

Birla Central Library

PILANI (Jaipur State)

Class No :- 914

Book No :- G 95 I

Accession No :- 6439

INSIDE EUROPE

by

JOHN GUNTHER

REVISED ILLUSTRATED EDITION

HAMISH HAMILTON
90 GREAT RUSSELL STREET LONDON

ORIGINAL EDITIONS

First Published	-	-	-	-	-	January 1936
Second Impression	-	-	-	-	-	January 1936
Third Impression	-	-	-	-	-	January 1936
Fourth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	February 1936
Fifth Impression (with new preface)	-	-	-	-	-	March 1936
Sixth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	March 1936
Seventh Impression	-	-	-	-	-	April 1936
Eighth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	May 1936
Ninth Impression (with new preface)	-	-	-	-	-	May 1936
Tenth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	June 1936
Eleventh Impression	-	-	-	-	-	July 1936
Twelfth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	August 1936
Thirteenth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	September 1936
Fourteenth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	October 1936

NEW AND REVISED EDITION

Fifteenth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	October 1936
Sixteenth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	November 1936
Seventeenth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	December 1936
Eighteenth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	December 1936
Nineteenth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	January 1937
Twentieth Impression (with new chapter)	-	-	-	-	-	March 1937
Twenty-first Impression	-	-	-	-	-	March 1937
Twenty-second Impression	-	-	-	-	-	May 1937
Twenty-third Impression	-	-	-	-	-	July 1937
Twenty-fourth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	August 1937

REVISED ILLUSTRATED EDITION

Twenty-fifth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	November 1937
Twenty-sixth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	November 1937
Twenty-seventh Impression	-	-	-	-	-	December 1937
Twenty-eighth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	March 1938
Twenty-ninth Impression	-	-	-	-	-	May 1938

To MY WIFE
IN LOVE AND FRIENDSHIP

NOTE

THIS book is written from a definite point of view. It is that the accidents of personality play a great role in history. As Bertrand Russell says, the Russian revolution might not have occurred without Lenin, and modern European development would have been very different if Bismarck had died as a child. The personality of Karl Marx himself has powerfully influenced the economic interpretation of history. Important political, religious, demographic, nationalist, as well as economic factors are not, I believe, neglected in this book. But its main trend is personal.

Fascism, the creation of Mussolini, has produced its first war. Then came Spain. What next?

The fact may be an outrage to reason, but it cannot be denied: unresolved personal conflicts in the lives of various European politicians may contribute to the collapse of our civilisation. This is the age of great dictatorial leaders; millions depend for life or death on the will of Hitler, Mussolini, Stalin. Never have politics been so vital and dynamic as to-day, and so pervasively obtrusive in non-political affairs. The politicians usurp other fields. What fictional drama can compare with the dramatic reality of Mussolini's career? What books in the realm of art have had the sale or influence of Hitler's Mein Kampf? What literary craftsman ever wrote history as Trotsky both wrote and made it? Who is a greater engineer than Stalin?

These men and their lesser contemporaries – couloir politicians like Laval, crude and boisterous adventurers of the type of Goering, nationalist officers like General Franco, politician-soldiers like the Polish general Rydz-Smigly, would-be dictators like Dr. Schuschnigg, Balkan kings like Zog and Carol – are playing decisive roles in the stupendous drama of Europe between wars. It is very difficult to explore usefully the private lives of these men. This is not a peep-hole book. It contains no gossip for gossip's sake. But it tries to tell the intimate story of these leaders, the personal sources of their power, the reasons for their impact on history. Who are these men who dominate our lives?

NOTE

The book begins with Hitler, then makes a tour around him. I have tried to note the impingement of Hitler's Germany on every European country, and to include an analysis of every important European situation. We visit, in a counter-clockwise circle, France, Spain, Italy; make a detour upward to that dominant island, England; proceed through the battered countries of Central Europe and the Balkans; finish the circle around Germany with Poland; visit Scandinavia and the neutral States briefly; inspect what we have seen of Western Europe at Geneva; and emerge finally in the Soviet Union. This arrangement has, I hope, a logic of its own.

J. G.

CONTENTS

CHAPTER	PAGE
I HITLER - - - - -	15
II PSYCHO-PATHOLOGY OF DICTATORS - - -	34
III WHO KILLED THE GERMAN REPUBLIC? - -	43
IV THE TRICK BY FIRE AND THE PURGE BY BLOOD	55
V THE TWO G-MEN - - - - -	73
VI THE OTHER LITTLE HITLERS - - - - -	84
VII WAR, PEACE, POLICY, AND CASH - - -	93
VIII LÉON BLUM - - - - -	113
IX FRENCH POLICY—AND WHY - - - - -	127
X MORE ABOUT FRENCHMEN - - - - -	143
XI FASCISM AND THE 'FRONT POPULAIRE' - -	159
XII THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR - - - - -	172
XIII MUSSOLINI - - - - -	194
XIV WHO ELSE IN ITALY? - - - - -	213
XV WAR IN ABYSSINIA - - - - -	222
XVI ENGLAND: THE RULING CLASSES - - -	236
XVII THE ABDICATION CRISIS - - - - -	250
XVIII CHAMBERLAIN AND BALDWIN - - - - -	264
XIX MEN OF WHITEHALL - - - - -	278
XX LEFT AND RIGHT IN ENGLAND - - - - -	295
XXI DE VALERA - - - - -	305
XXII DANUBE BLUES - - - - -	316
XXIII THE FEBRUARY TRAGEDY - - - - -	326

CONTENTS — continued

CHAPTER	PAGE
XXIV DEATH OF DOLLFUSS - - - - -	336
XXV AUSTRIA INFELIX - - - - -	353
XXVI HUNGARY AND DR. HABSBURG - - - - -	359
XXVII MASARYK AND BENEŠ - - - - -	368
XXVIII CAROL, RUMANIA, AND LUPESCU - - - - -	378
XXIX JUGOSLAVIA AFTER ALEXANDER - - - - -	393
XXX BALKAN KINGS - - - - -	409
XXXI THE TURKISH COLOSSUS - - - - -	418
XXXII POLAND WITHOUT PILSUDSKI - - - - -	424
XXXIII THE NOTABLE NEUTRALS - - - - -	435
XXXIV HALF A LEAGUE ONWARD - - - - -	446
XXXV STALIN - - - - -	456
XXXVI MEN AROUND STALIN - - - - -	477
XXXVII THE RUSSIAN TRIALS - - - - -	495
XXXVIII 'DURANTY'S INFERNO' - - - - -	506
ACKNOWLEDGMENTS AND BIBLIOGRAPHY - -	521
INDEX - - - - -	525

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

HITLER	- - - - -	(Wide World Photos)	Frontispiece
			facing page
GOERING	- - - - -	(Wide World Photos)	- 32
GOEBBELS AND HIS FAMILY	- - - - -	(Fox Photos)	- 80
BLUM	- - - - -	(Keystone View Co.)	- 120
CHAUTEMPS	- - - - -	(Keystone View Co.)	- 152
MUSSOLINI	- - - - -	(Wide World Photos)	- 200
WILLINGDON AND HOARE	- - - - -	(Central Press)	- 232
THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF WINDSOR	- - - - -	(Keystone View Co.)	- 256
NEVILLE CHAMBERLAIN	- - - - -	(Photopress)	- 264
BALDWIN AT HOME	- - - - -	(Central Press)	- 272
EDEN	- - - - -	(Topical Press Agency)	- 288
MOSLEY, LLOYD GEORGE AND MAXTON	- - - - -	(Wide World Photos)	- 304
DE VALERA	- - - - -	(Wide World Photos)	- 312
FEY, SCHUSCHNIGG AND STARHEMBERG	- - - - -	(Wide World Photos)	- 328
DOLLFUSS	- - - - -	(Photopress)	- 344
MASARYK	- - - - -	(Wide World Photos)	- 368
BENEŠ	- - - - -	(Wide World Photos)	- 376
CAROL	- - - - -	(Photopress)	- 384
ASSASSINATION OF KING ALEXANDER AT MARSEILLES	- - - - -	(Topical Press Agency)	- 400
EDWARD VIII AND KAMAL ATATURK	- - - - -	(Topical Press Agency)	- 420

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS—continued

	facing page
BECK, MOSCICKI AND LAVAL - - - - - (Wide World Photos)	- 432
STALIN - - - - - (Wide World Photos)	- 456
TROTSKY - - - - - (Wide World Photos)	- 464
LITVINOV - - - - - (Topical Press Agency)	- 512
 MAP OF EUROPE - - - - -	 - 24-25

INSIDE EUROPE

INSIDE EUROPE

CHAPTER I

HITLER

'The union of theoriser, organiser, and leader in one man is the rarest phenomenon on earth; therein lies greatness.'

— ADOLF HITLER.

ADOLF HITLER, irrational, contradictory, complex, is an unpredictable character; therein lies his power and his menace. To millions of honest Germans he is sublime, a figure of adoration; he fills them with love, fear, and nationalist ecstasy. To many other Germans he is meagre and ridiculous — a charlatan, a lucky hysteric, and a lying demagogue. What are the reasons for this paradox? What are the sources of his extraordinary power?

This paunchy, Charlie-Chaplin-moustached man, given to insomnia and emotionalism, who is head of the Nazi party, commander-in-chief of the German army and navy, Leader of the German nation, creator, president, and chancellor of the Third Reich, was born in Austria in 1889. He was not a German by birth. This was a highly important point inflaming his early nationalism. He developed the implacable patriotism of the frontiersman, the exile. Only an Austrian could take Germanism so seriously.

The inside story of Hitler includes many extraordinary and bizarre episodes. Before discussing his birth and childhood and outlining his career, it may be well to present a broad detailed picture of his character and his daily routine and his attitudes and habits, his personal characteristics and limitations.

Hitler the Human Being

His imagination is purely political. I have seen his early paintings, those which he submitted to the Vienna art academy as a boy. They are prosaic, utterly devoid of rhythm, colour, feeling, or spiritual imagination. They are architect's sketches: painful and precise draftsmanship; nothing more. No wonder the Vienna professors told him to go to an architectural school and give up pure art as hopeless.

His schooling was very brief, and by no stretch of generosity could he be called a person of genuine culture. He is not nearly so cultivated, so sophisticatedly interested in intellectual affairs as is, say, Mussolini. He reads almost nothing. The Treaty of Versailles was, probably, the most concrete single influence on his life; but it is doubtful if he ever read it in full. He dislikes intellectuals. He has never been outside Germany since his youth in Austria (if you except his War experiences in Flanders and the brief visit to Mussolini in Venice in 1934), and he speaks no foreign language, except a few words of French.

To many who meet him, Hitler seems awkward and ill at ease. This is because visitors, even among his subordinates, obtrude personal realities which interfere with his incessant fantasies. He has no poise. He finds it difficult to make quick decisions: capacity for quick decisions derives from inner harmony, which he lacks. He is no 'strong, silent man'.

Foreigners, especially interviewers from British or American papers, may find him cordial and even candid but they seldom have opportunity to question him, to participate in a give-and-take discussion. Hitler rants. He orates. He is extremely emotional.¹ He seldom answers questions. He talks to you as if you were a public meeting, and nothing can stop the gush of words.

Some time ago, before signing the friendship pact with Poland, he received a well-known American publicist and editor. He asked a question: What the American would think if, for example, Mexico were Poland and Texas were cut off from the United States by a 'corridor' in Mexico. The American replied, 'The answer to that is that Canada is not France.' Hitler had intended the question rhetorically, and he was so shocked and upset by the little interruption that it took him some time to get in full voice again — on another point.

For a time it was said commonly that Hitler's best trait was loyalty. He would never, the joke put it, give up three things: the Jews, his friends, and Austria. Nobody would make that joke to-day, now that Captain Roehm is dead. Nor would anyone of knowledge and discernment have made it even before June 30, 1934, because the scroll of Hitler's disloyalties was written in giant words.

¹ He told one astonished group of interviewers that they could 'crucify' him if he did not keep his promises.

One after another he eliminated those who helped him to his career: Drexler, Feder, Gregor Strasser. It is true that he has been loyal to some colleagues – those who never disagreed with him, who gave him absolute obedience. This loyalty is not an unmixed virtue, considering the unsavouriness of such men as Streicher, the Nuremberg Jew-fancier. Nothing can persuade Hitler to give up Streicher and some other comrades. Unsavouriness alone is not enough to provoke his Draconian ingratitude.

His physical courage is doubtful. When his men were fired on in the Munich Putsch of 1923, he flung himself to the street with such violence that his shoulder was broken. Nazi explanations of this are two: (1) linked arm in arm with a man on his right who was shot and killed, he was jerked unwittingly to the pavement; (2) he behaved with the reflex action of the veteran front-line soldier, that is, sensibly fell flat when the bullets came.

Hitler has told an acquaintance his own story of the somewhat mysterious circumstances in which he won the Iron Cross. He was a dispatch bearer. He was carrying messages across a part of No-Man's-Land which was believed to be clear of enemy troops, when he heard French voices. He was alone, armed only with a revolver; so with great presence of mind he shouted imaginary orders to an imaginary column of men. The Frenchmen tumbled out of a deserted dugout, seven in all, hands up. Hitler alone delivered all seven to the German lines. Recounting this story privately, he told his interlocutor that he knew the feat would have been impossible, had the seven men been American or English instead of French.¹

Like that of all fanatics, his capacity for self-belief, his ability to delude himself, is enormous. Thus he is quite 'sincere' – he really believes it – when in an interview with the Daily Mail he says that the Nazi revolution cost only twenty-six lives. He believes absolutely in what he says – at the moment.

But his lies have been notorious. Heiden² mentions some of the more recondite untruths, and others are known to every student. Hitler promised the authorities of Bavaria not to make a Putsch; and promptly made one. He promised to tolerate a Papen government; then fought it. He promised not to change the composition of the first cabinet; then changed it. He promised to kill himself if the Munich coup failed; it failed, and he is still alive.

¹ This story is not the official version, which is more grandiloquent. Some mystery attaches to the exact circumstances. cf. Heil, a bright anonymous book about Germany, p. 9.

² A History of National Socialism, by Konrad Heiden, a book indispensable for the study of the new Germany.

The Man Without Habits

Hitler, at forty-eight, is not in first-rate physical condition. He has gained about twelve pounds in the past year or so, and his neck and midriff show it. His physical presence has always been indifferent; the sloppiness with which he salutes is, for instance, notorious. The forearm barely moves above the elbow. He had lung trouble as a boy, and was blinded by poison gas in the War.

In August 1935, it was suddenly revealed that the Leader had suffered a minor operation some months before to remove a polyp on his vocal cords – penalty of years of tub-thumping. The operation was successful. The next month Hitler shocked his adherents at Nuremberg by alluding, in emotional and circumlocutory terms, to the possibility of his death. ‘I do not know when I shall finally close my eyes,’ he said, ‘but I do know that the party will continue and will rule. Leaders will come and Leaders will die, but Germany will live. . . . The army must preserve the power given to Germany and watch over it.’ The speech led to rumours (quite unconfirmed) that the growth in Hitler’s throat was malignant, and that he had cancer.

He takes no exercise, and his only important relaxation – though recently he began to like battleship cruises in the Baltic or North Sea – is music. He is deeply musical. Wagner is one of the cardinal influences on his life; he is obsessed by Wagner. He goes to opera as often as he can, and he was attending the Beyreuth Festival when, on July 25, 1934, Nazi putschists murdered Chancellor Dollfuss of Austria. Sessions of the Reichstag, which take place in the Kroll Opera House, sometimes end with whole performances of Wagner operas – to the boredom of non-musical deputies! When fatigued at night, in the old days, his friend Hanfstaengl was sometimes summoned to play him to sleep, occasionally with Schumann or Verdi, more often with Beethoven and Wagner, for Hitler needs music like dope.

Hitler cares nothing for books; nothing for clothes (he seldom wears anything but an ordinary brown-shirt uniform, or a double-breasted blue serge suit, with the inevitable raincoat and slouch hat); nothing for friends; and nothing for food and drink. He neither smokes nor drinks, and he will not allow anyone to smoke near him. He is practically a vegetarian. At the banquet tendered him by Mussolini he would eat only a double portion of scrambled eggs. He drinks coffee occasionally, but not often. Once or twice a week he crosses from the Chancellery to the Kaiserhof Hotel (the G.H.Q. of the Nazi party before he came to power), and sits there and sips – chocolate.

This has led many people to speak of Hitler's 'asceticism' but asceticism is not quite the proper word. He is limited in aesthetic interests, but he is no flagellant or anchorite. There is very little of the austere in Hitler. He eats only vegetables – but they are prepared by an exquisitely competent chef. He lives 'simply' – but his flat in Munich is the last word in courtly sumptuousness.

He works, when in Berlin, in the palace of the Reichskanzler on the Wilhelmstrasse. He seldom uses the president's palace a hundred yards away on the same street, because when Hindenburg died he wanted to eliminate as much as possible the memory of Presidential Germany. The building is new, furnished in modern glass and metal, and Hitler helped design it. Murals of the life of Wotan adorn the walls. An improvised balcony has been built over the street, from which, on public occasions, the Leader may review his men. Beneath the hall – according to reports – is a comfortable bomb-proof cellar.

Hitler dislikes Berlin. He leaves the capital at any opportunity, preferring Munich or Berchtesgaden, a village in southern Bavaria, where he has an alpine chalet, Haus Wachenfeld. Perched on the side of a mountain, this retreat, dear to his heart, is not far from the Austrian frontier, a psychological fact of great significance. From his front porch he can almost see the homeland which repudiated him, and for which he yearns.

Friends

By a man's friends may ye know him. But Hitler has none.

The man who is closest to Hitler at present, now that Capt. Ernst Roehm, the founder of the SA (Sturm Abteilung – Brown Shirts), is dead, is his chief bodyguard, Lieut. Brückner. The only two men who can see him at any time, without previous appointment, are Ribbentrop, his adviser in foreign affairs, and Schacht, the economics dictator. His chief permanent officials, like Dietrich, his Press secretary, may see him daily, and so may Hess, the deputy leader of the party; but even Hess is not an intimate friend. Neither Goering nor Goebbels, as a rule, may see Hitler without previous appointment.

He is almost oblivious of ordinary personal contacts. A colleague of mine travelled with him, in the same aeroplane, day after day, for two months during the 1932 electoral campaigns. Hitler never talked to a soul, not even to his secretaries, in the long hours in the air; never stirred; never smiled. My friend remembers most vividly that, in order to sneak a cigarette when the plane stopped, he had to run out of sight of the entourage. He says that he saw Hitler a steady five or six hours a day during this trip, but that he is perfectly sure Hitler, meeting him by chance outside the aeroplane, would not have known his name or face.

He dams profession of emotion to the bursting point, then is apt to break out in crying fits. A torrent of feminine tears compensates for the months of uneasy struggles not to give himself away. For instance, when he spent a whole night trying to persuade a dissident leader, Otto Strasser, from leaving the party, he broke into tears three times. In the early days he often wept, when other methods to carry a point failed.¹

Hitler does not enjoy too great exposure of this weakness, and he tends to keep all subordinates at a distance. They worship him: but they do not know him well. They may see him every day, year in year out; but they would never dare to be familiar. A man quite close to him told me once that in all the years of their association he had never called Hitler anything except 'Herr Hitler' (or 'Herr Reichskanzler' after the Leader reached power); and that Hitler had never called him by first name or his diminutive. There is an inhumanity about the inner circle of the Nazi party that is scarcely credible.

An old-time party member, to-day, would address Hitler as 'Mein Führer'; others as 'Herr Reichskanzler'. When greeted with the Nazi salute and the words 'Heil Hitler', Hitler himself replies with 'Heil Hitler'. Speechmaking, the Leader addresses his followers as 'My' German people. In posters for the plebiscites he asks, 'Dost thou, German man, and thou, German woman – etc.' It is as if he feels closer to the German people in bulk than to any individual German, and this is indeed true. The German people are the chief emotional reality of his life.

Let us, now, examine Hitler's relation to the imperatives which dominate the lives of most men.

¹ Compare to Stalin, for instance. Can one imagine Stalin weeping after a hard day, or summoning a comrade to play him music?

Attitude Towards Women

He is totally uninterested in women from any personal sexual point of view. He thinks of them as housewives and mothers or potential mothers, to provide sons for the battlefield – other people's sons.

'The life of our people must be freed from the asphyxiating perfume of modern eroticism,' he says in Mein Kampf, his autobiography.¹ His personal life embodies this precept to the fullest. He is not a woman-hater, but he avoids and evades women. His manners are those of the wary chevalier, given to hand-kissing – and nothing else. Many women are attracted to him sexually, but they have had to give up the chase. Frau Goebbels formerly had evening parties to which she asked pretty and distinguished women to meet him, but she was never able to arrange a match. The rumour was heard for a time that the coy Leader was engaged to the daughter-in-law of Richard Wagner. It was nonsense. It is quite possible that Hitler has never had anything to do with a woman in his life.

Occasionally young English or American girls, ardent Aryans, come to see him, and sometimes they are received. But Hitler does little but harangue them. At the top of his voice he talks politics and after a time subsides, as if limp and exhausted. Even these occasions are not tête-à-tête. For Hitler is very fond of the little daughter of Dr. Goebbels, and, fantastic as it may seem, she is often in the room, sometimes on the Leader's knee.

Nor, as is so widely believed, is he homosexual. Several German journalists spent much time and energy, when such an investigation was possible, checking every lodging that Hitler, in Munich days, had slept in; they interviewed beer-hall proprietors, coffee-house waiters, landladies, porters. No evidence was discovered that Hitler had been intimate with anybody of any sex at any time. His sexual energies, at the beginning of his career, were obviously sublimated into oratory. The influence of his mother and childhood environment, which we shall examine in Chapter Two, contributed signally to his frustration. Most of those German writers and observers best equipped to know think that Hitler is a virgin.

Attitude Towards Money

Hitler has no use for money personally and therefore very little interest in it, except for political purposes. He has virtually no financial sophistication; his lack of knowledge of even the practical details of finance, as of economics, is profound.

¹ Most of my quotations from Mein Kampf are from the English edition. (Hurst and Blackett, Ltd., 1933.)

Nowadays what would he need money for? The state furnishes him with servants, residences, motor-cars. One of his last personal purchases was a new raincoat for the visit to Mussolini in June 1934. Incidentally, members of his staff got into trouble over this, because on their advice he carried only civilian clothes; when he stepped from his aeroplane and saw Mussolini and all the Italians in uniform, he was ashamed of his mufti nakedness: and even suspected his advisers of purposely embarrassing him.

Hitler takes no salary from the state; rather he donates it to a fund which supports workmen who have suffered from labour accidents; but his private fortune could be considerable, if he chose to save. He announced late in 1935 that he – alone among statesmen – had no bank account or stocks or shares. Previous to this, it had been thought that he was part-owner of Franz Eher & Co., Munich, the publishers of the chief Nazi organs, Völkische Beobachter, Angriff, etc., one of the biggest publishing houses in Europe. Its director, Max Amman, was Hitler's sergeant-major in the War, and later for many years his business manager.

If Hitler has no personal fortune, he must have turned all his earnings from his autobiography, Mein Kampf, to the party. This book is almost obligatory reading for Germans and at a high price (RM 7.20 or about twelve shillings) it has sold 1,930,000 copies since its publication in 1925. If his royalty is fifteen per cent, a moderate estimate, Hitler's total proceeds from this source at the end of 1935 should have been about £160,000.

Nothing is more difficult in Europe than discovering the facts of the private fortunes of leading men. It is sacrosanct and thus forbidden ground to questioners in all countries. . . . Does any dictator, Hitler or Mussolini or Stalin, carry cash in his pocket, or make actual purchases in cash? It is unlikely.

Attitude Towards Religion

He was born and brought up a Roman Catholic. But he lost faith early and he attends no religious services of any kind. His catholicism means nothing to him; he is impervious even to the solace of confession. On being formed, his government almost immediately began a fierce religious war against Catholics, Protestants, and Jews alike.

Why? Perhaps the reason was not religion fundamentally, but politics. To Hitler the overwhelming first business of the Nazi revolution was the 'unification', the Gleichschaltung (co-ordination) of Germany. He had one driving passion, the removal from the Reich of any competition, of whatever kind. The Vatican, like Judaism, was a profoundly international (thus non-German) organism. Therefore – out with it.

The basis of much of the madness of Hitlerism was his incredibly severe and drastic desire to purge Germany of non-German elements, to create a hundred per cent Germany for one hundred per cent Germans only. He disliked bankers and department stores – as Dorothy Thompson pointed out – because they represented non-German, international, financial and commercial forces. He detested socialists and communists because they were affiliated with world groups aiming to internationalise labour. He loathed, above all, pacifists, because pacifists, opposing war, were internationalists.

Catholicism he considered a particularly dangerous competitive force, because it demands two allegiances of a man, and double allegiance was something Hitler could not countenance. Thus the campaign against the 'black moles', as Nazis call priests. Several times German relations with the Vatican neared breaking point. Protestantism was – theoretically – a simpler matter to deal with, because the Lutheran Church presumably was German and nationalist. Hitler thought that by the simple installation of an army chaplain, a ferocious Nazi named Müller, as Reichbishop, he could 'co-ordinate' the Evangelical Church in Germany, and turn it to his service. The idea of a united Protestant Church appealed to his neat, architect's mind. He was wrong. The church question has been an itching pot of trouble ever since. All through 1936 and 1937 it raged.

It was quite natural, following the confused failure to Nazify Protestantism, that some of Hitler's followers should have turned to Paganism. The Norse myths are a first-class nationalist substitute. Carried to its logical extreme, Naziism in fact demands the creation of a new and nationalist religion. Hitler has indicated this in a speech at Nuremberg in September 1935. 'Christianity,' he said, 'succeeded for a time in uniting the old Teutonic tribes, but the Reformation destroyed this unity. Germany is now a united nation. National socialism has succeeded where Christianity failed.' And Heiden has quoted Hitler's remark, 'We do not want any other God than Germany itself.' This is a vital point. Germany is Hitler's religion.

One of Hitler's grudges against God is the fact that Jesus was a Jew. Another is a nationalist grudge again. The basis of the Nazi revolution was the defeat of Germany in the War. Thus religion had to be Nazified because no God who permitted the French and other 'inferior' races to win the War could be a satisfactory God for Germany.

Hitler's attempt to unify religion in Germany may lead to one danger. He himself may become a God. And divinity entails difficulties. Gods have to perform miracles.

Vividly in Mein Kampf Hitler tells the story of his first encounter with a Jew. He was a boy of seventeen, alone in Vienna, and he had never seen a Jew in his life. The Jew, a visitor from Poland or the Ukraine, in native costume, outraged the tender susceptibilities of the youthful Hitler. 'Can this creature be a Jew?' he asked himself. Then, bursting on him, came a second question: 'Can he possibly be a German?'

This early experience had a profound influence on him, forming the emotional base of his perfervid anti-Semitism. He was provincially mortified that any such creature could be one with himself, a sharer in Teuton nationality. Later he 'rationalised' his fury on economic and political grounds. Jews, he said, took jobs away from 'Germans'; Jews controlled the Press of Berlin, the theatre, the arts; there were too many Jewish lawyers, doctors, professors; the Jews were a 'pestilence, worse than the Black Death'.

No one can properly conceive the basic depth and breadth of Hitler's anti-Semitism who has not carefully read Mein Kampf. This book was written twelve years ago. He has changed it as edition followed edition, in minor particulars, and refuses to allow its publication – unexpurgated – abroad. Recently he sued a French publisher who tried to bring out an unabridged translation. In all editions, the implacability of his anti-Jewish prejudice remains.

Any number of incidents outside the book may be mentioned. For instance, in the winter of 1934-35 he is reported to have seen a play called Tovarish, recounting sympathetically the plight of aristocratic Russian émigrés and sneering at the Bolsheviks, four times. Before he first attended it, it is said, his secretaries telegraphed to Paris to ascertain if the author, Jacques Deval, was Aryan as far back as his grandparents. It would have been unthinkable for Hitler to have witnessed a play by even a partly Jewish author.

Long before he became chancellor, Hitler would not allow himself to speak to a Jew even on the telephone. A publicist as well known as Walter Lippmann, a statesman as eminent as Lord Reading, would not be received at the Brown House. An interesting point arises. Has Hitler, in maturity, actually ever been in the company of a Jew, ever once talked to one? Possibly not.

'Am I My Brother's Keeper?'

Lieut. Brückner, the chief bodyguard, had two assistants, with the picturesque names of Schaub and Schreck, until Schreck died recently. Schaub takes care of all the details of Hitler's travel, arranges the motor-cars and aeroplanes. (Hitler, like Colonel Lindbergh, practically never takes a train.) Another member of this company, whose name is unknown, and who has fancifully been called the highest-paid man in Germany – according to the Daily Telegraph – is Hitler's double, a man who resembles him so startlingly that he can substitute for him, if necessary, on public occasions. But this may be a fable.

Extreme precautions are, naturally, taken to guard Hitler against assassination. Brückner, Schaub, and Schreck were supposed to be bound by a suicide pact; if, despite their vigilance, something should happen to the Führer, they would kill themselves. Recently a British politician lunched chez Hitler at the Chancellery. Nervously, he bumped a large vase off a pedestal. Instantly from behind each curtain an SS man, armed, is said to have leapt into the room.

When Hitler rides out in Berlin, he travels in a Mercédès-Benz as big as a locomotive. Brückner usually sits beside him. SS men with rifles may stand on the running-boards. If the occasion is ceremonial and large crowds are present, the route is lined with SS men (Black Shirts) alternately facing inward and outward.

Brückner is of great importance politically because he serves to block Hitler off from normal contacts. The complaint frequently is heard that Hitler is badly informed on even vital matters, because Brückner so isolates him from wide acquaintance; even advisers with the best intentions may have little chance of seeing him.

Not long ago Hitler broke his new rule against social affairs by visiting informally a diplomat and his wife who had been useful to him in earlier days. The diplomat talked to Hitler frankly and told him some honest truths. Hitler was upset. Then, the story says, Brückner descended on the diplomat, warning him under no circumstances to dare talk frankly to Hitler again.

Insurance rates on Hitler's life are quoted in London. A man with important business in Germany, which might be ruined by the terror and revolution which would very likely follow Hitler's assassination, paid £10 10s. per month for each £200 of insurance against Hitler's death.¹ But there was no authentic evidence of any attempt on his life up to the middle of 1936.²

Personal Sources of Power

Now we may proceed to summarise what might be called Hitler's positive qualities.

First of all, consider his single-mindedness, his intent fixity of purpose. His tactics may change; his strategy may change; his aim, never. His aim is to create a strong national Germany, with himself atop it. No opportunistic device, no zigzag in polemics, is too great for him; but the aim, the goal, never varies.

Associated with his single-mindedness is the quality of stamina. All dictators have stamina; all need it. Despite Hitler's lack of vigorous gesture and essential flabbiness, his physical endurance is considerable. I know interviewers who have talked to him on the eve of an election, after he has made several speeches a day, all over Germany, week on end; they found him fresh and even calm. 'When I have a mission to fulfil, I will have the strength for it,' he said.

Unlike most dictators, he has no great capacity for hard work, for industry; he is not the sloghorse that, for instance, Stalin is. He is not a good executive; his desk is usually high with documents requiring his decision which he neglects. He hates to make up his mind. His orders are often vague and contradictory.

Yet he gets a good deal of work done. 'Industry' in a dictator or head of a state means, as a rule, ability to read and listen. The major part of the work of Hitler or Mussolini is perusal of reports and attention to the advice of experts and subordinates. Half their working time they spend in receiving information. Therefore it is necessary for a dictator (a) to choose men intelligently – many of Hitler's best men he inherited from the old civil service, (b) to instil faith in himself in them. Hitler has succeeded in this double task amply. And when his men fail him, he murders them.

¹ cf. News Chronicle, London, May 21, 1935. The charge for similar insurance against Mussolini's assassination were £4 on £100 for three months.

² In March 1937, General Goering surprised listeners by a veiled reference to possible dangers to Hitler and thereby against a possible assassin.

Hitler's political sense is highly developed and acute. His calculations are shrewd and penetrating to the smallest detail. For instance, his three major decisions on foreign policy, Germany's departure from the League of Nations, the introduction of conscription, and the occupation of the Rhineland, were deliberately set for Saturday afternoon, to ease the shock to opinion abroad. When he has something unpleasant to explain, the events of June 30 for instance, he usually speaks well after eight p.m. so that foreign newspapers can carry only a hurried and perhaps garbled account of his words.

He made good practical use of his anti-Semitism. The Jewish terror was, indeed, an excellent campaign manoeuvre. The Nazis surged into power in March 1933 with an immense and unrealisable series of electoral pledges. They promised to end unemployment, rescind the Versailles Treaty, regain the Polish corridor, assimilate Austria, abolish department stores, socialise industry, eliminate interest on capital, give the people land. These aims were more easily talked about than achieved. One thing the Nazis could do. One pledge they could redeem – beat the Jews.

Hitler bases most decisions on intuition. Twice, on supreme occasions, it served him well. In the spring of 1932 his most powerful supporters, chiefly Roehm, pressed him to make a Putsch. Hitler refused, feeling absolute surety that he could come to power legally. Again, in the autumn of 1932, after the Nazis had lost heavily in the November elections, a strong section of the party, led by Gregor Strasser, urged him to admit defeat and enter a coalition government on disadvantageous terms. Hitler, with consummate perspicacity, refused. And within three months he reached power such as the maddest of his followers had not dreamed of.

Another source of Hitler's power is his impersonality, as Frances Gunther has pointed out. His vanity is extreme, but in an odd way it is not personal. He has no peacockery. Mussolini must have given autographed photographs to at least several thousand admirers since 1922. Those which Hitler has bestowed on friends may be counted on the fingers of two hands. His vanity is the more effective because it expresses itself in non-personal terms. He is the vessel, the instrument, of the will of the German people; or so he pretends. Thus his famous statement, after the June 30 murders, that for twenty-four hours he had been the supreme court of Germany.

Heiden says that Hitler's power is based on intellect, and his intellect on logic. This would seem a dubious interpretation because Hitler's mind is not ratiocinative in the least: he is a man of passion, of instinct, not of reason. His 'intellect' is that of a chameleon who knows when to change his colour; his 'logic' that of a panther who is hungry, and thus seeks food. He himself has said – proudly – that he is a 'somnambulist'.

His brain is small, limited, vulgar, narrow, and suspicious. But behind it is the lamp of passion, and this passion has such quality that it is immediately discernible and recognisable, like a diamond in the sand. The range of his interests is so slight that any sort of stimulus provokes the identical reflex: music, religion, economics, mean nothing to him except exercise in nationalism.

Anthony Eden, when he visited Berlin in the spring of 1935, and talked with Hitler seven hours, was quoted as saying that he showed 'complete mastery' of foreign affairs. This is, of course, nonsense. Hitler does not know one-tenth as much about foreign affairs, as, say, H. R. Knickerbocker, or F. A. Voigt, or Frank H. Simonds, or Dorothy Thompson, or Mr. Eden himself. What Eden meant was that Hitler showed unflagging mastery of his own view of foreign affairs.

Demosthenes in Brown Shirt

Then there is oratory. This is probably the chief external explanation of Hitler's rise. He talked himself to power. The strange thing is that Hitler is a bad speaker. He screeches; his mannerisms are awkward; his voice breaks at every peroration; he never knows when to stop. Goebbels is a far more subtle and accomplished orator. Yet Hitler, whose magnetism across the table is almost nil, can arouse an audience, especially a big audience, to frenzy.

He knows, of course, all the tricks. At one period he was accustomed to mention at great length the things that 'We Germans' (wir) had, or did not have, or wanted to do, or could not do. The word 'wir' drove into the audience with rhythmic savagery of a pneumatic drill. Then Hitler would pause dramatically. That, he would say, was the whole trouble. In Germany the word 'wir' had no meaning; the country was disunited; there was no 'we'.

Recently Hitler told a French interviewer about an early oratorical trick and triumph, fifteen years ago in a communist stronghold in Bavaria. He was savagely heckled. 'At any moment they might have thrown me out of the window, especially when they produced a blind War invalid who began to speak against all the things that are sacred to me. Fortunately I had also been blind as a result of the War. So I said to these people, "I know what this man feels. I was even more bewildered than he at one moment – but I have recovered my sight!"'

Hitler's first followers were converts in the literal sense of the term. They hit the sawdust trail. Hitler might have been Aimée Semple McPherson or Billy Sunday. Men listened to him once and were his for life – for instance, Goebbels, Brücker, Goering, Hess.

'Ruin Seize Thee, Ruthless King'

Hitler never flinched from the use of terror, and terror played a powerful role in the creation of the Nazi state. From the beginning he encouraged terror. The only purely joyous passage in Mein Kampf is the description of his first big mass meeting, in which the newly-organised SA pummelled hecklers bloody. The function of the SA was rough-house: first, rough-house with the aim of preserving 'order' at public meetings; second, rough-house on the streets, to frighten, terrorise and murder communists.

He gave jobs, big jobs, to confessed and admitted terrorists and murderers, like Heines. When a communist was murdered at Potempa, in Silesia, in circumstances of peculiarly revolting brutality, Hitler announced publicly his spiritual unity with the murderers. When, in August 1932, he thought that Hindenburg might appoint him chancellor, he asked for a three-day period during which the SA could run wild on the streets, and thus revenge themselves upon their enemies.

And we shall see presently what happened on the 30th June, 1934.

Führer Prinzip

Hitler's one contribution to political theory was the Führer Prinzip (Leader Principle). This means, briefly, authority from the top down, obedience from the bottom up, the reversal of the democratic theory of government. It was, as Heiden points out, a remarkably successful invention, since almost anybody could join the movement, no matter with what various aims, and yet feel spiritual cohesion through the personality of the leader. The Nazi movement gave wonderful play to diverse instincts and desires.

Then again, Germans love to be ruled. 'The most blissful state a German can experience is that of being bossed,' a friend of mine put it in Berlin. And Edgar Ansel Mowrer has recorded the shouts of Nazi youngsters on the streets, 'We spit at freedom.' A German feels undressed unless he is in uniform. The Führer Prinzip not only exploited this feeling by transforming the passive character of German docility, German obedience, into an active virtue; it gave expression also to the bipolar nature of obedience, namely that most men—even Germans—associate with a desire to be governed a hidden will to govern. The Führer Prinzip created hundreds, thousands, of sub-Führers, little Hitlers, down to the lowest storm-troop leader. It combined dignified submission with opportunity for leadership.

Mein Kampf, for all its impersonality, reveals over and over again Hitler's faith in 'the man'. After race and nation, personality is his main preoccupation. It is easy to see that the Führer Prinzip is simply a rationalisation of his own ambition; the theory is announced on the implicit understanding that the 'man' is Hitler himself. 'A majority,' he says, 'can never be a substitute for the Man.'

Opposition

Essentially Hitlerism is the process of 'unifying' Germany. Yet the Nazis have struck at Protestants, Catholics, Jews; they have mortally affronted the working classes; they cannot put into serious action any programme of economic amelioration without offending the industrialists; they have alienated, by brutality and terror, the republicans, democrats, socialists, communists.

By autumn 1937 Hitler had held three plebiscites. One asked vindication of his departure from the League, and he received a 92.3 per cent vote of confidence. The second sought acceptance of his combination of chancellorship and presidency after the death of Hindenburg; the affirmative vote was 38,362,760 out of 43,529,710 ballots cast. The third followed the Rhineland crisis in March 1936; his vote was no less than ninety-eight per cent. Of course none was a fair vote in the Anglo-Saxon sense of the term. The plebiscite in the Saar gave him ninety per cent, but it probably would have been the same under any other chancellor. The last general election in Danzig, where every effort was made to bring out the vote and which was a better indication than the Saar of public feeling on a straight for-or-against-Hitler issue, brought him 139,043 votes out of 234,956 – good enough, but not the two-thirds majority he hoped for.

The last reasonably fair German election, on March 5, 1933 – even though it took place under the shadow of the Reichstag fire – gave Hitler thirty-seven per cent. I believe in an election to-day he would better this considerably. Even so, the total Marxist (communist-cum-socialist) vote in 1933 was 11,845,000. This number has probably receded, but just the same there is still a large opposition submerged in Germany. What has happened to these millions of hidden voters?

They are terrified. They are hounded by the police and by spies. They vote Yes in plebiscites because they are frightened of their skins. Some few of them have sought cover actually by joining the SA. Most simply swallow their opinions, their feelings, their inward decency – and wait. They are waiting for their Day. But are they an active political force? No.

The reason is that revolution is a profoundly difficult matter in a police state like Germany, Russia, or Fascist Italy. It is almost an axiom these days that no revolution can succeed until the equipment in arms and ammunition of the revolutionaries is equal or superior to that of the government. And this margin of superiority is transcendently difficult to achieve.

The Nazis, to their own disadvantage, discovered the essential necessity of arms in the Austrian civil war of July 1934. They neglected to arm their Austrian adherents, out of carelessness or over-confidence; they assumed that once the signal for the revolt was given the Austrian army and police would mutiny and turn over their arms to the Nazis; this did not happen. The army and police of Dr. Dollfuss remained, by and large, loyal. Therefore we had the spectacle of thousands upon thousands of potentially revolutionary Nazis inhibited from any decisive or direct action simply because they did not possess arms. This lesson is cardinal. You cannot fight a machine-gun by saying 'Boo' to it.

If the people riot, Hitler can simply shoot them down. He has the Reichswehr (regular army) to do this, not merely the SA and SS. The Reichswehr (the ranks are mostly peasant boys) might not shoot at a rising in the agrarian districts, but the farmers are the most tractable people in Hitler's Reich. An urban population would get short shrift. But, one may say, no man, not even Hitler, could shoot down tens of thousands of unarmed or roughly armed rebels. The answer to this is that it is not necessary to shoot down tens of thousands. A few hundreds will be enough.

What is more likely to happen than open rebellion is the slow pressure upward of mass discontent, grumbling, and passive resistance, sabotage caused by growing privation, until the morale of the government cracks, and the government, panicky, does foolish things. Discontent may corrosively simmer to the top, disorganising the headship of state, causing new rivalries between sub-leaders, creating fissures between, say, Goebbels on the left and Schacht on the right, so deep and so unbridgeable that Hitler is powerless to compose the conflict.

The government might then attempt a classic but dangerous diversion – war.

Succession to the Purple

If Hitler should die to-morrow his most likely successor would be Goering, bitterly as he is disliked and feared by many members of the party. The Leader might himself prefer Hess, his deputy, as successor, but in the rough-and-tumble that might follow his death, Hess would have small chance against such a doughty character as Goering. The general is the logical choice.

Goering has force, colour, ambition; he is a figure of great popular appeal. The quality and quantity of his uniforms are highly attractive to Germans; his marriage may produce a dynasty. What is more important, the army likes him because he stands for the same thing as it stands for: a strong Germany. Moreover, in the SS and remnants of SA, Goering has a considerable armed force behind him. Finally, he has the guts to grab the job, if grabbing is necessary.

Goebbels would be impossible as successor to Hitler; he is the cleverest of the lot, but everybody hates him. Frick is important, but too colourless; Hess too unambitious; Ley and Darré out of the running as 'radicals'; Schacht is of the greatest importance in economics and finance, but impossible as a popular leader. In fact, the only alternative to Goering would seem to be a complete Reichswehr ministry formed by an army coup d'état, such as the one Schleicher might have headed. Or a dark horse.

Rumours, however, to the effect that Goering is now actively intriguing against Hitler are nonsense. There are many virtues that Goering lacks, but loyalty is not among them – at least not yet.

GOERING

Besides, Hitler could eliminate Goering to-day almost as easily as he eliminated Roehm. Hitler is all-powerful. Real rivals do not exist. Goering, Goebbels, and all the rest of them, as H. R. Knickerbocker once expressed it, are no more than moons to Hitler's sun. They shine – but only when the sun shines on them.

CHAPTER II

PSYCHO-PATHOLOGY OF DICTATORS

'The German has not the slightest notion how a people must be misled if the adherence of the masses is sought.'

— ADOLF HITLER.

NOT only Hitler but several modern leaders were born in border-zones or actually different countries from those they came to rule. Mustapha Kamal Ataturk, though you would hardly call him a Greek, was born in Salonika, Greece; Pilsudski was Lithuanian in origin; Schuschnigg, the Austrian chancellor, was born in Italy; and Stalin, as everyone knows, is not a Russian at all, but a Georgian.

I have visited Braunau, in Austria, and seen the house where Hitler was born. The legend has grown of a rustic dwelling, the Teutonic equivalent of our country cottage, where, in stern but idyllically bucolic circumstances, the Leader first saw daylight. Of course this is inaccurate. The house is a three-story structure on the main street of Braunau, and for twenty years it has been a Gasthaus (saloon, village pub) owned by a local worthy named Josef Pommer. Where a bronze tablet may one day mark the Leader's birth-place an enamelled metal sign now says, 'Spekl beer on draught.'

The house to-day is painted bright ochre brown, the colour of the brown-shirt uniform. It was padlocked by the Austrian authorities in July 1933, because it was the natural local headquarters of the Nazis. Hitler's parents never owned it; they lived in furnished rooms rented from the landlord. On the other hand, his father was not a poor man, and the legend that Hitler all but starved as a boy is nonsense.

The whole region around Braunau is Hitler country. Dozens of people who are still alive remember him as a young man. In the village of Spital, near Weitra, I met his mother's sister and two of his first cousins; in Leonding, near Linz, I talked to his Vormund (godfather), the son of his old schoolmaster (who had been one of his classmates), the proprietors of the pub where his father died, and – interesting old woman! – the midwife who hauled his infant body from his mother's womb.

Family Tree

The Hitler family springs from a section of Austria known as the Waldviertel, billowing Danube country near what is now the Czechoslovak frontier. The peasants living there are humble folk, blanched by poverty and gnarled by work; honest, God-fearing, illiterate, and heavily inbred. Populations of whole villages are first and second cousins. They live by tilling the soil, working in mills, or practising some humble trade like carpentry.

In the Waldviertel village Spital a man named Johann Georg Hiedler was born in February 1792. This was Adolf Hitler's grandfather. He was a wandering miller's helper. By him, a woman named Maria Anna Schicklgruber had a son, born in a near-by hamlet Strones in 1837. Five years later the parents were married, but the son took his mother's name – Schicklgruber – and was not legally legitimised till he was forty years old, in 1877. Then he became known as Alois Hitler – Adolf Hitler's father.

The change from 'Hiedler' to 'Hitler' is easily explained. The peasants could scarcely read and write; names were hardly ever written down, except at birth and death. Hiedler's father, in fact, called himself 'Hüttler', according to the records I saw in the village church. And Paula Hitler, Adolf's sister, to this day signs herself 'Hiedler'.

Alois Hitler, Adolf's father, was a cobbler. He married three times. His first wife, Anna Gläsl-Horer, was born in the Waldviertel town of Theresienfeld in 1823, and died in Braunau in 1883. This Anna, a moderately rich woman, treated the young cobbler, then known as Schicklgruber, as mother as well as wife and sent him to school, then purchased him a job in the Austrian civil service. She was fourteen years older than he. Thanks to her, he became a solid citizen, and the education of his son Adolf, born years later by another wife, was made possible.

Anna died in 1883; Alois waited only six weeks to marry again, this time to a woman named Franziska Matzelsberger. Their marriage lasted only a year. She died in 1884. Only three months after her death, Alois married once more, this time to Adolf's mother, Klara Poelzl, a distant cousin. This was on January 7, 1885. Four years later, in Braunau, on April 20, 1889, Adolf Hitler, creator of the Third Reich, was born. His father was fifty-two at his birth, his mother twenty-nine.

Klara Poelzl, Adolf's mother, was a woman of enterprise and courage. Her father was a peasant in the village of Spital, and her mother was Johanna Hüttler, a cousin of Alois Hitler's father. When Klara was ten years old (in 1870), she got her first job – as maid in the home of Alois Hitler's first wife, Anna Gläsl-Horer. Here Alois first saw the little girl, a distant relative, whom fifteen years later he was to marry – his first wife's servant.

Presently Klara ran away to Vienna. This was an unprecedented thing to do. Few other girls in the Waldviertel had shown such initiative. No one knew the reason for her flight. I have asked her sister (living to-day) about it. She has no explanation. Klara lived in Vienna – her circumstances a complete mystery – for ten years. Then in 1885 she returned to her native village, Spital. She was a tall, nervous girl now, not as strong as most of the peasant stock she came from. She lived with her parents in a house adjacent to the one – I have seen them both – wherein Alois was brooding over the loss of his two wives. He remembered the girl who had been his wife's servant – and married her.

By his first wife, Anna, Alois had had two children. A son, Alois Junior (Adolf's half-brother) became a waiter and recently opened a Berlin restaurant. A daughter, Angela, went to Vienna where she married a man named Raupel and earned a living as a cook in a Student's Charity Hall in Vienna. Some years ago Adolf brought her to Germany and installed her as housekeeper in his Berchtesgaden villa.

Klara had two children besides Adolf. Paula, born in 1897, is unmarried (another spinster in this neurotic family) and lives to-day in Vienna, an anonymous and forgotten figure. The local Nazis tried to make a heroine of her, but she was too retiring. Hitler apparently has nothing to do with her. The third child, Edouard, died in infancy.

Alois, a customs inspector, and Klara, with the boy Adolf growing up, lived in Braunau,¹ an important frontier town, until 1896, when Alois retired on pension. Then he moved to a village near Linz named Leonding, bought a house, and lived in it with Klara and Adolf till he died in 1903.

¹ Interestingly enough two of the most famous clairvoyants of modern Europe were born in Braunau, Willi and Rudi Schneider.

Father and Mother

I have seen the tombstone of Hitler père. It reads:

HIER RUHET IN GOTT HERR

ALOIS HITLER

K.K. Zollamts Oberoffizial I.P.
und Hausbesitzer

Gest. 3 Janner 1903, in 65 Lebensjahre
Dessen Gattin Frau

KLARA HITLER

Gest. 21 Dez. 1907 i. 47 Lebj.
R.I.P.

As is common in Austria, a small photograph of the dead man is attached to the stone. A skull big and round and hairless like a melon; small, sharp, wicked little eyes; a pair of bicycle-handle moustaches, and a heavy tyrant's chin. The mother's picture we saw later in a relative's house. A tall woman, with a narrow, sensitive face and arching eyes over sunken cheek-bones; her yellow braids now a grey mat at the back of the neck; large, luminous eyes.

Young Adolf detested his father and loved his mother. This difficult parental relationship, on which the villagers with whom I talked and the surviving relatives agreed, was obviously a cardinal point in the development of Hitler's character. He had an Oedipus complex as big as a house.

Hitler père was truculent and overbearing; he died over a bottle of wine in a public-house, of a sudden stroke. The father thought that Adolf was a weakling and a worthless idler and dreamer; he called him 'moonstruck', and bullied and beat him.

Young Hitler identified himself with his mother in opposition to the father. His jealousy of the father produced an extreme divergence in his character. Old Hitler was a drunkard; young Hitler never touched alcohol. Old Hitler married three times in quick succession; young Hitler never had any love life at all. Old Hitler was besotted with indulgence; young Hitler feared it.

Adolf loved his mother passionately. When he was about six she developed cancer, and it took her almost ten years to die. From her he got his impulse to ambition, his sense of historical mission, because she, too, wanted him to be different from his father. The mother encouraged him to be an artist. Throughout his life, Hitler has been subconsciously proving to his mother, the only woman he has loved, his right to independence, success, power.

In Spital, a country hamlet about an hour's journey from Leonding, I met several surviving members of the family, among them Hitler's aunt, Theresa Schmidt (Klara's sister) a bouncing old woman, and her two sons, Edward and Anton, Hitler's first cousins. One of them, Edward, is a hunchback with an impediment in his speech – a pitiable creature. They are miserably poor.

These people are Hitler's blood relatives. Their plaster huts seem a million miles from the shining roofs of Wilhelmstrasse, where the Leader rules. Hitler has never returned to visit the district since he left it as a boy. He sends these cousins no letters, no money, and seems totally unaware of their existence.

Authority Complex

All dictators are abnormal. This may be accepted as an axiom. No man perfectly normal can take it upon himself to rule a nation dictatorially, if only because the vanity of the normal male is not capacious enough to accept such supreme responsibility. Aside from this, most dictators are profound neurotics. Kamal Ataturk had a wildly disordered personal life; Dollfuss had a dwarf-complex; Pilsudski's breathless rages were pathological; Mussolini is something of a megalomaniac. Of the lot, Stalin is probably the nearest to a normal human being, but one should not forget that he was a criminal, viz. bomb-thrower, in his youth.

The great Viennese psychiatrist Dr. Wilhelm Stekel has a theory which accounts handily both for the neuroticism of dictators and for the supine willingness of most people to submit to dictatorial rule. He calls it the Authority Complex.

One must begin with the child. In every child, says Stekel, there is a struggle between his own instincts and the lessons he derives from the outer world. Children like, for instance, to be dirty. But they are taught by external education to be clean. Education is largely an effort to mould a child in opposition to his original instincts. Education is effected by authority. And authority becomes the child's enemy, because it means renouncement of his own instincts.

The first authority is that of the parents. If the parents are too weak and the child is overtly defiant, then other authorities come into play. The authority of older children. The authority of the teacher. In some cases, the authority of the law. The authority, above all, of religion. The final weapon in the hands of adults teaching authority to children is the phrase, 'God will punish you.'

Since about 1914 the Authority Complex has tended to break down. It is obvious that the family is no longer the sacred unit it once was. 'Parents,' Stekel puts it, 'did not respond themselves to the moral standard which they demanded of their children.' Inevitably children revolted at this unfairness. Parents sought stupidly or blindly to impose on children the moral imperatives which they ignored, which left the children no alternative but to revenge themselves by overthrowing parental prohibitions.

As with parents, so with teachers. School and university were taken less and less seriously. The Great War undermined authority internationally, and presently law and order within national boundaries suffered: a flood of criminality deluged the world, especially America. Then too, religion had been displaced by modern science as a vital authoritarian factor. Finally, young men and women asked how they could longer believe in a God who permitted the War and the butchery therein of some ten million men. Thus the principle of authority became discredited, and the old Authority Complex collapsed.

As a result came the wave of dictators. The Hitlers and Mussolinis were essentially father-substitutes. People may resent authority but they cannot easily live without it in some form; children have revolted against their fathers, and Hitler, Mussolini, Pilsudski, Alexander of Jugoslavia, Dollfuss, Kamal Ataturk, Stalin, replaced them. The modern child thought his parents unworthy and thus sought an external leader. The sphere of authority had been moved outside the home.

How Dictators Rule

Fundamentally all government is a subtle combination of the forces of fear and love. Dictators increase the dynamics of this process. Alexander of Jugoslavia tried to win over the rebellious Croats at the same time that he dragooned them to submission. Little Dollfuss murdered the socialists by artillery fire and then begged them to forgive him. Hitler is beloved by many of his followers; just the same, the St. Bartholomew of June 30 was necessary.

Why does the individual not resent the authority of the dictator, or leader, just as he resented parental authority? The reason, according to Stekel, is that individual doubt of the fallibility of the dictator is lessened as more and more people come to follow and worship him. The greater the number of followers, the less the necessity for doubt. 'A psychic epidemic of adoration' floods the country, engulfing the whole nation which prostrates itself at the dictator's feet.

Moreover, Stekel says, as more and more people join the leader, their merged inferiorities become a superiority. The people identify themselves with the leader. They partake of the flesh of his authority. They become part of his soul and substance, and he of theirs. They share in his Authority Complex. Germans, for instance, say that they don't fight for Hitler, but that Hitler fights for them. Mussolini does not want power for himself, many Italians believe, but only for the sake of Italy, viz., other Italians, viz., themselves. 'Obedience and defiance, love and hate, finally combine,' says Dr. Stekel, 'and the dictator becomes the saviour.'

In olden days new leaders were usually the founders of new religions. Now they are political. Many present-day leaders are jealous of religion; they fear the implacable rivalry of the Authority of God. Thus, very often, they try to kill religion, their strongest competitor, by seeking to destroy the religious faith of their people: Kamal Ataturk disestablished Islam, Stalin tried to root out the Orthodox Church.

Dictators are themselves usually neurotics because they too suffered from the iron circumscription of the Authority Complex; they too revolted against authority in childhood. But they were persons often of superior mentality or will, and, after a miserable childhood, their revolt was successful, and they revenged themselves on their parents by imposing authority on others. They became fathers, not of a family, but a nation.

Almost all the modern dictators (Alexander of Yugoslavia was an exception) were born in poverty. Mussolini and Stalin were wretchedly poor. Moreover several dictators, like Hitler, underwent childhood experiences of the most disastrous sort; Dollfuss, for instance, was of humble origin. The dictators compensated for their bitter youth by search for power and glory afterwards. Power and glory, even achieved, may not be anodynes enough. Thus Hitler seeks refuge in music, Mussolini in speeding, Kamal Ataturk in dissipation.

Dictators reach power so easily, Stekel believes, because we, the common people, seek to blame something for every crisis, and the nearest and biggest and easiest things to blame are our institutions. So the institutions fall, to give way to dictatorship. Dictators keep power so easily because the force of arms is inherent in their systems, and we, the common people – speaking broadly – like to be afraid.

Début

Hitler entered political life as a spy. The fact is unpleasant. The story is fully told by Heiden. Hitler was a non-commissioned officer in the German army, which had just become the Reichswehr, and he was detailed early in 1919 as a sort of intelligence officer to attend labour meetings, mingle with workers groups, and report to his superiors the state of popular opinion. Fulfilling one of these missions, he heard a man named Gottfried Feder speak. He was impressed by Feder's violent economic theories, including the distinction between raffendes (grasping, hence Jewish) and schaffendes (creative, hence Aryan) capital; he came again to hear him, and joined excitedly the discussion following the meeting, squelching an opposition speaker.

Feder was closely in touch with an ex-locksmith, Anton Drexler, who had formed a minuscule group of riffraff called the German Workers Party. Presently, Hitler was invited to join this party. He records his two days of 'agonised meditation and questioning' before giving assent. Then he became No. 7 not in the party itself (which at the time numbered about sixty members) but in its council. This was in July 1919. Officially, however, until the next June, Hitler remained in the service of his regiment.

The rise of the party under Hitler is history. He changed its name to N.S.D.A.P. (National Sozialistische Deutsche Arbeiter Partei), which, usually shortened to 'Nazi' is still its official name. He spoke first to audiences of twenty, then to twenty thousand. He founded his private army, the SA, the Brown Shirts. He was ill-advised enough to attempt a revolution in Munich in 1923 and was defeated and sentenced to jail for high treason. He emerged—Germany's potential 'saviour'.

It is well to underline two subsidiary but important points. One was that Hitler began to equivocate almost from the moment he seized control of the party. Naziism began as a predominantly Left-socialist movement, and the party programme, written by Feder and pronounced unalterable by Hitler, was a formidably anti-capitalist document. Hitler began to shed the socialist parts of the programme with systematic regularity as soon as he was on the road to power. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that Hitler never meant much by his socialist promises: they were a lure for votes, political racketeering, little more.

The second point is Hitler's intimate association with army influences almost from the beginning. He, as well as anyone, knew that the Reichswehr would in time wield decisive influence in Germany. As much as he dared, cautiously, cleverly, he cultivated the Reichswehr. It is not generally known that he was enabled to purchase control of the Völkische Beobachter, which became the principal Nazi organ, through use of Reichswehr funds.

Hitler took over the party from Drexler and Feder, but essentially it was his creation. He cozened it, nurtured it, watched it grow, and controlled it. The party came out of his own blood and heart. He was helped, and not inconsiderably, by industrialists, by gangsters, by smart bureaucrats and organisers; but his was the feeding spirit, the dominating pulse. He was himself responsible for the smallest details. He designed the Swastika flag, for instance, and he shaped the general propaganda methods, the like of which were never before seen in Germany – or anywhere. The party was everything to Hitler. It was his wife, mother, mistress, and all his children – at the end thirteen million of them.

Miracle of Nationality

Hitler became a German citizen only by virtue of machinery remarkably devious. He could not run for President against von Hindenburg while still technically an Austrian subject. But the Reich Government of the day had no intention of conferring statehood on its chief opponent. Therefore the Nazis had to resort to guile.

Dr. Frick, one of the earliest Hitlerites, the first Nazi to hold electoral office in the Reich, was minister of education and the interior in Thuringia. Citizenship would come automatically to Hitler if he became a German official, and Frick therefore decided to appoint him commander of gendarmerie in the inconspicuous hamlet of Hildburghausen. But news of this forcible 'naturalisation' leaked out and when all Germany laughed at the picture of Hitler as a Hildburghausen policeman the plan was given up.

Subsequently another Nazi who held a governmental post, Dietrich Klagges, the minister of justice in Brunswick, appointed Hitler to be Counsellor of the Brunswick Legation in Berlin. Scarcely anyone in Germany knew that such a post existed. Hitler took oath to be loyal to the constitution – which he was openly threatening to destroy – and the Austrian village boy became at long last – a German.

CHAPTER III

WHO KILLED THE GERMAN REPUBLIC?

'Everything has a cause, and the cause of anything is everything.'

- W. J. TURNER.

PERSONAL qualities alone would not have brought Hitler power. But they contributed to one of the main factors that did – his feat in identifying himself with a large percentage of the German nation. He became a demigod, a prophet, because with great mesmeric ability he persuaded so many Germans that he, and he alone, represented their renascent Germanism. People love Hitler because they love Germany. And Hitler and Germany – to Nazis – are one.

Germany was a loose aggregation of quarrelling states until the dawn of yesterday. Literature in a German language that can be read easily to-day did not exist till the seventeenth century. England and France unified themselves, constituted themselves homogeneous nations, in the Middle Ages; but even Bismarck did not make Germany a nation in the sense that England and France had been nations for five centuries.

Germany, the Nazi apologists say, is now at long last growing up. Adolescence produces pangs in children as well as nations, and no one becomes mature without suffering. The frightfulness of the Nazi terror, the confusions in personnel and administration, the lies and disingenuousness of foreign policy, the extraordinary capacity to blunder and irritate everybody in the outside world (i.e. grown ups) – these are evidences of a period of puberty.

Germany lost the War. It was an honourable defeat and in fact Germany came within a hair's breadth of beating the entire world; nevertheless the Germans felt 'humiliation'; they felt degradation and shame. The Nazis invented the legend of having been stabbed in the back by the Jews, socialists, pacifists – to excuse defeat. Hitler made immense capital of this unconscionable distortion of the facts. And he progressed to another deduction, equally false, that Germany had not, in fact, lost the War at all.

His technique was something like the following. He suggested to the German people first that they were sick, second that he alone could make them well. His argument was passionate and direct: 'You are humiliated. You are degraded. Germany is a sick nation. Admit it. Concede the extent of your misery. You have been trying to persuade yourselves that you are content with this miserable republic.

'Those who stabbed you in the back, the Jews and the Marxists, are ruling you to-day. They prevent you from recovering your self-respect. They are the spiritual death of your nation. And your own spiritual death too. For you are Germany. We are Germany. Be men! Out with the traitors, the Jews, the pacifists, the republicans. . . .' (And so on, in the early speeches, often for two hours and a half.)

These speeches had an immense emotional effect. Women, especially, were overcome by them. If the audience was full of women, Hitler would shriek out, 'You are mine, and I am yours, as long as I live!' So Hitler presented the Germans, who are idealists, who are egocentric, who are somewhat non-political, who had had a rough time, with their lost 'self-respect'. Suppression of liberty was the price they were willing to pay for his leadership.

The same technique is manifest in Mein Kampf. Compare this book with, say, the autobiographies of Trotsky or Henry Adams. It is vapid, vain, rhetorical, diffuse, prolix. But it is a powerful and moving book, the product of great passionate feeling. The theme is stated twenty times, slowly arising out of clouds of circumlocution and confusion, that Germany has been disunited, mortified, crucified, by the peace treaties, and that it must and will arise, a new, powerful, united, regenerated, national state.

One can well imagine hundreds of thousands of honest Germans, from dispossessed shopkeepers to General Blomberg, conscientiously, dutifully picking their way through this turbulent ocean of print, sinking back from it exhausted, but with its message, if only by the ceaseless repetition of the argument, left impregnable in their minds, fecund and germinating.

A number of elements quite outside Hitler's own character contributed, of course, to his meteoric, incredible career. What set the course of that savage, swooping arrow, Brüning-Papen-Schleicher-Hitler? One should keep in mind the following items:

1. The German inflation which was the result of passive resistance to the French invasion of the Ruhr, because it ruined the lower middle class, the petite bourgeoisie, and caused it to seize on Hitler's extravagant promises.

2. The deflationary policy of Brüning which helped to crush the upper middle class, already hard hit by the world economic crisis. Hard times bred both the violence of Hitler and the apathy of his opponents. The Nazis fed on other people's hunger.

3. The support of the great industrialists, chiefly the steel magnate Fritz Thyssen, who from 1930 on helped finance the Nazi party. This support was important. It was not, however, decisive. Hitlerism was a tremendous national movement, before the industrialists, seeing how the road led – years late – jumped on the band-waggon. The idea that Thyssen manufactured the Nazi movement by giving Hitler thousand-mark bills in a back room is simply monstrous, as Raymond Gram Swing has pointed out. As soon as the industrialists belatedly got round to seeing that Hitlerism was useful – since it was losing its early Left characteristics – they offered help. Perhaps they hoped to make Hitler their puppet. But they were mistaken.

4. Sabotage of the republic by its own officials, army officers, and government administrators; coupled with the extremely democratic character of the Weimar constitution whereby demagoguery got every chance to express itself in votes.

5. Finally, personal considerations. A great number of personal imponderables helped blow Hitler into port. The first of these was the mind and character of the old president, Field-Marshal Paul Ludwig Hans von Beneckendorf und von Hindenburg. His mind and character – plus the coruscation of intrigue blazing around him as he aged.

To understand properly Hitler's seizure of Germany and his establishment of power we must tell the inside story of three great episodes: the Papen-Schleicher-Hindenburg conspiracies, the Reichstag fire, and the events of the 30th of June. Let us begin with Hindenburg. To be blunt, it is quite possible that Hitler would never have become chancellor had not Hindenburg been senile.

The Squire of Neudeck

In the critical year, 1932, Hindenburg was already eighty-five and not in full possession of his faculties. He was 'all right', people said, until about the beginning of the morning, and those rare personages who could get to him at breakfast, or even earlier, could do something with him. This was the great strength of Franz von Papen, for a time his chancellor.

In Berlin at the time the health of the Old Man was of paramount interest, and a marvellous and cruel miscellany of jokes grew up at his expense, hinging on the question of his competency. It was no joking matter; the person of the President was the most powerful constitutional force in the country. But no one could talk or write openly on such a delicate matter: thus the retreat to an apocrypha of legend.

One of the Hindenburg stories had him turning in puzzled recollection to his son Oskar and asking, 'Where has that chap with glasses (Brüning) gone to?' Another alleged that he confused Brüning with Schleicher when Schleicher was dismissed. And once, the story goes, he received General von Hammerstein, the chief of the Reichswehr; the general had some pretty important business on his mind but Hindenburg began and ended the interview by shouting, 'Herr General, I was not satisfied with the autumn manoeuvres!'

When Hitler finally became chancellor, the Old Man – watching the immense parade of Nazi storm-troops celebrating the occasion – carefully unhinged his old knees to sit down and said to Oskar, 'Son, I did not know we had captured quite so many Russian prisoners.'

A favourite story, while Hindenburg was alive, detailed the alleged circumstances of his death. Kneeling at the bar of heaven, he was received by St. Peter who, glancing at him in surprise, asked him his identity. 'I am Hindenburg,' the field-marshal replied. 'But why are you here?' continued St. Peter. 'Because I am dead,' replied Hindenburg. St. Peter shook his head saying, 'There has been an error: you are not dead, but alive.' Hindenburg retreated in confusion: 'Ha! That rascal Meissner has misinformed me again!'

Meissner, the state secretary to the President, wielded influence on the Old Man, because next to Oskar he was nearest to his person. Meissner was, and is, a remarkably subtle politician. He has continuously been state secretary to all three German presidents – Ebert, the socialist, Hindenburg, the field-marshal, Hitler, the Nazi – an office-holding feat of no small quality. It is said that Hindenburg, knowing that his health and mind were failing, appealed to Meissner to be a super-efficient watchdog, to 'protect' him from breaking his oath, viz. the oath to preserve the Weimar constitution. It is also said that the Nazis 'got to' Hindenburg – through Meissner.

Meissner's influence was always palpable, but it diminished towards the end, as the Old Man, adrift in a perpetual maelstrom of crises and appeals to the German nation, unable to understand the intrigues going on, more and more hesitant to trust anyone, came inevitably to supreme dependence on the one person so close to him that question of faith did not arise – flesh of his own flesh, Oskar, his son.

Oskar was no stripling. He was a veteran officer. He had no taste for politics. But politics were all around him. General von Schleicher, later to become chancellor, was a fellow-officer in his regiment, the Third Potsdamer Foot Guards, and gradually, with Schleicher's connivance, a palace camarilla rose, with Oskar a member. The chief business of the camarilla was 'protection' of the aged President. Soon he was practically isolated from other contacts.

Every politician who wanted to see Hindenburg – the supreme repository of power – had to penetrate the wall of the camarilla first. The power of the camarilla grew. The Nazis did their best to gain the President's isolated ear. For a long time, however, Oskar and Schleicher and their crowd, aristocrats and Junkers, distrusting Hitler as a parvenu and a corporal, fended them off. In 1928 a group of Prussian notables had presented Hindenburg with an estate at Neudeck, thus fulfilling the Old Man's dearest dream: to become a landowner, a country squire. Immediately after Hitler became chancellor, the Government of Prussia presented him with an additional five thousand acres of land. The title was made out in Oskar's name, in order to avoid inheritance tax, since it was clear that Hindenburg père could not possibly live much longer.

(Acquisition of the Neudeck estate promptly produced a new joke when the Hitler government began to function. Q. 'What is the newest and smallest concentration camp in Germany?' A. 'Neudeck'.)

The camarilla exerted power chiefly because the Reichstag parliament met only stertorously and for short intervals (in the two years between December 1930 and November 1932 it did not pass a single law) and because the President, and the President alone, possessed the power of appointing a chancellor and giving him authority to dismiss the Reichstag if it were unruly. Intrigue reached a Borgia-point. Between the palace camp, the army camp, the Nazi camp, there was espionage galore. Brüning occasionally amused visitors whom he trusted by pointing up his fireplace and showing them where he imagined a dictaphone – Schleicher's probably – to be.

Brüning, Papen, Schleicher

Dr. Heinrich Brüning was chancellor of Germany from May 1930 to May 1932. He was the most enlightened and civilised statesman that modern Germany has produced. He was a machine-gunner during the War; he entered politics as a Catholic labour-union executive. Even old Junkers like Oldenburg-Januschau had to call him the 'best since Bismarck'. He devotedly defended the Weimar constitution; was largely responsible for Hindenburg's re-election as President; took the bold step of outlawing the Brown Shirts, exiling them for a brief period from the streets; sensibly sought to give Germany the victory in foreign policy it needed by proposing the Austro-German customs union; brought the reparations problem almost to settlement; and was cast out by Hindenburg like a dog.

Brüning detested Hitler, personally and politically, but he begat him. The Leit-Motiv of the two Brüning years was defence of the republic against Hitler. The Nazi leader rose to his first great electoral victory after Brüning became chancellor, with 6,400,000 votes and 107 deputies. Hitler, before 1930, was half a joke. After 1930 he was a tremendous phenomenon. It is one of the most tragic of modern ironies that Brüning, of all men, by the force of terrible circumstances, made way for Hitler. This was because, with the best intentions in the world, Brüning destroyed the German constitution.

In 1930, simply in order to be able to govern at all, Brüning had had to dissolve the Reichstag and begin to govern by decree. He was not the first to do so. Decrees began under Ebert. But Brüning signed them wholesale. He thus founded a system of double government, for the Reichstag permitted him decrees even when it was sitting. The Reichstag drew a razor across its own throat. This was because the Social Democrats, still the largest party, wanted to tolerate him but could not openly support his deflationary measures, which reduced wages and hurt the working class. Brüning reaped the inevitable harvest: he became responsible not to the Will of the Reichstag but to the Whim of the President. Once Hindenburg withdrew confidence in him he was doomed, because he had inadvertently destroyed the authority of the body, the Reichstag, to which he should have been responsible. This set a precedent for future chancellors. They were henceforth no more than creatures of Hindenburg, and presently of the camarilla. 'Presidential' Germany began.

By 1932 Brüning, in the opinion of the Hindenburg group, had outlived his usefulness. He had weakened his position vis-à-vis the Nazis by his bold dissolution of the Brown Shirts; vis-à-vis the socialists by his policy of drastic cutting of the social services; and, most important, vis-à-vis the camarilla by announcing a programme of agrarian settlement (to reduce unemployment) on bankrupt Junker estates. This mortally offended and terrified the Neudeck clique. Hindenburg, at the end of May 1932, was quietly shipped off to his estates, where he was isolated from everyone, even the chancellor. Schleicher remained in Berlin and undertook secret communication with Oskar in Neudeck. A troop of whisperers were sent in to Hindenburg, telling him that Brüning was an 'agrarian Bolshevik'. He went to Neudeck to ask additional powers: Hindenburg refused to grant them, and out Brüning went – like a gnawed bone.

It was now clear that the man behind the scenes was Major-General Kurt von Schleicher, the secretary of state in the ministry of defence. He represented in this tense and covert struggle for power what was still the most important element in Germany, the Reichswehr, the army. Schleicher was a headquarters officer during the War. He spent most of the four years far away from the Front, in Berlin. Don't say he wasn't smart.

From 1923 on he had been a rising influence. In 1924 he was executive officer to von Seeckt, then head of the Reichswehr. Later he broke with von Seeckt. He 'made' his subsequent superior, the Reichswehr minister General Groener; then he 'broke' Groener. And he was the discoverer of Brüning, whom he subsequently destroyed. Schleicher by 1930 had become the political specialist of the Reichswehr, an 'indispensable link between the army and political life'. His power was based partly on his great gifts of character, partly because the army, as an army, became increasingly dominant in German affairs to the exact proportion that civil politics became chaotic and obscure.

But when Hindenburg dismissed Brüning it was not Schleicher but Franz von Papen who, on June 1, 1932, became chancellor of the Reich. No mystery in this, though Papen was virtually unknown. Papen had been picked by Schleicher for the job. Papen, as people in Berlin expressed it, was a 'front' for Schleicher, someone to put out his chin on his behalf. And then an amazing thing happened. Old Hindenburg, who had scarcely known Papen, fell in love with him. A Junker, an officer and a gentleman, suave, quick-witted, a member of the Herrenklub, of impeccable manners and great charm, Papen became the palace favourite. Within a few weeks of his arrival at Neudeck he had completely captured the Old Man's confidence. He breakfasted with him as a member of the family, and strode in and out the palace as he pleased.

But Papen's chancellorship, much to his well-bred distress, was short. He had to go, despite his popularity in the palace, because he was so fantastically unpopular in the country. Germany was still theoretically a republic, governed by the democratic constitution of Weimar, and on assuming the chancellorship Papen had to call an election. He waited till the last possible day, July 31, and was overwhelmingly beaten. It was at this election that the Nazis reached their highest poll, for the time being – 13,700,000 votes.

Hitler now burned for power. As leader of the largest party, he was received by Hindenburg. Papen was present. Hitler behaved awkwardly; started to rant; demanded the chancellorship on his own terms and asked the same powers that Mussolini had been granted after the march on Rome; and was contemptuously rejected by Hindenburg. The Old Man told Papen, 'Let Hitler mend his manners, or I will appoint him to be a village postmaster.' Wild with fury, Hitler sought to overthrow Papen in the Reichstag; Papen circumvented him by dissolving the body instantly it met.¹

Prussia, the largest state in the Reich, was still – it should be interpolated – ruled by the Social Democrats. Papen determined upon a coup to annihilate them. Without the shadow of legal authority, he dismissed the socialist leaders, Braun and Severing. Although they might have replied by force or called a general strike, the socialists meekly submitted to arrest. This event was premonition of the death to the republic. It showed Papen, Schleicher – and the Nazis – that the body and spirit of the republic had already perished. And it set the example for similar lawlessness in Prussia by Goering later.

Papen, his parliament dissolved, had to call new elections. They occurred on November 6 and again he took a terrific beating. His first Reichstag sat exactly eleven days, his second exactly three. But this procedure – election, repudiation, dissolution – could not go on indefinitely, even in Germany. The people were tired of balloting. The Nazis dropped two million votes in the November election, so they joined the communists in a Berlin traffic strike, and made threats of united action in a general strike. This scared both the army and the palace. Nobody knew quite what to do. The camarilla hesitated; Hindenburg blinked; and Papen went.

¹ This was the first Reichstag of which Goering was president. Papen had a narrow escape. With his customary imperturbable casualness, he had forgotten to bring with him the Presidential decree, signed in advance, authorising the dissolution; he retrieved it just in time.

After a prolonged crisis Schleicher was pushed into the chancellorship himself. He took the post only after a fortnight of worry and negotiation; he would have much preferred to continue to rule from behind the scenes, or from the impregnable Reichswehr ministry. But there was no one else. The camarilla was running out of men. Schleicher lasted less than two months. It may surprise people, but he gave promise of an excellent administration. Schleicher despised Hitler and would have kept him from office; he was friendly with labour; he believed in a strong, moderate Germany, and he took a strong, moderate course. And so he came to commit unforgivable sins. To wit: he flirted with the trade unions; he announced himself neither capitalist nor socialist; he permitted scandals about the Osthilfe relief to come out; he even took up Brüning's scheme for colonising the bankrupt Junker estates. Also, he was too confident, too ambitious, and too clever by half. People distrusted him, and once Hindenburg is said to have barked at him, 'When, Herr General, are you going to lead the army against me?'

Above all, Schleicher was vanquished by the same thing that fundamentally had beaten both Brüning and Papen – failure to make terms with Hitler, failure somehow to solve the Nazi problem. It was utterly impossible to ignore the pressure of the Nazi movement, even if it had lost two million votes, and was momentarily distracted by the defection of Gregor Strasser, then the second highest Nazi in the party.

Strasser, the head of Hitler's political organisation, commanded between thirty or forty deputies, and his rebellion might have split the Nazi party. Schleicher had been intriguing with him, and he wanted to join the general in a coalition. Hitler squashed him. The episode is a revealing instance of Hitler's shrewd political sense, his implacability, and his tactics. What did Hitler do, faced with this formidable mutiny? He did not dismiss Strasser from the party, as Stalin or Mussolini might have done. Instead he summoned a meeting of all the Nazi deputies. Strasser himself was present. Ignoring him, Hitler began to speak, somewhat as follows:

'In every group of men there is likely to be a Judas. One of the things about a Judas is that he believes there are other Judases too. We have a Judas in our midst. This Judas of ours has spread reports of growing disaffection. But is he right? Do others share this baseness, this treachery of character?' Hitler paused. All eyes were turned on Strasser. Hitler pulled a piece of paper from his pocket. His secret service, within the party, was of the best.

'Apparently our other Judases do exist,' Hitler proceeded. 'Not only do they exist; I have their names. Do you want to hear the names of these other Judases, who would destroy our unity, disrupt our party?' Consternation. Hitler began reading names. Deputy A. Deputy B. And so on. All the names of those deputies who he knew sympathised with Strasser. As each name was read, Hitler turned sharply to the man, saying, 'Is it correct? Is it true that you are a Judas?' One and all, naturally, leapt to their feet, screaming denunciation on Strasser, loyalty to Hitler. It was only necessary to read the first few names. The meeting exploded into a pandemonium of violent fidelity.¹

The Strasser interlude was over. What next? The Nazis were still a tidal wave of almost twelve million voters and no bulwark in a democratic system could withstand the pressure of such a torrent. It was impossible to suppress the Nazis, impossible – so it was thought then – to give them carte blanche. The Nazis had to be seduced into the government or they might destroy Germany in civil war involuntarily. Yet Hitler, still smarting from the rebuff in August, steadily refused to enter any coalition save on prohibitive terms. Something had to be given him – but what?

'A Mighty Maze – But Not Without a Plan!'

Hitler might have made a civil war, but his whole policy was based on getting office by legal means. He was nicknamed, contemptuously, 'Adolf Légalité'. Perhaps his fear of risking a fight was patriotic; perhaps it was cowardice derived from the cold steel of 1923. His vanity, moreover, was supreme enough to suggest dictatorship of a type new to history, a dictatorship chosen voluntarily by the people, voted into power. But he did not have quite the necessary votes. He was too timid to use force. Therefore – intrigue.

¹ A few days later Hitler was returning to Berlin from Munich. His chief lieutenants met him at the station. Strasser, contrite, was among them. Hitler slowly greeted each man, shook his hand; and cut Strasser dead. Strasser, agape, was left standing on the platform. He was murdered, the penalty for his rebellion, on June 30, 1934.

The details are confused, a violent explosion of tangled plot and counter-plot.

First, Papen, who was Schleicher's creature, went Frankenstein. Having tasted glory, he wanted more. Partyless (he had been expelled from the Centre), thirsting for position, he joined the Nationalists of Dr. Hugenberg, the industrialist publisher, and leader of the big-capital reactionaries.

Second, Papen, turning on all his charm, contrived to meet Hitler secretly in the home of the banker Schroeder in Cologne. He succeeded in persuading Hitler – at last – to envisage the possibility of coalition.

The Hitler forces were summoning new strength. Hitler rightly regarded Schleicher as the last hurdle between himself and power. Worried, Schleicher called a secret meeting in the Reichswehr ministry. It is said that creation of a military dictatorship was discussed, with the arrest of Papen and Hugenberg. Received by the Old Man, Schleicher cautiously informed him that the situation was serious, that the Reichswehr might have to go into the streets against the Nazis. Schleicher's threat was probably a bluff. He wanted to frighten Papen and Hugenberg. But the threat turned out all wrong.

For hearing that Schleicher planned to call out the army, Papen and Hitler met again. The situation had developed beautifully to Papen's hand. He was now in a position to say to Hitler, 'If you don't join us now – on our terms – we are both lost. Schleicher will set the army on both of us. We must make a coalition.' Hitler agreed and accepted terms that hitherto had been impossible for him – three seats in the Cabinet as against Papen-Hugenberg's eight.

Schleicher, disastrously out-Schleichered, was victim of his own intrigue, because Hitler and Hugenberg presented Papen's plan for a Nazi-Nationalist government, and the Old Man accepted it. He appointed Hitler chancellor, Papen, vice-chancellor. Then he rolled round and fell back to sleep. This occurred, an amazing point, before Schleicher, who was chancellor, had been dismissed. It was not till next morning that the general, to his bewildered stupefaction, discovered himself out of office. When he heard the news, he walked in a long oval around his room, whispering to himself, head half bent.

(Brüning said, 'I was badly treated – but poor Schleicher – five times worse.')

Hindenburg thought that he had thoroughly safeguarded himself by drawing Hitler's sting. It was established that Hitler should never be received by the Old Man except in Papen's presence. So did democracy die in the Reich. So did Adolf Hitler, who had become a German citizen only a year before, find himself chancellor of Germany.

And little did Papen, Hindenburg or anyone reckon on the next bizarre development – the Reichstag fire.

CHAPTER IV

THE TRICK BY FIRE AND THE PURGE BY BLOOD

'Goering discloses the fact that the late Kurt von Schleicher plotted a coup against the Reich in 1933. We knew the Nazis would find out some day what they shot him for.'

- HOWARD BRUBAKER.

ON the night of February 27, 1933, a few days before the March 5 elections which were to confirm Hitler's chancellorship, the building of the German Reichstag in Berlin was gutted by fire. This fire destroyed what remained of the German republic. It not only burned a public building; it incinerated the communist, social democratic, catholic, and nationalist parties of Germany. It was discovered at about nine-fifteen on a winter evening back in 1933; but its embers are burning yet.

The Reichstag fire ruined a couple of million marks' worth of glass and masonry. It also ruined some thousands of human lives. Logically, inevitably, the fire produced the immense Nazi electoral victory of March 5, the savageries of the subsequent Brown Terror, the persecution of the Jews, the offensive against Austria, and the enormous process of Gleichschaltung, or forcible assimilation, which for the next years steam-rollered over Germany.

The fire turned an imposing edifice to dust and ashes. Also it turned to dust and ashes the lifework of many thousands of pacifists, liberals, democrats, socialists, decent-minded people of all sorts and classes. But for the fire the Nazis would never have gained so sweeping and crushing a victory. In the flames of the Reichstag fire disappeared the old Germany of Bismarck, William II, and the Weimar constitution. In its smoke rose Hitler's Third Reich.

'When Germany awoke,' Douglas Reed wrote, 'a man's home was no longer his castle. He could be seized by private individuals, could claim no protection from the police, could be indefinitely detained without preferment of charges; his property could be seized, his verbal and written communications overheard and perused; he no longer had the right to forgather with his fellow countrymen, and his newspapers might no longer freely express their opinions.'

The actual course of events the night of February 27 is quickly told. Smoke and flames were seen from the windows of the Reichstag, in the heart of Berlin near the butt end of the Unter den Linden, at about nine-fifteen p.m. The fire brigade was there by nine-twenty-five. The main hall was already a roaring cauldron. The ramparts of the building were saved but the interior was gutted. Incendiarism was soon suspected. The fire had started simultaneously in a great number of places – between twenty and thirty in all, according to a subsequent official report. Goering and Hitler arrived within an hour and at once said the fire was the work of communists. 'A sign from Heaven!' Hitler exclaimed, as he surveyed the ruins.

The background of these events may also be briefly sketched. Hitler as we know, had become Reichskanzler. He had only three Nazis in the cabinet as against eight belonging to Papen-Hugenberg, but he had not the faintest thought of playing second-string to them. To accomplish supremacy a great increase in Nazi votes in the March 5 elections was necessary. Hitler desperately needed what he had never had before, a clear majority of Reichstag seats. Papen-Hugenberg were equally determined to prevent this. There was much bad feeling between Hitler and the nationalists. Fighting on a common front, they were fighting each other in reality, because each wanted to dominate the ensuing government.

Things were not going too well with Hitler. Hindenburg still distrusted him. There were wild rumours that Hitler would seek to depose him by force. The Nazis feared that they were going to lose votes. Only one thing might save them by giving them a clear majority. There would be, it was estimated, about six hundred deputies in the new Reichstag, and the communist party was bound to get about one hundred of them. The Nazis claimed about two hundred and fifty. Well, two hundred and fifty is not a clear majority of six hundred; but is half of five hundred. Therefore suppress the communist party and wipe out those critical one hundred seats, and all was won.

At first the Nazis decided to raid the Karl Liebknecht house, the communist party headquarters in Berlin, incriminate the communists in conspiracy to revolt, and thus obtain a pretext to suppress them. The raid was carried out, but it was a failure. The date for the elections was rapidly approaching. Tension between Hitler and Papen-Hugenberg increased. The Nazis had to think of something else – in a hurry. They did.

The fire produced exactly what the Nazis hoped for. This we have seen.

The one hundred communist deputies were arrested. A state of virtual siege was proclaimed. The provisions of the constitution guaranteeing individual liberty were suppressed. Plans for a communist outbreak were 'revealed'. Germany rose with a roar. There was intense public excitement. The Nazis stormed the country, and Hitler was able to manoeuvre himself into a dictatorship for four years, affix himself to power immovably, unshakably.

Arson de Luxe

The inside story of the fire is not as well known as one might think. The Nazis did their job so expertly that, whereas everyone well informed instantly suspected them of complicity, there was much puzzlement as to details. Even to-day there are mysteries, subsidiary mysteries, not entirely clear. Let us deal with them.

During the night of the fire a Dutch half-wit named Marinus van der Lubbe was arrested when police found him in the burning ruins. There were no witnesses to his arrest except the police. The first statements about the Dutchman, issued by Goering, were false. It was said that he had a membership-card of the communist party on his person, a leaflet urging common action between socialists and communists, several photographs of himself, and a passport. Obliging fellow! He did possess the passport, but not the other documents, as the trial subsequently proved.

His career and movements were closely traced. He had set three other fires – minor ones – in Berlin just before the Reichstag fire. In 1929 he had joined something called the Dutch Communist Youth Organisation, a secessionist group. Two years later he was expelled from this as a worthless and stupid fellow. He never belonged to the communist party itself. Van der Lubbe's itinerary the few days before the fire was well established. As late as the night of February 17–18 he slept at Glinow, near Potsdam. He could not have got to Berlin before the 19th or 20th. Yet within a week he, an unknown tramp, either (a) so insinuated himself into the graces of the rigidly articulated communist party as to be given the dangerous and delicate job of firing the Reichstag, or (b) was hired to do it by someone else.

When it became clear, even in Germany, that the Van der Lubbe explanation simply would not hold water, the mystery thickened. The police got to the point of having to admit that Van der Lubbe had confederates. But how, carrying incendiary material, could enough of them possibly have penetrated the Reichstag walls, doorways, or windows in the middle of Berlin without being seen?

The German authorities themselves let the cat out of the bag, and an astounding cat it proved to be. It was announced that the incendiaries had presumably entered and escaped from the building by means of an underground tunnel leading from the Reichstag basement to the palace of the speaker of the Reichstag – Goering – across the street. Originally this tunnel was part of the Reichstag's central heating system. Until an official communiqué revealed its existence not a dozen persons in Berlin had ever heard of it. So one aspect of the mystery was solved. The incendiaries, whoever they were, got in and out of the Reichstag building – through Goering's back yard. Incredible information!

An ostrich sticks its head in the sand – well-meaning but stupid ostrich. There is an obverse of the ostrich process. A man may naïvely and stridently call attention to something he wishes to conceal, hoping thereby to lessen interest in it. A squirrel hides a nut under a tree. Then he squats and points at it, showing where it is. Disingenuously a man may reveal what is embarrassing to him, hoping thus to modify the terms of the embarrassment.

Long before the trial opened the accusation that the Nazis themselves had burned the building had impressed the world. A mock trial was held in London. The Brown Book, telling part of the story – but inaccurately – was published by émigrés and widely circulated. Moreover, a secret nationalist memorandum, written to the order of a prominent deputy named Oberfohren, was passed from hand to hand. Oberfohren was a nationalist, a Junker, one of Papen's men. He asserted flatly that the Nazis were the incendiaries. In June, a Nazi detachment searched his flat; mystery for some time surrounded Oberfohren's whereabouts. Then it was announced that he had 'shot himself'.

The half-wit Van der Lubbe was not the only person arrested. Ernst Torgler, chairman of the communist bloc in the Reichstag, gave himself up to the police when he heard the announcement incredible to his ears that he was accused of complicity; subsequently three Bulgarian communists, Dimitrov, Popov, and Tanev were arrested, when a waiter who had served them in a Berlin café told the police that their activities had been 'suspicious'. Dimitrov was in Munich, not Berlin, on the night of the fire, as an incontrovertible alibi proved; nevertheless he was held for five months until the trial, without a scrap of evidence against him.

Trial

I reported the trial in Leipzig and Berlin during its first six weeks. The court sat for fifty-seven days, and provided superlative drama. The trial was neither a farce nor a frame-up. The behaviour of the police and judicial authorities before the trial was outrageous, but once the proceedings reached the court-room there was a difference. The court got itself into a curious dilemma, of having to pretend to be fair even while exercising the greatest animus against the defendants, and little by little this necessity – caused mostly by the pressure of foreign opinion – to simulate justice led to some modicum of justice in the court-room.

When the trial opened, I think, the judges like many people in Germany genuinely thought that Van der Lubbe was a communist and that the communists were guilty. The prosecution thought so too and, assuming that the trial would be quick, it made no serious effort to fabricate a 'good' case. As the hearings went on it became evident even to the judges that there was no case at all. The evidence of the prosecution was a colossal confusion of inaccuracies, contradictions, and plain lies. But once the trial started, it couldn't be stopped. With dreadful pertinacity, with true Teutonic thoroughness, the court plodded on, deeper every day in a morass of evidence that ineluctably proved just what it didn't want proved – the innocence of the accused. The prosecution, nervous, began to produce incredible cranks as witnesses, whom even the judges couldn't stomach; the judges turned Dimitrov out of court whenever his questions became too intolerably pointed – which was often.

No one, of course, counted on the brilliant gallantry of Dimitrov. This Bulgarian revolutionary had, moreover, brains. Unerringly he picked every flaw in the testimony of a crooked witness; unerringly he asked just those questions most damaging to the prosecution. He turned the trial into a public forum. The trial started as an attempt to pin the guilt of the Reichstag arson on the defendants. Dimitrov turned it before long into an action precisely opposite: one seeking to clear the Nazis of the same charge.

Also Dimitrov, if only because he is the only man in recorded history to have made Goering turn publicly red in the neck, contributed deeply to the pure joy of living. When a witness could not be found, he asked: 'Have you looked for him in a concentration camp?' When the judge rebuked him for making communist propaganda, Dimitrov pointed to Goering – on the witness-stand – and said with a subtle combination of impudence and perfect courtesy: 'But he's making National Socialist propaganda!' No one who saw him will ever forget Dimitrov pointing to Lubbe and exclaiming, in his picturesque Balkan German: 'This miserable Faust! Who is his Mephistopheles?' Nor the climax to his final speech when, imperturbable as ever with the executioner's axe or Goering's private vengeance facing him, he demanded of the court 'compensation for his wasted time!'

Once the court was forced into calling every relevant witness, like porters and workmen in the Reichstag building, the flood-gates were open. Important little clues came out. Lubbe, inert, apathetic, testified – in one of his few lucid moments – that he had been 'with Nazis' the night before the fire. A gateman testified that a Nazi deputy, Dr. Albrecht, left the burning building, in great excitement, as late as ten p.m. A servant in Goering's house, Aldermann, testified that he heard, on several nights before the fire, mysterious sounds in the underground tunnel. Thus the fire – got hot.

Mystery

The court had no option but to acquit Torgler, Dimitrov, Popov, and Tanev; Van der Lubbe was sentenced to death and presently decapitated. (Torgler, one should interpolate, was held in 'protective custody' for two years after the trial, though the court declared him innocent.) The Dutchman died with his lips sealed, and with him to the grave went one secret – how exactly he and the incendiaries had worked together.

It was quite clear that he could not have set the fire alone. He was armed with household fire-lighters only; the expert evidence proved that some self-combustible chemical, phosphorous and sulphur, besides large quantities of petrol, which Lubbe could not possibly have carried, were used in the central hall of the Reichstag chamber. He was half blind; he shambled rather than walked; the Reichstag was a dark, unfamiliar building, composed of stone and heavy wood; yet two minutes five seconds (the re-enactment proved) after he entered the building, the central hall was fiercely burning.

It was also quite clear that Van der Lubbe was not an overt agent provocateur hired by the Nazis. This theory, for a long time popular, had to be given up immediately Lubbe took the stand. The Nazis could not possibly have deliberately picked an agent so inept and witless. Lubbe was an obvious victim of maniacal depressive psychosis. He could hardly have been acting. Nor was he drugged. He was no friend of the Nazis, and the court was terrified every time he opened his mouth.

Thus this mystery; if Van der Lubbe acted independently of the Nazis, how could the fire have been so physically successful. If he acted with the Nazis, why did he all but give them away in court?

The answer is, first, according to the only theory that will fit the facts, Van der Lubbe was not an agent provocateur, but a dupe; second, according to expert testimony at the trial which can hardly be gainsaid, there were two fires, not one, in the Reichstag building that night.

Van der Lubbe, a typical enough unfortunate by-product of modern civilisation, was not only weak-minded; he had a deep grievance against society and authority, which his feeble brain sought to remedy by pyromania. He was a genuine arsonist. A homeless vagrant, wandering in the Berlin slums, he set several fires, and in his thick manner boasted about them. And Nazis heard him. So much is fact.

Entering the Reichstag building, Van der Lubbe ignited his miserable smudges of tablecloths and curtains, using his shirt for tinder. The fires, like the acts of arson he had committed on previous days, were not fires but failures to set fires; feeble puddles of smoke and soot, nothing more. He proceeded – and must have seen, bursting ahead of him, a mighty cauldron of vivid flame! This was the other fire. It was the chemical fire set by the Nazis, who carried their material through the Goering tunnel, and timed it to go off at just that moment. But Lubbe thought it was his fire! He retreated, proud, triumphant – and was arrested by the police.

This was just what the Nazis planned. They wanted a scapegoat – any kind of scapegoat – so that they could blame the communists. The link between Lubbe and the Nazis is quite clear. He said in the Berlin underworld that he was going to burn the Reichstag. It was a matter of a moment – so honeycombed was Berlin with spies, tools, agents – for this information to reach high quarters.

The Nazis knew that Lubbe was going to be there. But they did not tell him that they were going to be there. He thought that he was alone. He never knew the Nazis were acting on his words. Thus his peculiar behaviour in the court. He was proud of his fire; he resented it deeply when anyone was put forward to share the credit. With impenetrable obstinacy, he insisted that he had no confederates, and set the fire alone – and really believed it. This is the only combination of theory and fact which accounts for all the circumstances of the Reichstag fire. It is the theory which Dimitrov, when I saw him in Moscow in June 1935, accepted as the best explanation of the events.

Explanation?

Karl Ernst, one of those extraordinary characters tossed up from obscurity to flitting eminence by the turmoil of the Nazi revolution, was murdered on June 30. He had been a waiter in a night club in the west end of Berlin. He was Roehm's chief protégé, and consequently his promotion was very rapid; at the age of twenty-seven he became Obergruppenführer (a rank corresponding to major-general) of the Berlin-Brandenburg SA, numbering sixty-five thousand men. Before June 30, Ernst was aware of impending dissension within the party. He wrote a letter, dated June 3, 1934, and sent it abroad, with instructions that it be published if his fears became true.

This Ernst letter purports to be a full description of the Reichstag fire plot. It gives a brilliant and terrible picture of the attitude and manners of the Nazi leaders just before the fire and after. They were (except for Hitler, who is mentioned reverently only as 'He'), vulgar, lusty, cruel, courageous, and having a marvellous time. They sound like a group of Capones in politics for the fun of it. And the fire was plotted almost like a bit of deviltry.

Ernst says that he lit the actual fire. His comrades were two SA men, Fiedler and Von Mohrenschild.

All three were 'executed' in the clean-up of June 30. Dead tongues tell no tales.

The Ernst letter may not be genuine. Even so, if Ernst didn't set the fire, someone like him did.

Blood Bath

The events of June 30, 1934, were an historic inevitability. They were indeed a necessity. Hitler was poised between two mutually exclusive armies, the Reichswehr (regular army), and the SA, his private Brown Shirt force, led by Roehm. Events made it imperative for him to give undisputed authority to one or the other. He chose the Reichswehr. The SA therefore had to be liquidated. This, in plain language, is the secret of June 30.

A secondary consideration, almost as important, was the nature of the Nazi party itself. The party, as Heiden put it, was a unity not of aims but of causes; it was founded on no coherent body of doctrine; its personnel was of the most various. The Führer Prinzip was its only structural bastion, and when sub-leaders became jealous of one another and thus undermined it, even though Hitler himself was not attacked, there was nothing to do but eliminate them—forcibly.

Third, it is necessary to remember that what began as a terrible administration of discipline to the adherents of Roehm degenerated uncontrollably into a violent situation which leaders seized as a priceless opportunity to settle old-standing party or private grudges. Admit terror as a principle, as Hitler did: and there was no telling where it would end.

The deaths occurred mostly on the night of June 30–July 1. Hitler, in his speech justifying the executions, admitted to seventy-seven slain. This was certainly an underestimate. The full toll may never be known. Probably it reached two hundred and fifty, possibly three hundred.

The dead fall into several groups. First, the SA men:

Captain Ernst Roehm, Reichs minister without portfolio and chief of staff of the SA; Hitler's best friend; organiser of his private army.

Karl Ernst, SA Obergruppenführer, Berlin and Brandenburg.

Three other SA Obergruppenführers (major-generals). Edmund Heines, boss of Silesia; August Schneidhuber, police president of Munich, and Fritz von Krausser.

Hans Hayn, SA Gruppenführer for Saxony, and other Gruppenführers (brigadier generals).

SA Standartenführer (colonel) Uhl, named by Hitler as the man appointed to assassinate him.

Second, a 'Catholic' group, composed mostly of men close to Vice-Chancellor von Papen:

Dr. Erich Klausner, leader of the 'Catholic Action', an important and distinguished political leader.

Adelbert Probst, leader of the Catholic Youth movement.

Fritz von Bose, Papen's state secretary.

Edgar Jung, Papen's private secretary.

Dr. Beck, of the International Students Exchange.

Third, victims of private or semi-private vengeance:

Gregor Strasser, brilliant theoretician of the Nazi party, formerly Hitler's second highest man, in virtual retirement since November 1932.

Gen. von Kahr, the dictator of Bavaria in 1923, whom the Nazis said 'betrayed' the first Hitler Putsch.

Fourth, in a special group:

Gen. Kurt von Schleicher, former chancellor.

Elisabeth von Schleicher, his wife.

Gen. von Bredow, his former assistant in the ministry of war.

Finally, those killed purely by accident, like the Munich music critic Willi Schmidt, who was executed by an SS squad despite his protests that he was not the Willi Schmidt, a Munich SA man, whom it sought. The proper Willi Schmidt was found and duly shot—later.

Former Chancellor von Papen, after his secretaries were killed, barely escaped with his life, and former Chancellor Brüning would certainly have been killed, had he not fled the country, against his will and on the urgent advice of friends, twenty-seven days before. Brüning slipped over the Dutch frontier partially disguised, in the company of Dutch priests.

Why was Schleicher killed? Why did these other former chancellors narrowly escape death? Because (a) they were former chancellors, and Brüning and Schleicher were the only two men in Germany who could conceivably have succeeded Hitler if intrigue of the same kind that brought him to power should presently unseat him; (b) Papen was still at his own game of palace manœuvres, and had deeply shocked and annoyed Nazi extremists by a speech at Marburg on June 17, attacking them; (c) Brüning was the man who had dared take the Nazi Brown Shirts off the streets, and they never forgave him for it.

Additionally, Schleicher was murdered because many leading Nazis thought him dangerous. The allegation that Schleicher had intrigued with a foreign power was nonsensical. He was a friend of Roehm's, but no evidence has been adduced that he and Roehm were actually plotting. Schleicher was a great diner-out; he was called the 'Social General' and had friends in the foreign embassies; that was all.

Fellow officers in the Reichswehr deeply resented Schleicher's murder, and they demanded that his name be cleared. The Nazis hedged. The documents in the case were in the hands of Himmler, the SS chief. The Reichswehr obtained the documents – no one knows how. Himmler tried to get them back. He failed. A group of four hundred Reichswehr officers met in a semi-public ceremony, with the old Field-Marshal von Mackensen in the chair, and drank a toast to Schleicher's memory, inscribing his name and that of Bredow in the regimental honour-roll. This frightened the Nazis. A hush-hush meeting was called by Goering, attended by a handful of prominent Nazis and all Reichswehr officers above the rank of captain, at which, it is believed, Goering confessed that Schleicher's death, like that of Willi Schmidt, was a 'mistake'.

Could any 'plot' (by talking of a plot, Hitler justified the clean-up)¹ have united Roehm, Strasser, Schleicher, Von Kahr, Willi Schmidt, Fritz von Bose, Klausner. The idea is, of course, fantastic. But was Roehm alone, as boss of the SA, considering subversive action? Most of those who were in Berlin at the time think not. But it is just possible.

Background of the Killings

Berlin was very tense in May and June, 1934, and economic distress was sharp. The revolution had taken place, i.e. the Nazis had seized power. But where were the rewards of victory? Why had not the Nazi economic programme been converted to reality? The radical Nazis, the rank and file, the men in the street, felt that Goering and the Reichswehr and the industrialists had grabbed the plums. They were tense with dissatisfaction, and they appealed to Hitler – in vain. The Leader announced that no 'second revolution' would occur.

Discontent was concentrated, among Nazis, in the SA. The SA considered itself the chief instrument of the party. It was Hitler's army of the streets, that had brought him office; Hitler was a Brown Shirt, first and last. The SA was the pedestal of the movement; the submerged mass and reservoir of man power; it contained many honest Leftists, eager for the promised land of economic reform.

¹ German apologists have been hard put to it to explain both the killings and Hitler's explanations of them. The most novel excuse I heard came from a highly nationalist German. Roehm and the others were shot, he said, because the Treaty of Versailles deprived Germany of colonies. Other countries may relegate unpopular or fallen heroes to distant places; for instance, Mussolini sent Balbo to Lybia to cool his heels. But Germany has no colonial posts available. Roehm might easily have gone to Tanganyika as administrator. But Tanganyika is no longer German, and therefore nothing could be done with Roehm save shoot him.

The SA had swollen to the immense number of 2,500,000 men, and with the revolution complete, there was nothing for them to do. They were all dressed up—in their nice brown shirts—with no place to go. Hitler, having created a private army, didn't know what to do with it. They were a fearsome burden on party finance; they had been replaced for guard duty by the SS; and they were an ocean of restlessness and undirected energy.

The leader of the SA was Roehm. He was a remarkable man. He had the blunt energy of Goering, the sharp ruthlessness of Goebbels, and an organising talent like none in Germany. A brusque character, a man of limited imagination, who hated peace, loved disorder, Roehm was second only to Hitler in the affection of the Brown Shirts. Hitler owed more to Roehm than to anybody. Hitler created the SA, but Roehm was the disciplinarian, the executive. And Hitler loved him.

Roehm's solution of the SA problem was quite simple. Ambitious, he wanted to feed the SA into the Reichswehr,¹ convert the Reichswehr into an immense national army, and become head of the armed force of the German state. Thus he became the personification of two tendencies. He was (a) the chief of the Leftist tendencies of the régime, since the SA were the Have-Nots in Germany, and (b) the competitor of the Reichswehr for basic authority in the nation.

The Reichswehr naturally opposed him with bitterness and vigour. The generals, first, had no intention of giving up their jobs to Roehm; second, they had built the 100,000 men of the Reichswehr into a beautifully precise and tempered military instrument, and would have committed suicide rather than see it drowned, inundated, with two and a half million hooligans, clerks, half-trained boys, Lumpen Proletariat off the streets. Merger with the SA meant death to the Reichswehr. And the general staff told Hitler so—in no uncertain terms.

The Leader sought about him warily. He hated to give up Roehm; but on the other hand the 100,000 men of the Reichswehr were infinitely more valuable to him than the 2,500,000 virtually unarmed SA. Assiduously he had cultivated the Reichswehr higher officers, especially General von Blomberg, who was minister of defence. Blomberg, an important point, became deeply devoted to Hitler. Actually on June 29, the day before the clean-up, ¹ He had had this idea as far back as 1922, and went to exile in South America when he previously split with Hitler on the same issue.

Blomberg in a significant speech expressed his contentment with the Nazi régime. This was enough for Hitler. If he could be absolutely sure of the Reichswehr, the most powerful force in Germany, the SA lost its raison d'être.

Hitler called Roehm to see him. They talked for five hours. Roehm asked him once more to enlarge the Reichswehr by inclusion of the SA. Hitler told him that the general staff of the Reichswehr insisted on selective recruiting, when and if conscription was introduced. Roehm departed, beaten. Sulking, he went to Munich. It was announced that, beginning July 1, the SA would take two months' leave, during which period they were not to wear uniforms. The SA off the streets! The revolution betrayed!

At this point should be mentioned another factor. We have not till now discussed the SS. These, the Schutzstaffel, were the Black Shirts, about three hundred thousand strong. They were the élite of the fighting forces of the party, founded originally as a bodyguard to Hitler and the other leaders. The SA was a mob. The SS was a pretorian guard, smart, well-fed, armed. The SA was loyal to Roehm. The SS, with which Roehm had nothing to do, was loyal to Hitler. The chief of the SS was a man who hated Roehm, Himmler. And Hitler could count on the SS absolutely.

The Reichswehr was sufficiently alarmed by this crisis to undertake unusual precautions. For ten days before the clean-up, Reichswehr staff officers in Berlin carried service revolvers, keeping them at hip even in their offices. A Reichswehr regiment was mobilised at Doebritz, near Berlin. This followed rumours—apparently without substantiation—that Karl Ernst, the most devoted of Roehm's followers, intended to defy the SA dispersal order and occupy Berlin. It was even said that Ernst intended murdering the general staff!

Precautions by the Reichswehr do not prove the existence of a plot. It is even possible that the Reichswehr, to serve its own ends, might have invented a plot, so as to be rid of Roehm. Certainly young Ernst seemed remarkably innocent of any political intentions, let alone mutiny. He had recently married and he was arrested en route to Bremen, where he was boarding ship for a postponed honeymoon in Madeira. Hitler had been best man at his wedding, not six weeks before.

'Spake The Grisly Terror'

Possibly to allay suspicions by Roehm that he was aware of treason, if any existed, Hitler left for south Germany to inspect a labour camp. He took Goebbels with him, and also a man named Lutze, who when Roehm was dead was promptly named new SA chief of staff. Goering had been charged with the clean-up in Berlin. That was why Goebbels was with Hitler. Goering, running wild, was capable of anything. In the middle of the night (June 29), Hitler records that he heard news of 'such serious character' that he must take action at once.

Goebbels had described the occasion picturesquely:

'I still see the Leader standing on the terrace of the Godesberg Hotel. The Leader looks seriously into the dark sky. Nobody knows yet what threatens. The Leader is true to his own principles. The Leader is full of determination regarding the reactionary rebels who have cast the nation into unlimited disturbance.

'Reports come to him from Berlin and Munich. After only a few minutes' conference, the decision is made not to wait until the next morning. We start at two in the night. At four we are in Munich.

'On the aerodrome the Leader receives reports. Then he decides to go into the lions' den. He rushes by car to Wiessee. Without resistance he manages to get into the house of Roehm. With incomparable courage Hitler carries out the arrests. Soon after the arrest of Roehm his staff arrives from Munich. Hitler confronts them and tells them in one sentence to go back to Munich. They obey.'

— (Manchester Guardian, July 2, 1934.)

Now if Roehm was planning an outbreak in Munich on the 30th, why was he in bed at Wiessee, twenty miles away, at six a.m. of the morning that the action was alleged to have begun? Why, if Munich was rising in revolt, was it quite peaceable when Hitler, the same morning, arrived there?

An official Nazi communiqué describes the raid at Wiessee in more detail:

The Führer entered, and in person arrested Chief of Staff Roehm, who yielded 'silently and without resistance' in his bedroom. In Heines's room immediately opposite 'a shameful picture' met the Führer. Heines was in bed with a youth; the repulsive scene which accompanied their arrest cannot be described. It pitilessly reveals the conditions reigning in the circles around the former Chief of Staff.

— (The Times, July 2, 1934.)

The unofficial story has it that Hitler, far from being alone, was accompanied by a squadron of SS gunmen, and that Roehm, far from accepting arrest silently, bawled insults at the Leader, denouncing him as a traitor to the revolution, and that Hitler shouted in return until SS men took Roehm away.

Roehm was brought into Munich. Heines and his Lustknabe were apparently dispatched on the spot. Hitler did not know what to do with Roehm. The chief of staff was clapped in prison and told to shoot himself. He refused, saying that if anyone shot him, it would have to be 'Adolf himself'. He was not killed till five p.m. the next day, about thirty-six hours after his arrest. No one knows the precise circumstances. Probably the jailers came to Hitler again and again, with the words, 'He won't kill himself. . . . What shall we do. . .?' And one can imagine Hitler's final, irritated, desperate order to get rid somehow of the man who was his only friend, get him out of the way, shoot him, kill him. . . .

The others did not matter to Hitler so much – personally. There were plenty of others. He made a clean sweep of the allegedly disaffected SA leaders in Munich and the vicinity. Then early in the morning he apparently sent Goering a message to go ahead in Berlin. Goering waited till about eleven a.m. before cutting loose. Then he commenced action, 'expanding the original scope of his instructions,' as he admitted later.

It is a moot point whether Goering had talked over with Hitler those whom he wished to kill. Possibly not. Hitler's 'executive' orders were often extremely vague.¹ At any rate the death squads got to work. Himmler superintended them. Annihilation, quick and terrible, began.

Schleicher was shot in his home. He was completely unaware that any action against him impended. He was, in fact, talking to a friend on the telephone when the SS men arrived. He said into the telephone, 'Excuse me just a moment; someone is in the room.' He turned and saw his executioners. They opened fire. Frau von Schleicher, hearing the shots, rushed into the room. She was killed so that there would be no witness to her husband's death.

The SS men were divided into two groups. Those who did the shooting were full-time veterans, members of Hitler's Leibstandarten (bodyguard). The executions, as apart from downright assassinations, took place in the Lichtenfelde barracks. The culprits were given a one-minute 'trial' before a drum-head court martial. The procedure in most cases was simply a statement by the officer in charge, 'You are accused of treachery and condemned to death.' As each man was brought out to face the firing squad, a blinding searchlight was turned into his eyes and drums rolled. Then the volley.

¹ The story goes that Hitler, some months later, was asked by a foreigner the whereabouts of a friend. A Nazi at the luncheon table stammered explanation that he had 'disappeared on June 30'. Hitler paled, not knowing the man was dead.

Several of the condemned SA leaders, including Sander, Ernst's chief of staff, were shot with 'Heil Hitler' on their lips. They thought that a mutinous group of SS men had revolted against Hitler and that they were dying loyal to the Führer and the Nazi movement! 'Traitors,' indeed!

It took Hitler from July 1 to July 13 to recover his shaken nerve. At first the announcement was made that only a few ranking SA leaders and General von Schleicher and his wife had been killed. Fearing that the plot theory would not receive credence the propaganda ministry also called attention to the homosexual character of Roehm, Heines, and their closest friends. The party had always been split on the homosexual issue. Hitler spoke on July 13 and tolled off the names of the seventy-seven whom he admitted to be dead. He looked like a broken man. The first part of his speech was received in almost complete silence, though Nazi deputies (some thirty seats were significantly vacant) were the audience.

In great detail, according to habit, Hitler first sketched the history of the Nazi revolution. Then he recounted his differences with Roehm. About details of the 'plot' he was far from precise. Referring to Schleicher's alleged meeting with a foreign diplomat, he made the remarkable statement that if 'German traitors met a foreign statesman and gave strict orders to conceal it from me, I will have such men shot, no matter whether this clandestine discussion had been devoted only to the weather, old coins, and the like.' Then he concluded with his passionate outburst that for twenty-four hours he had been supreme court of the German people – and the audience broke into wild applause.

June 30 had both good and bad results as far as the party in general was concerned. It undoubtedly performed a party service in removing from circulation such unsavoury men as Heines, who was a confessed murderer. On the other hand – the incidental horror quite apart – it 'destroyed something that is unlikely ever to be completely reconstructed, the illusion of indestructible patriotic unity, of that eternal loyalty to each other which the national socialist leaders had so often proclaimed'. And it ended finally 'radicalism' in the party.

Modern Monte Cristo

As extraordinary as some of the murders on June 30, were some of the escapes. Take the case of Gottfried Treviranus. He had been a submarine commander during the War and as a cabinet minister under Brüning had taken a nationalist point of view almost as strong as that of the Nazis. But he was on the death list for several reasons: (1) he was Brüning's closest friend, (2) he was a strong influence in the fighting services, (3) he had always despised Hitler and made no bones about it.

On June 30, just after lunch, Treviranus was playing tennis in his back yard. A lorry containing a dozen SS men, with drawn revolvers, ground to a stop athwart his house. One of his children met them and they shouted 'Where is Treviranus?' A voice from upstairs, attracted by the commotion, called 'Here I am.' But this was Treviranus's father! Rushing upstairs the SS men saw him, realised their mistake, and asked where his son was. Meanwhile the child ran out and told Treviranus, in the tennis court, what was happening. Instantly he jumped the garden wall and leapt into his car, parked outside. The SS men, now downstairs, saw him drive off, shot at him and missed.

Very intelligently Treviranus drove straight into town instead of trying to get into the country; the truck full of SS followed him but could not shoot on account of the heavy traffic, then lost him. Treviranus stopped at the home of a friend and borrowed street clothes. He then went to Schleicher's house to find out what was happening. There was a crowd outside. He got out of his car and asked an SS guard what had occurred. Hearing that Schleicher had been shot, Treviranus jumped back into his car with considerable alacrity but outward calm, and drove into the country, where he smashed the car against the edge of the road, to give the impression he had sought further escape into the fields. He returned to inner Berlin by taxi and took refuge in the house of a friend, where – incredible detail – he kept cool by reading Macaulay's History of England.

Several English opponents of the Nazis did stalwart service as Scarlet Pimpernels. One risked punishment by falsifying his passport and allowing it to be used for smuggling out of Germany two young children, son and daughter of another victim of the purge.

End of Hindenburg

On August 2, Hindenburg died. The bloodshed of June 30 may have been a shock to his aged frame; on the other hand the Old Man seemed to have been well satisfied with Hitler and Goering, because he sent telegrams of congratulation to each.

Even the day before the death the most competent of Berlin correspondents and diplomats considered that the event must be a crisis of the gravest sort for Hitler. Who would be President? Could he appoint himself President? If he did so, who would become Chancellor? Above all, what would the Reichswehr do?

Now, with better perspective, we know that Hitler had bought off the army on June 30. Even so, wise after the event, one is bound to be impressed at Hitler's cleverness and daring. No one at the time dreamed of the simple and subtle scheme long up Hitler's sleeve, of combining the office of President and Chancellor.

As to the Reichswehr, Blomberg took care of that. The very morning of Hindenburg's death, all Reichswehr garrisons in Germany took a new oath, and one of the most extraordinary in military history. Usually armies swear allegiance to the crown or head of state. This was an oath of fidelity, and a thorough one, to Hitler personally:

'I swear by God this sacred oath, that I will render unconditional obedience to the Leader of the German Reich and people, Adolf Hitler, the Commander-in-Chief of the Wehrmacht (armed forces) and that I will, as a valiant soldier, at all times be ready to stake my life for this oath.'

Each soldier and minor officer swore the oath two words at a time, repeating them after the commandant with hand upraised. Some officers, hating Hitler, took sick leave that day. The general staff was not perturbed. Each absent officer was forced to take the oath personally on his return to service. . . . After the oath all sang not only Deutschland Über Alles, but the Horst Wessel anthem, the Nazi hymn.

As long as Hindenburg lived, there was some possibility, albeit remote, that he might dismiss Hitler from the Chancellorship. With his death this danger passed. Hitler was now Head of State. He could only dismiss himself. His undeviating path had reached its natural end. Only God could remove him now. And God, he claimed, was on his side.

CHAPTER V

THE TWO G-MEN

'Be my brother, or I will bash your head in.'

- GERMAN PROVERB.

SURROUNDING Hitler are fantastic congeries of sub-Hitlers. In the early days in Berlin I heard one of the shrewdest of observers of affairs in Germany say: 'No top Nazi is perfectly normal or perfectly sincere. They are either cynics, on-the-make, or hysterics.' Every national revolution, it is true, convulsively stirring the depths of a great nation, may bring strange fish to the surface. And I do not say that hundreds and thousands of decent Germans, some of them in important administrative posts, are not forthright and honest men.

Several of the more notorious misfits perished on June 30. Many remain. It is not only that they remain, but they hold jobs extraordinarily appropriate to their weakness and failings. Who should be director of 'popular enlightenment' in the Third Reich? Who, indeed, but Dr. Goebbels, whose power of enlightenment is that of a cripple, a man maimed and dwarfed! Who should have almost supreme police power over sixty-five million Germans? Who, indeed, but General Goering, a man of the most violent and unstable passions!

Hitler once told an interviewer that he did not like Yes-men. Deliberately he chose to surround himself with bold and blustering spirits who often disagreed among themselves. He has, in fact, made a definite policy of playing one sub-leader against another; he keeps them guessing, gets out of each his best. Also, it is believed, he has something against most of them in his dossiers. The leaders, jealous of each other, and knowing Hitler the all-powerful arbiter of their destinies, compete with one another for his favour.

Hitler takes good care that none of the sub-leaders approach his own supremacy. When Goering got too powerful, he took the secret police away and gave them to Himmler. And Goering is not yet a member of the Reichsleitung (National Directorate) of the Nazi party.

Party posts more or less correspond to posts in the government. Dr. Goebbels, for instance, is Reichsleiter for propaganda in the party and also Reich propaganda minister; Darré is party leader for agriculture, and also minister of agriculture. If party and state were perfectly co-ordinated, as in Russia, this correspondence of posts would be complete. But it is by no means complete. Dr. Schacht, for instance, the economics dictator, has no party rank at all. And whereas Rosenberg is party chief for foreign affairs, he is very far from being foreign minister in the government.

Germany is divided into nineteen party districts or Gaus. (Austria, incidentally, was for some time considered the twentieth Gau.) Dr. Goebbels is Gauleiter for Berlin. When the Gauleiter is also the SA leader of the district, a condition which Hitler seeks to prevent as far as possible, he becomes a personage of enormous local power. Heines was both Gauleiter and SA commander in Silesia. Julius Streicher, the worst of the anti-Semites, is both Gauleiter and SA leader in North Bavaria.

The rivalries between these men are formidable. That between Goering and Goebbels is the best known. That between Goebbels and Rosenberg is no less vicious. It would be a complex task to draw a chart of the mutual hatreds within the party. Goebbels and Schacht are far from being friends; Goering and Papen; Goebbels and Himmler; and everyone dislikes Rosenberg. The only two men on fairly good terms with everyone are Hess and Frick; neither is ambitious, and both have pleasant personalities.

This unnatural mélange of hatreds produces friction and discordance and also inefficiency. Beyond that, it indicates what may be a serious weakness of Hitlerism. The party, founded on emotion, based on no fixed and stable ideology, held together only by the Leader Principle, is not indissolubly part and parcel of the structure of government and society, as is Fascism in Italy or communism in Russia. Hitler's three principal advisers are not Nazis at all: Schacht, Neurath, and General Blomberg. Imagine a Soviet Government in which the ministers of economics, foreign affairs, and war were not communists!

There are these sub-Hitlers then. Let us begin with General Goering.

Public Clothes-horse No. 1

'Der alte Kleiderständer . . .'- KARL ERNST.

Though nowadays he stands above all for the entity of Prussia,

Goering is a Bavarian; he was born in Rosenheim, Bavaria, on January 12, 1893. He came of a good family—his father was governor-general of German South-West Africa—and his schooling was good. He spent his holidays climbing the Austrian Alps. He too, like Hitler, has strong emotional affiliations with Austria, and this may be one of the contributory factors accounting for the Nazi assault on Austria in 1933 and 1934. Hitler's sister still lives in Vienna, and so does Goering's brother. And two of Goering's sisters married Austrians.

At twenty-one, Goering enlisted in the German Air Force. By the autumn of 1915 he was leader of No. 5 Pursuit Squadron. He was awarded the highest German decoration, the Pour le Mérite (equivalent to the Victoria Cross) and in 1918 he succeeded to the command of the celebrated Richthofen Squadron. Goering shot down twenty-three planes during the War, as against fifty-four for Udet, the second German pilot, and eighty-odd for Richthofen.

Two incidents which contributed deeply to the evolution of his life came in 1918, just after the Armistice. First, Goering refused to demobilise and surrender his planes. He was ordered to do so by the German General Staff, but, deliberately insubordinate, he refused to obey, until he was finally brought to ground near Darmstadt. He said farewell to his fellow officers, toasting the day when Germany would be supreme in the air. His planes were then destroyed.

He never got over this. The destruction of his precious aircraft, by men whom he considered his infinite inferiors, was a psychological shock from which he did not recover; his present passionate energy to build a new German air fleet is compensation.

Secondly, after he had returned to Berlin, a socialist mob saw him in uniform and forcibly tore his officer's insignia from his coat lapels. Foaming with rage, he swore vengeance. His hatred of socialists, which is psychopathic in intensity, dates from that day. It is not entirely fanciful to assume that much of the Brown Terror had its inner sources in this incident.

Goering went to Sweden in 1919 and got a job as a commercial flyer. There he fell in love with a woman who profoundly influenced his life, his first wife, Baroness Karin Fock. He met her, in almost Wagnerian fashion, after a forced landing on her estate at Rockelstad, in North Sweden. He was severely wounded in the Munich beer-hall Putsch of 1923, having become one of Hitler's leading followers the year before. He escaped to Italy and then returned to Sweden. His health broke down.

Frau Goering died in 1932, just before her husband became President of the Reichstag, his first big job. Thereafter, when Gregor Strasser was disgraced, Goering succeeded to much of his influence with Hitler and the party. At this time memory of the dead Karin seemed the most important personal factor in his life. He brought her body to Germany (she had died in Sweden) and built a sort of shrine in his Berlin home, where her portrait stood between lighted candles and tinted by reflections from a stained-glass window built into the wall. There Goering knelt daily and prayed – until he met Frau Emmy Sonnemann.

This massive lady, an actress, won his favour and a gargantuan wedding took place in Berlin in April 1935. The ceremony was practically a Roman feast. Hitler was best man. The newly-weds got eighty thousand pounds' worth of wedding gifts. On the same day two communists, Epstein and Ziegler, who had been condemned to death on the charge of complicity in the murder of the Nazi hero, Horst Wessel, were executed by the axe. Many Nazis admired the symbolic inference – a blood sacrifice to propitiate fertility in the married couple.

Goering holds an imposing galaxy of jobs. He is President of the Reichstag, General of the Reichswehr, General of the Air Force, General of Police, Reichs Minister of Aviation, Prime Minister of Prussia,¹ Master of the Hunt, Chief Forester of the Reich, and Director of Television – this last because television may be applicable to aerial warfare. In 1936 he became superintendent of the German 'Four-Year Plan' and as such the nominal economics dictator.

He is famous for the variety and flamboyance of his uniforms, but legend has got the better of fact, and in reality he wears only about ten. Usually he carries a hilted sword, like that of a crusader. Behind the desk in his principal residence, a colossal headman's sword is suspended perpendicularly on a velvet curtain. He has a mania for display not only in dress but houses.

Mostly he lives in a large structure on Leipzigerplatz. A sizeable swastika is designed in tile above the main fireplace. In one room the wallpaper is said to be blood-red and the carpet pitch-black; a marble bust of Hitler stands on a pedestal, illumined by a spotlight. Another room, an immense and richly-decorated hall, may be transformed into a movie theatre; at the touch of a button the tapestry on the wall rises into the ceiling, disclosing a movie screen.

¹ But he won't cross the threshold of the Prussian Ministry because it was formerly the stronghold of the socialists.

In Bavaria Goering has a country house, near Hitler's chalet, on a five thousand acre estate presented to him by the local government. His most ambitious project, and the one dearest to him, is the tremendous new air ministry in Berlin, with two thousand five hundred rooms, so big that aeroplanes can land and take off from the roof.

His ambition as well as his vanity is enormous. On March 6, 1933, exactly one day after the elections which confirmed Hitler's accession to office, he ordered his portrait painted – with a book in his lap conspicuously entitled Life of Napoleon. His pets are lion cubs. All of them, male or female, are supposed to be named Caesar.

He is as carnivorous as Hitler is frugal – brusque, impulsive, cruel. Testimony after the Munich Putsch of 1923 recorded his orders to 'beat in the skulls' of his opponents 'with rifle butts' (Heil, p. 19). His famous order to the police in February 1933 to shoot 'enemies' without question, really signalled the beginning of the Nazi terror. His ruthlessness is unthinking, spasmodic, hot-blooded. He is not a plotter, a conspirator, like Goebbels. He has great executive ability, and this serves to make him doubly dangerous.

Since Goering came to symbolise the police power of the Third Reich, 12,863 people have been sterilised, some of them forcibly. Some 90,000 Jews have fled the country. In the year between June 1933 and June 1934, 212 men and women were beheaded out of 214 sentenced to death, the great majority for political offences which in no other country would entail the capital penalty. The number of persons sentenced to imprisonment was 280,308; they were to serve an aggregate of 129,421 years. In addition, 184 persons were shot 'while attempting to escape', 13,000 were deprived of citizenship, and 49,000 sent to concentration camps.

Goering is a good Aryan. For instance, he greeted the conclusion of the Anglo-German naval agreement of June 1935 as 'a victory for race law'. But he is the only leading Nazi who is not an outspoken anti-Semite.

He is with the Rightists in the party. He cared nothing for the 'socialist' part of Hitler's programme. He became a Nazi because Naziism meant a strong national Germany with a new army and a powerful air force.

The jokes about Goering are, of course, legion. Most of them are predicated either on the resplendence of his uniforms or his abnormal size. He is not merely fat: he is fat on top of an immensity of muscle. He moves with the vigour of a man a hundred pounds lighter: there is nothing torpid about him; his energy is terrific. But the story goes that he is so obese that he 'sits down on his own stomach' and that he wears 'corsets on his thighs'.

One story is that he dons an admiral's uniform whenever he takes a bath, with rubber duplicates of all his medals. A new unit of weight has been established in Germany—a 'goering'—to signify the aggregate displacement of his decorations. Once he visited a steel factory and his companions were horrified to see him suddenly leave the floor and dart perpendicularly upward to the ceiling. Reason: an electro-magnet above had caught his medals.

Another little story has him arriving late at a luncheon in Berlin where he is to meet an eminent (and doubtless mythical) visiting Englishman. Goering apologises for his tardiness, and says that he has been out shooting. The Englishman turns to him with lofty words, 'Animals, I presume?' Goering, incidentally, is said to be fond himself of all the stories about him.

Once, the legend has it, Hitler fell into a doze during a performance of Lohengrin. The Führer was too tired to keep fully awake. His eyes opened suddenly as the figure of the shining knight in armour took the stage. Hitler thought it was Goering. 'Hermann,' he shouted, 'you are going too far.'

Goering's basic importance, if the present arrangement lasts, is not his blood lust, not his position in Prussia, not his command of the Prussian police. What matters is his association with aviation. The next war will be fought in the air, and it's an ill-omen that a man like Goering, with his immense drive and ruthlessness should be supremely responsible for the development of the German air arm.

As befits his character, the general can use doughty language on occasion. 'Anyone who writes against Germany,' he has said, 'must have filth in his brains.'

The Doctor

'A Jew is for me an object of physical disgust. I vomit when I see one. . . . Christ cannot possibly have been a Jew. I don't have to prove that scientifically. It is a fact. . . . I treasure an ordinary prostitute above a married Jewess.'

— DR. GOEBBELS.

Dr. Joseph Paul Goebbels was born with a club foot. This was the most important event in his life. It explains much of his personality and career. Crippled, as Heiden puts it, 'a dwarf among giants', he had to make his way by skill, by cleverness, by conspiracy. When his classmates went away to war — he was born in the Rhineland in 1897 — he had to stay at home on account of his deformity. His crippled foot sharpened his ambition, and also his hatred of the healthy. He is the most vicious man in the party, the most virulent — and the best educated. He took his Ph.D. at Heidelberg. The doctorate, alleged often to be spurious, is quite genuine.

The Goebbels family was devoutly Roman Catholic, but he is a ferocious anticlerical. His father was a teacher, the grandfather a peasant; his mother's family were handicraft workers, and all were poor. He worked his way to a scholarship at Heidelberg, after attending several other schools. As a youth he wanted to be a literary figure, and indeed he has written much: his published works fill fourteen volumes.

His wife, who married him after divorcing her first husband, was an important influence in his career. Enemies said that the first husband was Jewish; this was not true — he was a quite Aryan lawyer named Quandt. Hitler liked Frau Goebbels and, in the first years of his chancellorship, went often to her musical parties. This was highly advantageous to the political plans of the little doctor. For a time Frau Goebbels was director of the Deutsche Moden-Amt, a sort of fashion ministry supposed to create truly Aryan styles for German women; but it didn't last long.

The little doctor — he is scarcely five feet five inches — entered a meeting-hall in Munich in 1922; the speaker was Adolf Hitler. Goebbels says that pure chance brought him there. Converted instantly to Naziism, he went to the Rhineland to organise party groups. Hitler soon came to appreciate his quick tongue, his soaring words; next to the Leader he became the most valuable orator in the movement. In 1926 Hitler sent him to organise the party in Berlin, where it had made comparatively little progress. Goebbels founded a newspaper, the Angriff, and inside four years, by great feats of journalistic and organisational skill, he was leader of a powerful machine: next to Munich Berlin became the chief stronghold of the Hitlerites.

Goebbels's violence in oratory and journalism exceeded that of anyone in Germany. He was completely unscrupulous, reckless, and vindictive. At one time there were one hundred and twenty-six libel suits pending against him. Once, long ago, he printed a headline in the Angriff, IS HINDENBURG STILL ALIVE? The President brought suit for libel and collected eight hundred marks damages. Retaliating, Goebbels wrote that Hindenburg was surrounded 'by Jews and Marxists'. (Time, August 13, 1934.)

At the end of 1937 Goebbels was Reichsminister of Propaganda and Public Enlightenment. As such he was undisputed ruler of the Press in Germany and, something almost as important, ruler of the radio. He likewise controlled the theatre and the cinema, as well as most musical, artistic, cultural, and even scientific activities; he made the Reich a cultural prison, a Nazi vacuum, a country in a mental strait-jacket, for sixty-five million Germans.

Goebbels is also stage manager to the Nazi party. He invented the technique of the great mass meetings which helped so cardinally to bring Hitler votes. His tactics were simple. 'Propaganda has only one object,' he wrote, 'to conquer the masses. Every means that furthers this aim is good; every means that hinders it is bad.' He planned the strategy of incessant and unremitting attack. Thus the flaming decorations, the loud-speakers, the careful 'build-up' for Hitler's appearance, the marching, the uniforms.

Then, when Hitler was chancellor, he engineered the first incredible mob displays which so vehemently aroused the Nazis. He suggested the burning of the books; he organised the May Day and Harvest festivals; he superintended the Winterhilfe relief campaign. His supreme achievement was the creation of the Horst Wessel legend.

The youthful bravo named Horst Wessel, son of a Lutheran pastor, was one of the many rowdies who disfigured the Berlin streets before Hitler came to power. He became an SA troop commander, active in largely communist districts, and the communists hated him. Three hooligans, moved by personal as well as political reasons, went up to his room and shot him as he lay in bed. He refused to have a Jewish doctor who was summoned, and died of his wounds.

Goebbels saw in Horst Wessel's funeral, a perfect opportunity for propaganda on a large scale. But the police (this was way back in 1930) refused to permit an expansive demonstration. So Goebbels had to think of something else. Horst Wessel had written words to a street song, based on an old Bavarian tune, which was sung by Nazis and communists both. Goebbels decided to make capital of this song; and a good rousing tune it indeed is. Before a month had passed, the song was the unofficial Nazi hymn. Soon it was official. And Horst Wessel became, and still is, the first Nazi martyr.

GOEBBELS AND HIS FAMILY

Outwardly relations between Goebbels and Goering are correct, but they seldom miss opportunity for surreptitious digs at one another. Goering, as prime minister of Prussia, ruled the Staatsoper in Berlin. So Goebbels, undaunted, bought another opera in Berlin and set it going as a rival to Goering's opera. The new Frau Goering has ambitions to replace Frau Goebbels as first lady of the Third Reich. Goebbels is very jealous of his prerogatives. Putzi Hanfstaengl, late in 1933, was charged with the preparation of a film depicting the life of Horst Wessel. Goebbels succeeded first in temporarily banning the film, then in having its treatment altered and title changed, even though it was able Nazi propaganda as it stood.

Some Goebbels obiter dicta:

'I know it is a sacrifice for us not to have a new war.'

'Our Brown Shirts saved France from Bolshevism, and even now with its Stavisky scandal and Paris street riots, things are not in order there.'

'Hitler's attack on the democratic spirit is merely the opening act of a development the end of which will be a National Socialist Europe.'

'War is the most simple affirmation of life. Suppress war, and it would be like trying to suppress the processes of nature.'

Control the Press of a nation and half the job of dictatorship is done. Goebbels has given living strength to the authority of this maxim. As supreme dictator of the printed word in the Third Reich, nothing may be published in Germany without his consent. He is at liberty to censor even the words of fellow cabinet ministers. In June 1934 he prevented full publication of Papen's Marburg speech; in August 1935 he censored Dr. Schacht's similar warning to extremists at Königsberg; in the same month he forbade the broadcasting of Streicher's Jew-baiting rally in Berlin. No journalist may find employment in Germany till Dr. Goebbels certifies his acceptability; no newspaper may publish anything without his tacit consent. Incidental result: 1,400 German newspapers, about one-third of the total number in the Reich, have perished since 1933.

Dr. Goebbels would not like to hear it, but his minatory control of Press and propaganda is one of the things Naziism has taken over direct from the U.S.S.R. The Nazis justified their revolution on the ground that it would save Germany from communism but they appropriated wholesale a number of communist methods, anti-social in category. Justice in Germany is guided by the interests of the state; so it is in Russia. The state is totalitarian in the U.S.S.R.; the Germans have similar ambitions. Soviet Russia has a secret police; it has concentration camps; it has only one political party, and all ideological opposition is ruthlessly snuffed out – the same considerations were all copied by the Nazis.

Goebbels has kept his footing partly because Hitler needs him, partly because of his supernal shrewdness. His nose is sharp, and his instinct for self-preservation immense. He flatters those who, he thinks, are of use to him, and he never says anything against those who at the moment are powerful. When crisis brews, as on June 30, Goebbels will be found on Hitler's shadow.

Dr. Goebbels is the spiritual source of such a medley of violent nonsense as the modern world has seldom seen. For instance listen to Professor Herman Gauch, author of the Nazi tract, New Bases of Racial Research:

'In non-Nordics, the teeth, corresponding to the snout-like narrowness of the upper jaw, stand at a more oblique angle than in animals. The grinding motion of chewing in Nordics allows mastication to take place with the mouth closed, whereas men of other races are inclined to make the same smacking noise as animals. . . .

'The Nordic mouth has further superiorities. Just as the colour red has a stirring effect, the bright red mouth of Nordics attracts and provokes kisses and courtship. The Nordic mouth is kiss-capable. On the other hand, the non-Nordic's broad, thick-lipped mouth together with his wide-dilated nostrils displays sensual eagerness, a false and malicious sneering expression and a dipping movement indicative of voluptuous self-indulgence.

'Talking with the aid of hands and feet is characteristic of non-Nordics, whereas the Nordic man stands calmly, often enough with his hands in his pockets.

'Generally speaking, the Nordic race alone can emit sounds of untroubled clearness, whereas among non-Nordics the pronunciation is impure, the individual sounds are more confused and like the noises made by animals, such as barking, sniffing, snoring, squeaking.

'If non-Nordics are more closely allied to monkeys and apes than to Nordics, why is it possible for them to mate with Nordics and not with apes? The answer is this. It has not been proved that non-Nordics cannot mate with apes.'

And consider the following from the Judenkenner, a semi-official organ:

'German national comrades, do you know that the Jew:

Violates	Your Child,
Sullies	Your Wife,
Sullies	Your Sister,
Sullies	Your Fiancée,
Murders	Your Parents,
Steals	Your Property,
Mocks	Your Honour,
Scorns	Your Morals,
Destroys	Your Church,
Rots	Your Culture,
Infects	Your Race.'

— (Quoted in the Star, June 7, 1935.)

No detail is too small for Dr. Goebbels's men. For instance, this attack on the alien lemon:

'Farewell, lemon, we need thee not! Our German rhubarb will take thy place fully and entirely. He is so unpretending that we overlooked and despised him, busy with infatuation for foreign things. In all our shires we can have him in masses, the whole year round. We get him almost for nothing; his tartness will season our salads and vegetable dishes. Slightly sweetened he provides us with delicious refreshment, and, what is more, he is a blood-purifying and medicinal agent true to German type. Let us make good with German rhubarb the sins we have committed with the alien lemon.'

— (The Times, July 29, 1935.)

Goebbels is not a Jew, but his appearance is un-Aryan, to say the least. His enemies in the party have often pointedly but in circumlocutory fashion referred to the dangerous racial aspects of lame or deformed men, those with club feet in particular. Goebbels's reply was a minor masterpiece. He found an anthropologist who invented a classification in Aryan ethnology to apply to himself alone — Nachgedunkelter Schrumppfgermane. This is hard to translate. An approximate rendering: 'A dwarf-like German who grew dark.'

CHAPTER VI

THE OTHER LITTLE HITLERS

'I demand that every Storm Troop Leader, just as every political leader, should be conscious of the fact that his behaviour and conduct must be exemplary. . . . I wish every mother to give her son to The Party without fearing that he may be ruined morally. . . . Storm Troop Leaders who behave unworthily in public are to be mercilessly removed.'

— ADOLF HITLER.

The Perfect Bureaucrat — Frick

LESS publicised than either, Dr. Wilhelm Frick is, after Goering and Goebbels, the most powerful Nazi office-holder. He was appointed minister of the interior for the Reich in Hitler's first cabinet, and he has held this office ever since. Thus he controls the civil administration of Germany, and his influence is strong in the schools, the public services and the police.

Born in the Palatinate in 1877, Frick studied law and became a Beamter, an official. He is a bureaucrat through and through. Hitler is not intimate with him, but he respects him. He became minister of the interior because he was the only important Nazi with civil service training. Precise, obedient, uninspired, he turned out to be a faithful executive; he has been called the 'only honest Nazi'.

Yet no one should think that this dry, so-typical German Beamter is not capable of great, exhilarating Nazi words and deeds. It was Frick who drafted the Aryan law defining Jewishness unto the third generation. It was Frick, a cabinet minister in Thuringia, who enforced compulsory prayers on all school-children: hate-prayers for the destruction of the Treaty of Versailles. And in the Reichstag, as the senior Nazi deputy, Frick once introduced a law for the castration of homosexuals (cf. Heil, p. 69). This did not endear him to Heines or Roehm. Frick has always been on the side of the conservatives in the party, like Goering.

A fierce intra-party battle for the control of cultural affairs has been waged. Goebbels asserts that all art is propaganda and therefore belongs to him. Rosenberg holds that art is Weltanschauung and should thus be in his province. Goering, as boss of Prussia, feels that art is the prerogative of the executive authority, and therefore his. Rust, minister of education, would like culture as part of his domain, but being only a lion of the second magnitude, he is silent while the others roar. And Frick, the while, holds on to all he can.

His seven precepts for the education of the young are powerfully nationalist. And German school books – a profoundly important point for the future – are compact with an appallingly militant, pan-German propaganda.

Hess

Rudolf Hess, born in Alexandria, Egypt, in 1896, is the Führer's personal deputy, the deputy-leader of the party, and Reichsminister without portfolio. When Goering, after the murder of Schleicher, underwent a temporary period of severe unpopularity with the Reichswehr, Hess – had he been bold and assertive enough – might have taken his position. But the talents of Hess lie otherwise. He is the private secretary par excellence, the watchdog, the faithful servant, and little more. Hess, like so many others, was converted to Hitlerism on first hearing the Leader speak; like Goering and Ley, he was a flying officer during the War. He was the first 'gentleman' to join the Nazi party, and he became Hitler's secretary in 1923.

The strength of Hess lies in his closeness to Hitler. He has no government department, but, a cabinet minister himself, he acts as a co-ordinator between the other ministries. Hitler has given him several thankless jobs: for instance the onus of making the first public apologia for the murders of June 30. It is very difficult to get to Hitler on any political or party business except through Hess. His office is thronged with office-seekers and it has been nicely termed the Klagemauer (Wailing Wall) of the Third Reich.

Hess has recorded that in Alexandria he became a nationalist, during the War a socialist, and in Munich after the War an anti-Semite. Therefore his soul was ripe for Adolf's seed. His anti-Semitism is rigorous and extreme.

Hess is retiring in character, genuinely modest, and very popular. At every Parteitag in Nuremberg (annual Nazi congress) he receives the biggest applause next to Hitler: far more from the Nazi rank-and-file than Goering, Goebbels, Rosenberg, or Frick. His whole life is devoted to Hitler. His only outside interest is faith-healing, and he has founded a hospital in Dresden devoted to cures by means that scientific medicine does not recognise.

Hitler appointed him to become the head of the political section of the Nazi party in the fall of 1932, after the disgrace of Strasser. Previously, except in Hitler's intimate circle, he had been little known. The appointment was sound politics. With his usual perspicacity, Hitler chose as his deputy the one man in Germany who was not ambitious for a better job.

Hess was named, incredible as it may seem, as the German official who collaborated with Trotsky for the overthrow of the U.S.S.R. in the Moscow treason trial of January 1937. Hess was mentioned by name half a dozen times.

Boss of the Black Shirts

Heinrich Himmler wears pince-nez and looks like a schoolmaster. He is one of the most sinister personalities in the new Germany. He is two things, first Reich commander of the SS (Black Shirts), second, head of the entire German police, including the Gestapo, or secret police. He has informally told the world that in the event of an attempt on Hitler's life, even if it is unsuccessful, there will be chaos in Germany and 'a great pogrom'.

Born in Munich in 1900, Himmler, like so many of his colleagues, belonged to a nationalist gang of guerilla fighters; like Brücker, Goering, Streicher, Hess and other prominent leaders, he took part in the Putsch of 1923. In 1927 he became deputy leader of the SS, which was being formed by Hitler as a counterweight to the SA of Roehm. In 1929 he became Reichs leader of the SS, in 1933 police president of Munich, in 1934 chief of the political police.

The SS, as we have seen, are the picked Nazi forces. Himmler has said, 'The SA is the Line, the SS are the Guards.' Every SS man must obey especially strict standards of discipline; he must be of satisfactory height and appearance; he may not marry until he and his bride are certified by Himmler's Eugenics Bureau as irreproachably Aryan and healthy potential parents.

This man, holding in his person the double job of policeman and SS ruler, fulfils a double function. The Gestapo and SS between them are invincible. The police arrest people. The SS guard them in concentration camps. Himmler is all-powerful at both ends. Besides, he is a convenient instrument for the civil side of the party, in that he can obey secret orders and fulfil them, while the government officially disclaims 'knowledge' of what he does.

Bodyguard

Lieut. Brückner, the chief bodyguard, officially known as Adjutant to the Führer is, as befits his post, one of the huskiest men in Germany. He is at least six foot four and a tremendous specimen of agile muscularity. Brückner is never far from Hitler. He sleeps just outside Hitler's room. He was born in Baden-Baden in 1884 and, like Himmler, joined a corps of nationalist volunteers after the War. He and the Leader, as we have noted, are inseparable; Brückner was the man at Hitler's side when he arrested Roehm. He is in the SA not SS, with the rank of brigadier-general.

Nuremberg Jew-Fancier

Of all the leading Nazis, Julius Streicher is the most notorious. This rapacious anti-Semite, the Reichscommissar for Franconia, is a man of fifty-one, barrel-chested, shaven-headed, in appearance the incarnation of brutality. According to Heil, in July 1933 he ordered two hundred and fifty Jews who had been arrested to pluck grass out of a field with their teeth.

Streicher organised the anti-Jewish boycott held in Berlin in April 1933 just after the Nazis came to power. This was one great show that Dr. Goebbels did not put on. It was not repeated. Streicher publishes a weekly newspaper, Der Stürmer, solid with viciously revolting and pornographic anti-Semite propaganda. Once he issued a special 'Ritual Murder' issue. It caused such a storm of protest in the outside world – by the Archbishop of Canterbury for instance – that it had to be suppressed in Germany.

Streicher is quoted by the American magazine Time (April 8, 1935) as follows:

'With my riding-whip, I sometimes give it to prisoners I have had taken into protective custody to save them from the mob. Take that school-teacher Dr. Steinruck who used to talk so big! I went with several Party members into his cell. He began to talk with a weeping voice and acted like a schoolboy. He did not act like the man I had expected after so much big talk, so I gave him a good thrashing with my whip.'

On his fiftieth birthday the local authorities made him a picturesque gift – the dossier in the archives of the Nuremberg police which 'formerly might have been used against him as incriminating material'. Streicher's proudest boast is that he has cleared one Franconian district, Hersbruck, comprising thirty-six villages and 22,000 inhabitants, entirely of Jews. Not a single Jew remains. Everywhere in Franconia the terror against the Jews proceeds with miserable ferocity. Streicher's ultimate solution of the Jewish problem is to castrate all Jews.

His general culture is not too brilliant. When he came to Berlin in August 1935 to speak at the Sport-Palast meeting he said: 'The great Jew who lived in England, Benjamin Disraeli, became Premier. Later he was elevated to the peerage under the name of Lord Gladstone.'

It is no use, as some sympathisers do, saying that Hitler personally 'deplores' Streicher's blood-thirsty brutality. Hitler does not deplore it. He has been given every opportunity to get rid of Streicher. He refuses to do so. Streicher is one of his oldest supporters. Streicher joined him in 1923, having first formed a rival 'workers' party. Hitler has commended him highly and in public. Only two Nazis are mentioned by name in the whole of Mein Kampf: Hess and - Streicher. And when Streicher turned fifty, Hitler specially flew to Nuremberg from Berlin to pay him a surprise birthday visit.

Two Lesser Lights

Count Wolf von Helldorf, appointed police chief in Berlin during the second wave of Nazi terror against the Jews, in July 1935, has a peculiar qualification for his post: he was himself sentenced to jail in 1931 for leading a violent anti-Semitic demonstration on the same street, Kurfürstendamm, where the new riots, which he was appointed to 'clean up', occurred.

Baldur von Schirach is the leader of the Youth Movement. He was born in 1907. He is fanatically devoted to Hitler, given even to writing verses to him. He is interested in religion. Recently he said, 'The Nazi party has been proved to have better relations with the Lord of the Heaven than had the Christian parties which disappeared.' And note well: Von Schirach, like several other Nazis who mingle religion with nationalism, has become a pagan.

Two Radicals

These, though their names are seldom heard outside Germany, are among the most important Nazis. They are Dr. Robert Ley, chief of the trade unions and leader of the German labour front, and R. Walter Darré, 'Peasant Leader' and Reichs minister for agriculture. But their power may wane, because Nazi economics since June 30 has been conservative, and they are known as 'radicals'.

Darré, born in Buenos Aires¹ in 1895, is something of a scholar. He entered the inner ranks of Nazi nobility not by way of freebooting and brawls in Munich but – very late from the hierarchical point of view – as an agrarian expert. He had been a civil servant in the ministry of agriculture. He was hoisted into office after Hugenberg faded out. Promptly he initiated an ambitious series of agricultural reforms, and to him credit is due for almost all the 'socialist' measures the Nazi government has undertaken. Darré arranged a price-fixing scheme for grain, and he inaugurated the Hereditary Farms Act, by which old-established peasant holdings may not be sold or mortgaged, but must pass in entail to descendants of the owners.

Darré was a little too quick for his superiors. And they frowned at what they called his lack of modesty and tact when, a few months after taking office, he caused a monument to be erected to himself at Wiesbaden, marked 'Blood and Soil', and himself made a speech at its dedication. The party, however, has no cause to complain of his racial zeal. Darré is the author of the celebrated scheme to divide all the women of the Reich into eugenic classes, like cattle, for breeding purposes.

Dr. Robert Ley, the leader of the trade unions, somewhat unbridled in character, went to Geneva, before Germany left the League, to attend a meeting of the International Labour Office, and before an audience partly composed of South Americans made a remarkable speech denouncing inhabitants of several South American republics as uncivilised 'idiots'. He was a pilot during the War, and entered the party early. When Strasser was disgraced, in November 1932, Ley and Hess together succeeded to his posts, Ley becoming chief organiser of the party, an important 'key' position. To Hitler he is unswervingly loyal, and so the Leader keeps him.

Ley's grandiloquence is notable. Listen: 'We begin with the child when he is three years old. As soon as he begins to think, he gets a little flag put in his hand; then follows the school, the Hitler Jugend, the SA and military training. We don't let him go; and when adolescence is past, then comes the Arbeitsfront which takes him again and doesn't let him go till he dies, whether he likes it or not.'

¹ Another chieftain – like Hess – not German by birth. Also Rosenberg.

The Warriors

The immensity of German military preparation, both material and spiritual, is no longer news to anybody. Rearmament was covert until October 1933, when Germany left the League; an open secret until March 1935, when Hitler tore up the military clauses of Versailles and introduced conscription; since March 1935 the Reich has been an enormous military camp, with no disguise about it. And in March 1936 the demilitarised Rhineland zone was occupied.

As well as anything else, a little joke best summarised the covert period. Frau X asks her husband, worker in a perambulator factory, to procure her a baby-carriage. He promises to filch the parts, piece by piece, from the factory. Some months later they have all been stolen, and Herr X sets to work putting them together. He turns finally to his wife in puzzled despair: 'I have put the thing together three different times, and each time it turns out to be a machine-gun.'

This era is long past. Germany, it is true – and it is not a negligible point – still labours under certain disadvantages. The Air Force, though it is said to number 3,000 planes, is not 'ready' yet. It has few heavy guns so far, and few heavy tanks. But, on the other hand, full selective conscription is in force, and the Reichswehr is to attain a peace strength of 850,000 men. In August 1936 service was extended from one year to two. And, according to Winston Churchill, the country spends the stupendous sum of £800,000,000 annually on armament.

The minister of war is Col.-General Werner Eduard Fritz von Blomberg. Born in 1878 at Stargard in Pomerania, he comes of a distinguished officers' family. He entered the army and for a long time his promotion was very slow. He was second lieutenant in 1897, first lieutenant in 1907, captain in 1911, and only colonel in 1925. After 1928 his rise was extremely rapid. He was major-general in 1928, lieutenant-general in 1929, full general in 1930, minister of defence in 1933, colonel-general (the highest German rank except field-marshal) in 1934.

He is by no means a typical Prussian officer. Pleasant, cordial, calm, rather soft in manner, he is the last remove from a martinet, a goose-stepper. He speaks languages and has travelled widely; in 1930 he took a furlough for a vacation in the United States. He wears his hair rather long and combed backwards, whereas most Reichswehr officers are punctiliously cropped.

The importance of Blomberg is that he is deeply, passionately devoted to Hitler. He is a begeisterter Nazi, quite different from those officers who, granting that Hitler is a convenience, find much that is offensive in his fanaticism, and face with equanimity the day when they, not he, shall rule Germany. Blomberg is an ardent, convinced, personal Hitlerite.

He has known Hitler well only since 1933. His appointment as minister of war came in odd fashion. There was some difficulty in finding a man, on account of the sharp clash between Schleicher and the Nazis. One of Hitler's best friends was, and is, Ludwig Müller,¹ then a military chaplain in the division which Blomberg was commanding. He recommended Blomberg to Hitler, and through this priestly intermediary Blomberg got the job. Then Müller, as reward, was made Reichsbishop of the Protestant Church in Germany!

Under Blomberg is General Werner Freiherr von Fritsch, the chief of army direction (Chef der Heeresleitung), i.e. commander-in-chief. Fritsch is a quite different type from Blomberg. He is the complete army man. Nothing means anything to him except the army. He represents exclusively the army point of view. Blomberg, it is said in Germany, is 'Hitler-loyal'; Fritsch is 'Fatherland-loyal'. Blomberg is supposed to be something of a sentimentalist; Fritsch is hard-boiled. Blomberg can be influenced by Hitler; Fritsch cannot.

He was born in 1880 on the Rhine, of an officers' family and is of aristocratic birth. His career has been cut and dried. He was close to Hindenburg in the latter days, first as chief of staff of the First (East Prussian) division near Hindenburg's estate, second as chief commander of the military district of Berlin. His advance was regular and based on merit.

Fritsch did not want the Reichswehr to be increased to as many as 850,000 men. He thought this was too much. He is a firm believer in the Seeckt principle: of an army like a flail, a sword; an army not too big, but perfectly tempered, perfectly trained, superlatively supple, swift, sure.

¹ One of Müller's feats was production of a new Nazi version of the Sermon on the Mount. In the King James Bible, for instance, Matthew v. 9, reads as follows: 'Blessed are the peacemakers; for they shall be called the children of God.' The Nazi 'translation' is: 'Happy are they who keep the peace with their fellow-nationals (italics mine); they do God's will.'

In February 1937, a special prayer chanted over all German radio stations called Hitler 'God's revelation to the German people' and their 'redeemer'.

Hitler and the Reichswehr

Is Hitler dependent on the Reichswehr for support? Yes. But is not the Reichswehr loyal to Hitler? Again yes. Indeed, the question that is so often asked is rather pointless, viz. which, as between Hitler and the Reichswehr, is really boss in Germany. The fact is that both rule Germany. And so long as their aims are identical little chance of conflict between them exists.

The Reichswehr is a necessity to Hitler, but also Hitler is a necessity to the Reichswehr. Each needs the other. They are complements. The Reichswehr wants a strong, united Germany and Hitler is incomparably the strongest man in the country. The alternative to him is either an overt military dictatorship or chaos. The Reichswehr has no need of an overt military dictatorship, which would be unpopular, as long as Hitler does its job. And it certainly does not want chaos.

Moreover, one should not forget the oath that every officer and soldier in the army swore to Hitler personally. Prussian officers and soldiers do not break their word of honour lightly.

So long as Blomberg remains minister of war, there is little prospect of a 'Reichswehr revolt'. If Blomberg were to be succeeded by someone hostile to Hitler, it would be a different story. Hitler has dropped the SA and cast his lot with the Reichswehr once for all. Should the Reichswehr betray him, he is doomed.

Do not, finally, forget that the Reichswehr, from the very beginning, supported Hitler. Reichswehr money made the first party organisation and the early Völkische Beobachter possible. And Hitler began 'public' life as a Reichswehr spy.

CHAPTER VII

WAR, PEACE, POLICY, AND CASH

‘The Germans do not want a war; all they want are the rewards of victory.

— JULES CAMBON.

ON March 7, 1936, with flamboyant suddenness, Hitler sent his troops into the Rhineland, provoking what was in a sense the greatest European crisis since 1919. By terms of the peace treaties the Rhineland zone was to have been demilitarised in perpetuity. Germans – with much justice – resented bitterly the ‘inequality’ thus symbolised between themselves and the other powers. But Hitler not only invaded the Rhineland; by so doing he automatically tore up the Treaty of Locarno, which had been a bastion of European peace since 1925, through its guaranty by Britain and Italy of both sides of the Franco-Belgian-German frontier. Inviolability of the Rhineland zone was part of the Locarno Treaty. And Hitler’s destruction of this treaty split Europe open like a melon.

Some of the French wanted to march; and didn’t quite have the nerve. Most of the British wanted to temporise – and did. The Italians, annoyed by sanctions, refused to join Britain, France, and Belgium in a united Locarno ‘front’. As was inevitable, Italy and Germany – long separated by their quarrel over Austria – tended to come together. The failure of sanctions accelerated this process. The Belgians,¹ led by a man who quickly gained great respect through Europe, Paul van Zeeland, were especially exasperated by the crisis. Not only was Belgium virtually defenceless, as in 1914, against the enormous might of Germany, but Hitler had defended the Rhineland coup on the pretext that the Franco-Soviet pact of mutual assistance, which was about to be ratified in Paris, was itself a violation of the Treaty of Locarno. But Belgium was as much endangered by the new situation as was France, and with the Franco-Soviet pact Belgium had nothing whatever to do.

A great concourse of statesmen met in London to patch up the matter. They were confronted, of course, with the ancient and honourable problem of how to lock the stable door after the horse had fled. For ten days they wrangled to find a formula for settlement. British opinion, at first sharply pro-German, veered to realisation of the future disasters implicit in Hitler's wanton treaty breaking. In the end Herr von Ribbentrop, Hitler's ambassador-at-large, accepted an academic rebuke by the League Council in return for consideration of a 'peace' plan which the Leader had announced. Hitler, that incredible creature, meantime publicly told the world what he really was – a somnambulist! – and received a 98.81 per cent vote of confidence from the German people.

¹ For Belgium see Chapter XXXIII, below.

The Peace Plan proposed (a) a twenty-five years non-aggression pact between Germany, France, and Belgium, (b) a western air pact, (c) 'moral' disarmament, (d) an eastern security pact including Lithuania but excluding Soviet Russia, (e) return to the League by Germany if these and other conditions were fulfilled, (f) abolition of heavy tanks and heavy artillery. There was also an amazing incidental Hitlerism – a suggestion that not only Germany but France should hold a plebiscite on these issues. Also included was a reference to colonial equality within a reasonable time.

Careful scrutiny of the Plan showed at once that its face value might be high, its inner value dubious. Non-aggression pacts – there have been some two hundred in the post-War years – have not proved effective. Mutual assistance pacts Hitler eschewed – because they might be effective. The pacts he proposed, it seemed, would have two effects, to allow him to take on enemies one by one, and to freeze the western frontiers so that his hands would be free for the East. Hitler's enmity to the Soviet Union is subcutaneous and inefaceable. Suggestions for 'moral disarmament', including suppression of publications and educational books making for bad feeling between France and Germany, came strangely, to say the least, from the country where the Stürmer is published and where implacably nationalist militarism is hammered daily into the young. A western air pact on a quantitative basis is, most experts consider, a technical impossibility, and Hitler's proposal for it a mere gesture. As to tanks and heavy artillery, these are precisely the weapons in which Germany is weakest; therefore let them be abolished! Above and beyond all this was the question of Hitler's good faith. What, in effect, he was doing was to promise not to violate any more treaties immediately after flagrantly and incontestably tearing one up – and at the same time denying that he had done so.

A tedious and nerve-wracking period of diplomatic jockeying and bargaining ensued. Hitler's victory was complete in that he got what he wanted, the militarisation of the Rhineland. But an emphatic White Paper of the Locarno powers told him, to his annoyance, that Britain, France, and Belgium were provisionally to be bound by what amounted to a defensive military alliance against German aggression, and talks between the General Staffs of the three countries began. Mr. Eden then sent a questionnaire to Berlin, and a highly important document it was. As a manifest of Hitler's good faith it asked – politely but very firmly – if he were prepared to include Soviet Russia in his eastern pact, and what assurances he could give of the sanctity of future treaties. The questions reached Hitler just as Europe quivered from another severe shock – the flight of Hailé Selassié from Abyssinia and the occupation of Addis Ababa by Italian troops. The questionnaire put Hitler in a tight spot, and rudely he never answered it.

Meantime, the thoughtful sought to digest a sentence from his March 14 speech: 'I do not believe that there can be peace among the nations until they all have the same law and system of law. That is why I hope that National Socialism will one day extend over the world. That is no fantastic dream, but an achievable object.' And at Nuremberg he outdid himself in savage outbursts against the Soviet Union.

Rome-Berlin Axis and Fascist International

In September 1936 the British tentatively suggested conversations toward a new Locarno; the German answer was indecisive. Again in January Mr. Eden sought to open negotiation; again the Germans quibbled and delayed.

Two events of major importance had meantime occurred, serving to push Hitler to different tangents. Both gave the democracies of the world cause for legitimate alarm.

1. On November 25, 1936, Germany and Japan announced suddenly the conclusion of what seemed tantamount to an alliance. The agreement, directed 'against the communist international', was to last five years; it bound Germany and Japan to consultation and collaboration and established a permanent committee, 'both investigative and defensive', against the Comintern; Ambassador Ribbentrop who signed it on behalf of Germany called it 'an epoch-making event, a turning-point in the defensive struggle of all nations loving order and civilisation'.

2. Something that came to be called the 'Rome-Berlin axis' evolved. This was not a formal treaty between Hitler and Mussolini, but a gradual approximation of their policies. Germany and Italy commenced a period of very close co-operation; they intervened in Spain together and they recognised the Franco 'government' in identical notes sent the same day. Goering, Blomberg, Neurath, visited Rome; Mussolini announced his intention of visiting Germany. Count Ciano, after a trip to Berlin, talked of the virtual identity of German and Italian aims.

Rome did not associate herself formally with the new German-Japanese treaty. But it was welcomed in Rome; Ciano stated that 'the paucity of Italian interests in the Pacific made it unnecessary for Italy to proceed beyond the establishment of identity of views with Japan on the subject of communism'. This new community between the three great activist, expansionist states of the world – Germany, Italy, Japan – startled the world; the bogey of a 'Fascist International' seemed close.

German touchiness, German bad temper, increased apace during 1937. Mayor La Guardia of New York 'wise-cracked' at Hitler, not very seriously: the German Press called La Guardia 'a Jewish boob, a filthy character, a man with cheap brains, an impertinent Jewish lout, a well poisoner, a procurer, and a dirty Talmud Jew'. In August Germany expelled Norman Ebbutt, the distinguished Berlin correspondent of The Times, because three Nazi agents had been expelled from England. Hitler took time out, roving new fields, to call modern art 'insane'. In September Baron von Neurath shocked the world by stating that Germans all over the world, no matter where they lived, must remain German, and that German 'cultural attaches', i.e. propagandists, should have the same status as diplomatic representatives.

In a speech commemorating his first four years as Chancellor, however, Hitler announced that 'the era of surprises' in German foreign policy was over.

War?

It may be said, on the basis of several arguments, that war is impossible for Hitler. Let us explore.

First, one may argue that Germany has not enough money to make a war. But poverty has never prevented conflict. It may make the war hard to carry on, but a desperate country, already poverty-stricken, has less to lose by war than the rich countries which oppose it. The economic crisis in Italy did not prevent Mussolini's attack on Abyssinia.

Second, one may argue that Germany has not enough raw materials to make a war. The answer to this is she probably has as good an equipment of war materials to-day as in 1914 when, despite the blockade, she managed to fight a very good war for four long years.

Third, one may argue that opposition to Hitler within the Reich is too strong; that the workers would not mobilise; that they would shoot in the wrong direction. But the lesson of the totalitarian state is that each year it stays in power the strength of opposition lessens. Look at Soviet Russia. And look at Mussolini's success in Abyssinia. 'Good propaganda,' Frances Gunther expressed it, 'can make anything popular – even death.'

There are also certain tactical difficulties. Hitler's major objectives are, and for some time are likely to be, Austria and Memel. Hitler is blocked off from Austria by the Italian army on the Brenner Pass, for the Duce is still Austria's Lord High Protector. He is blocked from a Putsch in Memel – according to all the imperatives of reason – by his understanding with Poland. The Poles do not want Memel interfered with. Memel is Lithuanian territory. And the Poles have the sensible idea that no one is going to be allowed any rape of Lithuania except themselves. Hitler could make a coup d'état in Memel (Danzig also) only at the risk of breaking the Polish alliance, something he cannot afford to do.

Hitler's enmity to Soviet Russia is, we have noted, ineradicable. He said to a recent interviewer: 'We will not sign a multilateral pact of mutual assistance in the East, for in no circumstances would Germans fight for Bolsheviks. In such a fight our nation simply would not march. Rather than sign such a pact, I would hang myself.' These are, of course, cheap words. No one is asking Hitler to fight for Bolsheviks. Nor is it easy for him to fight against them. Hitler is accustomed both to give up things he hasn't got, and to threaten countries he cannot attack. Germany and Russia are not contiguous; Germany could invade Russia only through Poland, which would not allow troops of any nationality to invade its territory.

On the other hand, Germany's will to war is shown by an impressive list of factors. For one thing, the creation of the new German army and air force. For another, the fact that essential German ambitions to expand in the East or in Central Europe can only be achieved by war. Can Europe endure the steady outward pressure of the Reich without resistance? Underground aggression in Austria, threats against Lithuania, agitation and intrigue among Germans everywhere – in Switzerland, Holland, Rumania, Yugoslavia, Scandinavia, the Baltic States – show the latent explosive force of the Nazi revolution. All the frontiers of Germany tingle from the aggressive strain inside.

Again, Naziism, essentially a militarist creed, has produced in Germany a renaissance of incorrigibly belligerent Wotanism that may burst outward whether Hitler so desires or not. This factor is intensified by the possibility of economic breakdown. The lesson of the Abyssinian war is that dictatorships, if they are in danger of breaking down, break out. May not Lithuania, five years hence, be Hitler's Abyssinia? What will happen when Dr. Schacht can no longer purchase raw materials?

Post-War Germany is one of the Have-Nots, since Germany lost the War. But her policy seems to be not only to regain what she lost, which would be fair enough, but much more. It is a paramount item in the Nazi creed that all contiguous Teutons should be incorporated into the Third Reich. This means Austria, and then the Germans of Czechoslovakia, Switzerland, Denmark, Holland, and perhaps – eventually – the Italian Tyrol and Danzig and the Polish Corridor. For Naziism stands for renascent pan-Germanism or nothing.

Germany's will to expand is to be explained not so much by increase in the birth-rate but by 'moral' factors: Germany's right to a place in the sun, Germany's bursting energy demanding outlet. The birth-rate is not, in long perspective, increasing but actually decreasing; according to present estimates the population of Germany (within present frontiers) will be only about 49,000,000 in 1975 as against 65,000,000 to-day. As to the necessity of expansion it is illuminating to recall that in 1914 the total population of Germans in the German colonies was only about 25,000, which was fewer than the number of German residents in, of all places, Paris.

Hitler, confronted by a hostile world, had to survey his objectives with great caution. One should remember that Germany had gone a long way toward redressing the injustices of Versailles before he came to power. Foreign military control was abolished early in the Weimar republic. The Rhineland was evacuated of foreign garrisons under Stresemann. Reparations disappeared under Brüning and Papen. And the Allies accepted Germany's theoretical right to military equality under Papen-Schleicher.

Hitler has continued the process, by introducing conscription, reacquiring the Saar, occupying the Rhineland with troops, and denouncing the war-guilt clauses of the Versailles Treaty. Concurrently, he left the League of Nations and gave up German claims on the Polish Corridor for ten years (because it was essential for him, hemmed in, to come to terms with Poland). His progress cost him a good deal. He was, for a time, about as popular internationally as smallpox. Temporarily at last he alienated Mussolini, who might have been his friend; he frightened and annoyed Denmark, Holland, Switzerland; he united France, 'because the French Right hates Germany, the Left hates Hitler'; he lost Austria, just when it should have dropped into his lap; he knit the Soviet Union, the Little Entente, and France into an alliance against him; above all, he brought the U.S.S.R. into the League of Nations.

One thing he has steadily sought to keep in mind; the supreme importance of being on good terms with England.¹

No active policy can be successful for Germany without English friendship or neutrality. England must cover the German rear.

Hitler himself has said:

'It must be understood that in general the will of the German nation should no longer be limited to mere passive defence, but, on the contrary, should be steeled for a final, active settlement with France in a death grapple for the realisation of German aims.

'In the annihilation of France, Germany sees merely the means for our nation to obtain full development in another direction. Our foreign policy will only have been correct when there are two hundred and fifty million Germans, not crowded like coolies in a factory, but free peasants and workers.

'Almighty God, bless our weapons! Judge if we have merited freedom. Lord, bless our combat!'²

The dilemma for the rest of the world is obvious, and like all obvious dilemmas is perplexing in the extreme. What should be done is to allow Germany to become strong but not too strong. Germany should, manifestly, be allowed recovery of her self-respect.

¹ The British attitude to Hitlerism and its effects on British foreign policy are considered at the end of Chapter XVI.

² These passages are expurgated from the foreign editions of Mein Kampf. It may be argued that Hitler wrote them, in hot blood, twelve years ago. But he has steadily refused to repudiate them. And new editions of the book - inside Germany - continue to include them.

But if Germany grows too strong, and demands a new war as price for former defeat – what then? Two things are clear, Germany is the only country capable of plunging Europe into a general war, and no man can say with certainty what Hitler intends.

Germany has been ‘unjustly’ treated. Granted. The Germans have a perfectly good case, in that the allies foisted on the world the myth of exclusive war-guilt, invaded the Ruhr, and themselves refused to disarm in accordance with the terms of the treaty which at the same time they imposed on Germany. But it is interesting to note that Germany was just as militaristic in 1914 when it could not complain of ‘unjust’ treatment.

The analogies between the international situation in the summer of 1914 and the autumn of 1935 were, indeed, astounding. A homosexual camarilla surrounded Wilhelm II as it did Hitler. Wilhelm II talked of ‘shining armour’; Hitler talks of ‘race renaissance’. Wilhelm II challenged Britain with a fleet; Goering challenged Britain with an air force. Lord Haldane went to Berlin in 1912 on a mission somewhat analogous to that of Sir John Simon in 1935. For Agadir, read Dollfuss; for Sarajevo, read – what?

How difficult it is for a nation, like an individual, to keep from being itself!

Hitler himself vigorously and even passionately, denies that he wants a war. Listen:

‘There is no dispute in Europe sufficiently important to justify a war. . . . I am not quite mad – a war would not settle anything; it would only make matters worse – it would mark the end of our races, which are the elite of humanity, and in time Asia and Bolshevism would rule Europe. . . . I have a great deal of work to do at home. I have restored the German’s sense of honour; I want to restore his joy in life. I shall need years to restore Germany’s prosperity. Do you really think I want to upset my work with a new war?’

– Interview with a French journalist, Bulletin of International News, Vol. X, No. 17.

And of course he doesn’t want a war if he can achieve his aims without one. And of course he is not ready for war – yet.

Foreign Affairs Trio

The Foreign Minister himself, Baron Constantine von Neurath, is not a Nazi. When Hitler became chancellor, President Hindenburg insisted that Neurath remain in the foreign ministry, as a safeguard against the extremism of Nazi policy. Hitler learned to like him and respect his judgment and at the end of 1937 Neurath still survived. He established himself with Hitler largely by agreement on a fundamental issue – friendship with the British.

He is, of course, spiritually at one with the Leader, though his elegant nose may wrinkle with distaste at the more baroque excesses of Naziism. He was born in 1873 of a noble family in Württemberg. He studied law, then entered the diplomatic service, and went through the normal series of promotions of a professional diplomat. He was ambassador in London before being promoted by Papen to the foreign ministry. He is one of the few leading Germans with time or detachment enough for an extra-political hobby – he is an accomplished mineralogist.

Neurath has jealously guarded the holy halls of the Wilhelmstrasse from impatient and ambitious Nazi careerists. The diplomatic service, in his view, is the place for professional diplomats only, and Rosenberg, the ‘unofficial’ foreign minister, has striven in vain to squeeze men into Neurath’s carefully organised department.

.

Closer to Hitler than Neurath is young Joachim von Ribbentrop, the ambassador to London, who is the Führer’s chief adviser on disarmament questions, and who led the German delegation which, in June 1935, signed the Anglo-German naval treaty. As a result of this coup Ribbentrop gained more influence on the Leader than any man in Germany except Schacht. He represented Hitler in the Locarno negotiations, and was promoted to the London embassy soon after.

The Anglo-German naval treaty was so important for a variety of reasons: (1) It legalised German naval rearmament and permitted Germany to build a fleet one-third as great as the British fleet, which meant virtual naval parity between Germany and France. (2) It came directly after the declaration of an alleged ‘united front’ between Britain, France, and Italy at Stresa and helped to shatter it. (3) Britain, condemning Germany with one hand for creating an illegal army, with the other immediately gave permission for her to build a legal fleet – indication, the Germans said, that Britain was at long last on their side.

Joachim von Ribbentrop, a pleasant man with an attractive personality, was born in 1893 in the Rhineland, the son of a colonel. He had an excellent education, partly in England, partly in Switzerland; he speaks French and English almost flawlessly.

(This, incidentally, was something Hitler admired and it helped bring him close to Hitler; most of the men around the Leader are monolingual.) Young Ribbentrop emigrated to Canada at eighteen. He had decided to make his own way in the new world. For a time he worked, so the story goes, as a manual labourer in steel construction; for a time it seems he was a clerk in a Montreal bank.

The War came; Ribbentrop fled to avoid internment; on a Dutch boat returning to Europe he hid in the coal bunkers to escape arrest; he reached Germany and joined the army. He was an officer on the eastern front and later on the staff of the war ministry. After the War, he served in a minor capacity on the German delegation to Paris, and then, deserting public affairs, he went into the wine business. In 1920 he married Anna Henkel, the heiress of Germany's biggest champagne manufacturer.

His 'von' came, curiously enough, through adoption; some years after his marriage he was adopted by a titled aunt, Fräulein von Ribbentrop of another branch of the family, who had no heirs.

His political importance began about 1930. Though not a Nazi, he was an ardent nationalist; he met Hitler and Hitler liked him. And this wealthy and polished young man, widely travelled and with such a knowledge of the world, might be useful. He was. It was Ribbentrop, indeed, who engineered the meeting between Hitler and von Papen in the Cologne home of the banker von Schroeder in January 1933, which, as we have seen, made Hitler's chancellorship possible. Hitler, grateful, began to be attached to Ribbentrop.

In 1934 he began to use him on confidential diplomatic errands and to sound out opinion in other countries. Gradually the 'Buro-Ribbentrop' came into being, a sort of shadow foreign office behind – or in front of – the official foreign office of von Neurath. Ribbentrop became first special commissioner for disarmament questions, then ambassador-at-large. As ambassador to London since 1936 he has had a difficult job. He had to explain German behaviour in Spain to the British, and perhaps through misguided zeal he committed curious blunders – for instance giving the Nazi salute to King George VI. His too-forthright raising of the colonial issue was rebuffed. Most people would not consider his first year in London a success.

Ribbentrop has four children. For relaxation he plays the violin.

The influence of Franz von Papen, 'the breakfast chancellor',¹ who is Hitler's special envoy to Austria, is still considerable. For a time he was in sharp eclipse. No wonder. His fundamental policy, the conception that he and the nationalists could control Hitler and keep him in order, had been a terrible error. His two closest associates, Jung and von Bose, were murdered in his own office. Glad to be rid of him (and Papen himself must have felt a certain relief to get outside of Germany!) Hitler dispatched him to Austria after the Dollfuss murder in July 1934. He 'came back' by negotiating the new Austro-German Agreement of July 1936.

Edgar Jung was a Munich lawyer, and Papen's dependence on him was extreme. Papen seldom had ideas of his own. Jung wrote most of his speeches, including the celebrated Marburg speech. This not only warned the Nazis to avoid extremism; it said that 'those who threaten with the guillotine are the first to fall under the axe'; naturally the Nazis were annoyed – and two weeks later Jung was dead.

What is one to say about a man who can see his two best friends murdered for service on his behalf and then accept new office under the government that murdered them?

Papen's Marburg speech was not his only blunder in technique. Only a person of extreme lack of perception could have appointed Goering as his first assistant, as Papen did, and expect Goering – of all men! – to be a milksop.

Papen has, it is well known, a great reputation for poise, for grace, for suavity. But suavity in Papen reached a degree where it was a kind of blind incompetence, a self-assurance so monstrous that all reason, all caution, were obliterated.

He was born in 1879 in Werl in Westphalia. He was a lieutenant in a cavalry regiment. He married money, the daughter of Boch-Galhau, owner of a Saarland ceramics firm, and was transferred to a better regiment. In 1913 he went to Washington as military attaché. Promptly, as his job demanded, he engaged in espionage; but the job did not demand the terribly suave carelessness, the persistent 'charming' blundering, that distinguished him. In December 1915, before the United States entered the War, he and his colleague, Captain Boy-Ed, were expelled from the United States.

It was bad enough for Papen to be caught. But he let everyone else be caught. Captain von Rintelen, a German agent, describes vividly, in a book called The Dark Invader, his horror at Papen's carelessness. The American secret service found in the desk of one of his secretaries the key to the German code. Thus the Americans were able to read German foreign office messages, for instance the one from Zimmerman suggesting an alliance between Germany and Mexico.

¹ So called because of his 'diplomatic breakfasts', during which he did most of his business.

Papen had sailed for Germany. The ship was searched by the British authorities at Falmouth and his papers were seized – he thought a laisser-passer rendered him immune to search! The young German military attaché had most meticulously retained his cheque-books. In neat black ink, on stub after stub – one hundred and twenty-six in all – were found the names of German secret agents in America. Papen was pay-out man. The cheques linked him to dynamiters and saboteurs.

'No man has ever been caught so comprehensively, so drastically. Papen had recorded – and preserved – the most precise details of his transactions. He kept not only the cheque stubs but the cancelled cheques themselves, so that all the endorsements were available for scrutiny and investigation. In addition, dozens of his semi-official letters were found, carefully filed and assorted in his baggage. One is aghast at the effrontery of a man who could tempt fate so.

Once bitten, twice shy. For ordinary mortals this adage may hold true, but not for Junker officers of the imperturbable suavity and self-confidence of Franz von Papen. On arriving in Berlin he was assigned to service as a liaison officer to the Turkish Army. The British captured Jerusalem. Captain von Papen fled – leaving his trunks behind! Here was discovered another treasury of documents, including more papers incriminating agents in America, which Papen still had not destroyed.

One great service to Germany, from the nationalist point of view, Papen performed; in basic importance it may outrank his preparation of the way for Hitler. Early in his chancellorship the German Steel Trust (Vereinigte Stahlwerke A.G.), the agglutination of heavy industry that is one of the most powerful industrial forces in the world, suffered a severe financial crisis. Friedrich Frick, the owner of the largest block of stock, dumped them on the market. It seemed at first that French steel interests might acquire them. This was revolting to the industrial patriotism of the Germans. The Papen Government stepped in and took over Frick's shares; the German Government became – and still is – the largest shareholder in the greatest industrial concern in Germany.

Philosopher Rosenberg

From the point of view of underlying and eventual realities, the well-known Rosenberg, 'the philosopher with the sour stomach', is probably more important than either Neurath, Ribbentrop, or Papen. Rosenberg is the Nazi specialist in foreign affairs. He is one of Hitler's closest and most intimate associates; he is editor of Hitler's newspaper, the Völkische Beobachter; he heads the foreign political bureau of the Nazi party, and he is 'director of philosophical outlook'¹ for the Reich.

Rosenberg is the most disliked man in Germany. His personality is unpleasant. He is a prude and a prig. He is suspicious, close-minded, arrogant, ingrown. Like Hitler, he is a bachelor and 'a moral athlete'. The Leader got probably fifty per cent of his ideology from him, so it is important to see exactly what he stands for. Hitler promised him the foreign ministry, then went back on his word - which may account for Rosenberg's persistent surliness.

Alfred Rosenberg was born on January 12, 1893, in Reval, which was then in Russia and which is now capital of the border-state Esthonia. He is thus a Balt. He is a 'German by descent, but a Russian in mentality', as Heiden puts it. A White Russian. Not a Red Russian. Rosenberg's whole philosophy, ideology, and career are based on a psychopathically intense hatred of the Soviet Union. He studied architecture (as Hitler wanted to) and for a time was an instructor in draftsmanship; he went to school first in Riga, then in Moscow. The revolution intervened and a period of mystery followed: some say Rosenberg was drafted into the Russian army; others have it that he got across the frontier, enlisted with German troops, and took part in the campaigns in East Prussia.

He arrived in Munich in 1919 where so many riff-raff of the wars assembled. He was at that time more Russian than German; he seemed to be just another White Russian refugee. He met Dietrich Eckhart, the first 'poet' of the Nazi movement, and then Hitler. Promptly he intoxicated Hitler's imagination by his dream of a German empire in the East, and became the chief prophet of German expansionism and imperialism.

Rosenberg is the nightmare dreamer of Naziism. When he attempts to put his dreams into practice, he is a miserable, grotesque failure. His only adventure into practical politics occurred in May

¹ The full title is imposing: Beauftragter des Führers Zur Überwachung der weltan schaulichen Erziehung der nationalsoz. Bewegung.

1933, when he took it upon himself to make a good-will visit to England. One of his first acts was to lay a Swastika flag on the Cenotaph! The British, sensitive about such things, were indignant; Rosenberg scurried back to Berlin, and has not been outside Germany since.

Rosenberg's major opus is an enormous book Der Mythos des Zwanzigsten Jahrhunderts (Myth of the Twentieth Century). It is a torpid, florid, gusty, grandiloquent discourse on race, politics, and Germanism. Pages and pages of it hardly make sense.

What is known as the 'Rosenberg plan' is the project of eastward expansion which Hitler has never repudiated. Germany and Poland should, according to the plan, attack Russia: Germany should take the Baltic States as spoils, and Poland would get a share of the Ukraine – till Germany took it back again.

Goering's dislike of Rosenberg is notorious. At a party meeting in Hamburg in 1925, he said to Gregor Strasser: 'Let that damned Rosenberg tell us what he did do in Paris during the War.' In 1935 Rosenberg decided to erect a monument to the four thousand Saxons slain by Charlemagne. For each Saxon he wanted to provide a granite block of a peculiar sort, very old and pure geologically, found only in North Prussia.¹ Goering heard of the plan and promptly ordered that no stone of this kind might be quarried.

Rosenberg burned his fingers once by including in a book called The November Criminals a malignant portrait of Dr. Schacht. He accused Schacht of incorrect practices, and dared him to sue for libel. But this was in 1927, long before Schacht had listened to the voice of Hitler. Now the sketch of Schacht is omitted from the book. (See Heil, p. 199.)

Rosenberg's strength is, like that of so many Nazis, his undeviating single-mindedness, his obsessive devotion to an idée fixe. With Goering, it is the air force: with Streicher, the Jews; with Rosenberg, anti-Sovietism.

Unpopular as he is – except with Hitler – Rosenberg's influence is considerable. He is a party force of the first magnitude. It was, for instance, his private bodyguard of SA, mostly composed of White Russian guardists, which Hitler chose for the delicate honour of standing guard on the dying Hindenburg. His strength is founded on Hitler's great affection for him and the Leader's dependence on his 'ideas'.

¹ The Aryan principle applied to petrology!

Cash and Credit

'Germany is Hitler, and Hitler is Dr. Schacht.'

— BERLIN SAYING.

Superficially it seemed that by the end of 1937 the Nazi régime had produced a considerable degree of economic recovery. This was caused mostly by the spur to industry of war preparations. Unemployment had fallen to 1,870,000 — only about 600,000 more than in 1929, the best year since the War; and the volume of industrial production was back almost to the 1929–30 level. But this not very substantial boom was only achieved at frightful cost. The economic fabric of the country stretched and sagged.

In 1929 German exports amounted to approximately 13,000,000,000 Reichsmarks. By 1933 they had fallen to a value of scarcely 5,000,000,000 Reichsmarks, and in 1934 to only 4,187,000,000. Germany had a passive trade balance for the first time in years in 1934, when it amounted to 400,000,000 marks. German industry, normally, lives by its foreign trade. Its foreign trade began to disappear on account of the high gold value of the Reichsmark, the increase of import restrictions abroad, and the international boycott.

Yet Germany had to continue to pay for imports. It needed imports of raw material desperately. It needed silk, rubber, nickel, manganese, chromium, tungsten, raw textiles, tin, copper, gasoline. Using every available facility of cash and credit, Germany bought immense stores of these goods. Purchases of Swedish iron ore by the German Steel Trust — to cite a single instance — rose from 249,000 tons in August 1933, to 478,000 tons in August 1934. German imports of raw nickel — an essential war material — tripled between 1932 and 1935. And every effort was made to produce agricultural self-sufficiency, so that the Reich could feed itself despite blockade.

The search for Ersatz (substitute) materials was unceasing. Sugar from sawdust; flour from potato meal; gasoline from wood and coal; clothes from chemical fibre; tyres out of 'reclaimed' rubber; margarine from coal — these were some of the substitutes inflicted on hapless but patriotic Germans.

Wages were mercilessly deflated by means of forced payments to relief, the labour front, the air defence league, and so on. A bank clerk's salary, for instance, became 241.90 RM per month instead of 290.25 RM, purely as a result of 'voluntary' contributions.

H. R. Knickerbocker found that a skilled workman, such as an expert joiner, earning 39 RM per week, very high for Germany, had to pay out no less than 10.95 RM in taxes.

Even so, where did Dr. Schacht get all the money from? He had the quadruple job of paying for imports, financing public work projects to relieve unemployment, meeting the cost of rearmament, and maintaining the ordinary budget of the government. His gold reserve dwindled almost to nothing; in 1936 the cost was 1.6 per cent. He defaulted on his foreign debt. He seemingly sucked the last cent out of the German taxpayer. Yet he needed money, money, money. The cost of the arms programme was estimated abroad at £600,000,000 per year. How meet such staggering bills?

It seemed, roughly speaking, that Schacht adopted two general courses. Internally, he juggled by financing the current business of the government with internal loans, from banks, insurance companies, and the like, which were bled almost empty. They were practically forced loans. He gave in return government I.O.U.s worth no more – and no less – than the government's promise to pay. These forced loans – together with minor items such as conversion at lower interest rates of former public loans – amounted, of course, to nothing less than the compulsory mobilisation of the wealth of the German people. What were the German people promised in return for their savings? Prosperity and peace. Yet the money went to finance a colossal war machine.

Externally Dr. Schacht performed even greater feats of financial jugglery. He seems to have been the first financier of the period to have seized on the idea that the position of a big debtor was better than that of creditor. He made immense capital out of the fact that Germany owed money. Schacht, beyond any doubt, is one of the ablest financial experts alive. He really understands money. What he did may have been unscrupulous, but it was brilliant. He made Germany 'the most successful fraudulent bankrupt in the history of the world'.

This happened because he contrived to pay for imports by getting his creditors to foot the bill. German firms owe money, of course, to England, France, Scandinavia, the United States. Exporters in these countries do business with Germany. Dr. Schacht said to them in effect: 'Buy from us, and then we can pay our debts. If you don't buy, we cannot pay.' He promulgated partial moratorium after moratorium; and at the same time threatened to cease payment entirely unless he got more business. He was saying: 'Buy from me, or you will get nothing at all, since I cannot finance my debts unless you lend me more.'

There are always people willing to throw good money after bad, and the situation became that Germany was in reality expanding its armament industry by new borrowings. The potential enemies of Germany in the next war, France, the small succession states, Great Britain, and even Soviet Russia, were financing the effort that Germany may make some day to destroy them. The process reached its most extreme phase when, in December 1934, the Bank of England granted a £750,000 credit to Germany in order 'to facilitate the mobilisation of German commercial credits', i.e. so that Germany might have means (new credit) to meet old debts – and build aeroplanes that can cross the English Channel in seven minutes.

Also Dr. Schacht performed complex miracles in the field of barter. He needed raw materials from the Balkans, for instance, and finally the last gold in the sock to pay for them was gone. This deterred Dr. Schacht not at all. He visited the Balkan capitals, and made arrangements whereby he paid for tobacco, cotton, minerals, by goods. The Balkan exporters (exporters in many other countries too, for instance South America) had large credits in frozen marks in Berlin; Dr. Schacht proposed to liquidate these marks by payment in German manufactured goods, particularly munitions. So Greece, for instance, traded a tobacco crop for a crop of guns. Naturally this increased German political as well as economic influence in the Balkan regions. Eventually Schacht added a final fillip to this remarkable process; he 'bought' raw materials actually at a loss, had them shipped not to Germany but to a re-export point in, say, the Netherlands, and then sold them – for gold or foreign exchange. With this foreign exchange he was able to import material from countries which would not subscribe to the barter deals.

Schacht – The Money Bags

It took Hitler a long time to find Schacht. He tried and discarded several economic experts. There was no financial Rosenberg, no economic Goering, on hand from the beginning. Hitler's first choice as economic adviser was a certain retired captain, by name Wagner; for the past three years he has been in concentration camp. Following Wagner, a minor industrialist Wilhelm Keppler had decisive influence. When Keppler fell, a new and ambitious economist, Albert Pietsch, president of the Munich Chamber of Commerce, advanced; he had insinuated himself into the post of 'economic adviser' to Hess, Hitler's deputy. But meantime Schacht was ready.

He was born in January 1877 at Tingleff in Schleswig. His father was a great admirer of the American democratic tradition; thus the name he gave his son, Hjalmar Horace Greeley Schacht. The Hjalmar came from the mother, who was a Dane. Schacht is very proud of his Viking ancestry. His children have Danish names.

He studied at several universities in Germany, obtained a doctorate, and went to work as an archivist clerk in the Dresdener bank – one of the lowest posts. Clever and ambitious, he rose very quickly. One of his jobs was to prepare the routine trade bulletins; he did them so well – combining vigorous unorthodoxy with sly good sense – that presently the directors of the bank used them as a guide to policy. So, by 1908 he was deputy director. In 1916 he went to a rival bank, the Darmstaedter and National, as director.

In 1923, when the mark collapsed, he was appointed Reichs currency commissioner and he saved Germany from utterly chaotic conditions by inventing the Rentenmark, which stabilised the currency. As reward for this coup, he was appointed president of the Reichsbank; he had already refused the finance ministry, which he thought not big enough. He was Reichsbank president till 1930, when he resigned in protest at the Hague agreements which implemented the Young Plan. In March 1933, Hitler appointed him to the presidency of the Reichsbank again.

He is a man of utterly boundless ambition. Until he hitched his star to the Hitler waggon, he wanted to be president of Germany. He is a complete opportunist. He was one of the founders of the democratic party, in 1919, and the socialists supported him as the man who saved the mark. The campaign slogan went, 'Wer hat die Rentenmark erdacht? der Demokrat, Herr Dr. Schacht!' But early in 1930 Schacht saw on which side Germany's bread was buttered, and he turned to Hitler. He had met Hitler through Goering.

Dorothy Thompson interviewed Schacht early in 1931. He told her he was going Nazi. She asked him why. He replied, 'Because I believe in everything that encourages German Nationalism.' Miss Thompson said, 'But if Hitler comes to power, the Nazis can't run the country financially, economically. Who will run it?' Schacht replied, 'I will.'

His salary as president of the Reichsbank is 300,000 marks per year, one of the largest incomes in Germany. He saves nine-tenths of it. He could be minister of economics if he wished, but the salary is only 38,000 marks per year, so he prefers the Reichsbank job.

Like many Hitlerites, Schacht has no discernible private life. He owns an estate in the country, but he lives in the bank itself. He wears extraordinary collars, high and jaw-breaking. He likes good conversation. He is cool, shrewd, witty. His power is based first on tremendous ability, second his absolutely ruthless and calculating politico-economic opportunism. As a boy Schacht had ambitions to be a poet, and one of his songs, incorporated in a musical comedy, survives:

'I am a musician, very well known, and loved in the whole country.
When I arrive in a little town everybody cheers, the grown-up and the children.
For I play upon my fiddle first a dance and then a song.
And when people are happy together
I am welcome everywhere.'

Not only is Schacht Hitler's keeper of the purse, but he has contrived to make himself indispensable as a link between Hitler and the whole of German economic life. Schacht dominates, for instance, the newly-created Reich economic chamber. Theoretically, this organisation embraces the labour front, with its fifteen million members, whose dues amount to 100,000,000 RM per year.

Naturally Schacht has no fondness for Goebbels and the 'Left' extremists. He knows full well that anti-Jewish nonsense hurts German export trade. At Königsberg, in August 1935, he denounced the lunatic rabble, and Goebbels suppressed his speech. Schacht told friends that his course would lead him to a monument or the scaffold, he did not know which. Such conflicts, quarrels like these within the party, are bound to continue; they rise from the very nature of the Nazi movement. In 1936 Goering became a sort of 'front' for Schacht as economics minister.

The industrialists influence Schacht, as they influence Hitler, but he is by no means under their thumb. He is under no one's thumb. It may be said that Hitler 'protected' capitalism, saved capitalism for his industrialist friends. But this is not quite the truth. Hitler is no friend of orthodox finance capital. If private profits interfere with the security of the state, out private profits will go, as Dorothy Thompson has pointed out. The industrialists disapprove of much of Schacht's jugglery, and they have found that although Naziism serves to perpetuate capitalism, it also demands heavy sacrifices of the capitalists.

So far Hitler and Schacht have outlined only the scantiest adumbration of a Fascist, corporate state. Naziism, as it cannot be too often pointed out, is 'a faith not a doctrine', a nationalist revival, a 'broad mass movement of protest and despair'. It is not an economic experiment – at least not yet. It is the same old capitalist dog, decked out in bright nationalist ribbons, and it exploits the whole nation for the sake of the Hitler state.

Hitler has no interest in economics (which is one of the sources of Schacht's strength) but economics may be his ruin. The permanent realities of the economic situation in Germany wait upon no Hitlers, no Schachts, no Thyssens. If Schacht fails, Hitler will find another Schacht.¹ But the fundamental difficulties remain. Germany must feed sixty-five million people; it must borrow or export enough to pay for imports; it lives by the manufacture of raw materials, and no financial hocus-pocus can alter the inexorable law that goods, somehow, must be paid for.

The day of reckoning will come for Hitler – in gold as well as guns.

¹ In September 1937 rumours were rife, in fact, that Schacht's usefulness was considered at an end and that he would be replaced.

CHAPTER VIII

LÉON BLUM

M. LÉON BLUM, the socialist exquisite of the Ile St. Louis, has become a key figure in the world struggle between Fascism and democracy. This elegant and fastidious man of letters, surrounded by beautiful books and a few delicately chosen objets-d'art, is the main counterweight in contemporary Europe to the blackshirts, the mass propaganda, the crushing totalitarianism of Hitler and Mussolini. The man of thought is in opposition to the man of action. Against the bruiser's fist is M. Blum's silver poniard of wit and intellect. Against the loud speaker echoing the dictated will of a nation in bulk is the thin but penetrating voice of M. Blum, the cultivated individualist. He has emerged from his Ivory Tower to confront Hitler and Mussolini, men of the market-place.

Léon Blum is, of course, the leader of a party. He is more than that, he is the leader of the Popular Front, the Front Populaire, a genuine enough mass movement which comprises several parties. It was historically inevitable that the parties of the Left, sometime, somewhere should be brought to unity. Co-operation by the Left, fusion if possible, is the only possible answer to unity on the Right. The Popular Front idea first appeared in Austria after the Dollfuss dictatorship. It developed in the Saar and in Spain. Fittingly enough, it reached preliminary maturity in that country which is the proper school of democratic and rational thought—France. And quite fittingly its leader is Léon Blum, in every aspect of his character and intelligence the antithesis of the Hitler-Mussolini dictator 'type'.

Blum, leader of a mass movement, is not a man of the masses. Therein lie both weakness and strength.

Nor was he, for many years, predominantly a man of politics. 'Thank God!' exclaimed one of France's ambassadors, called to meet Blum for the first time. 'The new prime minister is not a politician!'

When Anthony Eden saw Blum just before he became Président du Conseil, their conversation—about politics and the international situation – languished. Then a change came. For an hour the veteran socialist and the young British diplomat bubbled with reciprocal enthusiasm. They were discussing Proust.

After he had been in power a week, one of his chief political opponents, as if to condone Blum's momentary supremacy, sighed, 'After all, Léon is an aristocrat and a gentleman.'

When Blum came to London in July 1936, for vitally important discussions with the Locarno powers, he finished his work, then disappeared – into the British Museum. With his friend Princess Elizabeth Bibesco he was renewing his acquaintance with the timeless beauty of the Elgin marbles.

I know no better way to indicate Blum's relation to the party he leads than to quote this excerpt from the letter of a friend in Paris who attended the meeting which celebrated his appointment as premier.

'The crowd is enormous inside the hall. Almost everybody is in shirt-sleeves. The air is thick, noisy. A very rough and ready audience, bursting at any moment into the Internationale or the Car-magnole. Suddenly the roaring swells unbelievably. Surrounded by shouting, shoving, sweating path-clearers, a couple appears. A small, neatly-dressed woman, a tall, slender, impeccably dressed grey-haired man, both with pince-nez, both seeming strangely out of place in the roaring medley. They are Blum and Mme Blum – who is always at his side.

'Bracke, the aged veteran of French socialism, is on the platform. Blum embraces him on either cheek, rather like a pupil saluting a beloved master. Blum is in vivid but quiet activity as Bracke prepares to speak. Greetings to friends, a ready smile of recognition here and there, a swift conversation with a whispering official: all animation, all grace, all aliveness. No indication that he has anything on his mind. No indication that he is to deliver a big speech on policy on an historic occasion. His manners are not of the stump, but of the drawing-room.

'Bracke speaks. Blum is in eclipse. He slumps in his chair, an old man, exhausted. He seems deliberately to take the spotlight off himself. He covers his face with a fragile hand. On his left Mme Blum is resolute, animated, gay, and infinitely protective. Another speaker, Mme Germaine Picard-Moch, begins to talk. She makes an illusion, caviare to the general, which the mob does not understand. Blum, catches it, slides down on his spine in an ecstasy of appreciation, brings his long delicate hands together in fluttering applause. The allusion was too subtle for the crowd to appreciate. No applause. But under Blum's guidance – involuntary to be sure – it caught on, first on the platform, then in the hall. The cheer, late in starting, then thundered.

'When Mme Moch finishes her speech – a plea for votes for women – there is no seat vacant on the platform. Blum is the first to notice this, springs up, offers her his – and as he does so kisses her hand. Certainly a curious leader for the robust, rowdy, hardboiled, dynamic Front Populaire. . . . He is the aristocrat, who by sheer honesty of conscience, sheer intellectual illumination, is accepted by the crowd. . . .'

Blum is no demagogue. He is the last possible remove from the man on horseback. He is utterly devoid of personal ambition. He is no opportunist, no adventurer. He is no longer young. Yet history has called him to fulfil at least one function, and possibly two. He is the first leader of a United Left government in an important bourgeois country since the War. And, in an age of violence and unreason, with Fascism spreading like eczema beyond Germany and Italy, he represents something like a breath of the past – and perhaps of the future! – the spirit of scholarship, intellectual detachment, humanism.

Boulevardier Into Socialist

Léon Blum was born on April 9, 1872, in Paris. Very few French politicians, it happens, are Paris-born; Blum and his inveterate antagonist André Tardieu are exceptions. Blum's family came originally from Alsace. His father was a manufacturer of silk ribbon, with a well-known business which still exists on the Rue du Quatre Septembre. The business, once prosperous, has suffered since styles in millinery changed. Léon was one of five brothers; when the father died the business was given to them jointly. Léon, however, and his younger brother René, who is art director of the Monte Carlo ballet, leave the other three in charge. The family, as everyone knows, is Jewish, and all the Blums have a strong family sense. Léon is not an orthodox communicant, but friends call him a 'good' Jew. All the five brothers meet piously on each anniversary of their father's death.

Léon's maternal grandmother was a remarkable woman, a Frondeuse, blind for many years, who nevertheless owned a bookstore on the île de la Cité, had profound radical convictions, voiced them on fit occasions, and held political salons twice a week. Young Blum was devoted to her. Jules Renard, the dramatist, tells in his invaluable Journal how Blum attended her. 'Graceful as Antigone, Léon serves her, tells her what to eat, prepares her food. Blind for thirty-six years, she looks in the direction of his voice. . . .’ In 1901 Blum took her on a holiday through Italy, giving her sight with his lucid explanatory conversation.

Blum’s mother emphasised the Jewish family tradition of unity, loyalty, and affection. The father was a merchant; she was an intellectual. She believed, almost too firmly, in justice, social and otherwise. At least the story is told that when she gave apples to her five sons, during their childhood, each got a different half of a different apple, so that full impartiality might be attained. Blum adores her memory, and speaks touchingly of her. He is, however, extremely stubborn about the privacy of his non-public life. Questions about his family or home life are, with charm, rebuffed.

From the earliest days Blum’s charm, as well as his intelligence and erudition, was noted widely. For instance two items from the Renard Journal:

‘Nov. 1, 1895. Léon Blum, a smooth-checked young man with the voice of a girl who for two hours by the clock can recite Pascal, La Bruyère, St. Evremont. . . .’

‘1898 (the time of the Fashoda crisis): Léon Blum explained precisely and eloquently the absurdity of an Anglo-French war. Charming, this beardless young man, who might be a trifler, but who instead comments luminously on the most difficult subjects. . . .’

Blum had a first-rate education in classics and the humanities. He went first to the Lycée Charlemagne, then the Lycée Henri IV (where he studied philosophy under Henri Bergson), and finally the École Normale Supérieure, the most eminent and intellectually formidable of French schools, where only brilliant scholars are admitted after severe examinations. Edouard Herriot was his classmate there. Later he took degrees both in philosophy and law. He was, at this time – an odd contradiction – an experienced duellist. But challenges were few after he wounded one antagonist. A recent cinema history of Blum, tracing his career in photographs, shows him duelling – lithe, graceful, with wrists of celerity and steel.

His career progressed in concurrent phases. For many years he was both a lawyer and a literary man; he was interested in politics early, but did not emerge as a practical politician until the War, when he had reached full maturity. As a lawyer he became an ‘auditeur’ in the Conseil d’État, the highest organ of the French civil service. It is a sort of supreme Court of France which, though it cannot declare any law passed by the parliament illegal, may adjudicate on injustices in the application of a law. Blum reached the high post of 'Maître de Requêtes', viz., solicitor-general, in charge of the state's cases. This was the top rank he could achieve in the civil service.

But meantime he was inveterately occupied with literature and journalism. Articles, essays, books, came in subtle and distinguished prose from his pen. He was a sort of literary man-about-town; Paul Valéry, Mallarmé, André Gide, Tristan Bernard, Jules Renard, Jules Lemaitre, Brioux, the Guitrys, Proust, Alfred Capus, Anatole France, Bernstein, were his friends. Passionately fond of the theatre, he was dramatic critic first of the Revue Blanche, an avant-garde literary journal, then of the Matin, finally of Comoedia, the 'official' theatrical newspaper. He wrote half a dozen books, one on marriage – in which he expressed his belief in sexual equality – one on Stenhal, one on Eckermann.

Across the life of this young lawyer-aesthete-philosopher was now flung the massive shadow of Karl Marx. Mallarmé left the boulevards for symbolism; Anatole France retreated into irony; Blum became a socialist. Socialism had, indeed, been in his blood. Two persons and one terrible fact combined to transform him into what he has been ever since, a socialist by intellectual conviction as well as inheritance. The persons were Lucien Herr, the socialist librarian of the École Normale, and the great Jean Jaurès, the terrible fact was the Dreyfus case. Convinced by Herr's 'incredible and truly unique force' (the words are Blum's) he became a Dreyfusard; through Herr he met Jaurès, the dynamic founder of modern French socialism. Blum was still a dandy, précieux to his slim finger-tips; Jaurès was historically uncouth, famous for spitting into his handkerchief. The two were staunch companions through all the inferno of the Dreyfus affair. Blum discovered in himself a passion not only for the theatre, but for social justice. He forgot his essays like 'En Lisant, réflexions critiques'; he read Sorel, Proudhon, and Marx. Jaurès took him into the streets, showed him people. Delicately – at first – he fingered proletarian Paris. The enormous ebullience of Jaurès taught him much. And in 1906 Blum and Jaurès together founded a daily socialist newspaper, L'Humanité.

So then politics. Blum wrote the leading article every day. Jaurès with the voice, Blum with the cutting pen; this was the partnership. At first, still clinging to literature, Blum preferred purely literary participation. Jaurès asked him to stand for the Chambre; he refused. But his friends say that at that time he could, out of his head, give you the votes on any issue of every deputy, as an American baseball-fan can give batting averages. Just before the outbreak of the War Jaurès was assassinated. A month later Blum did finally become a politician, to take up the Jaurès mantle; not however in the manner of a subordinate leader carrying on, but as a friend who wished to make a gesture in memory of his friend. Blum was neither conspicuously energetic nor ambitious. But Jaurès was dead; Jaurès had wanted him to go into politics; therefore he did. Almost at once he was appointed chef du cabinet (executive secretary) in the Ministry of Public works; the minister was a socialist, Marcel Sembat, in the coalition war cabinet. This was Blum's only actual experience of political administration before his premiership – twenty-two years later – in 1936.

After the War he became a deputy from the Seine, though comparatively few socialists got in; it was a 'khaki' election like the one in England at the same time. He was beaten in 1928, and re-elected – for Narbonne – in 1929. The same year he became president of the parliamentary group of the French socialist party. Meantime Humanité had become the communist organ; Blum had a new paper, Le Populaire. To this, the official socialist newspaper, he contributed a daily leading article, year in, year out. As socialist leader, he steadily and stubbornly refused participation in the various Radical cabinets of the time. He would not accept power, he said, without responsibility; he would not accept responsibility without power. So adamant and uncompromising was his attitude that in the early 30's he seemed in danger of becoming a political curiosity, the socialist leader who was frightened pallid at the idea of taking office. Then in May 1936 the socialists – for the first time – became the largest single party. Blum was offered the premiership and accepted it. After seventeen years of opposition he assumed office – and in about seventeen minutes France was waking up to something New.

Personal Life

Monsieur and Mme Léon Blum live in the Île St. Louis, facing the Seine in the oldest and loveliest part of Paris. The legend that the Blums are very rich is without foundation. They have many books, and everything in the apartment is 'a very good choice,' as the French would say; but their elegance is by no means sumptuous. Blum was supposed to own a famous silver collection, and was, in fact, invited to lend some of it to an exhibition; he could not do so because he had only enough knives and forks for his own modest table. The Blums were interested in another apartment on the Quai before they took their present home; it had once been occupied by Paul Painlevé, a former premier. The landlord said 'I'd be happy to rent it to you, but I don't like the swarm of journalists and politicians who came to see Painlevé, and I suppose you too will be Président du Conseil some day.' Blum replied that it was altogether improbable that he would ever become Président du Conseil, but he refused to sign a clause in the lease saying so; and the negotiations were broken off.

Mme Blum is his second wife. The first wife, a sister of the composer Paul Dukas, died some years ago, after long illness. By her he had one son, now employed in the Hispano-Suiza factory. The second marriage is childless. Mme Blum was a Mademoiselle Thérèse Pereira, an important member of the socialist party and a member of a firm of decorators. The marriage has been extremely happy, and Mme Blum accompanies her husband everywhere. At every political meeting, she is with him. In the days immediately preceding his premiership she was practically his chef du cabinet. His secretary, nowadays, is — appropriately enough — named Blumel.

Blum works at the Hôtel Matignon, on the Rue de Varenne, the history of which is curious. It is one of the most distinguished of the hôtels particuliers of the eighteenth-century Paris, a stately house behind a high solid gate and gravelled court, with wide gardens and flowering trees. It was the Austro-Hungarian Embassy before the War. When Flandin was the French prime minister in 1933, he discovered that unless the Président du Conseil also held a ministerial job, he had no office, no place to work. So a bill was prepared making the Hôtel Matignon the permanent headquarters of the prime minister like No. 10 Downing Street. There are living quarters available, and Flandin lived in it; Blum however prefers to live at home.

Blum's day is fairly busy, but he keeps his evenings to himself, clear of official business so that he may read and study. He gets up at eight, reads the newspapers himself, receives his closest associates after breakfast, and arrives at the Matignon at about ten-thirty. He always goes home to lunch. He returns to the Matignon, does his job, and finishes the day at about eight-thirty p.m. He never dines out. He is sixty-five, not in really robust health, and he has to be sparing of his energy. Very occasionally he goes to theatre; his most recent visit was to Le 14 Juillet, a patriotic pageant. He sleeps well. His bedside reading is Balzac and St. Simon.

His method of work is a combination of apparent slipshodness and actual precision. He is an inveterate note-taker. He writes everything down, not only ideas as they come to him, but notes on other people's conversation. An idea may arrive in a taxi, at a meal, during a debate, in an aeroplane, during a conference. Out of the pocket comes a notebook; the pencil cabalistically flies. If the notebook is not available, Blum uses any odd bit of paper that may be handy, even a newspaper. But everything must go down—in writing—and at once. These notes, which are voluminous, are carefully checked, filed, and preserved. Many are written at night just before he goes to bed. Out of them come his speeches, essays, arguments.

His speeches, extraordinarily lucid, and in a French of grave purity, give an impression of casualness, of extemporaneity. But behind them is much careful preparation—and the notes.

Although he represents an agricultural and mainly wine-growing constituency (Narbonne) Blum is almost—not quite—a teetotaller. He is a convenable, i.e. quite normal eater, not a famous gourmet like his foreign minister, Yvon Delbos. He smokes French cigarettes 'grises Gitanes', denicotinised—which are mild and cost Fr. 3.50 for twenty; he needs a packet or two per day. He plays good bridge, but plays it seldom. He wears a big black Latin Quarter hat. He loves conversation. He does not speak English or German fluently. His friends are legion. He was the only socialist whom Poincaré ever liked or admired. He hates no one. The story is, however, that he does not get along with one important collaborator—the ambitious Daladier.

Qualities of Blum

Charm, fastidiousness, cultivation, are not Blum's only qualities. There is, for instance, his supernal patience. I have noted his long refusal to take office—until he could take it on his own terms. Another example is the revolt of the 'Neo-socialists' in 1933. Three of his ablest associates, Marquet, Déat, and Renaudel tired of what they called his pontifical manner, his 'theorising', demanded a more active policy and the abandonment of socialist internationalism. They stormed at Blum and finally quit him. Blum said little; he was content to wait. To-day the 'Neos' are forlorn and forgotten.

RI IIM

Marquet is still mayor of Bordeaux, but Déat is out of the chamber, and Renaudel is dead.

Blum's mind is salty, and he has, without being witty, great sense of phrase. Once Poincaré remarked to a group of friends, 'I smell war.' Blum said simply, 'Let him disinfect himself.'

His intellectual honesty is complete. (Nor has there been any breath or hint of scandal in his public life; he is one of the comparatively few French politicians who have never been mentioned in any 'affaire'.) 'The free man,' he once told Jules Renard, 'is he who does not fear to go to the end of his thought.'

His manners are good, and he gets along with people, though at a certain distance; he was on thee-and-thou terms even with Laval. But no one could accuse him of being a person of the corridors. His political discernment is, however, shrewd. As long ago as 1933, quietly, almost surreptitiously he was feeling his way toward the Popular Front.

Until the summer of 1936, people invariably accused him of being doctrinaire. But the spate of Blum's bills in the Chambre soon disconvinced them.

He is not a good mob speaker, being far too rational and precise. It is doubtful if he ever can become a popular hero. He is too detached, too cerebral, and too rigid. He has yet to prove himself as supple as Briand, or as flintlike as Clemenceau. He is not, most people think, a fighter. He has no shoulders: only antennae. He has had only very limited experience in actual administration. And most observers fear that he seriously lacks physical stamina, which prime ministers notably need.¹

At a time when most democratic politicians were objects of derisive laughter, when the general public in France was sick to death of the venality, the inefficiency, the opportunism, the vulgar heroics of most of the Paris politicians, Blum emerged with one supreme quality, namely that he commanded respect, that no one who knew him well could fail to note and admire the disinterested honesty of his career and mind.

Just before becoming prime minister Blum and Monsignor Maglione, the Papal Nuncio, crossed in the anteroom of M. Sarraut. Mgr. Maglione expressed the desire to make Blum's acquaintance. 'Soon I am leaving France,' he said (he was en route to Rome to become a cardinal) 'and I cannot go without having shaken hands with Léon Blum.' They talked for a minute or two. As Maglione took leave, Blum remarked, 'I don't suppose I may dare to ask your benediction.' The Nuncio reflected, then replied, 'I shall pray God to give you His.'

¹ Incidentally, he was badly beaten up by a royalist mob in the spring of 1936.

Popular Front

On July 17, 1934, after much psychological preparation and a year of arduous negotiation, the national council of the French socialist party approved by a vote of 3,471 votes to 366 the proposal of the communist party for a programme of common action against war and Fascism. The draft agreement had been hammered out by a joint committee of ten socialists and ten communists. Thus the Popular Front, Front Populaire, came into being. It was made possible by two factors: (1) fear of Hitler, (2) the new policy of the Comintern (communist international) in Moscow, which decided to play down the idea of world revolution, and permit the French communist party to go to the polls on a patriotic, non-revolutionary basis.

Maurice Thorez, the young miner who is leader of the communist party in France, has stated that he and his followers (The Times, July 8, 1936) do not regard the Front Populaire as an instrument of socialisation, much less of communism. He added his hope for the eventual arrival of a communist system in France, but said that it must take an essentially French form – not something dictated from abroad. Thorez's motive is quite clear. No sensible communist wants to weaken France with civil war, when a strong and united France is Russia's best ally against Hitler.

Blum, on his side, accepted the communist initiative. The two parties, which had fought each other fiercely, each claiming the exclusive right of representing the proletariat, prepared a common programme. It seemed immoderately ambitious and utopian. Reform of the Banque de France. Nationalisation of the arms industry. Dissolution of the Fascist Leagues. Defence (oddly enough) of the franc. The forty-hour week. Collective bargaining. And so on. What was more, they agreed that in election run-offs, all their voters would support the leading Left candidate, irrespective of party allegiance.

France stumbled through 1934 and 1935 distraught and weary. Hitler seemed to be getting his way abroad. Flandin, Laval and Sarraut were baffled by economic perplexities at home. Laval's 'misery decrees' cut drastically at the living standard of every French home; the Stavisky scandal and the February riots exposed deep civil wounds; the fear of a Fascist putsch by Colonel de la Rocque's Croix de Feu steeply grew. In March 1936, came Hitler's Rhineland coup. France, nervous, wanted a change. And the elections of April 26 and May 3, resulting in an overwhelming Left victory, put the Front Populaire in power. Blum, as leader of the largest party in the coalition, became the first socialist prime minister in the Third Republic.

The Left all told got 381 seats to 237 for the Right. Blum formed a government of Radicals (who correspond to the English liberals) and socialists, with communist support. The communists who had risen from ten seats to seventy-two, did not enter the cabinet. They were in much the same position as Blum's own socialists in previous administrations, a Left group supporting the government – so long as it behaved. But there was a difference in that the communists were definitely committed to Blum's own programme – their joint programme – whereas Blum, a socialist, was never committed to the programmes of Radicals like Herriot and Daladier. Yet Blum must keep the communists in hand. 'I can do what I want to do,' he said recently in private conversation, 'if I have time. I will have time unless my friends on the Left push too hard. I can handle the Radicals. And I am not afraid of the enemies on the Right.'

When Blum, on June 1, moved into the Matignon, he was confronted at once with a first-rate crisis. The Left rose. In strikes. The strikes, most competent observers agree, were spontaneous in origin; they were neither fomented nor organised by either socialists or communists. Workmen in one industry after another downed tools, in what was a sort of spiritual epidemic, until production all over France was paralysed, with more than a million men in occupation of the factories. Hotels, department-stores, dockyards, munitions plants, restaurants, mines, beauty parlours, shut down, in some cases for a day or so, in some cases for several weeks. The Left, celebrating its victory, seemed to be showing Blum what latent power he represented.

The strikes were a marvellous tribute to the good sense and restraint of the average Frenchman. In an industrial stoppage as comprehensive and drastic as anything seen in Europe since the War, not a tool was injured, not a machine damaged, not a person hurt, not a single drop of blood spilt. One of the most experienced of American correspondents in France, Edgar Ansel Mowrer, cabled his newspaper that during the tensest days he would not have hesitated to lead a girls' school through the slums of Paris. In the great department-stores, men and women slept on the floors - instead of the beds. They were underpaid and often hungry - and never stole a cheese or opened a box of beans.

The strikes were a considerable asset to Blum, because they demonstrated both the power and the discipline of the workers. They were a cogent sign to the Senate if it should hesitate to pass his flood of bills. Blum resolutely refused to use troops or government power to clear the factories. This would only, he knew, cause bloodshed.

'I know the occupation is illegal,' he said, 'but is it not better to have the strikers sitting quietly in the shops and factories - where they are doing no harm - than fighting the police, and probably the Fascist Leagues, outside? The Garde Mobile and the troops might clear the factories, but what would be left of the factories when they had finished?'

Thus the rational mind. But after the first week, with the movement still spreading, it became necessary to show that the government could and would, if necessary, take steps to force a return to normal. Blum could not afford to let the situation get out of hand. Thorez sounded the word for the members of the communist unions to resume work. Roger Salengro,¹ the minister of the interior, announced that 'future' stay-in strikes would not be tolerated. Quietly, with good discipline, everyone slipped back to their machines.

What helped to end the strike so promptly was, of course, the courage, the comprehensiveness, and the speed of Blum's reforms. He set about an immediate realisation of the Front Populaire programme - which five months before had been ignored as visionary. People saw that he really intended fulfilling his political promises, and with a vengeance. On the Right, mouths gaped with resentment - and astonishment. The Left pretended that it was not astonished. Probably it was.

The first set of bills, after the 'Matignon agreement' with the employers, established a forty-hour week, with the right of labour to collective bargaining and the minimum wage, and with paid vacations. These measures, it was calculated, would add twelve per cent to the cost of production of French industry. Expensive. Blum was willing - perhaps he was forced - to take the risk.

¹ Who committed suicide in November 1936 following a slanderous campaign against him in the Rightist Press.

A variety of minor bills then occupied the government. (This, incidentally, includes three women as under secretaries, the first women to be given cabinet rank in French history.) The school-leaving age was raised. The cabinet was reorganised into seven 'spheres', to promote economy and efficiency in administration. The Laval wage and salary cuts were in part restored. A new régime for pensions was outlined. A comprehensive plan for agriculture was announced. And, perhaps recklessly, a bill was proposed to check the notorious venality of the Paris Press.

All this, however, merely touched the fringe. M. Blum had his eye on bigger business. And three astonishing measures were passed in record time. First, by an unprecedented majority (444 to 77), the chamber voted for the reform of the Banque de France, viz., curtailment of its feudal privileges. The new bill abolished the old Regency council of the Bank and put the Bank in its proper place as the servant not the master of the country. Second, by an even greater majority, 484 to 85, the government passed a law for the nationalisation of the munitions industry. The initial cost was to be 1,000,000,000 francs. Nothing quite like this bill has been seen in Europe before. Third, striking boldly at his chief enemies, Blum put through an act for the dissolution of those bad boys of the streets, the Fascist Leagues. Their tails between their legs – at least for the time being – the members of the Croix de Feu crawled home.

Then in October, Blum took a step of profound importance; he devalued the precious franc. For seven years France had been hamstrung by the gold standard, with industry all but ruined and the cost of living appallingly high, but no French Prime Minister had dared the plunge off gold. Blum took a deep breath and dived into the pleasant water of modified inflation. The franc eased off nearly thirty per cent. Great Britain and the United States joined to support the new figure, a good augury for future co-operation among the great democracies. French public opinion stood the shock comparatively well.

Blum thinks that if the Front Populaire programme fails, catastrophe will come to France in the shape of Fascism. He said recently, 'Some people think that ours will be a Kerensky government, that it will be working to prepare the way for a Lenin, who will be the one to benefit. That is not so. In France if some Kerensky were to fail, it would not be a Lenin who would be the beneficiary.'

Camille Chautemps

In July 1937, following a complicated crisis and a worsening of the financial situation—the franc was slipping—Blum resigned. He had held office thirteen months. His successor was the Radical leader, Camille Chautemps, but Blum remained vice-premier in the new government which continued to represent the Front Populaire. Most of the ministers were unchanged. It would not quite be fair to say that the Chautemps ministry is simply a Blum ministry with Blum second in command instead of first; it would be correct to state that Chautemps rules by Blum's sufferance. At any moment withdrawal of support by Blum would force him out.

Chautemps is much less a statesman than Blum; he is a professional politician, with all the vices of that ilk: a careerist, whose family has been a sort of radical dynasty since 1871. The royalists call him 'Le Ténébreux,' the shadowy; he is an acknowledged Freemason. Chautemps was seriously involved in repercussions of the Stavisky scandal; he was minister of the interior in Stavisky's big days, and his brother-in-law, Pressard, was head of the Paris parquet (prosecutor's office) which let Stavisky off. The campaign against Chautemps in the Rightist Press in those days was one of the most virulent of modern times. A commission of inquiry subsequently cleared Chautemps of any connection with Stavisky. He was prime minister for a brief interval in 1930, and again in 1934 between the two Daladier ministries. One thing he did may unfortunately live after him; he was the first prime minister of France to resign without being voted out by the chamber. Pressure of the February rioters forced him out. Chautemps, a native of Paris, was born in 1885; he was educated as a lawyer.

The initial successes of the Front Populaire should be greeted with some caution. Similarly did Franklin Roosevelt spend his first years in office in a gush of popularity and energy. Powerful dangers face the socialist-radical coalition. It may advance too rapidly for the radicals, or too slowly for the communists. The Right is a patient and unforgiving enemy. But one thing was undeniable in 1936 and 1937. A new wind, a new freshness, was blowing through France. The people knew that they had a new kind of government, something different from the usual reshuffle, a government which did things boldly and according to rational plan. Blum stood for Reason, and Reason was on his side.

CHAPTER IX

FRENCH POLICY – AND WHY

‘The friends of gold will have to be extremely wise and moderate if they are to avoid a revolution.’

– J. M. KEYNES.

‘The only way to treat a Prussian is to step on his toes until he apologises.’

– BAVARIAN PROVERB.

ANY French prime minister, until the provisional victory of the Front Populaire, was a creature of the financial oligarchy. I have alluded to the Banque de France in the preceding chapter. France for generations has been run by a group of about 200 financial families – the celebrated Deux Cents – whose central pediment was the Banque de France. How this oligarchy traditionally worked should be described. France, as the French said, was no longer a kingdom, but the Third Republic was the pawn of the eighteen ‘regents’ of the Banque.

The Banque de France was founded by Napoleon I; although it issues the public money of France and holds its gold supply, it is a private bank, not a state bank. By terms of its basic charter, which Blum attempted to alter, only the two hundred shareholders with the most stock are permitted to vote for the regents, who up to now have controlled the Banque absolutely.

In 1933 there were approximately forty thousand shareholders in the Banque de France. 17,889 shareholders held one share each, 9,021 held two shares, 8,021 held four shares. All told, 24,931 small shareholders held 68,015 shares. The remaining 115,485 shares were held by only 6,069 persons. Of these, the top two hundred alone had voting power. They chose the regents.

These two hundred men, the cream of financial France, are an amazing plutocracy. They are as snobbish as a vintage sardine or a Rue de la Paix hat. Mere wealth cannot buy its way into this velvety inner circle. The two most flagrantly conspicuous of modern French millionaires, Coty the perfume man, Citroën the automobile manufacturer, were not members of what is customarily called merely the ‘oligarchy’. The chosen insiders combine the hereditary distinction of family as well as the contemporary command of wealth. They rise straight from pre-Revolutionary times; they were the upper bourgeoisie during Napoleon; they worked together, consolidated their power under Louis Philippe and Napoleon III. The last person really 'taken in' by the oligarchy is supposed to have been Eugène Schneider, the steel and arms merchant, about thirty years ago.

Of the eighteen regents of the Banque de France, three – the governor and the two vice-governors – were appointed by the state. They had no more voting power than the other regents, but in actuality a governor of the Banque de France who disagreed with the private regents had little recourse but to resign. By terms of the Code Napoleon, the governor must possess one hundred shares of Banque stock, each vice-governor fifty shares – and the current price of shares is 10,000 francs. Not many civil servants of the French state had 500,000 or 1,000,000 francs to spend. So, in practice, the custom arose whereby the other regents lent each new governor the price of the necessary shares. When a governor retires, he is usually taken care of. A recent ex-governor, M. Sergent, went to the board of the Banque de l'Union Parisienne, a big business bank formed to handle the commercial business of the private bankers of the regency. Ex-governor Moreau went to the Banque de Paris et des Pays-Bas. Ex-governor Charles Rist, like ex-President Doumergue, joined the board of the Suez Canal Company.

Three other regents of the Banque were by ancient custom civil servants representing the French treasury. They held office primarily to oversee the treasury account. And they represented, as a rule, an extraordinary plutocracy within a plutocracy, that of the 'Inspecteurs de Finance' of the French civil service. These 'Inspecteurs' begin public life by passing one of the stiffest competitive examinations in the world. They are cultivated young men of good intellect and family. There are only about eighty of them in France, and they are at the top of the permanent civil service. After years of training they become 'inspectors'; later they may become regents of the Banque, or they may resign to take private positions in industry or banking. The eighty-odd 'inspecteurs de finance' comprise a sort of financial general staff, scattered – but closely knit – through the financial structure of the French republic.

The remaining twelve regents, representing private interests, were – until Blum – the actual rulers of the Banque de France. They were supposed to embody a cross-section of French finance, industry, commerce, agriculture. Six of the twelve were bankers, all of them, in the absolute sense of the term, 'hereditary' regents. Their seats were passed down, father to son. Of the six families represented, five came to France from Switzerland in the eighteenth century to assist Necker in preserving the finances of the Ancien Régime. The sixth seat was that of the Rothschilds; Baron Alfonse de Rothschild became a regent in 1855.

The six 'banking' regents were:

- Baron Edouard de Rothschild. (Rothschild bank.)
- Baron Hottinguer. (Banque Hottinguer.)
- Baron Jacques de Neuflyze. (Banque de Neuflyze.)
- M. Ernest Mallet. (Banque Mallet.)
- M. David Weil. (Banque Lazard Frères.)
- M. Pierre Mirabaud. (Banque Mirabaud.)

All of these banking firms are venerable private institutions, which for centuries have administered the estates of the French nobility, besides doing normal commercial business. They represent family dynasties. For instance, Pierre Mirabaud succeeded his uncle William d'Eichtal who succeeded his uncle Paul Mirabaud who succeeded his grandfather, Adolphe d'Eichtal. M. Weil succeeded to the seat of Felix Vernes, who had taken his place after father and grandfather. The Mallets have occupied a chair uninterruptedly for 109 years.

The final regents were traditionally chosen among 'manufacturiers, fabricants (merchants), ou commerçants' who were shareholders of the Banque. They were:

- M. François de Wendel, steel merchant.
- M. Tinardon, industrialist.
- M. René Duchemin, chemical manufacturer.
- M. Camille Poulenc, chemical manufacturer.
- M. Robert Darbley, paper manufacturer.

Interlocking directorates among the banking and industrial regents reached a point where these eleven men had one hundred and fifty seats in ninety-five corporations, which accounted for at least sixty per cent of the industrial output of France. They sat on the boards of thirty-one private banks, eight insurance companies, nine railway companies (four of which are foreign), eight navigation companies, seven metallurgical corporations, eight electrical companies, eight mining companies, twelve chemical companies.

Above all, the regents were part and parcel of that immense industrial complex known as the Comité des Forges.

The eighteenth regent, who has not been mentioned so far, is the Marquis de Vogüé, President of the Société des Agriculteurs de France.

For more than twenty years, agriculture, the backbone of France, has been represented at the central banking institution, and it is as spokesman of the farmers and peasants that M. de Vogüé joined the Council of Regency.

The regents of the Banque de France decisively controlled French politics, because by withholding credits from the treasury they could break any prime minister they didn't like. The Banque, which more or less represents the rentier class, stood for complete deflation. The much maligned Chamber of Deputies, representing the man in the street – and his pocket-book – opposed this. Thus the Banque could only get its way by taking the matter out of the hands of the chamber. The way to do this was to obtain 'pleins pouvoirs' (full powers) for a prime minister it liked. For instance the Banque persuaded old Gaston Doumergue, who headed France's 'National Government' formed after the Stavisky riots, to demand such powers. The chamber promptly threw the fatuous old gentleman out. The next prime minister was Pierre-Etienne Flandin, and the Banque squashed him in six months.

Flandin, six feet four, a man of the Centre, an honest fellow, refused to bow unconditionally to the Banque's will. He said, 'We are given a choice: deflation or devaluation of the franc. I refuse to let myself be tied up in this dilemma.' He proposed a third alternative, a policy of easier money, gradual 'reflation'. The Banque didn't like this and cooked up the panic which overthrew Flandin. The prime minister retaliated by dismissing Clement Moret, the governor. The bank thereupon refused to rediscount government short-term loans. Pressure on the government from the Banque became enormous. On June 15, the government had to meet a big payment of government bonds, but it was penniless; Flandin was living hand to mouth by borrowings from the post-office savings. Frenchmen, worried, fearing inflation, began to buy gold and ship their capital abroad. Blandly, the Banque let this go on. It could have stopped the drain of gold, but it wanted to beat Flandin. In a panic, Flandin appealed to the chamber for the same pleins pouvoirs which he had previously refused to request. The chamber was naturally incredulous and overthrew him. The Banque, victorious, then easily plugged the leak of gold. This was the inner history of the French financial 'crisis' of June 1935.

Laval became prime minister and obeyed the Banque implicitly in a merciless policy of deflation. He did not, however, swallow whole the programme of De Wendel, chairman of the Comité des Forges, who wanted four or five billion francs for 'economic redressment', viz. gifts to industry in the form of lightened taxation and government subsidies. Taxes went up. Everybody suffered. But it is interesting to note how De Wendel had Laval at heel when the prime minister asked the chamber for four thousand million francs as special military credits. The chamber entered two amendments, (1) to limit profits on arms manufacture to five per cent, (2) to nationalise the arms industry within a year. When Laval saw that these amendments would pass, he withdrew the bill.

The De Wendel-Laval decrees outdistanced anything in the history of the French republic for 'encroachment on the field of private enterprise'. The yield of government bonds was reduced ten per cent by fiat; the government procured the right to fix prices and profits in almost every branch of business, down to the corner bistro; house rents and mortgages were cut ten per cent by decree; private borrowers were permitted to reduce interest payments; official salaries, wages, and pensions were cut three to ten per cent; prices of coal, gas, electricity, were deflated. Even so, the cost of living in France remained about twenty-five per cent above the world level.

Why did the rentiers, the small capitalists, the peasants with savings, swallow such a programme when devaluation of the franc might much less painlessly lighten the burden? The reason is, of course, largely psychological. The terrors of deflation were comparatively unknown; those of inflation were known and doubly feared. Until the Front Populaire France was dominated by a stick-to-gold psychosis, much like that of the United States under Hoover. And it should not be forgotten that the French capital-owning classes lost four-fifths of their savings when the franc was re-established on gold by Poincaré.

Those who think that Fascism is exclusively a force operated for personal advantage by industrialists confront a paradox here. France is a democracy. But the industrialists of France have considerably more power over political life in France than have German industrialists in Germany. The point might well be made, were economics the only index of Fascism, that France is a more 'Fascist' country than Germany, where, by terms of a recent Hitlerite decree, no industry is permitted more than six per cent profit. Yet to say that France is Fascist would be preposterous.

Comité des Forges

François de Wendel is a good many things besides president of the Comité des Forges. He has, of course, his own steel business, 'Les Petits-fils de F. de Wendel et Cie'. The Wendels are an international family and three brothers run the business; one cousin, now dead, was a German citizen until the War, calling himself not de but von Wendel.¹ François de Wendel is a senator; the owner of the Journal de débats; and part owner of the semi-official French organ, Le Temps.

The Comité des Forges is the French steelmakers trade association, something like the Iron and Steel Institute of the United States. It neither sells nor produces steel, but it dominates the policy of the two hundred and fifty odd producers who are its members, by allotting quotas and setting prices. Of the companies in the Comité, probably the best known is Schneider et Cie, of Le Creusot, run by M. Eugène Schneider, who, like De Wendel, is of Franco-German extraction. The Schneider firm was founded by a Saarlander, the grandfather of the present Schneider, who settled in France in 1836. Schneider-Creusot does not produce much steel, but buys it from companies in the Comité that do, and then transforms it into armaments.

If I am killed in the next war I hope they will put on my white cross a notation that the bullet which killed me cost a fraction of a cent to make and sold for three cents or more. Someone, I should like it known, made a nice profit on my mouldering bones.

Bullets do not cost much. But if you shoot one million rounds an hour at £6 per thousand, the figures mount up. A rifle does not cost much – perhaps £5. But equip an army of one million men, and you have spent £5,000,000. A machine-gun costs about £128. The French have about forty thousand of them. A 37 mm. field-gun costs about £200, and each shell about £3. The famous French 75's come to about £1,600 each. They are expensive and intricate, with fuses built like watches. Their shells cost £5 each and in a single bombardment some millions may be fired. A big tank, complete, costs about £16,000. A bombing plane may diminish your budget £20,000. A modern cruiser costs £2,200,000, an aircraft carrier £3,800,000, and a big battleship almost £6,000,000.

¹ He was Ivan Edouard von Wendel (1871–1931), a cousin of François, not a brother as is often said.

Thus war, as we have, good reason to know, is expensive. It costs us money. We pay taxes. But war also makes money—for some—a lot of money. Thus the munitions business, one of the strangest in the world.

The world, according to the League of Nations, spent £855,360,000 on armament in 1934.¹ In one year, mind you. This sum is too astronomical for ready comprehension. Suppose I had that much money and spent it at the rate of £2 per day. I should still have some left after more than a million years. Suppose it should be transformed into a piece of tape, mile for dollar; it would go around the world 172,169 times. Suppose I had it in gold pieces of £1 each and counted them at the rate of one per second; the job would take 26 years!

The root of the munitions problem is the fact that only highly industrialised countries can profitably manufacture appreciable quantities of arms. These countries sell to those less industrialised. Ninety-eight per cent of the total arms exports of the world comes from ten countries; about sixty-five per cent comes from Great Britain, the United States, France, Sweden, and Czechoslovakia, the five greatest exporting countries. France, typified by Schneider-Creusot, supplied in 1932 no less than 27.9 per cent of the world's total output of arms.

Schneider-Creusot, like all great arms companies, is several things—an arms firm, a myth, a steel works, a microcosm of the munitions industry, a national institution, a nightmare to pacifists, an idol to patriots, a military necessity to more than one country, and a whale of a good business. The directors of Schneider and the other firms in the Comité des Forges which do munitions business are quite mild-mannered gentlemen. They do not seem ferocious; but their business is the invention, manufacture, and sale of implements of death.

The arms companies are as incestuous as white mice. They play together and breed. This is because they are in a signal sense non-competitive; good business for one means good business for the others; obviously if Schneider, say, gets a big order from Country X, other companies will have better chance of business from Country Y, which is X's unfriendly neighbour. As soon as one country buys a new military invention, other countries must buy it also. Arms firms may underbid one another for a contract in a single state; but internationally they all stand to gain. Cannon is expensive; cannon fodder cheap.

¹ This figure more than doubled itself in two years. In 1937 the world bill for arms was at least £2,000,000,000, believe it or not.

Extraordinarily interrelated and intertwined, the arms firms lace the whole world in their net. Schneider and Vickers were connected through Sir Basil Zaharoff, munitions salesman extraordinary. Schneider controls Skoda, the great Czechoslovak munitions firm, through a French holding company, the Union Européenne. An allied bank finances a big Hungarian bank, which provides loans for Schneider sales. The Schneider interests are believed to control an Austrian bank also, which is interested in the chief Austrian steel company, the Alpine Montangesellschaft. But the Alpine concern is 'owned' by the German Steel Trust! And through a Dusseldorff firm, Rheinmetall, Schneider is believed to be linked to Krupp.

It is, of course, an old story that arms firms maintain an extreme political impartiality in their business. They sell to each side in any war. They sell to friend and foe alike. Pluck a bullet out of the heart of a British boy shot on the North-west Frontier, and like as not you will find it of British make. Paul Faure, deputy in the French chamber, is in possession of photographs showing representatives of Turkey and Bulgaria buying arms at Creusot before the War which during the War were used against French troops; he has also a precious picture of Eugène Schneider on a yachting party with the Ex-Kaiser Wilhelm. French munition traffickers helped arm Abdel-Krim in his Morocco campaign against the French. The Turks used British cannon to beat the British at the Dardanelles; British battleships were sunk by British mines.

There is money in war. There is money in fear of war. Schneider and Skoda stocks skyrocketed on the Paris bourse from the time that Hitler came to power in Germany. Skoda dividends, even in 'depression' years, reached twenty-eight and a half per cent. And in times of comparative tranquillity, the arms traffickers were not above fomenting war scares. For details, one should read two remarkable pamphlets published in London by the Union of Democratic Control, the Secret International and Patriotism, Ltd.

War scares are good; real wars will be better. Let there be no mistake about it. Arms dealers want war. They are hypocrites if they deny this. War is to them what milk is to a baby. They fatten on it. They fatten on it like pigs in corn.

One should not think, however, that Schneider-Creusot and the De Wendels are more noisome specimens of the arms merchant genera than those of other lands. France has its finger in the arms traffic pie; so have many other countries, including such pacific states as Denmark and Sweden. Schneider-Creusot is on the whole, slightly more savoury a company than several of its great competitors. And, remembering some of the disclosures of the senate commission in Washington, one should recall the proverb about glass-houses.

M. Blum was the first modern statesman to tackle the arms racket. In 1937 it was announced that Schneider-Creusot would be nationalised.

Liberty, Equality, Fraternity—and Sterility

France is almost perfectly balanced between agriculture and industry; it needs to import only a very little food; it is infinitely less dependent on foreign markets than Great Britain or Germany; the backbone of the nation is the petite bourgeoisie, the small land-owner, the peasant capitalist; industry feeds healthily on the iron beds of Lorraine; the country is rich, even if the government is hard-up—these are the permanent economic realities of France.

There is another reality not quite so comforting. No Chautemps, no Laval, no Tardieu, no Herriot, no De Wendel, has power to change it. The paramount problem of France is not internal economics or finance. It is not even the safety of the Rhine frontier, security against the great enemy, Germany. It is a demographic problem—the falling birth-rate.

In 1934 in France there were 677,365 births, 638,525 deaths; the surplus of births was thus only about forty thousand. In the first quarter of 1935 there were ten thousand fewer births than in the corresponding period of 1934. The birth-rate in 1934 was 16.1 per thousand, and for years it has steadily gone down; the death-rate was 15.1 per thousand. In Germany, by contrast, the birth-rate was 18.0, the death-rate only 10.9. The corresponding figures for Italy are 23.2, and 13.1; for the U.S.S.R., 44.1 and 26.1. Germany, on the average—even though the German birth-rate, despite a temporary fillip following Hitler, is also going down—has about 1,100,000 births annually. And France has only 700,000—in a fruitful year.

No wonder France, with a population of forty-two million looks across the Rhine at Germany, with its sixty-five million, in trepidation and alarm. No wonder Marshal Foch, in one of his lighter moments, suggested that the only permanent solution of the Franco-German problem would be the castration of some twenty million Germans.

The Watchword – Security

‘FOR RENT – Five room apartment, two minutes from Bois de Boulogne, central heating, bombproof shelter.’

– ADVERTISEMENT IN PARIS DAILY.

There are arms merchants in France, but in general the French are the most pacific people in the world. The great mass of French rentiers and small shopkeepers want no more war. It is interesting, as Frances Gunther pointed out, to note the catchwords that come to mind in connection with different nationalities. Deutschland Über Alles, for instance. Germany on top of everything. ‘Rule Britannia’, for instance. The equivalent for France is ‘Vive la France’, let France live. The Frenchman doesn’t want to die: he wants to stay alive, keep his small shop, cultivate his plot of land.

The French have what Lytton Strachey, alluding to Gibbon, called the classic virtues: precision, balance, lucidity. They hate extravagance and sloppiness. They love order. Both the national habit of saving and the political desire for security are functions of the same instinct; the Frenchman puts his gold in a sock and his treaty at a frontier to satisfy the same craving – for economy, for order. By order I do not mean the compulsion to goose-step, but the inner harmony of activity in personal and political life that rises from lucid, well-balanced intelligence.

France, Seignobos has noted, never asks for anything at an international conference. This may be an exaggeration. France got a good deal out of the War. All France wants is to be permitted to keep what she has. I have written ‘a good deal’; but in reality did France get so very much? In proportion to their sacrifices and to the total German losses, the share of the French was not unduly great. Alsace-Lorraine; the Saar for fifteen years; the Syrian mandate and the Cameroons; reparations. Well, Alsace-Lorraine was French anyway, at least since Louis XIV; the Saar was duly given back to Germany; the Syrian mandate has been an expensive nuisance; and where, oh where, are reparations now?

For France, the ‘peace’ of 1919 has not proved enough. Fifteen years later France again saw the terrible weight of German militarism leaning against the fragile west frontier. The French have been invaded by Germany thrice in a little more than a century. They don’t want to be invaded again.

The war-guilt topic is complex. Of course France contributed to the origins of the Great War. To say that Germany alone was guilty is a monstrous exaggeration. Nevertheless, the German army was the aggressor. Monsieur Briand and Herr Stresemann—it seems a long time ago—once had a brief conversation on the subject:

‘Well,’ the old Frenchman sighed, ‘I don’t, of course, know what history will say, but I am afraid you will have to agree that in 1914 Belgium did not invade Germany!’

France, a realistic nation, having suffered the loss of almost two million war dead, having suffered unparalleled devastation and destruction of property and human values, sought after the War to create a system of defence, known as ‘security’. It comprised the following items:

The most powerful army in western Europe.

The most formidable air force.

The greatest number of tanks and artillery.

The line of fortifications on the eastern frontier.

An immense munitions industry.

The largest gold reserve in the world.

The League covenant and the Kellogg Pact.

The demilitarisation of Germany.

The Locarno treaties.

The military and diplomatic alliances with the Little Entente (Czechoslovakia, Jugoslavia, Rumania) and Poland.

The short-lived ‘Stresa Front’ with Italy and Britain.

These were among the spoils of victory, but they are—spoiling. All these items the French have—or had. But the French fear that they are not enough. And with reason.

The French army, say the French, is no longer the most powerful in Europe; the Russian is bigger, and the German better. French conscripts will melt like butter before the German professional battalions. The air force is out of date, and General Goering probably has as many planes as France. The fortifications are underground—and the Germans can simply fly over them. ‘France,’ it has been said, ‘was perfectly prepared in 1914 for the war of 1871, and in 1937 France is perfectly prepared—for the war of 1914.’ The League system has been dealt terrible blows by the Japanese in Manchuria, the Italians in Abyssinia. The alliances with the Little Entente are valid, but the Poles are a doubtful quantity. Germany, by leaving the League of Nations, ended the 'disarmament' phase of international politics, and the 'collective security' phase which replaced it is neither collective nor secure. The Russian treaty is valuable, but Russia is a long way away, and as we have seen, the U.S.S.R. is not contiguous to Germany. Finally, the 'Stresa Front' collapsed when Great Britain signed the Anglo-German naval treaty and when Mussolini began the Abyssinian war.

During the long Briand period, the French, albeit grudgingly, were conciliatory to Germany in the main. It was obvious to Briand that Germany, a complex of sixty-five million people in the heart of Europe, couldn't be kept down permanently, that a healthy Germany was the sine qua non of general European stability. But what happened? Every concession redoubled German chauvinism. The French evacuated the Rhine; the answer they got was the end of reparations. They granted Germany equal military status; the answer they got was Hitler. They gave Germany back the Saar; the answer they got was German conscription, plus Goering's tremendous air fleet.

Unilateral denunciation of treaties has become a bit of a bore, the French think. Suppose Spain should suddenly decide to demand the Philippines back from the United States! The French have submitted to a permanent inferiority in one branch of armament, that is, they accepted the 1.75 naval ratio vis-à-vis America and Britain. Why could not the Germans accept similar proportional inferiority? Should the Germans get back all they lost simply by asking for it? If they dislike the Treaty of Versailles, why did they sign it in the first place? What in short, was the use of winning the War anyway? Which is, of course, and the honest Frenchman will admit it, the exact point: winning the War brought little gain; no one won the War; winners were losers.

French policy in 1937 was based, as always, on the necessities of defence. Since the Doumergue government, the general staff of the army has been actually in the cabinet, first in the person of Marshal Pétain, currently through General Denain, the air minister. The Flandin government doubled the length of military service for conscripts. This was to counterbalance the meagre cadres of the 'lean years' during the War, when fewer men were born to reach military age.

Diplomatically, France follows the Barthou tactics, to keep its allies in order through regional pacts within the League of Nations. The French allies are, as everyone knows, the 'status quo' countries, the 'Haves' of Europe, those which got what they wanted by the War, more or less: Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Jugoslavia, Rumania. Also allied to France is Soviet Russia. The 'Have-Nots', the powers which want revision, are Germany, Italy, Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria. The conflict between these groups produces a vicious circle. The security arrangements of the 'Haves' stimulates the revisionism of the 'Have-Nots', threats of revision by the 'Have-Nots' then force the 'Haves' to stiffer standards of security. French nationalism spurs German nationalism, and vice versa. The more eager the Germans are to revise, the keener are the French for the status quo.

The new pacts France would like, on French terms, are the following:

1. A western air pact. This would extend the old Locarno to immediate assistance by air to any signatory attacked, not merely France or Germany. The advantage to France would be a closer tie-up to England and Italy. To accompany it France wanted a security arrangement in Eastern Europe, which Hitler—who might have signed a western air pact alone—balked at, thus bringing the whole business to nothing.

2. A Danubian pact. This, if negotiated, would take the form of a Franco-Italian guarantee of the present frontiers in Central Europe, plus assistance of some kind for Austria. Germany opposed it, because if successful it would, by 'freezing' the present borders, prevent Anschluss, union of Germany and Austria.

3. An 'Eastern Locarno', similarly guaranteeing the frontiers of Poland, Germany, the U.S.S.R., and the Baltic States. The U.S.S.R. is eager for such a treaty, and has made preliminary regional pacts with the buffer countries. Germany is against it. So is Poland.

To be more concrete, a pact which the French have—and indeed to keep—is the Franco-Soviet Treaty of Mutual Assistance signed in 1935 and ratified by the French chamber, after furious deliberation, a year later. This treaty is of paramount importance both to French policy and in the whole international picture; it has become, since Locarno died, the chief bastion of French security. And with reason. Most international treaties are pacts of 'non-aggression' and conciliation; they don't mean much except on paper. But the Franco-Soviet pact is a treaty of mutual assistance, in other words—whether or not it contains secret military clauses—an alliance. France and the Soviet Union are bound by it to come to one another's defence, if either is attacked. Czechoslovakia made similar treaties with both France and the U.S.S.R., thus creating a sort of defensive league stretching right across Europe.

The Franco-Soviet treaty, it is interesting to note, was negotiated and signed, not by the Leftists of the Front Populaire, but by a highly nationalist French government of the Right. It is the child of such non-Bolsheviks as Barthou and Laval; on a trip to Moscow, in fact, Laval arranged it. Thus criticism that it is a purely 'communist' arrangement has been easily rebutted. The Germans, naturally, were furious at the Franco-Soviet pact; its signature was the pretext for the 'invasion' of the Rhineland. They countered, as we have seen, with both the Japanese alliance and the 'Rome-Berlin axis'. As in 1914, conflicting treaties served to split Europe into two camps, with the difference that in 1937 the opponents were distinguished by ideological as well as national stigmata. The French, the Czechs, the Russians, seemed to make a 'democratic' bloc in contrast to the overtly Fascist nature of their competitors.

The Spanish civil war, as everyone knows, savagely illuminated this cleavage of Europe into two mutually exclusive blocs.

For a time, immediately after Hitler came to power, there was some fear that France might wage a 'cold' war, a preventive war, the theory being that it was better to strike at Germany when she was comparatively weak than risk waiting for a war made by Germany when strong. The idea fell flat, for the simple reason that France wouldn't fight. No government in France could get a single Frenchman to cross a frontier in any aggressive war. But woe to the man who treads two feet inside French territory.

Brass Check in France

One of the things which makes France so hard for a foreigner to understand is the notorious venality of the French Press. There are no fewer than one hundred and two daily newspapers in Paris alone and of the lot probably few except two are honest in our sense of the term, the Action Française, organ of the royalists, and Humanité, the communist sheet. Most of the others, from top to bottom, have news columns for sale.

When the American Ambassador Walter Edge arrived in Paris at the beginning of his term, one of the editors of an important paper called on his secretary, hat in hand, sure that the new emissary would appreciate the very best in 'publicité'. A year or so ago in Barcelona, the leader of the Catalan movement told me that he had had to pay another important paper to print a series of articles describing sympathetically Catalan aspirations.

Paris papers may be subsidised by foreign governments, for instance Japan and Italy. During the Japanese war in Manchuria the French Press was, by and large, thoroughly pro-Japanese – and for a reason. Italy, a competent authority estimates, spent about sixty-five million French francs on French newspapers in 1935. And the Press is subsidised by the French Government too. Both the ministry of foreign affairs and the ministry of the interior have at their disposal huge fonds secrets.

Esprit de France

France, above all, as Edgar Ansel Mowrer put it, is a success. Its language, its literature, its culture, are the envy of the intelligent in every country; France is the most civilised country in the world. But since the War the French have discovered that harmony, civilisation, are not enough. During the past fifty years the world has changed more than in history, and it has isolated the perfection of French character. The world is no longer bounded by the chaste walls of a room in the Faubourg St. Germain, or an apple orchard in Normandie, or a shopkeeper's neat, frugal premises in Lyons. The Frenchman sees the values of his world changing, and he doesn't know what to do about it.

More important in France than the figure of M. Léon Blum or M. Pierre Laval is the person of M. Jean Frenchman. France is a nation of forty-two million individualists. What does the average Frenchman think of the shattered world, the world slipping to a new catastrophe? M. Jean Frenchman, since his country is a success, is a standpatter. He is almost a stick-in-the-mud. His idea of a good time is to go fishing. His approach to things is, above all, rational. He refused, for a long time, to believe that Hitler – for example – was anything but 'cuckoo'. He knows better now. But tell him that Hitler is a prophet, and he will reply, sceptically, rationally, 'Prophète? Il n'y a plus de prophètes.'

M. Jean Frenchman has lived on a volcano all his life. Twice within living memory it has exploded. It may explode again. He grumbles, potters, and hopes – not very vigorously – for the best, meantime teaching his children, from the earliest ages, to be responsible. M. Frenchman wants above all to be let alone. He wants nothing more than to do nothing. He is no good except under pressure. 'Everything in France is at least twenty per cent better than it looks; everything in Germany is twenty per cent worse,' Mowrer says. If war comes, M. Frenchman will fight, and it will be hard to beat him, even if the perfection of his civilisation has sapped much of his vitality. Rather than let the Germans have what he owns, he will burn it if he cannot defend it. Maturity isn't necessarily decadence; and Germany learned that at Verdun.

CHAPTER X

MORE ABOUT FRENCHMEN

'It is impossible to think of France except in terms of individuals.'

— ANDRÉ SIEGFRIED.

GERMANY is Hitler. But France is a whole lot of people. Six hundred and eighteen of them are members of the chamber of deputies, subdivided into bewilderingly numerous parties and groups. In the sixty-five years of the French republic there have been ninety-eight cabinets, the average life being eight months. Living in France to-day are fifteen ex-prime ministers,¹ each of whom, as long as he lives, must be addressed officially as 'M. le Président [du Conseil]'. From one point of view, France is the reductio ad absurdum of democracy.

Several factors cause this extreme political fluidity. For one thing, as Siegfried says, the Frenchman wears his heart on the left, his pocket-book on the right; therefore he is a creature of conflicting impulses. Second, the parties and groups are not clearly demarcated as in America or England. Politics is largely a matter of personality; deputies are individualists rather than members of a rigid party machine, and many—thirty-one in the present chamber—belong to no party at all.

The French electoral system is a combination of the British and American, in that the chamber is elected for a stated period (four years), but that the cabinet must resign if it is outvoted; the new cabinet carries on under the old chamber, which is the source of much of the confusion. There are so many parties that no single one can command a majority, and they combine in coalitions.

'The nomenclature of parties,' Albert Guerard wrote, 'is'—he put it mildly—'perverse. The "Liberals" are dyed-in-the-wool conservatives. The "Conservatives" are revolutionary in spirit, tone, and method; the "Social and Radical Left" belongs to the Right; the "Radical Socialists" are trimmers and time-servers; and the most reactionary statesman of recent years, Millerand, was a socialist.

¹ Paul-Boncour, Caillaux, Chautemps, Daladier, Doumergue, Flandin, Tardieu, Herriot, François-Marsal, Millerand, Steeg, Sarraut, Bouisson, Laval, Blum.

French parties are not even shadows. It would tax the subtlety of a Byzantine theologian to distinguish between the Democratic Alliance, the Republicans of the Left, and the Republican Union.'

But, mystified by the whirling rotation of French cabinets, the foreign observer is likely to exaggerate its implications. The changes, the reshuffles, do not as a rule mean much. The civil service – the permanent staff of each ministry – holds the fabric of government tight and secure. The prime minister is titular rather than actual ruler of the country; he is 'a weather-vane, registering with fair accuracy the state of public opinion at the time'; behind him the bureaucracy carries on.

As a matter of fact, there have been only five drastic changes in governments in France since the War, the same number as in Britain. From 1919 to 1924 the Bloc National ruled, dominated by Clemenceau, Poincaré, and the financial oligarchy; it gave way from 1924 to 1926 to a Left coalition under Herriot, the Cartel des Gauches; Poincaré returned with the Union Nationale to save the franc from 1926 to 1929; a series of Left coalitions, more or less antagonistic to the oligarchy and the Banque de France, ruled roughly from 1929 to 1934; then came the 'National' period of Doumergue, Flandin, and Laval; in 1936 arrived the Popular Front.

Cutting across the political welter is one considerable issue, that of religion. France is divided into two extremes religiously, the Catholics and the Freemasons. The Catholics, the largest group, are nationalist, conservative, strong in the oligarchy and strong in the army; some, like the brilliant pamphleteers of the Action Française, are royalists; the bulk of the Catholics are loyal to the republic, but on the Right.

The Freemasons, on the other hand, are largely represented in the parties of the Left. Briand was reputed to be a Freemason; Herriot is supposed to be one; Chautemps is. The Freemasons are alleged to control the radical party; they are ferociously republican and anticlerical; they oppose the financial oligarchy and the banks. France is the only country in Europe where masonry is a serious political issue; the Right, for instance, exploited the Stavisky scandal as a 'masonic' plot.

'Lavaluation'

'There are five or six men in the world on whom peace depends. Destiny has placed me among them.'

— PIERRE LAVAL.

Pierre Laval, Mayor of the tough Paris suburb Aubervilliers, senator for the department of the Seine, former prime minister and foreign minister, was born in 1883 in the village of Châtelon, in the Auvergne. He is called 'Le Bougnat'—slang for Auvergnese—figuratively 'coal and wood man'. The Auvergne is a deep fastness in south-central France, made of granite as old as the earth; the Auvergnese are the grimmest of French peasants, hard-working, shrewd, with primitive reflexes, close to the soil. All over France they are the coal and wood dealers. There is a strong negroid cast of feature in many Auvergnese; Laval has thick lips, heavy, black, oily hair.

Laval's chief characteristic is his sense of the concrete, plus wiliness. He is, as the French say, malin—a word for which there is no precise translation; it means a sort of worthy unscrupulousness, slyness without evil. The joke goes that Laval was clever enough even to be born with a name which spells the same backwards and forwards, left to right or right to left. He rose from extreme poverty to wealth; yet he is one of the few French politicians untouched by financial scandal. He is supple as a cat. Like a cat, he never attempts anything he is not perfectly sure of; he calculates every jump to the inch. He gets out of things marvellously.

The great Briand, whose protégé he was, said of him, alluding to his slipperiness, 'Alas, it is impossible to agree with everyone and M. Laval.' Yet Laval is all things to all people. His manners in the lobbies of the chamber are the quintessence of tact. He is a couloir (corridor) politician, a fixer, par excellence. He is unassuming, unpretentious; among his friends are men in every party, journalists of every nation. He is on thee-and-thou terms, people say, with more men than any personage in France.

Not only is his capacity for friendship comprehensive; he treats one and all with an unvaryingly shrewd and watchful eye. Laval is too sly to trust anyone too fully. His character, in fact, embodies to a signal degree the national French trait of suspiciousness.

His father, who is supposed to be descended from the Moorish invaders of France, was the village butcher. Pierre did odd jobs as a child, went to school, read voraciously, taught himself Greek. For two years, when he was nineteen and twenty, he was school-teacher in the village. Then he studied law, went to Paris, and entered politics. Nominally he is still a barrister at the Paris court of appeals. In his comparatively short period as an active lawyer he had few conspicuous cases; mostly he was an 'inside' man on corporate work; he was an indifferent pleader. The great world of politics seized him—and here he pled well.

His career opened in 1914 when he was first elected deputy from Aubervilliers, where he chose to settle down. He has maintained the closest connection to this proletarian Paris suburb ever since. It is strongly communist, but enough communists vote for him to keep him perpetually mayor. He was up for re-election in 1935 while the government was negotiating the Moscow pact – so the communists didn't fight him very hard. His constituency knows him universally as 'Pierrot'; he gets along with everybody, and the poor people of the district like his homely manners, his bad teeth.

He began political life as a violent socialist, and until at least 1922 he was known as a man of the extreme Left. Since then he has moved steadily Right, until now he occupies a Centre position. He belongs to no political party, and describes himself as 'independent'. It is not quite fair to say that socialism brought Laval to power and that he then kicked it over, as did other notable French politicians. Laval was never an orthodox party man. He was a lone wolf, on the make.¹

But Laval was a passionate pacifist at the beginning of his career, when pacifism took real courage. His name was in the famous 'Carnet B' of the ministry of interior; he was called a 'dangerous' anti-militarist. He refused to volunteer in the French army, and on being drafted he served as a common poilu – for a very brief time. His pacifism made him popular with the disaffected infantry in the black middle period of the War. In 1916 he cried out in the chamber, 'Except for [Czarist] Russia, we shouldn't be at war at all!' A year later, referring to the socialist peace congress in Sweden, he shouted, 'Stockholm is the pole-star of our hopes.'

He lost his deputy's seat in 1919, and remained in the political wilderness till 1924. Then his qualities as a fixer boosted him suddenly to cabinet rank. The Cartel des Gauches (Left coalition) was undergoing one of its frequent shuffles, and Laval acted as a go-between for Paul Painlevé in negotiating with Briand and Caillaux; as reward, he became minister of public works. Caillaux lived in his house, Briand liked him, and when Briand became prime minister, Laval was first appointed his general secretary – a valuable key post – and later minister of justice.

Then the Left coalition crashed and during the Poincaré régime Laval was very much out in the cold. He was far too Leftish – still – for the harsh, legalistic Poincaré. This taught him a lesson, and he cultivated the friendship of a man distinctly not on the Left – André Tardieu. And when Tardieu formed a cabinet in 1930, Laval was his minister of labour. Laval played with Briand and Tardieu both. In January 1931, he became prime minister – at Briand's urgent intercession – and included Tardieu as minister of agriculture by sacrificing Left support. His first premiership lasted thirteen months – a long time for France.

¹ For a time according to Robert Dell (cf. Nation, October 28, 1931), he joined an abortive 'communist-socialist' party, which, however, never spread beyond the working-class districts of Paris and soon died.

Laval, among other things, went to Berlin, the first French prime minister to visit Germany since the War. All things to all men, it looked as if he intended to be all things to all nations too. The Germans gave him an imposing reception.¹ In June 1931 he showed the world his stubbornness in haggling for seventeen bitter days before France accepted the Hoover moratorium. In October he went to America – the first French prime minister to do so – and talked to Hoover at Rapidan. Meanwhile, the influence of Briand was waning. The Old Man of Peace was sick and tired; the reports that Laval deliberately undercut him are not true. The two men had great regard for each other, and Briand was too ill to work; when in January 1932 he resigned, Laval became foreign minister as well as premier.

But the next month Laval himself went out of office. The frugal French grudged him his free trip to America. And he had angered the all-powerful Banque de France, because he insisted that France stick to the British pound, and when the pound went off gold (partly as a result of Laval's long haggle over the Hoover moratorium), the Banque de France lost £20,000,000 on paper. So he went. This taught him a lesson, as we shall see; the next time he became prime minister he listened to the Banque more carefully. He was 'out' two and a half years. In October 1934 he became foreign minister after Jugoslav bullets and the lack of French first-aid killed Barthou at Marseilles; in June 1935 he became prime minister again, when the financial oligarchy vanquished his friend Flandin.

Laval is a bad speaker, and he never talks in the chamber unless it is absolutely necessary. He keeps his left hand in his trousers pocket and saws the air with his right hand. His oratorical delivery, say the sophisticated critics of the lobbies, lacks 'elegance'. But elegance is the last quality this swarthy peasant's son would pretend to. And why worry about public talk in the chamber, when private whispers just outside are more effective? When a speech is necessary, his political intuition helps him. He won the chamber at once in the crisis of June 1935 when it was smarting under the insolence of Bouisson, his predecessor.¹

¹ But the story is that Brüning, then chancellor, careful to risk no hostile demonstration at the station, filled it with several thousand detectives and their wives – disguised as the cheering populace.

Laval is probably the only important man in French public life who has never written a book, and the only one whose final ambition is not to become a member of the Academie Française. He is not like Painlevé or Herriot, passionately erudite. His intellect is that of an engineer, not a scholar. He dislikes abstractions, and he has little use for art, science, or pure literature.

But Laval, a typical Frenchman of the middle class – not a Parisian – is quick, shrewd, logical, practical, and lucid. Compare his intelligence to that of a German, for instance Rosenberg. Rosenberg is, as Dorothy Thompson has said, a man of great intelligence who is also a complete fool: like so many Germans, he is both brilliant and incredibly stupid; he is capable of erecting dialectical structures of extreme brilliance upon hypotheses which a child could knock apart. Laval is at the other extreme. He thinks not only with his head but with his finger-tips.

Every German has a sense of national mission. Every Frenchman, like Laval, has a sense of individual destiny. Scratch a German, and you find a sheep; scratch a Frenchman, and you have an anarchist. 'Remove liberty from Germany,' Frances Gunther wrote, 'and you unite the country; remove liberty from France, and you have a revolution.'

A famous mot is attributed to Clemenceau. 'Briand,' he said, 'knows nothing, understands everything; Poincaré knows everything, understands nothing.' Laval is in the middle ground. He knows a lot, but not everything; he understands even more than he knows, but he admits limits to his understanding. He loves to reconcile opposites. He is a lawyer, but he cares nothing for legal forms. And he has one trait excessively rare among politicians: he is not vain.

Laval married a woman from the Auvergne, who, like the wives of most French politicians, takes no part in public life. The Lavals, in Paris, live in the little impasse Villa Saïd, next door to the house where Anatole France lived. He prefers the country to Paris, and often returns to Châtelon, his birth-town, where, the local boy who made good, he owns an imposing château. Even during cabinet crises he tries to get out of Paris for the week-end. He has two or three country estates, including a stock farm in Normandie at La Corbière. His attractive daughter José is his constant companion.

¹ For a background to contemporary French politics see Alexander Werth's admirable France in Ferment.

Laval has no vices – except perhaps that since his doctor told him he must cut down his cigarettes, he now smokes a mere eighty per day. He still wears the kind of white tie that he adopted in 1914 – because white ties don't fade and are washable.

He had, it seems, no taste for the prime minister's job in June 1935. He much preferred to stick to his chosen field of foreign affairs where, indeed, his record was much brighter. He assumed the premiership only with great reluctance, because he knew that he could not last, while as a foreign minister his tenure would be longer. It is his life's ambition to be the great and permanent foreign minister of France, to effect French security by long-range settlement with England, Italy, and Germany. And he wanted badly to be the first Frenchman invited by Hitler to Berlin.¹

He took the foreign office just after Barthou had been busy patching up some badly broken French fences in Central Europe, thus annoying the Germans. The Saar plebiscite was coming soon and Laval did his utmost to appease Hitler by a strictly reasonable, business-like conclusion to the Saar problem. His policy was sensible: he knew the Saar was in any case bound to go to Germany, and he decided to give it up with good grace. Generosity, in the circumstances, cost nothing. Also he and Anthony Eden were the men who suggested creation of an international police force to supervise the plebiscite, and this may turn out to be an extremely important European precedent.

Then Laval went to Rome, and in January 1935 concluded his famous arrangement with Mussolini, which, it was announced, settled all outstanding difficulties between France and Italy. He gave Mussolini some worthless sand in Lybia; in return he got promises of joint Franco-Italian action in Central Europe. But these celebrated conversations with Mussolini gave him a peck of trouble later, because when the Abyssinian war began, the Frenchman was torn between his promises to Mussolini – who seemed to think Laval had given him a free hand in Abyssinia – and the burning necessity to keep on good terms with Britain within the League of Nations fold.¹ Laval went on, the story had it, trying to save 'both his faces'.

¹ Which calls to mind the joke after the Alexander-Barthou murders: the French considered asking Hitler to pay a State visit to – Marseilles!

Then the sanctions quarrel – plus domestic intrigue – finished him. At least for the time being.

Big Brother of the Boche

Edouard Herriot, the Mayor of Lyons, a torpid but strenuous idealist, was for years leader of the radical-socialist party, the second largest in the French Chamber. This party, corresponding more or less to the British liberals, is neither radical nor socialist, and Herriot, a copious enough personality, signalises well its aims, tempo, and limitations. He is always a power, because the average Frenchman is a radical. The radicals belong, of course, to the Popular Front.

He was born in Lyons, in 1872, and still lives there; he has been Mayor of Lyons uninterruptedly since 1905. When local opposition is serious, he descends on the town council, weeps and wails, and gets re-elected by making it ashamed of itself for even daring to consider any other candidate. He was a poor boy, largely self-educated. He became a teacher, then a professor at the University of Lyons, finally a deputy.

He is a great artist in the emotions. Sometimes this leads him to bizarre excesses of pathos. 'Gentlemen,' he said, with tears streaming down his cheeks, 'we must not quarrel over the bedside of our sick mother (France)', when he and Poincaré furiously bickered after the débâcle of the franc in 1926. He is very fond of placing his hand on his heart and declaiming about his warm virtues. He gets a lot of ragging for it.²

The antithesis of the lean, dry, acrid Poincaré, Herriot is a tower of massive flesh, given to indulgence. A friend of mine had a 'snack' with him – just a bite – recently at Geneva; he ate soup, two truites bleues, a partridge, considerable quantities of vegetable matter, a sweet, and cheese, washed down with two full bottles of burgundy. But he attributes his good health to the fact that he is a total abstainer from alcohol, viz., any alcohol except wine and beer.

Herriot first became prime minister in 1924, and his government set out to reverse the revanche politics of Clemenceau and Poincaré.

¹ For the Hoare-Laval plan see Chapter XV below.

² cf. Not to be Repeated, p. 259. Cartoonists like to portray Herriot as a transparent body with six or seven hearts.

Europe looked up with hope and interest. Herriot – and MacDonald across the channel – seemed symbols of a new and conciliatory era. Herriot in particular, robust, expansive, scholarly, benign, generous, suggested to nationalist Europe the France it had forgotten, the France of the classic humanities of Jean Jacques Rousseau, the ideals of the great Revolution.

For a time he flourished on the reversal of arid Poincarism. He set about to reach an agreement with England – Franco-British relations were then severely strained – and to conciliate Germany by settling the reparations question. Two months after the formation of his ministry the Ruhr was evacuated and the Dawes Plan went into operation. This seems small potatoes now; but it was a literally tremendous achievement. Herriot gave Europe a new start. He initiated the policy which has dominated French foreign politics ever since – reliance on the League – when the League behaves itself.

Much later, in 1930, Herriot was still battling with disarmament plans which might entice the Germans into playing European ball. Fittingly, he was the negotiator of the Lausanne settlement, which ended reparations – and closed a gloomy post-War chapter. He was the first French prime minister to get on good terms with the U.S.S.R., and as far back as 1932 he signed a Franco-Russian non-aggression treaty. He thought that France ought to pay its debt to the U.S.A., and lost office when the frugal French, like the normally honest British, thought that this idea was nonsense.

As disillusion came to Herriot, his idealism became a little tarnished. Inevitably, like most liberals, he had made some gigantic compromises. He took office in the Doumergue national government, even though his party did not. One would expect him to denounce the gold standard and Laval's humiliating dependence on the banks. But he took office under Laval too. This, his friends say, was so that he might the better spy on Laval at Geneva, keep him in proper order.

Herriot can make a speech, and a magnificent speech, though his very delivery is orotund and portly, on any occasion, extemporaneously. He was crossing on the Île de France after his American visit in 1933, with Paderewski a fellow-passenger, on a day that happened to be the Polish national holiday. The ship's company persuaded Paderewski to play; lights were kept low so that no one could see the old man, suffering agonies from rheumatism, too closely. Paderewski, barely able to lift his hands to the keyboard, played all his runs glissando, but he played them beautifully. Herriot, as was inevitable, had spoken introducing him. His speech was quite on a par with the music. At the end, anyone in the audience not knowing him would have thought him a Pole.

He is, like many French statesmen, a man of profound erudition and very nearly first-rate literary style. The rhythm of a sentence, the lilt of a sly adjective, the passion of an unexpected verb – these are matters almost as dear to his heart as the sauce of the quenelles de brochet at his favourite restaurant in Lyons. Herriot has written several books, and they are admirable. One was a study of Mme Recamier. Another was one of the best biographies of Beethoven ever written.

The Fusiliers

Edouard Daladier, deputy for Orange, nicknamed 'The Bull', 'The Inscrutable', 'The Taciturn', was born in Southern France in 1884. He bears a strong facial resemblance to Napoleon. Herriot was his professor at the University of Lyons, and for ten years he was Herriot's protégé. Now they are rivals and enemies. Daladier and the other 'Fusiliers', viz. members of the government which dispersed the mob of February 6, 1934, by force, are the 'Young Turks' of the radical party, who led the movement for fusion with the socialists and communists in the Front Populaire. He was Blum's vice-premier.

Daladier is blunt, level-headed, a clumsy but effective orator, simple, a man of the people, slow-witted, honourable. He married a wealthy woman, but he has no gift for luxury or display; he is the furthest possible remove from an ambitious opportunist like the brilliant Tardieu.

It seemed in 1933 that Daladier would have an exceptionally fine career. The British liked him; he bade fair to get along with Germany. He appeared to be the democratic leader that France, adjusting itself to contemporary difficulties, was searching for. He was prime minister and minister of war till October 1933, when he fell on the usual sort of minor domestic issue – a squabble over salary cuts. His second prime ministry lasted for four days, from February 3 to February 7, 1934, and was calamitous. The Stavisky scandal and the Paris riots ruined him.

These events I will discuss in the next chapter. Suffice it to say now that Daladier got himself into an impossible position, so that he could disperse the raging mob in the Place de la Concorde only by firing on it. It is no excuse that the mob, as general testimony agrees, fired first. Daladier was wedged into a hole he should never have entered. The Action Française always mentions him as the 'murderer'.

CHAUTEMPS

Eugène Frot, a youthful lawyer with lively black eyes and a vivid black beard on his lean jaws from ear to ear, was minister of the interior in the ill-fated Daladier government. He was known, even then, to be among the young radicals heartily bored with the crise de parlementarisme, with the scandalous inefficiency of the routine of the French government. Frot was, people said, a 'Fascist of the Left'. He was the chief actor of February 6, who brought the crisis to a head by causing the discharge of Chiappe, the Corsican who was chief of police. The royalists always call him the 'assassin'. Once they doused him—at a public meeting—with a bucket of butcher's blood.

Another of the 'Fusiliers' was Pierre Cot, minister of air in the Daladier and Chautemps governments. Thin, meagre, unimpressive physically, a scholar, he has considerable executive ability. The first thing he did on becoming air minister was learn to pilot a machine. He kept office in a good many cabinets, because he was given the job of tidying up the Aeropostale scandal and reorganising French civil aviation on reasonably efficient lines. He seemed indispensable at the job, but the riots of February 6 swept him away.

With Daladier he joined the socialist-communist United Front. On July 14th, 1935, he appeared at the monster Front Populaire demonstration at the Place de la Bastille, sitting atop a motor-car with an enormous tricolour above him; beside him was another car flying a red flag, equally huge. The crowds, greeting him, shouted 'Vive le dictateur!' Daladier, by contrast, walked in the ranks with the leaders of the march. Hundreds saw Daladier; thousands saw Cot. Even so, most folk do not think Cot will go too far.

Caillaux

Old Joseph Caillaux is seventy-four. At the end of 1937, it was a surprise to many who recalled the scandal of 1913, when his wife killed Gaston Calmette, editor of Figaro, that he was still alive—and not only alive, but an important factor in French politics. Caillaux is one of the chiefs of the radical-socialist party, as influential in his way as either Herriot or Daladier; and he is presiding officer of the important Senate finance commission.

Caillaux is a dandy still. He is arrogant, neat, vain, precise, clear-headed. He is either violently revered or violently hated by the young. He was one of the few men in France courageous enough, during the War, to assert that both vanquished and victors would be ruined; as a result, Clemenceau had him jailed for 'complicity with Germany'. He was not tried till 1920, when, adjudged guilty by the Senate of 'imprudent conversations', he was deprived of political rights for five years and of the right to enter Paris – 'interdiction de séjour', a judgment usually reserved for white-slavers, drug addicts, and thugs. Caillaux, a millionaire, and a man of the highest culture, was amnestied by Herriot in 1924.

Don Juan de Lavabo

When the Action Française does not call Joseph Paul-Boncour, the greatest lawyer in France, 'Don Juan de Lavabo', it calls him 'Paul-Arlette-Boncour' – because, it seems, the eminent jurist once had the honour of the acquaintance of Arlette Simon, the surprisingly beautiful wife of Serge Stavisky. When she was ill in hospital – before the scandal broke – he was one of two ministers who visited her.

Paul-Boncour, an old parliamentary hand, began politics as a socialist, then founded a short-lived party of his own. He looks like a Michelangelo angel – a fallen angel, perhaps. Over the massive carved head is the great mane of carved white hair. As foreign minister, he was too tender with Germany for the French general staff and almost lost his job. He made marvellous speeches at Geneva; but he forgot to meet Colonel Beck, the Polish foreign minister, at the railway station, mortally affronting him.

Of the other radicals little need be said. Albert Sarraut, former prime minister, is a communist-hater and an old-style political careerist. He gave Chiappe the job of chief of police when he was Poincaré's minister of the interior. . . . Henri Cheron, a frequent finance minister, was the man whom Philip Snowden, at the Hague, called 'grotesque and ridiculous'. And when Snowden accepted a peerage, the French papers were quick and neat to headline the story: 'Viscount Snowden – Grotesque and Ridiculous.' . . . Albert Dalimier was the minister in the radical cabinet who unwittingly caused the Stavisky explosion by recommending the Bayonne bonds. . . . The party threw him out – too late.

Tardieu

André Tardieu, 'The Shark', born in 1876, the most representative French politician of the Right, is a Parisian; the countryside, which is the bedrock of France, has always distrusted him, and this may have something to do with the comparative failure of his career. Too ambitious, his life never quite fulfilled the promise of his exceptionally brilliant youth, though he has been prime minister three times. He was first in his class at the École Normale Supérieure; he was first in his examinations for the diplomatic service; he was chef du cabinet of a prime minister (Waldeck-Rousseau in 1899) at the astounding age of twenty-three.

For twelve years, 1902 to 1914, Tardieu was a journalist, principally for the Temps, Figaro, and Revue des Deux Mondes. It is quite possible that he was the most brilliant journalist in the history of modern France. During the same year he was professor of history at the School of Political Science and the École Supérieure de Guerre. He wrote six volumes of contemporary history. He entered politics – as a deputy – in 1914 – and spent most of the early part of the War at the Front; he was wounded, poisoned by gas, cited in army orders, decorated. Clemenceau took him up. From about 1917 on he was Clemenceau's man, first in the United States as high commissioner – where his excellent manners, chic, good English, and brilliant social sense made him very popular – then as a delegate to the peace conference and minister for the liberated regions.

After he had tried to break up Doumergue's national government by attacking the radicals, Tardieu resigned his office as minister of state and spent most of 1935 in retirement. The report is that he is not well; doctors are supposed to have given him only a limited span of life. Tardieu, on the Right, like Daladier, on the Left, is contemptuous of present parliamentary procedure. He has said that he will never accept office in a cabinet constituted on the present basis. If France should go Fascist or semi-Fascist, then Tardieu may become an important – and dangerous – man again.

The Grand Inquisitor

One of the most remarkable of French political characters, also on the Right, though he calls himself independent, is Georges Mandel, whose real name is Jeroboam Rothschild. He was Clemenceau's first assistant in 1917–1918 and since the Tiger devoted himself exclusively to the War, Mandel, those two years, practically ran France. Until 1934 he was a sort of invisible Richelieu, an éminence grise behind the scenes; he knew everything, he forgot nothing, and the chamber quaked when he rose to talk. He refused to take formal office – any premier would have been glad to have him – until Flandin persuaded him to be minister of posts and telegraphs. Literally as well as figuratively, Georges Mandel could listen-in on anything in France. As a result, he is a taciturn and formidable encyclopedia on the secret life of the Third Republic. And his power was great.

Mandel is supposed to have entrenched himself with Clemenceau when he first asked for a job on the Tiger's newspaper. 'You are an ugly rat,' said Clemenceau. 'So I can see in that mirror,' Mandel instantly replied – pointing to the glass opposite the Tiger. Clemenceau made him foreign leader-writer because he knew nothing of foreign affairs. 'Mandel,' he said once, 'your articles are not stupider than others. But they are complicated. Hereafter, you may use merely one subject, one object, one verb in each sentence. The object must be direct. If you use an indirect object, consult me first.'

Then for fifteen years Mandel pursued many indirect objects – but not in literature.

Another important personage of the Right is Paul Reynaud, born at Barcelonnette in 1879, a lawyer and long-time deputy, who was Tardieu's minister of finance and Laval's minister of colonies. Reynaud, able, a son-in-law of the great Parisian barrister Maître Robert, has a kind of double foreign policy: he is an ardent nationalist, and at the same time wants Franco-German rapprochement. More than any contemporary French figure he has stood for negotiations with the Reich. In 1935 he made a notable speech opposing Laval on the Abyssinian deal; he said it was madness for France to alienate Britain for the sake of Mussolini's doubtful friendship.

Centre

The Centre in French politics, says Siegfried, is not so much a point of natural concentration in French politics, but a watershed dividing Left from Right. The most typical man of the Centre is Pierre-Etienne Flandin. Not a true leader, not a dynamic human being, he has commendable qualities: industry, a sense of balance, great technical proficiency in matters of economics and finance. But because he was cheap money man, the Banque, as we have seen, forced him out.

Flandin is called the Skyscraper; he is six foot four, and solidly built, zoned almost like a building. He was – at forty-five – the youngest prime minister in the history of France. He was a flyer during the War. Though on the Centre, he is a devout republican; though his family is rich with affiliations to heavy industry, he is no warm friend of the oligarchy.

The Jesuit Warrior

General Maxime Weygand retired as inspector-general of the French army when, early in 1935, he reached the age of sixty-eight. But there is little doubt that, if war should come, this peppery and shrivelled little military priest, the man who wrought the 'Miracle of Warsaw', would step out of retirement, become leader of the French armies once again.

He entered St. Cyr, the French equivalent of West Point, à titre étranger (as a foreigner, since he was born in Belgium) and had a brilliant career. Joffre appointed him chief of staff to Foch after the first battle of the Marne, and he remained Foch's 'right hand' (as Foch called him) all during the War. Foch, like Weygand, was a devout Catholic. The two generals prayed together at mass every morning, before beginning the day's fighting.

After the War Foch lent Weygand to the Poles; he reorganised the Polish army, vitalised it, and won the battle before the gates of Warsaw which halted the Bolshevik invasion. The Poles, of course, never forgave him for having saved them; he didn't claim the credit, but they didn't like it when other people did. Weygand, contrary to habit, was frank; both the Poles and Russians were, he said, the worst armies in the world.

Clemenceau's opinion of Weygand is worth quoting:

'Weygand is somebody. Ugly – he is ugly, misshapen, tortured, twisted; he must have had a lot of kicks when he was little. But he's intelligent; he has something in him; a dark fire. He used to anger me at the Interallied Council. He is a man – how shall I say it? – dangerous, capable of going far in a moment of crisis, of hurling himself too far. . . . Dangerous but precious. . . . He has one enormous quality, that of knowing how to do his work without talking or being talked about. He went to Poland. I don't know what he did up there, but what he did had to be done. He came back, didn't say anything. You don't know what he did or what he's about. That's pretty good. . . . Foch wasn't stupid. But he had good-boy genius, simplicity. Weygand is something else, tender and profound. Of course, he's up to his neck in priests.'

Weygand's Catholicism – he is a fanatic Catholic – naturally made him suspect to the Left. They accused him of political ambitions, of having turned St. Cyr into a royalist-Catholic nest. Weygand was, before Poland and after, a bitter Bolshevik hater. When he was governor-general of Syria, Herriot succeeded in ousting him; even now, he is not a marshal of France, although this is probably because of the technical point that only supreme army commanders may be marshals, and he was only chief of staff. Weygand is, naturally, the old white hope of the Right, and the terrier-darling of the Fascist Leagues.

Marshal Pétain, who was minister of war under Doumergue, is a 'Left' general, i.e. a good republican. The Right tolerated him because his accomplishments were such that he could not be ignored. Pétain is eighty now, and no longer a force either in military affairs or politics.

Monsieur le Président

Until 1939, unless death or revolution intervenes, the President of France will be that amiable and harmless old gentleman Albert Lebrun. Like all French presidents, he is above all safe: no brilliance, no eccentricity, is tolerated in the Élysée. He is supposed to have a great capacity for tears; cartoonists usually depict him in a puddle. When, once, a bicyclist knocked him over, he presented the luckless miscreant with 500 francs. He is known as 'pouh-pouh', because shortly after he entered the Élysée, he posed for the talkies, with wife, children, and grandchildren in considerable number. A small grandchild started to cry; the benevolent Lebrun dandled him on his knee, forgetting the sound camera, to the tune of 'Pouh-pouh-pouh'. And the unfortunate syllables resounded throughout France.

CHAPTER XI

FASCISM AND THE FRONT POPULAIRE

'Democracy which cannot defend itself has no right to exist.'

— DR. EMIL FRANKE.

THE inner history of the Stavisky case is briefly this. He was a petty gangster who knew important people and killed himself — or was murdered — when his little fraudulent empire collapsed. The case rocked parliamentarism in France, which was not illogical. Of the six hundred and ten French deputies and three hundred and five senators, not more than ten or twelve ever knew Stavisky or had anything to do with him, and his total defalcations amounted only to about 40,000,000 francs; but the implications of the affair reached the very heart of French political life.

In France there are thousands of small-scale crooks who know people who know people who know ministers. They wait in reception-rooms and filch official letter-paper. Lawyers in France, as in America, go to the courts and say that their clients are 'sick', and the cases are postponed. The French Government itself may not be corrupt, but negligence, piston ('pull') and political demoralisation are rife in the outer corridors. Stavisky was not even a good crook. But he had 'pull'. This was not corruption; it was ordinary parliamentary 'manners'. When the story broke, Chautemps tried to cover up, which made it look much worse than it was. And the Right opposition, the Action Française, the Fascist leagues, the Comité des Forges, the oligarchy, seized on it and exploited it as a perfectly priceless opportunity to wreck the 'Freemasons', the radicals, the Leftists, the government.

Serge Alexandre (Sacha) Stavisky, was born in Kiev, Russia, in 1886. His family seems to have been of decent petite bourgeoisie Jewish stock; his aged father, overcome with shame when Sacha's first defalcation was discovered, killed himself. . . . Stavisky's career in the underworld of Paris was quite typical. He was a pimp, a gigolo, a cocaine pedlar, a petty forger, a confidence man, finally a swindler of some proportion. He was successful, bought a theatre, gambled at Deauville, financed a newspaper. . . . He graduated, as Alexander Werth put it, from the cap-and-muffler to the top-hat underworld.

In 1926 he was arrested for the first and only time, on complaint of two brokers who asserted he had swindled them out of £70,000. He was soon 'provisionally' released, and he never saw the inside of a jail again; his trial was postponed by the Paris Parquet (public prosecutor) no fewer than nineteen times. The head of the Parquet, M. Pressard, was Chautemps's brother-in-law. The Paris police, who also 'knew' Stavisky, 'dealt' with his case forty-five times – without re-arresting him.

The years of 'provisional freedom' were the great years of Sacha Stavisky. He controlled two daily papers (both miserable rags, it is true), the Volonté on the Left, the Rampart on the Right. One of his lawyers, Renoult, was an ex-minister of justice. He knew countless public officials, and corrupted dozens of minor functionaries – pitiable creatures on minuscule salaries, who were dazzled by Stavisky's glory and joined his payroll; their careers were ruined afterwards, and at least two committed suicide. He had his own bodyguard, led by the remarkable Jo-la-Terreur. His friend Dubarry – a soidisant journalist who knew everyone in France, including Tardieu¹ – introduced him to Chiappe, the chief of police. Above all, a complicated fellow, he was employed as a sort of stool-pigeon by the Sûreté Générale, the national police force – distinct from the Paris prefecture – of the ministry of the interior.

In 1933 Stavisky was frustrated in two coups, despite his eminence. So he contrived a new scheme, the flotation of fraudulent bonds issued presumably by the municipal pawnshop of Bayonne. Minister Dalimier in the Chautemps cabinet signed a letter recommending these bonds. Someone got suspicious. About Christmas 1933 the truth began to leak out. Secrecy pent up in a hundred mouths for seven years burst forth in an angry scandalous torrent. Stavisky's connection with the bonds became known, and then his police record. He fled – having received a false passport from the police. He rested in Chamonix for a fortnight, hoping the storm would pass. Instead it blew to tornado violence. On ¹ 'Dubarry got the Sûreté Générale to restore Stavisky's gambling licence; and when an inspector of the Sûreté was going to arrest an illegal bookie at the races one day, Dubarry pounced on him and said: "Don't you dare do that, or I'll report you to André." "André" – so Inspector Colombani said telling the story to the committee of inquiry – "André, c'était M. Tardieu.'" New Statesman, April 14, 1935.

January 8, 1934, he knew that he was ruined, and the official story is that he shot himself. But the allegation that he was murdered was made almost everywhere in France.

The scandal was perfectly tremendous. It hissed and boiled during all of January, and came to climax in the bloodshed of February 6. The affair had the wildest ramifications. Daladier fired Chiappe; Thomé, the chief of the secret police, was kicked upstairs to become, of all things, director of the Comédie Française; the Right shrieked that Daladier did this to get rid of the former director, Emile Fabre, because he had put on Shakespeare's Coriolanus, which the Left had denounced as an 'authoritarian' play! The Action Française whooped and howled that the Sûreté and the Freemasons had murdered Stavisky to save their necks. Right deputies screamed execration on the government, for allegedly having accepted contributions by Stavisky to the party funds. The Fascist bands began to gather on the streets.

Some weeks later occurred the Prince affair. It is a shame to have to foreshorten drastically this perfect Arsène Lupin-Gaboriau-Lecocq case. Dr. Prince, a magistrate in the Parquet, was drawing up a report on the Stavisky case. A telephone-call, the origin of which is to this day unknown, decoyed him to Dijon, on the pretext that his wife's mother was ill. The next day his body was discovered, badly mangled, on the Paris-Dijon railway track. The official story was that Prince had been guilty of negligence in the Stavisky business, and had committed suicide in remorse. To accept this theory, as Janet Flanner wrote, meant that 'the judge sent himself a bogus message, went to Dijon, anaesthetised himself in a strange automobile, and while unconscious tied himself on a lonely railway line and allowed a train to run over him.' So it seemed at first. Later researches proved fairly conclusively – incredible as it may seem – that Prince was a suicide: because of some connection with the Stavisky case. The Prince affair let loose new storms of denunciation and scandal. The Action Française insisted grimly that the Sûreté Générale murdered Prince to shut him up.

February Sixth

But let us turn back to the tragic events of February 6. The story of the riots may be briefly told. A riot in France is one of the most remarkable things in the world. The frenzied combatants maintain perfect discipline. Seventeen people were barbarously killed, and several thousand injured, but there was no fighting at all between about seven-thirty p.m. and nine, when everyone took time for dinner. When it started, no one thought of revolution; it was just a nice big riot. Communists, royalists, Fascists, socialists, fought shoulder to shoulder under both red flag and tricolour against the police and Garde Mobile. The fighting stopped on the stroke of twelve, because the Paris Métro stops running at twelve-thirty, and no one wanted to walk all the way home. Bloody, bandaged, fighters and police jostled their way into the trains together. Promptly at seven-thirty next morning the fighting started again.

All during January the Right gangs had been making demonstrations. Chautemps had been forced out of office on January 27, and Daladier succeeded him. Daladier announced that his government would be 'vite and fort'; he genuinely feared a Fascist coup. The forces of Left and Right were nearly at the contact point. Daladier thought that Chiappe was deliberately encouraging the demonstrators to make trouble and might even deliver the city to Right insurrectionaries; certainly the police, all through January, treated the demonstrators very leniently, permitting them each time almost – not quite – to reach the chamber.

Daladier, spurred by Frot, determined to get rid of Chiappe. The circumstances were remarkable. He made the fatal error of not kicking him straight out, but offering him, as a sop to his wounded pride, the governorship of Morocco. Chiappe refused. Each man told a different story of the circumstances at the parliamentary inquiry. Chiappe, dismissed, said into the telephone – it was all done over the telephone – 'All right, I will be on the street to-night.' His words, he claimed, were 'à la rue' – out on the street, jobless. Daladier says that he said 'dans la rue,' which means 'on the street, a rioter'. So the prime minister set about to defend himself from what he thought was impending revolution. (The Canard Enchaîné, the wittiest of French papers, has an alternative version: Chiappe really said 'chez Larue,' a famous restaurant in Paris. cf. Werth, p. 132.) This was on February 3.

Daladier's first appearance in the chamber as prime minister was set for February 6. 'The thought that he would certainly get a majority maddened the reactionaries.' The various street groups, Camelots du Roi, Jeunesses Patriotes, Solidarité Française, the Croix de Feu, and, more pacific but most important of all, the National Union of Ex-Service men, prepared demonstrations. Daladier was in a bad position, because Chiappe had the confidence of a large part of the Paris police, who were consequently listless.

He had to call in the tough countrymen of the Garde Mobile, a very hard-boiled body.

Daladier should never have allowed the thirty thousand demonstrators to get into the Place de la Concorde that night. He and Frot bungled the preliminary arrangements badly. They might have forbidden the demonstrations, but, not trusting the police, they didn't dare do so. It was unwise in the first place to use the Garde Mobile; the decision being taken, many more Garde Mobile should have been on hand, not just a few. No one will agree as to who fired the first shots. Once shooting began, the crowd was uncontrollable – crazy enough to storm the chamber and massacre every deputy inside. So seventeen Frenchmen, including war veterans who had fought for France, died.

The Would-be Hitler

French Fascist No. 1, the chief potential French March-on-Romer, is Lieut.-Col. Casimir de la Rocque, Président-General of the Croix de Feu, the Volontaires Nationaux, and the Fils de Croix de Feu. He was born in 1885, of a distinguished military family; his father, a count, was a general of artillery – in the Auvergne.

De la Rocque is spare, handsome, with thinning hair, a good organiser; not a demagogue; a man of considerable intelligence but little warmth or magnetism; plenty of poise and courage; no charm. His name is against him, because the French think that 'Casimir' is a comical name; it is as if an aspirant for high office in Britain or America were named Alphonse – or Casimir.

De la Rocque had an interesting military career; he left St. Cyr with high honours, and began active service in 1907 in Morocco, spending nine years in North Africa as one of the brightest lads around the late, great Marshal Lyautey. He learned to speak Arabic almost perfectly and he was several times wounded and decorated. He was on Foch's staff from 1921 to 1923, when he went to Poland with Weygand. In 1925 he returned to Morocco in the war against Abdel Krim, and became head of the celebrated 'deuxième Bureau' – military secret service. In 1928 he retired from the army to organise the Croix de Feu.

His milieu is upper middle class, Roman Catholic, illiberal. His brother, Count Pierre de la Rocque, is aide-de-camp to the Comte de Paris, who is heir to the Duc de Guise, the pretender to the French throne. But Pierre and Casimir are not on cordial terms; Casimir, who pretends that he is 'non-political' and who dissociates himself with most political groups, doesn't want overt royalist support.

He talks often of his 'mystique', which is a combination of patriotic fervour, military virtues, and churchly faith. Though he has a very considerable force behind him, he denies ambitions to be dictator; he says he wants 'order' in France, nothing more. He has never run a candidate in an election, but his followers perpetually threaten a coup d'état. He will, he says, support any 'useful' government, attack any 'dangerous' government. But he cannot be pinned down to defining exactly what he considers dangerous or useful. 'He is not Christ, he is merely John the Baptist,' one of his followers said – not explaining exactly what he meant – or who Christ was to be. His social programme is a sort of upper-class, Lady Bountiful charity-paternalism; his organisation runs soup kitchens in poor neighbourhoods, builds kindergartens and sanatoria.

De la Rocque seems a rather pallid Fascist; people, however, fear him. He founded a private army like Hitler, but on a more restricted scale; at first, membership was confined to front-line veterans who had won decorations under fire. Its aim was – vaguely – to 'restore the "mystique" of sacrifice for the fatherland, consecrate itself to duty to France.' His followers in the beginning were strongly Leftist, and part of the unofficial programme was to wipe out the regents of the Banque de France; but De la Rocque himself is allied to big industry. François de Wendel is believed to hold card of membership No. 13 in the group. And De Wendel and other industrialists, so it is said, had ambitions to be the Thyssens of the movement.

Like Hitler De la Rocque has tended to shed his socialist supporters. These wanted what they called 'socialism for the middle classes', an obvious imitation of Nazi dislike of the proletariat, combined with some rudimentary instinct for socialism. De la Rocque's leading supporter, Bertrand de Maud'huy, son of a general who commanded the Blue Devils in the War, left him because he wanted more socialism in the movement, just as Otto Strasser left Hitler.

De la Rocque not only has disappointed his Left followers; those on the Right think that he is too slow, too cautious. In April 1935, two or three of his men invaded and sacked the headquarters of the socialist federation on the Rue Feydeau in Paris, searching for arms; they found none. De la Rocque, embarrassed, hesitated and hedged, and finally excommunicated the bold burglars.

Three times he has had a chance to seize power; each time he muffed it. On February 6 his cohorts could easily have captured the chamber. But he held his men back. 'France wasn't ready,' he explained. Perhaps, like Hitler, he hopes to gain power by legal means. Like Hitler in 1932, he has reached the stage of one consultation with the head of government – after the resignation of Doumergue – but he was not asked to form a cabinet. He speaks incessantly about the wickedness of the French parliamentary system. 'We (the army) saved France once: we can save it again;' this seems to be his programme. But he hesitated far too much for a popular leader. 'Men of destiny should not stand too long outside the door.'

At its height the Croix de Feu comprised, so its leaders claimed, a membership of over half a million. All were ex-service men or sons of ex-service men. The discipline was strict, and the methods of organisation secret. De la Rocque insisted on fairly complete application of the Leader Principle, much as this would seem to affront French individualist character. The organisation commanded not only men and money, but automobiles and lorries for transport, and some sixty aeroplanes. Secret manœuvres in the environs of Paris took place at night and on one occasion only severe threats prevented an aerial demonstration. 'Croix de Feu' does not, incidentally, mean Fiery Cross in the Ku Klux Klan sense of Fiery Cross; 'Croix' signifies decoration for war service, and 'Feu' means the fire of the front-line trenches.

All of which made it the more remarkable that, when the Blum cabinet dissolved the Croix de Feu and the other Leagues, Colonel de la Rocque submitted like a lamb. He tried to organise his followers into a legal political group, the P.S.F. (Parti Social Français), but it was a failure. He was severely discredited in 1937 after the Clichy riots, and then it was disclosed that for some time he, this pure and mystical character, had been secretly subsidised by André Tardieu.

Other Flowers of Fascism

The Croix de Feu, the most 'respectable' of the lot, overshadowed the other street groups, because the French, a respectable people, like their Fascism to be as mannerly as possible. (Incidentally, none of these organisations will admit to being 'Fascist'.) The only group which is openly pro-Hitler – commonly it is said to be subsidised by the Germans – is that of the 'Francistes'; they are small fry.

The Jeunesses Patriotes, considerably backed by heavy industry, are led by a deputy Pierre Taittinger. They are nationalist, anti-communist, and on the extreme Right. The organisation claims two hundred and forty thousand men, and among the leaders are some personages of consequence, like Deputy Ybarnégary. Marshal Lyautey was an honorary member; General Weygand is said to be.

The Solidarité Française was founded by Coty, the Corsican perfume manufacturer. It is more to the Right than the Croix de Feu, not so Right as the Jeunesses Patriotes. Coty was never a member of the financial oligarchy, and thus the Solidarité affects to despise the Banque. It is supposed to number one hundred and eighty thousand men.

The Union Nationale des Combattants, with nine hundred thousand adherents, is less inclined to street violence than the others; it is the Right offshoot of the far bigger and more important organisation the Federation des Anciens Combattants, with four million members, which is the Left veterans' association. All these Rightist groups were suppressed in 1936 by the Blum government.

The royalists – were there enough space – should have a section to themselves. Their newspaper is, of course, the Action Française; their street outfit is the Camelots du Roi, organised in slugger squads, equipped with knuckle-dusters, and amplified – when recruiting goes badly – by unemployed Arab carpet-salemén of the kind unfortunately known to all habitués of the Café du Dôme. The leaders are the sculptor Real del Sarte, the organiser Maurice Pujol, and the pamphleteers Charles Maurras and Léon Daudet. The royalists – supported largely by wealthy dowagers in the 'Association of royalist ladies' – are less important than the fantastic noise they make. The Action Française makes France a marvelously amusing country, journalistically; but its influence does not go much beyond that. The royal family itself has repudiated it.

Chiappe

The most dangerous man in France is probably not Weygand or De la Rocque, but little white-gloved Jean Chiappe, the ex-chief of police.

Chiappe (pronounced Kee-ahp) is, like Napoleon and François Coty, a Corsican. He got his start, strangely, through a radical cabinet; now he is on the extreme Right. His stepson-in-law, Horace de Carbuccia, another Corsican, is owner of a newspaper, Gringoire, violently reactionary. One of Chiappe's friends is Zographos, the manager of the Greek syndicate which specialises in gambling at Deauville, Biarritz, and Monte Carlo. Chiappe was very popular with his police during his term of office.

Bald, swarthy, squat, athletic – he is a notable duellist – Chiappe is a remarkably melodramatic character. A creature of cabals and vendettas, he seems to represent the romance of the Corsican bush in Paris. He looks like a vaudeville villain; a confidence man; a jolly but undersized professor of medicine; an animal trainer; a hirsute attendant at a Turkish bath. He is socially ambitious and prominent.

Chiappe's come-back in politics since his temporary eclipse after February 6 has been startling. He was, first of all, elected to the post of municipal councillor – alderman – in the Paris district of St. Germain des Près, part of the fashionable Faubourg St. Germain. Then he became president of the conseil municipal of Paris – mayor. If some day he should get ministerial post in a Right cabinet, fur – the fur of MM. Daladier, Frot and all the socialists and communists – will fly. For the white-gloved Corsican is a notorious Red-hunter.

Chiappe had to admit to having 'met' Stavisky, the indirect but effective author of his downfall. But that he had anything to 'do' with him he violently denies.

The Neo-Socialists

These are they who rebelled against Blum too early. Adrien Marquet, the Mayor of Bordeaux and a dentist by profession, seceded from the orthodox Second Internationale socialist party in 1933 to form a sub-group of his own, the Neo-Socialists. A bold and engagingly cynical politician, with a local machine which rivalled that of Herriot in Lyons, he carried about fifty deputies with him. Marquet is comparatively young, forceful, a great ladies' man, and what the French called débrouillard. One story is that an old time socialist, visiting him in the mayoralty in Bordeaux, incessantly called him 'Comrade.' 'Stop that "comrade",' Marquet said. 'Outside the office, I'm "comrade". In here, I'm the mayor!'

Marquet broke with Blum because he was convinced that orthodox socialism no longer met the urgent needs of post-War Europe. 'Order, Authority, Nation' were his watchwords. He professed himself an admirer of some qualities of Nazi Germany and said that the world – and France – needed renovation, revivification, and 'benevolent authoritarianism'. Then he made the mistake of joining the Doumergue 'National' government. His colleagues thought this represented a shift in principles – and threw him out of his own new-born party.

His successor as leader of the Neo-Socialists was Marcel Déat, an Auvergnat like Laval, provocative and industrious.

But neither Marquet nor Déat have much importance now, nor can they mean anything politically while the Front Populaire remains in power.

Turncoat Doriot

The dissident communist Jacques Doriot is an interesting character in French politics, because he personifies what remains of Trotskyism. His new party, formed in the spring of 1936, the 'Popular' party, with its newspaper Émancipation Nationale, seemed at outset merely one of those maddening 'splinter' groups that obstruct effective co-operation by the Left; but Doriot has some significance as an anti-Stalin communist, opposing the trend of modern Soviet policy, which is to play down revolution in order to encourage defensive nationalism. Doriot, who wants his revolution right away, says that Stalin, a Russian 'imperialist', has sacrificed the needs of France to those of Russia and has betrayed the 'true' communists. Yet a revolution in France to-day would weaken the country vis-à-vis Hitler, the chief enemy in the world to communism. It doesn't seem to make sense. Nor does the apparent willingness of Doriot to be friendly with Hitler and play with Fascist ideas.

Doriot has a brilliant revolutionary career behind him. An orthodox communist for many years, he spent much time in Russia. Twice he went to jail, once for agitation in French Indo-China. For a time he shared the regular communist leadership with Thorez. He has been a deputy for many years, and until recently was mayor of the Parisian suburb St. Denis.

Farmer Fascist

Henri Dorgères, whose real name is Henri d'Halluin, who at one time promised to be a remarkable phenomenon in French politics, is a peasant leader who organised a militant agrarian movement, a modern Jacquerie, which briefly swept the countryside as the 'Front Paysan'. He is not in the chamber, though he missed succeeding to Chautemps's seat by only a few hundred votes. Dorgères, one of the best natural orators in France, is, according to his enemies, a fake; he is no true son of the soil, no peasant, but an aristocrat in disguise, the Viscomte d'Halluin. These stories are untrue. His name is Halluin, but he is no fake. His father was a cattle merchant in Lille. His policy is drastically counter-revolutionary; clean up the chamber of deputies by 'shooting the whole damned lot', 'liberate' the farmers, build a peasant-corporative state.

Janet Flanner has described him thus: 'An odd-looking butcher's boy with a small, beautiful, aristocratic face; neat, intense manual gestures; and a sensitive, sensible eloquence that recently brought eight thousand wheat- and sugar-beet-farmers through miles of mud to hear him speak in the town's Grain Hall.'

Warriors of the Left

The Socialist-Communist United Front, organised during 1934 and 1935, was a significant and in fact revolutionary step, marking the first effective creation of such a bloc in Europe. At first it seemed odd that socialists, to save democracy, should join forces with communists, inclined to eliminate democracy. But the events of February 6, interpreted by both socialists and communists as an attempt at Fascist revolution, made action necessary. The United Front now includes virtual merger of the two great French trade unions, long historical antagonists, the C.G.T. (Confédération Générale du Travail), the socialist union, and the newer C.G.T.U. (Confédération Générale du Travail Unitaire), the union of the communists. And it incorporates, as we have seen, the bulk of the moderate Radical party.

The United Front derived, in the first instance, not from the enmity of Chiappe or the Action Française, but from Joseph Stalin. His policy of toning down world revolution permitted communists outside Russia, if they had such a romantic wish, to become 'respectable'. When Laval visited him in the spring of 1935, Stalin announced that the comrades in France should call off the revolution, unite with enemies of Fascism, and support the French Government and army as long as necessary, in opposition to Fascist forces.

A subsidiary father of the United Front was a remarkable young political idealist, Gaston Bergery, who began his career as a radical, turned independent, and finally gave up a comfortable seat in the chamber in protest at the formation and conduct of Doumergue's national government. He was the only deputy to do so. He fought a gallant by-election at his constituency, Mantes, and was beaten after a tremendous fight by only a few hundred out of sixteen thousand odd votes.

¹ Also see p. 122 above.

Bergery is an acute and sophisticated young man, married to an American girl, Bettina Shaw Jones, an assistant at Schiaparelli's. She fought the election at his side, complete with dashing white toque – and pet marmoset! Mantes is an industrial, proletarian constituency, and opinion is divided whether the 'wheat trust', the instrument of Bergery's Right opponents, beat him – or his wife's monkey.

Bergery, before the United Front between the communists and socialists, founded a group of his own, called at first the Front Commun, then the Front Social, finally the Front Populaire. It embodied the identical aims as the United Front – coalescence of all Left forces in a fight to the last trench against Fascism and the military leagues. This young man, not in the least doctrinaire, an exciting combination of idealist and practical politician, had the idea; the others worked it out. Then the name 'Front Populaire' was appropriated by the United Front to describe the entire movement.

As a result, Bergery came to be called the 'Lenin of France', the 'Nero of the French Republic' and a 'Marat and Robespierre' in one. Actually, he is neither a communist nor even a socialist. His movement, he says, is merely 'anti-capitalist'. He wants a merger of all the farmers, peasants, workmen, white-collar bourgeoisie, middle-men, who form ninety-five per cent of the population of France, against the five per cent of capitalists who exploit them. A cultivated aristocrat, he is no proletarian. He believes the role of the proletariat to be much exaggerated in the mechanics of socialism. And in France, he points out, only seven million out of forty-two million people are workers in the Marxist sense of the term.

Two personages on whom a great deal in the Front Populaire depends are Léon Jouhaux and Maurice Thorez. The veteran Jouhaux, born in 1879, is the leader of the C.G.T. and the boss of French trade-unionism. His father took part in the commune; his grandfather fought in the revolution of 1848. Jouhaux went to work in a match factory at sixteen; since 1909 he has been the C.G.T.'s somewhat old-fashioned and benevolent dictator. Blum appointed him a Regent of the Banque; which is as if John L. Lewis should become a Morgan partner. Maurice Thorez, much younger and stronger meat, born in 1896, was a farm labourer as a boy, then a coal miner. Militant, persuasive, he worked himself up the secretary-generalship of the communist party in 1932.

On foreign policy the Front Populaire is solid as a rock. The Jacobins in France were, after all, Nationalists. So are to-day's warriors of the Left patriots. Thorez, the communist leader, metaphorically stands on the Maginot line [of fortifications] every time he makes a speech. Blum, perhaps is so fair-minded that he tries to see some good even in Nazis who abhor him as a socialist and a Jew; but before he is a socialist or a Jew he is, as he has said in no uncertain terms, a patriot and a Frenchman. The Front Populaire stands for national defence and a firm foreign policy as fully as does the Right. And it is naturally more inclined than, say, a Laval government, to stand up against Hitler or Mussolini.

Domestically it is too early, despite Blum's reforms, to say what the outcome of the Front Populaire will be. One thing seems clear, that its creation effectively reduced the power of French Fascism; it is evidence that French democracy has organised to protect itself, and that Fascism can come to France only at the cost of civil war.

CHAPTER XII

THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR

'There is no country in Europe which is so easy to overrun as Spain; there is no country which it is more difficult to conquer.'

— LORD MACAULAY.

ON Saturday, July 18, 1936, civil war broke out in Spain. A clique of predatory and 'nationalist'-minded military chieftains rose against the legally and democratically elected government of Spain, and turned the peninsula into a shambles. What began as a military coup d'état developed into a conflict of ideologies. The Germans and Italians helped the Spanish Fascists; the Russians — later and much less intensively — helped the democratic loyalists. In its first year the war cost almost half a million lives. Bloodshed of such savagery had scarcely been seen in modern times. Following German and Italian intervention, possibility that the struggle might become a veritable World War became acute. In September 1937, pirate submarines were openly torpedoing neutral merchantmen in the Mediterranean. For month after haggard month, Europe watched the Spanish cauldron.

The cleavages, both horizontal and vertical, represented by the Spanish conflict were enormous. Poor against rich; workers against troops; the laity against the upper hierarchy of the church; volunteers against mercenaries; the peasantry against the aristocrats; the landless against the feudal landlords; democracy against Fascism; all these confrontations played their part in Spain. And these confrontations are not peculiar to Spaniards. It is not difficult to see why the struggle in Spain found developing repercussions all over the world. Emotionally the struggle became a world struggle. And it was waged with fierce partisanship, because it was represented as cutting across two of the most precious shibboleths of the average man, his feelings about class, and his feelings about religion.

Let us first underline a few primary and incontrovertible facts that have been obscured or misrepresented by propaganda. It is grossly and wantonly untruthful to speak of a 'Red' revolt in Spain. There never was any 'Red' revolt. This is simple fact. The revolt was made by General Franco and his friends. There were no communists – not even any socialists – in the republican government which he sought to overthrow, though they supported it. The socialists and communists came in later, but when Franco moved on July 18 the Spanish government was devoid of them. It was certainly a Left government – a moderate and not very efficient Left – but there were no Marxists in it.

Another point is the chronology of foreign intervention. It is now established beyond any doubt that German and Italian intervention occurred months before Russian help reached Spain. Indeed German and Italian aeroplanes were active at the very outset, months before the International Brigade was organised by foreign volunteers to aid the loyalists. And Russia at no time sent troops to Spain, as did Italy.

The forces on both sides can be summarised in a paragraph or two. On the rebel or insurgent side (called the ‘Nationalists’ in pro-Franco newspapers) were, speaking broadly, the officer class, the feudal aristocracy, the bulk of the politically-minded Roman Catholics, the monarchists, the Carlists from Navarre, the Falangistas or Fascists, the army officers, some of the industrialists, and part of the national police force or Civil Guard. Their rank-and-file fighting force contained Germans, Italians, Moorish troops from Spanish Morocco and the Rif, and the Spanish Foreign Legion – in a word, comparatively few authentic Spaniards except the Carlists and Falangistas.

On the government side was – the government. It came to include as time went on all the forces of the Left – republicans, liberals, democrats, socialists, communists, anarchists, syndicalists. It included also the Catalans centring on Barcelona, and such Roman Catholics as the Basque autonomists. The Basque clergy was solidly pro-government. It included the bulk of the peasants, the bulk of the landless, and all but a small fraction of the workers. It included most of the Freemasons, most of the middle class, most of the intelligentsia. Its army, since ninety-five per cent of the officers struck with Franco, was at first an extremely makeshift affair; the hardest kind of fighting and help from foreign volunteers turned it into a first-class fighting force. A militia of the people became a people’s army, with an extraordinary discipline exercised not by officers but from below.

The essence of the Spanish struggle can be compressed into a single sentence. The people of Spain, the common people, groping toward progress after centuries of feudalism, fought desperately to overcome a reactionary revolt. The struggle was four-square between the Left and Right – and the Right was in the wrong. The people of Spain, after five years of a weak republic, rose to defend it – because, for good or ill, it was theirs.

Good-bye Monarchy

Under the monarchy Spain was almost as backward a country as Czarist Russia. The illiteracy rate was the highest in Europe (Portugal excepted), namely forty-five per cent. The national history had been a study in disintegration for three hundred years. The country, potentially rich, was stagnating with corruption and decay. The landless workers were little better than serfs, and some of them lived almost like animals. And the ruling classes – to quote the American magazine Life – ‘were probably the world’s worst bosses – irresponsible, arrogant, vain, ignorant, shiftless, and incompetent’.

The monarchy, represented in the twentieth century by Alfonso XIII, was supported by three pillars, the landed aristocracy, the army, and the church.

Concerning the land – the central problem of Spain – a few figures are relevant. One per cent of the population owned no less than fifty-one per cent of the land. In all Spain, not more than fifteen to twenty thousand people owned as much as 250 hectares of land. The vast majority of the people on the land – and Spain is seventy-two per cent agricultural – were landless or owned nothing more than tiny strips. Forty per cent had no land at all. By contrast, one grandee, the Duke of Alba, held a territory almost as big as Belgium; on it were fifty-five villages. The landowners seldom put money back in the land; much fertile ground was turned over to grazing; only one crop was harvested each year; in some parts of Spain irrigation was unknown and modern machinery forbidden. Many of the landowners were absentees.

Spain had the most top-heavy army in the world. There were 365 active generals (700 in all) – one for every day in the year – and 21,000 officers, a proportion of one officer to every six enlisted men. Not even the German army in 1914 had 21,000 officers. The army, which had done little to distinguish itself since about 1640, consumed at least a quarter of the national budget. The military had feudal privileges. The Civil Guard was sacrosanct, and until 1931 civilians could be tried by military courts.

The church held an overwhelmingly dominant position in Spanish life. There were 40,000 priests and clergy, a fantastic number, all paid by the state, all part of the state, almost all associated in spirit and politics with the feudal landowners and the army. The church and the Jesuit order, through ownership of mines, industries, shipping, public utilities, banks, transportation, orange groves, expressed itself in business and industry as well as politics and religion. The church dominated education, through the state of which it was a part, and Spain was forty-five per cent illiterate. The church was rich and decadent; all the abuses of clericalism piled up. The church hierarchy and the religious orders exercised powers in Spain almost unbelievable. Blasphemy for instance was a crime. The Inquisition was not formally abolished until 1931.

The monarchy fell in 1931 of its own weight. There was no revolution. Only an election. Not a drop of blood was shed or a shot fired. Alfonso paid the penalty of years of misrule by driving to Cartagena from Madrid in perfect safety. No one molested him, and no one in the aristocracy, the army, or the church lifted a forefinger on his behalf. The dynasty which had ruled Spain for five centuries disappeared into the dust of history like a plum dropping from a tree. But – the forces behind Alfonso were still there.

Republic and Reaction

The quality of the republican government formed in April 1931 gave hope to liberals the world over. It was composed of middle-class intellectuals mostly – professors, academicians, literary men. The spiritual fathers of the republic were not politicians or army generals, but physicians like Dr. Gregario Marañón, a specialist in ductless glands, in whose home the revolutionary committee met, and philosophers like Miguel de Unamuno and José Ortega y Gasset, whose Revolt of the Masses expressed the ideals behind the movement. Among members of the government were littérateurs like Manuel Azaña, who soon became prime minister, professors like Fernando de los Rios, and labour leaders like Largo Caballero, who had been a mason by trade.

You can judge a country pretty well by its ambassadors. Suppose the British Government should give its best embassies to H. G. Wells, Aldous Huxley, and Bertrand Russell. Well, look at the Spaniards. To Geneva went Salvador de Madariaga, a professor and journalist. To London went the distinguished novelist Ramón Pérez de Ayala. The Germans got a Left-wing socialist intellectual, Luis Araquistáin; Julio Alvarez del Vayo, formerly the Manchester Guardian correspondent in Madrid, went to Mexico; Rome got a poet and Chili the translator of H. G. Wells's Outline of History.

The first thing the republican government did was write a constitution. It was a remarkable document. It exuded the pure cool aroma of Jean Jacques Rousseau and Thomas Jefferson – and alas of Weimar. It disestablished religion and – tremendous item – separated church and state; it declared Spain ‘a worker’s republic of all classes’; it abolished illegitimacy, made free primary education compulsory, and – in Spain! – gave women the vote. It made divorce easy. It promised labour participation in the rewards of industry. It was the first constitution of any national state to concede authority to the League of Nations; Spain was, for instance, forbidden to declare war except under conditions authorised by the League covenant. Ironic that seems now!

What happened was that the constitution did not, of course, work. The youthful republic paid far too much attention to theory and wasted far too much energy in determining its aspirations – on paper – without attempting to put the aspirations into concrete effect. It concerned itself with fine phrases and neglected concrete policy. Its leaders, like Manuel Azaña, were such profound liberals that they believed in free speech even for those who would destroy free speech. Azaña and his men thought that they could profoundly change the organisation of society without a revolution. They were wrong.

The republican leaders knew well enough who their enemies were, and they did set about moving against them – but not drastically enough. They went just far enough to provoke a fury of reaction. They were unskilled politicians, and in the new Cortes (parliament) they were presently sabotaged and out-manceuvred. Their job should have been to destroy feudal Spain. They might have been merciless to their enemies, as they knew their enemies would be merciless to them. They might have learned the lesson of Russia, that no revolution can succeed until the privileges of the propertied classes are not curtailed, but extirpated. Instead they dabbled, they temporised, they made half-hearted and inefficient reforms.

As to the nobility – the republic sought to emasculate it by taking its pretty titles away. The Duke of Alba, from twenty-six lines of fine type in the old official gazette, was reduced to plain señor; but the Duke of Alba himself was not eliminated. A land reform scheme was worked out – in theory – but very little land actually got to the peasants. In 1932 General Sanjurjo revolted against the new republic in the best Spanish manner; the revolt was quickly put down and as punishment all the land of all the grandees of Spain was confiscated – but only on paper.

As to the church, Azaña attacked it without destroying it; he deprived it of just enough privilege to make it stronger through anger. His Religious Orders bill of June 1933, 'nationalised' church property, valued at £100,000,000, but left it in the hands of the church; he theoretically dissolved the Jesuit order but the Jesuits were not expelled; he forbade the Jesuits to teach but the ban did not become effective. Within two years, like a black, solid, powerful mushroom, the church protruded itself again into power and prominence. Even during the Republic, it had more influence in Spain than in any country in Europe, Austria perhaps excepted.

As to the army, the republic thought it could solve the perennial problem of military treason by the simple expedient of pensioning off some ten thousand officers – at full pay for life.

On the other side were great and positive achievements of the new government. First, Azaña and his men gave Spain some political sense, they pulled Spain forward to contact with the modern world, they gave it hope. Second, they embarked on a tremendous educational programme; the education minister, Fernando de los Rios, spread schools – ten thousand of them – through the land with mighty fingers. Third, they abolished many of the minor survivals of feudalism. Fourth, they solved the Catalan problem, which had been a bugaboo to Spanish politics for four hundred years, by giving the Catalans provincial autonomy. They promised the Basques autonomy too.

In the autumn of 1933 Azaña was forced out of office. Thus the first period of the Left republic lasted two and one half years. A coalition of Rightist parties – loyal to the republic if it should be theirs – assumed power. The Rightists made what was tantamount to a counter-revolution. In October 1934 the socialists revolted against this counter-revolution, and were put down by force and with ghastly bloodshed. The Rightists (still loyal to the republic in theory) crushed the miners and workers in Asturias with Moorish troops. The Moors in Spain again! Some 1,400 men were killed, all but a few of them civilians. The Rightists wiped Asturias bloody. And terror spread all over Spain. By the end of 1935, some thirty thousand socialists and republicans were in jail.

The Rightists stayed in power, through a series of shambling governments, from the autumn of 1933 to the spring of 1936. It seemed that the Rousseau-Jefferson revolution was ended. But the brief flicker of daylight from 1931 to 1933 still lit the minds of the people. Following a series of violent scandals, and forced into holding an election, the Right went to the polls in February 1936. The parties of the republic banded together in a Popular Front and won a narrow victory. The Popular Front, plus the Basques, polled 4,838,449 votes; the Right got 3,996,931. A Popular Front government was formed – not, however, including socialists or communists – and set out to revive the 1931 republic.

It did not have much time to do so. On July 18, 1936, reaction rose in the person of General Franco. The Left – elected to office in an incontestably free and legal manner – resisted. So civil war – real civil war of the kind that Europe had not seen since Russia in 1919 – came to Spain.

People

A word at this juncture on personalities. Don Manuel Azaña has been an enigma to most observers. He became prime minister again after the February election – the second chance he had at the same big job – but soon he was elevated to the less active position of the presidency of the republic. Azaña was born January 10, 1880, at Alcala de Henares, the birth-place of Cervantes. He is a student, a philosopher, and had he never been prime minister and president of Spain he would be well known wherever Spanish is read by intellectuals. He has written essays, plays, novels, and at least one of his works is a minor classic, The Garden of the Monks. He is a passionate connoisseur of things Spanish, and in his youth he translated George Borrow's Bible in Spain, a labour of love.

Azaña spent many years as a civil servant. But always he had politics in mind, and he made a special hobby of army organisation and military affairs. Once a friend asked him, 'Why do you pore over these dull army books?' 'Because,' Azaña answered, 'in twenty years I am going to be minister of war.' He was. This would seem to show passionate forward-looking interest to his career. But when Louis Fischer interviewed him in 1936 and said he hoped he would still be in office the next year, Azaña replied, 'Of course – unless I get bored with politics.'

He is unequivocal about his politico-philosophical stand. When I interviewed him in 1932 and asked him where he belonged he replied almost defiantly, 'I am an intellectual, a democrat, and a bourgeois.'

Like no fewer than six other members of the first republican government, Azaña is a Freemason. This contributed somewhat to his collapse in 1933. Masonry, as in France, has played a powerful role in Spanish politics, though one dislikes to simplify the issue too much, to talk too glibly of the dividing line between Masonry and Catholicism as a major factor in the revolution. Indeed the line is illogically awry. Lerroxx, the Freemason, and Gil Robles, the Jesuit, are – or were – ardent allies.

The two most interesting figures in the Rightist camp before the civil war were Don Alejandro Lerroxx and Don José Maria Gil Robles. Lerroxx, comparatively little known outside Spain, one of the most bizarre personages in modern Europe, had a long career as an agitator and a revolutionary, became rich and powerful, took office in the first republican government, and quickly then shifted to the Right. His whole career was a series of shifts. Marcelino Domingo, one of the founders of the radical-socialist party and an early comrade, formally charged him with betraying the other republican leaders in an uprising in 1917. Miguel de Unamuno, the great Basque philosopher, sardonically suggested that Lerroxx claimed to be a republican so that everyone else would stop being a republican.

One of his friends was Juan March, the tobacco millionaire who helped finance Franco's revolt. Years before, during the Great War, Lerroxx and March did a thriving business supplying war materials to German submarines off the Iberian coast. On a trip to Paris, Lerroxx gave an interview to Le Journal nobly stating his and Spanish aims. 'When copies of Le Journal reached Madrid,' wrote one of Lerroxx's former friends, 'people vomited in the Puerto del Sol.' And another of his early friends said of Lerroxx, 'In this man's paunch are established the seven deadly sins.' The story went in the early days of the republic that a citizen filing an application wrote after 'Antecedents', 'Neither criminal nor Lerroxxista.'

More dangerous than Lerroxx, however, younger and more vigorous – he was born in 1901 – is José Maria Gil Robles. He was the son of a university professor; he studied with the Jesuits and his scholastic record was exceptional; he went into teaching first, then journalism, then politics. He organised the C.E.D.A. (Federation of Autonomous Parties of the Right), forced the Lerroix government to take him into the cabinet, and openly proclaimed hostility to the republic he was serving. 'The republic is like a case of measles; we will live through it,' he said. A militant Catholic and reactionary, Gil Robles has an unusual trait for a Spaniard—energy. A formidable enough speaker, he lacks what the Spaniards call elevación; he has vehemence rather than emotion, anger rather than indignation. Gil Robles is clever, ambitious, sybilline. He fled to Portugal when the civil war broke out. Franco had no use for him.

The Outbreak and the Course of the War

From February 1936, when it was elected to power, until July, the Popular Front government maintained uneasy rule. But the country was throbbing with disorder. All the years of pent-up hate were rushing to explosive outlet. The people, as Life put it, had fired the bosses; the bosses refused to stay fired; violence was inevitable. There were several hundred political assassinations in six months. The Fascists deliberately provoked disorder as an excuse to invoke order later. The Left retaliated. A Leftist officer, Lieutenant Castillo of the Assault Police, was murdered by Rightist gunmen. Then Señor Calvo Sotelo, who had been finance minister under Primo de Rivera and who hoped to be leader of the United Right, was killed by comrades of Castillo. The two killings were twin flames to set all Spain alight.

The detailed course of the war can be sketched only briefly here. Following a careful plan—but speeded up because of the assassination of Calvo Sotelo—the garrisons in most of Spain rose on July 18th. The revolts were successful in some towns, like Salamanca, Seville, Toledo; but in the more important cities—Madrid, Barcelona, Valencia, Malaga, Bilbao—they either misfired or were crushed by the enraged people, who (in Madrid for instance) stormed the barracks almost literally with their bare hands. The coup d'état, as a coup d'état, was a failure. It aimed to seize power in all Spain overnight. It did not. No one anticipated the capacity of the government and the people to resist.

But General Francisco Franco, the governor of the Canary Islands, flew to Morocco and with the aid of Italian aeroplanes succeeded in breaking the blockade at Gibraltar and flying Foreign Legion and Moorish troops to the mainland, whence they were dispatched to Seville and the front.¹ Moorish troops began to flood Spain. So Spain, which had so often invaded Morocco, was being invaded by Moroccans. The use of these Moors, excellent soldiers, in later campaigns – for instance against the Roman Catholics of the Basque country – by a junta steeped in political Catholicism, and with the aid of a government, that of Germany, at the moment engaged in a fierce religious struggle with the Vatican, provides one of the most interesting of modern historical ironies.

Of the fact of Italian intervention at this early stage there can be doubt no longer. As early as July 31 twenty Italian aeroplanes flew to Spanish Morocco to assist others already there; two came down in French territory. The French Government found them to be Italian air force bombers, with their marks painted over lightly. The pilots carried military papers. Other Italian planes, it is believed, reached Morocco before the war began. German planes were active as early as mid-August.

The war started out as a series of disjointed offensives which became stalemates. The rebels held the coast around Gibraltar, Seville, Toledo, and much territory in the north; the government held the central plain of Castille and most of the southern coast, as well as all of Catalonia. In August the rebels took Irun and San Sebastian and began to form their lines around Madrid. Then came the astonishing adventure of Toledo, where rebels had been trapped in the Alcazar since the war began. Franco's stubbornly advancing troops raised the seventy-day siege in September 28. The government, trying to blast the rebels out, seemed pitifully incompetent. The Moors, entering Toledo, found 600 government wounded in the hospital and assassinated them by hand-grenades. Previously, at Badajoz on the Portuguese border, 4,000 loyalist civilians and militiamen were captured by Franco's men and machine-gunned in the bull-ring.

Nothing, it appeared, could keep Franco from winning at this time. His lines drew closer to Madrid and early in October its siege began. But the loyalists miraculously stiffened. Franco's army reached the suburbs of the capital on November 7 and the government fled to Valencia. Apparently during one twenty-four hour interval Franco could have taken Madrid by walking in. But he waited. What really saved Madrid was the capture of Toledo; if Franco had not made that long detour Madrid might have fallen in September. After mid-November Madrid was safe, in a manner of speaking, though the enemy was still entrenched in the outskirts of the town. The siege lasted many months. Madrid was attacked incessantly from the air and by artillery fire, and in five different infantry offensives; they all collapsed. One third of the city was destroyed by bombs and shell-fire; the life of the capital was dislocated and transformed; thousands of civilians, women and children were killed.

¹ And his planes drove off the loyalist fleet and he was soon able to get material across.

At this point the story of the war becomes inextricably involved with the major fact of intervention. As early as mid-August a German warship appeared off Ceuta, and soon German destroyers and submarines dotted Spanish waters. German and Italian aeroplanes began to take active part in the land warfare, with German and Italian pilots. A Junker bomber was captured by the government as early as August 8, and Italian Capronis blossomed in the sky. German and Italian tanks, munitions, anti-aircraft guns, and materiel of all kinds flooded Franco territory. Entry was easy either by the sea or through Portugal, which made little pretence of neutrality. Finally actual German troops appeared.¹ So did Italian troops. Soon the Italians were in virtual occupation of the island of Majorca.

The reason for all this, from Franco's side, was very simple. He had to have foreign troops, the 'Aryan Moors' and the totalitarian 'volunteers', because not enough Spaniards could be found to fight for him. From the side of the interventionists it was simple too. The war was interpreted as a struggle between Fascism and Communism; Hitler and Mussolini would not brook a 'Bolshevist' régime in Western Europe. Spain was a perfect playground for them both politically and strategically. They knew too that a Fascist Spain would drastically weaken France. They delighted in the prospect of spheres of influence in Morocco and the western Mediterranean. They had been watching Spain a long time; General Sanjurjo visited Berlin just before the outbreak and the man whom the Germans sent to General Franco as ambassador, General Faupal, was head of an 'Iberian Bureau' in Berlin. Ties with Rome were also close. Italy to some extent and especially Germany had hungry eyes on Spanish ore and minerals, and before the war had proceeded six months cargoes of copper and iron were going to Hamburg to pay for German intervention. Both Germany and Italy recognised the Franco government in November.

¹ According to Freda White's War in Spain they first went into action south-west of Madrid on December 15.

Franco, interestingly enough, scoffed at Fascism at the beginning. Jay Allen of the Chicago Tribune and the News Chronicle, one of the most experienced of American correspondents in Spain, saw him on July 28 – when the war was only ten days old – for a historic interview and Franco told him, ‘This movement is not Fascist, it is Spanish and nationalist. . . . Fascism is ridiculous in Spain, ridiculous. The liberal middle class in Spain is all republican, masonic, and things like that. Fascism in Germany and Italy is a middle-class movement. Here these boys of Primo de Rivera’s say they are Fascists because it is the thing to say, but they are ridiculous.’

Before long General Franco saw his need of German and Italian aid, and when he had to pay for this aid he began to pipe a very different tune.

Such emphatic intervention by Germany and Italy – by the spring of 1937 it was estimated that the Germans had eight to ten thousand technicians in Spain and the Italians between 60,000 and 70,000 troops – was bound to provoke retaliation. Counter-intervention took two forms. First, volunteers from all over the world, liberals, anti-Fascists, communists, socialists, flocked to Spain and formed the International Brigade, motivated by common hatred of Fascist aggression. Such an army had never been seen before. It included Poles, Belgians, Czechs, Americans (some 2,700 from the U.S.A.), English, French, and anti-Fascist Italians and anti-Nazi Germans. The Brigade, which reached a maximum force of perhaps 20,000 men, went into action November 8th and 9th in the defence of Madrid, and it saved the capital. Second, beginning in October, the government of the U.S.S.R. sent tanks, aeroplanes, food, and diplomatic counsel. No Russian troops arrived in Spain, but Russian aeroplanes did, and their help was of inestimable value; their fast pursuit ships built on the American model, called Chatos, gave the loyalists the command of the air by early spring.

The war dragged on. Terrible tales of atrocities disfigured the world’s news. The rebels won several important offensives, for instance they took Malaga on February 7 and Bilbao on June 19, but they could not smash either the morale or the material defence of Madrid, and they got nowhere near Barcelona or Valencia. The government won a great victory on the Guadalajara front in March, when an Italian army was cut to pieces at Brihuega; the Italians lost more dead in this single engagement than in the whole Abyssinian war. Italian prisoners testified that they had 'enlisted' for service in Ethiopia, and were in effect shanghaied to Spain. In midsummer the loyalists took the offensive on two fronts.

Horrors heaped on horrors dulled the palate of the world, but Franco's march into the Basque country in June gave it a new sensation. German aviators bombed and destroyed Guernica, the holy city of the Basques, the first instance in history of the complete and wilful obliteration of a whole city, non combatants as well as fighters, by bombing and machine-gunning from the air. Franco apologists have stated that the Basques blew up their holy city and its inhabitants themselves. The testimony of G. L. Steer, the correspondent of The Times on the spot, gives a somewhat different story:

"The whole town of 7,000 inhabitants, plus 3,000 refugees, was slowly and systematically pounded to pieces. Over a radius of five miles round a detail of the raiders' technique was to bomb separate farm-houses. . . . All the villages around were bombed. Guernica was not a military objective. A factory producing war material lay outside the town and was untouched. . . . The town lay far behind the lines.

"The rhythm of this bombing of an open town was . . . a logical one; first hand grenades and heavy bombs to stampede the population, then machine-gunning to drive them below, next heavy and incendiary bombs to wreck the houses and burn them on top of the victims.

"I have seen and measured the enormous bomb-holes which, since I passed through the town the day before, I can testify were not there then. Unexploded German aluminium incendiary bombs found in Guernica were marked "Rheindorf factory, 1936".

In September 1937 though the rebels had pushed on and captured Santander, the war was still a stalemate.

The dominant issue was how long the government could hold out if more and more Germans and Italians came to fight.

General Franco

It would be naïve in the extreme to dismiss General Francisco Franco as a villain or a butcher. He is a creature of his caste, a product of his moral environment, and a fairly typical example of it. He has been commended for intelligence and courage, and he possesses social grace and charm. Beyond doubt, as he sees patriotism, he is a patriot. He is an idealist too. But let it be remembered that he started the war, and if he loses it, he will be a man like such tragic figures as Wrangel and Deniken, who helped to create what they sought to destroy. It is Franco – and what he represents – who knit Leftist Spain into a competent unity; if communism comes to Spain, General Franco will have been its accoucheur.

Franco is a first-rate example of a historical accident. He was not scheduled to be the supreme leader of the rebels. The leader was Calvo Sotelo, assassinated in July; General Sanjurjo, who was killed in an aeroplane accident three days after the war began, was theoretically the military chieftain. Franco stepped into his shoes. He was abler than the rest, he was in a better strategic position, he had the Moors and Legionnaires, and before the war was two months old he was indisputably in command. On October 1, 1936, he was invested as head of the Spanish 'state'.

General Franco, a small man, only a little over five feet, graceful, paunchy, with tiny well-formed hands and feet, called the 'Baby General', delicate, was born in Galicia in 1892. He came of a family which had sent its sons into the army or navy for generations. His brother Ramon was Spain's most distinguished aviator. Young Franco had an exceptionally brilliant military career. He saw service in Morocco, which taught him much, and at thirty-four he became the youngest general in the Spanish army. Under the republic he served in the Balearics and then again in Morocco. When the Lerroux-Gil Robles combination took power he was appointed chief of staff. This made the republicans suspicious, and when the Popular Front assumed office he was shelved and packed off to the Canary Islands.

Consider Jay Allen's interview with this graceful and idealistic little man:

Q. How long, now that your coup has failed in your objectives, is the massacre to go on?

A. There can be no compromise, no truce.

Q. That means you will have to shoot half Spain?

A. I repeat, at whatever cost.

Q. What would your government do if you won?

A. I would establish a military dictatorship.

Q. What would happen to the politicians of the republic?

A. Nothing, except that they would have to go to work.

Q. Why were you able to collaborate with the republic in apparent loyalty for so long?

A. I collaborated loyally as long as I thought the Republic represented the national will.

Q. What about the February elections? Didn't they represent the national will?

A. Elections never do.

Franco tries to embrace as wide a Rightist front as possible. He sincerely believes in a dictatorship above class and party. When, on April 20, he proclaimed himself dictator and leader of a one-party totalitarian state, he chose a comprehensive name for it: The Spanish Falangx of Traditionalist and Offensive National Syndicalist Juntas.

Franco's admirers are lyrical in their praise. For instance this item translated from the Paris Candide, by one René Benjamin:

'Franco is not tall, he is a little heavy, his body is timid. Ah! His glance is unforgettable, like that of all rare beings. A troubled and trembling glance, full of sweetness; the man is delicious and mysterious; he is a miracle of tenderness and energy. . . . The ravishing thing about Franco is his purity.'

— (New York Sun, July 27, 1937.)

And Mr. J. L. Garvin, in a pitiful article in the Observer, once called him 'a great gentleman'.

To which one might fairly reply that he has broken his oath twice; first to the King, when he took service with the republic; then to the republic, when he rose against it.

The other general on the Rightist side most worth notice is that fabulous creature General Don Gonzalo Queipo de Llano, who fights mostly with his tongue. He is the broadcaster for the insurgent forces, and over the radio from Seville gushes nightly on the exploits of his faction. On August 27, he ordered the execution of five members of a communist family for every person murdered by a communist. 'Colonel Yaguez followed my instructions in Badajoz, and the result was admirable,' (when four thousand people were massacred in the bull-ring!), he roared one night. He boasted that 'Red' women would be turned over to the Moors — one girl for each twenty Moors. He calls the British 'perfidious crocodiles', and predicts the end of the British Empire.

General de Llano was a republican for a while; in fact he was chief of the President's military household. He became a republican because he was slighted by the King; he rose against the republic when he lost the household job.

Terror

In the early days of the war a sporadic terror existed in both Madrid and Barcelona. The fact is unpleasant, but there is no use denying it. Churches were pillaged and wrecked, priests were murdered, and assassination of known Fascists occurred wholesale. The anarchists especially ran wild. But let it be remembered that these events occurred after Franco's revolt, when the population as a whole was exasperated to frenzy. The normal regulations of society broke down. Much of the killing occurred after a stupid boast by General Mola that a 'Fifth Column' of Fascists, the rebel sympathisers living in the city, would rise within the gates and help to capture it. Naturally they were hunted out and shot. Every responsible person in the loyalist government deplored the terror and sought to control it from the earliest days: soon it was stamped out.

The terror on the rebel side was infinitely more severe; killings took place on definite orders of the generals and as a part of policy. When a town was captured, known loyalists were shot out of hand. I have mentioned the horror of Badajoz. But Badajoz was only one of several examples. In the early days of the war, anyone who held a trade union card, anyone who was a Freemason, anyone who was known to have voted for the Popular Front, anyone who scorned going to mass, was liable to be executed.

The Times has stated that in Navarre 'in practically every village the three or four leading republicans are shot'. In Cordoba 2,000 people were executed and 1,800 in Saragossa. In Seville nine thousand people were shot, in Granada 6,000, in Pamplona 3,000. Leaflets were dropped by the rebels on Madrid reading as follows:

'The capture of Madrid by the National Army being imminent, you are warned that for every murder committed, ten of yours will be shot. Do not forget that we hold over 1,000 of the Red Militia as prisoners in the provinces, while in Madrid the 25,000 wounded will be held responsible for your excesses.'

When Franco's forces captured Malaga the town knew what might be coming. And, in an extraordinary mass exodus, almost one-third of the inhabitants left the city before the Fascists entered, walking with what possessions they could carry along the road to Almeria. They were willing to suffer any privation, to desert their homes, to risk death on the road – which was incessantly bombed – rather than live in a Franco city. The terrible scenes which accompanied this flight of 150,000 men, women, and children have been described by American doctors who witnessed them. Almost the same thing happened after the capture of Bilbao. But there were no neutral witnesses.

Left

The proletarian situation in Spain was, before the war, the most complicated in the world. The Left comprised several camps.

First there were several groups of bourgeois republicans, represented by men like Azaña and his allies.

Second there were the autonomists in Catalonia and the Basque country, who knew that the republic insured their freedom, which centralists like General Franco would take away.

Third, one must always keep in mind that syndicalism in Spain, alone among European countries, is a very powerful force. The Spanish labour movement for several generations was almost equally divided between socialist and syndicalist unions. The socialists, with their U.G.T. (Union General de Trabajadores), allied with the Second Internationale, were strongest in Madrid and the north; the syndicalists, with their rival C.N.T. (Confederación Nacional de Trabajo), flourished especially in Catalonia and Andalusia, with headquarters in Barcelona. Ever since the days of Bakunin, syndicalism has proliferated in these districts. It first took root when Marx and Bakunin split on the anarchist issue in 1872.

The syndicalists, queer fish, have traditionally stood aloof from politics. Until recently they refused to vote. They are 'a-political'. Their anarchist friends were a potent source of mischief, because the anarchists do not believe in government at all, and therefore stood to gain from any sort of chaos. In the old days it was a frequent manœuvre of the Right to bribe anarcho-syndicalists to make trouble, so that it could use the pretext for severe measures against more orderly opponents, like the socialists. Lerroux was a past master at this. Theoretically the syndicalists believe in a state founded on vertical trade unions. They began to take a more normal interest in politics when they saw that Fascism was rising in Spain, and would give them no mercy. They became willing to co-operate with the more moderate Left. And almost for the first time in history, they went to the polls and voted in February 1936 – with the Popular Front. Syndicalist votes helped make the Left victory possible.

Fourth, the anarchists. They have their own organisation in Spain, the F.A.I. (Federación Anarquista Ibera), which comprised only about 8,000 members but which 'muscle into' the syndicalist C.N.T., and for a time partially controlled it. The more responsible syndicalist leaders then walked out of the C.N.T. to demonstrate solidarity with the government.

Fifth, the socialists. These traditionally were moderate Marxists, but one wing, led by Largo Caballero, jumped very much to the Left just before the war and demanded an active revolutionary policy, partly as a manoeuvre to gain syndicalist support. The Caballero group went to the Left of the communists; the joke in Spain during the February elections was 'Vote communist to save Spain from Marxism.' The other wing of the socialist party, led by Indelacio Prieto, was more moderate. One of the ablest men in Spain, a rich newspaper owner and industrialist from the Basque country, Prieto wanted to co-operate with Azaña and join the government. A split in the socialist party seemed inevitable when the war came.

Sixth, the communists. These were a minor factor in Spain until the war broke out. There were only sixteen communist deputies in a Cortes of 473. The socialists and syndicalists had skimmed the cream of radical Spain.

Seventh, the P.O.U.M. (Party of Marxist Unification), which began as a dissident communist group, led by Andres Nin and Joaquin Maurin. Its strength was mostly in Barcelona. In 1936 it became frankly defeatist and Trotskyist and was presently suppressed.

Came the war. Madrid rocked with shock. There were three cabinets in twenty-four hours. The Left Republicans carried on, but in September they collapsed; the government was not prosecuting the war efficiently. Conditions were near chaos, though the masses kept on fighting. On September 6, Largo Caballero formed a government in which five men beside himself were socialists. Del Vayo became minister of foreign affairs, and Prieto minister of marine and air. Two communists were included, to reflect the realities of the situation, one Basque nationalist, one Catalan, and two republicans. Later, the government was further enlarged and the syndicalists came in.

Francisco Largo Caballero held office until the following spring. His integrity was beyond question, his prestige was great, his patience was tenacious. But he was a failure. He wasn't winning the war. Nor was he making the social revolution he had promised. For one thing he was too old for the job – sixty-seven – and not in the best of health; the story is that he went to bed at nine p.m. every night, and nothing could happen in loyalist Spain thereafter.

Caballero was the perfect type of trade union boss. A worthy character, who had devoted his whole life to the Spanish proletariat; he was a manual worker as a youth and until twenty he could not read nor write; he went to jail seven times, and once was sentenced to death. At the end the communists rose steeply in influence, backed by the U.S.S.R.; by May 1937 it was quite clear that the strongest fighting force in loyalist Spain was the communist party; Caballero detested the communists, and out he went.

He was succeeded by Dr. Juan Negrin on May 15, 1937. Not a communist but a Left-wing socialist, Negrin worked well with the communists and republicans both and his administration began on a note of competence and vigour. He dropped the anarchists, after a serious anarchist rising was suppressed in Barcelona. He muzzled Caballero and the P.O.U.M. and he strove to devote the whole energy of loyalist Spain to the one supreme task – winning the war. Negrin, a doctor of medicine, only forty-eight, widely travelled, a brilliant linguist, versatile, solid, urbane, made a name for himself as a financial expert. As finance minister under Caballero he was in charge of the carabineros, a sort of customs and border police; as premier, he developed this organisation into a powerful armed force. It helped save Spain.

Non-Intervention

According to the normal canons of international law, any government is entitled to purchase arms and munitions for suppression of a rebellion. Loyalist Spain was unable to do this. For one thing, General Franco's navy – though the rebels had no belligerent rights – set up a quite illegal but nevertheless efficacious blockade. For another, the great powers initiated the monstrous fiction known as the 'Non-Intervention Agreement' which established an embargo on the shipment of both munitions and volunteers to both Spanish sides. This was an almost fatal handicap to the loyalists. They could get nothing in from France and not much from the U.S.S.R. But Italy and Germany sent great quantities of arms and men to Spain before the pact was signed, and after its signature it seemed that they violated it almost at will.¹

The Non-Intervention Pact was suggested by France and Britain in the early days in order to keep the war from spreading. They thought that a rigid system of non-intervention would prevent wholesale conflagration. The Pact was laboriously hammered out from August till February, against the incessant objections of Germany, Italy, and especially Portugal – which hindered the negotiations at every opportunity – and finally twenty-seven nations signed it; in April an international naval control was set up in Spanish waters.

¹ The very day after the 'gentleman's agreement' was signed between England and Italy, 5,000 Italian troops landed at Cadiz.

The French point of view may be easily summarised. Most Frenchmen did not want Franco to win. A glance at the map will show why. A Fascist victory in Spain might mean that France would have a third frontier to defend in the event of war with Germany or Italy. Italian or German naval bases in the Balearics or Morocco would drastically shift the balance of power in the Mediterranean, and might cut France's 'life-line' of communication to her African reservoir of native troops. Yet a powerful section of French opinion favoured General Franco for class reasons. And the French were willing to make almost any concession, even if the loyalists should be defeated, in order to stave off the peril of immediate general war. The Fascists held their trump card again. They committed acts of aggression knowing that the French and British would not call the bluff because calling the bluff might mean war.

The British attitude was similar. From the nationalist and imperialist point of view a Franco victory would be an embarrassment to the British, even if they bought Franco up later. It would imperil Gibraltar – mysterious guns dominating the harbour were set in place by Franco or his allies early in the war – and give Italy and Germany a foothold in the western Mediterranean. The Mediterranean is an essential link in imperial communications. But from the point of view of property, privilege, and class, the British wanted Franco to win; they may like imperialism, but they like capitalism better. They quailed before the bogey of a Bolshevik Spain, of communism on the Pyrenees. Thus the British were divided by conflicting aims, stalemated by a dichotomy in policy. As a result they gave way to muddle, drift, and what almost seemed cowardice before repeated acts of aggression by the Fascists. They wanted peace at almost any price – until their own gigantic armament programme was ready.

The Non-Intervention Pact endured an agitated life. On May 29, a loyalist aviator bombed the German pocket-battleship Deutschland as she was lying in Ibiza harbour. Apparently the pilot mistook it for the rebel cruiser Baleares. The Germans, in a rage, bombarded Almeria two days later, a formal naval action by the German fleet against a Spanish town. The hypocrisy of the Non-Intervention agreement passed belief. Italy and Germany were theoretically part of an international scheme to prevent foreign troops fighting in Spain while thousands of their own troops were fighting there! But little by little the pretence of Non-Intervention was given up. When Franco's troops, largely Italian, captured Santander, the battle was openly and flamboyantly celebrated in Italy as an Italian victory.

The Leipzig incident came on June 19. Three torpedoes, it was alleged, were fired by an unknown submarine at the German cruiser Leipzig off Oran. No one ever saw the submarine. Comment was free to the effect that the attack might have been invented. It sent Hitler into a violent tantrum; Europe tottered on the brink of war.

In September, came another first-rate crisis. Submarines presumed to be Italian, enforcing Franco's blockade, set about torpedoing neutral merchantmen in the Mediterranean. A dozen British, Greek, Danish and other neutral ships were sunk in circumstances recalling the unrestricted U-boat warfare of 1917. The 'pirate' submarines, never showing themselves, crept marauding not only in Spanish waters, but as far away as the Aegean. The British and the small neutrals at first took this affront without rebuttal, but when two Russian ships were torpedoed and sunk, the Soviet Government angrily demanded reprisals and formally accused Italy of being the pirate power. A conference was called at Nyon, Switzerland. Germany and Italy refused to attend, and it seems that the categorical nature of the Russian note was designed to keep them away. The British and French, their backs up at last, took decisive action. The Italians, absent, were out-manceuvred, and the British and French fleets set up a powerful 'piracy control' in Mediterranean waters. This was something the Italians didn't like – it amounted to Anglo-French domination of their coastline – and they demanded equal share in the patrol.

Portugal

This small country, with a population less than that of London or New York City, undeveloped, backward, pleasantly remote, lives by export of cork, fish, wine. Until the Spanish war it played a respectable and peaceable role in international affairs. The country was a monarchy for some seven hundred years; in 1910 a revolution overthrew the Braganzas and a republic came to power. Distractions and vicissitudes were many, and in 1933, Professor Dr. Antonio de Oliveira Salazar, born in 1894, established a military dictatorship.

Professor Salazar, almost uniquely among dictators, was – and is – a recluse. He was an economist by profession, and from 1926 to 1933 he served as minister of finance. Dictatorship was forced on him, he says. A Jesuit, ascetic and devout, with hatred of pomp, he gained great respect abroad for balancing the budget and funding the national debt. Then the usual machinery of dictatorship came into action. A corporative state of totalitarian character, called the Estado Novo; an efficient secret police and a private army in green shirts; a militant youth movement; close association with the other Fascist powers; a single political party with Salazar at its head – the paraphernalia is familiar.

Professor Salazar once disguised himself as a customs official, worked on incoming baggage himself – because he heard tales of delay and inefficiency in customs inspection. Once his tourist bureau offered a £1 prize for the corpse of any flea or bug found in a Portuguese hotel – because a healthy tourist business is important to the country.

Portugal for many years was regarded as a satrapate of England. The country is Britain's most venerable ally – the treaty of alliance dates from A.D. 1373 – and Britain virtually controls its finance and is by far its most important customer.

CHAPTER XIII

MUSSOLINI

'I shall make my own life a masterpiece.'

- BENITO MUSSOLINI.

'I am desperately Italian. I believe in the function of Latinity.'

- BENITO MUSSOLINI.

BENITO MUSSOLINI, tempestuous and ornate, a blacksmith's son, the creator of modern Italy and the author of the Abyssinian war, was born July 29, 1883, at Dovia di Predappio, a village in the Romagna. His career is that of the most formidable combination of turncoat, ruffian, and man of genius in modern history.

The obvious motivations, except poverty, are lacking. His father, a revolutionary socialist, was the anarchist of the village square, yes; but no tragedy occurred in Mussolini's life to compare with the execution of Lenin's elder brother, or Pilsudski's. His mother, a school-teacher, like the mothers of most great men, was an exceptional woman, but her influence on Mussolini was, it seems, slight; adoration of her never made him, like Hitler, a prisoner of infantile fixations. Kamal Ataturk's mother was ill-treated by the Greeks, and years later the Turkish dictator drove the Greeks into the sea; in Mussolini's life there is no such dramatic and direct impulse to redemption.

Nor can one easily discover any extraordinary personal accidents without which the Duce might have lived and died a blacksmith's boy in Forli. It is quite possible, as Bertrand Russell has pointed out, that the revolution in Russia might never have occurred had not a German general permitted Lenin to travel across Germany in a sealed train. It is quite probable that Soviet Russia would have never had a Five-Year Plan, had not Trotsky succumbed to a fit of pique and refused to attend Lenin's funeral. The Dollfuss dictatorship in Austria was, as we shall see, made possible because a socialist deputy went to the bathroom during a crucial parliamentary vote. Such personal accidents, which play a large part in history, are not prominent in Mussolini's life. He made his own luck. His career has been a growth, steady and luxuriant, like that of some monstrous weed.

The chief personal influence on Mussolini as a young man was probably that of a Russian exile in Switzerland, Madame Angelica Balabanov. She took care of him in his early revolutionary days, mended his health, gave him food of both the body and the spirit. Mussolini, a bricklayer, apparently met Lenin through Balabanov. Years later Lenin rebuked the Italian socialists for having 'lost' Mussolini, their best man.

Every man is an arena, a pool, of forces. Those in Mussolini's early life were mostly literary and intellectual. Voraciously intelligent, he read Marx, Hegel, Machiavelli, La Salle, Nietzsche, Pareto, Sorel. He absorbed them like a blotter. From Nietzsche he learned to hate the mob, from Marx to love it. He records that in his early days he kept a medallion of Marx in his pocket.

Bombastes Furioso

The son of Alessandro Mussolini (who named him after Benito Jaurez, the Mexican revolutionist who ordered the execution of the Emperor Maximilian) and of Rosa Maltoni who was the school-teacher of the village, he grew up in the most crushing poverty. He never tasted coffee until he was twenty. He slept on a bundle of hay instead of a mattress, and the bedroom in his birth-place, which has been made a museum, preserves this symbol of extreme indigence. Mussolini often returns to his native village, and has built a model farm in the vicinity. Unlike Hitler, he takes some interest in the lives of his surviving relatives.

Though his father was a blacksmith, the family for generations had tilled the soil. Speaking to an assembly of peasants in October 1935, he said: 'The sort of people who like to rummage among old papers thought they would please me by discovering that my ancestors were of noble birth. So I said to them "Stop it." All my grandfathers, all my great-grandfathers were tillers of the soil, and to remove all doubts of it I stuck a tablet on the wall of the old farm which says that generations of Mussolinis before me have always tilled the soil with their own hands.'

Mussolini, at his mother's insistence, went to a religious school (like Stalin and Kamal Ataturk), though his father was an extreme anticlerical. Then he taught school himself, at a wage of 56 lire (then £2 5s.) per month, until he fled to Switzerland when he was nineteen. He earned a living as a mason and a labourer in a chocolate factory; he was hungry often, and Balabanov describes how on one occasion he snatched at food from two Englishwomen picnicking in a park. At night he studied socialism. Becoming an agitator, he got into trouble with the police, and was jailed and expelled from one Swiss canton after another. Altogether, in Italy as well as Switzerland, Mussolini was arrested eleven times.

He hated jail; he despised the moral obloquy and physical discomforts of confinement. Once he was finger-printed by the Geneva police; he has loathed Switzerland ever since, and it is not fanciful to assume that his dislike of the League of Nations was partly conditioned by this early Genevan insult. Certainly Mussolini's prison experiences caused his present pronounced claustrophobia. Once he refused to enter the Blue Grotto in Capri. And it is obvious that his famous predilection for enormous rooms, like his office in the Palazzo Venezia, which is sixty feet by forty by forty, is over-compensation for early confinement in small prison cells.

Mussolini returned to Italy in 1904 at the age of twenty-one and spent ten years as a red-hot socialist.

He earned a living the while by teaching school and by incessant journalism. Not as great a pamphleteer as Shaw or Trotsky, he is nevertheless one of the best journalists alive. An early venture into creative writing, a novel called The Cardinal's Mistress, was not successful; it was, however (I quote Francis Hackett), 'hard, violent, cynical, proud, strong, and troubled'. He also wrote a biography of John Huss. At Forli in 1909 he founded his own paper, La Lotta di Classi (The Class Struggle), and it made him known among socialists and revolutionaries all over Italy. In 1912 he became editor of the Avanti, the official socialist daily, and he trebled its circulation in three months. Previously he had spent some time in Trento, then in Austria, and this experience in irredentism awakened something cardinal in his character – nationalism.¹ In 1924 he was one of the organisers of 'Red Week', an attempt at socialist uprising in the Romagna.

The immense catastrophe of the Great War amputated his socialist career. The orthodox socialists wanted Italian neutrality; Mussolini stood for intervention on the side of the allies. 'To know why he became a warrior,' says Dr. Finer in his penetrating and exhaustive Mussolini's Italy, 'it is hardly necessary to do more than observe his physique.' On political nationalist grounds and purely personally through love of adventure, Mussolini wanted war. He gave up the editorship of Avanti and was expelled from the socialist party. When his former comrades howled him down, he shouted, with rare psychological discernment, 'You hate me because you still love me.' A few months later, he founded the newspaper he still directs, Popolo d'Italia. French money – since France was eager to drag Italy into the War – helped him.

¹ He was arrested by the Austrian police and deported. The man who got him out of jail was the Viennese socialist Ellenbogen, who, twenty-five years later, was himself arrested following the February 'revolt' in Austria, which was the result of Mussolini's Austrian policy.

Mussolini, so recently an anti-militarist, sounded a violent call to arms. 'We must distinguish between war and war,' he said, 'as we distinguish between crime and crime, between blood and blood. . . . We are not, and we do not wish to be, mummies, everlastingly immovable. We are men, and live men, who wish to give our contribution, however modest, to historical creation' (Finer, p. 101). He did not, however, go to the Front himself until December 1916, and he had only thirty-eight days in the trenches when he was severely wounded by the explosion of a trench mortar. He was in hospital for seven months. This, at least, is the official version of the incident.

After the War, on March 23, 1919, Mussolini formed the first Fasci di Combattimento, mostly from men who had joined him early in the War demanding intervention. He was still a socialist, though not a member of the party; his first programme asked for an eighty-five per cent tax on War profits. He disliked and distrusted the bourgeoisie and capitalist aristocracy. 'Fascio' is simply the Italian word for group or bundle; to Mussolini it conveniently symbolised the 'Fasces' of Imperial Rome. The original Fascists were augmented by local correspondents of the Popolo d'Italia in Lombardy, who organised the movement. It was not a party at first, but a militia. Its chief strength was among ex-soldiers, especially the arditi, front-line volunteers. 'We, the survivors, who have returned,' Mussolini wrote, 'demand the right of governing Italy.'

The movement developed speedily. Its roots were those which grew analogously in Germany and produced Hitler later: unemployment among the ex-soldiers, the weakness of democratic cabinets, parliamentary corruption, powerful nationalist feeling, restlessness on the Left coupled with dissatisfaction at orthodox international socialism. As Mussolini became stronger, the army backed him, exactly as the Reichswehr backed Hitler. The politicians, watching him warily, tried to buy his movement; Giolitti was the Italian Papen. The industrialists, precisely as in Germany, prepared to give his machine support.

Labour troubles shook Italy in 1920 and 1921. The workmen rose against intolerable wages and living conditions. Mussolini appears to have first supported the 'Occupation of the Factories', when six hundred thousand workers in the industrial north attempted to take over the means of production. The Occupation was a failure, partly because socialist leadership was weak. This made it easier for Mussolini to appeal to the mob. But the legend that he 'saved' Italy from Bolshevism was nonsense. Even Italians do not believe this any more.

By 1921 and 1922 Mussolini steadily expanded his influence, and by a weapon which later dictators were to imitate – violence. He became a sort of gang chieftain. (He was still an active journalist, however; he reported the Cannes Conference in 1922 and sought interviews with Briand and Lloyd George. This trip taught him, he records, his first lesson in the mysteries of foreign exchange, when he discovered to his shame that an Italian lira was not worth as much as a French franc.) Mussolini's gangs slugged their way to power in half a dozen districts. Balbo in Ferrara and Faranacci in Cremona attacked the 'reds'. Virtual civil war, of a minor guerilla type, terrorised Italy. Mussolini still claimed, theoretically, to be a socialist, but to gain powers he had to have an enemy; thus he fought the working classes, under the pretence that he was 'liberating' them.

The full reaction – and more violence – came after the March on Rome, in October 1922. As prime minister he was simply a gang leader who had become big enough to bluff the government into submission. He did not demand full power until he was quite certain that the army would not oppose him and when he was sure that the King would make him prime minister. The March on Rome was not, of course, a March on Rome at all; the Fascists took possession of a number of cities, with the army, 'neutral', standing aside. Mussolini travelled to Rome by sleeping-car, and the fifty thousand Fascists who had assembled in Rome were quietly dispersed the next day.

After 1922 Mussolini's history is familiar. He formed a coalition government, then, like Hitler ten years later, kicked the non-Fascists out. He was supported by Morgan loans. His only severe crisis till the Abyssinian war in 1935 was the Matteotti affair. Most critics nowadays do not think that the Duce directly ordered the assassination of Matteotti, the socialist leader, but his moral responsibility is indisputable. What happened, good informants think, is not only that Mussolini threatened Matteotti in the chamber, but angrily denounced him in private, spurting irritably at mention of his name. One can easily imagine him exploding to his underlings, 'That Matteotti -!' (Similarly, by a chance remark, Henry II caused the murder of Thomas a'Beckett.) The underlings, taking the hint, and thinking to gain favour with the Duce, went ahead on their own initiative and kidnapped and murdered the young socialist. Such a sequence of events is convenient for a dictator; if the business turns out 'well', the result is simple gain, if it turns out badly, viz., makes a scandal, the dictator can disclaim complicity. Mussolini, however, was bold enough to admit his responsibility; and he had to concede that the murderers were Fascists of 'high station'. Indeed some of his closest associates were involved. In a famous speech to the chamber he blustered his way out as follows:

'But after all, gentlemen, what butterflies are we looking for under the arch of Titus? Well, I declare here before this assembly, before all the Italian people, that I assume, I alone, the political, moral, historical responsibility for everything that has happened. If sentences, more or less maimed, are enough to hang a man, out with the noose! If Fascism has only been castor oil or a club, and not a proud passion of the best Italian youth, the blame is on me!

- (Mussolini's Autobiography, p. 231.)

This, be it noted, is almost the same technique that Hitler followed after the June 30 murders. He too assumed all responsibility; and in Italy and Germany both, this removed the burden of bad conscience from large quarters of the nation. The Matteotti affair, however, shook the Duce deeply. But on the whole it was of great value to him, because following it he was able to isolate and thus the more conveniently destroy the opposition.¹

'And Changes Fill the Cup of Alteration'

It is interesting in the light of the Abyssinian campaign to think back to the Italo-Turkish war of 1911-12 and recollect that Mussolini vigorously opposed it. This war, also fought in Africa, seemed to Mussolini, then a socialist, an imperialist crime. He organised an anti-war strike in Forli, and spent five months in prison as a result. The Lybian war, he wrote, and newspaper articles which it provoked, were 'manifestations, typical, qualified, and cynical, of nationalist delirium tremens'.

¹ The actual assassins of Matteotti got very light sentences. One was an American gangster from St. Louis.

In one editorial in the Avanti he wrote words which read strangely in 1935:

'We are in the presence of a nationalist, clerical, conservative Italy which proposes to make of the sword its law, of the army the nation's school. We foresaw this moral perversion; it does not surprise us. But those who think that preponderance of militarism is a sign of strength are wrong. Strong nations do not have to descend to the sort of insane carnival in which the Italians are indulging to-day; strong nations have a sense of proportion. Nationalist, militarist Italy shows that it lacks this sense. So it happens that a miserable war of conquest is celebrated as a Roman triumph.' (Italics mine.)

- (Daily Express, October 19, 1935.)

Dr. Finer has unearthed a precious quotation of similar vintage. 'Imagine an Italy,' wrote Mussolini indignantly in 1912, 'in which thirty-six millions should all think the same, as though their brains were made in an identical mould, and you would have a madhouse, or rather, a kingdom of utter boredom or imbecility.'

To which the detached observer might reply, Even so!

Man Mussolini

Most people meeting Mussolini are surprised at his shortness of stature. He is, like Napoleon, only five feet six. His shoulders are powerful and his hands finely formed and almost delicate. His smile is gritty. Usually he wears the uniform of a corporal of the Fascist Militia.¹ He works in the Palazzo Venezia, in the centre of Rome, and lives about ten minutes away by car, in the Villa Torlonia, a comfortable villa with a luxuriant garden on the Via Nomentana, near the Porta Pia. A Roman aristocrat, Prince Torlonia, offered the villa to Mussolini because he couldn't afford its upkeep; now he would like to have it back but Mussolini has fallen in love with the place, especially the garden.

For some years his wife, Donna Rachele Guidi, resided in Milan, but lately she moved to Rome and now lives in the Villa Torlonia. Donna Rachele, whose origins are obscure, was, according to one story, a waitress in a Forli pub, according to another the servant of Mussolini's father after he retired from blacksmithing. She has borne Mussolini five children.

Indeed Mussolini is the only contemporary dictator conspicuously

¹ Note the Napoleonic significance.

fecund; he is also the only dictator with a very strong regard for family life. Like Napoleon (and Hindenburg) he trusts members of his immediate family, and not many other people. For years his only friend was his brother Arnaldo, who succeeded him as editor of the Popolo d'Italia: Mussolini telephoned him from Rome to Milan almost every evening. Arnaldo's sudden death was a serious blow to the Duce. His daughter Edda, who is his living image, is the only person who dares to twit or heckle him; he adores her. Her husband, Count Galeazzo Ciano, became Mussolini's Press-director, and then the leader of the Desperata squadron of bombing and pursuit planes in Ethiopia. Mussolini's two elder sons, Vittorio, nineteen, and Bruno, seventeen, also went to the war as aviators. As if to give the two younger children, Romano and Anna-Maria, a touch of the air, Mussolini himself piloted the plane which gave them their first experience off the ground.

At fifty-three Mussolini is in powerfully good health, partly as a result of attention to a severe régime. Shortly after he became prime minister he was desperately ill with a stomach ailment; he eats very little nowadays but milk and fruit. He told a recent American interviewer, pointing to a basket of fruit on the table, 'That is the secret of my continued health – fruit, fruit, fruit. In the morning I have a cup of coffee and fruit; at noon I have soup or broth and fruit, and at night I have fruit. I never touch meat, but sometimes I have a little fish.' He loves exercise, and takes a lot of it: riding in the Torlonia gardens, fencing, swimming, hiking. He neither drinks nor smokes. He was fond of women in his younger days, but for the last few years he has paid little attention to them.¹

Mussolini is built like a steel spring. (Stalin is a rock of sleepy granite by comparison, and Hitler a blob of ectoplasm.) Mussolini's ascetic frugality is that of a strong man who scorns indulgence because he has tasted it often and knows that it may weaken him; Hitler's that of a weak man fearful of temptation. Stalin, on the other hand, is as normal in appetites as a buffalo.

The Duce has no social life. When, as foreign minister, it is incumbent on him to entertain, he greets his guests not at the Palazzo Venezia or the Villa Torlonia but in a hotel he hires for the occasion. No friend of the rich, he despises the decadent and profligate Roman aristocracy. He gave up the theatre, of which he was very fond, because he could not spare the time; he sometimes has private cinema shows at home. In his autobiography, written in 1928, he says that in his first six years of power he never once passed the threshold of an aristocrat's salon or even of a coffee-house.

¹ But early in 1937 a French lady, Madame de Fontages, told a dramatic story of his tempestuous attentions.

As a rule, Mussolini works very hard for five or six hours a day – except when a crisis makes more time necessary – and spends the rest of the day in reading, meditation, or exercise. He is neat, precise, orderly; as Ludwig¹ records, he hates the à peu près. His work is systematised to the ultimate detail; he is a perfect executive, considering the floriferousness of other aspects of his character; he never leaves the Palazzo Venezia till the day's work is done.

He cares very little for money, though his large family makes him less impervious to financial considerations than other dictators. His official salary is 8,000 lire per month (about £135), but he has a drawing account, 'small, unspecified, and variable', at the treasury. For his autobiography he received £5,000 in America; he gave some of it to the Rome poor. For a long period his chief source of income was reputed to come from the Hearst press; early in 1935, however, he gave up writing regular articles because international politics were so delicate that he could not express himself frankly. He gave a share of his Hearst income to Margherita Sarfatti, his biographer, who helped him prepare the articles. Mussolini's brother Arnaldo was rich, because the Popolo d'Italia was – and is – a prosperous newspaper; its director now is Mussolini's nephew.

The Duce is the only modern dictator who has come to terms with religion. In 1929 the Lateran Treaty adjusted the relations of church and state in Italy. Shortly thereafter Mussolini and the Pope, strong characters both, clashed over the education of Fascist youth; in 1932 the Duce went to the Vatican, knelt in prayer, and, it is believed, took holy communion. He was an avowed atheist, like his father, in youth; latterly he has become very religious. He prays daily. His wedding-gift to Edda was a golden rosary; his youngest child, Anna-Maria, was his first to be given a religious name.

The most accessible of Europe's statesmen, Mussolini (like Beneš of Czechoslovakia) sees an enormous number of people. His first visitor every day is the chief of police; (Alexander of Yugoslavia likewise saw a security official the first thing every morning.) The Duce, pervasively curious, interested in human nature, and an accomplished brain-tapper, like Franklin Roosevelt, enjoys his visitors. Finer quotes him as saying that he has given over sixty thousand audiences; he has interested himself in 1,887,112 individual 'affairs of citizens'.

¹ cf. Talks With Mussolini, by Emil Ludwig, a fascinating record.

Mussolini listens to people – but he seldom takes advice. He alone makes decisions. When he wishes, he can make himself as inaccessible as a Tibetan Lama. During the Geneva crises in 1935, when he was in a roaring temper, no one could get near him. Baron Aloisi and others made reports; he listened or not, as he chose. Several diplomats in Rome, like the British ambassador, Sir Eric Drummond, dislike talking to him; he terrifies them. Mussolini is proud of having thousands of acquaintances, and – with Arnaldo dead – no friends; he told Ludwig that he trusted 'no one'. This remark was expurgated from the Italian translation of Ludwig's book, since many Italians have served the Duce well and think that they deserve his trust.

A very good journalist himself, he likes newspaper men. But he is very much a prima donna, and needs careful handling. He is never 'charming'; he is contemptuous of all but the most skilful flattery; he may be brutal, gruff, cheerful, or stentorian, depending on his mood, which he seldom bothers to gloss over or conceal. He pays intelligent interlocutors the compliment of interviewing them; sometimes he asks many more questions than he answers. Boldness is the best avenue to his favour. I remember seeing Francis Hackett after his interview for the Survey Graphic, a little breathless because he had dared to ask a supremely audacious question: 'Where, your excellency, would you have been in your career, if you had applied to yourself the Fascist virtues of discipline, loyalty, and obedience?'

Interviews, Mussolini knows, are the best of all possible forms of propaganda; thus he is so lavish with them. Most newspaper men – and their editors – cannot resist the flattery of conversation with a dictator or head of a state; once they have been received by Mussolini or Hitler, they feel a sense of obligation which warps their objectivity. It is very difficult for the average correspondent to write unfavourably about a busy and important man who has just donated him a friendly hour of conversation.

A British interviewer saw Mussolini recently and, rare phenomenon, Mussolini laughed at one of his remarks. Preparing a draft of the interview, the correspondent wrote, 'The Duce's laughter encouraged me to make one criticism of the Fascist régime, that it permitted very little expression of humour.' Reading the draft for approval before publication (as he does with most interviews) Mussolini sternly elided the reference to the fact that he had laughed. Dictators never laugh!

¹ Rather weakly Mussolini replied that 'the War' had changed things.

Two newspaper men were the source of the only recorded instance of public embarrassment of the Duce. He was in Locarno to initial the security pact of 1925. (Incidentally, this is one of only four occasions that he has left Italy since 1922; he attended the Lausanne conference of that year, and in 1923 fleetingly visited London.) His régime had just taken over the great liberal newspapers of Italy; the corps of international correspondents resented this, and boycotted his Press conference. Annoyed, pouting, Mussolini found himself surrounded in the hotel lobby by the journalists who had slighted him. He addressed George Slocombe of the Daily Herald, a conspicuous red-bearded figure, whom he had met covering the conference of Cannes. 'Ha!' exclaimed Mussolini surlily. 'How are your communist friends getting on!' Slocombe replied with perfect good temper, 'I am not a communist, Monsieur le Président, but a socialist.' 'Ha!' Mussolini snorted again; 'then I am mistaken.' Whereupon a Dutch correspondent, George Nypels, piped out, 'And it is not the first time.'

Mussolini reads all the time; no modern statesman – except, perhaps, Masaryk – is so well acquainted with current literature. He keeps a systematic note-book of his reading. He astounded Ludwig by the range and accuracy of his historical knowledge. Like most people who like to read, he likes to write, and he writes extremely well. He compressed in the dozen pages of his pamphlet on Fascism what it analogously took Hitler six hundred pages to express in Mein Kampf. He is easily the best educated as well as the most sophisticated of the dictators – he is the only modern ruler who can genuinely be termed an intellectual – and he taught himself both French and German, which he speaks expertly. In about 1925 he began to learn English, so that he might read the political leaders in The Times. He chose an English newspaper woman, Miss Gibson, as his teacher. He writes often – anonymously – for the Popolo d'Italia; he is part author of one play, Campo di Maggio, dealing with Napoleon during the Hundred Days, and the author of another, not yet produced, about the chief of his heroes, Julius Cæsar.

The things that Mussolini hates most are Hitler, aristocrats, money, cats, and old age. He detests old people, especially old women. He dislikes references to the fact that he is a grandfather; and when, on July 29, 1933, he reached the age of fifty, the Italian Press was not allowed to mention it. The things that Mussolini loves most are the city of Rome (he has assiduously fostered the 'cult of Rome'), his daughter Edda, peasants, books, aeroplanes, and speed.

He is apt to straddle a motor-cycle, and like the late Colonel Lawrence hurl himself across country at night. He learned to pilot an aeroplane shortly after the War, and recounts in his autobiography a number of crashes and forced landings, from which he escaped miraculously, and which intensely exhilarated him.

'The Race by Vigour not by Vaunts is Won'

From the complex strands of Mussolini's character one may draw bright and brittle threads indicating the sources of his power.

He has, first of all, spine and starch, in a country sometimes lacking both.

For all his bombast and braggadocio,¹ his intelligence is cold, analytical, deductive, and intensely realistic.

His flaming egoism, his sacro egoismo, is cherished by Italians. His vanity is, as is obvious, extreme; for instance he stabilised the lira at nineteen to the dollar, far too high a rate, mostly to better the figure chosen by the French. He was called a paranoiac as far back as 1910.

Overwhelmingly he is a man of action. The single episode that amazed him most about the 30th of June in Germany was that Hitler consumed five hours talking to a man (Roehm) who was potentially a traitor.

His intuition, personal and political, is sensitive. He says, 'I cannot change myself. I am like the beasts. I smell the weather before it changes. If I submit to my instincts, I never err.'

He is an orator of the pen. He wrote his way to power.

Like all dictators, he is implacable. No Hitler, no Stalin, no Mussolini, has ever forgiven an enemy.

He is no hypocrite. He never made any secret of his ambition, which, he said frankly, was to seize power and stay in power as long as possible. On the other hand, he insists that he is no mere 'profiteer in patriotism'. Duty to Italy is his passion. 'Is it lust for power that possesses me?' he once said. 'No, I believe, in all conscience, no Italian thinks this. Not even my worst adversary. It is ¹ My colleague F. A. Voigt has noted that only the countries where grand opera flourishes have produced Fascism.

duty. A precise duty towards the revolution and towards Italy.' (Finer, p. 295.)

His histrionic ability is extreme. No modern politician except possibly Trotsky is so good an actor.

He distinctly has a 'world sense' of politics. Hitler thinks of Germany as an isolated entity; Mussolini knows well that the world contains much aside from Italy.

Above all, he possesses a passionate physical magnetism. His vitality expresses itself in every gesture; when he salutes, for instance, he shoots out his arm with such intensity you think the hand may fall off. This vitality is readily absorbed by others. When he arrives before troops ready for review, his presence has almost the effect of an electric shock.

Among more negative qualities in Mussolini the following might be mentioned.

He is intensely touchy. A journalist well known to him, whom he admired, visited Italy in August 1935 and wrote a quite objective story saying that the Abyssinian campaign was not universally popular. Mussolini saw it (he reads most of his press cuttings) and cancelled the appointment for an interview, a few hours before it was to take place. Again, a minor instance, he caused the Italian number of Fortune, which was very fair to him, to be suppressed in Italy, largely it is believed because of one remark quoting him (in his early days) as follows: 'What do I do first when I wake up? Jump straight out of bed! No matter how beautiful the head beside me on the pillow.'

He is superstitious. Early in his career he had accepted among the thousands of gifts which poured in on him, an Egyptian mummy. Then Lord Carnarvon, excavator of the Tomb of Tutankhamen, died. Mussolini ordered the mummy to be removed. He woke up the staff of the Palazzo Chigi (where he then worked) to have it instantly taken away, his fright of it having descended on him late at night.

His claustrophobia I have mentioned. It is possible also that his reckless addiction to speed and violent movement is compensation for the days when prison cells bound his steps to six feet by four.

He is, like many Italians, inclined to be suspicious. For instance when the King telephoned him from Rome to Milan offering him the premiership, he did not disbelieve the message, but refused to act on it until it should be confirmed by an official telegram.

He is not strikingly original. Most of his ideas are derivative. Ideologically Fascism is the distorted creation of Marx, Nietzsche, and Sorel. Mussolini did not invent the Fascist salute, which was a suggestion of D'Annunzio's; he did not devise the symbol of the Black Shirt, which he copied from the uniform of the arditi.

He is occasionally capable of humility. 'A man in my position,' he told Ludwig, 'must be stupid at least once a week.'

Mussolini, who is quite aware of the complexities of his character, read with interest a serial discussion of it in a Fascist newspaper. Then he telegraphed the local prefect: 'Be so good as to send for the editor and ask him to close his series of articles with the following statement! "Inasmuch as Mussolini himself says that he does not know exactly what he is, it is somewhat difficult for others to find out."'

After his visit to Rome in 1926, Francis Hackett wrote, 'Mussolini is an Italian masterpiece, all shade and all sun, concrete, bold, and tangible. . . . He is the hero of one of those terrific dramas of upstart genius which in England lead to Parliament Hill and in Italy to Vesuvius. Mussolini is Vesuvian. He is capable of a rush of blood to the head, a tower of rage, a surge of demoniac wilfulness, that may end in smoke, lava, destruction.' Hackett wrote with Corfu in mind. Nine years later came Abyssinia.

He is nothing if not frank. In October 1937 he said in a speech in Bologna, 'I hold out a great olive branch to the world. This olive branch springs from an immense forest of eight million bayonets, well-sharpened and thrust from intrepid young hearts.' (Bulletin of International News, Vol. XIII, No. 10.)

In an interview with a German journalist he exclaimed, 'We have made a big step forward. We have forged the Rome-Berlin axis. This is the beginning of a European consolidation process. Understand – I do not believe in the United States of Europe. That is a Utopia, an impossibility with historical and geo-political limitations. . . . We are experiencing a change of epoch, a total break-up of political and social ideologies. The democracies are done for. They are – centres of infection. The future turns away from collectivism, from the uncertain reaction of the masses. Democracies are like sand, like shifting sand. Our State-political ideal is rock-granite peaks.'

Soon the Duce began to back up his words – in Spain.

Violence

‘There are those who have to be crushed by truth before they can understand it.’
– MUSSOLINI

‘Not believing in force is the same as not believing in gravitation.’
– TROTSKY

Mussolini's first published work, written when he was twenty-one under the strong influence of Nietzsche, was an essay on the philosophy of force. The concept of force has always fascinated him. Yet, as he says, violence should be ‘surgical’, not ‘sporting’; defining the terror in Italy as ‘national prophylactics’, he wrote that certain ‘individuals should be removed from circulation as the doctor removes an infected person from circulation.’ At one point in his career, early in 1921, he resigned – extremely temporarily – the leadership of the Fascist movement, in protest at violence which he considered excessive by squadristi bands. He did not, however, abolish the squadristi till 1927, when their work with castor oil and clubs was safely done.

Mussolini's considered opinion on the subject of violence is the following:

‘Was there ever a government in history that was based exclusively on the consent of the people and renounced any and every use of force? A government so constituted there never was and there never will be. Consent is as changeable as the formations in the sands of the seashore. We cannot have it always. Nor can it ever be total. No government has ever existed which made all its subjects happy. Whatever solution you happen to give to any problem whatsoever, even though you share the Divine wisdom, you inevitably create a class of malcontents. . . . How are you going to avoid that this discontent spread and constitute a danger for the solidarity of the state? You avoid it with force – by employing force inexorably whenever it is rendered necessary. Rob any government of force and leave it only with its immortal principles, and that government will be at the mercy of the first group that is organised and intent on overthrowing it.’

There have been five or six attempts to assassinate Mussolini; he is a profound fatalist, but not so much so that severe precautions to guard him are not taken. The story is that only one man in Rome, the chief of police, can or cannot tell Mussolini what to do; the Duce obeys him in regard to routes he takes. There are some streets in Rome he never travels on. On the other hand, he travels daily from home to office without special guard.

Hitler, the story goes, keeps a small revolver in his desk drawer. Suicide would be understandable with Hitler if his régime collapsed. Not so the Duce. Mussolini, a compact gorilla, will not perish by such facile means.

Psychograph

Dr. Wilhelm Stekel, the Viennese psycho-analyst, has made a fascinating study of Mussolini. His will to power, his intense sense of great historical mission, may, according to Stekel, derive from bipolar tendencies of love and hatred of his father. Mussolini père was the first man of the native village. So young Mussolini became the first man of Italy. The boy, as a socialist, identified himself with his father; then differentiating himself, he kicked socialism overboard. The turning-point of Mussolini's life was, Stekel believes, his flight from Italy to Switzerland, which may well have been a flight from paternal influence. His father was sent to prison by the local police; now Mussolini sends father substitutes to prison.

Mussolini must always lead. As a schoolboy he sat at the third table, the one reserved for the poorest boys; he has never forgotten this humiliation. Climbing mountains, he records that his only pleasure is getting on top and resting there, the victor of the heights. As a bricklayer, he wanted always to put the very topmost brick in place. The fact that he was a mason is of psychological significance, Stekel believes. He was a builder first of houses, then of the house of Italy.

Throughout his whole life there has been conflict between the journalist in him and the artist. Like all newspaper men, he wanted to write novels and dramas. He learned to play the violin.¹ The men he chiefly admires, aside from Caesar and Napoleon, are imaginative writers – Shakespeare, Goethe, Balzac, Petrarck, Pascal. He himself was a failure as a poet; therefore he set out to make his life a work of art. He became a dictator partly because great creative art was denied him.

His life, Stekel says, has been to some extent a regression to childhood; he wants to be a stoic, to compensate for juvenile humiliations and defeats; he is fascinated by the history of Rome, which was the youth of his own country. ~~Julius Caesar he thinks was the greatest man who ever lived. He has identified himself with Caesar closely.~~

¹ In a vivid interview with George Seldes he explained what music – especially Italian music – meant to him.

(Like Caesar, a minor but interesting point, he is sensitive to bad weather.) The only rival to Caesar in his political affections is Napoleon, whom he always thinks of as an Italian. It is of some significance that his Napoleonic play described the Hundred Days: the period when Napoleon, returning from Elba, flung himself finally against destiny.

Mussolini hates Hitler because he can tolerate no rival dictator. There must be no second Duce. He has striven not only to check and defeat Hitler (as in Austria after the Dollfuss murder) but to outdo him. Hitler left the League of Nations; but Mussolini, in effect, made war on it. Hitler asked meekly for colonies, and got none; Mussolini carved one from Ethiopia.

In Caesar's time, as Mussolini showed Rome in the gigantic new historical tablets he has conspicuously set up near the Forum, Britain was merely an outpost of the Roman empire. In the eighteenth century Britain beat Napoleon, humiliating him at Elba and St. Helena. And in modern times Britain has sought to transform the Mediterranean, the Roman sea, Mare Nostrum, into a British lake. It is not entirely fanciful to think that Mussolini has visions of vindicating Caesar and avenging Napoleon.

What Fascism Is

When Mussolini took power he had no programme except to retain his job. He admits this candidly. But he quickly found a programme, which derived from a desire to replace the class struggle, which – certainly – he had done more than most men to intensify, by some sort of class collaboration. This was the origin of Fascism in practice. The contrast to Hitler is striking. Hitler came to power with a very definite programme, and soon lost it; Mussolini, devoid of programme, quickly invented one.

The outlines of Fascist economy are known to everyone. Private property, private profits, are preserved, but under strict state control. The entire productive capacity of the country, theoretically represented by employers and employees both, is organised into a series of twenty-two 'corporations', from which deputies to the lower chamber of parliament will be chosen. Representation will be on a basis of occupation instead of geography; a deputy will represent, say, the hotel business instead of the province of Turin.

The scheme was put forward cautiously, and expanded very slowly; in 1936 it was still an embryo structure. Every corporation contains three supervising delegates of the Fascist party; each corporation is headed by a member of the cabinet or an under-secretary, appointed by Mussolini. The deputies, moreover, are 'voted' into the chamber from an approved list chosen by the Grand Fascist Council; electors are privileged simply to say Yes or No to the whole list. Mussolini's two general 'elections' have been grossly dull affairs.

The state, being supreme, regulates economy for its exclusive benefit. Fascism may be, spiritually, 'an attempt to make Romans out of Italians', but physically it made Italy a prison. 'Fascism is a series of ideas turned into a person,' according to Gentile; and the peculiar person and character of Mussolini determined the repressive shape it took.

Mussolini told an English publicist late in 1935 that he would find no orthodox capitalism surviving in Fascist Italy. And in a famous speech to the National Council of Corporations he announced that the world economic crisis of 1931-34 had bored so deeply into the capitalist system that it had become an organic crisis of the system itself. "To-day," he said, 'I declare to you that the capitalist method of production is finished.'

Indeed one may assemble a seemingly impressive list of anti-capitalist forces in the corporative state. No employer may discharge labour without government consent. No capitalist may undertake such comparatively minor independent activity, as, say, enlarging his factory, without state approval. Wages are determined by the government; the employer may hire labour only at government labour exchanges. A factory owner may not liquidate his business without state permission; the government controls his sources of credit; and it takes a large share of his income in Draconian taxation.

On the other hand, the disadvantages to labour under Fascism are infinitely more severe. Liberty, in a Fascist system, ceases; the question for the individual is whether the merits of the régime compensate its loss. Workers have lost their right to bargain; their trade unions have been dissolved; they are the weaker party vis-à-vis the employers in the syndicates; they are still subject to the crises of capitalist economy; their wages may be (and have been) mercilessly deflated by decree; above all, they have lost the right to strike. The capitalist on the other hand, even if he has suffered inconvenience, maintains his fundamental privilege, that of earning private profits. Fascism as Mussolini introduced it was not, probably a deliberate artifice for propping up the capitalist structure, but it had that effect. The restriction on the mobility of capitalism was in effect 'a premium which the capitalists were willing to pay in order to get full security against the demands of labour'.

Mussolini, in his essay on Fascism in the Enciclopedia Italiana, begins by saying how a series of 'aphorisms, anticipations and aspirations' were welded by time into 'an ordered expression of doctrine'. He sketches the history of Fascism by describing the things it combated: (1) Pacifism, (2) Marxian Socialism, (3) Liberal Democracy. 'War,' he writes, 'alone brings up to its highest tension all human energy and puts the stamp of nobility upon the peoples who have the courage to meet it.' He attacks the materialist conception of history; 'Fascism, now and always, believes in holiness and heroism.' And as to democracy: 'Fascism denies that the majority, by the simple fact that it is a majority, can direct human society; it denies that numbers alone can govern by means of a periodical consultation, and it affirms the immutable, beneficial, and fruitful inequality of mankind.'

His best passage is devoted to Fascism as the totalitarian expression of the state:

'No doctrine has ever been born completely new, completely defined, and owing nothing to the past. . . . The foundation of Fascism is its conception of the state, its character, its duty, and its aim. Fascism conceives of the state as an absolute, in comparison with which all individuals or groups are relative, only to be conceived of in their relation to the state. . . . The state, as conceived of and as created by Fascism, is a spiritual and moral fact in itself, since its political, juridical, and economic organisation of the nation is a concrete thing; and such an organisation must be in its origins and development a manifestation of the spirit. . . .

'The Fascist state is unique, and an original creation. It is not reactionary, but revolutionary, in that it anticipates the solution of the universal political problems which elsewhere have to be settled in the political field by the rivalry of parties, the excessive power of the parliamentary régime and the irresponsibility of political assemblies; while it meets the problems of the economic field by a system of syndicalism which is continually increasing in importance, as much in the sphere of labour as of industry; and in the moral field enforces order, discipline, and obedience to that which is the determined moral code of the country.'

And he ends the essay by an urgent appeal to imperialism: 'For Fascism, the growth of empire, that is to say the expansion of the nation, is an essential manifestation of vitality.'

CHAPTER XIV

WHO ELSE IN ITALY?

'If I advance, follow me; if I retreat, kill me; if I die, avenge me.'

- MUSSOLINI.

'There is no revolution that can change the nature of man.'

- MUSSOLINI.

MUSSOLINI is three things: the Duce (leader) of the Fascist party, the Capo del Governo, or prime minister, and the head of the Grand Fascist Council, the highest organ of government in Italy. The three posts quite distinct, merge in his person. As Capo del Governo, he is theoretically responsible to the King; as Duce of the party, he appoints the Grand Fascist Council and presides over it. The Grand Fascist Council controls parliament. Hitler, in Germany, has united party and state; he is Reichsführer. Not so Mussolini, though the effect is the same. In the U.S.S.R., Stalin, in contrast to Mussolini, is – in theory – appointed by and is responsible to the other members of the central committee of the communist party, whereas in Italy the members of the Grand Fascist Council are Mussolini's underlings. Stalin, however, like Mussolini, keeps party and state theoretically separate.

The Duce is the only dictator who, so far as is known, has made arrangements for his succession. The Grand Fascist Council numbers about twenty-five men; its membership, except for ex-officio and life members, shifts continually and is secret, and it meets in secret. (The secretary of the party and certain other dignitaries are members so long as they hold their party or cabinet jobs; the three surviving quadrumvirs of the March on Rome – Balbo, De Bono, and De Vecchi – are life members.) If Mussolini dies, the Grand Council has the duty of submitting a list of men from which the King will choose a successor. Three names are, at present, understood to be on the list, selected in advance – of course – by Mussolini.

Mussolini told Ludwig that there will never be a second Duce; he meant obviously that there will never be a second Duce like himself. The men around him are, indeed, small fish. There is no Goering in Italy, no Kaganovitch. Whenever a subordinate like Grandi or Balbo becomes too prominent, Mussolini who doesn't like the luxury of seconds in command, contrives to get rid of him. De Bono was removed from Abyssinia as soon as he had captured Adowa and Makale. The present secretary of the party, Starace, holds on to his job by almost unique tactics of subservience; if unwisely he becomes too powerful, he will get the sack.

The Duce is the Fascist system; if he dies, can it survive him? The temptation is to answer in the negative, but one should not forget the precedent of other countries. Four post-War dictators have died: Lenin, Dollfuss, Alexander of Jugoslavia, and Pilsudski. In each case the systems they established – they differed enormously, of course, in scope and spirit – survived.

Dux and Rex

The King provides assurance of some sort of continuity – if he wants it – because he still has the right to name the new prime minister. Mussolini differs from all other dictators in that he preserved a symbol of permanence above him.

Vittorio Emanuele III, born in 1869, is the doyen of European kings, having reigned thirty-seven years. He acceded to the throne on the assassination of his father. His formative years were spent in the army. He married a Montenegrin princess, Elena. The two great decisions of his life were the dismissal of Giliotti in 1915, which brought Italy into the War, and his acquiescence to Mussolini's March on Rome. He is an enthusiastic numismatist. He is mild, well educated, and, like almost all Italians, intelligent. His salary is 11,250,000 lire per year, or roughly £200,000. His relations with Mussolini are, contrary to gossip, excellent.

Nevertheless the little story is told that Vittorio Emanuele greeted the Abyssinian war with satisfaction.

'If we win,' he is reported to have said, 'I shall be King of Abyssinia. If we lose, I shall be King of Italy.'

Orderlies and Underlings

The job of the secretary of the Fascist party is to make the mistakes. Mussolini gives him all the inside work to do; when he has made himself sufficiently unpopular by exerting discipline, refusing promotions, picking out men for jobs, and so on, he is dismissed and replaced by someone else. Since 1919, when the party was organised, there have been six secretaries; in other words it takes an average of two and a half years for one to outlive his usefulness. Bianchi, one of the quadrumvirs, the first secretary, was involved in the Matteotti business, and Mussolini dropped him. His successor, Giunta, was one of D'Annunzio's legionnaires in the attack on Fiume. The next was Roberto Faranacci, boss of Cremona; he was too violent even for the Duce and to-day he is an obscure and forgotten figure. Next came Augusto Turati, a more capable and respectable man, who managed to hold the job for four years; he is now, however, interned on the island of Rhodes. Following him was Giurati; he was the author of the Fascist Ten Commandments. The present incumbent is a cautious watch-dog, Achille Starace.

It happens that Starace has exophthalmic eyes, somewhat like Mussolini's, and he is accused of slavish physical imitation of his master when, as often happens, his eyes pop and roll. A minor victim of megalomania, within safe bounds, he maintains an imposing office, and is supposed to exercise his fingers with a mechanical device in order to strengthen his handshake. Starace, as long as he holds to the secretaryship, is deputy chairman of the Grand Council, and his influence on party personnel is great. He is also the head of the Dopolavoro movement which is an effort to supervise Fascist leisure as well as working hours. His job makes him unpopular; his honesty is however admitted. Starace has made only one blunder so far, his announcement that letter writers should say Evviva Il Duce in their correspondence. The next day one of Mussolini's typical anonymous and scornful editorials in the Popolo d'Italia repudiated the idea; he didn't want to copy the Heil Hitler of Nazi Germany.

Much closer to Mussolini personally is Count Galeazzo Ciano, his son-in-law, the new foreign minister. His father, Count Costanzo Ciano, a former minister of communications, is president of the chamber of deputies, and one of Mussolini's closest associates; Count Ciano, Senior, is supposed to be one of the three men on the succession list of the Grand Fascist Council. The younger Ciano, able and intelligent, entered the diplomatic service and worked first as secretary of embassy in South America, then as consul-general in Shanghai, then as minister of propaganda; later he served in Abyssinia. He was very popular with the newspaper men in Rome.

His friends on one occasion were somewhat shocked at his light-hearted description of the modern technique of massacre.

Interviewed after one of his bombing exploits in Ethiopia, young Ciano was reported to have said:

'When you see a concentration of Ethiopian troops, you give them a few rounds with a machine-gun and they scatter and hide in the long grass. Then, when you fire a few more rounds at random, each of them thinks the bullets are falling near him, and they promptly emerge and run in all directions, when you can pop them off in real earnest.'

— (Evening News, October 17, 1935.)

After signing the six-point accord with Germany in 1936, which created the Rome-Berlin axis, young Ciano was quoted by the New York Times in a remarkable interview as follows: 'My pet plan — a close tie-up with Germany — has become a reality.'

Young Ciano did not have an easy time as foreign minister. Spain was exploding, the Mediterranean crisis intervened, and his relations with Britain continued to be troublesome. It seemed that Neville Chamberlain, following an Anglo-Italian 'Gentleman's Agreement,' did everything possible to conciliate Mussolini, but without much success. The Italians were not represented at the coronation of George VI; for a time Italian journalists were withdrawn from London.

Another comparatively powerful subordinate is Edmondo Rossoni, under-secretary to the Duce in his capacity of Capo del Governo, who spent many years in America as a labour organiser. Rossoni was the man who built up Mussolini's labour syndicates.

Balbo

Italo Balbo, reputedly the inventor of the castor-oil treatment for recalcitrant non-Fascists, 'a Fascist from the first hour' and Mussolini's whilom 'right hand', was still in 1937 exiled in Lybia, of which province he was governor. He was given no part in the Abyssinian campaign, of which, it is believed, he (like the general staff) at first strongly disapproved. Balbo was packed off to Lybia in June 1933, after his dramatic and successful flight to Chicago from Rome. His name may not be mentioned in an Italian paper more than once a month.

The story was that Mussolini exiled Balbo first because his spectacular success in aviation had made him too popular. But another reason was apparently Balbo's close friendship with Umberto, the Crown Prince. In 1932 and 1933 Umberto had anti-Fascist leanings; grimly Mussolini changed the army oath of allegiance, cutting out the reference to the King's 'royal successor'. The report was heard that the Duke of Aosta, a great favourite with the régime, might displace Umberto as heir-apparent. Balbo at the time was Umberto's 'man'. Now, most of those well-informed think, the King has prevailed upon Umberto to see the foolishness of his ways. But Balbo still is very close to Umberto; every once in a while he flies from Lybia to Naples, where the Crown Prince lives, and conspicuously stays in the palace for a day or two.

Balbo is the only man in Fascist Italy who even now, within limitations, does what he pleases. Once, when he was air minister, the Duce disapproved of his aviation budget; Balbo, arriving in the Palazzo Venezia, saw that the usual chair next to Mussolini's desk was missing, while his master remained seated. This meant that Balbo was being disciplined like a schoolboy; he would have to talk standing up. So promptly he sat down – on Mussolini's desk.

Tall, copper-bearded, a picturesque as well as arrogant figure, Balbo was born in Ferrara, near Bologna, in 1897. He enlisted in the army as a boy, and won decorations in his 'teens; he founded a newspaper at twenty; he took part in the D'Annunzio adventure and was among the first to join Mussolini in 1919. In the braggadocio days, he was conspicuous among the bludgeoners; he captured Ravenna from the socialists, besieged Parma, and for a time was expelled from the party. At the age of twenty-six he was first commander of the Fascist militia; then he became under-secretary of national economy, finally secretary for air. Before his flight to Chicago he had organised and led similar formation flights to Odessa, around the Mediterranean, and to Brazil.

Balbo is quoted in Finer with a passage which strikingly shows the similarity between the early Fascists and their subsequent analogues in Germany:

'When I returned from the war – just like so many others – I hated politics and the politicians, who in my opinion had betrayed the hopes of the soldiers, reducing Italy to a shameful peace and the cult of heroes. To struggle, to fight in order to return to the land of Giolitti, who made a merchandise of every ideal? No. Rather deny everything, destroy everything, in order to renew everything from the foundations.'

Marshal Emilio de Bono, another of the quadrumvirs, was the first commander-in-chief of the Italian forces in Abyssinia. Born in 1866, a generation older than Balbo, he had a long career as a regular army officer; he was the commander of Mussolini's regiment in the War. Disgusted at the 'collapse' of Italy in 1919 and 1920, he resigned his command of the army corps at Verona and joined the Fascist movement. An amateur musician, he wrote the first marching song of the Black Shirts. He was governor of Tripoli for a time, then minister of colonies.

The Other Warriors

In November 1935, Mussolini replaced De Bono in Abyssinia by Marshal Pietro Badoglio, Italy's most distinguished soldier. The reasons for the shift were several. For one thing, De Bono had done his job, even though the campaign was going slowly. For another, appointment of Badoglio made the business an affair squarely of the regular army, not merely of the Black Shirts. Cleverly the Duce saddled Badoglio with responsibility for making the war succeed. It certainly succeeded, and Badoglio became first Viceroy of Ethiopia and Duke of Addis Ababa.

Marshal Badoglio had a routine but brilliant military career. He was born in 1875, and joined the artillery in 1890; he has fought in every Italian war since, and was one of the survivors of Adowa in 1896; he has been decorated for bravery seven times. After the Great War he was variously a senator, ambassador to Brazil, chief of the general staff, and president of the army council. He could have crushed the March on Rome had the King given assent. It is generally believed that at the beginning he opposed the Abyssinian war; the general staff prepared a report on the possibilities of the campaign which Mussolini, it is said, tore up in rage. But Mussolini was right; they were wrong.

General Rudolfo Graziani, at first the leader of the Somaliland forces, knows Africa well; he spent seven years as junior officer in Eritrea, and from 1926 to 1930 he was the 'pacifier' of Cyrenaica. Military experts call him Italy's best soldier. He succeeded Badoglio in the supreme Abyssinian command. In 1937 came an attempt on his life in Addis Ababa; a massacre of Ethiopians followed. . . . General Attilio Teruzzi, chief of staff of the Fascist militia for seven years and in 1935 the commander of the Black Shirts in Abyssinia, is an army officer who turned politician. Like De Bono, he gave up military life to join Mussolini after the War. A vigorous man with a heavy black beard, he has been a deputy, an under-secretary of the interior, and governor of Lybia. . . . General Giuseppe Pavone, a regular officer with much experience in Africa, joined the D'Annunzio freebooters and was cashiered by the Nitti government; Mussolini restored his rank. He invented the black tasselled cap, something like a fez, which is part of the Black Shirt uniform. It was Pavone who organised the march of the Padua division to the Austrian frontier after the Dollfuss murder. Pavone's father was sentenced to death for a patriotic plot against the Bourbons in Naples in 1848. He is known as diavolo nero, black devil. In Abyssinia he commanded the native Eritrean troops, the Askaris.

Diplomats

Baron Pompeo Aloisi, the man who represents Mussolini at Geneva, did well with a stiff and ticklish job; he had to maintain a modicum of self-respect and persuade others of the independence of his judgment while he was, in the strenuous days of October 1935, merely the Duce's mouthpiece. His ferocious master raged in the Palazzo Venezia; at the Council table in Geneva Aloisi had to give the impression of steadiness and poise. Mussolini gave him impossible orders like the injunction to accuse the Abyssinians of 'aggression', which he had to present plausibly and with a straight face.

Born of a noble Roman family in 1875, Aloisi began life as a naval officer, then turned to the diplomatic service. He had wide experience; in 1919, far from the squadristi in Tuscany and the Emilia, he was Press officer of the Italian delegation at the Paris peace conference. He was a diplomate de carrière, one of the few whom Mussolini retained, and he served as minister or ambassador in Copenhagen, Tirana, Bucharest, Ankara, and Tokio. He was the agent of Mussolini's penetration of Albania; in Japan, a cultivated man, he found time to write a book on Japanese art. The Duce sent him to the League in 1932. He worked well as chairman of the League committee organising the Saar plebiscite.

For a time the Duce's favourite for work in foreign affairs was Dino Grandi, but at the Lausanne reparations conference the French and British composed an agreement excluding Italy, and Grandi was punished by being sent to London as ambassador — there, presumably, to learn better the manners of the subtle British. Mussolini was supposed to have been furious at him in the summer of 1935, because Grandi had not warned him that the British would take the lead in imposing sanctions against Italy. But many besides Grandi were deceived. Grandi, once a squadristi leader, has long since lived down his salad days. He is connected with the Sorima company at Genoa, which recovered the gold from the submerged liner Egypt, one of the most remarkable of modern marine exploits. A man of great personal charm, he is probably the most popular of the ambassadors at the Court of St. James's.

The former under-secretary for foreign affairs, Fulvio Suvitch, well known for his foppish clothes, was born in Trieste, then part of Austria. During the War he crossed the lines from the Austrian to the Italian army. He is of no consequence nowadays in execution of policy; in 1936 he was named ambassador to the United States.

'Jesters do oft Prove Prophets'

'There is a widespread belief,' wrote the Manchester Guardian recently, 'that dictators are iron-souled and thick-skinned; the truth is that they are the most sensitive creatures in the world. . . . It is the leaders of the democracies who are tough and wiry. They can stand criticism, and either bear it in good part or put up with it. Not so the dictator; an unfriendly remark or even good-humoured banter is so intolerable that the very sinews of the state are felt to shake dangerously in response to the jangled nerves of the dictator.'

Jokes in the U.S.S.R., as we shall see, mostly deal with the rigours of the Five-Year Plan; German jokes are based most often on the Terror, jokes in Italy perhaps significantly – aside from those international jokes which are applied indiscriminately to all the dictators – deal mostly with corruption. Mussolini himself is above any whisper of financial irregularity, but if the current of suppressed laughter in Italy is any indication, the rank and file Fascists think poorly of the integrity of petty bosses and sub-leaders. The party, of course, controls all the best jobs; on this fact the wits flourish.

Most Italian jokes hinge on the word mangiare, which means two things, 'to eat' and 'to graft'.

Little Romano Mussolini, for instance, says to the Duce at the dinner-table. 'Father, what must I do to become a great man like yourself?' Mussolini answers, 'Mangi e taci' (Eat and be quiet).

The most Fascist of animals is the elephant; because it first makes the Fascist salute – and then eats. The Fascist insignia have been placed on all locomotives – because they 'eat up' the road. Mount Vesuvius was recently given an honorary degree, because it opened its mouth – to eat. A traveller stops a policeman, 'Where can I eat best in this town?' Reply: 'At the party headquarters.'

Another type of story goes like this. At a congress of veteran Fascists someone calls out, 'To whom does Italy belong?' Chorus:

'A NOI!' (to us). 'To whom belongs victory?' Chorus: 'A NOI!' 'To whom the Duce?' Chorus: 'A NOI!' Then a voice interrupts: 'To whom belongs work?' (A chi il lavoro?) The chorus stops in embarrassment, then begins to sing the Fascist anthem, Giovinetta.

No street has ever been named for Mussolini. This is because the word via means not only street, but 'away'.

CHAPTER XV

WAR IN ABYSSINIA

'Our future lies to the east and south, in Asia and Africa.'

— MUSSOLINI.

'Statesmen only talk of fate when they have blundered.'

— MUSSOLINI.

'If it wasn't for myopia,
We could see to Ethiopia.'

IN October 1935 the campaign against Abyssinia began. Mussolini, cold-blooded as only an Italian can be, set out, 'in violation of covenants he was pledged to support, to rob and conquer a country he had promised to defend'.

For years he had threatened a push to the east. The campaign should have surprised nobody. He had cast hungry eyes at Tunis; an arrangement between Soviet Russia and Turkey prevented an adventure some years ago in Anatolia. He needed room — colonies — for Italy to expand in. But his habit of bluster, had, lamentably enough, persuaded folk in Western Europe that he was bluffing. Why did he choose 1935 as the time for the adventure he had long foretold? And why, as proof that his bite was worse than his bark, did he pick Abyssinia?

One must pause a moment to describe Italy's fundamental realities, Mussolini or no Mussolini, in economics.

Italy has forty-two million people, as many as France, crowded into one-third the arable land of France. The population increases by the astounding total of four hundred and fifty thousand births per year. 'We are hungry for land,' Mussolini himself put it, 'because we are prolific, and intend to remain so.' Of the forty-two million Italians, overwhelmingly the largest proportion are engaged in agriculture; the country is only ten per cent industrial. No less than twenty-one per cent of the population is illiterate. The country cardinally lacks raw materials; it has no rubber, tin, nickel, tungsten, mica, or chromium; it is dependent on imports from abroad for ninety-nine per cent of its cotton, eighty per cent of its wool, ninety-five per cent of its coal, ninety-nine per cent of its mineral oil, eighty per cent of its iron and steel, ninety-nine per cent of its copper. Despite Mussolini's 'battle of the grain', it does not produce enough food for its own requirements; it must import fifteen per cent of its meat, and twenty per cent of its grain. Finally, Japan excepted, Italy has the most exposed coastline of any important country in the world.

Mussolini's job in the first years of Fascism was, in general terms, an attempt to transform a country so meagrely favoured by nature into a great power. He succeeded, but at a frightful cost. Taxation increased till it ate up no less than thirty-eight per cent of the total national income. The trade balance remained monstrously adverse. The budget deficit increased from a modest £11,000,000 in 1930-31 to £60,000,000 in 1932-33, and £107,000,000 in 1933-34, which was twenty-five per cent of the total national revenue. The preparations for the Abyssinian campaign, before the war began, cost two thousand million lire, or roughly £33,000,000. The Italian gold reserve was halved; Mussolini, who had sworn to defend the lira to the 'last drop' of his blood, was forced in effect to leave the gold standard. The war itself cost an incalculable sum.

Now it is quite true, as H. R. Knickerbocker and Dorothy Thompson have pointed out, that under dictatorships the economic laws which apply in democratic countries may be simply suspended. Hitler or Mussolini can do tricks with money that are impossible under orthodox laissez-faire capitalism. Economics under Hitler and Mussolini became purely a political question; the only issue was how long the people would bear the merciless strain of dictatorial manipulation. Even so, the internal situation of Italy, towards the end of 1934 and the beginning of 1935, contributed to make an 'external diversion', so popular among dictators, necessary. The very reasons why he should not have made war were those why Mussolini did. 'It was not a question of whether he could afford to fight, but whether he could afford not to.'

I do not think, however, that Mussolini (who like Hitler is not much interested in economics) was prompted to war exclusively by economic factors. They were immensely buttressed by politico-nationalist considerations.¹ Mussolini is not the man who thinks of countries or frontiers predominantly as functions of economic stresses. His mind much more directly seized on territory as a symbol of political prestige. One should never forget the secret treaty of London, which tempted Italy to break the Triple Alliance and enter the War on the side of the allies. By that treaty Italy was promised more spoils of victory than it got.

¹ Nationalism is, of course, partly an economic phenomenon.

Mussolini's foreign policy was, on the whole, a failure. He stood in a contradictory position; Italy, one of the victor powers, wanted treaty revision just the same. The French blocked him off from Tunis; his penetration of Albania was a costly and not very lucrative experiment; his Four-Power Pact, an attempt to form a sort of twentieth century Holy Alliance on quasi-revisionist grounds, was still-born; he played the wrong side in the Arabian wars; he tried to keep the Balkan pot boiling, and was defeated by a Balkan Pact virtually uniting Jugoslavia, Rumania, Turkey, and Greece against him; he did, however, extend importantly his sphere of influence to Austria and Hungary.

But politics alone might not have sufficed to cause the war. The climate of Fascism is high and strenuous. Like all dictators, Mussolini was 'a prisoner of prestige'. He had to keep on doing something. Hitler was stealing far too much space from him in world headlines. He was personally a warrior and imperialist; he talked of 'imperialism' as the eternal and immutable law of life. Every rational or objective consideration told Mussolini, a strikingly intelligent man, that the Abyssinian war was a difficult and dangerous business. It had long been a truism in European politics that Italy was permanently condemned to dependence on Great Britain, because of its exposed coastline and the control of the Mediterranean by the British fleet. Mussolini flouted this truism. An interesting example of the importance of personality, perhaps of megalomania, in politics. The Duce was not alarmed by the pessimistic reports of the geologists in Abyssinia. He knew what its chief crop was - glory.

'Upon What Meat Has This Our Caesar Fed?'

Mussolini himself would lift an eyebrow at it, but parenthetically one should quote the following manifesto by the well-known Italian futurist, F. T. Marinetti, called 'War Has a Beauty of Its Own':

1. Because it fuses strength and kindness. Strength alone tends to cruelty and kindness to debility, but the two together 'generate solidarity and generosity'.
2. Because it assures the supremacy of mechanised man, equipped with gas-masks, megaphones, flame-throwers, and tanks, over his machines.
3. Because it begins the long-dreamed-of 'metalisation' of man.

4. Because it completes the beauty of a flowery meadow with its machine-guns, 'passionate orchids'.

5. Because when the symphony of rifle fire and artillery bombardment stops, the songs of soldiers can be heard and the perfumes and odours of putrefaction can be perceived.

6. Because it 'genially remoulds terrestrial scenery' with its inspired artillery.

7. Because it creates new architecture, such as the heavy tank.

8. Because it exceeds in violence the battles of the angels and the devils.

9. Because it definitely cures man of individual fear and collective panic, with a refined and stylised heroism.

10. Because it rejuvenates the male body and renders the female one more desirable.

11. War has a beauty of its own because it 'serves towards the aggrandisement of the great Fascist Italy'.

— (Manchester Guardian, November 15, 1935.)

Another factor was that intangible and elastic concept known as national 'honour'. The same factor, we have seen, helped bring Hitler power in Germany. Italians, despite Mussolini, still smarted under the humiliation of Adowa where the Abyssinians had massacred them in 1896, and of Caporetto, where the Austro-German army had broken through in the worst defeat suffered by a western power in the Great War. Mussolini, like Hitler, was avenging an earlier degradation, returning to Italy, as on a bloody salver, its self-respect.

The Dogs of War

Why did Mussolini choose Abyssinia? For the simplest of reasons, that Italy grew up too late to join the other imperialist powers picking colonial fruit, and Abyssinia was the only territory left. Why had Abyssinia been spared the colonial 'attentions' of Great Britain and France? Because it was a country where settlement by Europeans was costly, where the wealth of natural resources was dubious, and where, above all, peculiarly impregnable warrior tribes made military conquest difficult. Dislike of the Italian campaign should not make anyone think that the Abyssinians are a gentle or charming people.

As to difficulties of settlement, the following excerpts from an article in the New Republic (August 7, 1935), are illuminating:

'An Italian settler going to Ethiopia to engage in farming would need to take with him complete supplies, including building materials for his home. Ethiopia could not serve as an outlet for Italy's surplus population unless the government heavily subsidised each emigrant. For about forty years Italy has made sporadic attempts to colonise Eritrea, which, in the uplands, resembles much of Ethiopia. The present European population of Eritrea is 4,565, most of whom are government officials. . . .

'There is another drawback to mass emigration to Ethiopia - with an estimated native population of ten million. Many natives develop into highly skilful workmen, as has been demonstrated on two Belgian coffee plantations already established there. . . . Throughout Africa, the individual white farmer, depending on his own labour, has never succeeded in competing with the native worker under white management. An Italian peasant farmer in Ethiopia would either drop to the native standard of living or starve to death.

'In attempting to use Ethiopia as a source of raw materials, Italy will be confronted with its obdurate geography. . . . For years adventurous white men have prospected in Ethiopia and tried to interest European capital in their supposed discoveries. None of them¹ has yet told a story convincing enough to obtain backing. . . .'

But Abyssinia's 'obdurate' geography did not prevent the great powers from the usual imperialist aggressions. As far back as 1891 and 1894, Britain and Italy set up 'spheres of influence' in Abyssinia; that of Italy was not very valuable, but the British sphere included the Lake Tsana region, from which flow the headwaters of the Blue Nile, which irrigates the Sudan and Egypt. In 1906, although Abyssinia's independence was recognised by Italy, a Tripartite agreement formally partitioned the country into French, British and Italian spheres; this was a typical pre-War imperialist treaty. Abyssinia protested against it, but no one paid attention.

In 1915 the secret treaty of London, mentioned above, provided that 'in the event of France and Great Britain increasing their colonial territories in Africa at the expense of Germany, those two powers agree in principle that Italy may claim some equitable compensation, particularly as regards the settlement in her favour of the questions relating to the frontiers of the Italian colonies of Eritrea, Somaliland, and Lybia'.

Abyssinia entered the League of Nations in 1923, with France and Italy as her godmothers. Italy was particularly eager to press Abyssinian membership, in order to forestall suspected encroachments in Ethiopia by Great Britain. This was a mistake of Mussolini's. Anyone who tries to hoodwink the British suffers for it - in the long run. Had not Abyssinia been a member of the League, the British could not have mobilised world opinion to harass Italy in the 1935-6 war.

¹ Except Francis W. Rickett, whose Standard Oil concession of August 31, 1935, was shelved.

In 1925 Sir Austen Chamberlain and Mussolini negotiated an agreement confirming their respective spheres of influence in Abyssinia. Referring to this document, Mussolini angrily stated in September 1935, that 'it divided - you understand me - virtually cut up Abyssinia'. The British wanted to build a dam near Lake Tsana. In return for Italian approval and support, they promised 'to recognise an exclusive Italian economic influence in the west of Abyssinia' and to support an Italian project for a railway through Abyssinia connecting Eritrea and Somaliland. But Abyssinia was a member of the League in 1925 and the Emperor Hailé Selassié (then the Regent) protested so vigorously at Geneva that the agreement lapsed.

In 1928 Italy signed a treaty of 'friendship, conciliation, and arbitration' with Abyssinia. In Article Two, each government pledged itself 'not to take any action detrimental to the independence of the other'. Then seven years passed, until Mussolini struck.

The initial incident, that of Walwal on December 5, 1934, was called a 'frontier' squabble, but in reality, as even Italian maps showed at the time (they have been hurriedly changed), Walwal is about a hundred miles from the Somaliland border, well inside Abyssinian territory. The fight began when a joint Anglo-Abyssinian frontier commission discovered an Italian military detachment camped at Walwal. The British retired; the Abyssinians fought. Thirty-two Italians, one hundred and ten Abyssinians were killed. This was probably the pretext Mussolini was waiting for; at any rate a flaming ultimatum, in the Corfu manner, descended on Addis Ababa; the Duce - it was all very 'pre-war' - demanded that the Abyssinians apologise, salute the Italian flag, and pay £20,000 indemnity.

What happened thereafter is well known. The British Empire began to move.

Albion Perfide?

Mussolini must have assumed that Great Britain would not object to his adventure. Otherwise it is doubtful if even the Duce would have launched it. At any rate he accuses the British of having seriously misled him. On January 29, 1935, he sent Signor Grandi to the Foreign Office, 'inviting the British Government to consider specific agreements for a harmonious development of the Italian and British interests in Ethiopia'. He was, he said, willing to 'table his case'. The British answered 'evasively'. The Foreign Office did not, apparently, look with favour on the Duce's proposal; on the other hand it seems to have given no very definite warning of opposition.

When it became clear that Britain was opposing him and lending the immense weight of its influence to the League, Mussolini began to storm and bluster. He snarled at one interviewer that he was 'not a collector of deserts',¹ when the Committee of Five proposed minor territorial adjustments. He threatened to leave the League 'at once' if sanctions against Italy were applied; and did not do so. While Eden, Laval, and Aloisi put their heads together in Paris, he mounted a howitzer shouting encouragement to his Black Shirts, saying that he would go forward 'with Geneva, without Geneva, or against Geneva'. Sir Samuel Hoare made a historic speech to the League assembly, pledging Britain to 'collective maintenance of the Covenant in its entirety, and particularly for steady and collective resistance to all acts of unprovoked aggression'.

Mussolini's reply to this was twofold. First, he proceeded with the war, and on October 3 invaded Abyssinia. One of his rare hypocrisies, he claimed that Hailé Selassié was the aggressor, who, as Vernon Bartlett ironically put it, 'by ordering withdrawal of his own troops in his own territory, had committed a provocative act'. Second, he issued a series of tumultuous statements and interviews which, for Mussolini, were remarkably plaintive in tone.

'We are on the march,' he told the Morning Post. 'It is too late now to tell us to stop. . . . Look at Portugal, and Belgium, and Holland. They all have fruitful colonies. Surely Italy must have fruitful colonies too. As soon as we get such colonies, Italy will become conservative, like all colonial powers. . . .' To the New York Sun he complained: 'Why are we condemned for what you yourselves do whenever the need arises? You never hesitated about war when your interests were involved. Think about Mexico and Cuba and your own civil war between North and South. How did the United States end slavery?' He said in one speech, 'The wheel of destiny moves towards a goal—the rhythm has become faster and cannot now be stopped. An attempt is being made to commit the blackest injustice against Italians, that of refusing them a little place in the sun. Until it is proved to the contrary, I refuse to believe that the people of Great Britain wish to shed their blood and to drive Europe towards catastrophe to defend a barbarous country unworthy of ranking among civilised peoples.'

¹ He told Ward Price of the Daily Mail, 'I got 110,000 square miles of Sahara desert from the French a little while ago. Do you know how many inhabitants there are in that desolate area? Sixty-two!'

He foamed with rage at England. Britain, he did not need to point out, while sitting on roughly one-quarter of the world, while dominating an empire of 450,000,000 people (384,000,000 of whom represent coloured races), was frustrating his tiny adventure, a colonial adventure of the kind that Britain had herself so many times indulged in. It was no use trying to explain to him that the British Empire was built up before the War, that the Covenant of the League of Nations put a different face on the piracy of new territory. Britain had fought the Boer War. Britain suppressed the 320,000,000 people of India. Britain had not stopped Japan in Manchuria. Mussolini raged.

And indeed others than Mussolini were able to assemble a list of British imperialist adventures.

From 1788 till 1925 Great Britain fought, it was calculated, approximately twenty campaigns or wars to keep the route to India open.¹ The British fought Napoleon on the Nile, at Trafalgar, at Aboukir, and indirectly in Copenhagen, which they wantonly bombarded. The British intrigued in Egypt, annexed Aden, invaded Abyssinia, penetrated Persia, and joined the Turks against Russia in the Crimean War. The British acquired Cyprus, extended their control of Egypt, advanced into the Sudan, and fought the Great War to prevent the German Drang Nach Osten.

In October the French newspaper Gringoire, an organ of the Right, published an article entitled 'Should England be Reduced to Slavery?' Its unamiable strictures caused a minor diplomatic incident, and M. Laval apologised to the British ambassador. 'England's policy,' murmured the Gringoire,² 'consists of troubling the earth so that she can rule the seas. . . . I think English friendship the most cruel present the gods can give a people. When I see England, the Bible in one hand, the League of Nations Covenant in the other, upholding the cause of the weak or righteous, I can't but believe she has her own reasons. . . . I have seen His Majesty's police slashing Egyptian students in the streets of Cairo. I saw the ¹ Britain was not, of course, the only country with an imperial policy. The United States of America in the same period acquired Texas, the Panama Canal, the Philippines, etc.

² Janet Flanner's translation in the New Yorker.

Lord Mayor of Cork dying in London in a criminal's cell. I saw convicts, disguised by Lloyd George as soldiers, shooting down the Balbriggan martyrs at their cottage doors. . . . Is it indispensable for human happiness that the route to India be British?'

Recently the New Leader printed a list of 'independent territories' which the British Government has annexed since 1870. Baluchistan. Burma. Cyprus. Wei-hai-Wei. Hong-kong. Koweit. Sinai. North Guinea. South Guinea. East Guinea. Solomon Islands. Tonga Islands. Sudan. Uganda. British East Africa. British Somaliland. Zanzibar. Transvaal. Orange Free State. Rhodesia. British Central Africa. Nigeria. In addition the British Empire was in effect enlarged by mandated territories acquired by the peace settlements of 1919. Palestine. Transjordan. Tanganyika. Togo. Cameroons. South-West Africa. Apparently the British themselves began to think this was a little too much. And the Italians greeted with interested scepticism Sir Samuel Hoare's careful hints in his Assembly speech of September 11, 1935, that colonial raw materials were inequitably distributed.

Sanctions

British policy in regard to sanctions that might be applied to Italy for violation of the Covenant of the League of Nations¹ did not become clear till late in the teeming summer of 1935. At the beginning the government took no strong line to prevent war. 'It was,' wrote the anonymous author of Inquest on Peace, 'passionately sincere in its desire that the lion and the lamb should lie down together. But it was hazy whether the lamb ought to be outside or inside the lion.' Once Mussolini had committed himself too far to go back, with a hundred thousand troops in Abyssinia, British policy sharpened. The Admiralty filled the Mediterranean with warships, and Eden pushed economic sanctions at Geneva. Thus it was commonly bruited about that the British were 'out to bust' the Duce. This was far too blunt a way to put it. What happened was that Britain was perplexed by the difficulty of the decision it had to make. Its policy, founded on a double negative, was equivocal. It did not want a war; at the same time it did not want permanently to affront Mussolini. On the one hand, the British disliked the rupture of peace entailed by the Abyssinian campaign; on the other they did not want to rupture the collective security system by forcing Mussolini out of the League, and into the hands of Hitler.

¹ For the League itself see Chapter XXXIV below.

Germany, as always, remained the chief preoccupation of British foreign policy in Europe. A perfectly good case for or against sanctions against Italy could be made with only the German imperative in view. One might have favoured sanctions, on the ground that vindication of the League system and a sound setback to Mussolini in Abyssinia would discourage Hitler from breaking the peace later. Or one might have opposed sanctions, on the ground that they would weaken Italy, shake up Central Europe, and give Hitler an excellent chance to expand and profit.

There was also the question whether Britain could stop Mussolini without risking a much bigger war than the Abyssinian one. The British cabinet was divided on this issue. Mussolini himself provoked a preliminary decision against Italy, by rashly filling Lybia with Italian troops and giving the impression of Italian designs on Malta and Egypt. The British fleet did not concentrate in the Mediterranean until after at least several Italian divisions, for no purpose connected with the actual campaign in Ethiopia, had been sent to Lybia and Cyrenaica.

The reasons for the sanctions policy provisionally adopted were, roughly, the following:

First, as indicated above, the Abyssinian crisis was interpreted as a 'final' test of the League system. The issue was quite clear, whether the League would go into the discard for good, or be made to work. The very fact that Japan in Manchuria had successfully defied the League made it the more necessary for the League powers to assert themselves against Mussolini. Defiance of the Covenant had occurred, without penalties, in distant Asia. Ethiopia – in Africa – was nearer home. Let the Italians succeed in Ethiopia, and aggression would break out in Europe next. Sanctions against Italy were in effect sanctions against Germany later.

Second, the British Dominions, which since the Statute of Westminster have the right to secede from the British Empire, and which are bound together only by the symbol of the crown, were vigorous in support of sanctions policy. There was plenty of idealism at Geneva in September and October in 1935, and South Africa supplied a fair share of it. It became clear to the seasoned and wary brains of Whitehall that the League of Nations might turn out to be an inestimably valuable agency for keeping the Empire solid.

Third, liberal opinion in England, which hated Fascism, was eager to down Mussolini on moral-political grounds.¹

Fourth, an extraordinary informal plebiscite, the 'Peace Ballot', was taken in June in England by the League of Nations Union, under the powerful leadership of Lord Cecil. 11,500,000 people voted, and no fewer than 10,088,000 of them favoured economic and non-military sanctions against an aggressor, and actually 6,748,000 were willing to support, 'if necessary', military sanctions. Now the average total vote in a British general election is only about 20,000,000; obviously the government could not afford to dismiss this registry of opinion by one half of the electorate. The Peace Ballot greatly strengthened the hands of the pro-sanction members of the cabinet, like Anthony Eden, and confounded those who disliked the League.

Fifth, the labour party, the official opposition, obligingly and overwhelmingly approved a sanctions policy.

Sixth, General Smuts pointed out that the Abyssinian war might be interpreted in Africa and elsewhere among British colonies as a war between white and black, something disastrous to British interests.

Seventh, British imperial interests, as outlined above, became involved. Idealism and what is called 'character' play a certain role in British policy, but idealism alone would not have prompted the first vigour of British response to Italian aggression. Idealism plus Egypt, the Red Sea and India turned England against Italy. The conflict was between an old and surfeited and a new and untried imperialism. As soon as Mussolini began to mass troops near Egypt, the British jumped.² Sir Samuel Hoare – till he lost his job – was the luckiest foreign minister in modern times; he was able to write a policy in which idealism and imperialism exactly coincided. Not only God, but the British route to India, was on his side.

Hoare-Laval Plan

But sanctions started slowly and half-heartedly in actual practice.

¹ Dean Inge, writing to The Times, expressed his fear of this. 'I think all friends of the League,' he wrote, 'should beware of their involuntary association with socialists who care nothing for Abyssinia or the League, but who wish to embroil us with Italy because they hate and fear Fascism. If Russia were attacking Afghanistan they would sing a very different tune.'

² At Geneva the story went that 'S. d. N.' (Société des Nations) really stood for 'Source du Nile'.

Oil was not included in the embargo, and British companies actually furnished some of the petrol feeding Count Ciano's planes. And at no time were military sanctions – or closure of the Suez Canal – contemplated by Britain or the League. Even so, a General Election was fought in November in England largely on the peace-and-sanctions issue, and the government, going to the country on a firm League platform, was overwhelmingly successful. Thus it was an acute shock to public opinion when, in December, news of the celebrated Hoare-Laval plan leaked out.

The 'inside' story of this plan seems to be the following. For some weeks experts of the Foreign Office and the Quai d'Orsay were at work trying to hammer out a formula to end the war. On Sunday, December 8th, Hoare went to Paris, had a few hours with M. Laval, and proceeded to a badly-needed rest and ice-skating holiday in Switzerland. A joint Anglo-French statement was issued guardedly noting the progress made toward a settlement. 'There could be no question at present of publishing these formulas,' the statement said. Then – what often happens – someone in Paris leaked. The Monday papers in England were full of more or less authoritative statements of the deal whereby Italy was to be given a good share of Abyssinia as a bribe to call off the war.

The original statement had made it clear that the arrangement had not yet been sanctioned by the British cabinet. Therefore the cabinet had to do something in a hurry. It happened that the inaugural session of the London Naval conference was held in London this morning – Monday, December 9th. I remember how everyone was surprised at the extreme briefness of Mr. Baldwin's opening address, and his apology that he must depart at once to attend to urgent business. It certainly was urgent, though few people knew then what was going on. The cabinet, its hand forced by the leakage in Paris and the growing agitation of public opinion, had to decide whether to accept the Hoare-Laval plan, or repudiate Sir Samuel Hoare. It decided to accept the plan. Everything happened in a hurry. One story is that there were no maps in the cabinet-room, and ministers had to approve the plan without any idea of how much Abyssinian territory Italy was to get.

The next day Baldwin made an amazing speech in the House, as more and more details of the plan became known. Baldwin said that his 'lips were sealed', but that if the trouble were over he could make such a case that 'not a man would go into the Lobby against us'. This piquant observation aroused, naturally, much curiosity.

Hoare himself was still away. On the 13th the Anglo-French proposals were at last published. They were even worse than had been anticipated in sanctionist circles. And on the 14th it was revealed that Hoare had sent the British minister in Abyssinia a telegram urging him to use 'his utmost influence' on the Emperor to give 'careful and favourable consideration' to the proposals.

The storm in the country grew. Britain rose in bewilderment, indignation, and alarm. Eden had the unpleasant job of explaining to his friends how the British and French governments – after all – were selling the Abyssinians down the river. The Times and Daily Telegraph, usually staunch supporters of the government, began to waver. Personage after personage descended on Baldwin at 10 Downing Street and told him that the business simply would not do. Even the Tories revolted. Hoare came back from Switzerland. Somebody had to be the culprit, someone had to suffer or the government itself might have been overthrown. Pitched overboard like a blood sacrifice, Hoare resigned. And the plan was buried.

In his speech to the House of Commons on December 19th Hoare could not tell the whole story. But he made a dignified and impressive defence of his policy. There were many who thought that it was Baldwin who should have resigned, not his foreign minister. After all, the cabinet as a whole had presumably sanctioned Hoare's dealings with Laval and certainly had approved the plan. Baldwin, incidentally, has never 'unsealed' his lips. No word of explanation has ever come from him as to what, precisely, he meant. Ever since the cartoonist David Low has portrayed him with sticking-plaster across his mouth. One famous caricature shows Baldwin with the corpse of the League behind him, muttering through the plaster, 'You know you can trust me.'

Six months later, in cooler days, it was easier to make an explanation. Baldwin almost certainly was alluding to the possibility that sanctions, especially if they were implemented by an oil embargo, might make Mussolini angry enough to perish in a cloud of glory by attacking the British fleet. What the British were doing was an attempt to stave off a general European war. There were subsidiary considerations also. One was the feeling in some British circles that Mussolini was losing the Abyssinian war, and that if he lost he might collapse in Italy, which would shake the whole European structure. Another – quite contrary – was the conviction of some well-informed people that Mussolini was not losing, but winning, the war, and that it was best to buy him off with a slice of Abyssinia before he took it all.

If Mussolini had accepted the Hoare-Laval proposals, before they were dropped by the British, what an odd irony it would have been!

Finis

Early in 1936, still worried by sanctions, Mussolini decided to transform a colonial campaign into a major engagement, a real war, and with almost half a million troops in Africa, using poison gas, the result could not long be in doubt. Even so, the speed and vigour of the Italian advance confounded all experts. They did not realise how badly armed and led were the Abyssinians, nor the immense advantage of mechanisation even in guerilla fighting on such difficult terrain. Badoglio's campaign was a military and engineering masterpiece. By April 15th the Italians had captured Dessie, having advanced the 120 miles from Quoram in the incredible time of nine days, and on May 5th they were in Addis Ababa. The Emperor fled.

Hitler's victory in the Rhineland, the victory of Mussolini in Abyssinia, the war in Spain, are branches of the same poisonous tree. Qualified as the victories may prove to be, they indubitably represent the temporary triumph of swift, hard-hitting Fascism against the slow motion and diffusion of power of the democracies. Mussolini's triumph was followed by Fascist forwardness everywhere in Europe, as those who had hoped to check him with sanctions had foreseen: Greiser in Danzig, Franco in Spain, put on their several performances. Hitler and Mussolini may some time come to conflict over Austria, but at present they represent almost identical dynamic forces. What is going on in Europe to-day is a struggle between law and right on the one hand, and the big fist and the machine-gun in the other. The struggle is between respect for international obligations and the most forthright kind of adventurous and predatory nationalism. The adventurers have won two important skirmishes. But democracy may have the final word.

Mussolini, a discerning and powerful gambler, set the Italian people on new paths. But the future of Italy, like that of Germany, depends on the British Empire. The cruel and youthful obstreperousness of the Fascist states must sooner or later come into conflict with the mature vitality of England. So now we pause in this counter-clockwise tour of Europe and turn to Britain.

CHAPTER XVI

ENGLAND: THE RULING CLASSES

'England is not to be saved by any single man.'

— WILLIAM PITT.

'This royal throne of kings, this sceptred isle,
This earth of majesty, this seat of Mars,
This other Eden, demi-paradise. . . .'

AT one and the same time, England, a puzzling nation, is the world's firmest monarchy, strongest oligarchy, and freest democracy, and its empire is the only one that survived the War. It is also an island of country houses, built on a foundation of coal, which, in spite of the strenuous difficulties of the age, remains prosperous. Two per cent of the property owners of England own sixty-four per cent of the national wealth. These persons comprise a fluid and impregnable ruling class, or caste, which is one of the most remarkable phenomena of the world to-day.

It was produced partly by geography; it supports itself by ownership of land or by trade in all the markets of the world; it pays service to conscience and religion; the House of Commons and the House of Lords are its clubs; it believes in freedom of speech and the democratic process; it responds very sensitively to public opinion; among its bastions are the Navy, the Bank of England, and the civil service; it lives in public schools and country houses; its empire is its greatest pride.

The ruling classes absorb an acutely disproportionate share of the national income and of economic power. Take, for instance, the land of London. One peer owns no less than two hundred and seventy acres in the West End. Only about forty thousand of the eight million inhabitants of London own any land at all, and the really valuable slices are in the hands of about twenty men.¹ There are about one hundred thousand men and women in England with incomes over £2,000 per year, who take sixteen per cent of the national income; there are eighteen millions whose wages, under £250 per year, are only fifty-six per cent of the national income. Of those who die in England, 'only one in four leaves as much as a hundred pounds' worth of property'.

¹ See Hugh Dalton, Practical Socialism for Britain, p. 151.

The House of Commons represents a considerable concentration of wealth; a writer in the Sunday Express, found, for instance, that in 1934 170 members of the House of Commons held 650 company directorships. One M.P. had 34. The New Statesman recently published an analysis of the occupation of the 729 peers who comprise the House of Lords. 246 owned land. 112 were directors in insurance companies, 74 in financial or investment houses, 67 in banks, 64 in railway companies, 49 in shipbuilding or engineering companies, and so on. Interestingly enough, of the 729 peers, 371 or more than half, never once spoke in any debate in the House of Lords from 1919 to 1931; 111 of them never voted in a single division; the average number taking part in a division was 83.

The most important basic fact in British public and political life is geographical. The British Isles are islands. And, as the school-boy put it in a famous definition, 'an island is a piece of land entirely surrounded by the British navy'. The English, a mixed race – composed of Angles, Saxons, Jutes, Romans, Normans, Teutons, Celts – grew up and coalesced in comparative isolation. Since Elizabeth they have been free from intrusion by others and were free to intrude themselves upon others. And their island heritage gave them a long view, because for generations they looked out to the sea. Geography has produced, in this imperial race, some magnificent provincialism. Two or three winters ago a heavy storm completely blocked traffic across the Channel. 'CONTINENT ISOLATED', the newspaper posters couldn't help saying.

The weather has in fact – the same thing is true of many countries – been an important political factor. In Austria, for instance, as I shall try to show when we reach Central Europe, the enervating Föhn is responsible for many of the eccentricities of Austrian behaviour. So in England, fog and damp have chilled the national bones. I know that from one point of view the English climate is the finest in the world, because, as it has proudly been pointed out, you can play golf almost every day in the year; you may get wet, but you can play. The Englishman has his umbrella within reach almost from birth; growing up, he is conditioned in preparation for any emergency, not merely those in the realm of climate. The British Empire was the inevitable result of geographical and meteorological factors; anyone who has survived a few

London winters knows why the Empire Builders sought the sun.¹

England produces only about three-fifths of the food it needs and only about twenty per cent of the raw materials which it transforms into manufactured goods for all the markets of the world. But it is a country rich in the right things – coal and iron and steel. It is, of course, the most highly industrialised state in Europe. It produces so much wealth that roughly forty per cent of its trade is export trade. And it gives the world not only steel and shoes, cotton shirts and locomotive engines, razor blades and cantilever bridges, but ships, insurance, and financial services. I have mentioned the disproportion in individual British incomes. But the national income as a whole is much greater than that of any other European country; according to G. D. H. Cole, it is £87 per capita in England, as against, for instance, £46 for Germany, £43 for France, and only £28 for Mussolini's Italy.

The ruling classes make most of their money by trade. Some members live on the land, but trade is the predominant national occupation. 'The British,' it has been written, 'are serious about their trade. It is the one thing in life they are serious about. In England's case, uniquely, God and Mammon are one. Mammon's appetite is tempered by the knowledge that honesty is the best (paying) policy. God is goodness, justice, love, mercy, and five per cent on a sound investment.' Factors of many sorts contribute to make a trade respectable and profitable; as Douglas Jerrold wrote referring to older days, 'No consideration of social justice must interfere with the right to buy cheap and sell dear.' Britain is one of the few countries in the world where the use of the Union Jack, the national flag, is permitted in the advertising of commercial products. Even the Crown Jewels pay interest; to see them in the Tower, you pay sixpence.

For six days a week the Englishman worships at the Bank of England, and on the seventh day at the Church of England. For religion is a powerful force on the side of the ruling classes. Uniquely among modern nations, the country has a national church, 'an island religion', serving this one people. Associated with it, drawing strength from its cool and privileged ritual, is the factor of morality. The standard of public life in England is the highest in the world; honour and idealism play a part in politics that the suspicious foreigner finds it difficult to understand. Honour and idealism do, of course, correspond as a rule with practical interests. The Germans not only broke a treaty by invading Belgium; they shot an arrow toward the channel ports. But the fact remains, as a diplomat of consequence remarked to a friend of mine, 'England is the most dangerous country in the world, because it is the only one capable of going to war on behalf of another country.'

¹ And a psychologist might say that the national instinct for the accumulation of wealth is associated with the concept of the rainy day.

The ruling classes believe in freedom, in democracy, partly because, as Trevelyan says, freedom and democracy are so much more efficient than despotism. The English people, like the French, have paid a high price for freedom; to gain freedom they had to shed the blood of kings. The execution of Charles I made great inroads on the English conscience, and the constitutional privileges and prerogatives of parliament are, to this day, zealously guarded. One is astounded in reading English history to note the great number of men who had their heads chopped off for freedom. English democracy is conservative, and the Englishman defines the word 'conservatism' quite literally; it means to conserve things. Nothing but a great fire can destroy anything in England.

The parliamentary tradition of Westminster is the envy of the world; and with reason. In a dictatorship, the individual exists as a servant of the state; in democracies, the state is theoretically the servant of the individual. No Englishman forgets this. And, as Stanley Baldwin said in one of his most famous speeches, England has had only ten years of dictatorship in the past three hundred years. The English parliamentarians play the game in the grand manner. After an election the opposing candidates shake hands, exactly as if it had been a game of tennis. When Baldwin became prime minister for the first time, one of the first things he did was to call on Lord Oxford, his most eminent adversary, to ask advice.

Most Englishmen, of course, prize England above party: which is one reason for British capacity for self-government. When a prominent Tory, like Lord Curzon, dies, the labour members eulogise him in the House of Commons. During the General Strike of 1926, as everyone knows, Welsh strikers and police took Sunday off to play football.

¹ One may point out, on the other hand, that few of the many Britons who were profoundly shocked morally by the Abyssinian war noted that at the same time an army of no fewer than thirty thousand Anglo-Indians were 'cleaning up' the Afridis on the North-West frontier of India. Not that the two cases were analogous.

Even the poorest of the poor are loyal. Visitors from abroad to the Tyneside and Durham are incredulous that poverty of such miserable proportions does not produce revolution. There are almost two millions of unemployed in England, and of them perhaps a million can never hope to get jobs again; but not only is the thought of revolution an absurdity, but a good proportion of the unemployed vote conservative instead of labour. One reason is the fear of the middle classes that labour is not 'experienced' enough to form a successful government. Another is the social insurance and paternalistic legislation of modern England; the country buys off unrest by paying £2,000,000 per week to support the unemployed.

The instruments of domination by the ruling classes are several. There is, for instance, the Admiralty, which is a law unto itself. There is, for instance, the Bank, 'a most peculiar institution'. The elasticity of the nobility, which constantly enriches itself by vulgar blood, is another factor. So is the public school – the fetish of the 'old school tie'. Of the fifty-five members of the British cabinet and junior ministers, no fewer than sixteen went to Eton, six to Harrow, and seventeen to other public schools of recognised quality.¹

'When the call came to me to form a government,' Mr. Baldwin has written in On England, 'one of my first thoughts was that it should be a government of which Harrow should not be ashamed. I remembered how in previous governments there had been four or, perhaps, five Harrovians, and I determined to have six. To make a cabinet is like making a jig-saw puzzle fit, and I managed to make my six fit by keeping the post of chancellor of the exchequer for myself. . . . I will, with God's help, do nothing in the course of an arduous and difficult career which shall cause any Harrovian to say of me that I have failed to do my best to live up to the highest ideals of the school.'

Another instrument of rule is the country house. No one should think that a group of aristocratic plotters spend the week-end putting their heads together for conspiracy or mischief. It is ever so much more casual and less sinister than that. But suppose that the editor of a great newspaper wants to meet a promising labour politician. The country house, like that of the Lady Astor at Cliveden, is the perfect place. Wealthy and influential people, often bored with their formal duties, go to the country in order to get out of London, the ugliest and most uncomfortable city in the world; they invented the long week-end to stay away as long as possible. Their métier is politics; they talk politics; and they make politics, quite spontaneously.

¹ Of the ninety-seven ministers who have been in the cabinet since the War, forty went to either Oxford or Cambridge. But a university career is not quite so important ritualistically as education in a great public school.

The Tories, it was explained to me when I arrived in London, make a practice of lassoing the best brains in England. When someone arises with brains who is not a Tory, the Tories promptly attempt to appropriate him. Social flattery is an excellent weapon. It was the country-house system that helped to divert Ramsay MacDonald from nationalisation of the mines to nationalisation merely of the cabinet. One must be to the country house born. Otherwise, it goes to one's head, feet, and tongue. Let any really intelligent and vigorous champion of the Left arise, and presently he will find his way thorny with the invitations of the rich.

Newspapers are also a powerful instrument of rule. The ruling classes pay little attention to Lord Rothermere of the Daily Mail or Lord Beaverbrook of the Daily Express, the 'Press lords' of the nineteen-twenties, who, for all their shouting – and despite Beaverbrook's impishly attractive personality – are nowadays without much influence. Their ill-advised campaign to wreck Baldwin proved to be a boomerang. But Geoffrey Dawson, the editor of The Times, is certainly one of the ten most important people in England. And J. L. Garvin of the Observer is a potent influence, even though he took the unpopular side in the Abyssinian war, and lost all contact with reality in regard to Spain.

Then consider the civil service, which is the incorruptible spinal column of England. My office boy, if he were reasonably presentable and adaptable, could conceivably fill the office of chancellor of the exchequer or minister of war; the permanent staff would carry on. Men like Sir Robert Vansittart, the permanent head of the Foreign Office, and Sir Warren Fisher, the head of the treasury, are among the characters who really rule England. About most of these all-but-anonymous men – Vansittart, who has published belles lettres and poetry, is an exception – little is known. They avoid the limelight. They flourish in the shadows. And their power is immense. Consider, for instance, the indispensable quality of a man like Sir Maurice Hankey, whose very name is unknown to millions, but who combines in his person the posts of secretary to the cabinet, secretary to the privy council, and secretary to the committee of imperial defence. What is more, other Vansittarts, other Fishers, even other Hankeys, shadows behind shadows, are continually in course of training, to take over their masters' jobs after retirement. No man is indispensable. The mechanism is self-perpetuating.

England is a thicket of stylistic difficulties, and the ruling classes are able to entrench themselves behind a massive hedge not only of privilege but of tradition. In no country may a man be so easily penalised for gaucherie; and a young M.P. told me the other day that it had taken him about two years to master the intricacies of parliamentary procedure. What is one to say about a country where the 'Lord' Privy Seal may be a commoner, where the King's youngest son only became a peer after his marriage, where the monarch may not even enter the House of Commons? The English constitution is not a document. No British M.P. may resign (he must make application for the 'Chiltern Hundreds'). And the prime minister gets no salary as prime minister!

The ruling classes employ propaganda far more artful than any ever dreamed of by Dr. Goebbels. They often stoop to censorship, but always in the quietest possible way; it is usually censorship not by ukase but by voluntary conspiracy. Every editor in Fleet Street knew, for instance, the approximate strength of the British Fleet in the Mediterranean last summer; but no one printed it, not even the opposition papers. The method of persuasion is the only one employed. 'Look, my dear fellow,' an official of the Foreign Office may say, 'I can't ask you to do this for me, but it would be awfully decent if you would.'

The ruling classes, by virtue of the single-member constituency system, gerrymander elections in a manner which, if it happened in Bulgaria or Turkey, would make liberal editors explode in indignation. In the 1931 'National Government' election for instance, the Baldwin-Simon-MacDonald coalition got 556 seats for 14,500,000 votes, whereas the opposition, with the quite respectable total of 7,200,000 votes, got only 59 seats. In the election of November 14, 1935, the government polled only fifty-four per cent of the votes cast, but got 428 seats out of 615. If the voting had been by proportional representation, the government's majority would have been 48 instead of 250. But as it happened, the opposition got no less than forty-six per cent of the total poll – and was condemned to impotence for another four or five years.

The ruling classes, finally, despite the misery of the 'Special' Areas, have produced not only complete political stability but a striking measure of industrial recovery. There were Cassandras in the middle twenties who said that Britain was 'done'; they were wrong. Together with domestic strength came a renewal of predominance in international affairs. Britain, which had been tempted towards isolation by imperial preoccupations, joined once more, in full voice, the concert of European powers. And to strengthen his hand in the turbulent period that faced him, Baldwin inaugurated a tremendous programme of rearmament, called 'national defence', to cost at least £1,500,000,000.

Miscellany

Among many other forces and counter-forces, players and counter-players, in the broad arena of English political life:

Cricket and the ritualistic attitude to fair play that it has produced.

The nonconformist conscience.

The decline in the birth-rate, which, according to competent estimates, will reduce the population to thirty-three million by 1985.

Personalities like the Very Rev. W. R. Inge, the former Dean of St. Paul's, General Critchley, the patron of greyhound racing, and Lord Dawson of Penn, the late King's physician.

The bold and irreverent cartoons of David Low, the greatest caricaturist in the world.

The open forum in Hyde Park, something unique and cardinal.

The father-to-son tradition in politics; not only does Randolph Churchill seek to follow Winston, but labour politicians pass on their hopes and aspirations: the son of Arthur Henderson is in the House of Commons. So are Lloyd George's children.

The publishing house of Victor Gollancz, Ltd.

The fact that politics are the first profession of the land.

Letters to The Times.

Willingness of party or personality to admit defeat, and play the game loyally thereafter. Winston Churchill fought his own party's India Bill with magnetic persistence for a number of years; when it became law he re-entered the party fold.

The rule of thumb.

Economists of various breeds: J. M. Keynes, Sir Arthur Salter, Sir Josiah Stamp, Sir Walter Layton.

The formidable severity of English law.

An ingrained pacifism in the younger men, who dislike their former military titles. Captain Duff Cooper, the first lord of the Admiralty, is Mr. Duff Cooper; Captain Anthony Eden is Mr. Anthony Eden; Captain Ormsby-Gore, the colonial secretary, is Mr. Ormsby-Gore. Some years ago Major Walter Elliot went so far as to issue an announcement saying that he was to be known thereafter as Mr. Walter Elliot.

The intelligence service of the Admiralty.

The investigations of Royal Commissions.

The Countess of Oxford and Asquith.

Professor Harold J. Laski.

The death duties.

The radicalism of many Oxford and Cambridge undergraduates.

The tradition of venerableness. A politician may be still a promising young man at fifty-five. Mr. Baldwin once referred to the 'tender age' of one of his parliamentary secretaries, a stripling of forty-two. Baldwin himself did not enter the House of Commons until he was forty-one.

The habit of the Archbishop of Canterbury occasionally to write to The Times appealing for public prayer in regard to a political issue, e.g. in February 1935 when the India Bill was nearing completion.

The fantastic number of humanitarian societies.

The cathedral close.

Clubs.

The Federation of British Industries.

The pacifism of the late Canon 'Dick' Sheppard and the Oxford group.

The apparent disposition of women to have an Oedipus Complex on their fathers. The British is a masculine civilisation. Women wear mannish clothes; they hunt foxes; they are fierce parliamentarians.

The village pub.

The tradition of what is 'done', and the fact that everybody who is 'in' has known everybody else since childhood.

Imperialism, which extends beyond Empire bounds. Portugal for instance is almost as much in the British sphere of influence as Ireland. So – following the return of George II of the Hellenes – may be Greece.

Punch.

The high salaries paid judges, members of the cabinet, and ambassadors.

Inner Circle?

One should not be tempted to think that the ruling classes comprise a body which could meet in a room, elect a chairman, and perform the organic functions of domination. England possesses no close, tight oligarchy like that represented by the regents of the Banque de France. One might say that a certain number of persons comprise an 'inner-ring', for instance Mr. Baldwin, Lord Tyrrell (former ambassador to Paris), Lord Salisbury, the great economist Sir Josiah Stamp, Lord Hailsham, Geoffrey Dawson of The Times, Neville Chamberlain, Lord Derby, Montagu Norman, and Sir Maurice Hankey. But no two observers would agree on the names to be included, Baldwin aside. The 'ring' is not a ring in other words: at least not a fixed immutable ring. Indeed the great strength of the ruling classes is fluidity. One may be a member of one of the oldest aristocratic houses in the British Isles, and yet not be 'in'; mere wealth has very little to do with privilege; brains alone are not enough; character may be.

Royal

King George V, who died in January 1936, was one of those rare kings, it is realised now, who made history. First, he supported Mr. Asquith in the great struggle with the House of Lords in 1910, by agreeing to create enough new peers to inundate the old aristocracy, if the Lords persisted in their refusal to accept the 'People's Budget' of the Commons. Second, he 'sent for' Baldwin instead of Lord Curzon in 1923 to succeed Bonar Law as prime minister, and thus paved the way for the long Baldwin premiership later. The next year, though labour could form only a minority government, he named Ramsay MacDonald prime minister, making possible the first Socialist Government in British history. Finally, on his own initiative he travelled from Balmoral to London on August 22, 1931, in the middle of the financial crisis, and persuaded MacDonald to form a National Government.

King George – considerable tribute to the stability of British politics – had only five prime ministers in the twenty-five years of his reign which were celebrated by the Silver Jubilee of May 1935. The Jubilee, silver in name, was worth its weight in gold. Not only did it symbolise the return of comparative prosperity to Britain (and incidentally bring millions of pounds in trade to London), but it expressed with great brilliance the affection with which the nation regarded the Royal Family. The King was intensely touched, and, since he was a modest man, astounded at the colossal mass emotion his presence evoked. The origins of the Jubilee were obscure. There was no precedent for the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the accession of a monarch. No one, when the matter was first discussed in the House of Commons, anticipated the depth and range of celebration that occurred.

The King of England, no matter who he happens to be, is a personage of great political consequence. First of all, the Palace is the ultimate citadel of the ruling classes; the men who rule England live in widening concentric circles around the throne. Second, since the Statute of Westminster the King is the chief link between England and the self-governing dominions. Third, the King is a sort of gyroscope stabilising the machinery of government. The King is – and must be – outside party politics (as was demonstrated in no uncertain way by Edward VIII's abdication), but he exerts serious influence through his choice of advisers and he has the right to appraise and consult in all matters of foreign and domestic policy.

Foreign Policy

British foreign policy, which is extraordinarily constant, changing little (as Sir Samuel recently said) from generation to generation, is based, broadly speaking, on the concept of the balance of power with Britain holding the balance. 'All our greatest wars,' Sir Austen Chamberlain put it, 'have been fought to prevent one great military power dominating Europe, and at the same time dominating the coasts of the channel and the ports of the Low Countries.' Trevelyan has said, 'From Tudor times onwards, England treated European politics simply as a means of ensuring her own security from invasion and furthering her designs beyond the ocean.' In modern times, following this policy, Britain has tended, when France was stronger than Germany, to support Germany; when Germany was stronger than France, to support France. Since the War the League of Nations has been a convenient mechanism to this end; if the League ceases to serve British purpose, Britain ignores it. Since, with great shrewdness in 1919, Britain obtained the entrance of the Dominions (and India) into the League as separate States, she is always able to dominate its deliberations. Before the War it was a cardinal principle of British politics not to commit the nation to any action on the continent in regard to hypothetical future contingencies. Locarno, the apex of the balance of power policy, changed this. All these considerations are of course, dominated by the principle of Pax Britannica; Britain, a great trading nation, wants peace.

Another and very curious minor factor should be mentioned. It causes much puzzlement to observers on the continent. The British think even of foreign policy as a sort of game. Unlike the Germans or the French, to whom politics is a matter of life or death, the British are capable of extreme detachment in the direction of their complex foreign affairs. Europe is a sort of stage; the play that is going on is a play. And if someone misses his cue, or blunders with his lines, the average Briton always assumes that the drama is merely in rehearsal, and can be played over again – better.

Roughly there are two groups in the Foreign Office. The first comprises pro-leaguers who are idealists. They hope through a system of collective security to bring Germany into the amicable concert of great powers. They view war as a literal horror; the Abyssinian crisis meant to them the collapse of moral law in Europe. The second group, mostly represented by older men, are willing enough to give the League a bit of rope, but they distrust the efficacy of the collective security principle, and put their hopes in (1) a powerful navy, and (2) isolationism. The opinions of this group served to encourage Germany, because isolation – non-interference in Europe – is tantamount to taking the German side.

Strong pro-German influences exist in England, even since the dictatorship of Hitler. Here is a summary of them:

(a) Many Tories fear Bolshevism, and stupid ones think of Hitler as a sort of guarantee against future encroachments westward on the part of Russia. England and Germany should be allies against Russia, the great communist enemy. Moreover, Russia has always been a 'traditional' foe; communism serves to make it doubly dangerous.

(b) The City of London, with enormous investments in Germany, allows itself to be dazzled by the brilliance of Dr. Schacht.

(c) A great many powerful persons in Britain dislike France and the French, and therefore tend to be pro-German.

(d) A group of personalities around Lord Lothian (formerly Philip Kerr, Lloyd George's alter ego at the Peace Conference), admire Hitler; they think that a stable Germany, under Hitler, will ensure peace. Lothian is a Christian Scientist, and Christian Scientists, who do not believe in death or evil, find it easier than members of other religions to accept at face value Hitler's promises.

(e) The Times (Lothian and Geoffrey Dawson, its editor, are close friends), is of course, irrefragably independent; its Berlin correspondence has performed noble service in revealing Nazi brutality and prejudice; but it dislikes the communists more than the Nazis, and sometimes has rather more than given Hitler the benefit of the doubt in matters of foreign policy.

(f) A tendency exists in England to be sorry for Germany in its role of conquered but honourable foe. (By contrast, the French will never forgive Germany for the injustices of the Treaty of Versailles.)

(g) Oddly enough, some forces in the labour party are pro-German. It is obvious that British socialists and trade unionists under Naziism would suffer even as their German colleagues, but labour foreign policy in Great Britain was erected on dislike of the Versailles Treaty and plea for fair play to Germany, and even outrages performed upon labour by Hitler did not much modify pro-Germanism in some circles of the British Left.¹

If war with Germany should come, influences like the foregoing will have borne some responsibility for it; because just as in 1914 the delusion that Britain could afford to remain neutral might be the one thing prompting Hitler to hostilities.

The British reply to Hitler's programme of rearmament was a typical compromise; first, the British bought off competition at sea by the Anglo-German naval pact of June 1935; second, the cabinet announced measures to triple the British Air Force.

I have heard one highly fanciful explanation of the naval pact (which was more an affair of the Admiralty than the Foreign Office). It runs as follows. Britain fought Germany in 1914 because the Germans were underselling Britain in world markets, with consequent industrial depression and unemployment at home. Now Japan is in a position to do precisely the same thing. The Anglo-German naval treaty gives Germany command of the Baltic;² Britain knows that Japan will attack the U.S.S.R. only if Germany is strong; if Japan and Germany join to make war on Russia, all three will be weakened, much to Britain's imperial advantage.

All this produces a certain paradox. Among personalities it is that they are pro-German and (many of them) anti-Fascist at the same time, which is tantamount to eating an orange, say, with one half of the mouth, and spitting it out at the same time with the other half. In policy it is that Britain is rearming might and main against Germany, the only conceivable enemy, while a powerful share of opinion does what it can to strengthen the putative enemy's hand.

¹ Harold Laski mentioned once that Woodrow Wilson was responsible for this, because he invented the demarcation between the ruler of Germany and the German 'people'. To many labourites and liberals Hitler to-day is Wilson's Kaiser Wilhelm.

² Even the Polish foreign minister, Colonel Beck, was somewhat shocked at the degree to which the pact strengthened Germany.

Britain is, of course, waiting, playing for time, until its own tremendous rearmament programme is complete.

CHAPTER XVII

THE ABDICATION CRISIS

EARLY in February 1936, I started to write a character sketch of Edward of Wales. I didn't finish it but in rummaging through my notes for that old article I found one of the lines I had contemplated using. I had completely forgotten it. It was, 'Perhaps Edward is one of those kings who will have to make history some day – even if he doesn't want to.'

Edward, the most famous young man in the world, began his brief and startling reign on a note of sensible modernity. He turned the clocks in Sandringham to the right time (they had been set half an hour fast since the time of Edward VII, to give more daylight for hunting). He broke all precedent by flying to London immediately his father died. He addressed Parliament in the first person. On March 1st, he spoke to millions of listeners throughout the Empire on the radio. At once it was apparent that a new freshness, a note of informality and daring, was blowing through royal affairs.

Nervous, headstrong, inclined to be very stubborn, extraordinarily likeable, with great private charm, Edward was always supposed to have been somewhat 'pink'. He had strong humanitarian feelings about poverty, slums, and the under-dog. When he visited Austria in 1935 he embarrassed the clerical authorities by insisting on visiting the Karl Marx Hof, the socialist tenement which the year before they had attacked and partially destroyed by shell fire. Though a crown was on his head, Edward was emphatically a people's man. Early in his reign he went to Glasgow to inspect the Queen Mary and stayed to sympathise with the people in its slums. This note in his character caused some political alarm when, in the autumn of 1936, he visited the distressed mining districts in South Wales, saw the unutterably grisly conditions of blight and suffering there, and said – perhaps rashly – that 'something would be done'.

Rather illogically, some whisperers had it that Edward had Fascist or even Nazi sympathies. Incipient Fascists and Nazis are 'pink', too, in that they try to cash in on the sympathies of the labouring class. The Royal Family in England has had a long reputation of being privately pro-German. Edward was rather conspicuously cordial to Von Neurath when the German foreign minister came to London, and some of his friends were good friends of Von Ribbentrop. On the other hand, Edward was cordial to Litvinov, too. And seemingly Edward blasted for ever any talk of Naziness by choosing, of all persons in the world, to seek refuge after his abdication with someone who was not only Jewish, but an Austrian Jew of a great international banking family – the kind of Jew that the Nazis particularly detest.

Edward's first months as king rolled along smoothly and easily. He was enormously popular. He swallowed the ritual and stuffiness of monarchy, which he didn't very much care for, with dignity and good grace. He was unconventional, yes; he got rid of some of the oldsters around the Palace and found new friends, yes; but as far as most good informants could judge the way was clear for a long and perhaps uneventful reign, cheerier and more vivid than that of his father, but long, sound, and in the Georgian tradition, nevertheless. The good informants were wrong. Everybody was wrong. A storm gathered around the Palace such as had not been seen in England for a thousand years. The storm was personified by an American, Mrs. Wallis Simpson.

Enter Mrs. Simpson

Such a blazing tornado of words has been spilled on the whole incredible case that it is necessary to foreshorten it drastically. Bessie Wallis Warfield was born in Blue Ridge Summit, Pennsylvania, in 1896, of an old and sound Southern family that had come on hard times. Genealogists even tried to trace her descent to William the Conqueror. She grew up in Baltimore, a Southern belle who was chic and amiable but not particularly distinguished – just one of dozens of pretty, bright young girls – and she caused the most severe constitutional crisis in modern British history and became the central figure of what H. L. Mencken called 'the greatest news story since the Resurrection' because – in 1916 – she met and married a young American naval officer, Lieutenant Earl W. Spencer, Jr.

Eleven years later, in 1927, she divorced him. That divorce doomed everything. In those days Mrs. Spencer could not possibly have imagined, in her most vivid dreams, that the legal dissolution of this marriage would prevent her later from being a queen, and cost the throne of a king who loved her. One divorce would have been enough. The implacable fury of the bishops, the Puritans, the parliamentarians, was directed against Mrs. Simpson not because she was a commoner (the new Queen was a commoner until her marriage to the Duke of York), not even because she was an American by birth, but because she was a divorcee. It was intolerable to their minds that anyone living could have known the person of the Queen.

One divorce, it is clear, was enough to cause catastrophe. Re-marriage after divorce simply filled the cup to angry overflowing. In 1928, freed from Lieutenant Spencer, she married a young New Yorker, Ernest Aldrich Simpson, who had served in the Coldstream Guards, entered a London shipping business, and become a British subject. The Simpsons moved to London (by marrying Mr. Simpson she herself automatically became a British subject) and entered the smart life of young Mayfair people. In 1931 she was presented at court, and a year or so later she and the then Prince of Wales became friends.

There was nothing in the least abnormal or vicious about this. The Simpsons and their circle did nothing that millions of people in the world don't do. They danced; they flirted; they drank cocktails (for some reason the word 'cocktail' always connotes ominous scandal to an archbishop); they had good conversation. Mrs. Simpson was not – and is not – in any sense a vulgar, pretentious, or grasping person. She had – and has – great social grace, modesty, tact, and a very fair wit. She was a great deal more intelligent than many in the Palace circle. She was a comfortable person to be with. She was an excellent influence on the Prince. She treated him like a man and a human being, not as an Heir Apparent and a puppet, and he became deeply devoted to her. Seemingly for the first time in his life, he was happily in love.

While he was still Prince their attachment went forward without embarrassing publicity. Mrs. Simpson was first mentioned in American newspapers in the summer of 1934 during a holiday at Cannes. Later she was a member of a party that accompanied the Prince to Budapest and Vienna early in 1935. When King George V died in January 1936, it became more difficult for the Prince, as King, to keep his personal affairs purely personal. A man can be so public, G. K. Chesterton once wrote, that he can have no private life. The new King determined, thereupon, to bring matters gradually to light. He had always detested sham and humbug. In the summer of 1936 Mrs. Simpson and a party accompanied him on a yachting cruise in the Mediterranean and Ægean. They were widely photographed together on the Dalmatian coast and in Turkey, but few of these photographs were published in England, and none of them identified Mrs. Simpson. The more the King tried to get the matter aboveboard, the more conspiratorial became the British Press to bury any hint of 'scandal'. Twice, as if trying to give a lead to the people, the King saw to it that Mrs. Simpson's name was included in the court circular. Once the occasion was a dinner party at which Mr. and Mrs. Baldwin were present, the other the arrival of Mrs. Simpson and several of her friends at Balmoral.

What happened then was that the King, irritated, decided to settle matters once for all by marriage. The friendship might have gone on gaining slow ground and sympathy. But torrents of gossip were loose. In exclusive circles in England – and everywhere in America – people talked of nothing else. It became known in mid-August that Mrs. Simpson was about to bring divorce proceedings against her husband. The King wanted marriage. He was dissatisfied with the status quo, and perhaps he realised that it was untenable. Mrs. Simpson got her decree nisi on October 27th at Ipswich Assizes. By this time the whole world – Britain excepted, where a voluntary censorship remained in force – was standing in line to see what would come next. In six months, on April 27th, Mrs. Simpson would be free to marry the King and perhaps become Queen, provided the Proctor did not intervene and make a final divorce decree impossible.

But some other things intervened – the Church of England, the House of Commons, and Mr. Stanley Baldwin.

'When I Give I Give Myself'

The storm is bound to break. The Times on November 30th uttered a curious covert warning in an otherwise meaningless editorial; 'The Commons may well prove itself what the country has often required in similar times . . . a Council of State [to govern] in any crisis, foreign or domestic.' The next day, as if by prearranged signal, the Bishop of Bradford struck against the King with the words, 'The King's personal views are his own, but it is still an essential part of the idea of kingship . . . that the King needs the grace of God for his office. We hope he is aware of his need. Some of us wish he gave more positive signs of his awareness.'

Some observers believe that a Palace clique, together with high and stodgy members of the Conservative Party, manœuvred to make the Bishop speak as he did. The clique was offended, so the stories went, not so much at Mrs. Simpson (whom they might have swallowed), but at the King's disregard of ancient norms and traditions, his political 'capriciousness', his alleged determination to be an active ruler, not a mere symbol.

The Bishop himself soon explained that he had not referred to any aspect of the King's private life, only to the fact that the Coronation (mostly a religious ceremony) was coming on and that Edward didn't go to church. He said categorically that when he wrote his address he had absolutely never heard of 'these [Simpson] rumours'. This may quite possibly be true. It may also be true that the Bishop was the innocent victim of subtler powers behind the scenes who put him up to making his address.

At any rate, the British public, that vast mass which was not 'inside' on all the gossip, heard with utter surprise and bewilderment that a Bishop of the Church of England had rebuked the monarch in terms unknown in England for hundreds of years. Why? And for what? What had the King done? The country held its collective head in amazement and alarm. Their curiosity was soon satisfied. By December 3rd the papers had broken the censorship self-imposed through the Newspaper Proprietors Association, and the whole terrific story broke.

Not just the story of Edward's attachment to an American woman with two husbands living. The story of a major struggle over the future of the King himself.

Mr. Baldwin – the account of him in the next chapter may illuminate some of the factors in his complex character – went to the King on October 20th, on his own initiative, for what was in effect a secret meeting at Fort Belvedere. Baldwin reported to the Monarch his alarm at the growing wave of stories about Mrs. Simpson, his fear that publicity was imminent and would damage the Crown, and his concern at the changed situation which might follow the Ipswich divorce.

(No one knew of this meeting between Baldwin and the King until Baldwin spoke in Parliament on December 10th. Nor of the subsequent secret meetings. The country was almost entirely in the dark. Yet one cannot fairly complain to Mr. Baldwin for not having shouted the details from the chimneypots.)

A second meeting took place, at the King's command, on November 16th.

By that date [Mr. Baldwin told Parliament] the decree nisi was pronounced in the divorce case and I felt it my duty . . . to begin the conversation, and I spoke to His Majesty for a quarter of an hour on the question of marriage.

Again you must remember my Cabinet hadn't been in this at all. I reported to about four of my senior colleagues the conversation at Belvedere.

I told him [His Majesty] that I did not think that the particular marriage was one that would receive the approbation of the country.

That marriage would have involved a lady becoming Queen, and I did tell His Majesty once that I might be a remnant of the old Victorians but my worst enemy could not say this of me – that I did not know what the reaction of the English people would be to any particular course of action.

I told him that so far as they went I was certain that that would be impracticable.

I cannot go further into the details, but that was the substance, and I pointed out to him that the position of the King's wife was different from the position of the wife of any citizen of the country. It was part of the price the King has to pay. His wife becomes the Queen. The Queen becomes the Queen of the country, and, therefore, in the choice of the Queen the voice of the people must be heard.

And then His Majesty said to me, and I had his permission to tell you this, that he wanted to tell me something that he had long wanted to tell me. He said: 'I am going to marry Mrs. Simpson and I am prepared to go.'

I said: 'Sir, that is most grievous news and it is impossible for me to make any comment on it to-day.'

So Mr. Baldwin, on his own personal responsibility, told the King on November 16th that the marriage was an impossibility. At this point only four members of the Cabinet had been informed, and apparently there had been no contact at all with the Dominions. Baldwin himself – and only Baldwin – decided that Mrs. Simpson could not be Queen.

The third meeting was on November 20th. Here the possibility of a compromise in the form of a morganatic marriage was first brought up. The King might marry Mrs. Simpson and Parliament might pass a bill – since morganatic marriage does not legally exist in England – specifying that she should not be Queen. Mr. Baldwin does not say who precisely suggested this compromise. His words are simply, 'The suggestion had been made to me.' He does not say specifically that the King suggested it. The King, in his words, merely 'asked me if that proposition had been put up to me'. Baldwin replied 'Yes' and the King asked him what he thought of it. Baldwin goes on:

I told him that I had given it no considered opinion, but if he asked me my first reaction, it was that Parliament would never pass it.

I said that if he desired I would examine it formally. He said he did so desire. Then I said it will mean my putting it formally before the whole Cabinet and communicating with all the Prime Ministers of the Dominions, and asked if that was his wish. He told me that it was, and I said I would do it.

(Meanwhile, among the 45,000,000 people of Britain, not a dozen knew that these tremendous colloquies were going on. Baldwin consulted – he was ‘ashamed to confess’ – none of his colleagues. . . .)

On December 2nd Baldwin saw the King again for the fourth decisive meeting. And Baldwin told him that although his inquiries were not complete, they had proceeded far enough to indicate that neither Britain nor the Dominions would tolerate a morganatic marriage.

In this statement is the crux of the whole story, so far as Baldwin’s conduct is concerned. Were his inquiries correctly performed and did he derive the correct conclusions therefrom? If so, he was right in being the agent whereby Edward was chucked off the throne. If not, Baldwin cost the Empire its King unjustly.

The Prime Minister’s speech proceeds:

His Majesty asked me if I could answer his question [if a morganatic marriage was possible]. . . . I gave him the reply. . . . His Majesty said he was not surprised at that answer. He took my answer without question, and he never referred to it again.

December 2nd was the dawn of the storm. For eight tremendous days the King fought out the decision he had to make. The whole business from now on was in a Turneresque sunset of burning publicity. Tension reached an almost intolerable pitch. Crowds gathered. The King could decide three ways: (1) he could give up Mrs. Simpson and keep the throne; (2) he could refuse to accept Baldwin’s advice, ask his resignation, try to govern with a new Cabinet, and perhaps be forced into the position of ruling with a ‘King’s party’, (3) he could abdicate.

Baldwin says:

In the last days from that date until now, that has been the struggle in which His Majesty has been engaged. We had many talks discussing the aspects of this limited problem, the House must realise – and it is difficult to realise – that His Majesty is not a boy. He looks so young that we all thought of him as our Prince, but he is a mature man with a wide and great experience of life and the world.

He always had before him three motives which he repeated in the course of conversation at all hours and again and again; that if he went he would go with dignity; that he would not allow a situation to arise in which he could not do that; and that he wanted to go with as little disturbance to his Ministers and his people as possible.

He wished to go in such circumstances that the succession of his brother would be made with as little difficulty as possible, and I may say that any idea to him of what might be called a King's party was abhorrent.

He stayed down at Belvedere because he said he was not coming to London while these things were in dispute because of the cheering crowds. I honour and respect him for the manner in which he behaved at that time.

It is a little difficult for an American to realise with what power Constitutionalism is entrenched in England, and with what horror the possibility of a King's party was greeted by a great majority of the House of Commons. Parliament is supreme over the King. That issue has been fought out since the Magna Charta, and Charles I paid with his head for defying it. Many members – for instance Winston Churchill – thought when everything was still hush-hush that the King was being shabbily treated and presented with an unfair ultimatum, but very few indeed would have been willing to envisage a royal dictatorship. The King's party idea was, moreover, discredited by the type of people who tried to cash in on it, like Mosley, Lady Houston, and Lord Rothermere.

Mrs. Simpson meantime had fled the torrent. No Dido, no Helen of Troy, has ever been heroine of a more remarkable adventure. Stealthily, accompanied by one of the King's trusted friends, she crossed France by motor-car, and took refuge in the villa of Mr. and Mrs. Rogers in Cannes. Her behaviour during the crisis was impeccable; it remained so. She tried, a supreme feat, to appear perfectly natural; she bought flowers, went out shopping. A doctor and a lawyer flew to visit her in a fog that grounded regular passenger aeroplanes. Finally she issued a statement that for dignity and decency matched any words of any of the parliamentarians: 'I have throughout the last few weeks – wished to avoid any action or proposal which would have hurt or damaged His Majesty or the throne. To-day . . . I am willing . . . to withdraw from a situation both unhappy and untenable.'

On December 10th the climax came. The lawyers, the officials, and the comptrollers had got all the unprecedented details straight. Baldwin and the King were in incessant communication, and the Royal Family gathered for a last painful farewell dinner. Queen

Mary issued a poignant statement. Edward signed the deed of abdication, which was witnessed by his three brothers, and the Duke of York prepared to take the throne. In the afternoon Parliament assembled, the Speaker read out Edward's message, and Baldwin spoke. The crowds, numb with shock and the conflict of emotions, which had booed the Cabinet a day or so before, set about somewhat glumly cheering the new King.

On December 11th Edward read over the radio his farewell, and the whole world listened. It was a masterpiece to which a quarter-century of frustration gave perfect form:

At long last I am able to say a few words of my own. I have never wanted to withhold anything, but until now it has not been constitutionally possible for me to speak.

A few hours ago I discharged my last duty as King and Emperor. And now that I have been succeeded by my brother, the Duke of York, my first words must be to declare my allegiance to him. This I do with all my heart.

You know the reasons which have impelled me to renounce the throne, but I want you to understand that in making up my mind I did not forget the country or the empire which, as Prince of Wales and lately as King, I have for twenty-five years tried to serve.

But you must believe me when I tell you that I have found it impossible to carry the heavy burden of responsibility and to discharge my duties as King as I would wish to do without the help and support of the woman I love.

And I want you to know that the decision I have made has been mine and mine alone.

This was a thing I had to judge entirely for myself. The other person most nearly concerned has tried up to the last to persuade me to take a different course.

I have made this the most serious decision of my life, only upon the single thought of what would in the end, be best for all.

This decision has been made less difficult for me by the sure knowledge that my brother, with his long training in the public affairs of this country and with his fine qualities, will be able to take my place forthwith without interruption or injury to the life and progress of the empire, and he has one matchless blessing, enjoyed by so many of you and not bestowed upon me, a happy home with his wife and children.

During these hard days, I have been comforted by Her Majesty, my mother, and by my family. The Ministers of the Crown and in particular Mr. Baldwin, the Prime Minister, have always treated me with full consideration.

There has never been any constitutional difference between me and them and between me and Parliament. Bred in the constitutional traditions by my father, I should never have allowed any such issue to arise.

Ever since I was Prince of Wales, and later on, when I occupied the throne, I have been treated with the greatest kindness by all classes of the people wherever I have lived or journeyed throughout the empire. For that I am very grateful. I now quit altogether public affairs and I lay down my burden.

It may be some time before I return to my native land, but I shall always follow the fortunes of the British race and empire with profound interest and if, at any time in the future, I can be found of service to His Majesty in a private station I shall not fail.

And now we all have a new King. I wish him and you, his people happiness and prosperity with all my heart.

God bless you all! God save the King!

It is somewhat shocking incidentally that a country which traditionally prides itself on free speech and fair play should submit to the stupid censorship which prevented gramophone records of this speech being bought anywhere in England. (Of course, the ruling classes, trying desperately to 'build up' the Duke of York, did everything possible to bury Edward and his memory at once.)

That night Edward, lonely, left England on a destroyer for France and exile in the shadows of the Austrian Wienerwald.

Afterthoughts

The whole stupendous business is full of puzzles, paradoxes, and contradictions. Contradiction Number One: The person of the King is so unimportant that the transition from Edward to York proceeds on the surface with the utmost smoothness; yet the person of the Queen is so critically important that it cost Edward the throne.

Another is that the Church of England, which forbade this marriage on the issue of divorce, was itself founded by Henry VIII, in a manner of speaking, to make divorce possible to a monarch.

Another is that England, above all things, is a 'free' country; yet ruthless censorship of the greatest story of a generation helped Edward to lose the crown. A subsidiary irony is the position of Mr. Hearst. It must have been the early Hearst stories, whooping for marriage, which got to Baldwin and helped to blast it.

Incidentally the American Press was not so wild as many people uncritically imagine. No breath of scandal about Mrs. Simpson was ever unearthed. She was simply a lady who had had two husbands. The papers went in for informality and abbreviation, a form of fondness.

Why did it all have to happen? Old Family Doctor Baldwin said that growing publicity made him go to the King. But everyone who counted in England had known for at least six months that Mrs. Simpson's special position greatly improved the character and happiness of the Monarch and made him a better King. The issue of censorship is of great importance. If public opinion had been allowed gradually to form a favourable opinion of Mrs. Simpson and her excellent influence on the King, there might have been very little scandal. If Mrs. Baldwin had had her to tea or if Queen Mary had taken her out shopping, the results might have been very different.

It is quite possible that Mrs. Baldwin had a considerable amount to do with shaping her husband's mind.

Of course Edward must have made up his mind absolutely for marriage with Mrs. Simpson. Otherwise the story doesn't make sense. He gave up the throne not just for a woman, but for a wife, which is something quite different.

This brings up another terrific contradiction. Edward did not want to live a loose life. He could have had plenty of mistresses. But he wanted marriage and a family. Mr. Baldwin, the moralist, denied him this. He used a moral position to deny the King a moral solution to the problem. It was not immorality, but just the opposite, which provoked the Church of England's wrath.

The case seemingly attaches a stigma to all divorced persons in England. Mrs. Simpson's one and one-half divorces were strictly conventional and proper. Her ex-husbands 'now living' admire her greatly. Supposing she had been twice widowed. Would that have made a difference? Suppose both her ex-husbands should die next week. Would this whole crisis have been in vain?

Mr. Baldwin said that no precedent existed for a morganatic marriage. But none existed for an abdication – infinitely more iconoclastic – of this kind.

The quotation from Laertes in the prime minister's speech was striking. Has Mr. Baldwin forgotten how Hamlet ends?

Many people wished the Labour Party had not been so glacially 'constitutional'. The English constitution permits new precedents. If Mr. Attlee and his advisers had had more push and sting and farsightedness they might, from January to October, have got much closer to the King than they did get; the King was not unsympathetic. If, thoroughly warm relations having been established, the Labour leaders had not been quite so stick-in-the-muddish over divorce, they might have been in a position to tell Baldwin that they were willing to go to the country on the issue. Perhaps the Labour Party is too hopelessly bankrupt for revival. But a lot of observers thought they missed a grand chance for resuscitation. Again the business of censorship comes up. The people, the bulk of them, knew nothing of the crisis until it was splashed into their faces on December 3rd, and Baldwin certainly never gave them a chance of expressing an opinion.

I do not think that Baldwin, the Archbishop, The Times, and so on formed a cabal to squeeze Edward off the throne. Things don't happen that way in England. Nor was Edward's visit to Wales more than a minor embarrassment to the Cabinet. No one important in the ruling classes wanted an abdication, by choice, even though they might have been willing to see Edward put in his place rather sharply, perhaps, and even though they have taken the whole business with almost unseemly grace.

Baldwin's speech was an authentic masterpiece. Its strength derived from the curious Puritan mysticism in his character. Perhaps, though, he left some things out. Edward's speech was a masterpiece, too, and also with great emotional quality.

If Parliament is going to interfere with the private life of a king – even a king cursed with inability to love anyone except a woman who belongs or belonged to someone else – then Parliament should be responsible for his education and upbringing.

The whole thing is an imperial as well as a personal tragedy. Edward's position may be tinged with a certain neuroticism, but surely his abdication represents a tremendous wastage of human material. And the political consequences must be considerable. At once Mr. de Valera squeezed out from under with the governor-general's head. What are the people in India and Africa and the South Seas going to think – if they get a chance – about the value of the Crown as a symbol of imperial unity, when a King in the full spring of his reign tosses it into the junkpile like a can of soup. The political value of monarchy is the assurance it gives – or should give – of fixity, dignity, stability, permanence. This crisis proves that a King, after all, is just a man.

When I was in England there was a good deal of talk about Edward's alleged pro-Germanism. I do not think that this could have become a very important political force. It was based not only on heredity but upon a sort of good-fellowship feeling that the Germans had had bad treatment after the War and deserved some sporting aid. The new King probably has much of the same basic impulse and ideas. So one might conclude that the shift from Edward to York will not mean much difference on this important issue. York, however, is much less vivid a character than Edward and will doubtless be much more under the influence of his advisers.

People wonder if Edward, like Carol of Rumania, will be a political source of trouble during exile. There will certainly be trouble-makers anxious to capitalise his position. But it is doubtful in the extreme that Edward will pay any attention to them. If he was too fed up to keep the job, he will be too fed up to try to get it back. A very important point all along was Edward's considerable fed-upness.

Finally, I am curious to hear the Marxist interpretation of all this. What do the economic determinists say of Mrs. Simpson?

George VI

Of the Duke of York, who chose the title George VI, there is very little to be said. He is quite unambitious and dutiful and apparently he did not want the throne; the story is that he suggested a regency for his daughter Elizabeth, but the Cabinet overruled him. So he began what everyone hopes will be a long and very colourless reign. George VI was born in York Cottage in 1895 and served manfully but without brilliance in the familiar Royal curriculum; he fought in the Navy, went to Cambridge, and toured the Empire. Rather oddly, he has never been in the United States. In 1923 he married Elizabeth Bowes-Lyon, the daughter of the Earl of Strathmore; thus a Scotswoman is Queen of England.

No one with normal standards ever mentioned it in print, but the Archbishop of Canterbury saw fit to give it prominence in a radio broadcast, and so there is no harm now in noting that George VI is afflicted with a stammer. The Archbishop said, 'When his people listen to him, they will note an occasional momentary hesitation in his speech. But he brought it into full control, and to those who hear him it need cause no sort of embarrassment, for it causes none to him who speaks.'

This was the radio sermon in which Canterbury severely rebuked Edward – after his abdication and departure – 'for having sought his happiness in a manner inconsistent with Christian principles of marriage and within a social circle whose standards and ways of life are alien to all the best instincts of his people.' Subsequently the Archbishop of York spoke similarly if not quite with such vengeful point. The two speeches provoked bitter reaction. The archbishops, it seemed, after perfect propriety by everyone in the most difficult circumstances, had added a vulgar note when it was all over.

In the spring of 1937 Edward and Mrs. Simpson were quietly married in France. The tumult died, and people of good heart wished them well.

CHAPTER XVIII

CHAMBERLAIN AND BALDWIN

THE new British prime minister, Arthur Neville Chamberlain, is a business man. He personifies something very striking in the politics of England – the emergence of the middle trading class to a dominant note in government. Baldwin, who preceded him, was an iron manufacturer from the Midlands; Chamberlain spent all his early years in business. He is one of the comparatively few British statesmen of eminence who went neither to Eton nor Harrow, Cambridge nor Oxford. His public school was Rugby, and he never went to University at all.

Shortly after he assumed the prime ministership Chamberlain said, 'Although I cannot boast of the blueness in my veins or of the fame of my forbears, I am yet prouder of being descended from those respectable tradesmen than if my ancestors had worn shining armour and carried great swords.' The new prime minister, unlike so many of his predecessors, is not an aristocrat; he is not wealthy; he is no great scholar; he is not a philosopher like Balfour, or a classicist like Asquith.

Yet Chamberlain is as British as beef. Back in 1730 the Chamberlains were malsters in Wiltshire; the next generation turned to cordwaining (shoemaking and leather work) and five successive Chamberlains were cordwainers. No fewer than eleven members of the family have been at one time or other members of the honourable Cordwainers company. In recent years the family developed distinct political importance, as everyone knows. Neville is the son of the great Joseph, Gladstone's most formidable opponent, and half-brother of Austen, who died last year after a distinguished life in politics.

Neville was born in Birmingham, which had become the bailiwick of the Chamberlains, in 1869. Thus he is only two years younger than Mr. Baldwin, who gave up the premiership because, at his age, the strain of office was too onerous. It is a striking historical curiosity that Neville should finally reach the highest office in the state, which his father just missed, rather than Austen, whom Joseph had trained from boyhood for a political career. Austen twice gave up his chances to be prime minister. Now Neville, who was destined for a purely business life, takes on the job.

The dynamic, rugged, almost brutal figure of father Joseph has profoundly influenced Neville's character. Joseph was one of the great radicals of British history, and Neville's preoccupation with housing and social problems, during his term as minister of health, was certainly an inherited characteristic. Joseph was the first modern imperialist, and Neville seemed to be standing in his shoes at the Imperial Conference in Ottawa which opened the way to Imperial Preference. Joseph, above all, fought for a tariff programme, and Neville, as chancellor of the exchequer, reversed British free trade policy after a hundred years and gave Britain a protective tariff.

Neville began his business career with seven years in the British West Indies, to take care of his father's sisal plantations there, sisal being a sort of hemp. He returned to Birmingham, and in 1911 married Miss Annie Cole, who has been his inseparable and devoted companion ever since. She turned him to politics, he says. In 1915, a prosperous business man, he was chosen Lord Mayor of Birmingham (his father had been Lord Mayor forty years before); he became a national figure for the first time when the War prime minister, Mr. Lloyd George, created a post for him as Director of the National Services. Lloyd George says that he was a failure at it; apparently other ministries cut across his unmarked sphere of authority, and soon he returned to Birmingham.

He first entered parliament in 1918; he was almost fifty before becoming an M.P. His rise was rapid, because like Bonar Law and Baldwin he deserted the Lloyd George coalition, and the conservatives, in the wilderness, had few competent men. (Austen stayed faithful to Lloyd George, and thus missed his chance to become leader of the conservative party.) Neville was chancellor of the exchequer for a brief interval – he had no time to introduce a budget – and then minister of health. When Baldwin became prime minister in 1923 he offered Chamberlain the exchequer again. 'What a day!' Chamberlain wrote to Baldwin from Scotland. 'Two salmon this morning, and the offer of the exchequer in the afternoon!' (For Neville is a notable and enthusiastic fly-fisherman.)

He turned down the exchequer, preferring the more modest post of health minister. He held this job with one interruption till 1929. His ministry helped build some 900,000 houses, and his Rating and Valuation Act (1928) and Local Government Act (1929) were widely praised. When the National Government was formed he took the exchequer. His budgets were orthodox and parsimonious; he commanded the complete confidence of the plutocracy in the City. His outstanding performance was the introduction of Protection. He was accused of starving the social services; his defenders applauded his 'refusal to be rattled into prodigality'.

His power in cabinet grew and also his reputation in the country; when it became clear that Baldwin would retire his succession to the prime ministry was inevitable; for considerable periods in 1935 and 1936 he was, in fact, prime minister in all but name.

Shy rather than stiff, upright and austere, unimaginative, a convinced democrat, without a particle of the 'personality' distinguishing men like Lloyd George, without a trace of Baldwin's mysticism or Churchill's rhetoric, one who abhors the grandiose, a hard and conscientious worker, sound in health (except for occasional twinges of gout), orderly as a blue-print, Neville Chamberlain will probably be prime minister as long as the present National Government lasts. He need not go to the country till 1940.

He loves gardening, fishing, and nature study; these are his only relaxations. He is a profound bird lover. He installed a bird-bath in the garden between No. 10 and No. 11 Downing Street, and Mrs. Chamberlain recounts that each morning at breakfast they watch the blackbirds bathing. The 1936 report of the Committee of Bird Sanctuaries in Royal Parks contains three observations by the new prime minister. Walking through St. James's Park or the Green Park he saw, on February 13 and 14, 'large flocks of redwings'; on January 16 and February 17, 'pied wagtails, the bird on the latter date being an unusual dark specimen'; on August 1, 'a swift crossing the Horse Guards Parade'.

During one serious financial crisis he found time to write a letter to The Times as follows:

'Sir: It may be of interest to record that in walking through St James's Park to-day I noticed a grey wagtail running about on the now temporarily dry bed of the lake near the dam below the bridge, and occasionally picking small insects out of the cracks in the dam. Probably the occurrence of this bird in the heart of London has been recorded before, but I have not previously noted it in the park.

'P.S. For the purpose of removing doubts, as we say in the House of Commons, I should perhaps add that I mean a grey wagtail not a pied.'

He is exceptionally shy, and his intimate friends are few. Photographs exist showing him masking his face from news cameras. An odd point is that reputedly he enjoys singing negro spirituals, which he learned many years ago in the West Indies. His stepmother, by the way, Mrs. W. H. Carnegie, is American.

He talks no more than is necessary. In his last budget he gave exactly forty-five words to the £350,000,000 Exchange Equalisation Fund, saying that the fund showed a profit, but that its operation 'must continue to be wrapped in mystery'.

During the Leipzig crisis during the Spanish war, when hostilities were nearly at the point of spreading, Chamberlain appealed to the House for coolness and caution. Lloyd George jibed at him, 'Any fish can keep a cool head.'

Someone said of him casually once: 'Neville? Town-clerk of Birmingham in a lean year!'

Taking Over

Mr. Chamberlain's cabinet, formed on May 28, 1937, contained few surprises. Ramsay MacDonald stepped out of politics, and Lord Halifax took his post as Lord President of the Council. Sir John Simon, leader of the Liberal Nationals in the coalition, succeeded Chamberlain as chancellor of the exchequer, and Earl de la Warr, representing National Labour, became Lord Privy Seal. Ministers like Mr. Eden at the Foreign Office, Lord Swinton as secretary for air, the Marquess of Zetland as secretary for India, Mr. Ormsby-Gore as colonial secretary, W. S. Morrison (a rising star in the Tory party) as minister for agriculture, Malcolm MacDonald (Ramsay's thirty-six-year-old son) as minister for dominions, stayed in their posts. The brilliant Sir Philip Sassoon became First Commissioner of Works, and Sir Samuel Hoare took the Home Office. Mr. Duff Cooper was transferred to the Admiralty, and Leslie Hore-Belisha, the able and flamboyant youngster who created the Belisha beacons while minister of transport, became secretary for war.

Almost at once the new prime minister was confronted with a serious crisis. His budget included a heavy tax on profits, amounting to roughly thirty per cent on increase of profits as compared with the averages for 1933-35. The motives behind this tax, known as the 'National Defence Contribution', were twofold, to check profiteering and to help pay for Britain's gigantic rearmament programme. It aroused a violent storm. The stockmarket collapsed, and in a week prices fell almost £500,000,000. Counsellors from all sides, including even the labour party, begged Chamberlain to withdraw the bill; Mr. Churchill brilliantly made it easy for him to retreat (Churchill quoted an ironic Disraeli to the effect that 'in a democratically governed country, it is sometimes necessary to defer to the opinions of the people'); and, with more grace and suppleness than his opponents believed possible, the new prime minister acquiesced and introduced a new measure.

Overwhelmingly Chamberlain's job is to superintend British rearmament. The armament programme was initiated before he became prime minister, but it is his baby now. And a baby of some weight. The cost of rearmament is estimated at no less than £1,500,000,000 in the next three years. Obviously Britain would not lend itself to such a major operation without good reason. Anyone who chose to look across the channel or in the Mediterranean saw it. The rearmament programme, stirring the country to its vitals, affecting almost every industry, providing for the revitalisation and re-equipment of every branch of the service, including especially the air, is by all odds the most important event in recent British history. And it is of great importance internationally. Britain, lacking biceps, has latterly been weak before the threat of Fascist aggression. Strong, Britain can throw its full weight into diplomacy once more. A strong Britain makes for a stable Europe, and Europe knows it. But until the rearmament programme is complete—and it may take longer than expected to complete it—British policy is apt to be one of equivocation and delay.

The new prime minister faced an angry and disordered world in his first months of office. The Spanish war, as we have seen, led to a severe Mediterranean crisis; British merchantmen were torpedoed by pirate submarines, and a British destroyer was attacked. Chamberlain wanted good relations and conciliation with both Germany and Italy. He exchanged cordial notes with Mussolini. Nevertheless he had to join France in patrolling the Mediterranean. Concurrently the Far East blew up. British interests were threatened everywhere in China, and the British ambassador, Sir Hughe Knatchbull-Hugessen, was bombed and machine-gunned by Japanese military aircraft. Chamberlain's government sent a stiff note to Japan, and had to accept a not very satisfactory reply.

Stanley Baldwin

'Is Stanley Baldwin the luckiest of incompetent politicians or the subtlest of competent statesmen?'

— WICKHAM STEED.

'Mr. Baldwin has the Englishman's genius for appearing an amateur in a game in which, in fact, he is a superb professional.'

— HAROLD J. LASKI.

'Dictatorship is like a giant beech-tree — very magnificent to look at in its prime, but nothing grows underneath it.'

— STANLEY BALDWIN.

Mr. Baldwin retired from office after the coronation of George VI, became a knight of the garter, and accepted an earldom, amid universal praise. He had, as we all know, surmounted the terrific crisis of Edward's abdication; he then left public life. Baldwin's career is one of the most astonishing of modern times. This man was so obscure fifteen years ago that a prominent leader of the conservative party confessed that he didn't know him by sight when he became prime minister. Baldwin himself records that a 'well-known lady of society' asked one of his friends, 'Is the new prime minister what you would call an educated man?'

Baldwin was — and is — two things: a sort of John Bull, the embodiment of British solidity and substance; and a sort of Scandinavian mystic, a profound puritan whose strength of character comes partly from 'spiritual' values. He was not an 'intellectual'; he was not strikingly clever or energetic; he groped toward solutions of problems instead of thinking them out rationally; he responded to emotion easily, and he could evoke strong emotion in even British listeners. No one could shake him from his convictions. His career is an example of the triumph of character over circumstance. 'The spiritual home of Stanley Baldwin,' it has been written, 'is the last ditch.'

Baldwin was born at Bewdley in Worcestershire — the constituency he represented for many years — in 1867. His father, Alfred Baldwin, was chairman of the Great Western Railway and head of Baldwins Ltd., one of the great iron works of England; the Baldwins founded the company and had operated it for four generations, since the middle eighteenth century. Baldwin is a typical Englishman: that is to say, his mother was of Scotch descent, his father Welsh. His maternal grandfather, a Wesleyan minister, G. B. Macdonald, was an ardent prohibitionist, who wrote tracts against alcohol. Of his mother's sisters, one married the painter Burne-Jones, another Sir Edward Poynter, and a third was the mother of Rudyard Kipling. Baldwin and Kipling are first cousins.

Baldwin has described¹ how he failed in the entrance examinations for the Fourth Form Room at Harrow. He was disappointed, but, he says, 'I got over it in subsequent years when I learnt that two of the most distinguished men in public life to-day had shared my fate.' One was F. E. Smith, who later became Lord Birkenhead. Baldwin, reminiscing, said that it was the first time he had ever been classed with first-class brains. This was, of course, an effective retort to the brilliant but unstable Birkenhead, who had scoffed at Baldwin once, saying his brains were 'second-class'. After Harrow Baldwin proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was thoroughly inconspicuous. 'I did nothing at the university,' he records. And in one of his speeches he said, 'I attribute such faculties as I have to the fact that I did not overstrain them in youth.' Far cry from Trotsky or Mussolini!

He entered his father's iron foundry and no record exists of any public speech or activity for almost twenty years. 'I lived in a backwater,' he says. His father died in 1908, vacating the parliamentary seat he had held since 1892; the younger Baldwin, at the age of forty-one, succeeded to it in a by-election. He waited for four months to make his maiden speech in the House of Commons; it was in opposition to the eight-hour day for miners. He was so little noticed that Hansard, as if detecting no difference between father and son, called him 'A. Baldwin' by mistake. In his first nine years in the House he made only five speeches.

When the Canadian-born statesman Bonar Law became chancellor of the exchequer in 1916 he made Baldwin his parliamentary private secretary. This, the legend said, was because Bonar Law knew that Baldwin was too honest to intrigue against him, and not clever enough to get into trouble. In reality he was suggested to Bonar Law by a Scottish conservative M.P., J. C. C. Davidson, an old friend of Baldwin's. In 1917 Baldwin was promoted to be financial secretary of the treasury—the threshold to the cabinet—on Davidson's recommendation. Bonar Law, according to Wickham Steed,² at first demurred. 'He doubted whether Baldwin deserved ministerial rank or "carried enough guns" for the job.'

¹ Perhaps not altogether seriously, he wrote once that one of his early ambitions was to be a blacksmith.

² In The Real Stanley Baldwin, an acute and dispassionate study.

After the War occurred the famous incident of the letter to The Times, wherein Baldwin announced his intention of anonymously donating one-fifth of his fortune to the state. The letter was signed with the initials 'F.S.T.', and Steed records that Baldwin's card was enclosed; but no one for some time guessed that 'F.S.T.' stood for Financial Secretary of the Treasury, and the editor of The Times kept the secret well. The letter is of such importance to an understanding of Baldwin's character that it should be given in full:

SIR, — It is now a truism to say that in August 1914, the nation was face to face with the greatest crisis in her history. She was saved by the free-will offerings of her people. The best of her men rushed to the colours; the best of her women left their homes to spend and be spent; the best of her older men worked as they had never worked before, to a common end, and with a unity and fellowship as new as it was exhilarating. It may be that in four and a half years the ideals of many became dim, but the spiritual impetus of those early days carried the country through to the end.

To-day, on the eve of peace, we are faced with another crisis, less obvious, but none the less searching. The whole country is exhausted. By a natural reaction, not unlike that which led to the excesses of the Restoration after the reign of the Puritans, all classes are in danger of being submerged by a wave of extravagance and materialism. It is so easy to live on borrowed money; so difficult to realise that you are doing so.

It is so easy to play; so hard to learn that you cannot play for long without work. A fool's paradise is only the ante-room to a fool's hell.

How can the nation be made to understand the gravity of the financial situation; that love of country is better than love of money?

This can only be done by example, and the wealthy classes have to-day an opportunity for service which can never recur.

They know the danger of the present debt; they know the weight of it in the years to come. They know the practical difficulties of a universal statutory capital levy. Let them impose upon themselves, each as he is able, a voluntary levy. It should be possible to pay to the Exchequer within twelve months such a sum as would save the taxpayer fifty millions a year.

I have been considering this matter for nearly two years, but my mind moves slowly; I dislike publicity, and I hoped that someone else might lead the way. I have made as accurate an estimate as I am able of the value of my own estate, and have arrived at a total of about £580,000. I have decided to realise twenty per cent of that amount or, say £120,000 which will purchase £150,000 of the new War Loan, and present it to the Government for cancellation.

I give this portion of my estate as a thank offering in the firm conviction that never again shall we have such a chance of giving our country that form of help which is so vital at the present time.

Yours, etc.,

F.S.T.

An unfriendly critic would have to decide for himself what other considerations, if any, beside patriotism, prompted Baldwin to this extraordinary letter. Did he know that the secret of his identity was bound to be revealed, with resultant publicity wie noch nie? Had he not, possibly, a pang of conscience that Baldwins Ltd., like all similar firms, had boomed during the War, and was he not protecting himself from a possible charge by his inner self of profiteering?¹

In 1921 Baldwin reached cabinet rank as president of the Board of Trade; he was as mute in cabinet as in the Commons. Then in the next year the turning-point of his life occurred. The Lloyd George coalition was breaking up; the conservative party split on whether or not to continue support of the prime minister, and Bonar Law and Baldwin led the dissidents who chose revolt. A meeting was called at the Carlton Club to consider the position. In an astonishing speech Baldwin helped to turn the tide against Lloyd George; the Tories withdrew their support from the government, and Lloyd George has been out of office ever since.

Thus one of the most obscure public men in England brought down its most celebrated figure through a largely moral and emotional appeal. The lumbering tortoise tripped the bright sharp fox – and the era of Versailles was over.

Baldwin became chancellor of the exchequer in the conservative Bonar Law cabinet that replaced Lloyd George, largely because in the attenuated Tory ranks (Austen Chamberlain, Churchill, Birkenhead, Sir Robert Horne, departed with Lloyd George) no one else was available for the job. He went to America and, faithful to the conviction that the Briton pays his bills, negotiated a debt settlement on what in England were considered extremely onerous terms.² Bonar Law, horrified, said that the agreement would depress the standard of living in England for a generation.

Bonar Law was too ill to work and early in 1923 resigned. He recommended no one to be his successor, and the King had to decide between Lord Curzon, the foreign minister, and Baldwin. He chose Baldwin, both on personal grounds and because labour had become the largest opposition party, which made it almost impossible for the prime minister to be in the Lords. Curzon was stunned. 'Not even a public figure,' he wailed, referring to

¹ Very few people followed Baldwin's lead in surrendering part of their fortunes to the treasury. The total realised was less than half a million pounds.

² And which Neville Chamberlain ten years later repudiated.

Baldwin. 'A man of no experience. And of the utmost insignificance!' Baldwin received journalists after he had visited the palace. 'I don't need your congratulations,' he said, 'but your prayers.'

'The Methodist Machiavelli'

Baldwin sees few people nowadays; Worcestershire and his new house in Eaton Square circumscribe his life. The chief personal influence on him is undoubtedly his wife, Lucy. Even if he should want to do so, he would have small chance of straying from the strict line of nonconformist probity while his wife was at his side. Once at least it was her firm character which kept him from resigning the leadership of the party, when the attacks of the Press lords had depressed him. The Baldwins' son, Oliver, a vigorous socialist, has been a political grief to them.

Baldwin writes all his own speeches; he is supposed never to read the newspapers; his favourite reading is Thucydides; he takes no exercise; he smokes a pipe. The pipe has become, of course, the symbol of his 'personality', but ten years ago, before the Baldwin legend grew, caricatures usually portrayed him pipeless. He always has enjoyed a pipe; now he has to smoke one, on all occasions.

'The pose of simplicity,' Professor Laski wrote, 'which Mr. Baldwin affects ought to deceive no one; a simple man has never been prime minister of England. His pigs and his pipe are simply the technique of propaganda. Like the orchid of Mr. Chamberlain or the ringlets of Disraeli, they create an image which the multitude can remember, and they give a satisfaction to innumerable followers who believe that a common interest in pigs and pipes is a permanent basis of political adequacy.'

Most of his life Baldwin has seemed to show bad conscience about the responsibilities of wealth. He opposed the eight-hour day; but he paid out of his own pocket the wages of workmen at Baldwins Ltd., during a post-War stoppage. He is apt to think of industrial management as a personal responsibility of employer to labour, as a manorial business within family walls. His government passed the Trade Union Law of 1927, 'the first legislation hostile to trade unions in over a century of British history'; but his extreme Tory opponents have called him a socialist. Steed records as characteristic 'both of his generosity and his love of doing good by stealth' a remarkable incident when Baldwin, tramping in Gloucestershire, overheard two old ladies discussing how they could scrape enough money together to maintain an asylum for feeble-minded girls. He collected two hundred dirty one-pound notes, wrapped them in a bit of old newspaper, and sent them to the ladies with a purposely badly-written letter as a gift of 'a passing vagabond'.

While he was prime minister he had his salary as first lord of the treasury, £5,000 per year; but he had to live, he said, on capital and borrowings. In May, 1928, he said: 'For every shilling I had when I took office I now have something less than a penny,' and his remark that he exists 'on an overdraft' has been widely quoted. Yet, according to the Sunday Express (May 12, 1935), he held 181,526 ordinary shares in Baldwins Ltd., and 37,591 preference shares, which at the market price at the time were worth roughly £100,000. No one, of course, knows what his obligations may be. He has no expensive hobbies. The things he likes best are books.

A familiar criticism of Baldwin is that he is lazy. Another is that he is sly. Another is that he is too supine, too 'passive'. When really roused, however, he can make mincemeat of his enemies. It takes a great deal of unpleasantness to stir him to protect himself; when he does so, he is irresistible. Twice he has surmounted major crises within the party, once when the Press lords sought by every possible means to deprive him of the leadership; second, a less overtly dramatic but inwardly more serious struggle, when Churchill and some of the greatest dignitaries of the party sought to oust him because of his liberal attitude to India—liberal, at least, compared to theirs.

He moves slowly; but he can move. In November 1935 he dropped Lord Londonderry from the cabinet; and the great reception in Londonderry House traditionally given on the eve of the opening of Parliament did not occur. Londonderry had been severely heckled during the election campaign for a remark he had made as air minister and which pursued him with ghoulish zest. Referring to the disarmament conference, he told the House of Lords, 'I had the utmost difficulty at that time, amid the public outcry, in preserving the use of the bombing aeroplane even on the frontier of the Middle East and India.'

Baldwin disappointed the hopes of that rare adventurer Winston Churchill of inclusion in the cabinet reconstruction of 1935. Churchill's speeches in the campaign were in his best flamboyant style, and he pointed vigorously to the peril of German rearmament.

But Baldwin, cautious, knew that however valuable Churchill would be in vitalising matters of defence, his presence in the government might be a diplomatic liability. Baldwin did not want, at that time, to confess to a full-blast arms policy. Also his majority was so great that he didn't need the support of Churchill's wing of diehards.

Baldwin is no backslapper; he has described his discomfort at the electioneering expected from him in his first contest and which he erased from his soul by reading Horace or the Odyssey every evening. He dislikes rhetoric; but he is capable of a good deal of it. He confesses that he is of a 'somewhat flabby nature', who always 'prefers agreement to disagreement'; but the Quaker strain in his blood would make him go to the stake, he says, rather than give up a principle. Rather enviously he quotes Seneca to the effect that 'a strong man matched with fortune is a sight for the gods to witness'. And he says, 'Success is not necessarily a matter to which you should devote your whole life.'

Baldwin seldom promises anything unless he is sure he can make the promise good. This is one source of his power. He is almost quixotically generous, and his loyalty is staunch; never did he intrude on Ramsay MacDonald's prerogatives as prime minister during the first phase of the National Government, although he, Baldwin, held the real power. He is capable of great detachment; for instance, during the election campaign of November 1935 he paused to make a speech on peace, in fulfilment of an engagement made long before, in which he gave at least the impression of having eliminated the electoral struggle from his mind. His political discernment is vivid; he was the first man to seize on and dramatise the new phase of international relations which accompanied Hitler's rise to power, by his speech stating that Britain's frontier had become the Rhine. Finally, he stays put.

One of his early speeches, delivered to the Classical Association in 1926, gives insight to his character:

'I remember many years ago standing on the terrace of a beautiful villa near Florence. It was a September evening, and the valley below was transfigured in the long, horizontal rays of the declining sun. And then I heard a bell, such a bell as never was on land or sea, a bell whose every vibration found an echo in my innermost heart. I said to my hostess, "That is the most beautiful bell I have ever heard." "Yes," she replied, "it is an English bell." And so it was. For generations its sound had gone out over English fields, giving the hours of work and prayer to English folk from the tower of an English abbey, and then came the Reformation, and some wise Italian bought the bell . . . and sent it to the Valley of the Arno, where after four centuries it stirred the heart of a wandering Englishman and made him sick for home.'

Three Times Prime Minister

His first premiership, in 1923, lasted less than a year; he was feeling his way, with only a slim majority, and decided to go to the country – to the horror of most of his colleagues – on the issue of protection. The country was not ready for tariffs; he was turned out of office. It was during this administration that he made the remarkable statement, 'Well, having been prime minister will have been an interesting experience to have had.'

Ramsay MacDonald formed the first Labour Government and lasted only a year; the Zinoviev letter crushed him and Baldwin returned to the premiership with a tremendous majority; his first act was to forgive his enemies in the party, and bring Churchill, Birkenhead, Austen Chamberlain back from the wilderness and give them his best portfolios. He was in office from 1924 to 1929, by which time his majority had dwindled away; he went to the country on a 'Safety First' slogan – which was strange politics – and was roundly beaten.

The 1924–29 administration has lessons for the student. The prime minister, who hardly seemed interested enough in his job to keep a grip on things, succumbed to inertia, to muddle, to bad advice. He mishandled the coal situation, which is insoluble except on the basis of nationalisation of royalties, and reaped the harvest of the General Strike. He flirted with the project to 'reform' the House of Lords, viz., make it stronger, so that J. L. Garvin covered acres of space in the Observer calling his government 'Doomed!' His foreign policy, except for Locarno, was a list of blunders. His government threw over the Geneva protocol, humiliated Germany by delaying her entrance to the League, encouraged Mussolini in Albania and Abyssinia, signed the Kellogg Pact only after weakening it, annoyed the United States by the Anglo-French naval compromise, and botched the Geneva naval conference so badly that Lord Cecil resigned in protest.

But when Baldwin became prime minister again in 1935 he had an immense majority once more. His manœuvre in calling an election on November 14, in the very middle of a grave international crisis when the people were inevitably bound to support a strong, 'safe', government, was called vulgar; but it was, of course, shrewd politics. And the results were a great tribute to Baldwin personally. The people were not voting so much for the Tory party or for the National Government; they were voting for a man. Then in 1937 after the abdication and the coronation he resigned.

England, he said once, has never sought a second Cromwell. But it may yearn for other Baldwins.

CHAPTER XIX

MEN OF WHITEHALL

The D eb acle of MacDonald

'What we have to do is to pile up and pile up and pile up the income of the industry in this way and that way and the other way.'

— Mr. MACDONALD, quoted in the Manchester Guardian.

'Because thou art neither cold nor hot will I spew thee out of my mouth.'

— Quoted at Seaham Harbour by LADY HOUSTON.

JAMES RAMSAY MACDONALD, the creator and the despoiler of the labour party, despicable or heroic as you choose, a man of Olympian or Stygian loneliness, was born in Scotland in 1866 of obscure parentage. The fact of his humble origin has been of profound psychological importance in his career. All his life he sought compensation for the miserable poverty of his boyhood. When, according to Philip Snowden, he became prime minister of the National Government and chuckled, 'To-morrow every duchess in London will be wanting to kiss me,' he was no more than finally squaring the accounts of his arduous and unhappy youth.

The record of his career until and during the War was conspicuously honourable. He left school in Scotland when he was fourteen to earn a living; penniless in London, he found a job in a warehouse, working as a clerk for 12s. 6d. a week; he studied science and economics at night. On August 3, 1914, he had courage enough to stand up against the whole House of Commons and denounce the War. He seemingly ruined his political career; even now some extreme Tories print with objurgation the socialist manifesto, which he prominently signed, urging support of the Russian revolution in 1917. During the War a ship's company threatened to strike rather than carry MacDonald, a militant pacifist, to the Stockholm peace congress. He was forced to resign from his golf club at Lossiemouth; his meetings had to be protected by the police. And, be it noted, in those days the bulk of the socialist party deserted him.

Twice MacDonald owed great good fortune to chance. In 1900, the story goes, 'Mr. James R. MacDonald' was elected secretary of the newly-formed labour representative committee, which later became the labour party. But many of the delegates, according to the Daily Herald (February 27, 1932), were under the impression that they were voting for a different MacDonald – one Jimmie MacDonald, a prominent member of the London trades union council. The name proposed was J. Macdonald. Two J. MacDonalds were present. Mr. J. Ramsay MacDonald won.

More than half a generation later, in 1922, he was elected leader of the party in parliament by a majority of two over J. R. Clynes, and thus, as leader of the opposition, he became prime minister the next year. The Clydesiders, radicals from Glasgow, supported him because they thought he would undertake a genuinely Left policy. He was, indeed, when he first reached the premiership, a picturesque and challenging personality. His rich Scottish eloquence, his instructive air of leadership, his poise and parliamentary skill, his undoubted courage and facility in negotiation, made him – the first labour prime minister in British history – a world figure. And at the Foreign Office he joined Herriot to inaugurate a new era in post-War affairs by a peaceful policy toward Germany.

But even within his own party, even in the early days, MacDonald was not popular. 'He was never,' Robert Bernays wrote, 'at ease in the world he had conquered.' Inordinately proud and vain, he walled himself off from his subordinates; the story is told that he never spoke even to Arthur Henderson, his worthy second in command, except in cabinet. 'No prime minister of modern times has been on less intimate terms with his colleagues.' Like Woodrow Wilson he could not bear criticism. And his followers began to complain of his 'insufferable superiority'.

MacDonald, born without much sense of humour, a creature of angular and obstinate desires, with a highly oblique vision of his fellow men, full of Scotch mists and tempests, required, above all, adoration. And adoration was hardly the emotion he could inspire in his hard-headed and individualist colleagues. His wife, whom he had worshipped, died in 1911; he was an extremely lonely man. It was inevitable that he should turn to 'society'. He was 'taken up' by people like the Londonderrys, and few things mattered to him more than lionisation.

He became capable of profound ridiculousness. In 1929, en route to visit the United States, he is said to have wirelessly London for advice as to what he, the first socialist prime minister, should wear at the reception. The Foreign Office, terrified that he might step off the boat in a deerstalker hat or leather stockings or something else he would consider appropriate, wirelessly back that a top hat and morning coat would see him through.

¹ Great Contemporaries, p. 260.

In 1935, after the Stresa conference and when he was prime minister in the National Government, he warmly shocked a group of quite friendly journalists by asking them to leave the public restaurant-car until he had concluded his dinner. Everybody was hungry, but Ramsay, rolling towards Geneva, wanted to be alone.

A 'National' Government is a convenient device by which the leading party exploits a crisis by giving other parties representation in the cabinet, but on disadvantageous terms. Its result is permanently to split and weaken the opposition; it rubs down party lines, but maintains the pretence of comprehensive party support. MacDonald became prime minister in the first National Government in 1931. Possibly he thought that his labour colleagues would follow him in toto. Probably he didn't care much if they did or not. They didn't.

The financial crisis of 1931 was caused, basically, by the shrinkage of British exports and the decline of British shipping and overseas investments. The City of London had borrowed money on short-term, and lent it on long-term; it made money by paying three per cent on loans from France, and receiving six per cent on it from Germany. This process was a happy one until Germany, caught by the crisis, could not repay; London found itself with only £55 millions in gold, and with £250 millions in immediate outstanding liabilities. The London bankers might, they thought, save themselves by a loan from New York, but Wall Street refused to advance credit until the British budget, swollen by perfectly legitimate expenses of the social services and the famous but misnamed 'Dole', should be balanced. MacDonald went to the country on a promise to stick to gold and clean house. Campaigning, he descended to un-British demagoguery by exhibiting German banknotes of the inflation period, and threatening that presently a million British pounds would not suffice to buy a postage stamp. The country, frightened, gave him immense support. And then the cabinet was forced to do just what MacDonald had sworn it never would do. Britain devaluated her currency.

The National Government, of which Baldwin and not MacDonald soon became the leading power, helped to kill the disarmament conference, and repudiated the American debt; the world economic conference held under its auspices was a grisly failure. On the other hand, it revolutionised British tariff policy by introducing protection, which stimulated industrial recovery; it inaugurated a sort of empire customs union by the Ottawa agreements; it converted £2,000 millions of War Loan bonds from five to three and a half per cent.

Midway in his administration MacDonald's health began to fail. His eyesight troubled him, and he became seriously ill.

At about this time an incredible woolliness became noticeable in his public utterances.

Regarding unemployment, he described the problem to the House of Commons as follows:

'Schemes must be devised, policies must be devised if it is humanly possible to take that section (i.e., those unemployed who are unlikely shortly to be reabsorbed into industry) and to regard them not as wastrels, not as hopeless people, but as people for whom occupation must be provided somehow or other, and that occupation, although it may not be in the regular factory or in organised large-scale industrial groups, nevertheless will be quite as effective for themselves mentally, morally, spiritually and physically than, perhaps, if they were included in this enormous mechanism of humanity which is not always producing the best results, and which, to a very large extent, fails in producing the good results that so many of us expect to see from a higher civilisation based upon national wealth.

'That is a problem that has got to be faced.'

Regarding disarmament, he told the general committee of the disarmament conference the following:

'You are faced with the problem of what to do in respect to this question, to that question, and to the other question, but perfectly obviously, after you have faced the more superficial aspects of the separate questions, you want to know in relation to a complete plan what you are actually giving and what you are actually getting. Therefore, when the departmental, or compartmental, exploration has gone on to a certain extent it cannot be finished until somebody, co-ordinating all your problems, sets out in one statement and declaration the complete scheme that this Conference can pass in order to give security, to give disarmament, to give hope for the future - until that scheme has been placed before you, you cannot complete your examination of compartmental problems and questions. ...'

Lady Astor asked him in the House if he would consider appointing a woman to the front bench. He replied:

'I should be very glad not only to have one in the administration, but half a dozen, and if my Noble Friend will find that there are not quite so many, or even perhaps worse than that, I, having made that statement to her and given her that assurance, am perfectly certain she will not blame me for the result.'

Mr. Churchill, during these unhappy days, called MacDonald 'the boneless wonder'; the prime minister, he said, possessed the 'gift of compressing the maximum of words into the minimum of thought'. And Trotsky, be it remembered, once accused MacDonald of 'complete mental bankruptcy'; he called him a 'sober and timorous curmudgeon, in whom there is as much poetry as in a square inch of felting'.

MacDonald had seemingly lost all traces of socialism. He was howled down by his former colleagues, during the Means Test debate, as a 'mountebank' and 'a swine', 'a low, dirty cur who ought to be whipped out of public life'. He spent his time alone, brooding, or in the parlours of the rich. At a public dinner he once excused himself with the remark, 'I am sorry to leave this congenial company, but I must preside at a Coal committee.' And the wits said, 'Ramsay has finally succeeded in nationalising something – the government.'

One sentiment is to his credit; in the spring of 1935 he took a strong line against Hitler; he realised how dangerous Germany was becoming. But apparently it was not only the persecution of pacifists or socialists like (theoretically) himself in Germany which turned him against the Nazis, but – a more or less emotional consideration – his horror that the German Government had executed two handsome and aristocratic women spies.

In November 1935 MacDonald was beaten for re-election at Seaham – to the relief of some millions of his countrymen. He had already given way (after the Jubilee) to Baldwin as prime minister. When Baldwin was succeeded by Neville Chamberlain, MacDonald retired from public life.¹

Hoare

Rather arch, rather delicate, bookish, fond of sports like ice-skating, Sir Samuel Hoare, the new home secretary, gives an impression of primness which his inner character belies. He was an active air minister; he flew twice to India and back. As secretary of state for India he wrote the India bill, the longest in the history of the British parliament; with supernal industry he answered 15,000 questions about it, made 600 speeches, read 25,000 pages of reports and participated in a debate which lasted seven and a half years and comprised 15,500,000 words in Hansard, which is equivalent to twenty books the size of the English Bible.

¹ Mr. Ramsay MacDonald died on a liner on his way to South America on November 9, 1937.

Moreover, during most of this labour, his chief antagonist was Winston Churchill, the most accomplished and tenacious debater in the House of Commons.

Hoare became foreign minister in June 1935, partly because Baldwin knew his abilities, partly as reward for his prodigious Indian labours. The bill itself, a typically Baldwin measure, was a middle-of-the-road affair. It outraged Indian nationalist and diehard Tories both, by extending a measure of self-government to India while retaining the essentials of British control.

Mr. Gandhi liked Hoare, because, as he said, Hoare said No when he meant No, instead of evading direct statement with pious platitudes, as MacDonald did. The great Indian leader once told Lord Irwin, the former viceroy, whom he deeply admired despite their political antagonism, 'You know, I trust that man Hoare as I do you' – which was as high a compliment as existed in Gandhi's vocabulary.

Hoare comes from an old banking family. He learned rudimentary Russian (his teachers were the translators to the then Imperial Russian Embassy in London and the cantor of the Orthodox Church), and went to Russia during the War, as a member of the British Intelligence Service. He was so expert at his job that – as he himself revealed in a speech in 1933 – the Czar accused him of foreknowledge of the murder of Rasputin. Hoare left Russia in February 1917, and went to Italy with Lord Milner, as a general staff officer. After the War he spent some time in Czechoslovakia and he has been president of the Anglo-Czech Society in London. Meantime, he has uninterruptedly been a conservative M.P. for Chelsea since 1910.

Hoare's literary affiliations with France are close. I read in the Evening Standard recently that his wife's grand-aunt, Aimée de Coigny, inspired André Chenier's La Jeune Captive. Like the permanent under-secretary, Sir Robert Vansittart, he is widely read in French literature, and he speaks French well. He mildly startled the House of Commons in October 1935, by being the first foreign minister ever to quote Marcel Proust there. Emotionally, Hoare is very much closer to the French than to the Germans; and considerations like these are apt to play a certain role in policy.

We have noted Hoare's part in the Abyssinian negotiations, and how the Hoare-Laval plan – only temporarily – ruined him. Obviously he had been made a scapegoat, and within six months after retiring as foreign minister he was back in the government in charge of the admiralty, an equally important job. One footnote to the affair caused titters. Explaining the Abyssinian business to his constituents in Chelsea in February, he defended himself for having gone to Paris to meet the wily Laval. He didn't want to go, he said, but the British ambassador in Paris pressed him to break his journey to Switzerland for the visit. 'I could not refuse,' Sir Samuel's letter read, 'though it meant separating myself from Lady Maud and the luggage.'

Hoare is often spoken of as the next prime minister if Neville Chamberlain should some day retire.

Eden for One

No one need go far in seeking the sources of Anthony Eden's sincerity in the cause of peace. Two of his brothers were killed in the War, Edward, the eldest son of the family, in France, and the youngest, William Nicholas, who, a midshipman at Jutland, perished at sixteen.

Eden, one of the most attractive figures in world politics to-day, who succeeded Hoare as foreign minister, was born in 1897. His mother was a famous society beauty, his father, Sir William Eden, a terrifyingly 'county' baronet who, interested also in art, once quarrelled famously with Whistler. His family connections are typical of the gentry. His wife is the daughter of Sir Gervase Beckett; once he fought an election against Frances Countess of Warwick, who (only a genealogist could get the details clear) was both his sister's mother-in-law and his wife's stepmother's sister. Eden went to war at seventeen and was gassed at Ypres; at twenty-one, a survivor, he was captain. Then he went to Christ Church, Oxford. He was not faintly interested in politics; he did not even join the Union. He studied (and got first-class honours in) Oriental languages; his only conspicuous undergraduate activity seems to have been an essay he read on – Cézanne.

But presently he found himself in politics, and his rise was extraordinarily rapid. It seemed at first that he was a typical specimen of the young man-about-politics: good family; Eton and Oxford; War service; handsome wife; two sturdy boys; comfortable private means; impeccable clothes; conventional good looks.

But by 1926 he had become parliamentary private secretary to Sir Austen Chamberlain, then the foreign secretary. This was partly because the shrewd Baldwin had an eye on him, partly because the conservative back-benchers were demanding jobs for the young men. By 1931 he was parliamentary under-secretary to the Foreign Office, and as Sir John Simon's popularity in Geneva and Whitehall waned, Eden's rose. He did most of the hard work at Geneva. In 1934, as Lord Privy Seal, he was practically the sub-foreign minister; in 1935 he entered the cabinet as minister without portfolio for League of Nations affairs.

It was not merely his sincerity for peace and his charm and likeableness that brought him this post. What counted were, first, the picturesque unorthodoxies in his character, which were especially notable because his outward stamp appeared to conform so closely to the common mould. He studied Persian; this was odd. Once in Sweden, guest of honour at a hunt, he refused to shoot a stag, because it was 'too beautiful'. Second, he was Baldwin's 'man' in the Foreign Office, and thus a check on Simon, who was detested by the Tories. Third, the permanent staff of the Foreign Office swore by him.

Eden is a skilful and patient negotiator; he made the Jugoslavs and Hungarians agree after the murder of King Alexander, which is as if he had made Goering and Dimitrov kiss. He was the first British cabinet minister to enter Russia since the revolution in 1917; the job called for the maximum of tact, resilience, and candour. The Soviets had been deeply suspicious of British policy, and the British Tories thought that Stalin and his men were poison. Eden and Stalin liked each other at once. Then came Abyssinia, and Eden's importance in British politics steeply rose; he was the darling of the peace-balloters and the pacifists, so much so that his departure from the government might have wrecked it. To millions in the country, Eden personified peace.

Why didn't Eden resign after the Hoare-Laval fiasco? Probably because the 'old-school-tie' tradition demanded that he stay loyal to his chief.

Plenty of diehards dislike Eden; but as long as Chamberlain is prime minister his position is reasonably secure.

Halifax

We have several times mentioned Lord Cecil, England's foremost apostle of disarmament. There should also be a word about Lord Halifax, called the 'saintliest' character in British public life.

Like many Englishmen of the upper class his name has changed with bewildering frequency; as minister of agriculture he was known as Edward Wood; as the most notable Viceroy of India of modern times he was Lord Irwin. Now called Lord Halifax since his father's death, he is leader of the House of Lords and Eden's first collaborator on foreign policy. Halifax, like Simon and several other British intellectuals who are also politicians, was a Fellow of All Souls at Oxford, a great distinction; since 1933 he has been Chancellor of Oxford University. He is a devout churchman. A 'liberal' among the conservatives, the modesty, detachment, unworldliness and extreme moral dignity of his character have brought him fame.

Tories

Major (now Mr.) Walter Elliot, formerly the food dictator, now minister for Scotland, began political life as a fabian socialist; he is a Tory to-day but the Tory who is most susceptible to the contemporary shibboleth of 'planning'. His abstruse experiments in reorganising British agriculture, his complex net of subsidies and quotas and marketing acts are necessary because a complete policy of agrarian protection would starve England. He was educated to be a doctor; he wants to be a scientist in politics. Even Mr. Wells is not enough a planner for his taste. Commenting on a speech by Wells, 'Whither Britain?' Elliot said, 'He consigned himself to the nineteenth century with his opening remarks.'

Like many Britons, Elliot has a rhyming sense of the ridiculous. The philosophy of determinism, he remarked in his presidential address to Aberdeen university, might be expressed by the following ditty:

'Oh, damn! At last I perceive what I am,
Just a creature that moves in predestinate grooves,
I'm not even a bus, but a tram!'

Then, describing the astronomer Sir James Jeans, Elliot said:

'Oh, cuss! Though his picture grows steadily wuss,
I shall go on my way whatever they say,
For I won't be a tram, I'm a bus!'

And when he was a student at Glasgow university he wrote an Ode to the Pig, two lines of which were:

'Alive it is a loathsome beast,
But dead provides a toothsome feast.'

His visions of economic reconstruction follow quite orthodox lines; the 'leisure state', he thinks, can be produced by laissez-faire capitalism. He is a relentless empiricist; the saying is that he remains minister of agriculture because no one else could possibly understand the complicated structure of his regulations. Their result has been, of course, to make much friction with the dominions, who quarrelled about how much meat they might export to Britain, and to raise the prices of foodstuffs for the British consumer, in order that the producers might survive.

Oliver Stanley, formerly minister of labour, now President of the Board of Trade, is the son of the Earl of Derby, and he married Lady Maureen Stewart, daughter of Lord Londonderry. He has, like most Tory politicians, a good War record; unlike most of them, he is a wit: once he said that Sidney Webb had 'blue books in his veins'. During the General Strike he served as a clerk in the Westminster tube station. With the willingness to admit mistakes that is an excellent tradition in British politics, he offered to resign as minister of labour when the Means Test regulations broke down. 'That the responsibility for the error was mine is a thing,' he said, 'that I have never attempted to evade.' He didn't explain why he had made the error in the first place. Ramsay MacDonald, the 'socialist', refused to accept his resignation.

Alfred Duff Cooper, husband of Lady Diana, is the best and ablest of the younger Tories: intelligent-plus, combative, thoroughly sound on foreign policy, liberal, tenacious. He and Eden, with Ormsby-Gore, are the 'young Turks' in the cabinet, opposed to the ossified conservatism of the elder statesmen. Since he became minister of war late in 1935, after years of impatient second-stringing, Duff Cooper has made things hum. With Hoare and Swinton, the air minister, he is concretely responsible for the development of the armament programme. Duff Cooper doesn't mind being indiscreet when necessary. Early in his tenure of office he tilted a lance at the pacifist bishops, and in Paris in June he raised a minor storm by a sensible speech (in French) which was interpreted as a bid for an Anglo-French alliance. He is only 46. The social grace and beauty of his wife have been of considerable importance to his career. Their young son, like his father, will go to Eton. Duff Cooper is the author of an admirable book on Talleyrand, a less admirable one on Field-Marshal Haig.

Sir Thomas Inskip is the sixty-year-old man of mystery who, to general astonishment, was promoted early in 1936 to be minister for the co-ordination of defence. Inskip, a devout churchman, is above all 'safe'; therefore he is sometimes spoken of as a future prime minister. One cruel story accounts for his defence appointment on the ground that Baldwin, with great difficulty, had to find someone for the job 'even less brilliant than himself'. Inskip has had a fairly distinguished career at the bar.

Not So Simple Simon

Sir John Simon just squeezed home in the 1935 general election, with his group of 'Liberal National' supporters of the coalition government reduced in number. No matter how unpopular Simon may be, his position in the cabinet is secure, because inclusion of his liberal supporters is necessary to retain the pretence of 'National' government. This, of course, causes dissatisfaction in Tory ranks; the MacDonald 'National Labourites' who possess exactly seven seats in the House of Commons, have three cabinet posts; the Simonites have no fewer than four jobs in the cabinet for their meagre thirty-three seats in the House; the Tories, with a colossal block of three hundred and eighty-four seats, have to be satisfied with the rest of the cabinet posts, twenty-two in all.

Simon, the greatest lawyer in modern England and the least successful foreign minister, has always wanted to be liked more than people liked him. This is the tragedy of his life. About no other man in English public life, except MacDonald, is there such a miscellany of cruel legends.

One story has it that he won so many cases against others that he lost his own.

Mr. Lloyd George is reported to have said of him that 'John Simon had sat on the fence so long that the iron entered his soul!'

One apocryphal story is that Simon, finding an acquaintance of long standing to be useful, came up to him, put his arm around his shoulders – and called him by the wrong Christian name.

Mr. Garvin, referring to the 'half-headedness and half-heartedness' of the foreign policy of the first National Government, said that Simon created the impression of a man marking time with an agility intended to resemble walking.

The story is told that when Sir John Simon plays golf, he putts around bunkers.

He understands things, it was said, 'only through his mind'.

¹ Reduced to two when J. H. ('Jimmy') Thomas resigned in June 1936, after the budget leakage scandal.

In one of his really bad-tempered moments, Mr. Lloyd George said, 'Many a better man than he has crossed the floor of this house before him, but none has left such a slimy trail of hypocrisy behind him.' (Inquest on Peace, p. 356.)

Philip Snowden said, 'Sir John Simon is the chief advertising agent of the government and of himself; but if he had any sense of the pitiable failure he made of the high and responsible office he held, but of which he was happily deprived for his country's good, instead of appearing so much on the public platforms he would hide his head in some place of suitable obscurity in the hope that his miserable record would be forgotten.'

Simon is, of course, not nearly so forbidding a creature as these stories make out. An exceptionally shy man, lonely and anxious to be popular, he was afraid to offend people. That he was a devoted public servant for almost a generation was never doubted.

His unpopularity as foreign minister was largely the result of his virtual advocacy of the Japanese case in the Manchurian crisis at Geneva. Matsoaka, the Japanese delegate, told friends that Simon had said in fifteen minutes what he had been trying to express for weeks. Simon offended the United States during the Manchurian crisis; he disastrously weakened the League; he was accused of responsibility for the failure of the disarmament conference.

It was Simon who, in a historic speech during the General Strike, declared the strike illegal, which more than any other thing broke the spirit of the workers. This has not endeared him to labour.

It was Simon who, as chairman of the Indian Statutory Commission, produced a report hundreds of pages long (which was a dead letter before it was published); he gave Mr. Gandhi hardly a paragraph.

Finally, it was Sir John Simon, who, with his usual ill luck, was responsible as home secretary for the first handbooks on Anti-Gas precautions; and in no circles were they very popular.

Liberals

The opposition liberals were practically wiped out in the November 1935 election. Sir Herbert Samuel, the cultivated and philosophical Jew who had been leader of the party, lost his seat; his successor was Sir Archibald Sinclair, a young Scot who is half-American and who began politics as Winston Churchill's secretary.

Sinclair was honest and bold enough to sacrifice his career – temporarily – by sticking to free-trade and the remnants of the historic liberal party, when after the Ottawa agreements he crossed the floor of the House and resigned his membership in the first National Government.

David Lloyd George and his family group survived in the 1935 elections. They are 'independent' liberals. Lloyd George himself has sat in the Commons uninterruptedly for forty-five years, a dazzling record. But at the end of his career the great Welshman was fighting a more serious enemy than any political adversary: he was fighting – time. His last speeches, however illuminating they may have been on domestic affairs, have acutely disappointed his friends when they touched on the situation abroad. Lloyd George has turned into something of a pro-German; doubtless this is conscience money for the Treaty of Versailles.

The liberals, Lloyd George among them, are much tempted by the United Front idea. But so far labour will have nothing to do with them.

B.B.C.

Sir John Reith, the tall and powerful director-general of the British Broadcasting Corporation, is not a resident of Whitehall, but his modernist citadel on Portland Place is more important in the life of Britain than most government offices. Reith, 'a fanatical Puritan, in awe of hell, yet suspecting Heaven', is a complex character; he rules the B.B.C. with a hand of granite. 'A great black tower of a man, one eye burning fiercely, one a little scared, mouth moulded in a cynical No.' (I am quoting an anonymous commentator in the New Statesman.) 'His smile is so rare and so lovely that the humanity it discovers seems a mirage. . . . He has no intimates and few friends. Futile to pump his staff. They do not know him, or he them.'

Reith is a Scotsman, the son of a Glasgow clergyman. He had long experience as an engineer, first in the civil engineering department of the Admiralty, then as general manager of Wm. Beardmore and Sons, the steel firm. He has made the B.B.C. an expression of his nonconformist conscience. He has also made it probably the finest broadcasting organisation in the world. Even socialists like it, because it is a public body ruled by charter, and its relation to the state is semi-socialistic. Reith, able if narrow, might make a considerable career if he went into politics.

Norman

'Unless drastic measures are taken to save it, the capitalist system throughout the world will be wrecked within a year.'

- MONTAGU NORMAN IN 1931.

Montagu Collet Norman, since 1920 governor of the Bank of England, is to banking born. Both his grandfathers were directors of the Bank of England, one of them for more than fifty years. He went to Eton, King's College, Cambridge and served in the South African war. For some years he worked in commercial banking (he was connected with the house of Brown-Shipley); like many great bankers, he is not much interested in money personally, and he is by no means a very rich man; money and its mechanism is rather a fascinating problem to him as a diplomat, a mathematician, almost a creative artist.

His farouche air of international intrigue-cum-artistic worldliness is famous. Everything is permitted him, because he has been governor of the Bank of England longer than any man in history. He wears flowing capes, black slouch hats, and a waggish beard; his house on Campden Hill is decorated with extraordinarily silken elegance. Yet he takes the tube to work every morning, and likes to be the last man on the escalator. He enjoys appearing to be mysterious, and he has made only three public speeches in his life.

Norman's experience alone would make him indispensable. But he has more than mere experience. His technical capacity to handle banking problems is superb, his skill and boldness in negotiation considerable. Like many Englishmen, he knows how to make a virtue of humility; in October 1932 he said 'the difficulties are so great, the forces are so unlimited, precedents are so lacking, that I approach the whole subject in ignorance. . . . It is too great for me—I will admit that for the moment the way, to me, is not clear.'

Once, amiably chatting with a banker friend, he listened imperiously to the argument that the gold standard would impoverish Britain in the long run. 'Tell me,' Norman is reported to have asked, 'do you think it better to be rich than to be poor?' His friend replied, 'Well, I have been poor, and now I am fairly rich, and I hope to be richer.' Norman replied that he was not sure but that countries which were too rich went to pieces; he pointed to the example of Periclean Athens and Imperial Rome. His friend did not reveal the substance of the conversation; the intimation that the governor of the Bank of England might consider it his duty to impoverish his country for the country's benefit would not have been too popular.

He was, of course, the main spirit forcing England back to the gold standard in 1925. This severely punished British industry, but, like most central bankers, Norman worshipped gold. By insisting that Snowden (who didn't need much persuasion), should stick to gold, he was the spiritual author of the 1931 financial crisis. He has admitted, too, that various foreign (mostly German) concerns had been able 'to borrow on short credit sums which, had the various lenders all been aware of it, would have been quite out of the question'. Apparently there was little co-operation between the lending agencies in London; competitively they threw their money away.

Norman has, as is well known, great regard for Dr. Schacht; the governors of all the central banks play together closely. His high opinion of Schacht's shrewdness dates, it is believed, from 1927, when both attended a conference in New York, Schacht opposed, speaking broadly, a world easy money policy; Norman favoured it. Events ultimately proved Schacht to be right, because the unstable Wall Street boom, when it collapsed, provoked the world crisis; and Norman ever after has respected Schacht for his prescience, and for having proved that he, Norman, was wrong.

Hugh Dalton, who was under-secretary for foreign affairs in the second Labour Government, records how he became aware that Norman pursued a foreign policy quite his own. There was a 'dyarchy'. No matter what the real Foreign Office might be doing, Norman's policy proceeded on the basis that 'unless Germany is economically strong and prosperous, it is impossible to balance the one-sided political strength of France on the continent'. When the Credit Anstalt, the great Rothschild bank, crashed in Vienna in 1931, Norman on his own responsibility advanced to Austria enough credit, it was hoped, to tide the crisis over. Two years later the loan was transferred from the books of the bank to the treasury, i.e. the British taxpayer.

But it should not be assumed too glibly that Norman always rules the treasury. Snowden fed out of his hand; but not Neville Chamberlain. Indeed the treasury, ever since the devaluation of sterling, has been more important than the Bank, because the treasury, by controlling the exchanges through the £300,000,000 Equalisation Fund, has usurped one of the Bank's primary functions. Norman would like to see the pound high and stable, and perhaps even a return to gold. The treasury wants to keep the pound fairly low and, within limits, variable, in order to reduce the debt charge on the budget and to encourage industry. So far the treasury has been the winner.

Two More - of the Best

The discrepancy in politicians between outward appearance and inner character is nowhere more apparent than England. Take, for instance, the case of Sir Austen Chamberlain.¹ Caricaturists for twenty years have portrayed him as a stalactite, as an icicle, with his frigid monocle and glassily protruding chin. But as a matter of fact Sir Austen is a lively youngster of seventy-two, full of laughter, quite supple, a great humanist, with charm as well as character. Chamberlain has filled practically every great political office in England except the highest. Twice, through loyalty to colleagues, he surrendered his chances for the premiership. In 1931 he stepped aside as the National Government was being formed in order to give way to younger men. Since that time his influence in the country, far from diminishing, has actually increased. This is because, not even Churchill excepted, he commands more weight than any backbencher in the Commons. He is one of the supreme rulers of the Tory party. When Austen Chamberlain said thumbs down on the Hoare-Laval plan, the plan was forthwith doomed. Chamberlain is, as everyone knows, pro-French and anti-German.

Winston Churchill, like so many British politicians, seems younger than he is. And his sixty-two is practically babyhood considering his immense vitality and the tradition of venerableness in British public service. Winston may still become prime minister. He has certainly been everything else. And not only in the field of politics. Restless, dictatorial, voracious for experience, intensely ambitious, this scion of the Marlboroughs with an American mother has been a brilliant soldier, water-colour painter, journalist, historian, bricklayer, administrator, orator. He has, it has been said, a 'noisy' mind, and he is much given to rhetoric; but few modern books in English can rival his World Crisis for comprehensive and sustained brilliance of style and clarity of exposition. The blot on Churchill's character and intelligence is his inveterate phobia about anything faintly pink. Lately, fearing Germany more than Russia, he has been less rabid, at least so far as foreign policy is concerned. It was his influence more than any other factor which drove Britain to its rearmament programme. Churchill's judgment is faulty, people say; he is too impetuous and 'unstable'; but many people think that in a great upheaval he might emerge as Britain's national leader.

¹ Sir Austen died suddenly in the spring of 1937, just before his half-brother Neville became prime minister.

Lord Beaverbrook

The circulation of his chief newspaper, the Daily Express, is the largest in the world, some two and a half million daily, and soon it may be three million. The quality of his ambition is inconstant: business, politics, journalism, have taken him by turn. The bitterness of his feud with Baldwin is partially forgotten; his influence in crusading for empire free trade, friendship with the United States, and isolation from the Continent, is considerable. His reputation as a host is fabulous; all over the world friends testify to the magnitude of his charm. William Maxwell Aitken, Lord Beaverbrook, the chief of the 'Press Lords', is one of the most provocative unpredictable, and lively public men in England.

Beaverbrook, the son of a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ontario, Canada, in 1879. A poor boy, he amassed an astounding fortune, at least a million pounds, by the time he was thirty. Electric power and cement were his magic lamps. He dropped business, went to England, ran for parliament, and became the close friend, the eminence grise of Bonar Law. For ten years, mostly behind the scenes (though he was a cabinet minister for a time) Beaverbrook – a new 'incomparable Max' – shifted other cabinet ministers like puppets. He made the alliance between Bonar Law and Lloyd George; he played a prominent part in overthrowing Asquith. Then apparently politics began to bore him. His health, too, was uneven. He took over the Daily Express, founded the Sunday Express, obtained control of the Evening Standard, and ever since has been the restless Puck of British journalism.

CHAPTER XX

LEFT AND RIGHT IN ENGLAND

'When a revolutionary party has not the support of a majority either among the vanguard of the revolutionary class or among the rural population, there can be no question of a rising. A rising must have not only the majority, but must have the incoming revolutionary tide over the whole country, the complete moral and political bankruptcy of the old régime – and a deep-seated sense of insecurity among all these irresolute elements.'

– LENIN.

SOCIALISM in England, as is notorious, is not revolutionary, and not even the grisly condition of the depressed areas, the suffering of two million unemployed, and the eloquence of Sir Stafford Cripps can make it so. It is difficult to organise effective solidarity among the poor in a country where, as Mirsky puts it, 'the smallest white collar clerk thinks of himself as the opposite of a workman'. The measure of British recovery that has occurred has occurred partly at the expense of the working class; but this does not much increase the labour party, the I.L.P., or the exiguous communist vote.

The labour party itself, a product of the Fabian doctrine of the 'inevitability of gradualness', made no official declaration of socialist principles until 1918. The influence of Marx among British socialists was always comparatively small; and when the first Labour Government was formed, it took office not only on sufferance but on the understanding that, even if it could, it would introduce no socialist measures. The trade unions (who represent eight million British workmen) only became formally committed to socialism in 1924. Trotsky quotes MacDonald to the effect that revolution is 'a ruin and a calamity, and nothing more'.

When labour was called upon to form a government, Hugh Dalton says, it had the choice of three alternatives. It could have refused office, since there was no clear labour majority in parliament. It could have accepted office, introduced 'some bold socialist measures', and gone down to defeat, then appealing to the country in a new election. Or it could have co-operated freely and frankly with the liberals who held the balance of power. Instead, the MacDonald cabinet did none of the three; it only muddled.

Labour had won two hundred and sixty-one seats in 1929, a very respectable total (caused partly because so many fights at that time were three-cornered). It sank to fifty-seven after the financial crisis of 1931 and the formation of the National Government. In 1935 it rose only to 154, though the total opposition vote was forty-six per cent of the electorate. There were several reasons why the showing was not better. First, the National Government boasted of the prosperity it had produced. Second, labour was in an impossible position as regards foreign policy, since on the one hand it supported the government in sanctions, while on the other, illogically, it opposed rearmament.

Armament has been a disastrous issue for Leftists everywhere for several years. If they took a genuinely long view, they had to concede the necessity of eventual defence against Germany. Yet if they supported armament and a strong government they would help to make capitalism stronger and thus write the doom of socialist reform in their own countries. The first duty of genuine Leftists was to support the U.S.S.R. But since Germany was the chief potential enemy of the U.S.S.R., they could do this only by strengthening the capitalist states which were anti-German, and which would then be in a stronger position to destroy revolution at home.

Besides labour in England suffered from divided leadership. The death of Arthur Henderson removed the one personage in the party both vital and venerable. Henderson, a doughty figure, whose heart and health were broken by the sabotage of the disarmament conference, spoke in a language few of his subordinates had the courage or capacity to copy. When he was foreign minister in the second Labour Government, the New Statesman relates, one of his officials suggested that he send telegrams to Mussolini and the Pope congratulating them on the Lateran Treaty. 'No,' replied Uncle Arthur. 'I shall send no telegram to the Pope; I am a Wesleyan. I shall send no telegram to Mussolini; I have denounced him in a public speech as the murderer of Matteotti.'

Of the contemporary labour chieftains, the most interesting are Morrison and Cripps.

The Boss of London

'The socialist minister of the future must try to be as good a man at business for public ends as the ablest of the capitalists or managing directors are for private ends. . . . It is essential that socialism should be sound public business as well as being healthy in its social morality.'

- HERBERT MORRISON.

Morrison is a born Cockney. He is the son of a policeman. He has lost an eye. He had only board school education. He has been an errand boy, a shop assistant, and a telephone operator. The curl in his hair, his unquenchable good humour, his gift for pungent repartee, his realistic optimism, make him remarkably resemble early characters by H. G. Wells, for instance Kipps. He has been secretary of the London labour party since 1914, and he is an efficient and indeed almost a ruthlessly good organiser. Since 1932 he has been not only party chief in London but majority leader of the London County Council. As minister of transport in the second Labour Government, he put through its most praiseworthy legislation, the bill reorganising London transport. He is plausible, lively, and inquisitive.

'Mr. Morrison,' wrote A. J. Cummings in the News Chronicle, 'is the rising hope of the labour party – one might say its only hope. He is a comparatively young man with a political future that holds out the dazzling promise of the premiership as its crown and climax. He is an astute politician with sincere convictions whose party loyalty has never been questioned.'

But on November 26, 1935, Morrison was not chosen as the leader of the parliamentary labour party, but a man somewhat his inferior in personality and push, Major Clement Attlee; which was a bitter disappointment to those who had thought of Morrison as the inevitable leader. Reasons: Morrison was too much on the Right for the Leftists in the party. Morrison was, the trade unionists suspected, likely to be too strong a character to be easily manageable. He was a London product, and the trade unions dislike the London labour party, in which their influence is comparatively small. Finally, Morrison was the victim of inertia. Attlee had succeeded to the temporary leadership of the party when old George Lansbury resigned, and he led the party in the election fight; it seemed discourteous to remove him.

Morrison is not an expert on foreign affairs, but his intuition is quick and his instincts good. At the 1935 party congress, for instance, he 'urged that the labour movement (which had just adopted sanctions by a twenty to one vote) should not make the mistake of assuming that it could destroy Fascism by upsetting Mussolini as it once hoped to destroy militarism by getting rid of the Kaiser.'

He is distinctly on the Right wing of the labour movement; but even so the Leftists thoroughly respect him.

Cripps

'You have only got to look at the pages of British imperial history to hide your head in shame that you are British.'

— SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS.

The best intellect among labour M.P.s is probably that of Sir Stafford Cripps, son of Lord Parmoor and nephew of the Webbs, socialist by conviction, one of the best parliamentarians in England, and, like Simon, a great lawyer and advocate. He founded the socialist league (within the parliamentary labour party); he is very far to the Left. He shocked a good many people by saying once that eventually 'we shall have to overcome opposition from Buckingham Palace'. Tories — a significant point — are afraid of Cripps, whereas few of them fear Morrison. They think that Cripps might, if he got the chance, inaugurate a real socialism-in-our-time policy, and even try to abolish the House of Lords, and rule by an Enabling Act. This has frightened conservative labourites too; after a good start toward the party leadership, he underwent comparative eclipse.

England is a country of superb surprises, for which reason one should not be surprised to learn that Cripps, the last possible remove from the workman-agitator, is a man of considerable wealth; he fights entrenched privilege from the inside. His fees as a K.C. are estimated at £30,000 per year. Once he told a political audience that as a lawyer he met the people of the ruling classes: 'They pay me fabulous and fantastic sums to get them out of their difficulties. I have no hesitation in saying that the working class of this country are more capable of ruling than they are.' And the passionate radical sincerity of his convictions is beyond doubt.

Cripps has pointed out that during the first term of the National Government the number of people on Poor Law Relief increased by four hundred thousand and he is convinced that Fascism has already protruded ugly fingers in the life of Britain. The Manchester Guardian quoted him recently saying that the first definite and conscious step toward Fascism was the Trades Dispute Act of 1927. The 1931 elections were 'essentially Fascist in nature'; the forces of capitalism had such a triumph at the polls that 'there was no need for any formal personal dictatorship.' He notes the contrast of subsidies to capitalists — for instance those of Elliot's agricultural schemes — with 'the discipline imposed on the workers through the Means Test'. 'The worker is being, and has been, disciplined not viciously and ruthlessly as in Germany and Italy, but gently and firmly as one would expect from a country-gentleman-Fascism in Britain. Coloured shirts are not necessary and are embarrassingly obvious, a special constable is much cheaper and attracts less attention.'

His definition of the corporate state is interesting: 'A method by which complete power is given to the capitalist to produce that scarcity which will ensure him a share of the national wealth out of all proportion to his efforts, and which will enable him to enslave the workers by substituting for their freedom and right to combine a nominal and ineffective minority voice in the government of industry.'

Cripps and Morrison might be quite capable of working well together, despite their ideological differences. The former could supply theory and strategy; the latter organising power and sense of political tactics. But against them both is the great conservative force of the trade unions.

T.U.C.

'For my part I would rather rely on Sir Walter Citrine, arch-priest of British trade unionism, than on Mr. Baldwin, the conservative prime minister, to keep the present system intact. There is to-day no Toryism more fearful and immovable than that which is enshrined in the ideals and practice of trade union leadership.'

— A. J. CUMMINGS.

In the labour opposition in 1937 there were seventy-two nominees of the labour party itself, and seventy-four representatives of the trade unions. These were sub-divided as follows: thirty-seven men of the miners' federation, seven municipal workers, six railway clerks, six transport workers, five distributive workers, three from the national union of railway men, two composers, and one each from eight other unions. The last thing that most of them want would be socialism in our time.

The most prominent trade unionist, like Sir Walter Citrine, the general secretary — the National Government recently knighted him, which was shrewd politics — and Ernest Bevin, the boss of the comparatively new and powerful Transport and General Workers' Union, are not M.P.s. The general rule is that the T.U.C. chieftains stay out of active politics. But they control the labour party, because they have the funds.

The triumph of Sir Walter Citrine is that of method. He was a member of an electrical union and then became assistant-secretary of the Trades Union Congress; his extreme organisational skill made him indispensable; and he succeeded to the leadership. He lives, it has been said, on his files; he is a filing Robot. When, once, he was invited to an informal discussion among labour intellectuals, to thrash out some party business, he brought the files – and a secretary – along; the secretary took down everything that he said, presumably so that later he could not be incorrectly quoted.

Citrine visited Moscow in the autumn of 1935 and wrote a book about Russia which sought to be impartial. But he rejected an offer of a communist-socialist united front. Since 1928 he has been president of the International Federation of Trade Unions.

Attlee

The leader of the labour party and head of his Majesty's most loyal Opposition, Major Clement Attlee, would not have been leader had not the whole labour front bench been wiped out in the 1931 elections. But since 1935 when he has had a chance to show himself, his capabilities have vastly improved. Attlee was of middle-class parentage and background, and became a socialist through intellectual conviction rather than through the hard school of poverty and direct awareness of social injustice. He has considerable grace and pertinacity and a very fair wit. He is only fifty-four. What he lacks most is colour, personality. Unlike most Labour leaders, he is a public school and Oxford man. For two years he laboured with Sir John Simon as labour representative on the Indian Statutory Commission.

Among the younger socialists the most interesting is perhaps Aneurin Bevan, the member for Ebbw Vale. His wife is Jennie Lee, the youthful member of Scottish I.L.P. Bevan is a Welshman, a miner's son, who worked underground as a child and then educated himself despite formidable obstacles of poverty. Vital, ambitious, magnetic, with an immense Welsh laugh, he is one of the most attractive characters in the Commons. His comment on sanctions gives a clue to his pungent quality: 'Britain's policy is that of the successful burglar turned householder who wants a strong police force. If I am going to ask any worker to shed his blood, it will not be for medieval Abyssinia or for Fascist Italy, but for the making of a better social system in this country.'

The Red Fringe

One communist M.P. was elected to the House of Commons in November 1935, Willie Gallacher, a veteran Scottish revolutionary.

A typical enough Clydeside crusader, he began as a liberal, turned socialist, finally became a communist; he led the first strike against the War – in 1915 – that took place in England; Lenin admired him greatly. But Gallacher is not as important to the communist movement as Harry Pollitt, the leader of the party and a member of the executive committee of the Communist International. Pollitt is a Marxian theorist, who, a boiler-maker by trade, is also a practical journalist and politician. One of the most acute journalists in London told me that he considered Pollitt's 'news-sense' to be better than his own. Evidently a believer in the policy of boring from within as well as without, Pollitt keeps his trade union membership and ordered his followers to vote labour in the last election (except in the few constituencies where communists were standing). As an organiser of the party, he receives its maximum salary, £4 per week. He is, of course, vividly eager for a united front. An unquenchable speaker, writer, and propagandist, Pollitt is one of the most attractive public men in England.

From several points of view the I.L.P. (Independent Labour Party) is to the Left of the communists, like the P.O.U.M. in Spain. It opposed sanctions, which the communists approved; it refused any compact with labour, and the labour machine fought it even on the Clydeside, where it was impregnable. Four I.L.P. men sit in the present House; it is a small group, but noisy. The I.L.P. was founded as far back as 1893, and in early days it had great influence on labour policy. In 1932, devoted to genuinely revolutionary tactics, it broke with labour.

The leader of the I.L.P., James Maxton, was once, like Litvinov, a soldier; he belonged to the territorials. His first instincts were conservative; the story is told in Glasgow that while Elliot was a Fabian, Maxton was a Tory. Lean, with a famous mane of black-white hair, a 'cadaverous British Danton', Maxton sardonically denounces the government for planning to spend one hundred million pounds on road development – to make them safer for the next hunger marchers. Maxton, a unique personality, provides yet another British paradox; he is an overt revolutionary, yet both Baldwin and MacDonald would admit that he is the most popular man in the House of Commons.

'This Rock Shall Fly from its Extreme Base as Soon as I'

On the extreme Right, far beyond even the Chamberlains and Hailshams and Londonderrys, are two lonely last-ditch imperialists,

L. S. Amery, former minister of colonies, and Lord Lloyd, once governor-general of Bombay and high commissioner of Egypt. Amery has lately been conspicuous as the leader of those M.P.s most resolutely determined to block the possible return of colonies to Germany. 'If I were asked to name the most convinced diehard among the great politicians of to-day,' wrote Robert Bernays, 'I should pass over the claims of Mr. Churchill and plump for Mr. Amery. . . . He is an imperialist of the school of Treitschke and Bernhardi. . . .' And thus he is out of office. Amery is diminutive, pugnacious, a formidable if dry debater, and, like most top-flight English politicians, a man of great intelligence and culture.

Lord Lloyd, whose tradition is that of Empire administration rather than Westminster debate, traces his ancestry back to the princes who ruled Dyfed (South Wales) nine hundred years ago. He was one of Colonel Lawrence's early companions in the Arabian adventure. It was he who first caused Gandhi to be arrested; he lost his job in Egypt when the conciliatory Arthur Henderson became labour's foreign minister. Like Amery, he is an isolationist and an imperialist. As a proconsul, he was a famous martinet; he believed in pomp. Once when the Prince of Wales visited him in Bombay, His Royal Highness is reported to have murmured, 'I never knew how royalty lived until I stayed with George Lloyd.'

Mosley

'Over the whole of this Abyssinian dispute rises the stink of oil, and stronger than even the stink of oil is the stink of the Jews.'

- MOSLEY.

With Sir Oswald Mosley, Fascism became a thrice-told tale; it became a watery English stew that compared to Italian Fascism as a soggy British cabbage compares to the fiery authority of Italian wine. If the other dictators of the age, Hitler and Mussolini, are boils and pimples, as H. G. Wells expressed it, Oswald Mosley is a blackhead.

Mosley is ambitious. He is (he rather resembles Starhemberg) strikingly handsome. He is probably the best orator in England. His personal magnetism is very great. He was competent enough intellectually to draw into his camp, before he turned Fascist, some of the best young minds in England. Nevertheless his movement at the end of 1935 had petered out. In the November elections he did not run a single candidate.

In The Town Labourer J. L. and Barbara Hammond wrote,

'In 1596 a Mr. Oswald Mosley . . . bought the land on which Manchester now stands for £3,500. In 1846 the town of Manchester bought the manor and all the rights and incidents from Sir Oswald Mosley for £200,000. . . .'

The present Sir Oswald, the sixth baronet to bear the name, inherited a fortune of £247,000 from the late baroness; from his grandfather, who died in 1915, he received £60,000 more. In 1920 he married Lady Cynthia Curzon, the daughter of the late Lord Curzon and the granddaughter of Levi Leiter, the Chicago millionaire; she too was wealthy. At the wedding two kings and two queens were present.

Mosley entered politics as conservative M.P. for Harrow, but presently became 'independent'. There were several reasons for this. As a rich young conservative, he was only one among many rich young conservatives. As an independent who was rich, other parties would be interested in him. Finally, the labour party was rising in influence, and Mosley had strong ideas about economic reform. In 1924 he became a labourite. 'When my wife and I joined the labour movement,' he wrote, 'it meant a complete break with family and former associations.' This plunge into proletarian existence had however its compensations. He bought one of the most beautiful and ancient manor-houses in England (price £9,000) and spent £10,000 rebuilding and furnishing it. Meantime, the toiling masses heard with interest that his wife wanted to be called 'plain Mrs. Mosley'. But when his father died, he assumed the parental title.

In 1929, at the age of thirty-three, he went into the labour ministry as chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. This job is a ministerial sinecure; Mosley was in effect a minister without portfolio to deal with unemployment. Of his intelligence, his magnetism, there was no doubt. He advocated a vigorous policy of public works; but J. H. Thomas and the stand-pat labour leaders rejected his 'Mosley Memorandum'. He resigned his post, and set about organising a party of his own. Several labour people were tempted to join him, for instance John Strachey, now the most brilliant and persuasive communist pamphleteer in England; but when he formed his 'New Party' it had only five members in the House, and as his ideas became more and more Fascist, his Left supporters dropped him. The New Party had only a year of life, and in September 1932 Mosley emerged as leader of the B.U.F., British Union of Fascists.

The movement is compact of all the familiar Fascist nostrums.

Mosley attacks the City of London and the Jews; he demands a strong policy for India; he appeals for support of the working classes by demagoguery very much like Hitler's; he does not go so far as to threaten revolution, but he hints that the 'Gordian knot' must be cut; he brings little fresh salt to the Fascist pie. Arrogant, supercilious, dressed in black like a skating champion, he puts on a superb show; he is one of the most graceful speakers alive; but what he talks is mostly nonsense. Spectacular, he organised his Black Shirts on more or less the German model; but at a great meeting at Olympia on June 7, 1934, rough-house by his bodyguards seriously discredited the movement.

On May 11, 1935, Mosley sent the following communication to Julius Streicher, the SA boss of Nuremberg:

DEAR HERR STREICHER, - I thank you very much for your telegram regarding my speech at Leicester, which arrived in London during my absence.

I value this message of yours, in the midst of our hard fight, greatly.

The might of Jewish corruption must be overcome in all great countries before the future of Europe can be assured in justice and in peace.

Our fight is a difficult one. Our victory certain. I thank you. Yours very faithfully, MOSLEY.

- (Daily Herald, May 11, 1935.)

Sometimes, in view of his attack on the Jews, Mosley was heckled by people who alluded to his wife's Jewish blood. Arms akimbo, shoulders arched back, he replied (on one occasion) 'My wife is of Dutch extraction.'

Rothermere's affection for Mosley cooled, particularly after the June 30 murders in Germany, and the British Fascists began to droop. They were, of course, fighting on sterile ground, because of British industrial recovery. One thing might make Mosley of importance again - reaction against a powerful Labour Government, if, miraculously, labour should come powerfully to office.

MOSLEY, LLOYD GEORGE AND MAXTON

CHAPTER XXI

DE VALERA

LIKE many modern chieftains, Eamon de Valera was not born a citizen of the country he rules. Hitler, as we have seen, was an Austrian; Pilsudski was Lithuanian in origin, not Polish; Josef Stalin still speaks with his native Georgian accent; Kamal Ataturk was born in Salonika, Greece, and Dr. Kurt von Schuschnigg, the Austrian chancellor, in Riva, Italy.

This is a demonstration, among other things, of the way frontiers have danced about since the War. Salonika was still part of Turkey when Kamal Ataturk was an infant; Riva was part of Austria when Schuschnigg went to school. Eamon de Valera's birth-place is separated from his capital by 3,000 miles of ocean. He was born, in 1882, in New York, his father was a Spanish immigrant from Cuba, his mother an Irishwoman lately an arrival in America. De Valera's American birth – and citizenship – saved his life.

Whereas Austrianism has been something of an encumbrance to Hitler, the fact that the Irish leader was American made him President of Ireland. For he was saved from execution after the Easter rebellion in 1916 purely because the British military tribunal had no wish to alienate American opinion by shooting an American citizen. Almost every other commandant in the rebellion was shot. Had he been born elsewhere than in America, the history of the Irish Free State would have been very different. Perhaps – it is quite possible – there would have been no Free State at all.

Eamon de Valera is one of those rare statesmen, like Disraeli and Theodore Roosevelt, who are blessed by a universally known nickname. To everyone in Ireland de Valera is simply 'Dev'. This at once gives some indication of his quality. The Irish are not particularly prone to giving nicknames; Mr. Cosgrave never had one. A nationally-used nickname indicates intimacy and affection; it is a tribute worth thousands in votes; it is the ultimate in honours conferred upon a statesman by the lay public. Mere demagoguery cannot win a nickname, nor can mere success, no matter how great. Hitler has never been nicknamed, and neither was Woodrow Wilson. But Theodore Roosevelt became 'Teddy' or 'T. R.' and Mr. Lloyd George became 'L. G.' No one in his own country has ever dared to nickname Mussolini or Kamal Ataturk. But everywhere in Ireland Eamon de Valera is just 'Dev'.

Not many people, however, call him 'Dev' to his face. His wife does, and those who are intimate enough to address him by his Christian name, if it were commonly used. Some of his mother's relatives in County Limerick, where he was reared, still call him Eddie. His friends and colleagues usually say Chief, or if addressing him in Irish, Uachtaran (President). He himself addresses most of his staff by their first names, in their Irish form. But 'Dev' is what people call him when he is not in the room.

Ten years or so ago, when he was in opposition, known as 'the President of the Republic' to his followers, the Cosgrave government introduced a Bill in the Dáil Eireann (National Assembly) making it a serious offence to use the title 'President' to describe anybody but Mr. Cosgrave, who was president of the Executive Council. At a public meeting in Dublin, one of the de Valerists, Countess Markievitz, rose and said that she had never called the President of the Republic anything but Dev, but that henceforth she would call Dev nothing but the President of the Republic. Whereupon the Bill was dropped.

Like most men with a single-track mind, de Valera gets a lot of work done. He puts in a gruelling day. Usually he arrives at his office in Government Buildings between 9.30 and 10. He receives, as a rule, the heads of all departments under his direct administration; he scrupulously pays attention to the smallest details. He returns home for luncheon and is in the office again shortly afterwards. He works till six, goes home to tea, and frequently returns to the office again at night. Often, passing Government Buildings, one may see lights in the President's quarters till after midnight. He has bread and butter for supper. He has never, except for reasons of illness, taken a holiday.

He has the spare but rugged frame that fanatics need. He was a first-class rigger player in his youth, and is still an excellent horseman, very fond of riding. He likes to hike and climb. Almost every Sunday he may be seen walking across a pass in the hills about ten miles from Dublin. His car, empty except for the chauffeur and detectives, drives slowly along; Dev walks behind it, very rapidly, hatless, his hair on end. His clothes, even on this occasion, are usually black. Members of his family have a hard time keeping up with him, so rapid is his pace. Behind are other detectives – members of a group of eight chosen men – who are never far from his person.

He never touches a drop of any kind of alcohol in Ireland or England. He believes drink – hard drink – to be the curse of his country. But, an odd point, he drinks wine or beer when he is on the Continent. He likes nothing better than to sit in a café in Zurich or Geneva sipping a glass of beer and watching people. He does not smoke. But until 1916 he was a heavy smoker. The story is told that he filled his pipe and was about to light it when, after the Easter Rebellion, he was on his way to penal servitude. He stopped suddenly and said, 'I will not let them deprive me of this pleasure in jail!' He threw away the pipe, and has never smoked since.

His hobbies, apart from exercise, are chess, listening to the radio, and above all, mathematics. He was an omnivorous reader until his eye complaint grew serious. He especially read Shakespeare and the Gaelic writers. He speaks Irish fluently and correctly, but with a strong guttural accent. The intellectual pleasure that matters most to him is mathematics. One day going to Rome he asked his secretary what he thought of the quaternary theorem. 'Nothing,' the secretary replied, who knew only elementary mathematics. It was a boiling hot day, and the rest of the staff dozed, but Dev spent twelve solid hours teaching the secretary the quaternary theorem. The secretary said that Dev's twelve-hour lecture was the most brilliant intellectual performance he had ever known. When in jail in 1918, incidentally, de Valera spent all his time mastering the Einstein theory.

His wife was a school-teacher, Sinéad Ní Fhlannagáin (Jennie O'Flanagan), whom he met at the Gaelic League when he was learning Irish. The legend is that de Valera was unable to enter the Civil Service because he failed in his examinations in Gaelic; the story may be apocryphal, and, anyway, Dev married his teacher. That was in 1910. They had seven children. One boy, Brian, was killed riding in Phoenix Park, Dublin, in February 1936. The eldest boy, Vivian, has his Master of Science degree from the National University of Ireland and is now a demonstrator in University College, Dublin; he has also been gazetted lieutenant in the National Volunteers. The eldest girl is also a Graduate of the National University. The younger children are still in secondary school or college.

Mrs. de Valera was a beautiful fair girl. Her golden hair is now turning grey. She is reserved in character, like her husband. The family has almost no social life, except the minimum necessary for official functions. When de Valera became President his wife said that she wished the government would give him an official wife to tend to the official entertaining. The de Valeras live in a simple house on Cross Avenue, Blackrock. They have only one servant, a maid. Before 1932 they had no servants at all, and lived in a much smaller house; Mrs. de Valera did all the work. They entertained guests in the dining-room. Like all the Irish, Mrs. de Valera has a long memory. The younger children are clever and very popular in Blackrock. They have been invited to parties by families who were desperate political opponents of de Valera in the early days. Mrs. de Valera refuses the invitations on the ground that the children are 'too busy'.

President de Valera is extremely accessible as a statesman and he receives a great number of people. (He is very particular about newspaper interviews, however; everything must be checked and okayed by him.) He has many friends. One is a rich farmer doctor, by the name of Farnan. De Valera often visits him late at night and they take long walks together. Another is his secretary, Kathleen O'Connell. She has been with the Chief for almost twenty years, and knows his work and the method of his mind inside out. De Valera is very attractive to women, but pays no attention to them. They follow him about at functions; he is smiling but reserved, and, without ever being rude or pompous, manages to create a sense of distance between himself and them.

He has utterly no interest in money. He reduced his salary from £2,500 to £1,500 on taking office. He has no private means, no expensive hobbies, and no taste for luxury. He is very fond of music. His views on art are unknown; he does not appear to be much interested in graphic art. He is, of course, extremely religious, but his Catholicism is neither ostentatious nor bigoted; several of his friends are Protestant. Whenever possible, de Valera is a daily communicant at Mass. As one of his staff expressed it to me, 'His whole life is a prayer.'

His sense of humour is hardly robust; but it exists. It is on the ironic side. He rarely makes jokes, but he appreciates comic situations, and when he laughs, he laughs very heartily. Once he was arrested, at Ennis, in the middle of a speech. A year later he was released. He went forthwith to Ennis, and began to speak again with the words, 'As I was saying when I was interrupted -'

His personal traits are clearly marked: rigid self-control; fanatic faith in his duty to Ireland; extreme seriousness of mind; complete unworldliness; a certain didacticism; stubbornness; humanity. People say that he has lost his temper publicly only once in his life; it occurred during a debate on the Irish Press bonds. Similarly his friends can recall only very rare and isolated cases where he gave way to emotion. Once in 1921, when the Treaty had been ratified by seven votes, he got up and said, 'During these last four years we have worked together like brothers—'; then his voice broke and he sat down and cloaked his face with his hands. He was intensely fond of his son Brian; but immediately after his tragic death he appeared at a party meeting quite calm. When he enters a public place—for instance, the stands at a football match—he does not smile or nod to the crowd. He walks straight ahead, very reserved, and seems to pretend that the crowd is not there.

Eamon de Valera discovered Ireland at the age of two. His father (in New York) died and he was dispatched to Ireland in the care of his mother's brother. He lived in his grandmother's home near Bruree, in County Limerick. His mother, who stayed in America, married again; no one seems to know accurately how much contact there was between mother and son during his early years. He went to the local school, living meanwhile on a farm, and won a scholarship, owing to his skill at mathematics, in a religious school near Cork. For a time he thought of entering a Jesuit college. Instead he went to Blackrock College, near Dublin, where his own children were subsequently educated. He got his degree at the Royal University, learned Irish, became a teacher, and opened his career as a nationalist and a revolutionary.

In many European countries to-day many young men follow roughly the same pattern. In Jugoslavia, in Bulgaria, in Turkey, in Syria and Egypt and Palestine, I have met young de Valeras of various breeds. They may also—who knows?—become fathers of countries. Not many have the great intellectual equipment de Valera possessed, and very few can be his equals in force of character; but the general type is the same. Poverty in youth; the struggle for an education combined inextricably with nationalism; deep religious faith in many cases; dedication of the totality of life to a passionate desire for freedom. Many of the nationalisms represented by these young men seem feeble and petty. The hatreds they engender—that of a young Syrian for the French, for instance, or a Croat for the Serb government in Belgrade – seem deplorable. But they are living factors in the Europe of to-day.

De Valera, from the beginning, was an extremist of extremists. It was inevitable that he should join Pearce, MacDonough, MacDermott, and the others in the proclamation of the Irish Republic at Easter 1916. It was a mad adventure. It could not possibly succeed. It was sheer suicide. So the level-headed ones said at the time. They were wrong. The rebellion was put down by force of arms, true, after a week's fighting; all the leaders except de Valera, true, were sentenced to death and shot. But the Easter rebellion was not a failure. It was a success. So at least de Valera would look at it. For out of its fire and bloodshed came – after terribly tragic years – the Irish Free State, with himself on top of it.

De Valera was one of the 'commandants' who were charged with the actual military operations, and his handful of men were in occupation of a place outside Dublin called Boland's Mills. This was a key spot, because the British had to pass it to reach Dublin from the sea. From Boland's Mills a murderous fire raked the British troops. De Valera's men were the best trained, the best led, in the Irish Army. The British themselves conceded this. One of de Valera's tricks was to station a very few men, with a couple of machine-guns, in an outhouse from which the Irish flag was flying. This deceived the British into thinking that it housed his main force. De Valera did not want to surrender when the revolt – inside Dublin – was crushed, but he obeyed his superior officers. He came out of Boland's Mills to surrender, saying, 'Shoot me if you like. Let my men alone.'

He was sentenced to death by military tribunal, but the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment when it became known that the leader was an American. The British at the time were very anxious that America should come into the war on the side of the Allies; the Irish-American vote and sentiment were important. He spent only a year in Dartmoor, because in 1917 there was a general amnesty. Promptly – since most of the other republican leaders had been shot – he was elected president of Sinn Fein. He was also Sinn Fein M.P. for Clare. He never got a chance to sit at Westminster – of course he was an abstentionist and he would not have gone to London even if permitted – because early in 1918 he was again arrested, and this time sent to jail in Lincoln.

About his escape from Lincoln there are many legends. The true story appears to be this. He drew a grotesque picture on a postcard!

it showed a drunken man fitting an enormous key into a lock. The card passed the censor, but its Irish recipient, dull-witted, put it away in a drawer thinking that Dev was off his head. The picture, in reality, was an accurate drawing of the key to the prison yard. Later the friend got another similarly grotesque postcard, this time depicting a smaller key. The friend now put two and two together. A key was made and smuggled into de Valera. It did not fit. Then Dev managed to make a wax cast of a key from a bit of candle. This was smuggled out; later a key blank and a file, concealed in a cake, were smuggled in. And one fine evening Dev walked out of jail.

There was a tremendous man-hunt for him. De Valera got to Manchester and hid in the house of a priest. As he walked in, the priest had been reading in the Bible the words, 'Knock, and it shall be opened unto you.' De Valera got to Liverpool, and made his way – with some difficulty – to Ireland. One story is that he disguised himself as an ordinary seaman, and was scrubbing the decks under the very feet of the detectives who searched every boat for him; another is that he was hidden by a friend in the potato stores, was literally buried in potatoes till the search was over. Then he went to America, disguised as a stoker. His arrival in New York was a nine days' wonder. The police were still scouring England and Ireland for him. He spoke all over the United States, raised money for the Irish cause, and established himself as the undisputed spokesman of free Ireland.

He returned to Ireland to the tune of more narrow escapes and adventures. He landed first in Liverpool, aboard the Celtic. He bribed an officer of a tramp steamer to smuggle him into Ireland; the fee was £100. Whereupon the officer went ashore and had a drink or two. De Valera was hidden in his cabin. The officer did not return as the ship was due to sail. The captain, furious, came to his cabin to investigate. Thinking quickly, de Valera pretended to be very drunk himself. After a tense few moments, the captain dismissed him as a harmless if exhilarated friend of his absent officer. And the ship sailed. Once in Ireland again – this was in 1919 – history began.

It was history of a most disorderly, cruel, factional and bloody kind. The story has been told too often, and at too great length, to bear detailed repetition here. De Valera was elected President of the Dáil Eireann comprising the Sinn Fein deputies from Southern Ireland. The de Valerists constituted themselves a national assembly, refused to take the oath to the King, and proclaimed their independence. Civil war began: the Black and Tans and Irish nationalists slaughtered one another. The war ended in a truce in July 1921, and negotiations went on for five months until the Irish Treaty was signed. This gave Ireland dominion status, but separated the Free State from Ulster. The de Valerists split. De Valera, though the delegates who went to London were his plenipotentiaries, disowned them and refused to accept the treaty. He wanted more. He went into opposition; which meant that civil war started once again.

It ended with mutual exhaustion, and in the spring of 1923 a Cease Fire order stopped the bloodshed. De Valera and his group of followers, now a minority, insisted that the Treaty had been imposed on the Free State by Lloyd George's threat of war, and refused to sit in the Dáil so long as members took the oath to the King 'in virtue of the common citizenship of Ireland with Great Britain and her adherence to and membership of the group of nations forming the British commonwealth of Nations'. In June 1927 the Cosgrave government passed a bill requiring that candidates for the Dáil, must, if elected, promise to take their seats. This brought de Valera and his forty-three men into the Dáil. A new election increased his strength to fifty-seven. Finally, in 1932, he won a majority, by coalition with the Labour Party, and displaced Cosgrave as President. He went to the country in 1933 and got a clear majority – but a slight one – and has been in power ever since.

When I saw de Valera last summer it was with the understanding that I would not quote him directly on Irish affairs. It was not an interview; merely a brief chat. His office is a simple small room, with 'President' printed in black on the frosted window. It resembled the kind of room which a modest executive official of a very modest business might use. No particular decoration; no covey of secretaries; no swank. Just a big desk next to a small window and a tall, gaunt man behind it.

De Valera looks less severe than his pictures. The long nose and the deep lines to the mouth are his most characteristic features. He seemed younger, I thought, than his fifty-four years. He was alert, interested, and extremely courteous. He speaks with a perceptible brogue; words like 'that' or 'this' come out with the 'th's' thickened.

I explained that I had recently been appointed London correspondent of my newspaper and that this was my first visit to Ireland. I said that I was very happy, after many years on the Continent, to be exploring these new realms, and that life in the British Isles was most exciting. My use of the term 'British Isles' was an unconscious little slip. Mr. de Valera did not allow it to go uncorrected. Quite soberly he smiled and said that if I had meant to include Ireland in the British Isles, he trusted that I did so only as a 'geographical expression'. I explained that my chief duty to my newspaper was to gain knowledge, background, education. 'Very well,' Mr. de Valera said, 'let your instruction begin at once.' And he set out to explain the difference between Ireland and the 'British Isles'. Some moments later, having again necessity to describe my field of operations, I sought a phrase and said, after a slight pause, 'a group of islands in the northern part of Europe.' Mr. de Valera sat back and laughed heartily. I hope he will not mind my telling this little story.

DE VALERA

We talked a good deal about Austria and Central Europe, whence I had recently come. The President was exceptionally well-informed on European conditions and affairs. For a time it seemed that he was interviewing me, not vice versa. He asked a great many questions, all of them acute. I tried to answer. What would be the result of a plebiscite in Austria? Was there any possibility of Austrian union with Hungary? What was the attitude of Starhemberg to this and that? What was the character of Dr. Schuschnigg? And so on.

The President thought that the most disconcerting thing about Europe was the way people – good and intelligent people – had been forced by the pressure of events to think of war as an inevitability. Five years ago that was not true, he was inclined to think. War was something that people feared, and which they hoped would not come. But nowadays it seemed that people considered war as the normal thing to expect. He shook his head gravely, and said that if he had been born a German or a Frenchman he would have devoted his whole life to trying to make permanent peace between France and Germany.

Then Mr. de Valera turned to Ireland, and my 'instruction' began. He was patient, explicit, and formidably, sombrely reasonable. But in that gaunt face I saw the eyes of a fanatic. When I left him, deeply impressed by his terrific Irishness, I recalled the little story about his first talk with Lloyd George. 'How did you get along with de Valera?' the Welshman was asked. 'We have talked for two days,' Lloyd George sighed, 'and he has got up to Brian Boru.'

Beyond the obvious things – tenacity, intelligence, and so on – it would seem that a main source of de Valera's power is his community with people. His position – especially since the abolition of the Senate – is virtually that of a dictator, but he is an unchallengeably firm democrat. He believes in the people; his people believe in him. He said recently that he did not think he would ever again have to take arms in his hands and fight for Ireland, but that he would gladly fight – and die – for democracy. His faith in the fundamental goodness and rightness of people is profound. In 1933, however, he was quick to smash the Blueshirt (Fascist) movement, because he is well aware that even the best of people may be misled, and that a first duty of democracy is to protect itself. Almost immediately on reaching power, it will be recalled, he submitted himself to an election which he did not, technically, have to hold. The instant his majority is lost, he will resign. In 1934 an organised campaign against local rates and taxes began. Some of his friends appealed for more vigorous action against saboteurs who were felling trees across roads and cutting telegraph wires. 'No,' de Valera said. 'Leave them to the people. The people themselves will check them.'

The faith of the average Free Stater in de Valera is little short of idolatrous. Way back in 1921, when it seemed that civil war was imminent again, de Valera organised his volunteers. During a test mobilisation near Dublin a road mine was found to be defective. De Valera examined it, discovered what was wrong, and put it right. 'He's a greater soldier than Napoleon,' one of the men exclaimed. Now, however fine a military amateur de Valera may be, the comparison is, of course, ridiculous. 'But it is a great thing,' the Irishman who told me this story commented, 'that a leader should have followers who really think of comparing him to Napoleon.'

He is utterly without personal ambition. His only ambition is the unity and self-determination of the Irish people. 'It is not a question of what I want,' he told an interviewer once, 'but what the people of Ireland want.'

Since reaching power de Valera has, as was inevitable, tweaked the British lion's tail. The Dáil has abolished the oath of allegiance to the King, greatly reduced the power and privileges of the governor-general, denied the right of appeal from the Irish Supreme Court to the Privy Council, and withheld the land annuities. These were payments of roughly £5,000,000 per year by Ireland to Britain on account of loans during the last century by which Irish tenant farmers purchased land. The British retaliated by a prohibitive tariff on Irish goods, chiefly the agricultural produce – cattle and milk and butter – which was the bulk of Ireland's export business. An economic war began, and still continues. As a result de Valera has had profoundly to change the texture of Irish economic life. He has cut down imports, built sugar factories, sown the land with wheat, and killed off his surplus cattle by trying to encourage leather and meatmeal industries; in a word, he has been forced by Britain to an experiment in self-sufficiency. How successful it will be none can tell. The effort has been great, and the cost tremendous. Meantime, there are signs – very slight but something – that the President's obsessive hatred of Britain may be modified. For instance, he announced early in 1936 that the Irish Free State would never permit its territory to be used by any foreign power as a base for attacking England.

De Valera's whole life has been dominated by one idea and ideal: a united and independent Ireland. This he has not achieved. What he has achieved is the creation of a Free State which, as it was aptly expressed, is in the British Commonwealth, but not of it. The Free State is a compromise between republican aspirations and the blunt realities of British power. De Valera's feeling is, perhaps, that a generation is very short in the life of mankind, and that the creation of the Free State is a beginning that will develop to its proper end. He wants and needs only two things, one of his friends told me – peace and time.

.
In April 1937 the new Constitution of the Irish Free State was published. In July de Valera was re-elected president of the executive council after a close fight.

CHAPTER XXII

DANUBE BLUES

'The situation in Germany is serious but not hopeless; the situation in Austria is hopeless but not serious.'

— VIENNESE SAYING.

'AUSTRIA is ruled,' said old Viktor Adler, the founder of Viennese social democracy, 'by Absolutism modified by Schlamperei.' I do not know exactly how to translate this lovely Viennese word, Schlamperei, but roughly it means slovenliness plus a certain charm, provided you do not lose your temper. Adler made his little joke many years ago; despite the terrible trials Austria has undergone since 1919, including the two civil wars of 1934, it still holds good to-day.

But Austria and its entrancing capital Vienna no longer quite represent the undiluted joy of life of other days. The Föhn, that seductive and enervating breeze from the Austrian Alps, the source of much of Vienna's pervasive, exasperating charm, still blows — yes. The Viennese, a profoundly civilised people, still drink gallons of beer and the best coffee in the world, discussing placidly the really important things of life, like Mozart and whipped cream — yes.

Nevertheless we who lived in Vienna through the year 1934 have had to alter our comfortable view that the Viennese were invariably shiftless, easy-going, sophisticated, gentle. We found that some things, in the last analysis, were more important to the Viennese than the first act of the newest Jaray comedy, or the latest subtle embroidery on the theories of Freud or Stekel. We learned that the Balkans do, as Metternich said, begin at Landstrasse Hauptstrasse.

Austria to-day is a country roughly three-fifths the size of England, with a population of six and a half million, a good deal less than that of London. Before the War Austria-Hungary, with fifty million people, stretched from the Carpathians to the Adriatic; the chief psychological problem of the country in post-War years was adjustment to this shrinkage from imperial greatness to meagre exiguity. The story of the two Tyroleans is well known. 'Let's take a walk,' one said, 'around Austria.' 'No,' replied the other, 'I don't want to get back before lunch.'

The capital, Vienna, like a swollen head atop a dwarfed and shrunken body, contains more than one-third of the country's inhabitants, and this acute disproportion has been its chief economic problem since 1918. The country has to import more than it exports; it does not raise enough to feed itself; therefore it is very poor. Vienna, a gaping maw, swallows more than the mountainously beautiful but economically almost useless hinterland can produce. The chief crop of provincial Austria is – scenery.

The weakness of Austria has in a way been its greatest strength. Until 1934 at least its foreign policy was largely one of gentle blackmail; it demanded and got financial or political help from the other powers because it was a buffer state in a key position, and if it collapsed the whole Danube equilibrium would go to pot. A joke from Germany is relevant. Hitler, Goering, Goebbels, discuss what they will do if the Nazi régime crashes. Goering says: 'I will wear civilian clothes, and no one will recognise me.' Goebbels says, 'I will keep my mouth shut, and people will not know who I am.' But Hitler says he need do nothing: 'I am an Austrian, and therefore the powers will have to protect me.'

Austria is not only the pivot of the Danube, but the key to great events far afield. In March 1931, the German foreign minister Curtius and the Austrian chancellor, an honest but dull-witted policeman Dr. Schober, suggested a Customs Union between their respective countries. This, of course, aroused French rage, because the Quai d'Orsay saw it as the first step to Anschluss, union of Germany and Austria. So the French withdrew credits from Austrian banks and helped to provoke the collapse of Credit Anstalt, the chief financial institution in Central Europe. Results: the German banking crisis, the reparations moratorium, the flight from sterling. Banks crashed through Europe like tin pans down a concrete alley. A politico-economic quarrel in remote Vienna, it was proved, could – and did – shake Great Britain off gold. Confidence, betrayed by the pound sterling, left the earth; and it has not yet returned.

The disequilibrium between Marxist Vienna and the clerical countryside was the dominating Motiv of Austrian politics until the rise of Hitler. Vienna was socialist, anti-clerical, and, as a municipality, fairly rich. The hinterland was poor, backward, conservative, Roman Catholic, and jealous of Vienna's higher standard of living. The socialists, to defend themselves in what they thought was their impregnable citadel, founded a private army of young workmen and intellectuals, the Schutzbund. The countryside promptly countered with a similar army – but recruited from primitive and hungry peasant lads, in leather breeches and green hats – the Heimwehr. The struggle between these two forces resulted in the civil war of February 1934.

In Vienna the socialists produced a remarkable administration, making it probably the most successful municipality in the world. By means of an ingenious if Draconian taxation system they financed paternalistic reforms of unparalleled quantity and quality; they built health clinics, baths, gymnasia, sanatoria, schools, kindergartens, and the imposing sunshine dwellings which, in decency and cleanliness if not luxury, housed sixty thousand families – socialist families. They eliminated slums; they cut down drastically the tuberculosis rate; they took money from the rich, who could spare it, and used it for the benefit of the worthy poor. The achievements of the Vienna socialists were the most exhilarating social monument of the post-War period in any European country. Result: the clericals bombed them out of existence.

Through the terrible years of poverty and deflation in the early thirties tension between the socialists and their opponents grew. The Credit Anstalt crash cost the country one thousand million schillings, about £28,000,000. The fall of agricultural prices in the Danube basin ruined Austria's attenuated trade. The political structure of the country creaked with strain. The socialists, with a cool forty-two per cent of the electorate, were the largest political party, but they shut themselves up in Vienna and turned their back on the country at large; had they tried to form a minority government – because a coalition of all the other parties could out-vote them – there might have been civil war. Little Putsches, instigated by the Heimwehr, did occur. Angrily tension increased.

The man in the street, sipping his coffee, dreaming of the great days before the War, seemingly paid little attention to the crisis. Vienna's familiar lassitude, product of the warm, sirocco-like Föhn, enveloped politics in a fog of languor. When the Customs Union and Credit Anstalt stories raged across the front pages of the world, the Vienna papers carried scare headlines – about the deficit in the Burg theatre. Man, said Aristotle, is a political animal; but Vienna is a woman. She had no practical head for politics, especially her own politics. The plan for a Danubian confederation got scarcely a yawn out of the Viennese – but when Jeritza missed a high C in Tannhäuser, the whole town rocked with shame. The country was poor, but it still managed to subsidise the Opera to the tune of £200,000 per year – so all was well.

Then two things happened to jerk Vienna from its pensive lethargy. One was Dollfuss. The other Hitler.

Duodecimo Dictator

Dr. Engelbert Dollfuss, who had a vivid couple of years as the political darling of western Europe, the ‘Millimetternich’ – so called because he was only four feet eleven inches high – the youngest and littlest of the post-War dictators, was born in Texing, a village in Lower Austria, on October 4, 1892. His origins were humble. His mother and brothers still till the soil near the farm where he was born. He worked his way through school, studied law at the University of Vienna, and when the War came served three years at the Front. He went in a private – in the famous Kaiserchützen regiment – and came out a first lieutenant, no small feat in the old imperial army.

Dollfuss was born a peasant and with belief in God. These were the two paramount facts in his character. Much of his personal charm and force came from his extreme simplicity of character; his modesty and directness amounted almost to naïveté. A foreigner approaching him with a compliment would hear a broad farmer’s accent in reply, ‘Ach – abr gehen Sie’ (‘Oh, go on. . .’) His speeches were extraordinarily unsophisticated; he listened to speeches of members of his cabinet who were experts in their field with the respectful attention of a child in school. Speaking himself, he was tense, awkward, overworked. A devout Catholic, his religious faith gave him something of the curious innocence of old, wise priests, an innocence as impregnable to the wiles of adversaries as the most glittering sophistication.

Of course his stature – or rather lack of it – helped him inordinately. He became David to the Goliath of the Nazis. His diminutiveness dramatised him into the heart of Austrian politics. He was a sort of mascot. One could be angry with a six-footer, but a prime minister barely five feet in his stocking-feet was irresistible. (These feelings were, of course, blasted by the events of February, when he stupidly moved against the socialists.) Tiny physically, Dollfuss was not however a dwarf. His smallness was shapely; all the features, diminutive, were well-formed.

The jokes about his size were famous. He broke his leg one day falling off a ladder; he had been picking a dandelion. The police discovered an attentat against his life; a mouse-trap had been secreted in his bedroom. Postage stamps were to be issued commemorating his victories, adorned with his portrait – life size. An Austrian physicist won the Nobel prize for his experiments splitting the atom, with Dollfuss as his subject. When agitated at night, he either paced up and down under the bed or went skating on the frozen surface of his pot. He did not take the train to Rome when he visited Mussolini; he was dispatched air mail. When the chief of the staff of the Austrian army, reviewing troops, was startled to see a turtle at the head of the formations, his shock was quickly dispelled; the turtle was the Herr Bundeskanzler – in a steel helmet.

Dollfuss entered politics as a member of the Christian Social (conservative) party, led by that astute cleric, Monsignor Ignaz Seipel. The little man was interested in agriculture; he organised a peasants' league in Lower Austria and presently became a deputy in the now-defunct Austrian parliament. The federal railways needed an agrarian expert and he joined its administrative council; in October 1930 he became president of the railways. In March 1931 he got a cabinet post as minister of agriculture. A year later an exasperating crisis provoked the resignation of the Christian Social government of Dr. Buresch. Dollfuss was asked to form a new government. No one else would take the ticklish job, because the party had a majority of only one in the chamber. Dollfuss prayed all night before accepting. This was on May 20, 1932. He remained prime minister until the Nazis murdered him in little over two years later.

No one, when he assumed the chancellorship, thought that he would last long; no one, indeed, thought that he was of any consequence at all. With a group of newspaper men I had lunch with him during the first week of his rule. Earnest, shy, tired, excited, Dollfuss sat, smoked and talked till dusk. And we became aware that here might be a person of original quality. The two main factors in his career became manifest soon after: (1) his capacity to take immediate advantage of a situation, (2) his sense of drama. Ratification of the Lausanne Loan¹ which was to bring 300,000,000 schillings to the country was up before parliament. The socialists and pan-Germans opposed ratification. Early that morning Dr. Seipel died. Dollfuss' majority of one had gone to heaven. So the miniature chancellor promptly swore in a successor and dragooned every member of his party, sick or well, to the chamber: one man was carried in by three comrades, another man came direct from hospital swathed in bandages. Dollfuss won – by one vote. And by such unconventional, even tyrannical behaviour! – exclaimed the Austrians, shocked and impressed. A few weeks later another crucial vote impended. Dollfuss won again, and again by a single vote. The missing adversary was the former chancellor Dr. Schober – who had died the night before.

¹ Austria was nearing default on the 1923 League of Nations Reconstruction Loan, which was guaranteed by the Powers. The Powers thereupon lent Austria more money because they themselves would have had to pay the original investors if default persisted. This was known as 'saving' Austria.

On March 4, 1933, the Austrian parliament committed suicide. It was a marvellously, typically Viennese occasion. A socialist deputy, just before an important vote, went out, as the phrase goes, to wash his hands. A colleague voted for him, but carelessly inserted into the box an incorrect ballot, one marked with his own name instead of that of the missing deputy. The vote was eighty-one to eighty against the government. The high-minded socialist speaker, Dr. Renner, announced however that an irregularity in the voting had occurred.¹ Long did he regret it. Because the chamber got excited and in the confusion Dr. Renner so far lost his head as to resign and walk out of the meeting. The two deputy speakers likewise resigned; the session ended in pandemonium.

Then clever Dr. Dollfuss discovered that legally the parliament could not reconstitute itself, since by law only the speaker or deputy speakers could call a session, and all three, having resigned, were powerless to do so. It was a ridiculous little contretemps, but the Austrians are extremely legal-minded, and it ended parliamentarism in the country. Dollfuss, like a bulldog, pounced on his opportunity. He resigned office – having learned the good political lesson never to offer resignation until you are indispensable – and was reappointed with emergency powers. On March 7 a flood of decrees splashed on Vienna. People read them – and discovered that Dollfuss was their dictator.

His luck, until the end, was always of phenomenal quality, but at two-fifteen p.m. on October 3, 1933, the luckiest thing of all happened: he was shot. At two-fourteen he was only a chancellor; at two-sixteen, he became a martyr, and a living martyr at that. Only good luck stood between his heart and the two bullets fired at less than a yard's range. It was his great sense of occasion that made him deliver a radio speech from his bedside which turned him into the world's favourite convalescent. The would-be assassin was discovered to be a slightly Van-der-loony Nazi. How Hitler must have wanted to choke him for having made a hero of his own worst enemy! For the enormous and foreboding shadow of the Nazis had, meantime, begun to fall on Austria,

¹ The issue was a motion asking lenience for railway workers who a few days before had gone on strike. The railway administration was hopelessly in debt and could not pay the men their full wages. The workmen protested. For want of a few thousand schillings in the railway cash box, parliamentarism in Austria expired.

Marauders from the North

Hitler, who had become chancellor that year, wanted Austria for a variety of reasons; he mentions the union of Austria and Germany in the very first paragraph of Mein Kampf.

(1) Himself an Austrian, he viewed the little country's 'misbehaviour' as direct repudiation by his own people and thus an unforgivable assault on his personal prestige.

(2) The pan-Germanism of the Nazis was bound to look ridiculous as long as 6,500,000 Austrian Germans, directly contiguous to the Third Reich, sniggered at the Swastika instead of worshipping it.

(3) Germany badly needed a triumph in foreign policy, and a successful assault on Austria would have cloaked discontent at home.

(4) Austria possessed valuable reserves of iron ore, the Eisenerz deposit in Styria, which would compensate for Germany's mineral starvation.

(5) If Austria became part of Germany, the Mittel-Europa dream would begin to be realised: the dream of an encircled Czechoslovakia, of a Nazi push into the broad plains of Hungary and beyond.

At the beginning Nazis within Austria represented only a very small force. In the last general election (November 1930) they had not got a single seat, though Hitler at that time in Germany commanded six million votes. When Hitler became chancellor, Nazism among Austrians, who are, after all, German, steeply grew. Had the Nazis behaved less stupidly Austria might very well have fallen into their lap. Dollfuss, quarrelling with the socialists, was in a ticklish position; his Heimwehr support was unreliable; jealous clerical politicians were undercutting him. And the biggest Nazi card was Austrian defeatism; the Austrians don't like to fight and their attitude was more or less, 'Oh, well, if the Germans want to take us in and support us, why not?' But instead of waiting the Nazis began an extraordinary campaign of terrorism and violence. This served to challenge Austria to stand on its own feet; it backed the country against the wall of its own dormant patriotism. Then Hitlerism inside Germany alienated large numbers of Austrian clericals, socialists, and Jews. In 1932, Austria was probably eighty per cent pro-Anschluss. By the end of 1933 it was at least sixty per cent against. Reason: the Hitler terror.

Even so, as the full-dress campaign of the Nazis got under way, Dollfuss faced formidable difficulties. Nazi violence in the form of shootings, intimidations, assaults, bombings, slanders, libels, occurred almost daily. The small but tough chancellor fought back. On May Day he forbade the usual social democrat demonstrations and to the amazement of the populace filled the Ringstrasse in Vienna with troops and barbed wire – as a show of force. Then he expelled the Bavarian minister of justice, Dr. Frank, who was visiting the country on a speaking tour. The Germans retaliated by imposing a 1,000 mark fine on German tourists to Austria, a serious blow to the tourist traffic; Dollfuss retaliated by outlawing the Nazi party. In Berlin the Austrian press attaché was arrested and expelled. This happened the night before Dollfuss was to address the London Economic Conference. The incident dramatised his appearance and he got a great ovation. The Nazis countered with more violence.

And then began a war, one of the queerest wars ever known everywhere, a war fought bloodlessly (except for casualties in minor border frays) but a war nevertheless. The Nazis invaded Austria. They crossed the frontier – through the air. Their planes dropped propaganda leaflets; their radio station in Munich, through the mouth of Herr Habicht, Hitler's 'inspector-general' for Austria, hurled speeches across the ether. As Austrian Nazis fled Austria, they were organised on German soil into an 'Austrian Legion', the avowed aim of which was reconquest of the homeland. Tension increased till the Great Powers found it intolerable; France, Italy and Great Britain joined to present a vigorous démarche in Berlin, and for a time the Nazis quieted down.

Even so, at the end of 1933, things looked very dark for Dollfuss.

Protector from the South

Three developments of great importance then occurred. First, Mussolini took Dollfuss in his pocket and became to all intents and purposes the Lord High Protector of Austria. This was because Italy could not endure the thought of strong Prussians instead of weak Austrians on the Brenner Pass, the frontier between Italy and Austria. If Austria went Nazi, it would in effect mean that Germany was in the backyard of Trieste and overlooking the fields of Lombardy, whereas it was cardinal point in Italian policy to keep independent Austria as a buffer state between the Fascist giants. Moreover, there are two hundred thousand German speaking people in the South Tyrol – and the further Germany is away from them the better Mussolini likes it. Dollfuss visited Mussolini three times. Their interests coincided.

Second, Dollfuss was forced to concede more and more authority to the Heimwehr, led by a young aristocrat and freebooter, Prince Ernst Rudiger von Starhemberg, and a tough Viennese ex-army officer Major Emil Fey. The Heimwehr, malignantly anti-socialist, became in effect the private army of the Dollfuss régime. As price for its support, it demanded more and more strenuous action against the social democrats. Dollfuss dissolved the socialist Schutzbund; he pinpricked and heckled the socialist leaders; he curtailed the financial privileges of the Vienna municipality; he gave way steadily to Heimwehr provocation. Moreover, the Heimwehr was financed partly by Italy, with the result that Dollfuss was doubly in Italian hands.

Third, Dollfuss, who had assumed five of the nine portfolios in the Austrian cabinet, becoming a dictator in name as well as fact, announced his intention to promulgate a new constitution reforming the state on an authoritarian, Staendische (guild) basis. He borrowed the idea from a papal encyclical, the Quadragesimo Anno of 1931, wherein Pope Pius XI pleaded for the end of social strife and urged the adoption of a corporate organisation of society as a 'cure' for class war. This meant, if introduced full force, the end of trade unionism under socialist control; so the socialists fought it tooth and hammer. As an adjunct to the new constitution, Dollfuss created the Vaterlaendische Front (Fatherland Front), a national movement above the parties, grounded on a patriotic basis. Mussolini approved both measures.

But the crisis with Germany got hot again. The equilibrium of Austrian affairs was permanently shattered. Instead of the former tug of war between two more or less equal opponents, socialist and clericals, Dollfuss had to survive an angry triple struggle; the country became divided into three groups, roughly approximate in power – socialists, Nazis, and government-plus-Heimwehr. The dynamics of this struggle were unpredictable. Dollfuss was in the Centre, fighting both Left and Right. If the Nazis and socialists had joined forces, he would have been crushed. But Hitler made a socialist-Nazi coalition impossible. Another danger then cropped up: the Nazis and the Heimwehr – bad actors – started secret negotiations.

To ease himself from these predicaments, Dollfuss himself began a flirtation with the Nazis. His policy had been consistently defensive; he was willing to negotiate peace on the basis of independent Austria. Hitler agreed to negotiation. The details were to be settled between Dollfuss and Habicht, and on January 8, 1934, Habicht by terms of the arrangement, stepped into a plane at Munich and headed for Vienna. At the very last moment, Dollfuss – the explanation is that more Nazi terrorism, contrary to the truce, occurred the night before – called off the plan. Habicht was stopped in mid-air by radio.

The next week Signor Suvitch, Mussolini's under-secretary of state for foreign affairs, arrived on an official visit to Vienna. He suggested a new way out. The Austrian régime, attacked on both flanks, could not possibly survive as it stood; Dollfuss had to eliminate one of his enemies in order to free himself to fight the other. Mussolini detested the Austrian social democrats. They had exposed his smuggling of weapons to Hungary in the Hirtenberg arms affair the year before. So the Italians told Dollfuss to 'solve' the problem by getting rid of the socialists. 'Liquidate the socialists somehow,' they said. This is the true explanation of the terrible event that then took place – the February civil war.

CHAPTER XXIII

THE FEBRUARY TRAGEDY

THE civil war, which echoed ominously in every chancellery in Europe, was called a socialist 'revolution' by the Dollfuss government. Just as the Nazis in Germany tried to foist on the world the legend that they saved the Reich from Marxism, so did the Dollfuss-Heimwehr-clerical apologists explain that they used field artillery to kill women and children in residential buildings in order to crush a 'Bolshevik insurrection'. This was, of course, not true. The tragic and terrible bloodshed of February 12 was the result of a cold-blooded Fascist (Heimwehr) coup d'état. The socialists resisted, certainly; so did the Belgians when Germany crossed the frontier in 1914. The Belgians may have fired the first shots, but they didn't start the War.

The government charged Dr. Otto Bauer and Col. Julius Deutsch, the two leading socialists, with being Bolsheviks. The fact was that their brand of social democracy saved Austria from Bolshevism in 1919 when both Bavaria and Hungary succumbed to communist régimes. The government alleged that members of the Socialist Schutzbund possessed illegal arms. They did indeed – arms which the government itself gave them. It was conveniently forgotten that the Schutzbund was armed as a defensive measure against Jugoslavia during a frontier crisis in 1920, and that for many years the Schutzbund and federal army held the arms in common. The socialist tenements, the government said, were 'fortresses'. Of course. Any modern building is a fortress as soon as artillery starts to fire on it and if defenders with guns are within.

The Heimwehr, under Starhemberg and Major Fey, who was vice-chancellor in the government, had violently threatened extirpation of the socialists since 1927. A Heimwehr Putsch was averted in 1929 only by the most exiguous of margins, and in 1931 a Heimwehr rising in Styria was put down by military action: Starhemberg was arrested and jailed.¹ Then in 1932 Monsignor ¹ And fined £5 10s. See G. E. R. Gedye's admirable book, Heirs to the Habsburgs, p. 105.

Seipel took the Heimwehr into his government, and under Dollfuss the movement was blessed officially as an auxiliary armed force. The socialists wrote their doom, not by aggression, but by temporising, by seeking compromise. This was seized on by the Heimwehr as a sign of weakness. The socialists wanted peace; but the Heimwehr wanted war.

After the Habicht fiasco and the Suvitch visit the Heimwehr got beyond control. Its leaders decided to force Dollfuss' hand, because the little chancellor, afraid of bloodshed, seemed to be wavering. Conveniently, he went to Hungary on a state visit, it is unknown exactly to what extent he encouraged what happened in his absence. The Heimwehr throughout Austria progressively ran wild through the provinces. Let extracts from the chronology of the Bulletin of International News, published by the Royal Institute of International Affairs, tell the story:

Jan. 31. The Heimwehr leaders presented the Governor of the Tyrol with six demands which, if carried out, amounted to the establishment of semi-military rule in the Province. . . . This followed the mobilisation of 8,000 Heimwehr on Jan. 30 to avert disorders threatened by the Nazis.

Feb. 6. The leaders of the Upper Austrian Heimwehr, supported by the Patriotic Front, were understood to be making the same demands as those in the Tyrol, and detachments of them occupied some of the public buildings at Linz, the provincial capital.

Feb. 7. The Heimwehr leaders in Styria and the Burgenland submitted to the Provincial Governors at Graz and Eisenstadt demands for a more authoritative government and a semi-military administration.

Feb. 8. The police raided the offices of the Arbeiter Zeitung. . . . This was a sequel to the seizure a few days previously of arms and explosives in buildings to which the socialists had access at Schwechat. . . .

Feb. 9. The Heimwehr leaders in Salzburg presented authoritarian demands to the Provincial Governor. The Governor of Lower Austria was understood to have refused to see the local Heimwehr leaders, on the ground that their demands were unconstitutional. Following on reports that the Heimwehr were demanding of the Government the banning of the socialist party and the occupation of the Vienna City Hall, the socialist headquarters, intimated that any such action would be the signal for a general strike. Herr Dollfuss returned from Budapest and received the Heimwehr leaders.

Feb. 10. The vice-chancellor deprived the Mayor of Vienna (a Social Democrat) and other City Officials of the authority to supervise matters of public safety.

Feb. 11. Speaking at a Heimwehr parade, attended by the minister of war, Major Fey (the vice-chancellor) said, 'In the last two days I have made certain that Herr Dollfuss is with us. To-morrow we are going to clean up Austria.' (Italics mine.)

Major Fey was as good as his word. On February 12 the fighting began.

Gemütlichkeit Gone Wrong

At about eight-thirty that morning one of the local Press agencies phoned me that fighting had broken out at Linz. He had few details. Apparently socialist workers resisted when Heimwehr guardsmen invaded their premises. As early as February 7 I had concluded a dispatch to my newspaper with the words 'civil war is possible'. But even on the morning of the twelfth I thought that there was still some hope that Dollfuss would keep his head and avert a crisis. Otto Bauer had told me not long before that he and Dollfuss would 'negotiate'. I phoned the Arbeiter Zeitung, the socialist newspaper, and got no reply. I rushed out to pick up what information I could find, and returned home at about eleven-thirty to write my story. At eleven-forty-five my wife said, 'Try to turn on the electric light.' I twiddled the button; no light. General strike!

So we thought, but as we learned later, the strike of the electrical workers was not, alas, general. They had downed tools spontaneously as word of fighting came from Linz. I noted the strangely quiet streets, because the tramcars had stopped; most of the motor-men and conductors didn't know why the current had snapped off; small, curious crowds surrounded the stranded trams. (Later that day, we saw innumerable horse-drawn and motor-tractors pulling them along the dead rails to the barns. . . .) At the Arbeiter Zeitung I learned that the police, wearing steel helmets and armed with carbines, had evacuated the building. My wife and I with two friends drove hurriedly through the working-class Ottakring and Hernals districts. We were nearing one of the great municipal tenements when I heard for the first time in years that unpleasantly brittle and discordant music – rifle fire.

The battle in Vienna lasted four days, and in the provinces five or six. Almost a thousand men, women, and children were killed. Nine socialist leaders, including one man seriously wounded, and dragged to the gallows from a stretcher, were hanged. The Karl Marx Hof and the Goethe Hof were badly smashed by shell fire – two of the finest blocks of workers' dwellings in the world. I remember a scene in the Goethe Hof a few hours after the bombardment. Mournful women and frightened children stared miserably at the police. The simple, clean little flats were blasted to bits by shells. I walked through the kindergarten. Desks, black-boards, school-books, paint-boxes, shattered toys, were smashed together with broken beams and fallen plaster. On one wall stood a coloured-paper design proudly inscribed with the name of its author, aged six. A bullet had crashed through it. On the other wall, in this Marxist, 'atheist' cathedral, was a lithograph of the crucifixion. The glass was shattered – by a Christian Social shell.

FEX, SCHUSCHNIGG AND STARHEMFBRG

I did not see Dollfuss to talk to until the twenty-second. When I mentioned that Bauer and Deutsch, who, when the fight was hopeless, had fled to Czechoslovakia, told me in Bratislava that they tried vainly to get in touch with him on the morning of the twelfth, in order to avert bloodshed by some last minute compromise, the chancellor looked puzzled and said, earnestly, blandly, that he had been at mass in St. Stephen's when the lights went out! – a signal that he could only interpret as the call for a general strike. On the afternoon of the thirteenth, incidentally, when fighting was at its hottest, Dollfuss spent a quiet hour having tea with the Papal Nuncio.

The spoils of victory for Dollfuss and the Heimwehr were enormous. Literally not since the Turks had there been such loot. The socialist municipality owned about thirty-five per cent of the land of Vienna; it employed fifty-four thousand people and was by far the largest enterprise in Central Europe; from 1923 to 1929 it spent about £22,000,000 on housing and similar projects, and its funds in the municipal savings banks alone were about £14,000,000. It collected about £5,000,000 in taxes per year, and it owned the municipal gas works, the electrical plant, the street-cars and subways and omnibuses, the slaughter-houses and the public baths, a cemetery, a brewery, a bakery, and a big department store. All this went into government hands. Thousands of people were arrested, and thousands lost their jobs; the social disorganisation resulting from the outbreak was tremendous.

Socialist Side

The secret history of the socialist end of the 'revolt' has never been fully told.

One vitally important factor in the conflict was the bitter personal enmity between Bauer, the socialist leader, and Dollfuss.

Otto Bauer, a brilliantly cultivated Jew of fifty-five, was the brains of the social democratic party. A gentleman-politician, Bauer acted as he thought British gentlemen-politicians acted; and he idealised them slightly. He was honest, he was scrupulous, he was fair. An intellectual in the best and worst senses of the word, he composed sound theories, but was utterly inadequate to meet an unforeseen situation, the importance or even the existence of which he would proceed to belittle or deny. Dollfuss, on the other hand, was about as theoretical as a flea; he hopped from place to place by instinct.

Bauer, in judgments of people, was far from sound. He had had an over-exaggerated admiration for the intellect of Monsignor Seipel, whom he called an enemy worthy of his pen; the politics he liked were polemical debates between himself on the front page of the Arbeiter Zeitung and Seipel in the Reichspost. And Bauer underestimated Dollfuss seriously. He called him a fool. And Dollfuss, cunning as a peasant, charming as a child, was very far from being a fool. Openly in the chamber Bauer denounced the chancellor as a liar and 'Schuft' (scoundrel). Dollfuss never forgave him. A simpler man might have eliminated Bauer by manœuvring him from the leadership of the party, but the chancellor was too subtle for that; he knew the party was more important to Bauer than his own position and that he would not greatly care what happened to him so long as the party went on; therefore Dollfuss decided that the party had to go, and Bauer with it.

Behind this first-rate personal quarrel was, of course, the critically difficult position of the socialists both ideologically and politically. Orthodox Second International socialism was, in 1934, as old-fashioned as horse-cars. Flattened between the opposites of Fascism and communism, the socialists became, instead of a revolutionary party, a party of the middle. They represented workers in work; and after some years of comfortable, almost bourgeois living in the Engels Hof or the Goethe Hof they lost a good deal of revolutionary fervour; they were not so anxious as before to man the barricades.

Socialism lost out in Austria because of its own decency. The socialists hated bloodshed and violence; they could not believe that their enemies were capable of ruthlessness and treachery; innocently they believed the lies of their opponents, because their own characters were grounded on probity and truth.

'Tactically, the socialists were in a hopeless position,' Frances Gunther wrote at the time. 'As socialists, they believed in the dictatorship of the proletariat. As democrats, they believed in the tolerant rule of the majority. Through the gap between these two stools, they crashed. They socialised some of the luxuries of life, but none of the necessities. Back in 1919 they had a chance to acquire the Alpine Montangesellschaft, the pivot of Austrian industry; they let it go, and instead built lovely swimming-pools and gardens for Vienna kiddies, by means of taxes which were just and therefore doubly intolerable to the former upper classes. Militarily, they succeeded in arming themselves – as socialists. But as democrats, they failed to disarm their enemies.'

From 1932 on Bauer and his men were pressed closer and closer against the wall. The Dollfuss technique was to whittle away their advantages, but never give them a square issue to fight on. Unemployment and the growth of the economic crisis had made the use of the supreme socialist weapon, the general strike, more and more dangerous. The quintessence of unrealism and decency, Bauer – who, after all, commanded the largest party in the country, with sixty per cent of the Vienna electorate – offered to let Dollfuss rule dictatorially for two years, provided only the steering committee of parliament kept in operation. Dollfuss refused. The socialists seventeen different times offered to disarm the Schutzbund if the government would disarm the Heimwehr. Dollfuss made no categorical answer, but simply kept Bauer dangling. Finally the socialists announced the four things which would cause a general strike: (1) imposition on Austria of a Fascist constitution, (2) installation of a government commissar in Vienna, (3) dissolution of the social democratic party, (4) dissolution of the trade unions. Dollfuss simply pasted these four items in his hat, gleeful; he knew that he must merely avoid these major provocations and the fight was won.

Bauer himself generously – too generously – admitted his error. Writing (Austrian Democracy Under Fire, p. 42) of the death of parliament, he says:

'We could have responded on March 15 (1933), by calling a general strike. Never were the conditions for a successful strike so favourable as on that day. The counter revolution which was just then reaching its full development in Germany had aroused the Austrian masses. The masses of the workers were awaiting the signal for battle. The railwaymen were not yet so crushed as they were eleven months later. The government's military organisation was far weaker than in February 1934. At that time we might have won. 'But we shrank back dismayed from the battle. We still believed that we should be able to reach a peaceable settlement by negotiation.

Dollfuss had promised to negotiate with us at an early date . . . and we were still fools enough to trust a promise of Dollfuss. We postponed the fight, because we wanted to spare the country the disaster of a bloody civil war. The civil war, nevertheless, broke out eleven months later, but under conditions that were considerably less favourable to ourselves. It was a mistake – the most fatal of all our mistakes.'

Confusion Worse Confounded

On the night of February 11 – the day before the outbreak – Bauer and his wife and two friends went, of all places, to the movies where they saw Greta Garbo in Grand Hotel. Thus was the 'Bolshevist plotter' making ready for the 'revolution'! Returning home, he found a message from the leader of the Schutzbund in Linz, a man named Bernacek, announcing that he, Bernacek, would resist by force the Heimwehr attack expected for the morrow. Bauer, agitated, sent Bernacek the following telegram, appealing to him not to provoke action: AUNTIE'S ALL RIGHT BOTH THE DOCTORS AND UNCLE OTTO THINK THAT NOTHING SHOULD BE DONE AT THIS MOMENT. Bernacek, a hothead, contemptuous of Bauer's caution, disregarded this message, and next day, defending himself, he took to arms.

What happened then was one of the ghastliest muddles in revolutionary history.

Bauer got news at about eight-thirty of the bloodshed in Linz. He summoned a meeting of the Aktions-Ausschuss (executive committee) of the trade unions and the party. A vote to call a general strike was carried by a majority of only one. Meantime, the workers in the powerful electrical union, inflamed, infuriated, preferring death fighting to death by slow suffocation, had – without orders – already struck. Then a terrible thing occurred. The general strike manifesto was rushed to the Arbeiter Zeitung presses for publication. But no contact had been established between the electrical workers and the Arbeiter Zeitung building, where the committee met. At the very moment that printing of the manifesto was to begin, the presses stopped. The electrical workers had shut off the power! So the call for a general strike was never promulgated, because of an unofficial strike of men who should have been an essential part of the general strike.

It appears that the general strike was set for five p.m. The idea was to bluff the government. What it did was give the government seven precious hours of warning. Bauer and Deutsch went to Schutzbund headquarters to direct operations in the field, but other prominent socialists waited upon the government to appeal once more for conciliation. General Koerner, a Schutzbund executive, went to see President Miklas; a group of Right-wing socialists, led by Dr. Renner, called on the Governor of Lower Austria to ask him to intervene with Dollfuss for them. (They did not go to Dollfuss direct; they hated him too much, and they knew he wouldn't see them.) The government did what any hard-boiled government would do. Conveniently the whole leadership of the party, Bauer and Deutsch excepted, were in the lions' den and the authorities simply arrested the lot. Koerner was apprehended actually in Miklas's anteroom, and the others – including the socialist journalist Braunthal who was simply reporting the event – were bagged wholesale. The only socialist who behaved with sense and dignity was the veteran mayor of Vienna, Karl Seitz, who stuck to his desk in the town hall like a captain on the bridge of a battleship, and was finally dragged off by force.

The strike was a terrible failure. Everything that could possibly go wrong went wrong. Of course no one counted on the relentless acumen and energy of Dollfuss and Fey. By mid-afternoon, every important socialist leader was in jail. Anticipating this the party had appointed second and third men for each post; they were all arrested too. As a result no one remained to give orders. The signal for the strike was to be the stoppage of the trains. But the railwaymen did not stop the trains, because they never knew a strike had been officially declared. Couriers were sent out – too late – to rouse the countryside. Most of them were caught. A liaison committee had been set up in advance for communication between fighters and staff. It never met, because of a childish inaccuracy in the location of the rendezvous.

The fighting that followed was heartbreaking. I saw most of it. The lack of organisation was pitiful. Bauer, a stern disciplinarian, had ossified the party, so that young men eager to go on the streets obediently waited all day Monday and even till Tuesday expecting orders to fight. The orders never came; the young men then began shooting and were slaughtered. As early as February 3, the government – assisted by turncoat Schutzbunders, who sold secrets of the organisation – had arrested a group of key Schutzbund leaders. Most of the workers did not know where their arms were hidden. Only a few men in each district were cognisant of the location of the secret depots. The consequence was that young Schutzbunders

I know dug with their hands all Monday and Tuesday nights in the courtyards of their tenements, searching wildly for the arms that they knew were there. They never found them.

One band of three hundred Schutzbunders never received arms because the second-in-command refused to disclose their location without orders from above, even though the supposition was that his superior had been arrested. Another man I know could have machine-gunned a whole detachment of police, but the rule was that no socialist should fire until fired upon; so my machine-gunner had to wait till the police were nicely in position and ready for attack. The government cut key telephones so that no communication was possible between one besieged tenement and the others. Workers in one house fought with no idea whether their comrades were keeping up the battle or not. And the government maintained over the radio a stream of lies and slander—for instance, that Bauer and Deutsch had walked off with the trade union funds.

One can say what one likes about the leadership of the party. But about the valiant courage of the men there can be no doubt. It took a modern army of nineteen thousand men, equipped with machine-guns, armoured-cars, and field artillery, four whole days to crush the resistance of perhaps five thousand forlorn and desperate Schutzbunders, their backs to the wall or their necks in the noose. It was a hopeless fight, but it was magnificent. The workers of the world will never forget the February heroism of the Vienna proletariat.

'Down Thou Climbing Sorrow!'

After February Dollfuss promulgated the new corporative constitution. The old parliament, comatose, was revived so that it could finally commit legal suicide. An extraordinary document, the constitution made one think that Austria was going to be in the twentieth century what it had been in the nineteenth—the heart and soul of European reaction. The last vestiges of free popular suffrage disappeared. Way was opened for a Habsburg restoration. A chamber chosen on a guild basis replaced the old parliament. And the preamble to the constitution announced that all the 'rights' of the Austrian people derived from God.

But more mundane affairs preoccupied the little chancellor. A confusing period of inner rivalries and shifts of power began, concurrently between Dollfuss and Starhemberg for control of the country and between Starhemberg and Fey for control of the Heimwehr. Fearful that the Heimwehr was too powerful, Dollfuss encouraged the growth of another private army, the extreme clerical and monarchist Sturmscharen of the minister of justice Dr. Schuschnigg. The Heimwehr,¹ sore, flirted with the Nazis. And on the honey of these confusions the Nazis fed like bees.

From February to midsummer Dollfuss, desperately needing all energy for settlement, was unexpectedly tender to the Nazis, his worst enemies. A new campaign of violence began. Time and time again he threatened to hang a Nazi terrorist; he never did. Reasons: (1) he feared retaliation; (2) he was sabotaged by his own civil service; (3) he didn't want to make martyrs of Nazi criminals; (4) he wanted – still – to leave the way open for negotiations with Germany.

Events promptly showed that the Nazis were the chief beneficiaries of February. The Mussolini-Suvitch plan turned out all wrong. Instead of strengthening himself by the murder of the socialists, Dollfuss was disastrously weakened, because he had destroyed the political morale of the country. The Nazis were delighted that he had done their own job for them in removing the working-class movement which was the best defence of democracy. Socialists down! Nazis up! Nevertheless, Mussolini's support kept Dollfuss in.

For five months there was an uneasy lull, punctuated by Nazi bombs. Then, on July 25, 1934, civil war again struck Austria. A socialist lad wounded a policeman in a scuffle and the authorities chose to make an example of him; it was a splendid chance to make good the threats of the death penalty and at the same time avoid the danger of Nazi vengeance. The boy, Josef Gerl, was hanged on July 24. This event did not directly precipitate the Nazi revolt. But within twenty hours Dollfuss himself was dead. He hanged a socialist, and, illogical as it seems, the Nazis killed him.

¹ One of the most popular anecdotes of the period described two Heimwehr men who met two others. The first two said after they separated, 'I wonder if those two Nazis know that we are socialists.'

DEATH OF DOLLFUSS

THE murder of Dollfuss marked the entrance of gangsterism into European politics on an international basis. On June 30, inside Germany, the Nazis imitated Al Capone, and on July 25 these methods crossed into a neighbouring land. The assassination was a deliberate exercise in policy; the Nazis had to murder Dollfuss because every other method to defeat him failed. The story of the Dollfuss killing is that of an organised conspiracy to murder.

All the Putschists seem to have been members of the eighty-ninth SS regiment, one of four SS (Hitlerite guard) detachments which secretly existed on Austrian soil. The rank and file of the plotters were former non-commissioned officers or privates of the regular Austrian army who had been dismissed from the service for their Nazi sympathies. Also among them were active officers of the Vienna police whose surreptitious Nazi activities had escaped detection – an extremely important point.

The plotters looked for support in three directions. (1) In Germany there were Frauenfeld and Habicht, the exiled leaders of the Austrian section of the Nazi party. (2) In Vienna there was a group of high police executives and officials, who were later arrested or fled the country. (3) In Rome there was 'King Anton' Rintelen. There was another leader, a mysterious civilian whose nom-de-complot was Kunze, of whom more later.

Dr. Anton Rintelen, a white-cropped man of fifty-eight, who looked less like a conspirator than almost anyone I ever met, was promoted by Dollfuss to be Austrian minister in Rome in order to get him out of the country. He was too powerful to be overtly sacked. For ten years Rintelen had been Governor of Styria, the turbulent province south of Vienna. He was clever and cold and ambitious and, though named by the Nazis as their chancellor, he was not a Nazi. He was Rintelen. Years ago he flirted with the socialists hoping to reach power by a socialist coalition. When the socialists faded and the Nazis rose he intrigued with the Nazis. It is not the least of the ironies of July 25th that this chief actor should have been motivated by aims so crass. He ran with the Nazis not because he loved Hitler but because he wanted a job and loved power. The Nazis, on their side, needed him. He was 'respectable' and they knew they could most easily gain Austria through the medium of a transitory coalition government. Rintelen was their Austrian Papen.

Various Styrian industrialists were friends of Rintelen. In their factories, like the Alpine Montangesellschaft, the largest industrial concern in Austria, the workmen were secretly organised on an SA basis. Here the Styrian rebels hid their arms.

Germany fed the springs of dissatisfaction and treachery with a powerful stream of gold. I had it on what seemed to be indisputable authority that the Germans spent 75,000,000 marks in Austria for propaganda in the seventeen months between January 1933 and July 1934. Of German moral responsibility for the Dollfuss murder there was no doubt. Munich day in, day out, preached violence. And plenty of indication of German foreknowledge of the actual plot may be cited. As witness:

(1) The Munich headquarters of the Nazi party, according to the official Wiener Zeitung, had a special aeroplane ready at nine a.m. on the 25th for the victorious flight of Habicht and Frauenfeld to Vienna.

(2) As early as July 21st, a Berlin photograph agency sent out pictures of Rintelen marked 'New Austrian Chancellor - Hold for Release'.

(3) A Nazi named Abereger, arrested in Innsbruck and later sentenced to life imprisonment for bomb smuggling, testified that on July 22nd, three days before the murder, he was informed by courier from Munich that an armed rising was scheduled in Austria for the 25th.

(4) Italian secret agents reported movements of the Austrian Legion (Austrian Nazis on German soil) to the frontier on the evening of the 24th. The legion was to take posts two miles behind the border.

The Nazis were in a hurry because Dollfuss planned to visit Mussolini in Riccioni, an Italian seaside resort, later that week, and they feared that some new agreement between Mussolini and Dollfuss would finally beat them. One story is that the Putsch was first planned for July 24th, but was postponed a day when inside information came to the plotters that Dollfuss' last cabinet session in Austria would take place on the 25th, not on the 24th as first believed. It was the intention of the conspirators to capture the whole cabinet. Rintelen had arrived in Vienna from Rome on July 23rd, ostensibly on a holiday.

So much for the setting. The actual events of July 25th began as follows:

At about eleven a.m. the conspirators assembled at various points in the streets of Vienna. Their organisation was excellent and they acted with the utmost smoothness and precision. One group gathered, man by man, on the sidewalk of the Kolowrat Ring. They had received weapons from their leaders the night before, and some had found cards in their letter-boxes notifying them of the rendezvous. Not all the plotters knew who the higher-ups were; the password was the number '89'. Fourteen started from Kolowrat Ring for Ravag, the radio headquarters, where the signal for the Putsch was given. They were not disguised and they went on foot. Loitering on the Johannesgasse, where Ravag is situated, were two uniformed policemen, members of the gang, who 'covered' them and led them to the door.

A larger group meantime assembled at the gymnasium of the German Athletic Club on Siebensterngasse. This building, it is interesting to note, directly adjoins an army barracks. The plot had been organised with such care that one of the conspirators confessed later to having been informed by telegram where to come and what to do. The group numbered one hundred and forty-four, of whom no fewer than one hundred and six were former army non-coms or privates, and ten were active police. The hour of attack was chosen with beautiful precision so that the plotters would reach the chancellery at the moment of the changing of the guard, when it was most vulnerable.

At about ten a.m. a police officer named Dobler who was also a prominent (secret) Nazi aware of the plot turned traitor to the Nazis and in a very befuddled and Viennese way betrayed the business to the authorities.¹ Had they acted promptly, Dollfuss would never have been shot. But the police who were loyal had been fatigued by a plethora of false alarms, and the disloyal police sabotaged attempts to take precautions.

Dobler's movements that morning form a fascinating record.

¹ Dobler later committed suicide or was murdered by either loyal or Nazi police. The full story is in the official Austrian version of the events, translated into English as The Death of Dollfuss.

Trying to notify the authorities without giving himself away, he and intermediaries of the most astoundingly fortuitous variety succeeded, between ten and eleven-thirty, in holding meetings with public officials in at least three different – of course – coffee-houses. By about eleven-fifteen Major Wrabel, the aide-de-camp to Major Fey, minister of public security, had heard the gist of the matter. He sent a trusted detective, Marek, to Siebensterngasse to investigate. Fey seems to have been informed, 'rather vaguely', at eleven-forty-five. He acted promptly and at once informed the cabinet, but it was too late.

The detective Marek, arrived at the Siebensterngasse barracks and saw the plotters but the presence of uniformed police threw him off the track. The whole plot was made possible by the factor of disguise. Nevertheless his suspicions grew and three times he telephoned to Wrabel between twelve-ten and twelve-thirty, once from a public phone-booth, once from a coffee-house, once from a furniture shop. Wrabel transmitted the alarm to the public security officials, but police headquarters were only informed later. Meantime loyal police had been misled by clever and daring spies who reported that an attack on Dollfuss was being prepared in a different part of town.

After his third call Marek was seen by the conspirators and they seized him. He was dragged into the hall, where he saw the men changing into army uniform, the uniform of the crack Vienna Deutschmeister regiment. The rebels clambered into three private trucks, which they had hired, one marked BUTTER AND EGGS, and started for the chancellery. They did not know what to do with Marek and so (amazing cheek) they took him with them. When they were close to the chancellery Marek jumped out, and none of the Nazis, for fear of raising the alarm, dared shoot him. The reader may well ask how three trucks full of 'soldiers' could traverse a dozen streets of a crowded city at noon without attracting attention; but troop movements were not uncommon in Vienna at this time, and the uniformed police on the running-boards allayed suspicion.

The plotters reached the chancellery at twelve-fifty-three p.m. The scene was set for dramatic and terrible events. But first there is the Ravag episode to tell.

Revolt on the Ether

July 25th was a hot day, though not sunny, and I wanted to go swimming. I had finished my morning's work and put on my hat to leave for lunch when at seven minutes past one the telephone rang. One of my tipsters said in a low voice, 'Have you heard the radio? The Vienna radio has just made this announcement: "The government of Dr. Dollfuss has resigned. Dr. Rintelen has assumed power." It may be a joke. I don't know. I'll check it up and call in a minute.'

I put in a call for Paris at once (we sent our stories by telephone) and while waiting for it I telephoned (a) the American legation, (b) a friend, M. W. Fodor of the Manchester Guardian, with whom I worked closely, (c) the Bundeskanzleramt or chancellery. The legation had heard the radio announcement and was investigating. Fodor rushed to meet me down-town. The Bundeskanzleramt – interesting! did not answer. Then Telegrafien-Compagnie, a local news service, called with the radio announcement, and said that a Nazi Putsch was in progress. I wrote a brief story and finished it just when the Paris call came through. It was one-nineteen. I still had my hat on.

I lost about ten minutes because a police officer stopped me and made me drive him to his headquarters. A general alarm had been sounded, he said, but he didn't know about what. I got to the Bundeskanzleramt at about one-thirty-five. The tawny oak doors were shut and a few policemen were outside, but otherwise nothing seemed wrong. I assumed that the government had locked itself in, preparing defence.

An armoured car passed by and with a couple of other newspaper men I followed in pursuit. It turned away from the Bundeskanzleramt and lurched round the Ring to the Johannesgasse, the Ravag headquarters. The locale is comparable to Regent Street or Piccadilly in London. The car got into position and the police on the turret ducked inside the steel shell. Then I heard revolver shooting and machine-gun fire. The police were storming Ravag to blast out the Nazi Putschists there. I had a feeling that it was all monstrously unreal. The police pushed us back, but we were eager to see: it isn't often you get a pitched battle in the heart of Vienna. Then PRPRPRFFBUM we heard exploding hand-grenades. A waiter in a white-duck jacket slid through the crowd with a platter of beers.

What had happened at Ravag was this. At two minutes to one the fourteen plotters from Kolowrat Ring entered the building. They shot the loyal policeman on guard and the chauffeur of the Ravag director who were lounging in the doorway. Four Nazis reached the studio, where a broadcast of gramophone records was going on. They grabbed the announcer, put a gun in his ribs, and made him give their message. This was the signal for the Putsch. All over Austria it throbbed.

But a courageous telephone girl had had time to sound an alarm, although all the lines to police headquarters – an interesting point – were ‘busy’. And an official with great presence of mind cut the wires to Bisamberg, the sending station, so that the Nazis were unable to give a second message. Their plan had been to repeat ‘Dollfuss has resigned; Rintelen is chancellor’ every ten minutes, interspersing this aerial tattoo with instructions to the country, false news, and so on, which would have paralysed any defence action of the government. I remember that a British radio expert told me years before how marvellously a revolution might be organised by radio.

An unfortunate actor rehearsing a broadcast skit became hysterical with excitement, started to scream, and was shot. The police broke into the building and another policeman was killed, also the Nazi leader. Of the five who died, three bled to death because no doctor was available. Outside we waited till the police, victorious, began to drag out their captives at about three-twenty. I proceeded home and wrote my story, longer this time, and put in my telephone call to Paris.

I went to the Bundeskanzleramt again at about three-fifty. On the way I ran into G. E. R. Gedye of the New York Times, who was returning from Ravag, and we stopped a second, both saying, ‘Well, it seems to be all over.’ We certainly were wrong, but very few people knew then that anything was amiss except at Ravag. I had passed the Bundeskanzleramt myself before, and it looked entirely normal except for the closed doors. Feeling a flicker of doubt, I said to Gedye, ‘You know, a government doesn’t usually lock itself in at a moment of great crisis.’ He agreed. ‘Funny.’ And we remembered that the phone had not answered. I walked towards the building. A patrol had been flung round the area and I couldn’t get in. Then the story burst.

Policy by Murder

The Bundeskanzleramt, or Federal Chancellery, is the old Metternich palace where the Congress of Vienna met in 1815. Certainly from that day to this it can have witnessed no more dramatic and agitated situation. A stately baroque building, its cream-coloured façade opens on the Ballhausplatz. Grilled balconies of graceful iron project twenty feet over the side-walk. Directly opposite is a post office built into the heavy walls of the Hofburg, the former imperial palace, and on the west side a high gate leads to the green meadow of the Burg garden.

The hundred and forty-four Nazis from Siebensterngasse, sweeping into the courtyard, had seized those members of the government within, Dollfuss, Fey, and Fey's assistant Karwinsky, and about one hundred and fifty members of the staff, civil servants, clerks, and so on. The guards in the building, sixty strong, suspected nothing or at least put up no resistance and were disarmed and arrested. The police plotters knew well the corridors and rooms of the complicated building (some of them, indeed, had previously been posted there on duty), and the occupation was quick and thorough. The analogy for England would be the seizure of 10 Downing Street, since the Bundeskanzleramt is the central ganglion of government in Austria.

Nothing whatever of these events was known to the small group outside the building. Among the newspaper men who, having heard the radio signal, had arrived by one-fifteen and stayed till nightfall were Nypels of the Amsterdam Handelsblatt, Diez of the New York Herald Tribune, Werner of the A.P., two Hungarians, one Albanian, and one Czech. They did not succumb to the temptation to follow the armoured-car which led me away to Ravag. They saw the whole story, and from a correlation of their records I made the following chronology.

The very first arrival on Ballhausplatz after Nypels was a tall blond youthful German photographer, who had arrived in Vienna from Berlin the day before. Calmly he set up his tripod. At one-twenty-five some plain-clothes detectives and four uniformed police wearing steel helmets and carrying rifles arrived. A shout pierced the basement window, 'Go away, or we shoot.' At one-fifty-five a Heimwehr lieutenant arrived, unarmed and alone, and smashed his fists against the door, shouting with quixotic magnificence, 'I give you five minutes to open the door, or I will blow it up.' This gesture accomplished, he went away and was not seen again.

(Dollfuss was already bleeding to death by this time, the blood pumping from the hole in his throat, but no one knew. . . .)

Several other officers arrived, looked about, decided that nothing was wrong, and went away again. Traffic was still entirely normal. Then, at five minutes past two, came Dr. Funder, the venerable editor of the government organ Reichspost. A voice from inside was heard, 'Machen Sie sich keine Sorgen.' (Don't be alarmed) 'Rintelen is chancellor and a new police chief is coming from Berlin.' Funder hurried away. Many Heimwehr men and police had now arrived. At about two-thirty began a series of ultimatums that lasted the whole day. A Heimwehr officer knocked on the door at two-thirty-five and said, 'We give you twenty minutes and then we blow up the building.' 'Go away or we shoot,' a voice, distorted and hollow, answered through the door. The impression was now general that the whole government had been taken prisoner.

At three o'clock Major Baar, a Heimwehr officer and vice-governor of Lower Austria, arrived. A police officer told him, 'I don't know what to do. I am awaiting reinforcements and orders.' The Heimwehr were now massed along the road to the Burg Theatre, but the police pushed them back. 'Who is inside?' Baar was asked. He answered, 'Dollfuss, Fey, and Karwinsky are inside, prisoners of the Putschists. A new government has been formed and is meeting at the war ministry on Stubenring.' Police reinforcements came and a courteous officer said, 'Look here, gentlemen, this is not a good place to stand because here you are in the direct line of fire.' At three-forty-five traffic was finally stopped and the little group of onlookers were a compact island in the broad empty pond of the square.

At three-fifty-seven Major Fey, who has a face like a battle-axe, appeared for the first time on the balcony. He was pale as paper. He wrung his hands as if to free them from dust on the door-handle. With him was Holzweber, the leader of the rebels, a bespectacled little man who looked like a clerk on a stool despite his captain's uniform, blazing with decorations. The crowd started to shout, and Fey called in a low voice, 'Ruhe!' (Quiet.)

Everyone thought at once. 'It is a Putsch made by Fey and the regular army.'

Fey called, 'Where is the commandant?' He could not be found, but a policeman walked up and saluted respectfully. 'Who are you?' Fey asked. 'I am Captain Eibel, awaiting orders,' the policeman said. Holzweber whispered to Fey and Fey said, 'Come without weapons to the back door.' Eibel nodded and Holzweber called after him, 'Be sure you are without arms and come alone.'

Heimwehr men in the square had recognised Fey and they began to shout 'Fey! Our Fey!'

At eight minutes past four Eibel returned from the back door on Metastasiogasse. He was running hard, his helmet was off, and his hair was damp and disorderly. He grabbed an open alarm phone. Everyone heard what he said, talking to headquarters:

'I've been inside, I've spoken with Fey. The Bundeskanzler (Dollfuss) is apparently badly wounded. He has resigned. There is a new government, and Fey remains vice-chancellor.' Headquarters asked something and Eibel replied, 'They are disciplined and look like the military. The staff of the chancellery, one hundred and fifty men and women, are under guard in the courtyard.'

By this time the commandant, Hofrat Humpel, had turned up and he said to Eibel, 'If the chancellor is wounded he should have a physician. Run to the back door and offer to bring a doctor.' Eibel came back: 'I knocked and the sentry said, "No need for a physician any more."' So it was known to this limited group that the chancellor was dead.

At four-twenty Fey appeared on the balcony again, Holzweber at his elbow. The idea that it was a Putsch with Fey in charge was exploded because obviously Holzweber was in command and giving Fey orders. Fey called 'Ruhe!' (Quiet.) Then, bending over the balcony, he called, 'Where is Rintelen?' The Heimwehr started to shout to the Nazis inside:

'Woe on you if you harm our Fey. Touch our Fey, and we will hang every one of you on these trees.'

Fey shouted: 'Nichts unternehmen!' (Take no action.) Nothing may be done until I give the order. I am in command here.' He beckoned to Humpel and ordered him round to the back door. A big Heimwehr man, just under the balcony, crossed his hands like a seat and gestured to Fey to jump. Humpel came back in about twenty minutes and shouted, 'Rintelen is chancellor, Fey is vice-chancellor. They are waiting for Rintelen, who will come in a few minutes.'

On the Balcony

But it was not Rintelen who came; it was quite another person. Neustädter-Stürmer, a member of Dollfuss' cabinet. He waited a few moments and then Fey appeared on the balcony again and called, 'Where is Rintelen?'

DOLLFUSS

Neustädter-Stürmer shouted, standing in the street, 'Rintelen kommt nicht!' (Rintelen is not coming.)

Astonished, Fey turned to Holzweber at his elbow and a Heimwehr man called, 'Shall we storm the building?'

Fey shouted down: 'No, nothing is to be done. Take no action without my orders.'

Neustädter-Stürmer answered, 'A new government has been formed and I represent it. In the name of the government I promise a safe conduct to the rebels. They will be conducted to the German frontier. If you do not surrender in twenty minutes we storm the building.'

Fey called: 'No. You will not storm the building. I am state secretary of public security and you are to take no action without my authority.'

Neustädter-Stürmer, looking up (sharply): 'Sie irren Sich, Herr Fey! (You are mistaken!) The members of the government who are prisoners are under duress and are not competent to give orders. It is now five-twenty-eight. At five-forty-eight the building will be stormed.'

When the ultimatum expired everyone took cover but there was no shooting. Neustädter-Stürmer kept pacing up and down and Fey had disappeared. 'It was just an Austrian ultimatum,' someone joked. But the tension was terrific. At four minutes past six Fey came out again and said that the rebels agreed to surrender but asked what guaranty there was of safe conduct. They wanted military protection to the border. 'That can be arranged.' Neustädter-Stürmer replied, and Fey, speaking for Hudl (another rebel on the balcony) called, 'Can we have fifteen minutes more?' A civilian shouted, 'They mustn't harm anyone in the building.'

At six-thirty Fey came out once more. He tried to talk to General Zehner, the under-secretary of state for war, who had taken charge. There was such a tumult that no one could hear. Police, journalists, Heimwehr, lookers-on were all under the balcony shouting. So Zehner and Neustädter-Stürmer went round to meet Fey at the back door. Then Dr. Rieth, the German minister arrived. At about five-fifty Zehner reappeared and announced, 'They will get military protection to the frontier under the command of a staff officer.'

At about seven-thirty Fey came out of the back door. He walked up to Neustädter-Stürmer and said, 'Give me a cigarette.' A journalist called, 'Pfui on their safe-conduct!' Fey, lifting his voice with effort, said, 'Quiet!' Neustädter-Stürmer asked him, 'Is it true that Dollfuss is dead?' Fey said, 'Yes, I spoke to him just before he died. When I came in he was lying on a divan wounded and bleeding.' He crushed the cigarette in his hand and said, 'Give me another cigarette.'

At seven-forty Rieth and Karwinsky came out. Schuschnigg, the new prime minister, arrived and led Fey, Zehner, and Neustädter-Stürmer into the Burg garden. The police closed the gates behind them and, standing there on the grass, in the dusk, they held a cabinet meeting. By now twenty military trucks were lined up along the Ballhaus, and police streamed into the building to disarm the rebels and conduct them to the frontier. The rebels came out cocky and confident. Everyone thought their free passage to Germany was assured. They thought so too. But they were wrong.

Death

Dollfuss had opened his last cabinet meeting at eleven. Among the items on the agenda were – of all things – regulations governing a famous Vienna theatre devoted to comic opera. The warning did not reach the cabinet till after eleven. Vienna Schlamperei, as well as treason, is probably responsible for the fact that the chancellery doors were not shut in time. Once he got the alarm, Dollfuss acted with great energy and coolness. He dismissed the cabinet and ordered the ministers to scatter to their separate offices, only Fey and Karwinsky remaining. This saved Austria, because if Schuschnigg and Neustädter-Stürmer had not been outside the building the Putsch would probably have succeeded.

By twelve-fifty-five the rebels were inside the gates, one hundred and forty-four of them. 'We arrest you in the name of President Miklas,' they falsely shouted.

Officials at the chancellery told me the next day that they first thought a surprise military drill was in progress. The uniforms seemed genuine and the men were disciplined. Then, along each tier of offices, rude voices shouted, 'Come out! Hands up!' Doors were battered down and the staff herded into the courtyard. The more prominent officials were imprisoned in a small room and told that they were the first batch of hostages who would be shot if the plot miscarried. A second batch was then chosen to be shot after the first batch. It became clear that the men were Nazis when the first thing they did was to open the telephone switchboard to get in touch with the German legation. And one rebel told a friend of mine, 'Curious, are you? In half an hour you'll hear all about it on the Munich radio.'

Immediately on disarming the guard one detachment of rebels went up the main staircase, ignoring other objectives, to search the state departments, find Dollfuss, and murder him. There is little doubt but that this group was specifically charged with this duty. It was led by an ex-corporal in the army, Otta Planetta, with a chin like a boxing glove. Dollfuss was given no chance to escape. He might easily, like Fey and the others, have been captured alive. But the rebels had one aim, to kill him. They entered the building at twelve-fifty-five and by two minutes past one at latest he was shot.

Having dismissed the cabinet, Dollfuss retired to his private study, a small room lined with yellow silk. His valet, Hedvicek, looked out of the window and saw the rebel trucks unloading in the courtyard. He told Dollfuss to try to escape through a passage that led through the complicated web of archive rooms upstairs. Briskly the chancellor left the yellow room and started across an oyster-white room towards the famous congress hall. The oyster-white room has three doors. One gives on the main staircase, and here the rebels entered. The door to the congress hall was locked and Hedvicek fumbled with the key. Dollfuss, a small man, reached for the knob and at a range of about twenty inches Planetta shot him in the exposed arm-pit. The chancellor reeled and Planetta fired again, this time in the throat, at about a distance of eight inches. The chancellor fell. ('How his head cracked on the floor!' Hedvicek said.)

'Hilfe, Hilfe!' Dollfuss muttered. ('Help, help.')

Planetta said, 'Stand up.'

'I cannot,' Dollfuss whispered.

They picked him up and laid him on the rose-and-cream Louis XV divan. Servants were still sucking up the dust and blood with vacuum cleaners when I saw the room next morning. On the embroidery of the divan were three large blood spots, almost exactly the shape and colour of large oak leaves.

Fey, who was detained near by, had heard the shots but did not know their meaning. At about two-thirty a group of Nazis summoned him and led him to the room where Dollfuss was still dying. The chancellor recognised him and whispered weakly:

'I charge you to take care of my family if I die.'

The rebels had a revolver in Fey's ribs and permitted him to say nothing. Dollfuss went on, very faintly:

'Where is Schuschnigg?'

Fey shook his head and, mustering strength, Dollfuss whispered, 'Try to settle this without bloodshed. Tell Rintelen to make peace.'

Fey was hustled out of the room. He appealed to the rebels to get a doctor or at least a priest. They refused, although they asked the prisoners if a doctor were among them, and one of them gave the dying chancellor a glass of water. Dollfuss must have thought he had been betrayed by his own army; not only that the Putsch had succeeded but that his own men had killed him. Later he apparently believed that loyal troops, not rebels, were surrounding him, staring at his shrunken face, because he whispered, 'Kinder (children) you are so good to me. Why are the others not as you are? I wanted only peace. May God forgive the others.' The last blood was now streaming from his small body. A basin to catch it was put under the divan. At three-forty-five he died.

The rebels thought they had won, until about five p.m. At four-thirty Hudl, the second in command, told the prisoners in the courtyard, that a new government had been formed and that Rintelen, the new chancellor, would arrive at once. Thereupon about twenty officials gave him the Hitler salute and others called out 'Heil Hitler'. Hudl testified at his trial that Wrabel, who was caught inside the building, gave him his card and said, 'Call me du.' (The German familiar form of the second person.)

After five, when Neustädter-Stürmer was outside, the morale of the rebels began to break. Holzweber went to Fey and said frankly, 'There has been some hitch. I do not know what to do.' Fey shrugged. Then, a characteristically Viennese touch, Holzweber proceeded, 'Ah! I shall telephone the Café Eiles and ask if Herr Kunze is there.' So with the chancellor dead, the government disrupted, Austria convulsed, and Europe at the ragged edge of war, the leader of the rebels rang up a coffee-house, to ask if a man who might be there could tell him what to do.

Kunze was a civilian who had been at Siebensterngasse. Holzweber led the first truck and Hudl the second and Kunze was to have been in the third. But he never arrived. No one knows certainly what happened to him or how he disappeared. The Viennese police think he was a Nazi lawyer who ratted at the extreme moment and fled to Germany.

At about six the rebels decided to surrender, following the promise of safe conduct. All the one hundred and fifty hostages would be shot, Holzweber declared, if free passage was not given. Fey said to the government negotiator, 'Do not allow considerations of my safety to influence you one way or another.' Then Hudl suggested telephoning to Dr. Rieth, the German minister, as witness for the safe conduct. Fey explained the business over the telephone, and Rieth asked him whether or not to come. Fey said, 'It is not my business to give you orders or dissuade you. I have only to pass on these men's demand.' Rieth came, the negotiations were completed, and the exodus began.

Still the mass of the imprisoned hostages did not know the chancellor was dead. Leaving the building, one of the rebels called out, 'We've left a dead one in the corner room upstairs. An official rushed up and found Dollfuss there. The body had completely shrivelled like a raisin and was clammy blue. The face was uncovered and wore an expression of extremest agony. A piece of canvas covered part of the body. There was a terrible wound in the throat. Underneath the divan, spilled beyond the basin, was a lake of blood.

The Missing Chief

And now about Rintelen. Why did Rintelen not come? Why did the Putsch fail?

He did not come because he was arrested. He was arrested not by the police or government, but by his old friend Dr. Funder, the editor of the Reichspost, who, leaving the chancellery at ten minutes past two, went straight to the Hotel Imperial where Rintelen was staying and on his own responsibility persuaded him to give himself up at the war ministry, in order to avert scandal. Owing to his position as a minister he was not searched. It is said that the Ravag got through to Rintelen at about one-fifty and asked him to deny the radio report naming him chancellor. 'I have no authority to do that,' Rintelen answered, and rang off. At midnight that night he shot himself. The wound was not mortal, though so dangerous that the actual heart had to be stitched up.

About the position of Fey there will probably be dispute as long as the story is told. I do not think he knew anything about this particular plot. No one knows exactly what passed between Fey and the rebels when they first arrested him; but the evidence of both police officers who entered the building is that they understood that Fey, with Dollfuss dead hardly a minute, was vice-chancellor in the new Rintelen régime. On the other hand, Fey can hardly be blamed for telling the loyalist forces not to bombard the building. He had not only his own life to save but he was responsible for the safety of the one hundred and fifty other prisoners. If Fey had shouted early in the afternoon, 'They have murdered the chancellor; storm the building even if we die,' it would have been a magnificent gesture but it would have cost much bloodshed. One must remember that Fey knew nothing of what was going on outside. He thought Rintelen was chancellor. Even so, if he had greeted Neustädter-Stürmer's appearance with a whisper of pleasure instead of a reiterated demand for Rintelen his reputation for loyalty and courage would not have suffered such a severe setback.

There was much bad feeling about the withdrawal of the safe-conduct. The rebels were shipped, not to the German frontier, but to the Marokanner police barracks hardly a mile away. The government defends what was certainly bad faith by saying (a) Fey was not authorised to give a safe-conduct, and (b) Neustädter-Stürmer gave it unaware that the rump cabinet at five o'clock made it conditional on no casualties. I imagine the final decision not to free the Nazis was taken at the cabinet meeting outside the chancellery at seven-thirty. Here Schuschnigg was informed for the first time of the circumstances of Dollfuss' death and he decided simply not to let the murderers go. Neustädter-Stürmer said at Holzweber's trial, 'Yes, I gave my soldier's word of honour. But a soldier's word of honour is given to other soldiers, not to men who deny medical aid and priestly services to a mortally wounded man.'

Another reason for the failure of the Putsch was that the country as a whole did not rise. In Styria and Carinthia, where the Nazis had arms, there was severe but brief fighting, but nowhere else. For a year all of us had been deluded into believing that the Nazis were fifty or sixty per cent of the country. Possibly this was true, but at the critical moment the Nazis did not take action. The rebel signal had reverberated through the land; for four hours there was no regular government; but nothing happened. The Nazis had not bothered to arm their adherents, feeling sure that the army would mutiny and provide weapons; but the army remained loyal. Thus they lost their supreme chance.

Above all, the Putsch failed because Hitler wshed. The one hundred and forty-four conspirators were betrayed three times on July 25th; by their own higher-ups, chiefly Kunze; by the promise of safe-conduct; above all, by Germany. For a year and a half the Germans had incited their Austrian cousins to violence and rebellion and then, at the crisis, they let them down. The Austrian Legion did not march; instead, as soon as the Putsch was seen to have failed, it was disbanded. Habicht was dismissed from his post as Hitler's 'Inspector' for Austria, and Frauenfeld disappeared. Dr. Rieth was summarily fired, to give way to Franz von Papen. Instantly it was known that Mussolini had mobilised and would march into Austria if the Putsch succeeded, and this was clear by six p.m. of the 25th, the Germans wretchedly crawled and washed their hands of the whole business and ever since have sought to evade responsibility.

Thirteen of the Putschists were hanged, including four of the traitorous policemen, and, of course, Holzweber and Planetta. I have seldom seen a court-room more stirred than when Holzweber just before his sentence, rose and said:

'I was assured that there would be no bloodshed. I was told that I should find Rintelen at the chancellery and that the new government was already formed. Not meeting the leader of the operation at the chancellery I disclosed myself at once to Major Fey. I told him, "Here I stand, and I do not know what to do."'

Three hours later he and Planetta were hanged. Both died bravely, and both with the words 'Heil Hitler' on their lips. But Hitler did not hear them. In East Prussia President von Hindenburg was dying. And Hitler was busy becoming President of Germany.

.

Rintelen, seven months later, went on trial and was sentenced to life imprisonment on a charge of high treason. After serving a brief time in the penitentiary he was transferred to a sanatorium, under police surveillance. The evidence against him at the trial was not particularly concrete. As a result rumours rose that Rintelen had come to Vienna expecting to take part in a different revolt against Dollfuss, in which others too were involved. The July 25 Putsch was, it was said, made by Habicht, to forestall a Rintelen Putsch scheduled for about the same time. Habicht in Munich distrusted the Rintelen group, even though – according to this story – it was to pave the way for a Nazi régime; therefore Habicht jumped the gun on July 25 and therefore Rintelen and his friends, not knowing whether the Putsch going on was their Putsch or not, behaved with such confusion.

Rintelen might have been acquitted except for the evidence of his Italian servant Ripoldi, who testified that his master in Rome had frequently consorted with alleged Nazi emissaries. This contributes an obscure, bizarre footnote to the whole affair. Ripoldi had previously been the valet of a friend of Rintelen's, the financier Camillio Castiglione. He admitted in court that Castiglione had persuaded him to telegraph the court from Milan about his knowledge of Rintelen's doings, and had paid for the telegram. Apparently Rintelen and Castiglione, old friends, had fallen out.

CHAPTER XXV

AUSTRIA INFELIX

'I am young. I am not yet ready for supreme power.'

— PRINCE STARHEMBERG.

DR. KURT VON SCHUSCHNIGG, the Austrian chancellor and semi-dictator, who succeeded Dollfuss, was born in 1897 in the Lake Garda region of Italy, which was then Austrian territory. He volunteered for war service when he was eighteen and was captured in 1917 by Italian troops. The rest of the War he spent in an Italian prison camp. It would not be too much to say that he is as much a prisoner of the Italians now — if the Germans don't get him next week.

After Schuschnigg had been chancellor a short time two Viennese met in Stephensplatz.

'I have a job,' said one.

'What? A job! Impossible,' replied the other.

'Yes, I sit in the bell-tower of St. Stephen's Church and wait for the first joke about Schuschnigg to be born. Then I toll the bells.'

'Hinnff. That's not much of a job. How much do you get?'

'Fifty groschen (five-pence) a day. But it's a job for life.'

Dr. Schuschnigg, rather dull a personality indeed, was the son of a general. His family belonged to the minor aristocracy, devoutly Catholic, devoutly monarchist. He was educated in law at the University of Innsbruck, and entered politics as a protégé of the Christian social chancellor, Monsignor Seipel. He became first minister of education, then minister of justice, and finally Dollfuss' most reliable aide and confidant.

He had very little of Dollfuss' magnetic nimbleness; he was cold, severe, logical, dutiful, dry. But absolutely honest and conscientious, he was valuable as an offset to the erratic and unpredictable Starhemberg. Schuschnigg had no demagoguery. But demagoguery was the last thing Dollfuss wanted — except his own. He wanted a man who knew his business, who kept his mouth shut, and whom he could trust implicitly.

It was Schuschnigg's ambition to be, not a politician, but a professor – a scholar in the history of law. But events seized him. As an attempt to wean the youth of the Tyrol from Hitlerism and turn it to patriotic Austrian nationalism, he founded his militant Catholic youth organisation, the Sturmscharen. As we have seen, Dollfuss promptly utilised the Sturmscharen as an offset to Starhemberg's Heimwehr, when the Heimwehr momentarily became too powerful.

Schuschnigg's wife was killed in an automobile accident in the summer of 1935, after he had acceded to the chancellorship; this seemed to break his spirit for the time being. Nazis (who had threatened Frau Schuschnigg with numerous ghastly practical jokes) were said in some quarters to have tampered with the car, but nothing was ever proved.

Dr. Schuschnigg began to show his quality in a struggle with the Heimwehr in 1936. For a long time it was supposed that Prince Starhemberg, the vice-chancellor and Heimwehr leader, was the real force behind the Austrian Government; Schuschnigg was thought – by the ill-informed – to be no more than his 'front'. But gradually Schuschnigg manoeuvred the young Prince into a difficult position and finally got rid of him.

The immediate reason for Starhemberg's dismissal was, it is said, a hotheaded and somewhat indiscreet telegram he sent to Mussolini congratulating him on the downfall of Ethiopia. 'I congratulate you,' Starhemberg wired, 'on the famous and magnificent . . . victory of the Fascist spirit over democratic dishonesty and hypocrisy.' This was too much for Schuschnigg, who was trying at the time to make his régime appear as democratic as possible. The underlying reason for the split was Schuschnigg's intention to make some sort of accord with Germany. This Starhemberg, who was on the Italian side, would not countenance.

Schuschnigg knew that Starhemberg was famous for his delight in pretty girls and fashionable female company. As if in ironic acceptance of this, the dry semi-dictator – after throwing Starhemberg out – made him honorary president of the Austrian Mothers Aid Society.

Methodically Schuschnigg went on to clean up the Heimwehr. He reconstructed the cabinet in November, eliminating Heimwehr members; again in March 1937, he whittled his government down, concentrating authority to himself and his own friends. Finally the Heimwehr was dissolved as an independent armed force and incorporated into the government militia.

To complete this survey of Austrian politics one must mention one more character—Cardinal Innitzer. His influence with Schuschnigg is profound.

Prince Out of Politics

Prince Starhemberg, born in 1899, owed much of his career to his family, especially his mother. A direct descendant of one of the twelve original families of the Holy Roman Empire, he is a lineal scion of Ottakar I, Count of Steyr a thousand years ago. The name, corrupted from Storchenberg, means 'Stork's Mount'. One of his great-great-grandfathers saved Vienna from the Turks in 1683. A proud and ancient family, the Starhembergs are apt to consider mere Habsburgs as distinctly parvenu. His mother, Countess Franziska Starhemberg, a profound influence on his life, was—and is—a considerable force in the inner workings of the Christian Social party.

Young Ernst Rüdiger joined the Austrian army at seventeen. After the War he became a soldier of fortune, a freebooter, fighting with the Bavarian Oberland organisation in frontier squabbles in Silesia. He met Hitler, joined him, and took part in the Munich beer-hall Putsch. His mother, horrified that her blue-blooded son should come too much under Hitler's Lumpen-Proletariat and anti-Catholic influence, brought him back to Austria. She intervened with Monsignor Seipel to keep an eye on her boy, start him on a 'respectable' political career.

Young Starhemberg decided to found a private army of his own. He owned fourteen castles throughout Austria. In one of them, Waxenberg, he organised eight hundred of his retainers—practically serfs—into the Starhemberjaeger (hunter) detachment. This group merged with the Heimwehr. For some years, out of his family fortune, Starhemberg financed the movement himself. By 1926 he was head of the Upper Austrian Heimwehr, and in 1928 leader of the Heimwehr in all of Austria.

His fortune disappeared; he borrowed money right and left. At one time his liabilities were reported to be about £120,000. When he was on the verge of bankruptcy some rich industrialist friends—and Mussolini—rescued him. To Dollfuss the Italians gave advice during the trying 1932-34 years, but to Starhemberg they gave something more important—money.

Opinions differ about Starhemberg's ability. Myself I think he is an exceptionally intelligent young man; liberals, I fear, underestimate him just as they underestimated Dollfuss. I heard Starhemberg speak at Dollfuss' funeral; he addressed the dead leader with passionate thee-and-thou intimacy in one of the most moving orations I ever heard. At lunch a few weeks later Starhemberg talked off-the-record to a group of newspaper men; his answers were deliberate and a little long, but brilliantly phrased and apposite. He is rather shy, his manner occasionally constrained.

Opinions do not differ about Starhemberg's good looks. He is an exceedingly handsome fellow. Nor do they differ about the basic aims of his character and intelligence. He is a perfectly definite would-be Fascist. Also he is ambitious – if temperamental. One of his dreams was to become Regent of Austria, like Horthy in Hungary. At almost any time, Starhemberg may try to 'come back'.

Dictatorship on Crutches

After the Dollfuss murder the Austrian Government proceeded like a man with one foot on the street, one in the gutter; it wobbled, it tottered, it managed to span unnatural extremes of distance – but it stood. A dictatorship it was, and one of the most complete – if sloppy – in the world. Hitler 'makes' elections; but at least he has them; Mussolini is head of a political party which contributes some vitality to the state; Stalin is part of an organism to which he admits responsibility. But in Austria there was nothing but Schuschnigg, the Fatherland Front, and the Almighty.

The combination ruled by police power and the support of Italy. It evaded elections, because it knew that elections would let the Nazis in. It assaulted the rights of citizens in a fantastic manner. In the year 1934, for instance, 106,000 dwellings in Vienna alone were raided by the police. No fewer than 38,141 persons were arrested, of whom 19,090 were Nazis, 12,276 social democrats, and 6,775 communists. But – and it was an important 'but' – the terror never reached anything like the repressive force of the Nazi terror. Most of those arrested promptly got out of jail again. Even at its most extreme phase, it was difficult to take the Schuschnigg dictatorship completely seriously.¹ This was because of Austrian gentleness, Austrian genius for compromise, Austrian love for cloudy legal abstractions, and Austrian Schlamperei.

¹ For instance, in a memorial exhibition in Schoenbrunn Palace to the Emperor Franz Josef, one of the portraits in an honoured place was that of Viktor Adler, founder of Viennese socialism. Another point is that few of the names of the great municipal tenements were changed. Engels Hof is still Engels Hof. The Karl Marx Hof remained the Karl Marx Hof until July 1935. You can still read Marxist books in its library. On the other hand, Schutzbundlers tried in 1935, got very severe sentences.

The social democrats, smarting from the February wounds, and the communists, forgetting their usual propaganda which was restricted exclusively to those who were already communists, formed, early in 1935, a United Front. A new Schutzbund arose from the ashes of the old; the social democrats, taught a lesson in realism, changed their name to 'The Revolutionary Socialists of Austria.' They assaulted the country – with literature. The dissemination of illicit propaganda in Austria, although severely punishable, reached a point where scarcely a day passed without a shower of leaflets or handbills somewhere in Vienna. Miniature newspapers were passed around from hand to hand; some thirty thousand copies of the new-born Arbeiter Zeitung, printed in miniature in Brunn, Czechoslovakia, crossed the frontier secretly every fortnight. In my mail-box I would find luscious specimens daily of almost every kind of subversive literature. The government did its best to check the flow. But it was like trying to mop up the Danube with a sponge.

Agreement with Germany

In July 1936 Schuschnigg and Franz von Papen, the German minister to Austria, came to an agreement normalising the relations between the two countries. The event was hailed by Dr. Goebbels as a masterpiece of the new German diplomacy; the Austrians, on their side, seemed reasonably satisfied. Germany agreed to recognise the sovereignty of Austria; Austria agreed to release Nazi political prisoners and allow the Nazis, as individuals, to join the Fatherland Front. The long period of tension between Austria and Germany was, it was announced, ended – obviously a development of great importance.

Papen's tactics had, it was proved, been very sensible. He had seen that the iron fist would fail and so he tried the suède glove. His plan was to take prominent Austrians aside, whisper to them that he himself found distasteful things – indeed! – in the Nazi régime, and try to persuade them that both should work together for good old pan-German ideals. Papen worked very slowly – and confidently. His policy was based on the fact that there is no use ravishing a girl whom you are to marry next week. But his campaign was made difficult by two things. First, he was not trusted. Second, as Frances Gunther put it, no Austrian can be a Nazi twenty-four hours a day. It takes too much energy. Naziism broke in Vienna not on the machine-guns of Schuschnigg and Starhemberg, but paradoxically, on the softness of Austrian character.

Nevertheless Schuschnigg had to come to some sort of modus vivendi with Germany. The German boycott was killing Austria. For a time Mussolini prevented any compromise, because the Duce was still boiling with rage at the death of Dollfuss – Frau Dollfuss was a guest in his house at Riccioni, it will be remembered, when the murder took place. But apparently in the summer of 1936 Schuschnigg told Mussolini that he could not hold out much longer, and that some sort of Austro-German pact was essential, no matter on what terms. As a matter of fact, the terms that Schuschnigg got were pretty good.

The Austrians are, after all, not Italians; they are of German stock and eighty per cent of them were pro-Anschluss before Hitler. The oft-laboured scheme of a Danube confederation as a solution of the Austrian problem will not work while nationality remains a spiritual as well as economic barrier between the Central European countries. Austria's fate is indissolubly connected with that of Germany; the only eventual path of Austria is in the German orbit. And it is not impossible that Austria, long an obstacle separating the two Fascist states, may become a bridge connecting them.

At any rate in 1937 the little country was still a pawn between the two giants on either side.

Habsburg Hullabaloo

The Dollfuss corporative constitution repealed the constitutional quality of the laws which, in 1919, dispossessed the Habsburgs and exiled them. Then in July 1935, the Schuschnigg-Starhemberg government repealed the laws themselves. As a result no legal obstacle remained to the return to Austria of the exiled pretender to the Austrian throne, Prince Otto, and his mother the empress Zita. But their return was not immediately anticipated. What Schuschnigg did was pull Otto out of his sleeve, be in position to slap him on the table. For the final, the ultimate obstacle to a Nazi régime in Austria might be a Habsburg restoration.

EDITOR'S NOTE :—Readers are of course familiar with the Nazi coup of March 1938 which ended many centuries of Austrian independence. Occurring since this chapter was written, and brought about, in the consensus of foreign opinion, against the will of a considerable section of the population, it has settled some questions and raised many others. But certain it is that the whole picture has been changed, and that all signs now point to the end of Austria as a centre of a distinctive culture.

HUNGARY AND DR. HABSBURG

'I believe in God, I believe in the unity of my country,
 I believe in the eternal divine justice,
 I believe in the resurrection of Hungary.
 Amen!'

— HUNGARIAN NATIONAL CREED.

BEHIND Otto are some seven hundred years of madness, murder, melancholia. At least five of his cousins and forbears, in the last couple of generations, have met violent deaths, and several died insane. Crown Prince Rudolf shot himself at Mayerling in the greatest of modern royal mysteries and Archduke Franz Ferdinand was killed at Sarajevo with the result that Otto stands in his present lonely and enigmatic position, heir to all the realms of Habsburg. Before him is a throne — perhaps.

Archduke Franz - Josef - Otto - Robert - Marie - Antoine - Karl - Maximilian - Heinrich - Sixtus - Xavier - Felix - Renatus - Ludwig - Gaetan-Pius-Ignaz, Prince of Habsburg-Lorraine, the exiled pretender to the Austrian and Hungarian thrones, comes of fertile blood. He is one of eight children of the late Emperor, Karl, and his widow, Zita of Bourbon-Parme, who is herself the tenth child of a litter of seventeen. Royalty produces at least an insurance of complex continuity. He was born near Vienna — in a chalet that is now a pension — on November 20, 1912.

The Habsburgs are more than a family, they are a sort of organism — a resplendent fungus long attached to the body politic of Europe. They are as prolific as white mice and as international as counterfeiters. The Archduke Franz Ferdinand had 2,047 ancestors, including 1,486 Germans, 124 Frenchmen, 196 Italians, 89 Spaniards, 20 Englishmen, 52 Poles, and 47 Danes. The Habsburgs ruled in Europe for some sixteen generations. Their polyglot and bulbous holdings included at one time or other twenty countries, but never, one might say, a single country. The family was always superior to the state. Family laws in old Austro-Hungary had precedence over state laws, and the provisions of the Family Charter, drawn up in 1839, are still unpublished and secret. When he heard of Franz Ferdinand's death in 1914 (which removed the possibility of uncertainty in the succession), old Franz Josef, who had been emperor for sixty-six years, exclaimed, 'Ahl! A higher power has restored the order that I was unhappily unable to maintain.'

The Habsburg power toppled at the end of the War in 1918, but not the Habsburg dynasty. When the last Emperor, Karl, a weak man, was asked to abdicate the Empress replied fiercely: 'Rather will I die with you here. Then Otto will come, and when all our own family has gone there will still be Habsburgs enough.' Karl, indeed, never abdicated, although he renounced all participation in the governments of Austria and Hungary on November 11 and 13, 1918. He and Zita fled to exile. Twice Karl made abortive Putsches in Hungary, in March 1921, and October 1921; the Hungarian Government of Admiral Horthy beat him. He died in Madeira in 1922. Ever since Zita trained her eldest son, Prince Otto, for kingship.

Otto grew up grave, intelligent, sensitive, and extraordinarily good-looking. Through some pleasant chance he missed the traditional pouched eyes of the Habsburgs, the pendulous under-lip. 'Let that boy loose in Austria and give people a chance to look at him and he'll capture the country like a Valentino,' a friend of mine said after a recent visit to Stenockerzeel, the ramshackle castle in Belgium where after vicissitudes all over Europe the royal family lives.

Otto is a modest boy and extremely well-mannered, but seven hundred years of Habsburgs have driven into his brain complete appreciation of the privileges and prerogatives of kingship. Already, in his occasional public pronouncements, he refers to Austrians as 'My People'. An English friend recently asked Otto what he thought of Hitler and the prince replied, 'Unfortunately not having had an opportunity as yet to receive Mr. Hitler, I cannot say.'

The young prince has had to pay for his choice and dangerous lineage by performing the inevitable chore of royalty, learning languages; he speaks German, French, Italian, Spanish, English, and Hungarian quite fluently. Zita had never been able to learn Hungarian, a staggeringly difficult tongue; the chauvinist Hungarians never forgave her for this and she saw to it that her son did not make the same mistake. He was brought up, of course, a Roman Catholic, and he prays thrice daily.

After years of tutoring Otto went to the University of Louvain, graduating with a Ph. D. degree in the spring of 1935. He is, I imagine, the first royal pretender in history with a legitimate doctorate. His oral examinations included questions on the closer economic co-operation of the Danube states, the reconcilability of the new corporative Austrian constitution with democratic development, and the reafforestation of parts of the Hungarian plain. The written thesis, which ran to three hundred and sixty-eight pages in its French text, concerned 'the right, born of usage and of the peasant law of inheritance, of the indivisibility of rural land ownership in Austria'. He wrote it first in German and then translated it into French. The published brochure was signed 'Dr. Otto von Habsburg'.

He travelled a good deal as part of his studies; he visited Scandinavia, Germany, Italy. Each trip done, he returned dutifully to Stenockerzeel, his books, and Mother Zita. So far the old Empress has not found him a bride. A good match would be with Princess Maria, the youngest daughter of the King and Queen of Italy. But Mussolini, contrary to general opinion, does not like the idea of a Habsburg restoration – which would tend to recreate an empire on his Adriatic flank – and largely for this political reason the engagement didn't occur.

The young prince, whose political intelligence is seemingly acute, is quite aware of his importance as a club the Austrian Government may use against Germany. He has taken a strong anti-Hitler line: 'I absolutely reject [Nazi] Fascism for Austria. . . . This un-Austrian movement promises everything to everyone, but really intends the most ruthless subjugation of the Austrian people. . . . The people of Austria will never tolerate that our beautiful fatherland should become an exploited colony, and that the Austrian should become a man of second category.'

Otto is popular in Austria; of that no doubt. His mother Zita is not so popular. It is a private idea of mine that restoration would be a good deal closer if Otto's return would not mean the return also of his mother – to say nothing of hundreds of assorted and impoverished Habsburg cousins and aunts, who would flock to Vienna like ants to a keg of syrup. The ex-Empress, a woman of enormous strength of character and some old-fashioned ideas, is a good mother, so good a mother that she might find it difficult to let Otto be king alone. And many Austrians have no fancy to see Otto swaddled to the throne with Zita's apron strings.

The obstacles to restoration are mostly international. The chief reason that Otto lives at Stenockerzeel and not Schönbrunn, the Vienna palace of his fathers, is that Czechoslovakia and Jugoslavia will fight to keep him out. That is because Czechoslovakia and Jugoslavia, countries carved from the haunches of the old empire, have large populations in Slovakia and Croatia who might be stirred enough by a restoration to attempt rejoining a reconstituted monarchy.

The only excuse for kingship in the modern world is the symbol it provides of permanence. It gives a country an anchor into the dark furrows of the future. Otto, if Austria or Hungary take him back, will give them the security of a fixed headship of the state and a fixed succession. It is unfortunate that to make such provision for the future one must dredge so deep into the shadows of the past. A restoration seems a very backward gesture. 'We did not wage the war,' Dr. Beneš has said, 'in order to go back to former times.'

Otto's chances in Austria, even though the restoration question is officially not 'actual', were so good that his claims on Hungary have latterly been neglected. In Hungary he faces not only international but serious domestic obstacles. The principal one is the attitude of the Hungarian Government itself. Otto is outside Hungary to-day not so much because the Czechs and Jugoslavs want him out but because Horthy and Goemboes did not want him in.

Noblesse Oblige?

The chief internal problem of Hungary, which has been an independent kingdom since A.D. 1001, is that of the land. The country is almost exclusively a pool of wheat. Agrarian prices have fallen drastically since 1930; the nation was terribly overborrowed, with the largest per capita foreign debt in Europe. The urgencies of the resultant crisis were not improved by the maldistribution of economic power in the country. The feudal aristocracy rule the roost. One-third of the total arable land of Hungary is owned by nine hundred and eighty men.

Another sixth of the land – the figures remind one of Spain – is owned by some 1,112 magnates of the landed gentry class. Then come about 250,000 small-holders who have up to 150 acres each. Following are about 600,000 owners who are restricted to a plot so small that they have to sell their labour power as agricultural workers elsewhere. Finally there are about 1,130,000 peasants quite without land – out of Hungary's total population of roughly 8,600,000 – proportionately the largest group of landless agrarian proletariat in the world.

The aristocrats, though many of them lost much power and wealth by the amputation of Hungary after the War, are still a lush and fantastic lot. The Esterhazys, the Karolyis, the Czekonitchs, the Hunyadis and Telekis and Szaparys, maintain a shadow-glamour like nothing else in Europe, except perhaps for similar remnants of colossal feudal power in the nobility of Poland. Once an Esterhazy used a Titian painting as lining for his cloak. A Karolyi once sent a precious bottle of tokay to a sweetheart by special train.

These noblemen and their families intermarried to an unusual extent. The wife of Count Windischgraetz is a Szechenyi; her husband once went to jail for counterfeiting francs in a nationalist plot. Their daughter married a son of the Karolyis. One Countess Karolyi is an Apponyi. The wife of Michael Karolyi, president of the extremely temporary Hungarian republic, was an Andrassy. Admiral Horthy's daughter Paulette married a son of Count Emmerich Karolyi, relative of Michael and his son married a daughter of the same Karolyi. The daughter of Count Julius Karolyi, who it is thought will be Horthy's successor as Regent, married one of the Esterhazys.

The noblemen, practically without exception, favour the return of Otto to the throne. But Horthy and Goemboes heartily opposed restoration. Their motives were not exclusively personal, although Otto's return would lose Horthy his pleasant job; Zita would never forgive him for having crushed the Karlist Putsches. Horthy and Goemboes thought that a restoration would weaken Hungary, not strengthen it; they felt that the house of Habsburg has brought more harm to Hungary than good; the choice, in their minds, was quite flat between dynasticism and patriotism.

Hungary is not, as is usually said, a dictatorship; the Hungarian Parliament, founded in A.D. 1222, is one of the oldest in the world, and theoretically, just as in England, it can overturn any prime minister by an adverse vote. Horthy, the Regent, though reactionary as far as social or economic ideas are concerned, is in effect the guardian of constitutionalism and the vestigial democracy that remains in the country, because it is largely his influence that prevents the prime minister from abolishing parliament and setting up dictatorial rule.

As long as Horthy and Count Julius Karolyi live, the squabbles of domestic politics in Hungary do not mean much, because the inside leaders are all members of a secret society, heritage of the civil wars and White Terror, called the 'Double Cross', in reference to the Holy Apostolic Cross of Hungary. It was founded by Horthy and his cohorts when they organised a provisional government in Szeged in 1919 to fight the communists then ruling in Budapest. Every Hungarian prime minister since the counter-revolution has been a member of the Double Cross. There are about thirty-five surviving members; most of them dine together informally every month in a beer-hall, the Matthias Keller, near the Elizabeth bridge in Budapest. Bethlen and Karolyi may quarrel but their brotherhood in this secret organisation outrides personal feuds, and they combine against outsiders. The Double Cross is mostly landed gentry and Protestant. The great legitimist aristocrats are not members.

Choleric Admiral

Nicholas Horthy de Nagybánya, born in 1868 of a Transylvanian family, was a naval officer. Hardly brilliant, he nevertheless had qualities of candour and courage, and in thirty-six years of service he rose without much influence of wealth or family to be, first, naval aide-de-camp to the old Emperor Franz Josef, and second, admiral commanding the Austro-Hungarian fleet. As such, he was partly responsible for the suppression of the mutiny which last year was celebrated by the New York Theatre Union in Sailors of Cattaro.

The most unpleasant thing about Horthy is his White Terror history. He was minister of war in the counter-revolutionary government that followed the crash of the communist régime Bela Kun. On August 10, 1919, his detachments were stationed at Siofok, in trans-Danubia. Some officers, drunk and cheerful, talked blood-thirstily about Bolshevik atrocities. Horthy remarked, 'Words, always words! And never any action!' So the officers, including men who later became infamous as wholesale sadists, went out and that night murdered sixty Jews and communists. This was the beginning of the White Terror. When members of a British labour delegation investigating the atrocities complained to Horthy that the officers responsible had not been punished, the admiral replied in naïve indignation, 'Why, they are my best men!'

Horthy is the most indiscreet man in Europe. A bluff and friendly fellow nowadays, he likes to see visiting notables and journalists, but his aides try to isolate him on account of his enormous, full-blooded disposition to air his views—frankly. What he says in private conversation about the Serbs and Czechs and Germans and anyone you mention will make your hair dance and quiver. He is sixty-eight, but aflame with a sort of humorous-choleric vitality. He positively explodes with passion and pathos. At one moment he may burst a collar discussing Hungarian revisionism; at the next, pick up a paper-knife and go through the gestures of murder to illustrate a point; at the next, mention with tears in his eyes how good a human being old Franz Josef was, but how that 'poor boy' – Otto – cannot hope to rule in his (Horthy's) stead.

Goemboes

General Julius Goemboes de Jákfa, was an adventurer, a nationalist, a desperado politician, all his life. He was born in 1886 in a district of Hungary populated mostly by Germans. His mother does not speak correct Hungarian to this day. The family came from the Rhineland, and the name was originally Gelb. His father, who was a school-teacher, Magyarised it to Goemboes some years before the future prime minister was born. Goemboes died in October 1936.

A rebellious Magyar chauvinist, he went to cadet school and then the war college in Vienna. He was almost expelled when a professor asked him if he would be faithful to the Habsburg régime in the event of a revolution. Goemboes answered vigorously No. He would, he said, as a Magyar officer, fight for nationalist Hungary, not for the dynasty. As with Hitler and Pilsudski, the dominant note in his character from childhood was a fanatic nationalism.

Goemboes was wounded in the War on the Rumanian front and then served on the staff in Vienna. A man of plot and counter-plot, highly ambitious, he organised the 'M.O.V.E.' (Magyar Országos Vedo Egylet), a sort of officers trade union; for Goemboes had like his idol Mussolini a strong early socialist streak. The Hungarian revolution occurred and Goemboes offered to reorganise the socialist Michael Karolyi's army. Karolyi, distrusting him, refused, and he fled to Vienna where – meeting in secret – he and Count Stephen Bethlen, another émigré, plotted the downfall of the Karolyi régime. When Bela Kun came to power, Goemboes went to Szeged and joined Horthy in organising the counter-revolutionary forces, and his great days began.

Beyond doubt, more than Horthy, he was responsible for the White Terror in which at least several thousand innocent Jews and communists were tortured and murdered. Beyond doubt, too, he was the force behind Horthy repelling the two adventures of the Emperor Karl to regain his throne. On March 21, 1921, it was he who intervened between Horthy and Karl saying, 'Majesty, I order you to leave this country by eight o'clock to-night.' On the occasion of the second Putsch, in October of the same year, Goemboes, distrusting the regular army, called out and armed the secret societies and students corps.

The Hungary of that time was the worst dictatorship in Europe. In it were Magyar traces of all the Fascist tendencies we know today: violent economic nationalism, hatred of the Jews, suppression of liberals, pacifists, socialists. Goemboes was indeed in active touch with Hitler in 1922 and 1923, but he disavowed him after the Munich beer-hall Putsch. The murderers of the German foreign minister Rathenau were hidden for some years on his estate at Nagy-Teteny, disguised as gardeners.

Goemboes originally was a member of Bethlen's Union party. In 1923 he seceded to form a sort of Hungarian Fascist party, and stayed in the political wilderness for five years. He rejoined Bethlen in 1928, and became minister of war. When the complex and enigmatic Bethlen resigned in the middle of the Hungarian financial crisis of 1931, after ten years as prime minister, Goemboes succeeded him.

Goemboes attracted much attention in 1935 by attempting to broaden Hungary's sphere of foreign political action. From the time that Bethlen had contrived the tie-up with Italy, Hungary had been Mussolini's puppet. He glanced northward to the Nazis. He was active, moreover, in negotiating what promised to become a Central European bloc of dissatisfied states, Germany, Hungary, and Poland, and he joined one of General Goering's famous hunting parties in East Prussia to this end.

His successor as prime minister has the remarkable name Dr. Kalamán Darányi de Pusztaszentgyoergy and de Tetetlen. Let us call him, as most people do, Dr. Darányi for short. He is fifty, and he comes from a family of large landowners; his uncle was a famous minister of agriculture. Whereas Goemboes was genuinely the friend of the middleman and small farmer, and no lover of the feudal aristocrats whose estates he threatened to cut up, Dr. Darányi definitely represents the big landowning class, and his prime ministry probably means a long delay to the projected land reform. Darányi is called one of Bethlen's men. This means, as far as one may safely forecast it, a pro-Italian rather than a pro-German policy for Hungary. Early in 1937 the Nazis attempted to make Putsch in Budapest.

Nem Nem Soha

In Hungary is the strongest, the most pervasive nationalism in Europe. In the chauvinism sweepstakes the Hungarians beat even the Poles. A little story is relevant. The proud father of an eight-year-old schoolgirl entering a geography class bought her a globe. She surveyed it and broke into tears. 'Papa,' she wailed, 'I want a globe with only Hungary on it.'

Hungarian nationalism has fed ever since 1919 on the open wounds made by the peace treaties which, in their comparative iniquitousness, reached in the Treaty of Trianon the most iniquitous point. Hungary lost, after the War, no less than 68.5 per cent of its territory – 191,756 square kilometres out of a former total area of 282,870 square kilometres. Hungary lost no less than 58.2 per cent of its population – 10,782,560 people out of 18,264,500. Hungary lost all its gold, silver, copper, salt, and mercury; it lost its best collieries, eighty-five per cent of its forests, sixty-five per cent of its vineyards. It lost fifty-six per cent of its horses, sixty-nine per cent of its cattle, fifty-two per cent of its factories, fifty-seven per cent of its arable land, and fifty-two per cent of its total wheat production. Amputated from Hungary was its outlet to the sea. The economic unity of the old Danube basin, a perfectly balanced area, was destroyed.

On the other hand, one should point out that these terrible losses included districts not populated by Hungarians. A full forty-five per cent of the old population were minorities – Slovaks, Rumanians, Serbs, Croats, Ruthenians, Italians, Slovenes. The ostensible justification of the Trianon Treaty was liberation of these minorities. Of the 10,782,560 people lost, 6,345,500 were not Hungarians. But here is precisely where the trouble lies. Had the victor powers been content to draw really accurate minority and frontier lines, Hungarian revisionism would have little pretext. But some three million people who were pure Magyars were grabbed along with the others, and made to live, a new minority, within the new borders of Rumania, Jugoslavia, and Czechoslovakia.

The sole basis of Hungarian foreign policy since the War has been revisionism – to change the treaties in order to get its lost territory back.

To frustrate Hungarian aims, the Little Entente, which encircles Hungary, was formed. Let us do a march around Hungary, through Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Jugoslavia.

CHAPTER XXVII

MASARYK AND BENEŠ

'The master of Bohemia is the master of Europe.'

– BISMARCK.

'We shall always be a small minority in the world, but, when a small nation accomplishes something with its limited means, what it achieves has an immense and exceptional value, like the widow's mite. . . . It is a deliberate and discerning love of a nation that appeals to me, not the indiscriminate love that assumes everything to be right because it bears a national label. . . . Love of one's own nation should not entail non-love of other nations. . . . Institutions by themselves are not enough.'

– MASARYK.

MASARYK – what grandeur the name connotes! The son of a serf who created a nation; the blacksmith boy who grew to have 'the finest intellect of the century'; the pacifist who organised an army that performed a feat unparalleled in military annals – the Czechoslovak legions who marched across Siberia to the Pacific; the philosopher who became a statesman in spite of himself; the living father of a state who is also its simplest citizen; an unchallengeably firm democrat who, in the débâcle of the modern world, still believes in rule by tolerance; the man who more than any other smashed the old Austro-Hungarian empire, so that Czechoslovakia, a free republic, rose from its ruins – the stablest, strongest, and most prosperous of the succession states.

In his autobiography Masaryk says that his life has been 'shot through with paradox'. He is, for instance, the son of a coachman – and he lives to-day in the castle of the old Bohemian kings. His father was, moreover, a servant on an imperial estate, so that in throwing the Habsburgs out of Czechoslovakia Masaryk also symbolically threw them from the front yard where he grew up in the most crushing poverty.

He was, for instance, both a locksmith's apprentice and a helper in a blacksmith's shop, because in early youth he disliked school. During the War he was a first-class practical conspirator, a specialist in decoys, codes, and stratagems. Yet the whole basis of his career was moral-intellectual. He was one of the most formidably learned men of his time, a philosopher and prophet of almost Judaic stature.

MASARYK

The greatest of living Czechoslovaks, the first act in his life to bring him prominence was an investigation which proved a set of documents hallowed and revered by the Czech and Slovak peoples to be forgeries. A Roman Catholic who turned Protestant, he gained early distinction by defending a Jew wrongfully accused of an obscure ritual murder. He exposed as fabrications of the Austrian foreign office the documents in the Friedjung case, which ruined what was then his official career; but this occasion made him a hero of the oppressed Slavic peoples. Dominating his life have been two factors, faith in Czechoslovakia and the pursuit of truth.

It was not idly that Masaryk called his philosophy 'Realism'. Once he all but decided to return to Austria during the War so that he might be hanged – he knew that his martyrism would help the Czech national cause. There were several attempts on his life which he shrugged off – he was psychologically incapable of fear – but he took the precaution of drawing up his own obituary so that it would be the best possible propaganda for the liberation of his people.

He founded the most central of central European states in Pittsburg, Pa., where he negotiated a Czech-Slovak unity pact, and in Washington, D.C., where he issued the Czechoslovakian declaration of independence. He was proclaimed president of Czechoslovakia after he had not set foot in it for four years, and when he was 4,500 miles away.

His autobiography is warm and rigid with insistence on the most complete intellectual, moral, and emotional probity. He records how a simple lie might have saved his life when he was in acute danger in Moscow – to gain cover in a hotel he would have had to say incorrectly that he was registered there; he refused although the bullets were splattering about him – and his life was saved anyway. Yet in his career he was a splendid opportunist.

In Washington, before attempting to make any appointment at the White House, Masaryk spent weeks in a detailed and penetrating study of Wilson's writings. The old professor was knee-deep in books about and by Wilson. Then he drew up his manifesto on Czech aspirations for independence and presented it to Wilson. Half a dozen times in the document Masaryk had cleverly used citations from Wilson's own works as legal and political authority for the Czech claims.

Two quotations from his great book The Making of a State give fleeting illustrations of his quality:

'Hardly had I settled in Geneva when news of my son Herbert's illness came unexpectedly from my family in Prague; and, on March 15 (1915), a telegram announcing his death. Thus, like thousands of families at home, we were stricken. He was clean and honourable in rare degree, a poet-painter whose ideal of beauty was simplicity. Healthy he was, too, and strong through physical exercise. He had done all he could to avoid fighting for Austria and yet found death through the War. Typhus, caught from some Galician refugees whom he was helping, killed him – a case for fatalists! My old Clerical opponents did not fail to send me from Prague their coarse and malicious anonymous letters. "The finger of God!" they said. To me it seemed rather an injunction not to abate or to grow weary in my efforts.'

And discussing one of his visits to Tolstoy,

'Neither morally nor, I think, psychologically, did Tolstoy recognise the distinction between aggressive violence and self-defence. Here he was wrong; for the motives are different in the two cases and it is the motive which is ethically decisive. Two men may shoot, but it makes a difference whether they shoot in attack or defence. The mechanical acts are identical but the two acts are dissimilar in intention, in object, in morality. Tolstoy once argued arithmetically that fewer people would be killed if attack were not resisted; that, in fighting, both sides get wilder and more are killed; whereas if the aggressor meets with no opposition he ceases to slay. But the practical standpoint is that, if anybody is to be killed, let it be the aggressor. Why should a peace-loving man, void of evil intent, be slain and not the man of evil purpose who kills? . . . I know, too, that it is hard sometimes to say precisely who the aggressor is, yet it is not impossible. Thoughtful men of honest mind can distinguish impartially the quarter whence attack proceeds.'

Thomas Garrigue Masaryk was born on March 7, 1850, in the Moravian town of Hodonin. His mother, a cook, seems to have been a remarkable woman; Masaryk pays touching tribute to her strength, her ideals, her clamour to give her son an education. His father apparently he had little sympathy with. He went to school in Vienna, became a professor at Prague, wrote exhaustively (of some psychological interest is the fact that his first book was on suicide), entered politics. His wife was an American woman, Miss Charlotte Garrigue, whom he met in student days at Leipzig and whose name he added to his own. He writes of her: 'She was beautiful to look at; she had a magnificent intellect, better than mine.¹ Their son, Jan, a turbulent and candid character, is now Czechoslovak minister in London.

Masaryk's real career did not begin until he was well over sixty. He records a testimonial dinner given him at the time, a sort of climax to his work as a distinguished savant; he tells wryly of his inner feeling that he was being buried before he was dead. Then came the high years, between sixty-five and seventy, when he fled from Prague to organise the Czech movement abroad. His final work, nurture of the new Czechoslovak state, began at an age when the lives as well as careers of most men are long since over.

He is a very old man now, but still alert, and the range of his interests is extraordinary. His conversation is a bit diffuse; he is inclined to get lost in the flow of his own sentences. In one half-hour's talk I had with him, he mentioned, aside from domestic politics, such things as birth control, Irish nationalism and the Catholic Church, Senator Borah, biology, modern American literature (of which he has an amazing knowledge), the Polish corridor, the amount of pocket-money of American soldiers in France, the Habsburgs, Dostoevsky (he is, at eighty-five, just finishing a book on Dostoevsky), Bill Hard, the world economic crisis, the Yugoslav sculptor Mestrovic, and a new English novel he had just been reading and the title of which he couldn't for the life of him remember.

I had expected to meet a man excessively stern, even self-righteous. But Masaryk has a strong sense of humour. He cackled vigorously. His interest in human nature, immense, neglects no comic facet. He told Čapek that academic psychology was of no help to him in learning about human nature – 'only life and novels'. For seventy years, he said, he has been reading novels every day. 'Man is a damned complicated and puzzling machine. And each man different.' During the whole period of the War, he has related, he slept only half a dozen nights; presumably he read novels instead.

After seeing him I made a few rough notes as follows: 'Warm, strong handshake; no glasses; old man's eyes, hard to tell the colour of them, probably deep grey; still a fuzz of white hair on the scalp; all his own teeth, plus a bit of gold shining when he laughs; plenty of moustache, small beard; glazed hard, shiny, cheeks; prominent nose; a typical peasant's face; distinctly not patrician or "intellectual"; a boulder, shrunken, hard-bitten, out of the soil.'

Masaryk is old. But his work is done. He has built a nation.

¹ Čapek, President Masaryk Tells His Story, p. 121.

The story, in its perfection of sequence in cause and effect, is like a Greek tragedy – except that it ended happily. He will die soon. There is no man of our time who will leave a better memory, for others to remember.¹

Beneš

'I can tell you that without Beneš we should not have had our revolution,' Masaryk told Čapek. The two men worked together from the time of the War, though Beneš was thirty-five years younger. The old philosopher roamed the world, seeking sympathy for the Czech cause: Beneš, likewise a refugee, stayed in Paris – he was the organiser, the filing clerk, the skilful and adhesive practical politician. Masaryk wrote Czech aspirations amid the stars; the pertinacious Beneš wrote them into treaties which re-drew the map of Europe.

Dr. Eduard Beneš, sharp-nosed, sharp-eyed, an intelligent and responsible world statesman, one of the soundest of European public men, has been uninterruptedly Czechoslovak minister of foreign affairs since 1919; thus he was the doyen of the foreign ministers of Europe. He was the son of a peasant, and was born in 1884 in Kozlany, Bohemia. As poor a boy as Masaryk, like his master he was self-educated; but whereas Masaryk's Ph. D. thesis was on suicide, that of Beneš in 1908 was on a more practical issue, 'The Austrian Problem and the Czechoslovak Question.'

Beneš is as efficient as a dynamo. I have never seen him laugh. He is small and slight. He wears a flat-brimmed hat cocked high on the head. He works about fifteen hours a day, and like Mussolini (whom he doesn't otherwise resemble) he delights to see people if they can tell him things; he is one of the most accessible statesmen in Europe. He has no cant or side. He talks facts. Listening to you, he forms your ideas into an orderly progression, One – Two – Three – and then discusses them in series. Expressing his own viewpoint he again uses numerals, but with alphabetical subheads 1A, 2B, and so on. The basis of his success is method. He is a wiry negotiator. No one ever put anything over on Eduard Beneš.

It gives one a queer oblique glimpse through the years to remember that Beneš was not always Beneš. His names, at one time or other, have been 'Spolný', 'Bělský', 'Berger', 'Novotný', 'König', 'Šícha', and 'Leblanc'. Fifteen years ago the Czechoslovak foreign minister was busy, like Masaryk, forging passports, crawling across frontiers, in momentary danger of being shot as a spy – which he was. Once he was arrested in England for travelling with a false passport. Within six months he was officially signing passports of the nation he helped to create.

¹ Thomas Garrigue Masaryk died at the age of eighty-seven in September 1937. As one man his country mourned him.

Like Masaryk, Beneš is a good European. He performs the complex miracle of adjusting complete national patriotism to a deep and conscientious regard to his duties, as he sees them, to Europe as a whole. He helped to found the League of Nations, and helps to run it. One of the greatest living authorities on security and disarmament, he was almost as active in Geneva for many years as Prague. Any time an important European issue arises, Beneš writes an 'exposé', usually a pamphlet eighty or ninety pages long, which he reads to the Czech parliament; and you can be sure it will be a complete and authoritative statement of the problem. Beneš was president of the Sanctions Assembly in September 1935. His dearest ambition is to organise an effective United States of Europe.

When Masaryk retired in December 1935, Beneš, as was expected, succeeded him to the presidency of Czechoslovakia.

Czech Complex

The good wife is the one you don't hear about. So it is with countries. Almost everyone who visits Czechoslovakia returns to quote the old saying, 'Happy is the country that has no history.' Czechoslovakia has, of course, plenty of history, but it is undeniably true that local Czech politics, under the inspiration of Masaryk, pursue a very smooth and inconspicuous course.

One of the first persons I met on the first of many visits to Prague was the dramatist Karel Čapek, author of the robot play R.U.R. He said at once, 'Why do you come here? We have no Hitlers, no royal pretenders, no Putsches, no communist riots, no palace scandals. I warn you immediately – we are terribly uninteresting.' And the dour Czechs were, indeed, a great contrast to the flamboyance of Hungary, the paralysis of Vienna, the hysterics of Berlin.

I met a Press officer in the foreign office – one of the best Press offices in Europe, incidentally. Czechoslovakia being a civilised country, there is no need for a newspaper man to waste his first three days convincing the authorities that he is not a burglar or spy. The Press bureau in Prague is so well run that it is often accused of 'propaganda'. Of course. Propaganda is what it exists for. What enemies of Czechoslovakia object to is that Czechoslovak propaganda is so friendly, efficient, and, in general, honest and accurate that rival countries are outrun.

Czechoslovakia was, of course, more fortunate to begin with than its partners or opponents. Its people were, for one thing, a closely-knit cultural unit, deriving from the tradition of Bohemian kings older than Habsburgs or Hohenzollerns. The Czechs were steadier than their volatile southern Slav cousins, more industrious than the Poles and Rumanians, and with a better background of administrative experience – the Czechs were the civil servants of the old empire – than Slovenes or Serbs.

They inherited, moreover, about three-quarters of the industry of the old empire and most of its mineral and other resources. Thus the great streams of toys, ceramics, glassware, textiles, steelware, munitions, beer, paper, yarn, hams, buttons, that have poured from Czechoslovakia ever since. Again, Czechoslovakia, unlike Jugoslavia or Poland, had been untouched by actual battle; physical reparation was not a problem. Finally, Czechoslovakia had a solid and unbeaten army, comprised of the Russian legions, in contrast to the wrecked fugitives that had to restore order in the other succession states.

On this lucky basis the young country, wedged like a downward-pointing long-nosed dachshund in the very centre of Europe, built, and built well. It eschewed foreign loans and foreign short-term credits, and so was not caught frenziedly short like Germany and the other Danubian countries in the 1931 financial crisis; it strictly limited imports ('Any Czech citizen who buys an orange,' said the first finance minister, 'is a traitor to the state') in an effort to maintain its favourable trade balance; it kept its budget in good order; it made a fairly successful land reform; it built schools for free education; it permitted inner politics to evolve on a very wide coalition basis including the social democrats; and it adopted a fairly reasonable policy toward its numerous minorities.

Even so, after a decade of almost uninterruptedly calm development, Czechoslovakia in the middle thirties faced serious troubles. Two events of great importance occurred. One was the sudden and powerful rise of a disguised Nazi party under a thirty-five-year-old Bohemian sub-Hitler, a gymnasium instructor named Konrad Henlein. In the 1935 elections this party, representing the bulk of Czechoslovakia's minority of 3,300,000 Germans, polled 1,247,000 votes and became overnight the second largest party in the country, rising from zero seats in the chamber to forty-four. Henlein protested loyalty to Masaryk and the Czechoslovak state. But if Austria should go Nazi, Czechoslovakia would virtually be encircled by Hitlerism, and Henlein's movement is a serious potential threat.

Intelligent Dr. Beneš knows this. Therefore the second event. He went through Europe mending fences with assiduous alacrity. The first plank in his policy is the alliance with France, the second, the solidarity of the Little Entente – Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Jugoslavia. But as the German menace mounted and Czech relations with Poland grew steadily worse Dr. Beneš saw that he needed something else, and so he went to Moscow and signed a mutual assistance pact – not merely a 'non-aggression' pact which is the form such treaties usually take – with the U.S.S.R. Czechoslovakia, it is understood, became the military link between France and the Soviet Union as defence against Germany and the other revisionist states. Prague, conveniently central, could be an air-base for both French and Russian planes. In erecting this framework, Beneš was actuated by imperatives of self-defence.

Dr. Hodza and his Problems

Dr. Milan Hodza, a Slovak agrarian, became prime minister after the elevation of Dr. Beneš to the presidency. His appointment was shrewd politics, a gesture to the large Slovak component of the republic. Ambitious and hard-boiled, Hodza took office after many years of opposition and started off well. He was born in Sucany (then a town in Hungary) in 1878, a protestant. He took his Ph. D. at the University of Vienna, became a journalist, and sat in the old Hungarian parliament as a representative of the Slovak minority.

The chief thing Hodza had – and has – to worry about is Germany. Himself rather pro-German (but not pro-Nazi) in instinct, anxious for rapprochement with difficult neighbours like the Reich and Poland, he found the Germans an incessant problem. Domestically Henlein's Nazi party tried to make trouble; externally the German Government continually bombarded him. One charge was that Russian aerodromes had been secretly constructed – underground! – in Czechoslovakia. Until Spain blew up, Czechoslovakia had the doubtful honour of being the unanimous choice of most political Cassandras as the locale of the next war.

Danube Pact

It is in the Danube region that those two doughty warriors, politics and economics, fight some of their grimmest battles. Nothing, on the face of it, would seem to be more sensible a solution of the difficulties of the area than an economic recreation of empire unity. Abolish the tariffs that deface the territory; cut out mushroom nationalist industries; exchange agrarian goods for industrial products on a basis of efficiency. Simple? Far from it! The Danube countries would far prefer to sink alone than swim together. The nationalist hatreds of these regions cannot be expressed in graphs and charts. They defy belief. I remember a young Hungarian's response to a proposal for a mutual ten per cent cut on Czech-Hungarian tariffs.

'What!' he exclaimed. 'Do you imagine we rate our hatred of the Czechs at only ten per cent!'

The political cleavage of the Danube powers does not, of course, correspond to the natural economic realities of the region. The six states were stratified into two groups, the winners, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Jugoslavia, against the losers, Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria. This political groupment is bad business, as business. Economically, Czechoslovakia and Austria should form one bloc, an industrial bloc, vis-à-vis an agrarian block of the predominantly grain producing countries, Hungary, Rumania, Jugoslavia, Bulgaria. All attempts at Danube salvage have broken on this issue, the fundamental and inescapable dichotomy between the political and economic interests of the region.

There were other political difficulties. Austro-Czechoslovakia (if it existed) would not be big enough a market for all the grain of Hungaro-Rumano-Bulgoslavia. Germany, the best natural purchaser, would have to join the industrial brethren. Then politics protruded its ugly face again: because France would object to this. So would Italy. The Little Entente itself is far from being a happy economic unit. Czechoslovakia buys comparatively little grain from its allies Rumania and Jugoslavia, because the strong Czech agrarian party, defending its internal interests, demands high tariffs on grain from the Entente partners.

Balkans

'The war between Hungary and Jugoslavia has been averted, and the League of Nations will try to find a way to settle the controversy. Perhaps the best solution would be to plough under every third Balkan.'

— HOWARD BRUBAKER.

Beyond and below Czechoslovakia lie the deep Balkans. They are, it has been said, a sort of hell paved with the bad intentions of the powers. The War was fought, remarked the Greek statesman Venizelos, to Europeanise the Balkans; what the War did, more or less, was Balkanise Europe. The Balkan peninsula is an unstable pyramid of nationalist hatreds, and of minority hatreds within nations.

BENEŠ

One can make a pretty list of them. What is the worst hatred in southern and eastern Europe? Does a Bulgar hate a Serb more than a Croat hates a Serb? Do the hatreds of both combined equal the hatred of either for, say, an Italian or a Greek? Does a Hungarian hate a Rumanian more than a Rumanian hates a Bulgarian? Does a Galician hate a Pole more than a Ukrainian hates a Russian?

It is an intolerable affront to human and political nature that these wretched and unhappy little countries in the Balkan peninsula can, and do, have quarrels that cause world wars. A million young Englishmen died because of an event in 1914 in a mud-caked primitive village Sarajevo. Loathsome and almost obscene snarls in Balkan politics, hardly intelligible to a western reader, are still vital to the peace of Europe, and perhaps the world.

EDITOR'S NOTE:—Since the recent Nazi coup made Austria a province of the German Reich, the world has been wondering about the probable fate of Czechoslovakia. She has announced that she is prepared to defend her frontiers, but while she has strong defences along her German front, she has none on the Austrian border. Reference to the map will show that, with the annexation of Austria, Germany now holds Czechoslovakia in a pincer-like grip.

CAROL, RUMANIA, AND LUPESCU

RUMANIA, a rich country, 18,800,000 strong, is ruled by King Carol, who in turn is ruled by Magda Lupescu. The land swims in oil, smothers in grain and timber, though much wealth has been lost by the depredations of corrupt politicians. The capital, Bucharest, is a tinselly sort of little Paris where the main street, the Calea Victoria, flutters with silken skirts and the leather trappings of gay carriages transporting perfumed, corseted officers. Here wealth produced by the sweating and starving peasants is spent on tsuica (plum spirit), on caviare from Danube sturgeons, on huge red strawberries from the Transylvanian hills.

For three generations Rumania was ruled by a family of hereditary semi-dictators, the Bratianus; it was a Bratianu who peddled the Rumanian crown around the courts of Europe and brought back Carol's grand-uncle as the country's first king. The policy of the Bratianus was that of the Turk suzerains and Phanariot Greek concessionaires who had preceded them – despoil the land with artful greed. No country in Europe has been so corruptly manipulated and exploited. Baksheesh was the national watchword. After the War came a land reform. The peasants, to buy seed and tools, borrowed money at interest rates of thirty, forty, even fifty per cent. But they could not sell the glut of grain the land produced. As a result agrarian bankruptcy ruined them in thousands and the agricultural debt became, per capita, the highest in the world. The finances were paralysed, the budget deficit mounted out of sight – and in the ornate streets of Bucharest money flowed like silk in the hands of a corrupt and chosen few.

There is a cruel little joke about Rumania. 'Mania' means madness. 'Kleptomania' means madness to steal. 'Rumania' means madness to steal applied to a nation.

Rumanians are good-natured and fatalistic folk, colourful and easy-going; they don't like trouble or bloodshed. They are not like Serbs, who have high qualities of heroism and a predisposition to patriotic murder. There has never been a revolution in Rumania.

The Rumanians are oddly mixed in blood, being originally Latin, the descendants of Roman legions sent to the province of Dacia by the emperor Trajan; atop this were superimposed centuries of Slavic blood. And there are traces of Gipsy, Tartar, Greek, and Turk in most Rumanians.

To this country and its primitive and illiterate people came a young British princess about forty years ago. She was Marie, daughter of the Duke of Edinburgh and grand-daughter of both Queen Victoria of England and the Czar of Russia, representing a type of unique concentration of royalty that has become rare in the modern world. Marie married Ferdinand, the Rumanian heir apparent, and gave birth to six children, the eldest of whom was Carol. She and Ferdinand ruled from 1914 till Ferdinand died in 1927. Meanwhile all manner of scandalous things had happened. And kept on happening.

Carol was a complicated, truculent, and strongwilled youngster. Even as a boy he was hard to manage. He disliked his father, the arid, flinty Ferdinand, and adored his mother – at the beginning. He bitterly resented, however, the power in the court of one of the great Rumanian nobles, Prince Stirbey, and of Jon Bratianu, the dictator, who was Stirbey's brother-in-law. Carol grew up to follow the example of the court, and himself began to lead an emotional life of considerable complexity.

In 1918 he met Mlle Zizi Lambrino in Jassy, the provincial town where the Rumanian court had taken refuge during the German invasion. Marie tried to frustrate his affair with Lambrino with the result, of course, that she strengthened it. As if going out of his way to annoy his family, Carol actually married Lambrino. It was not a clandestine or morganatic marriage, but took place in the cathedral of Odessa, fully solemnised. The Rumanian supreme court annulled the marriage and Carol was angry enough to abdicate. But after a year or so he tired of Lambrino, and in the crush of war both marriage and abdication were allowed to be forgotten. Lambrino bore Carol a son, by name Mircea.

Carol, still more or less a boy in the hands of Marie and the Bratianu bosses, was told to take a trip around the world to recuperate and forget. He got as far from Rumania as Switzerland, where he met Princess Helene, the daughter of King Constantine of Greece, whose son George, by the efficient management of Marie, was to marry Carol's sister Elizabeth. Carol decided to settle down.

He married Helene. This was in March 1921. The royal couple returned to Bucharest and prepared to live happily ever after.

But subsequently Carol met Magda Lupescu, and a new phase of Rumanian history began.

Carol had come by this time to open conflict with Jon Bratianu, the dictator. He resented Bratianu's influence, and had served formal notice that when he became king he would wipe out the Bratianu-Stirbey clique. Bratianu was no person to take a threat like this lying down. Carol's affair with Lupescu was becoming a bit of a scandal, and it gave Bratianu a chance to strike. Carol was sent off to represent Rumania at the funeral in London of Queen Alexandra. This duty performed, he met Lupescu in Milan. They were going to Venice together, but he found a message telling him to return to Bucharest at once, without his mistress, or forfeit the succession. Bratianu had prevailed on Ferdinand and Marie thus to 'discipline' their son. Carol flashed into temper, refused to return. Thereupon, with extreme haste, Bratianu wangled a crown council into accepting Carol's 'abdication'.

Carol thus began his five years' exile. During this time Lupescu never once left his side.

Ferdinand died in 1927, and Carol's six-year-old son Michael – by Helene – became king. Then, more important, Jon Bratianu died, and the clique lost power as a peasant chieftain, Juliu Maniu, took advantage of the troubled situation to assert leadership; he became prime minister. The remnants of the Bratianu gang wanted Carol out. Maniu, patriotically eager to preserve the dynasty, wanted him back. Maniu's idea was that the divorce between Carol and Helene made during the exile should be annulled, and that Carol might then really settle down. So he arranged for Carol to return – by means of the celebrated coup of June 1930, when the exiled prince flew back to Bucharest. Carol proclaimed himself king, unseating his boy Michael, and taking thus a throne that had already been held by both his father and his son.

Maniu, as we shall see, reckoned without Lupescu. He had assumed Carol would desert her. He was wrong.

The Lady

Magda Lupescu is, beyond doubt, one of the most remarkable women of the time. She is fortyish now, and getting fat; nevertheless Carol is still devoted to her, and life without her is unthinkable for him. She is a King's Favourite in the grand line of Du Barry and de Pompadour. Her personal influence on him is probably, on the whole, good, but the fact that she is Jewish, and has come to head a sort of secret government within a government, has had serious political consequences.

Lupescu is in fact only half-Jewish. She was born in Jassy, the daughter of the keeper of an apothecary shop named Wolff. He changed his name to Lupescu, the Rumanian equivalent, in order to get permission to practise as a chemist, since only a certain proportion of Jews were allowed to enter the professions. On a trip to Vienna he met a Roman Catholic girl and married her. Lupescu was the child of his marriage. She was actually baptised a Roman Catholic.

She met Carol in 1923 in Sinaia, the summer capital, where his coterie of bucks and bloods went to hunt and play roulette. Previously she had married an army officer; when Carol became attentive she quietly divorced him. A woman of great intelligence and commanding personality, with flaming red hair, her charms were such that Carol gave up a throne for her.

Until very recently she lived at No. 2 Alea Vulpache, in a two-story red brick villa at the left of the Polish legation, near the corner of the Alea Alexandria, in the residential outskirts of Bucharest. There is a big garden, and the visitor is perplexed by a row of chicken coops along one wall. Leghorns and Plymouth Rocks, also a couple of turkeys, scamper and strut behind the wire. The story is that not only does Lupescu tend these domestic creatures, but with her own hands helped the carpenters build the sheds and coops.

She and Carol cannot live together openly. This would not be too great a shock for Rumanian morals but it would be politically imprudent. Everyone in the kingdom knows that she is his mistress, and she is openly attacked as such in speeches and pamphlets by the opposition, but a certain discretion is necessary in Carol's personal routine. Sometimes she motors into town at night and enters the palace grounds by a garden gate. In the garden, separate from the palace but connected with it by a passage, is a small cottage. The palace, be it understood, is situated on the main street of Bucharest, in a location comparable to that of Piccadilly in London. So privacy is difficult. Therefore, Carol and Lupescu live as much as possible in the mountain village where they first met, Sinaia.

People resent Lupescu for a variety of reasons. Some of the princely families which had ruled and pillaged Rumania for so long cannot stand it that Carol lives such an irregular personal life. Many other Rumanians, both patrician and of common stock, would not mind if the king had twenty mistresses, but they dislike Lupescu's Jewishness. Above all, she has come to typify and concentrate the opposition of the politicians, for the special reason that she has become a politician in her own right, and the most important one in the kingdom – head of the palace camarilla.

This camarilla grew up partly because Carol, in his unwedded state, could not have a queen and a regular court, partly because he was naturally attached to a few old cronies. These were friends of Lupescu also. The camarilla, as it originally existed, was led by a man named Poui Dimitrescu, for many years the King's private secretary. The first camarilla was broken up early in 1934, following the assassination of the prime minister, Jon Duca, by fanatical adherents of the Iron Guard, a Fascist organisation pledged to extirpate Lupescu and all her friends. But a new camarilla took its place.

Lupescu has friends in all the key positions of the realm. She has her own secret service. She puts people in the big jobs. She has, in fact, almost usurped the functions of the prime minister; no prime minister can rule independently of her, yet she is not responsible to anyone. She isn't, even her enemies admit, interfering with things badly, but nothing important can be done without her consent; and this infuriates the politicians. Her activity of course enhances her value to the King, because she is the convenient instrument whereby he exercises extra-curricular functions – so necessary to the fun of kingship, especially in Rumania, where almost everything is 'fixed'.

Two people have dared come out in the open against Lupescu. One is Maniu. He is able to do so because, to date, the King can touch him only at the risk of a revolution. But Maniu lost his job as prime minister on Lupescu's account. The other was Colonel Vladimir Precup. This officer was the agent chiefly responsible for the outside arrangements of Carol's coup d'état when he flew back to Rumania. For years he was one of Carol's best friends, along with the all-powerful private secretary, Dimitrescu. Later Precup thought that Lupescu's influence on Carol was ruining the country and he concocted a fantastic plot to get rid of her. He was arrested, dismissed from the army, and sentenced to ten years in jail.

One person dared to combat her – to a point. He was, and is, Nicolai Titulescu, until recently Rumania's voluble and eccentric foreign minister. After the Duca killing, Titulescu declined to enter the cabinet until there was a house-cleaning. He refused to serve in any government so long as the King was surrounded by a gang which aroused the Iron Guard to murder. Titulescu was indispensable to Carol, as the only Rumanian with a European prestige in international matters. As price for his entry in the government, he demanded the break-up of the old camarilla. For a week, the struggle went on between Lupescu, the King's mistress, and Titulescu, who is uninterested in mistresses. Titulescu won. But he was far too shrewd to threaten the position of Lupescu herself.

Lupescu is practically an ideal mistress, were it not for politics. She is not frivolous; on the contrary her discretion is notorious. Not forty people in Bucharest, outside her own circle, have ever seen her. She is not avaricious; indeed she learned the value of cold cash during the years of exile, and she persuades Carol to save his money. She is, according to all gossip, faithful to him, and this in a country monstrously licentious. She has no desire to marry Carol. She knows it would be the end of the dynasty. Nor has she encumbered him with illegitimate children. And Madame de Montespan, be it remembered, inflicted on Louis XIV seven.¹

Magda Lupescu is a striking anachronism. Kings are dull folk these days; and royal favourites, like court jesters, have practically fled the field. Louise de la Vallière was the daughter of an officer; Lupescu of a small town chemist. Nell Gwynn sold oranges at Drury Lane; Lupescu frequented the Athena Palace hotel in Bucharest. Her mileage is good. Du Barry lasted five years a king's mistress; Lupescu has been with Carol over ten.

They tell a little story in Bucharest to the effect that her father scolded her severely at the time that Carol's brother, Nicholas, was indulging in amorous and scandalous high jinks. Carol had settled, as it were, down. But Nicholas was acting up. Against his brother's orders he had committed marriage with a certain Madame Saveanu. Carol had done something exactly similar in his youth but there was no puritan like a reformed rake and he was wild with fury; Nicholas, he said, was bringing a bad name to the crown. Bucharest rocked, especially at the report that Nicholas blacked his royal brother's eye. And old Lupescu came to Magda saying, ¹ Occasionally rumours that Lupescu is to be married off to someone crop up. Also reports of Carol's 'engagement' to a German princess were recently heard.

'Daughter, daughter, what kind of a family are you getting mixed up with!'

Royal Rapscaillon

Carol to-day is rather portly, with something of a midriff; he is no youngster. He is vain, stubborn, wilful, and by no means unintelligent. He has very little sense of humour. He speaks letter-perfect English with a hint of German accent, letter-perfect French with a hint of English accent, and letter-perfect German with a hint of French accent. Even his Rumanian is not quite perfect – familiar symptom of the polyglot training of Balkan kings.

He is pretty well off. His personal salary is £72,727 per year (at present exchange) and, contrary to general opinion, he lives fairly modestly and must be able to save a third of it. One Bucharest estimate gives him savings, deposited mostly in banks or securities abroad, of 20,000,000 French francs, or something over £200,000. The official civil list is the following:

King Carol	40,000,000 lei (£72,727)
Queen Mother Marie	20,000,000 ,, (£36,364)
Ex-Queen Helene	7,000,000 ,, (£12,726)
Crown Prince Michael	7,000,000 ,, (£12,726)
Travelling Expenses	6,000,000 ,, (£10,909)
Total	80,000,000 lei (£145,452)

Carol's relations with his whole family are bad, except with his son Michael, the only lad in history who has been king of a country once and may with reasonable expectation be king of the same country again. His system for Michael's education is eminently sensible, Carol having realised how bad his own education was. But Carol avoids his mother; he has exiled his ex-wife, Helene; he and Nicholas are far from friendly; and he is said to dislike his sister Ileana, now wife of the Archduke Anton Habsburg, who is the nicest of all the royal Rumanians.

Carol has very few friends; few kings, indeed can afford the luxury of friendship. He is apt to be rude, and overbearing, and on his dignity; people find it hard to talk to him. There is an ugly, jagged streak of maladjustment in his character, caused possibly by jealousy of his mother. His closest friend is probably Titianu, the man who is under-secretary of the interior in all cabinets; another intimate is Professor Nicolas Jorga, the fantastic pundit who was his tutor in his youth, who became professor of universal history at the University of Bucharest at the age of twenty-two, and who has written two hundred and fifty-seven different books and pamphlets.

CAROL

Carol is not a dictator. The plain truth is that he has no need to be. He is willing to practise almost any compromise which will save him from the danger of overt dictatorial rule, because he has taken good note of the fate of his royal cousins Alfonso of Spain and Alexander of Jugoslavia. He does not need to exert dictatorial power largely because of the Rumanian electoral law, by which the party getting forty per cent of the votes takes a thirty per cent bonus of the seats in the chamber. And Rumanian politics are such that a government in office is never voted out; the king determines the time for a change, superintends the appointment of a new ministry, and then this ministry makes new elections and always wins them.

After Duca was killed the King suddenly developed an extremely diplomatic illness, which prevented him from attending the funeral of the murdered prime minister. He feared the Iron Guard might bomb the cathedral where the services were being held. The decision to stay away was made at the last moment. Charts prepared in advance had shown where he would be. He wasn't there. Whispers surged through Bucharest that Carol was hiding in his palace, paralysed with fear. Possibly he was only being prudent. But he lost a fine chance to prove that bullets which could kill a prime minister could not scare a king.

Mother Marie

There should be another word about Marie. She is still a gorgeous woman. There are large sections of purest 'blah' in her autobiography, a book she never should have written; but from childhood she has sought to express herself. She was born with no sense of envy, no jealousy; she has not the faintest shadow of inferiority complex; she might have been a superb actress; her dramatic ability is extreme.

The tragedy of her life is the failure of her personal relations with Carol. She spoiled him as a youngster, and she still loves him deeply, but she cannot take him seriously as a king. He is still a boy to her. It is almost impossible for her to resist thinking that he is being absurd when he is acting like a monarch. And that he detests. In contrast, Lupescu's hold on Carol comes partly because she does see him for what he after all is, King of Rumania.

Marie is fond of young Michael and hopes desperately that he will grow up with her character in his bones, that he will skip the generation of his father. She wants him to get a good education, marry a princess, be a good king. She does everything possible to salve the unhappiness of his situation vis-à-vis his parents. Lupescu, incidentally, sees Michael casually but regularly, and is fond of him.

One is apt to forget what a first-class political queen Marie was. In the modern world royalty should earn its keep. Marie not only gave Rumania six children; she more than doubled its population and territory. An Englishwoman, she influenced Ferdinand, a German and a Hohenzollern, to side with the Allies instead of the Central Powers during the War; and thus at a stroke converted Rumania from a somewhat ridiculous semi-principality to the seventh largest country in continental Europe.

Marie is out of the political picture now. But, as she puts it, the people know that if they 'need' her, she is there.

More Fascist Scurvy

Only two streets away from the town palace where Carol lives is a hotel which, to put it mildly, expresses much of the spirit of Bucharest, amorously, politically, venally. In this hotel, almost every afternoon, two or three young men, well-dressed and multi-lingual, sit and sip Turkish coffee and talk about revolution. They are members of the Iron Guard.

This organisation was founded in 1927 by a young zealot, Corneliu Codreanu, who was of Polish not Rumanian origin; his real name is Zelinski. At first he called it the 'Legion of the Archangel Michael'. Its programme was a fanatic, obstreperous sub-Fascism on a strong nationalist and anti-Semitic basis. Its members trooped through the countryside, wore white costumes, carried burning crosses, impressed the ignorant peasantry, aroused the students in the towns. Presently its enrolled strength was two hundred thousand men.

Codreanu believed in overt violence; in fact he once shot the Mayor of Jassy, whom he accused of being pro-Semite. But his movement was only a sort of unpleasant eczema on the face of the land until Hitlerism came to power in the Reich. Then it straight-way reached considerable political importance, because if the Iron Guard came to power, it might transfer Rumania's traditional allegiance from France to Germany. Meanwhile, the person of Magda Lupescu was a perpetual red flag in the faces of Iron Guardsmen. Finally Duca, the prime minister, was murdered by Iron Guard desperadoes.

After the murder the Iron Guard split up, and the leadership passed to a more important man, Nicolai Stelescu. Officially, he separated from Codreanu because he did not believe in terrorism. He sought to make the Iron Guard respectable. It was forbidden as a legal party, but he tried to fight by legal means. He is a youngster of thirty, a fanatic, an idealist, with a council of advisers who worship him. He sits, holding a sort of court, in the foyer of the Athena Palace hotel almost every afternoon. He is a good demagogue and orator.¹

Men of the Iron Guard say that they expect to come to power through country-wide agitation centralised in local clubs called 'Cult de Patrie'. They intend to eliminate political parties when they reach power, but to leave the King alone, if he gives Lupescu up. They talk of the King quite respectfully. They deny that the organisation is any longer financed by Hitler. They say, in fact, that when their men visited Rosenberg in Berlin, he was astonished that they did not want money and complimented them on being the only Balkan sub-Hitler group which had ever come to Berlin without begging.

The Iron Guard recently became allied to the great National Peasant party of Juliu Maniu. This is an important development. Maniu thinks he is using the Iron Guard; they are his shock-troops. The Iron Guard assumes it is using Maniu; he is their political tactician. Other leaders, other parties, have joined this informal common-front, like the dissident liberals of George Bratianu, and the adherents of General Averescu, Rumania's chief War hero. All are linked by common hatred of Lupescu.

Maniu Tells his Story

One of the finest characters in all the Balkans, in fact in all Europe, and certainly the most distinguished citizen of Rumania, is Juliu Maniu. Ascetic, incorruptible, stately, devout, Maniu is a Transylvanian, the son of a peasant. He is a bachelor. Like Matchek in Croatia, whom his career resembles, he is a Roman ¹ On July 7, 1936, Stelescu was murdered in Bucharest as he lay on a hospital bed, presumably by Iron Guardists of the other camp.

Catholic; he was educated as a Jesuit. He has no interest in women, in money, or in personal power; he is that rare thing, a Rumanian patriot for Rumania's sake.

Maniu was born in 1873. Before the War he was a deputy in the Hungarian parliament, representing the (then) Rumanian minority. His health is not good. His faults as a politician are an unyielding stubbornness and inability to compromise; and his mind, tenacious enough, is slow-moving. He is capable of immense disinterestedness. He resigned the premiership because he was convinced Carol had treated Helene unjustly. He resigned his presidency of the National Peasant party because he felt that Carol's dislike of him prejudiced the party's chances of political success.

Maniu's first great achievement was binding together two wings of the submerged opposition, just after the War, and making a united force of it. From the old kingdom came the 'peasant' (Tsaranist) half of the party; from Transylvania and the other districts acquired by the peace treaties came the 'national' half. Rumania had a decent government for the first time in history when Maniu became prime minister. He tried to promote essential governmental economics and reforms; he set about reorganising agriculture and the railways; above all – a negative but valuable accomplishment – he ended the vicious Bratianu tyranny.

What is more, Maniu did something for which he gets small thanks nowadays – he brought King Carol back.

The world has heard a great deal of that dazzling aeroplane coup in June 1930, whereby Carol regained his throne. The true story of that coup has never been written. It is assumed that Carol, with the aid of a couple of gallant desperadoes, did the job himself. He was described as a hard-flying prince, a modern Allen Quartermaine, a hero. Nothing could be further from the truth. Carol did nothing whatever to bring himself back except get in the aeroplane. The whole business was engineered, inside Rumania, by Maniu.

His motives were clear. He knew that Carol, outside the country, was a perpetual focus of unrest and intrigue. He was aware that the regency was weak and he believed strongly in the three essential conditions of monarchist institutions: stability, continuity, authority. Moreover, he knew that inasmuch as the 'Liberal' (Bratianu) party was against Carol, his own National Peasant party, on realistic grounds, should favour him. Logic compelled him to try to bring the errant prince home. But he wanted him home without Lupescu.

Deeply disillusioned years after, Maniu himself wrote the whole story, as a speech which he was refused permission to deliver in the Rumanian parliament on December 12, 1934. It recounts in full detail his incessant manoeuvres on behalf of Carol even while Ferdinand was still alive. When Ferdinand died Maniu's activities redoubled. He committed the National Peasant party to the idea of Carol's restoration, sounded out the regency, and carefully tested public opinion. Following is part of the speech, which has never before been published:

'The impatience of H.R.H. Prince Carol (to return to Rumania) was growing, but he showed not the least sign of an intention to separate from Madame Lupescu. . . . In all conversations which I had with H.R.H. the Princess Mother Helene, I tried to remove her explicable bitterness towards H.R.H. Prince Carol, with the aim that should Prince Carol return the ground would be spiritually prepared for a reconciliation. . . . H.R.H. Prince Carol judged my foresight as indecision.

'My attitude, which was confirmed by messages I received, was not caused by hesitation but by the fact that for me two things were important: first, I needed assurance from H.R.H. Prince Carol that . . . he intended to reign in constitutional manner and not through personal friends; and secondly, that he would separate from Madame Lupescu whose fatal influence on Prince Carol enshadows him. . . .'

Maniu proceeds to relate how he sent an emissary to Paris to sound out Carol; the emissary saw not only the prince but Lupescu herself, who said that she would not upset plans by returning to Rumania with him. She is quoted as having said, 'The day that H.R.H. is restored to the throne for the happiness of the country, I shall disappear for ever, and my only wish is that thereafter no one shall speak of me.' Maniu, cautious, wanted this declaration implemented by a statement from Carol. He determined to send Nicholas to see him. He proceeds:

'In this situation, one day at the end of May 1930, Major Precup, well known to me, a devoted supporter of H.R.H. Prince Carol, presented himself and informed that he had been to see H.R.H. Prince Carol who begged him to ascertain what my final attitude would be were H.R.H. Prince Carol one day to decide to return home. I charged Major Precup to say to H.R.H. Prince Carol that there was no need for such a step because H.R.H. Prince Nicholas on July 18th would leave for Paris and meet H.R.H. Prince Carol and discuss matters until I could come myself.

'I asked Major Precup about Madame Lupescu. He replied: "She is not returning to the country." I then told him that in that event if . . . H.R.H. Prince Carol should decide independently to return, he would not find an enemy but a good friend in me.'

Maniu then details the astounding labours he went through preparing for the event. He tended to every detail. He called Colonel Manolescu, the adjutant of Prince Nicholas, and communicated with Nicholas. He arranged that the minister of war, General Condescu, should prepare troops at Cluj and Jassy to receive Carol, and that the garrison in Bucharest should be on duty at the aeroplane field. He informed the cabinet and the regents, and arranged that one of the regents, Sarateanu, should resign his place so that Carol could take it. He even arranged for a room for Carol to sleep in at the palace.

Carol arrived; and at five the next morning Maniu was informed that he wished to be proclaimed King at once. Maniu had had the different idea that Carol should first enter the regency, until his marital affairs were adjusted and the country got used to the new state of affairs. Carol was insistent. Maniu dutifully and with some difficulty procured the consent of the regency and then held a cabinet meeting:

'Five ministers voted for the entry of H.R.H. Prince Carol into the regency, while six were in favour of his being proclaimed King. My view was the minority, but several ministers said they were prepared to submit to my decision, whatever it might be. . . . During the cabinet meeting a large delegation of members of parliament of our party had come to see me. I received them. They were of the opinion that H.R.H. Prince Carol should be proclaimed King immediately and begged me not to obstruct their desires. I saw at once the problem had taken a turning from which no efforts of mine could divert it, even though it was obvious what evil results would follow if H.R.H. Prince Carol were proclaimed King without first having arranged the question of Princess Helene and Madame Lupescu. . . . But I could not force my views in the face of public opinion . . . and it was too late to obtain the results at which I had aimed. I therefore took recourse to the only logical and honourable solution; I . . . resigned.'

Carol, after a few days, was compelled to reaccept Maniu as prime minister. Maniu proceeds:

'Immediately after the formation of the government, in accord with the wishes of H.M. the King, I proposed that the coronation be held without delay. I fixed the date between September 15 and 20, 1930, and established that H.M. the King should be crowned together with Princess Mother Helene. I presented the programme of the coronation and took the preliminary measures at Alba Julia. Tired but glad at the result obtained, I left for a two weeks' holiday.

'Upon my return I found the situation entirely changed. H.M. the King no longer wanted to hear of the coronation. The situation which, to my great joy, had been improving, tending to become more normal, had been aggravated. I did not know how this change had come about. . . .

'Then, accidentally, I learned that Madame Lupescu had returned to the country. I refused to believe it. I made inquiry of the directors of the Security Service, Messrs. Cadere and Bianu. They denied it. I asked M. Vaida; he knew nothing. I was again informed that Madame Lupescu had returned. I again asked M. Bianu, who replied that it was another Madame Lupescu. I learned, however, that she had returned on August 4, 1930, and that she was stopping at Foisor Palace.'

Shortly thereafter Maniu resigned again. He was 'extremely tired' and saw that 'under these conditions government with results was not possible'. The King, he records, received his resignation with 'evident pleasure'. Maniu learned the lesson that royalty does not like to be too much indebted to its subjects. What had happened was that Carol tried to give Lupescu up. He stuck it out alone for just two months. Then he found life unbearable without her.

Diplomat De Luxe

The only other Rumanian politician worth note is the fabulous ex-foreign minister Nicolai Titulescu. He looks like a mongoloid monkey; he is the best conversationalist in the Balkans; he controls all the best journalists in Bucharest; he is the one man in Rumania trusted by the French general staff; he is torrentially voluble in half a dozen languages; his wit and unquenchable vivacity are famous all over Europe: he wears an overcoat indoors, even on the hottest day; he is No. 2 on the death list of the Iron Guard; he has twice been president of the League of Nations Assembly and in 1935 was president of both the Little Entente and the Balkan Entente, comprising populations of almost seventy million people.

Carol, jealous of Titulescu, booted him from office while he was ill and in France on a holiday.

George Tatarescu, Carol's premier since 1935, a young 'liberal', took his job.

Germany or U.S.S.R.?

Rumania is the second country in the iron ring of the Little Entente. Its army is not very good but its resources in oil (one-third owned by British companies), are enormous and it is of great strategic importance in the French system of alliances throughout Europe. The French would not like to lose Rumania. And they have no intention of doing so.

Yet Rumania has been tempted on occasion to German leanings. There are several reasons:

(1) Rumania's chief crop is grain and Germany is potentially its best market. France and Rumania's partners in the Little Entente and Balkan Entente (Jugoslavia, Turkey, and Greece) are able to buy very little Rumanian grain. Germany could buy it all – for a political price.

(2) Not only is anti-Semitism very acute in Rumania, but there exists a German minority of eight hundred thousand Saxons; these naturally feel the swastika itch. Besides the Iron Guard there are at least three Fascist parties in Rumania.

(3) Rumania's enemy is Hungary. France is not near enough to help Rumania in the event of war with Hungary, even if it were willing to. Germany might. This is to look far ahead, but the necessity to have an ally in the event the Hungarians ever attempt to regain Transylvania plays a certain role in Rumanian foreign policy.

(4) Carol is half a Hohenzollern. And like many men with power who would like more power, he probably has a surreptitious admiration for Hitler.

The Franco-Soviet arrangement, on the other hand, tends to keep Rumania in line. For years Rumania feared a Russian attempt to regain Bessarabia, the rich province along the Dniester which Rumania seized from the U.S.S.R. after the War. The Bolsheviks playing for peace in the west, renounced aggressive intentions towards Bessarabia. This naturally relieved the Rumanians, and the way was open to extend the French alliance with a Rumanian-Soviet non-aggression pact. But so far the Iron Guard has blocked it.

JUGOSLAVIA AFTER ALEXANDER

PETER II, Europe's youngest monarch, fourteen years old, King of Yugoslavia in succession to his murdered father Alexander, is titular ruler of some 13,500,000 powerful Serbs, Croats, Slovenes, Slavones, Macedonians, Montenegrins, Bosnians, Dalmatians, united in the Kingdom of Yugoslavia. He is a shy and awkward boy. The trouble seems to be a badly mangled education. Through carelessness or ignorance, or both, his father and mother brought him up in errant fashion. His only teacher until he was ten was an English governess. She was a worthy character and devoted to the backward, lonely child, but her share in his training should have ended when he reached school age.

The King, Alexander, only realised this shortly before his death, and it was Queen Marie of Rumania, the boy's grandmother, who stepped in and insisted on some proper education for the prince. So he was sent to England to school. Then his father was murdered and Peter, succeeding him, returned to Yugoslavia and now is unable to resume school, because the provisions of the Yugoslav constitution forbid the monarch from leaving the country for any extended stay. It was a pity Peter could not finish school in England. The next best thing was done; an English tutor, Parrott, was put in charge of him.

Peter learned the news of his father's death from Queen Marie. She didn't know how to break the terrible news to him. Finally she said, 'Peter, you know people will call you Majesty now.' The boy burst into tears, crying, 'Grandmamma, I am too young to be a king.'

In strict contrast to Peter's mismanaged education is the example of his cousin Michael of Rumania. Father Carol has been very sensible about Michael. He goes to school with twelve other boys picked from all over the kingdom, and on terms of almost complete democracy with them. The boys are chosen from different parts of Rumania – Transylvania, Bessarabia, and so on – so that Michael will absorb different Rumanian characteristics, and they come from various walks of life: the father of one, for instance, is a railway switchman, another is the son of a minor government official. The school, which sits in the palace, is completely staffed, and Carol has the boys to lunch once a week or so. As a result, Michael is a poised and confident youngster, and when he and Peter are together, the contrast between his bright ebullience and Peter's shy timidity is striking.

Peter is one of the richest boys of his age in Europe, perhaps the richest. The financial section of his father's will has never been published, but so far as is known, Peter is sole heir, and Alexander's fortune was estimated at £2,000,000. Much of it – not a patriotic detail from the viewpoint of orthodox nationalism – was held in bank accounts abroad, not in Jugoslavia, and in foreign (not Jugoslav) securities. Alexander differed from other dictators, Hitler or Mussolini, in a passionate acquisitiveness to money.

The Jugoslav civil list is paid as a whole to the King and the King determines how it shall be apportioned in the family. Obviously a boy of fourteen cannot do this and his cousin, the Regent Prince Paul and his mother have charge of the income, though purely as trustees. The civil list is enormous, amounting to 55,000,000 dinars a year, or about £250,000 at present exchange: half of it is paid in dinars in Jugoslavia, half deposited in Swiss francs abroad. Regent Paul's allowance is 720,000 dinars a year, and in addition he gets a salary as Regent of 540,000 dinars, a total roughly equal to £5,760 – a pittance compared to the money at theoretical disposal of the boy.

Peter is a boy with a throne – and no playmates. He has £2,000,000 – and nothing to spend it on. His income is somewhere around £600 a day and he earns it by being afflicted with kingship in the most obstreperous of Balkan countries. All the glamour of royalty, if there is any, is hardly recompense for the formidable strain which will accompany this unlucky lad's adolescence. He should be playing football; instead he has a court chamberlain behind the curtains. He has, moreover, the most terrible prospect in the world; he can never change his job, he is King for life, he can never escape the steep walls of his own future.

Martyred Monarch

Alexander is dead, and his bullet-torn body lies in the Kara-georgeovitch crypt in Oblenetz, near Belgrade, a highly decorated structure that will look well in a century or two, when time has dimmed the colour of its burning mosaics. But to understand Jugoslavia, to chart even an approximate projection of events, we must pause a moment and study the dead king's life and works.

In pictures, as the American magazine Time unvaryingly pointed out, he resembled a small-town dentist. In reality he looked like what he was—a King. He was industrious, charming, capable of almost inexplicable sudden flights of worry, temperament, and fury, yet disciplined and shrewd—a complex character. He was both implacable and bright-hearted. He died at forty-six, and he is stronger dead than alive, because temporarily at least his murder served to unify his riven country.

First and last Alexander was a soldier. He fought all through the War. He walked with common soldiers in the terrible retreat across Serbia in 1915. Moral in his personal life to the point of austerity, he despised his brother-in-law Carol as a wastrel and profligate. He liked Boris of Bulgaria but was suspicious of his timidity and lackadaisical qualities. It would have been unthinkable for Alexander, like Boris, to walk the streets of his capital unguarded. He was brought up at the court of the Czar in Petrograd, where he was a page; the glitter and absolutism of this resplendency dazzled him, permanently influenced his life. He did not love pomp but he did love uncompromisingly the display of authority. He spent his fantastic salary with extreme frugality; his only extravagances were books and motor-cars. In the Dedinje library he had twenty thousand books. He owned twenty-three motor-cars, all Packards; he was one of the largest individual owners of Packards in the world.

Like all dictators except Hitler, he was a tremendous worker. Alexander rose early and was at his desk by eight; his secretaries had to have the whole of his day's correspondence, papers, etc., ready for him at this hour. At ten every day the audiences began. Every Monday he received first the chief of the general staff, the town commandant of Belgrade, and the chief of police. He worked till late in the evening, when, stupefied with fatigue, he either played bridge with the Queen and a few close friends, or, like Hitler, listened to music. He played the piano himself quite often, and fairly well. He never wore civilian dress; always uniform. In his reception-room the only ornaments were showcases filled with models of field artillery and cross-sections of shells, burnished till they glowed like jewels.

Behind Alexander, behind young Peter, are a couple of generations of the most turbulent Balkan genealogy imaginable. The family, the Karageorgeovitch dynasty, is pure Serb; unlike all other dynasties, it intermarried with other royalty only with extreme reluctance, and then only with next-door Balkan neighbours. Alexander's father, Peter I, married the daughter of the King of Montenegro; he himself went as far as Bucharest to espouse Marie, daughter of Rumania's Marie.

The Karageorgeovitch family (the name means 'Black George') was descended from a haiduk, bandit chieftain, who freed Serbia from the Turks in 1810. This original Black George was a person of some character. Aside from his patriotic exploits he is said to have murdered both his own father, to keep him from capture by the Turks, and his own brother, and he was himself assassinated. Through the nineteenth century the family wound through Serbian history like a crimson rope. Sometimes it was in power, sometimes out.

In 1903, when modern Yugoslav history began, the rulers of Serbia were King Alexander Obrenovitch, who belonged to a rival dynasty, and his Queen a disreputable commoner named Draga. They were murdered by officers owing allegiance to the Karageorgeovitch group, temporarily in exile. The Karageorgeovitch who then ascended the throne, Peter I, was the late Alexander's father. He ruled till 1914, when Alexander became Regent. Peter was afflicted with the family temperament. A story, never proved and probably without foundation, says that he murdered his wife, Zorka of Montenegro. At any rate he was a violently unstable character. When his mind began to deteriorate, the clique of officers who really ruled Serbia removed him from the throne.

The Regent should have been, not Alexander, but the eldest son, George. But George, the Crown Prince, was unbalanced. He thrashed his servants in violent fits of rage, and following a series of exciting scandals, he was quietly certified as insane and removed to confinement in a fortress at Nisch.¹ There, in 1937, he still was.

Alexander, be it hastily said, inherited none of these Karageorgeovitch qualities. He was neither a murderer nor a madman. He was a King conscientious to the point of stuffiness, and, a complete patriot, he did what he thought was best for the country. A large section of the country, as we shall see below, wanted something different, and Alexander's abrasiveness did not make negotiations easy; but the monarch, even though his egoism may have been distorted by the family history, was incorruptibly sincere. The tragedy was that he drove the country to the verge of chaos, through his method of trying to unite it.

¹ Gedye, Op. cit., quotes an Italian journalist who describes how George practised with a revolver by shooting cigarettes out of the mouth of his unhappy valet.

So much for Peter's family and Peter's father. It is not a wholesome heritage.

Prince Paul, the first Regent, was a cousin of Alexander's, and his nearest competent adult relative. Therefore the King had to choose him, simply to preserve the dynasty, although it is said that they were not close friends. Paul was educated at Oxford, the worst possible training ground for a man of action. His wife, Princess Olga, is the sister of the Duchess of Kent. He loves books, music, pictures, the life of a country gentleman. He would like to die, when he must, in bed, a feat only one Karageorgeovitch ruler has accomplished (and that one, Peter I, was insane). He is, the Serbs say, 'too English', and indeed he is more at ease with foreigners than his own people.

Paul never had much desire to be Regent. The panoply of royalty may induct him into appreciation of its glamour, but certainly he would prefer less glamour if he could get it with less responsibility. It is no joke, being the ruler of a country like Jugoslavia. Paul was unable to sleep during the first few months of his regency except with the aid of sedatives, so the gossips said.

Paul has a pleasant personality, and people are not afraid of him, afraid to tell him the truth, as they were frightened of Alexander. Although at first he was quite approachable, now his appointments are carefully watched. One of the curses of Balkan politics has descended on him – army intrigue. When Paul takes a walk – for exercise – the affair is almost tragi-comedy. One motor-car filled with troops immediately precedes him through the wooded road, another immediately follows him; the route is lined with soldiers and Paul and his consort amble along, suffocated by petrol fumes, unable to admire a bird or tree without a sentry jumping. This is done by the army to keep him tractable.

Even so Paul has given signs of good administration. He fought the old Serbs when they tried to hush up the King's testament. His influence has been on the conciliatory side, and it was he who sensibly persuaded his first prime minister, Bogolub Yevtitch, to release Matchek, the chief of the Croat opposition, from jail. His next prime minister, Milan Stoyadinovitch, gave promise of a good administration. Paul is not ambitious. His regency has seven more years to run. He will be glad when they are over.

The other two regents are Radekno Stankovitch, who was Alexander's personal physician, and Ivan Perovitch, former governor of Croatia. Neither Stankovitch nor Perovitch are orthodox Serbs, and the appointments caused alarm in Belgrade. Apparently the King chose them for reasons which were Balkan-typical. They were personally honest men, a rare distinction and neither colourful nor likely to become big popular heroes. Moreover Stankovitch and Perovitch don't like each other; the King was aware of this and knew that they would quarrel and that, therefore, one of them would always be on Paul's side, thus giving Paul the majority in any decision.

Stankovitch, a good doctor, cured Alexander of a troublesome stomach ailment after half a dozen foreign specialists had failed. Stankovitch simply said: 'Your Majesty, nothing is wrong with you except nerves. There is no organic ailment. Forget it, and you will be well.' The King discovered himself cured through this simple process, and asked Stankovitch what he could do to reward him. Stankovitch replied with Oriental parable. Once, he said, the Sultan of Turkey had greatly benefited from the advice of an obscure courtier; asked what reward he wanted the courtier replied, 'Talk to me conspicuously at your next reception.' The Sultan did so. The court watched in envy and excitement. The courtier's name was soon on everybody's lips. This man, it seemed, was the King's favourite. So the Grand Vizier offered him a job. And then another job. And finally the inconspicuous courtier became Grand Vizier.

The story may be apocryphal, but it is a fact that Stankovitch, completely unknown politically, became minister of education after the King's recovery. Then his rise was rapid. And now he is a regent. He is generally unpopular. People say that he has never forgotten or forgiven any person who slighted him in the long years when he was obscure.

Perovitch, the third regent, has more quality. Louis Adamic writes of him respectfully, and I know no higher tribute for a politician in Jugoslavia. He is not a Croat, as usually reported, but a Dalmatian. His rule as governor of Croatia was better-minded than that of his predecessors, though pressure from Belgrade prevented him from being really moderate. He is, of course, an ardent anti-federalist, believing in the 'essential, natural homogeneity of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes'.

Psychology of Assassination

Another name should be mentioned at this point, the name of Vlada Georgiev, the King's assassin. By what mysterious sequence of casualty did Alexander, the monarch, and Georgiev, the killer, meet at that precise moment on the cobbled streets of Marseilles? Almost everyone saw the remarkable film of the assassination. Its great quality of emotion came from the fact that the audience knew, from the time the King stepped off the boat, that he would be dead in ninety seconds. And the King did not know this.

Georgiev was a Macedonian terrorist. This means in Balkan terminology that he was a 'patriot' and an 'idealist'. He believed in a free Macedonia; the object of his group, in other words, was to wrest the Serb part of Macedonia from the Yugoslav Government, and unite it with the Bulgarian segments of that forlorn, invisible province. A Macedonian movement to this end has existed for forty years. The eventual hope is the erection of an independent or autonomous Macedonia; failing this, which is a political impossibility, to unite Macedonia with Bulgaria.

The Macedonian organisation, the I.M.R.O., was led by a redoubtable chieftain, Ivan Mihailov. He was a sort of Robin Hood murderer, never attacking the virtuous, but only the Serbs. Mihailov and his men perfected a government within a government that had its own army and police, its own courier service, its own taxation and standards of law and justice. The arm of the organisation was long and relentless. A traitor never escaped. Mihailov's wife, for instance, followed an enemy all the way to the Burg Theatre in Vienna and there shot him. Georgiev was Mihailov's chauffeur.

The Macedonians split into factions, and Georgiev first distinguished himself by patriotic slaughter of members of the anti-Mihailov group. He killed two notable figures, the communist Hadzidimov and the moderate Tomalevsky. Then, although the Bulgarian Government of the day protected the Macedonians, he was forced to flee. He devoted himself to two projects. These dominated his able and distorted intelligence. He became a fanatic, and the most dangerous kind of fanatic, one with a cold heart. One of his projects, on which he laboured for years, was to blow up the League of Nations building at Geneva. The other was to kill Alexander. Georgiev never got around to blowing up the League. . . .

The year 1934 produced a veritable carnival of political assassinations: Dollfuss, Roehm, Schleicher, Duca, Alexander, Louis Barthou, the Polish minister of the interior Pieracki, and Serge Kirov, the second man in Soviet Russia. There was a precise common denominator to several of them, which were performed by fanatics with the purpose of overthrowing or weakening the régime in power and opening the way for a government more representative of the common people. Constantinescu, the murderer of Duca; Planetta, the Dollfuss killer; Georgiev, the assassin of Alexander, and the Ukrainian who killed Pieracki were all good democrats, though they called themselves Iron Guardists, Nazis, and the like.

What is the psychological basis of the desire to kill? In Vienna Dr. Wilhelm Stekel, discussing this problem, told me that most political murders are offshoots of a distorted father fixation. Cranks and anarchists, who seek out and kill statesmen to satisfy some mysterious personal grievance, are usually psychic invalids as a result of some unhappy experience in childhood; often—like the anarchist who killed the Empress Elizabeth of Austria-Hungary—they are illegitimate. The assassins are living out some infantile conflict. The assassinations they perform are supreme efforts at self-justification, to make up for the miseries of thwarted youth.

No one commits suicide, says Dr. Stekel in a famous essay, unless he has a tendency to kill some other person. Conversely, no one commits murder unless he has a tendency to suicide also. Most assassins are desperate enough to perform the act of murder because they are disappointed in life; they are candidates for suicide and thus do not mind risking their own lives to kill someone else. In fact, their tendency to murder may arise from a desire to make a spectacular exit from life; they say: 'I shall die, but before doing so I will take another with me.'

Behind most political assassinations, according to this theory, is a history of conspiracy. Secret terrorist groups always deal in the attentat. The psychological basis of conspiracy is dislike of being an average man; the conspirator and potential murderer is contemptuous of the organised majority; he takes fascinated delight in being the member of a repressed minority with a political grievance, real or imaginary. Most men are born with a sense of a great historical mission. All assassins are motivated by a compelling desire to become prominent.¹

Very often the assassin kills a statesman as a father-image. He blames his father for his precarious and ill-nurtured position in life (almost all assassins are poor); the prominent person he slays is, psychically, his father, whom he holds responsible for his fate; the prominent person may be first admired as a father-substitute, then hated, finally killed. Or, Dr. Stekel proceeds, the assassin may love his father-substitute enough to kill him; the bipolar nature of love and hate is obvious. Brutus, for instance, may have killed Caesar because, his spiritual son, he wanted to be closest to Caesar's heart, and saw himself displaced by Mark Antony. He murdered Caesar not because he hated him but out of jealousy.

A psychic injury such as doubt of the facts of paternity or any one of the innumerable trauma that may occur in childhood are permanent in a neurotic personality. They form a suppressed nucleus of eternal discontent with life. In extreme cases, says Dr. Stekel, they may cause murder. 'The murdered king is in reality atoning for something in the hidden life of the assassin.' An attentat is a displacement of a small personal conflict into the life of nations; the assassin is transposing the source of his unhappiness into the horizon of world affairs. Perhaps Booth was beaten by a drunken father. So—perhaps—Lincoln died. Perhaps Princep had an unhappy childhood. So the World War came.

Jugoslavia—Hot on the Griddle

The Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes was, J. Hampden Jackson points out² the product of 'an unnatural union of motives'. President Wilson, applying the doctrine of self-determination, wished to liberate and unite the South Slav peoples, excluding Bulgaria. Clemenceau and his realistic associates wished to set up a buffer state which would serve two purposes: (1) remove a lot of territory from the old Austro-Hungary, and thus weaken the new Austria and the new Hungary, and (2) keep Italy off the Dalmatian coast, which as we know, had been promised her by the secret treaty by which she was bribed to enter the War.

The word Jugoslavia ('Jugo' means 'south') may connote to many Englishmen a vague Balkan something-or-other of no particular beam or bulk. But in fact Yugoslavia is one of the most important and powerful countries in Europe; it stretches from the plains of Hungary almost to the Aegean, and from the gateway to Austria to the bottle-neck of the Adriatic. Its population is 13,500,000, and it covers an area as big as England; the people are mostly peasants or mountain folk, raw-boned, poor, hard-lipped, superb fighters, primitive.

¹ And note Mussolini's remark to Ludwig: 'Every anarchist is a dictator who missed fire.'

² In his admirable The Post-War World, p. 59.

Jugoslavia's chief domestic issue should have been to consolidate itself politically and sell its grain; like Rumania, it lives largely on the land. But almost from the beginning it was torn by domestic quarrels and split by internal fissures. The dominant political note ever since the War has been the angry quarrel between Serbs and Croats. Alexander's dictatorship was made necessary, fundamentally, by the absolute failure of Serb-Croat relations during the ten years 1919-1929 of the parliamentary régime.

The Serbs are Balkan folk centring in Belgrade, Greek Orthodox in religion, semi-Turkish in culture, and militant in spirit. The Croats, centring in Zagreb, lived for centuries in the orbit of Vienna, and represented a more European culture and tradition: they are Roman Catholic. The Serbs fought with us during the War, the Croats (against their will, it is true) with the Central Powers. The Croats number three million three hundred thousand people, almost thirty per cent of the realm. Allied to them have been their cousins to the north, the Slovenes. The Croats use the Latin alphabet, the Serbs the old Cyrillic script.

After the War the country was given a handsome new democratic constitution and the discordant parts of the kingdom were expected to live happily ever after. Of course they didn't. The ruling Serbs, led by Alexander, made some tactical mistakes; for instance so convinced was the King of the intractability of the Croats that for a period of ten years he never set foot in Zagreb, although it was the second capital of his realm; which is as if the King of England refused ever to go to Scotland. The Croats, convinced that they were being treated like second-class citizens, grew more and more intransigent; passion finally exploded in the massacre in the Skupstchina (parliament) when the Croat leader, Raditch, was killed.

The psychological core of the quarrel was probably resentment by the Serbs at their inferiority to Zagreb; therefore they punished Zagreb. The Serbs had a subconscious hatred of 'European' civilisation, which had been personified to them by German and Austrian invaders. And the Croats, though Slav by race and language, were thoroughly Teutonised. They were richer than the Serbs, with most of the industry of the kingdom. No wonder the Serbs, who had stood the whole brunt of the War, and whose country had been terribly devastated, were jealous.

The Croats called the Serbs 'Mexicans' and 'bandits'. The Serbs called the Croats lazy trouble-makers. The Croats said they would prefer even the old monarchy to the tyranny of Alexander's dictatorship in Belgrade. The Serbs scoffingly quoted the old proverb that if there were only three Croats left alive, there would be four Croat political parties. The Croats martyred Raditch, their murdered leader. The Serbs replied that the Croats had done everything for independence for a thousand years—except fight for it. And the Serbs dragooned the Croats into submission.

All of this, for which both sides were at fault, was a pity. What Jugoslavia needed was forty years of peace. It needed time to develop its mines and farms and magnificent natural resources. The country is sketched out; it needs to be built up. Take Belgrade, for instance. The majority of its shops, in the main streets, are still devoted to the sale of the most primitive necessities of life, the simplest kind of manufactured goods, like pins, buttons, cotton cloth. Belgrade is blessed as few cities are with natural beauty, lying high on the confluence of two great rivers, Danube and Save; but it is like a pretty peasant girl with the carriage of a queen and the raiment of a dirty beggar.

When Alexander died the Croats did not make the revolution that many people expected. Reasons: the dissidents were, as the Serbs charged, soft folk, not given to bloodshed or revolution; they had no arms; Croat detachments of the army had been carefully scattered in remote parts of the kingdom; the Serb police, veritable myrmidons, were watchful; above all no help came from Italy. And in homage to Alexander a political truce began. It did not last long.

Revolution in the Balkans—Why Not?

The question is often asked why the miserable Danube and Balkan folk do not rise from their poverty and squalor and make a thorough-going social revolution. There are several reasons, aside from the obvious difficulty of proletarian revolt in a country ruled by police power.

1. The basic passion of most Balkan folk is nationalism. Their primitive and turbulent energies are directed to the preservation of their own political minority or country, rather than social revolution; nationalism is the pipe through which their energies are discharged.

2. Danubia is at least three-fifths agrarian, and the majority of peasants, though poor, own their own land. The industrial proletariat is scanty. A middle class has grown up only in the last two generations, and is still very new and shaky; in Jugoslavia, for instance, as in Hungary, there is scarcely any middle class at all. The extreme primitiveness of Balkan social structures makes revolutionary propaganda difficult.

3. Social democracy, long a considerable force, has produced in most of these countries a considerable paternalism; there is a proverb in Hungary, for instance, that the state takes care of you from birth till you are fifteen, and then from sixty until you die. As long as the people get assistance from the state, in however rudimentary a form, revolt is unlikely.

4. A White Terror of terrible ferocity followed the only two attempts to introduce communism to the Danube, those of Bela Kun in Hungary and Stambolisky in Bulgaria. To justify their mass murders, the Whites kept alive the legend of communist barbarity and secret strength. Having tasted blood, the Whites would not mind tasting more. Therefore any outcropping of communism is mercilessly crushed.

5. Hunger. Prolonged misery and distress, such as have afflicted the people of Danubia, are likely, it seems, to produce not revolt but apathy and inertia, and a torpor of almost pathological quality. People do not make revolutions when hungry – at first – simply because hunger makes them weak.

Black Hand and White

General Peter Zivkovitch was a young man in 1903, a junior lieutenant in the royal guard. Mark that date. 1903 was the year in which, as mentioned above, King Alexander Obrenovitch and his wife Draga were murdered by officers who subsequently put Peter Karageorgeovitch on the throne. The officer whose special job it was to force open the palace gates was ever after nicknamed by his intimates 'Peter the Door'. His name was, and is, Peter Zivkovitch.

Zivkovitch, the son of a blacksmith, was for many years a dominant factor in Jugoslav military life. For a long time he received only normal promotions, but his influence behind the scenes, as a survivor of the original murder gang, was great. In 1921, King

Alexander Karageorgeovitch appointed him commander of the palace guard, a sort of army within an army, eighteen thousand strong, which garrisons Belgrade. It seemed strange to some that a witness to the murder of one king should be charged with the security of another. In 1929, when the King abolished democracy, he appointed Zivkovitch prime minister, which job the general held till 1932. Subsequently he was minister of war.

After the 1903 murder the leading conspirator-officers formed the nucleus of a secret society, the Black Hand, officially called Ujedinjenje ili Smrt, which means Society of Union or Death. Its adventures in patriotic murder and terrorism caused, among other things, the Great War, since Princep, the Sarajevo assassin, was schooled by Black Hand men. In Sarajevo to-day there is, incidentally, a public monument to Princep, who is a national hero to the Serbs, even though he indirectly cost the loss of twenty million lives.

Zivkovitch was a prominent Black Hander for sound political reasons. The Black Hand stood for greater Serbia; it sought to keep Serb chauvinism, no cool thing anyway, at fever heat; it was the military clique behind the throne. The Black Hand society was truly secret. Members knew each other only by number, and no one was sure who was not a member. The leader was a general staff officer of marvellous ruthlessness and fervour, Colonel Dragutin Dimitrijevitich. Had not Dimitrijevitich founded the Black Hand, it is quite possible that the World War would have come—in a different way.

The Black Hand was broken up during the War. This was because some of the members were believed to have turned republican. They did not trust the young Alexander. Zivkovitch, however, gambled on Alexander, and formed, so far as is known, a sort of counter-movement to the Black Hand, called—without startling originality—the White Hand. The White Hand men were those who depended for their careers on the young King.

Dimitrijevitich and the out-and-out Black Handers were eliminated by a conspiracy in which Zivkovitch, possibly with the knowledge of Alexander, played at least the role of winner. In 1917 Serbia seemed doomed. Wanting as good terms as possible, the Serbs destroyed the archives linking the Black Hand with the Sarajevo murder. It remained to put Dimitrijevitich out of the way, and direct witness to the preparations of the assassination of Franz Ferdinand would be silenced. With four fellows Dimitrijevitch was tried at Salonika, charged with an attempt on Alexander's life. The evidence was flimsy, but after a sensational trial the Black Handers were convicted, and Dimitrijevitch was put to death.

This cleared the field for Zivkovitch. The White Hand took over from the Black.

He forgot all about political terrorism and conspiracy, and devoted himself to the interests of Alexander.

Zivkovitch's influence notably waned after the assassination of Alexander. In 1937 he left politics and was pensioned out of the army.

Croat Crusader

The opposition leader most worth noting is Vladimir Matchek. His resemblances to Maniu in Rumania are very strong: an idealist, stubborn, Roman Catholic, a lover of the peasants, incorruptibly honest, narrow, old-fashioned in his belief in the natural goodness of people and that right will prevail in politics, because it is right. He is a lawyer by profession. He did not, like so many leaders in the Balkans, go into politics because politics was the only way for the educated to earn a living. As with most Croats, oppositionism, particularism, is ingrained in his character.

Matchek in Croatia, like Maniu in Transylvania, is revered by his people almost like a messiah. He has suffered imprisonment on trumped-up charges; his best friends have been murdered by police spies; his lieutenants beaten and tortured in a manner unknown in modern Europe till Hitler took power in Germany. He is a messiah; but a messiah without much prospect of power. He is defeated by the central illogicality of his position; he does not want complete separatism for Croatia, and indeed separatism is a political impossibility; therefore, since he won't go the whole way, his opposition is permanent – and sterile.

Foreign Affairs – and Affaires

The position that will be taken by Jugoslavia in the next war is of the greatest possible importance. The army is the sixth largest in Europe, numbering 187,000 men with 1,200,000 trained reserves; it is competently advised by the French general staff and armed by French and Czechoslovak munition companies, particularly the Skoda works at Pilsen; moreover, the fighting quality of the men is superb. The Yugoslav army is probably, man for man, the most formidable in Europe.

The chief enemies of Jugoslavia, the third country in the Little Entente, are Hungary and Italy. If Otto Habsburg should return to Austria or Hungary, Jugoslavia would bear the brunt of the armed action to get him out, because Czechoslovakia, pressed from the north by Germany and Poland, is too vulnerable. As long as Italy is occupied by the war in Abyssinia, Yugoslav hands in Central Europe are fairly free. Jugoslavia took part in sanctions against Mussolini even though Italy is her best customer: which goes to show that bad blood counts more in the Balkans than an export surplus.

For a long time Italy had aggressive intentions towards Jugoslavia. Mussolini coveted Yugoslav territory because the seizure of Dalmatia would make the Adriatic an Italian lake. Italian interests encouraged, and probably subsidised the less respectable elements of Croat, Slovene, and Macedonian opposition to the Belgrade Government. Italy made alliances with Austria and Hungary and sought to make one with Bulgaria, thus encircling Jugoslavia. But lately Mussolini with all his energies occupied in Spain, has let Jugoslavia alone. Italy and France, both fearing Germany, worked amicably together, and this tended to relieve Italo-Yugoslav tension. In March 1935 the new Italian minister to Jugoslavia outdid himself in conciliatory messages from his government. (In contrast, think of 1927, when a Yugoslav minister to Rome had to wait seven months before being received by Mussolini.) Meantime Yugoslav relations with Bulgaria have been improving, because a new Bulgarian Government made a genuine attempt to suppress the Macedonian movement, the chief source of Bulgar-Yugoslav friction.

Jugoslavia, though a French ally, has considerable pro-German feelings. Reasons: (1) Germany is the best potential customer for Yugoslav – like Rumanian – grain; (2) Good armies tend, in times of peace, to admire each other, and Zivkovitch deeply respects the Reichswehr; (3) French loans, for many years the prop of Yugoslav finance, don't flow as freely as heretofore; (4) German aims in Austria are antipathetical to a Habsburg restoration, which is Jugoslavia's chief foreign bugaboo; (5) above all, German acquisition of Austria would be a terrible blow to Italy. It would put the mighty Reichswehr instead of the weak Austrian battalions on the Brenner Pass and this would solve Jugoslavia's most pressing military problem. 'Make friends with the enemy of your enemy,' is a cardinal principle of Balkan politics. Despite the recent nibblings towards cordiality, Jugoslavia's 'permanent' enemy is Italy.

The Germans, realising this, have courted Jugoslavia hotly. Early in 1934 I met an amiable servant of the Wilhelmstrasse in a Belgrade wagon-lit, who made no bones about the fact that his job was passing out money to German language newspapers in the Balkans. General Goering swooped into Jugoslavia for several visits, and pleased the boy King with a tremendous toy railway train as a birthday gift. Dr. Stoyadinovitch, the Jugoslav premier, was invited to one of the Goering-Goemboes-Polish hunting parties, but French advisers prevailed upon him not to go.

Jugoslavia is more or less in the position of a hitherto faithful husband, and a powerful young fellow too, happily married to La Belle France – who now looks northward to the big blonde German maiden, wondering if divorce and remarriage might not be a good idea if his wife persists in flirting with that dark, unscrupulous, Italian adventurer in international amour. Unfortunately, you can't be married to two women at the same time.

CHAPTER XXX

BALKAN KINGS

'Must every little language have a country all its own?'

— JEROME FRANK.

Zog of Albania

THIS picturesque sub-monarch, ruler of the smallest country in Europe, is forty-one and has been King of Albania since September 1928.

'Zog' is the indefinite, Zogu the definite form of his name, which in Albanian, a chaotically difficult language of Illyrian origin, means BIRD. Zog is often called 'The Bird' or 'The Big Bird'. He is a Moslem by religion, and he was born of distinguished parents, his father having been hereditary chieftain of the powerful Mati tribe, in upper Albania. He was educated in Constantinople and speaks Turkish and a little dilapidated German as well as Albanian. In Zog's homeland, remote and barbarous, law is informally administered by what is known as the blood feud. If you kill a man, his relatives kill you, and so on for a couple of generations. There are supposed to be about six hundred blood feuds out against King Zog.

He was destined to a political life. His uncle was Essad Pasha, who created Albanian independence. Zog returned to Albania after his Turkish education in 1912 and took part in the guerilla fighting of the Balkan wars. Many pleasant legends grew up about him: they tell you in Albania how at first he was so inexperienced that he could not properly tie the straps of his opanji, native shoes; that once he killed seven horses riding to his men; that he took over command of the district by blunt force of character and courage; that he led a sortie into Montenegro and cut his way in and out of two whole armies; and so on. There are always such stories about Balkan princelings. Not impossibly these are true.

Zog fell in love with a girl named Miriana Zougdidi, according to one of these legends. Her father refused permission for the match. Zog swore that he would become King of Albania to prove his worth. The father, still obdurate, chased a gang of Zog's kidnapers who abducted the girl, and killed her with his own dagger to keep her from falling into Zog's hands. He then sent the girl's body to Zog as a sort of wedding present. Zog swore eternal vengeance, and never to marry. He exterminated the father and his whole family – and never married. Also, be it noted, he did become King of Albania.

The bloodshed among Albanian politicians in this period, immediately after the War, was immense. Essad Pasha, Zog's uncle, was assassinated in Paris by a compatriot, Aveni Roustemi. This Roustemi was himself later assassinated in Tirana, Albania's village capital. Tzena Bey, Zog's brother-in-law, was killed in Prague by a student, Alcibiades Bedi. Bedi was shot and killed in the court-room where he stood trial by colleagues who thought he might inform on them. There have been two attempts on Zog's life, but he escaped each time.

The way to play politics in Albania is to make a revolution. Zog has made several. He was minister of interior in an Albanian government that was forced out of office and into exile by a Putsch engineered by a radical priest, Monsignor Fan Noli. Zog lived in Belgrade, Jugoslavia, for a year, and then made another revolution whereby he ousted Fan Noli and became president of Albania. This was in 1925. Three years years later Zog promoted himself, with Italian help, to be King.

Zog had done very well out of kingship financially. His acknowledged civil list for the year 1934–35 was the following:

Compensation to H.M. the King	300,000	gold	francs
Rent allowance	20,000	„	„
Compensation to H.M. the Queen Mother	88,000	„	„
Salary to Master of Ceremonies	4,752	„	„
Salaries, royal household	14,900	„	„
Travelling expenses	2,000	„	„
Office supplies, etc.	2,500	„	„
Salaries of the Inspectorate	22,282	„	„
Travelling expenses and supplies	9,000	„	„

463,434 gold francs.

which is 2.63 per cent of the total revenue of his realm.

This civil list represents only a part of the King's gross income, because revenue from this investment abroad is considerable. His capital, according to conservative informants in Albania, is roughly 20,000,000 gold francs. Most of it is on deposit in banks in France and Switzerland. The King built up this tidy fortune largely, it is believed, through gifts from Italy.

The cardinal fact of the Albanian situation is this: Zog started out as Jugoslavia's man, and then sold out to Mussolini.

Both Jugoslavia and Italy are interested in Albania, because it lies at the bottleneck of the Adriatic. When Zog was a refugee in Belgrade the Jugoslavs decided to support him, because they disliked Fan Noli. From Jugoslavia Zog not only got moral and political assistance, but actually troops. Imagine, then the horror and anger of Belgrade when, having put Zog back into power, it saw him immediately turn his country over to the Italians. Zog's excuse is that he had to have money to build up the country and strengthen his position, and that Jugoslavia could give him none. So he became an Italian puppet.

Very promptly the Italians implemented their advantage. First came a series of loans whereby an Italian company, the Society for the Economic Development of Albania, received exclusive rights to build roads, dredge harbours, and undertake other public works. An oil concession was given Italy. Italian officers reorganised the Albanian army. In November 1926 Mussolini and Zog signed the first Treaty of Tirana, which virtually made Albania an Italian protectorate. A year later – just in time to stave off a revengeful Jugoslav Putsch this treaty was strengthened by an outright military alliance.

Italy has poured millions of lire into Albania. The country became, in fact, a sort of bottomless marsh swallowing Italian gold. The pace of this financial debauch had to be retarded when the world economic crisis hit Italy, but even in 1931 Italy agreed to lend Albania 10,000,000 gold francs (£400,000 gold) per year for ten years, free of interest 'in order to make the financial position of Albania sound and to facilitate development of its national economy'. In 1934 there came still another loan, in 1935 another.

Lately, however, developments in Albania have tended to discourage Italian enterprise. The Italians have threatened to cut off the stream of gold. This is because Zog, a flirtatious fellow, has begun to be friendly again with Jugoslavia. Italians – the doctors, soldiers, engineers, topographers, road builders – became increasingly unpopular in Albania. Zog quarrelled with his Italian advisers. Meantime, Mussolini had become interested in bigger game – Abyssinia.

The present situation is that relations between Albania and Italy are severely strained. Italy keeps on paying just enough to keep Albania in line, not a penny more. It cannot refuse to pay anything, or Zog will jump into Yugoslavia's waiting arms. And it cannot foreclose the mortgage, viz., demand repayment of the 'loans', because Italian occupation of Albania, the only weapon of foreclosure, might cause war with Yugoslavia. Meanwhile, Italy's dominating position rests on Zog. If Zog goes, Italy goes. Therefore, even coming to detest him, Italy must keep him in.

Zog is not at all an unpleasant character, despite his tendency to flirt. If he betrayed Yugoslavia and eventually betrays Italy, he may suffer for it, but his motives were good, viz., thoroughly consistent with Balkan nationalist ideals. By playing Italy and Yugoslavia against one another, he was ensuring the one thing that mattered to him – his country's independence. A patriot, he stands for free Albania. Alexander the Great, the Albanians say, was the first Albanian. Their nationalism does not whisper because their country is small.

Boris of Bulgaria

Boris III of Bulgaria, gentle and retiring, now forty-two, is a doubter, not a man of action. Groping, honest, theoretical rather than realistic, he likes to believe the best of people. His personal charm is considerable. He is extremely obliging. The little story is told in Sofia that he was found in the palace gardens one morning, engaged in netting butterflies – because he was receiving an entomologist for lunch that day.

He and his queen, the Italian princess Giovanna of Savoy, lead a quiet life. During the first years of their marriage, October 1930, they went out not at all, because Boris wanted his bride to feel at home in Bulgaria and learn a little Bulgarian before exposing herself to the rigours of Sofia society. Even now they seldom entertain or go to diplomatic functions, first because the frugality of Bulgarian character tends to discourage such displays, second because the King – incredible as this may seem – feels that he might not be able to repay the hospitality in kind. He is not so indigent that he cannot afford a few dozen cases of champagne, but the country is so threadbare-poor that he thinks any ostentatious display of luxury to be bad taste.

Boris knows an astounding number of his subjects by name and face, literally thousands, from peasant farmers in the valley of roses near Plovdiv to civil servants in government ministries. He is fond of mechanics, and his only hobby is locomotive driving. Once he jumped into the sea off Varna and rescued a villager from drowning. Frequently he himself pushes the perambulator containing his baby daughter through the modest palace gardens. After his marriage, the story goes, he would meet old friends on the streets and introduce the Queen by saying simply, 'Meet my wife.'

Boris is the worst-dressed king in Europe. He insists on wearing Sofia-made clothes. And Sofia is not exactly Savile Row. He drinks little alcohol. He knows five European languages, and in bed each morning he reads newspapers in them all: French, German, Bulgarian, Italian, English. His study is lined with photographs of his multitudinous cousins, uncles, aunts, and other relatives scattered through the reigning houses of Europe. All his instincts, his associations, are with the past.

Boris gets about £12,000 per year. This is not much for a king, but the Bulgarian Government pays most of his expenses. He has little of Zog's interest in money and nothing of the financial capacity of the late Alexander of Yugoslavia. Queen Giovanna received a dowry of 25,000,000 lire from her father, the King of Italy, on the occasion of her marriage, and the income from it should make her about as rich as Boris. In addition she gets an allowance of 950,000 leva, about £2,200, a year from the Bulgarian state. Boris should become very rich when his father, ex-King Ferdinand, 'the Old Fox', dies.

King Carol of Rumania got the fright of his life when he and Boris met at the Danube town of Roustchuk in 1934. Boris greeted him, persuaded him to descend from his car, and walked with him arm in arm down the streets. Carol would never have dreamed of so exposing himself in any Rumanian town. He was alarmed at first by his unwonted proximity to the common herd, then impressed at the friendly way the crowd greeted Boris. Exactly the same thing happened when the late King Alexander of Yugoslavia visited the Bulgarian monarch. Boris drove him to Plovdiv to see the roses; they went alone, without even informing the Mayor of Plovdiv that they were coming. There were plenty of Macedonians in the crowd, and Alexander didn't like it at all, but Boris insisted on walking with him through the streets. The fact that he was in Boris's company kept him safe.

.

In Bulgaria when villagers go on a journey they often carry their shoes in their hands to save wear and tear on the leather. Thus one knows that Bulgaria is a frugal country. Among the six million inhabitants of Bulgaria, fewer than six thousand have been divorced; thus one knows its folk are morally conventional. The Bulgars, poor, clean, intensely honest, are the best people in the Balkans.

Look at some Bulgarian salaries. A cabinet minister gets £40 per month, a tremendous sum for the country. The Rector of Sofia University gets £17, and an ordinary professor £16. Judges range from £6 to £10 a month; generals get £15, policemen £2 15s.; archbishops £20, high school teachers £7, a locomotive driver £3. And there is no baksheesh – bribery – in Bulgaria.

To Bulgaria, during the worst of the economic crisis in the early thirties, went the distressing honour of owning the most tragically extreme statistics in Europe. For instance, the weight of Bulgarian exports in 1930, increased by eighty per cent over the previous year – but their value decreased by three per cent. In 1931, again, the volume of exports went up by forty per cent – and the value fell again – by four per cent.

The depression, by emphasising economic discontent, aggravated political unrest. Boris is a pleasant man, but he is in a dangerous predicament. His timidity, his lack of decision, got him in a pretty mess, and for one extensive period during 1934, he did not dare to leave his palace. The people may have liked him – but certain powerful officers in the army didn't. Three men who are real forces in the political life of Bulgaria, Professor Tzankov, Colonel Kimon Gheorgiev, and Colonel Damien Veltchev, are his enemies.

Tzankov is the reactionary who crushed the peasant government of Stambolisky in 1923. He was prime minister then till 1926. During the first part of his rule a White Terror, for which he was partly responsible, ruled the land. Tzankov has built up a powerful Fascist movement, and is bidding for power again.

Gheorgiev is the blunt, one-eyed colonel of reserve who performed the coup d'état of May 19, 1934, when the King was forced to abolish parliament and consent to the establishment of a dictatorial régime. The Gheorgiev government performed a useful service, however, in bettering Bulgaria's relations with Jugoslavia. This it did by outlawing one faction of the Macedonian movement and expelling Ivan Mihailov, the chief of the Macedonians, from the country.

Gheorgiev was forced from office on January 22, 1935, when officers of the Military League, royalist in sympathy, accused him of republicanism and a plot to dethrone the King. The government that succeeded Gheorgiev was the King's government, made by his authority; this was dangerous, because Boris could be accused of taking an active partisan role in politics.

The third man of importance is an overt republican, Colonel Damien Veltchev. He was the man behind Gheorgiev, who did little but take his orders. Veltchev was for many years the commandant of the cadet school in Sofia, and thus most of the younger officers of the army are 'his' men. He is a typical Balkan adventurer: able, unscrupulous, a fanatic nationalist. Veltchev, whose insurrectionary activity goes back a long way, organised the 1923 Putsch which murdered Stambolisky and put Tzankov into power.

Both Gheorgiev and Veltchev were arrested late in 1935. Veltchev was sentenced to death, but in March 1936 the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment.

Bulgaria, a loser in the War—the unfortunate little country always picks the wrong side in wars—was mercilessly chopped asunder, like Hungary, by the peace treaties. Rumania got the Dobrudja; Turkey got Thrace; Greece got part of Thrace and part of Macedonia; Jugoslavia got the rest of Macedonia.

The Bulgarians, decent folk, and too small and too far away to create much international noise, have not been as umbrageous as the Hungarians in demanding their territory back. But the country is officially one of the 'revisionist' powers, and, as such, has tended to associate itself with Italy and Germany.

Early in 1934 the countries surrounding Bulgaria decided to check this tendency, and so formed the Balkan Entente. The participants were Rumania, Jugoslavia, Greece, Turkey; and the diplomat who did most of the negotiating was the Rumanian foreign minister, Titulescu. Just as Hungary is encircled by the Little Entente, Bulgaria is encircled by the Balkan Entente.

It is hard luck for small and sinned-against Bulgaria; the only way out seems to be individual rapprochement with Jugoslavia.

Can a king be a dictator? Alexander of Jugoslavia is the only one who tried it: and look what happened. Indeed, with Boris in mind, it seems a safe generalisation that royalty and dictatorship do not lie well together. There are many reasons. This is an age of bourgeois or proletarian adventurers, Hitlers and Mussolinis, the age of the strong man with a fist. Kings have not enough freedom of education to be good dictators. They are inveterately international, and thus cut across the deep exclusive nationality of men like Pilsudski or Kamal Ataturk. They have no real contact with the common man. And modern science, modern economics, have destroyed the will of the masses to believe in kings as kings.

Greece and Metaxas

In November 1935 George, King of the Hellenes, regained the throne of Greece. This amiable and complex young man, long an exile in Brown's Hotel, Dover Street, London, had reigned for a brief period in 1922, in succession to his father Constantine. Greek politics for twenty years has been an angry quarrel between royalists and republicans. Venizelos, the great republican leader, an old and tired man, was forced to flee the country when his final attempt at a rising was crushed in March 1935, and shortly afterwards he died in Paris. Subsequently a royalist general, Kondylis,¹ long a bad actor in Greek politics, prepared the way for a monarchial coup d'état.

George, a cautious fellow, who well remembers the chequered history of his family on the throne – his father for instance had to flee the country twice – was not passionately eager to return. Very different from his ex-brother-in-law Carol (George and his Rumanian wife Elizabeth have been divorced), he did not itch to regain the crown, for the simple reason that he doesn't want subsequently to be pushed out again. George told his adherents that he would not return until an honest – well, fairly honest – plebiscite demanded him.

In August 1936 Greece became a military dictatorship, with George's consent, under a royalist general with a long record of mischief-making, General Metaxas. In January a general election had been held, according to the King's pledges; it resulted in a virtual draw between the monarchists and republicans, with a communist bloc of fifteen deputies holding the balance of power. Thereafter parliamentary government became even more difficult than it had ordinarily been. On the pretext that the communists were planning a general strike, General Metaxas suddenly declared martial law and set out to rule the country by decree.

Metaxas was born on Ithica, the island of Ulysses, in 1871. He is thus the oldest of the dictators. He was educated in Berlin – note well – and from 1890 was an army officer. During the Balkan wars he was director of operations on the general staff. At about this time his loyalty to the Constantine dynasty began to assert itself; from 1917 he became an inveterate enemy of the Venizelists. Once he was condemned to death; several times he was exiled; he always came back. People called him the ‘Little Moltke’. In 1934 he started a party of his own, Fascist-monarchists, which was severely defeated in the polls. Then came the unsuccessful Venizelist Putsch of 1935 which he helped to put down.

¹ Who has also since died. So has George's first prime minister, Tsaldaris, the man who brought him back.

He is quite frank about his aims. ‘Parliamentary democracy is ended in Greece for ever,’ he said in September 1936.

His régime is seemingly an overt despotism, and King George has acted like a puppet in his hands.

Greece lies outside the grande ligne of European politics, despite the Balkan Entente. Roughly speaking, the royalists are pro-ally and pro-status quo; the republicans like Venizelos, are revisionist and pro-Italian. Venizelos, for instance, bitterly opposed the Balkan Entente. Because George might be supposed to be anti-Mussolini, the British foreign office looked with cautious favour on his return, provided it could be managed without a civil war. George is, of course, a cousin of Princess Marina, the wife of the Duke of Kent, and is thus associated with the House of Windsor. Britain would find Greek naval bases convenient in the event of war with Italy. For some time there was talk that the Duke of Kent, instead of George, might become Greek king.

George’s restoration was popular among the other royalties of the region. There is a fourth internationale in the world, as my friend M. W. Fodor has pointed out. Kings like more kings.

THE TURKISH COLOSSUS

THE blond, blue-eyed combination of patriot and psychopath who is dictator of Turkey has changed his name seven times. First he was simply MUSTAFA, so called by his parents in Salonika. At school he was given the name MUSTAFA KEMAL to distinguish him from other little Mustafas, and because a teacher admired his skill in mathematics; 'Kemal' in Turkish means 'perfection'. After the Dardanelles campaign, he became MUSTAFA KEMAL PASHA, 'pasha' being a military title equivalent to general. After he crushed the Greeks in 1921 he assumed the name GHAZI MUSTAFA KEMAL PASHA; 'ghazi' means 'destroyer of infidels', an odd sobriquet for Kemal, inasmuch as he was the greatest infidel in Turkish history. Ten years later he became GHAZI MUSTAFA KEMAL when he abolished military titles. In 1934 he ordered every Turk to assume a patronymic in the western fashion and chose for himself 'Ataturk', which means 'Father of Turks'. So he was simply KEMAL ATATURK.

Finally he modified this to the Turkish form of the Arabic, to become KAMAL ATATURK.

His own is by no means the only name he changed. When I went to Constantinople recently after an absence of several years I was astounded at the metamorphosis in names placarded on the streets. Kamal westernised the Turkish alphabet—quite completely. Modern Turkish is strictly a phonetic tongue. These were some of the compulsory renderings of names which greeted me:

Kahve	instead of	Coffee
Tabldot	„	Table d'Hote
Amerikan Ekspres Ko, Ink.	„	American Express Co. Inc.
Jorj	„	George
Moris Sovaliye	„	Maurice Chevalier
La Jones	„	La Jeunesse (a shop)
Dizl Enjn	„	Diesel Engine
Star Su Sop	„	Star Shoe Shop
Vagonli-Kook	„	Wagon-Lit-Cook
Enstitu do Boté	„	Institute de Beauté

Or Duvr	instead of	Hors-d'Œuvres
Foks Film Korporeysen	,,	Fox Film Corporation
Waytaus	,,	White House (a shop)
Lozan Palas Otel	,,	Lausanne Palace Hotel

Kamal Ataturk, who strides the Turkish landscape like a colossus – significantly a bronze statue of him in a dinner-jacket (with the trousers cuffed) commands the Golden Horn – is in a position of a man with no more worlds to conquer. His reforms have been so drastic and so comprehensive that in cultural and social fields at least there is very little left to do. He has abolished the fez, turned the mosques into granaries, Latinised the language. He has ended polygamy, installed new legal codes, and experimented with a (paying) casino in the sultan's palace. He compulsorily disinfected all the buildings in Istanbul, adopted the Gregorian calendar and metric system, and took the first census in Turkish history. He cut political holidays down to three, demanded physical examination of those about to marry, and built a new capital, Ankara, in the Anatolian highlands, replacing proud Constantinople. He limited most business activity to Turkish nationals and Turkish firms, abolished books of magic, and gave every Turk a new last name. He emancipated the women (more or less), tossed the priests into the discard, and superintended the writing of a new history of the world proving that Turkey is the source of all civilisation.

Kamal Ataturk, a somewhat Bacchic character, the full record of whose personal life makes you blink, is the dictator-type carried to its ultimate extreme, the embodiment of totalitarian rule by character. This man, in personality and accomplishments, resembles no one so much as Peter the Great, who also westernised his country as frightful cost. Kamal Ataturk is the roughneck of dictators. Beside him, Hitler is a milksop, Mussolini a perfumed dandy, and Goemboes a creature of the drawing-room. At one of his own receptions Kamal, slightly exhilarated, publicly slapped the Egyptian minister, when he observed the hapless diplomat wearing the forbidden fez.

No man has ever betrayed more masters, and always from motives of his own view of patriotism. In 1918, a staff officer, he was chosen to accompany Vahydu'd-Din, the Crown Prince, to Berlin, and there assist him in consultations with Hindenburg, Ludendorff and the German high command. Three years later Kamal booted him, as Sultan Mehmed VI, out of Turkey.

After the armistice Kamal was sent by the authorities as inspector-general of the eastern vilayets to investigate a nationalist insurrection in Kurdistan. He was ordered to find and quell these rebels. He found them all right. But instead of crushing the movement he took charge of it. Within two years he brought victory in all of Turkey to the very organisation his superiors had sent him to suppress.

In 1926, following a not very professional attempt on his life, he handed what amounted to the entire leadership of the opposition. Among those he allowed to be sentenced to death and executed were Colonel Arif, who had been his comrade-at-arms in the Greek campaign, and Djavid Bey, the best financial mind in Turkey. Kamal had a champagne party in his lonely farm-house at Chankaya, near Ankara, to celebrate the occasion, and invited all the diplomats. Returning home at dawn, they saw the corpses hanging in the town square.

(In 1930 Kamal decided that totalitarian rule to the extremity which he carried it was a bore, and, uniquely among dictators, he proceeded to create an opposition, naming various men to be its leaders. Somewhat timidly, they accepted. Kamal wanted to see if western democratic methods would work; he wanted an opposition bench to argue with in parliament. The system didn't work. The Turks, with the memory of 1926 in mind, didn't quite seem to understand. . . .)

His psychological history is of surpassing interest. Two things have dominated the secret springs of his life, his mother and illness. For his mother he had a typical love-hate obsession. During the early years he was continually fetching her to live with him, then flinging off alone again. Finally he brought her to the Chankaya farm-house and she died there. She was the only woman he was ever faithful to. It is possible that his merciless campaign against the Greeks was subconsciously motivated by his mother's experiences in a refugee camp in Salonika during the Balkan wars. Kamal rushed across the Aegean (he had been fighting in Tripoli against the Italians) to see her, and found her a prisoner of the Greeks in indescribable circumstances of suffering.

In 1917 Kamal took time off from the War to visit Carlsbad for a cure. A famous Viennese professor, Dr. Zuckerkandl, looked him over and told him that if he did not stop drinking he would die in a year. The illness was troublesome. Kamal returned to the Front (he had just been the most important Turkish officer in beating back the British at the Dardanelles) for service in Syria and to his well-known habits. His health remained, and has remained, about the same. The dear old Viennese professor, however, died two years after prophesying Kamal's collapse and demise.

EDWARD VIII AND KAMAL ATATURK

A favourite theory is that Kamal's extraordinary bursts of reformist energy are due to chronic pain. The familiar and excruciating twinges return, and lo! the dictator abolishes the Turkish alphabet or decrees the formation of a dozen new investigating commissions; if true, this is an interesting example of what the psychiatrists call 'displacement'. Kamal punishes someone else for his own early sins, purifies a nation as a surrogate for purification of his own painful blood.

Kamal was born in 1881, the son (like Hitler) of a minor customs official. The father, Ali Rasa, was nothing more than a petty and narrow bureaucrat, but the mother, named Zubeida, was, like the mothers of Pilsudski, Mussolini, and Masaryk, a woman far above the normal of her station. She wanted her son to get an education and become a priest—exactly like Stalin's mother who sent the future dictator of all the Russians to theological school in Tiflis. It is clear to the point of triteness that most of the great men of the world had remarkable mothers, and that the development of their sons' Oedipus complex was of paramount importance in their characters and careers. Kamal's mother, not an unimportant point, married again after her first husband's death, and young Mustafa bitterly hated his stepfather, an interloper in the home.

Ali Rasa, Kamal's father, was apparently of Albanian origin. Zubeida, the mother, was the daughter of a Turkish peasant whose wife was Macedonian. Kamal is thus far from being purely Turkish. As great an authority as Toynbee (Great Contemporaries, p. 291) suggests that Jewish blood may have been in the family. Salonika has, of course, been a citadel of Jews since the Diaspora; many, called 'Dönme', were converts to Islam. But Kamal's irrefragable blondness and his cold blue eyes would seem to preclude more than a hint of Jewish—or for that matter Turkish—ancestry.

Kamal's early life was that of a rebel and above all of a hater. He wrote revolutionary pamphlets and even poems. He was sentenced to jail in Constantinople but his skill as an officer made him valuable, and he was released. Although a 'Young Turk', his position was that of a suppressed oppositionist; he detested the Young Turk triumvirs, Talaat, Enver, and Djemal, a feeling which they reciprocated. But his reputation as a soldier was invincible, after service on the most remote, dangerous and hopeless fronts, and the way to his career was open.

That career is without parallel in modern times. Kamal engineered the congresses of Erzerum and Sivas and organised the nationalist movement, leading it to victory. Other people have created nations. Kamal's job was harder. He took a nation that was centuries deep in rot, pulled it to its feet, wiped its face, re-clothed it, transformed it, made it work. In 1919 Turkey was so crushed and broken that it would have welcomed renunciation of sovereignty and a British mandate. In 1922 Turkey was the one enemy state so strong that it practically dictated its own peace terms.

In those three years Kamal (1) drove out the Sultan, (2) abolished the caliphate, (3) fought and won the war against the Greeks and drove them into the sea, (4) bluffed Great Britain to a standstill at Chanak, (5) negotiated, through Ismet Pasha, the Treaty of Lausanne, which ended the régime of capitulations (foreign judicial rights) in Turkey and established the new frontiers on a basis that the wildest Turkish nationalist could not have dreamed possible, (6) wrote a republican constitution and created a parliament in his new impregnable capital, (7) became Turkey's first—and only—president.

Kamal, alone, it may be said, does not deserve credit for all this. The general programme of westernisation was planned by the Young Turks and he simply appropriated it. The Greeks were destroyed by the defection of the allies, also by their own incapacity, not by Kamal's armies. Sultan and caliph were doomed in any case, and it is no tribute to Kamal that he ejected them. The Treaty of Lausanne was won not by Ismet Pasha but because of jealous squabbles between the western powers. And so on.

Kamal lives nowadays in Chankaya, a complete recluse. His model farm is his avocation; a true megalomaniac, he designed the water reservoir in the shape of the Sea of Marmora! He married a woman named Latifé Hanum in 1923, but divorced her a few years later; now he lives alone. He is the most inaccessible public character in Europe. King George V himself would not have been more difficult to interview. Unlike all other dictators, he keeps from the foreground; the Turkish papers do not mention his name half a dozen times a month. He has a group of soldier underlings and cronies with whom he plays poker. Rarely, he gambles at cards with foreign diplomats; he usually wins, then insists on returning his winnings. He still likes to drink.

The Turkish dictator differs from almost all others in that he had no socialist period in youth and even in maturity betrays not the faintest interest in socio-economic stresses. His only policy was Turkey for the Turks. He is certainly a revolutionary, but as far as economics is concerned he might be President of Switzerland. The theory that all nationalist dictators must bear to extreme Right or extreme Left breaks down on Kamal Ataturk, as it did on Pilsudski.

The two foreign powers that Kamal is most interested in are (except for Great Britain, which he hates), the U.S.S.R. and Italy. In the bleak year 1932 he set a new peak in picturesque achievement by procuring loans from both these countries, which are states not given to the export of credit in the best of years. Kamal plays them, of course, against each other. Italy wants Turkish support in the eastern Mediterranean, and Turkey is bound always to be an important factor in Soviet foreign policy because the Dardanelles comprise Russia's only outlet to warm seas. Kamal disliked the Abyssinian adventure. Therefore his policy took on a stronger Russian tinge. For some years the Soviet Union and Turkey were close allies at Geneva, and Dr. Twefik Aras, the Turk foreign minister (who, incidentally, was Kamal's personal physician in Salonika many years ago), was generally recognised to be Litvinov's hand inside a Turkish glove. Meantime, Kamal has begun to fortify the Dardanelles. In June 1936, a conference of the European powers at Montreux gave him what he didn't particularly need — permission.

POLAND WITHOUT PILSUDSKI

THE theory that nationalism is the most powerful of politico-economic forces and that nationalism is best represented politically by the power of personality is well expressed by the case of Poland. Poland, the great unpredictable in Europe to-day, was created by two factors, nationalism and Pilsudski. The dictator, Pilsudski, died in 1935, but the fabric of Polish Government to-day is based on his living character and idiosyncrasies.

On August 6, 1914, Josef Pilsudski, a Polish patriot and revolutionary, went to war against Russia with an army of – three hundred men. This was the celebrated Kadrówka (literally 'cadre'), and with it Pilsudski crossed the frontier and invaded the giant body of Russia. The three hundred men grew into a brigade and the brigade into three brigades. Eventually the Kadrówka became the Polish Legion, fourteen thousand strong, a revolutionary army for the deliverance of Poland from the enemies who had partitioned it. But until well into the middle of the War, most people – even Poles – thought that Pilsudski was a quixotic lunatic.

In 1916 the Germans captured Warsaw. They offered to permit the Polish Legion to continue operations against the Russians as an auxiliary force, but Pilsudski held out unqualifiedly for Polish independence, and he was incarcerated in prison at Magdeburg. But first he had time to transform the Legion into a secret underground organisation, the P.O.W. (Polska Organizacja Wojskowa), to carry on its work. In 1918 the Central Powers were defeated; Pilsudski returned in triumph to Warsaw to become head of the Polish state; and the Legions and the P.O.W. were its first armed force.

Now the points to be made are that the Legions were absolutely the single-handed creation of Pilsudski and that in 1937, nineteen years later, Poland was still the instrument of his creation. The Legionnaires, now as then, rule Poland. A clique of the marshal's officers, fanatically devoted to him in life, reverent of his memory now that the gruff old walrus is dead, dominate comprehensively almost every aspect of Polish life.

Let us list the names that count. They are difficult names, but each man is important.

General Thaddeus Kasprzycki is the minister of war. What was he in the old days? Field chief of Pilsudski's first three hundred men.

General Jan Soznkowski, commander of an army division, will probably be the next President of Poland. What was he to Pilsudski? Chief of staff of the Legion.

General Eduard Rydz-Smigly, immediately on Pilsudski's death, succeeded him as inspector-general of the army. He had been commander of the first brigade of the Legionnaires.

Colonel Valerian Slawek, the prime minister when Pilsudski died, and still one of the three or four most important men in Poland, was an intelligence officer in the first three hundred.

Colonel Blazej Prystor, several times prime minister, one of the famous little circle of 'colonels', was special adjutant for political affairs in the Legion.

Colonel Joseph Beck, who seems on the way to be Poland's permanent foreign minister, was Pilsudski's chief adjutant in the latter period of the Legion and P.O.W.

Marjan Zyndram-Koscialkowski, minister of social welfare, was an aide-de-camp of Pilsudski's, and chief intelligence officer during the attack on Vilna.

Among others, Colonel Adam Koc, leader of the new Polish government party, the 'Camp of National Unity', was chief assistant to Pilsudski in organising the P.O.W. Boguslav Miedzinski, now the editor of the semi-official newspaper, Gazetta Polska, was an intelligence officer both in the Legion and P.O.W. Henri Floyar-Rajchmann, also an intelligence man in the Legion, is minister of commerce and industry. General Roman Gorecki, president of the Polish state bank, was commander of the second brigade of the Kadrówka. Waclaw Jedrejewicz, chief of intelligence for Lithuania in the P.O.W., is now minister of education and religion. Finally, the only important opposition leader in Poland, General Sikorski, who resisted the 1926 Pilsudski Putsch, was a Legionnaire.

These men are the essence of the ruling power in Poland today. Pilsudski was Alpha and Omega to them. Only those officers who were in the original three hundred or who entered Kadrówka ranks immediately thereafter, who were trained by Pilsudski himself in this strange Polish equivalent of Eton and Oxford, count in Poland. Thus Pilsudski's colossal power. Like a father, he brought Poland up. And his children run it.

Grandpa

Pilsudski was usually called, in fact, not father – he was getting too old toward the end – but Dziadek, grandfather. He called all his men 'Du' or 'toi'; respectful, they did not respond with such intimacy, but addressed him as Komendant, chief. That the old dictator was a turncoat, a ruffian, a lover of scatological language, a brigand, a befuddled and idiosyncratic martinet (in his old days) was undeniable; undeniably also he was honest, capable of arousing great affection, and an implacable patriot for Poland.

The career of the Dziadek was one of the most extraordinary of modern times. He was what the biologists might call a 'sport' among post-War revolutionary dictators. He was not, for instance, a man of the people like Mussolini or Dollfuss or Kamal Ataturk; he was born (in 1867 on an estate near Vilna) of an aristocratic Lithuanian family. But passion for Poland drove him to revolutionary activity. Hatred of Czarist Russia, on nationalist grounds, dominated his life.

His mother a tremendous Polish patriot and Russia-hater, allowed him to desert the family tradition and become a Marxist, because at that time the only effective revolutionary organisation was socialist. As a student of medicine (Pilsudski just failed to get an M.D. degree at the University of Kharkov) he began insurrectionary activity. He was arrested in 1887 and sentenced to exile in the Siberian lead mines for participation in the plot to kill Czar Alexander III for which Lenin's older brother was hanged. One of Pilsudski's brothers was likewise executed. Motivation for a revolutionary!

In 1893 he returned from Siberia and became editor of the socialist newspaper Robotnik (Workman). He flitted from place to place publishing it; the police did not find him and his secret peripatetic printing-press for seven years. In 1900 he went to jail again in the terrible 'Pavilion No. 10' of the Warsaw citadel, a dungeon reserved for the worst political offenders. He escaped – by feigning insanity! Fooled, the prison doctors sent him to an asylum in St. Petersburg. With the connivance of a Polish medical man he got away and returned to Poland.

He spent some years as a patriotic bandit, and in one coup in 1908 he robbed a mail train and got away with two million roubles.

Almost at the same time another socialist revolutionary, Josef Stalin, performed almost an identical feat in Tiflis, Georgia. (When, years later, Polish-Soviet relations were straightened out, Stalin sent Pilsudski his Czarist police dossier as a memento of their comradeship.) When the War came Pilsudski dropped socialism, because he felt that the best way to resurrect Poland would be to work first with the Austrian armies against the Russians, then with a Polish army against the field. So he created the Legions; witless, the Austrians permitted their organisation.¹

Pilsudski had by the time of the War become a potent and baffling romantic legend. One story about him, widely believed, was that he disguised himself as a Russian cavalry officer, rode up to the Warsaw jail, and ordered the release of all the Polish political prisoners! On the pretext that he had orders to lead them to a new jail he secured the freedom of the lot.

He left his first wife in 1912. His second wife was a socialist comrade. She went to work in a factory at Grochow, just outside Warsaw, when Pilsudski was imprisoned by the Germans. When he returned to Poland in 1918 his first act as head of the state was to fetch the President's carriage, and, with a tremendous retinue behind silver horses, drive to Grochow, find her, and return with her to the palace. By her he had two children. Wanda, now nineteen, and Jadwiga, sixteen, of whom he was passionately fond.

Pilsudski was the author of the coup d'état by which Poland seized Vilna from Lithuania. Questioned by the allied ministers in Warsaw, he staunchly denied his responsibility. Several days later (this was in 1920) he resigned office as head of state. He called the ministers together. 'Gentlemen,' he said, 'the other day I lied to you. I was a public character and I had to lie. Now I am a private individual and I can tell you the truth. I did engineer the Vilna coup. Gentlemen, good morning.'

Blunt, gruff, he loved mystification. As he grew older his facial resemblance to Friedrich Nietzsche was very close; there were plenty who said that he was unbalanced, who hinted that when he feigned lunacy to escape the Russians the feat was not purely histrionics. He continually perplexed his subordinates by trapping them with misleading statements; he sent Beck and Prystor to the verge of nervous breakdowns by never communicating to them the policies he held them responsible for executing.

¹ Pilsudski in later years told a former comrade, 'My friend, you and I caught the socialist train together. I got off at "Polish Independence" station. I wish you good luck on your journey to . . . Utopia.' (Spectator, May 17, 1935.)

After the War the old marshal retired from politics; he returned to power in 1926 to 'restore order' (incidentally killing six hundred men on the streets of Warsaw); thereafter he governed from the back seat, as minister of war. He was contemptuous of the deputies; the grizzled vigour of his language to them became famous. Few speeches by Pilsudski could be printed verbatim in a western newspaper. He died thinking of his birth-land, Lithuania, and whispering messages to his daughters. His last gesture was characteristic, he ordered his brain to be given to the University of Warsaw for research; his heart to be preserved in the crypt in Vilna which held his mother's ashes; and his body to be sent to a third place, Cracow, where lie the tombs of Poland's ancient kings.

*The 'Colonels'*¹

General Eduard Rydz-Smigly, newly created a 'Marshal of Poland', the country's dominant figure, was not a professional soldier, but a Legionnaire. It was he, however, who captured Kiev in the wild Polish assault on the U.S.S.R. in 1921. Rydz-Smigly studied to be a portrait painter in his youth. The army is believed to be devoted to him. Therefore Pilsudski arranged that he should become its chief, so that he could bring it loyally to support whatever new civil régime took power. He was born in 1886. Cultivated, quiet, he is the student type of officer. In June 1936, he was formally named 'First Citizen' of Poland. He is virtually the country's dictator. As boss of the army he has the decisive word.

Of all the Legionnaires, the man Pilsudski loved best was General Soznkowski, the comrade who shared his imprisonment at Magdeburg. This officer, ten years later, performed a feat of deeply quixotic and Polish devotion; he was a general in command of the division at Posnan when he heard that Pilsudski, his old chief, was marching on Warsaw. Soznkowski joined neither Pilsudski nor the forces of the government.

Instead – he shot himself. In shame that Poland was undergoing civil war, which might split the army, he fired a bullet in his breast, committed hara kiri – and recovered! By some miracle, the hole next to his heart was stitched up. Pilsudski rewarded this dramatic expression of divided loyalty by intimating that Soznkowski should be the next President of Poland. When it was known on the inside that Pilsudski was dying, a new constitution greatly strengthening the power of the executive was rushed to completion.

¹ Most of the 'colonels', incidentally, are not colonels. Either they are beyond that and have become generals (like the minister of war Gen. Kasprzycki, who began adult life as a mathematics teacher in Paris), or (like Kasprzycki again) they were soldiers by accident, men who followed Pilsudski into the Legion from various occupations.

Colonel Slawek, a companion of Pilsudski's from the earliest revolutionary days, was a socialist conspirator; making bombs for Pilsudski in 1903, he lost one side of his face in an explosion. His origins are mysterious; no one but Pilsudski, so the story went, knew where he was born, or his real name. The report is that he is really a Count Czetwertynski, a scion of one of the greatest Polish noble families, who hid these connections without trace when he joined the marshal thirty-five years ago. Slawek is to-day a pet of the Polish aristocrats, the Radziwills and Potockis, who look to him as their own; and it was Slawek who was the bridge between Pilsudski and the aristocracy in the early days of the reborn state.

Colonel Joseph Beck, born in 1894, less amiable a character than his colleagues, was a special favourite of Pilsudski in the latter days; the old man had great affection for him. Complicated, ingrown, with a snarl like Tardieu's, moody, elegant, Beck came from the low nobility in the Austrian part of Poland, and began his career as a student of economics in Vienna. He joined the Legion; after the War Pilsudski gave him regular officer's training in the new military academy he set up in Warsaw. For a time he was Polish military attaché in Paris.

The President of Poland is Ignacy Moscicki, known as 'Ignace the Obedient'. He is, of all things, a distinguished electro-physicist, called to politics from a professorship at the University of Lwow. He was also head of the Chemical Research Institute in Warsaw. He has something like five hundred inventions in the field of electro-physics and chemistry to his credit, and holds fifty-three patents. Like the pianist Paderewski, he was valuable to Poland's politics largely because his life was utterly unpolitical.

The former prime minister, Koscialkowski, although a Legionnaire, was disliked by the Slawek-Prystor-Beck group, because of his reputation as a Left-winger and liberal. He was out of national politics till 1934, when the minister of the interior, Pieracki, was murdered. The colonels asked Pilsudski who was to be the successor; the old marshal replied, 'Why do I always have to decide everything? Can't you young fellows rule this country yet?'

The colonels retired and presented a list of candidates to Pilsudski, who glanced at it and tossed it in the waste-basket; he picked up the telephone, got through to Koscialkowski, and said, 'You are the new minister of the interior,' then rang off. Pilsudski liked him because he too was a Pole of Lithuanian origin. Koscialkowski, as minister of the interior, attempted to liberalise the treatment of minorities; the old marshal approved of this, because he knew his death would make necessary some broadening of the basis of government.¹

Rzeczpospolita Polska

The nationalism of Poland, like that of Hungary, is flamboyant and tenacious. This is partly because the country, as everyone knows, suffered the unique and terrible experience of partition. Yet when Poland disappeared from the map there were only eight million Poles; when Woodrow Wilson put it on the map again there were twenty million. Despite the supreme ordeal of concrete geographical dissolution, the country lived—and grew. Poland's resurrection has given it a sort of crucifix complex. This was the source of many of its troubles. It rose from the dead and thus there was something holy about its survival. It began a career of proselytising. It suffered from the delusion that it was not merely a succession state, but a great power.

Polish nationalism is nicely illustrated by the elephant story, which, if legend is correct, was invented in an objective moment by Paderewski.

Five men of different nationalities each write a book about an elephant. The Englishman goes to India, organises a hunt, and composes a thick illustrated travelogue, 'How I Shot my First Elephant'. The Frenchman casually visits the Zoo and promptly produces a yellow-back 'L'Éléphant et Ses Amours'. The German plunges into research and emerges some years later with a five-volume work, 'Introduction to a Monograph to the Study of the Elephant'. The Russian gets drunk on vodka, retires to his garret, and issues a slim philosophical treatise, 'The Elephant—Does it Exist?' The Pole sits down in the national library and turns out a fiery pamphlet, 'The Elephant and the Polish Question'.

¹ In 1937, however, serious anti-Jewish excesses were reported from various parts of Poland.

Poland may not be a great power, but it is a country the physical bulk of which can hardly be ignored. Its population is thirty-two million, which increases at the tremendous rate of five hundred thousand per year; in area it is the fifth state in Europe, Russia excluded. Its first tremendous job was to amalgamate the Russian, German and Austrian divisions of the country into a homogeneous and viable whole. Since then the chief internal problems have been two: settlement of the minorities issue, because the hungry Poles took more than their share of territory; of the thirty-two million people, between eight and ten million are not Poles at all, but Ukrainians, Germans, White Russians, Galicians, Ruthenes, Lithuanians. Second, to persuade God to raise agricultural prices.

As is the case with most Central European and Balkan countries, between thirty-five and forty per cent of the budget goes to armament. A peasant country, not rich in industrial resources, it bears the burden of one of the most formidable military machines in the world. The standing army numbers three hundred and fifty thousand, the trained reserves one million six hundred and forty-five thousand; pressed, Poland could mobilise three million men. And the Poles will tell you that this is necessary because the country, without distinct natural geographic borders, lies exposed between two greater powers, Germany and the U.S.S.R.

The foreign policy of Poland since the War has been that of the nut in the nutcracker. At first the orientation, as we know, was the alliance with France and the Little Entente. Beck changed this, though the treaty with France is still operative; aware of the growing strength of Germany, and Germany's desire to recover the Polish Corridor, he took advantage of Hitler's offer for a ten-year peace pact; Germany temporarily gave up claims on the Corridor in return for Polish friendship. Germany and Poland united in what was potentially an anti-Soviet bloc; nevertheless Beck went to Moscow as well as Berlin, and a Polish-Soviet non-aggression treaty is in force. The Russians, wanting permanent peace, would like to transform this into an Eastern Locarno freezing the frontiers on the present basis; Poland refused. It is on the fence – with legs in both directions.

Eyes North

To the north of Poland are the four Baltic States, each with individual problems, but united by the same overwhelming geographical consideration: former provinces of Russia, they are now buffer states between Germany, Poland and the Soviet Union. For a long time they represented a descending order of anti-Russianism and pro-Germanism from north to south. Finland hated the Russians most; Lithuania, at the bottom, disliked them least. Lithuanian policy is grounded on fear of Germany and Poland.

Finland resembles a good deal the states we shall discuss in the next chapter – the neutrals, like the Scandinavian countries, with their sensible social ideals, advanced democratic methods, and comparatively high standard of living. Finland, a sturdy country, lives on timber and pays its debts; alone among European countries it did not default on its war debt to America. It was part of Sweden from A.D. 1154 to Napoleonic times, when the Russians grabbed it; its affiliations to Sweden are close but it has tenaciously held to its own language and national tradition. The Finns do not consider themselves 'Scandinavian', and a local political issue has always been rivalry between 'authentic' Finns and those of Swedish blood.

The new Finnish prime minister, Kyosti Kallio, the country's first peasant-born premier, is an agrarian and he rules with social democrat support. He succeeded the seventy-five-year-old Pehr Evind Svinhufvud, who was something of a reactionary. Kallio's government, staunchly democratic, has seemingly reversed the former position of Finnish hostility to the U.S.S.R. His foreign minister, Dr. Rudolf Hoisti, promptly made a visit to Moscow, where he was cordially received, and the Soviet chief of staff, Marshal Yegoroff, returned the visit.

By contrast the next state to the south, Estonia, is almost frankly Fascist, and pro-German influences are strong. Estonia is a republic about the size of New Hampshire and Vermont together; its strategic position to the mouth of the gulf of Finland is important, and the harbour of Tallin, the capital, would make a pretty naval base. Estonia is ruled by its acting president and premier, Konstantin Päts, who is virtual dictator. The country was under martial law for a considerable period, all political parties were suppressed, and, although a plebiscite in 1936 favoured a return to representative government, a new corporative constitution is in process of creation.

The next country, Latvia, whose inhabitants are among the toughest folk in Europe, is ruled by an overt dictatorship. In 1934 Premier Dr. Karlis Ulmanis dismissed the diet, dissolved the political parties, and reorganised the cabinet; later he assumed office as president as well as prime minister. The constitution, like that of Estonia, is being 'amended'. Latvia has always sought to be the leader of the Baltic States; Finland aside it is the largest of them and the most militant. German (and Nazi) influence is very strong in Latvia, and the U.S.S.R. is severely unpopular.

BECK, MOSCICKI AND LAVAL

Lithuania, the fourth state, has the liveliest history of them all. It is still, technically, in a state of war with Poland; the border has been closed since 1920. A former prime minister, Valdemaras (whose name brings echoes to those who remember the middle twenties), attempted a coup d'état in 1934. Lithuania fears the Germans almost as much as the Poles; in 1934 126 Nazi agitators were arrested and had a sensational trial. Lithuania leans frankly to the Soviet Union for support; in 1937 Hitler's paper, the Völkische Beobachter, violently attacked the country as an outpost of Moscow. The president is Antanas Smetona, and his rule is at least quasi-democratic; his wife is a picturesque and powerful force in the affairs of the little state.

Two Danger Spots

Two specific danger spots in the northern area are Danzig and Memel. Both are predominantly German cities separated from the Reich by the Treaty of Versailles; both have grown up under the tutelage of the League of Nations; Germany wants both back. Danzig is technically a free city, however, whereas Memel is on Lithuanian territory.

The Polish Corridor, a wedge of land which outraged the Germans by giving Poland an outlet to the sea at the cost of separating East Prussia from the rest of Germany, was not long ago the most perilous territorial issue in Europe. The Polish-German pact shelved it, and by so doing reduced much of the dangerousness of Danzig, which is the Corridor's natural port. The Nazi party in Danzig is, however, a powerful latent source of mischief.¹ Poland, though it believes a Nazi coup to regain Danzig unlikely to succeed, has played safe by building a rival port in the Corridor, Gdynia, at tremendous expense — £20,000,000. The investment in Gdynia is such that, no matter what happens to Danzig, Poland will never give up the Corridor except by defeat in war.

Memel was detached from Germany presumably to give ¹ And was recently in the news when, Herr Greiser, its leader, cocked a notable snook at the League of Nations, during the July 1936 assembly.

Lithuania an outlet to the sea; it was to be the Lithuanian equivalent of Danzig. While the allies were still deliberating how exactly to draw the frontiers, Poland under Pilsudski unconscionably seized the Lithuanian territory of Vilna; tit for tat, Lithuania then grabbed Memel. The German Nazis have violently agitated for the return of Memel to Germany; in retaliation, the Lithuanians have treated the German minority none too gently. Meantime Polish-Lithuanian relations have been broken off since the rape of Vilna; the frontier, after fifteen years, is still closed. The Lithuanians, tough folk themselves, hope that the U.S.S.R. will help them if trouble comes. But in fact Lithuania is fairly safe from aggression as long as Poland and Germany remain friends. As we saw in Chapter Seven, Hitler cannot attack the Lithuanians without losing his entente with Poland. Should, however, Germany and Poland come to an arrangement to divide Lithuania between them, then fireworks would begin. This is the kind of villainous nationalist snarl for which there seems no reasonable territorial solution.

THE NOTABLE NEUTRALS

ABOUT Sweden there is a fine and honourable thing to say; it has had no war since 1814. This is a unique record, which no country in the world can match. Likewise Sweden is notable in that it has no foreign alliances of any kind; the Swedes live alone and like it. Yet their policy of strict neutrality, of comfortable self-assurance, does not isolate them from the rest of Europe; with a great history and healthy nationalism, they are intensely European in the best sense of that term; from the beginning they have been sturdy advocates of the League of Nations and international co-operation.

The Swedes have no empire to worry about, no big army to maintain, no foreign entanglements to un wrinkle or smooth over; partly for this reason – also of course because of something inherently solid in their character – they have made their own country, like Denmark, peaceable and prosperous. Sweden and Denmark to-day are the two healthiest countries in Europe. It is vastly refreshing to pause in this swing around tortured Europe and inspect the Scandinavian states, islands of tranquillity, rational behaviour, and decent government.

Sweden, together with Denmark, may be said to represent the highest type of state paternalism yet seen in the world. When a Swede – or a Dane – is born he becomes state property in a sense then and there. In every town and village there is a child welfare board. Children go to schools and universities maintained by the state; they grow up to join an exceedingly elaborate social insurance scheme; their old age is taken care of by the most advanced old age and disablement insurance in Europe. The Swede travels on railways operated by the state; he uses state telephones; the mines which produce the bulk of his exports are state controlled; even the alcohol he drinks is managed by an ingenious system of regulation.

There are the co-operatives too; they deserve a chapter to themselves. 'Approximately one third of all retail trade and more than ten per cent of wholesale trade and manufacture for domestic consumption are carried on by co-operatives without profit,' writes Marquis Childs in Sweden: The Middle Way. The co-operatives have opened the way to cheap housing (there are no slums in Sweden – or Denmark – any more than there are any aged poor) and a comprehensive raising of living standards. Denmark and Sweden have the highest standards of living in Europe. Yet the essential privileges of capitalism are not abrogated. People may possess private property, they may trade at a profit, they may own production. Sweden, as Mr. Childs says, is the country where capitalism is controlled, but the individual is free.

The three Scandinavian countries are brothers, but, as is often the case with brothers, they are rather dissimilar in character. Denmark, a country of islands, swept always by a fresh swift breeze, is developed to the last square inch. Of the tiny farms more than ninety per cent are cultivated by their owners. The Danes are, speaking broadly, more 'continental' than Swedes and Norwegians; they are closer to Europe and the pressure of Germany. Sweden is a much more spacious country – if you turn it around at the southernmost tip it would nearly reach Africa – less intensively developed, bursting with water-power, living on export of ore and manufactured goods as well as agriculture, and, in its northern emptiness, reminiscent of Russia perhaps and even Asia. The Swedes, by and large, are more formal than the Danes, more rugged perhaps, with less cosmopolitan a capital – but one equally beautiful – and perhaps a shade more conscious nationalism. The Norwegians, again speaking broadly, are more like the Danes than the Swedes. Their independence is so comparatively recent that they take their nationalism quite seriously and sometimes fear that their neighbours don't take it seriously enough; they changed the name of their capital from Kristiania to Oslo and revived the indigenous Norwegian language, although for generations Dano-Norwegian was almost a common tongue. 'The Norwegians,' one of my Scandinavian friends once put it, 'are, like their landscape, rather vertical.' Their country is less rich than Sweden or Denmark, the people are mostly of peasant stock, their chief exports are timber, paper, pulp.

The resemblances are closer. The three countries have tightly inter-related royal families; indeed the Danish and Norwegian kings are brothers. Internal politics have followed the same general courses in all three countries, and all three have social democratic governments. Postal rates are the same, the currency until recently was interchangeable, and the languages are very similar. The three are friends, and work together very closely; the prime ministers meet regularly. All three represent the same ideals socially – child welfare, social reform, a high standard of living, curtailment of the privileges of capitalism, education and cultural development, evolutionary progress. There is no illiteracy in Scandinavia. Infant mortality rates are the lowest in the world. None of the three, in international affairs, has ambition beyond its frontiers; there is no instinct for aggression and no delusions of national grandeur.

Peace among the three, interestingly enough, is a comparatively recent development. Denmark and Sweden fought each other more than once before the nineteenth century. Both had designs on Norway. Norway got loose from Denmark, rushed into the arms of Sweden, got tired of Sweden, and set up a kingdom for itself – with a Danish prince as king. The only recent international issue occurred in 1931 when Norway made claims on the east coast of Greenland, Denmark's property. Instead of fighting they turned to the Hague court; Norway lost, and like a gentleman has never mentioned the matter since.

The royal families in each country are deliberate and successful democrats. For the last two or three generations they have been born in captivity, and any inkling toward despotism long since left the blood. They are pleasant human beings, considerably popular, and much less expensive politically than presidents. Nowadays they work in close harmony with socialist prime ministers.

The three kings make a handsome picture. All are spare and lean, more than six feet tall; Christian of Denmark is the tallest king in the world, and the tallest man (reputedly) in his kingdom – six foot six. All have reigned a long time, Haakon of Norway since 1905, Gustav of Sweden since 1907, Christian of Denmark (Haakon's brother) since 1912. Gustav, at seventy-nine, is still an active tennis player; he enters the Riviera tournaments disguised as 'Mr. G.'. Possibly the ablest of the three is Christian; his silver jubilee, celebrated this year, was an impressive testimonial. Christian rides alone, through the streets of Copenhagen, every morning at seven a.m., he stops at traffic-lights and the passers-by salute him without ostentation. He likes to sail among the Danish islands, dropping in without warning at the villages; he knows an extraordinary number of his subjects by name and face.

The families have intermarried regularly. The Danish Crown

Prince, Frederick (the Danes have alternated Christians with Fredericks for 400 years), married Ingrid, the daughter of the crown prince of Sweden; the crown prince of Norway, Olaf, married another Swedish princess. They had a son, amid rejoicing, in 1936 – the first royal prince to be born in Norway since 1370. The oldest of the three families is the Danish. The Swedish dynasty began in Napoleonic times with Marshal Bernadotte, and the Norwegians have less history than the others, having started from scratch in 1905.

All three families have distinguished themselves outside the royal province. For instance the Danish crown prince is an accomplished musician and orchestra conductor. The King's uncle, Prince Waldemar, has four sons: one is in the French Foreign Legion, one in business. Prince Eugene, brother of the King of Sweden, is a painter of distinction; Prince William, second son of King Gustav, is a widely travelled lecturer and poet; the Swedish crown prince is a professional archaeologist.

The dominant issue in Scandinavian foreign affairs is Nazi Germany. When I was in Denmark and Sweden some years ago I wandered through their foreign offices for days, looking for an issue. I would find it promptly enough to-day. The Germans have designs on Scandinavia, particularly Denmark, for obvious reasons. The Scandinavians are first-class Aryans. Denmark might be a larder in case of war; Sweden might provide precious raw material for arms. The Germans would like diplomatic support at least from their northern cousins. Sweden has a tradition of pro-Germanism, and there are prominent Danes, like the foreign minister Dr. Munch, who have seemed to favour the German side.

More than anywhere except Austria the Nazis turned the full weight of their propaganda machine to Scandinavia. Emissaries flooded Denmark and Sweden; the indigenous Germans were organised into Nazi or quasi-Nazi groups; parties closely analogous to the Nazis entered Swedish, Danish, and Norwegian politics. For a time¹ there were three Nazi factions in Sweden, four in Norway, in Denmark two. A local group of the German Nazi party exists in most important Scandinavian towns.

The fervour of German attempts at penetration defeated its own ends; it might fairly be said that Nazi agitation served to decrease rather than increase normal pro-German sentiment. As Germany became more powerful, more restless, in international affairs, the Danes and the Swedes became more alarmed. The Anglo-German naval pact seemed to give the German navy domination in the Baltic. German naval vessels were continually experiencing 'engine trouble' in obscure Norwegian fiords (where Swedish ore might be shipped to German ports); German leaders developed the habit of cruising in Scandinavian waters outside the tourist season. The Germans made no secret of their fortification of the island of Sylt, off the Danish coast.

¹ See The Nazis in Scandinavia, by Joachim Joesten, Foreign Affairs, July 1937.

The results were (a) an increased socialist and labour vote in all three Scandinavian countries and (b) Scandinavian rearmament. The three countries, reluctantly, regretfully, after so many years outside the sphere of continental politics and competitive armament, were forced to mend their military programmes. Denmark, which only a few years before had contemplated abolishing its army altogether, introduced a defence bill of 20,000,000 kroner; Norway upped its military budget from about nine to more than thirteen million dollars; Sweden raised its defence appropriation twenty-two per cent.

Per Albin Hansson, born near Malmo in 1885, is the Swedish prime minister. His father was a mason; he was once an errand boy in a country store. At twelve he worked in a grocery at four shillings per week, with hours from six a.m. to nine p.m.; via a co-operative he entered the trade union movement and labour politics; at nineteen he was editor of a socialist newspaper. He has always liked journalism. In his first cabinet there were five journalists besides himself.

Hansson, the story goes, tried to evade military service by drinking a lot of black coffee, smoking a dozen cigars, and racing to the medical examination. He was accepted just the same – and became the strictest corporal in the regiment. He was an early prohibitionist, and thundered against alcohol with a quotation from Aristotle: 'Those who go to bed drunk beget only daughters.'

Mr. Hansson, universally known in Sweden as Per Albin, succeeded to the leadership of the social democratic party on the death of the grand old man of Swedish socialism, Hjalmar Branting. (Incidentally Branting and King Gustav were classmates at the University of Upsala and close friends.) Hansson formed his first cabinet in 1932, the first labour prime minister in Swedish history, when the liberals then in power were discredited by repercussions of the Kreuger crash; he took office again in 1936. The agrarians are represented in his coalition.

The leader of the agrarian party is Axel Pehrsson, Bramstorp. (There are so many Pehrssons in Sweden that often they add their village to their names.) He is a wealthy farmer, born near Hansson's birth-place in the fat lands of Skaane, fifty-five now, powerful, ambitious. He likes to tackle any variety of job. The story goes that a friend of Pehrsson's, looking through the local paper, said, 'A position as midwife is vacant; it's strange Pehrsson hasn't yet applied.'

Denmark, the oldest kingdom in the world, is a slender little country – though it lives on butter, bacon, and eggs. It is small, less than twice the size of Vermont – but its sinuous coastline is as long as that of European Russia. The unmelancholy Danes number only 3,550,000 people – but they provide thirty per cent of the world's export butter, more than sixty per cent of its bacon. Their co-operatives are even more advanced than those of Sweden; the co-ops handle ninety per cent of Danish milk and they send to England alone no fewer than 56,000,000 neatly stamped and dated eggs per year.

The Dominant Dane, one of the most remarkable of present-day European figures, is Thorvald Stauning, the prime minister.

Stauning is a modern Viking – in a workman's cap. He is six foot three; he weighs 250 pounds; he has a luxuriant red beard, now turning grey. His features are Rodinesque, his voice is like a foghorn, he has, even notably among Danes, who like life, an inordinate capacity to enjoy existence. Yet this decisive and dramatic character, exuding vigour and masculinity, was weakly and poor as a boy; he started work in a tobacco factory when still a child; his struggles were crushingly long and difficult.

Stauning is sixty-four. He was born in Copenhagen, the son of a cartwright. He worked as a cigar-roller (like Samuel Gompers) and led his trade-union. He entered journalism on a social democrat newspaper and in 1906 was elected to the Rigsdag. His rise was quick. Very early he showed the chief reasons for his success – vigour plus great common sense and practical faith in his ideals. As long ago as 1916 he was a cabinet minister, the first labour cabinet minister in Scandinavia; in 1924 he became prime minister. He resigned in 1927 when he was defeated on a proposal to introduce a capital levy (to augment the social services); he returned to power in 1929 and has been in power, the leader of a labour coalition, ever since.

In 1930 he proposed what amounted to the abolition of Denmark's armed forces. A step so sensible (at the time) and sensational shocked Europe. Stauning said that Denmark was bound to be defeated if it were invaded by a great power; therefore it was nonsense to resist and that the business of policy should be to avert war, not prepare for it. He suggested the reduction of the army to a nominal police force of 13,000 men, severe restriction of the navy, and diminution of the defence budget from 56,000,000 kronen a year to 18,000,000. The bill was defeated. Presently the Nazis came to power in Germany, and it is doubtful if Stauning to-day would reintroduce his bill.

In 1934 he presented a bill to abolish the Landsting or Upper Chamber of Parliament, because it was impeding socialist reforms. Yet, like most of the Scandinavian socialists, Stauning is a moderate, with a strictly pragmatic view of progress.

Stauning vigorously opposed a suggestion by the Swedish foreign minister Dr. Sandler for a Scandinavian defensive entente. 'Denmark will not be Scandinavia's watchdog,' he announced. Denmark, as he well knows, the nearest state to Germany, is the one most in danger of aggression; he fears that Denmark might have to pull Swedish or Norwegian chestnuts from the fire if all were united in a common policy.

Literate, literary, Stauning has written plays. One, The Lies of Life, was a great success in Copenhagen.

The Norwegian prime minister is Johan Nygaardsvold. He was the son of a poor farmer, and worked in a sawmill from his twelfth year. For six years, emigrating to the U.S.A., he did pick and shovel work on the western railways. He returned to Norway, got a trade-union job, and entered politics. He has been in the Storting (parliament) since 1915 and has led the labour party since 1932. A socialist to the bone. When he gets into difficulties he says, 'It's because I couldn't shut up.'

Nygaardsvold, with the help of the farmer's party, became Norway's first labour prime minister in 1935.

Paul van Zeeland and the State of Belgium

Belgium, the most densely populated state in Europe, has been an independent kingdom since 1830, when it broke away from the Netherlands. The country is a compact triangular bridge between France and Holland, and its people partake of the nature of both neighbours. Powerfully industrial, the factories of Belgium ship manufactured goods all over the world. The chief problem of internal politics – seldom reaching an acute stage however – has been the fight of the Flemish provinces, where Flemish (instead of French) is spoken, for what might be called linguistic autonomy. The constitution, under which Belgium is ‘a constitutional and representative’ monarchy, has one unique provision – that the king, if he has no male heirs, may with the consent of parliament nominate his successor.

The most prominent Belgian politician at the present time, since Emile Vandervelde, the socialist leader, became inactive, is a brilliant new star in the constellation of European statesmen, Paul van Zeeland. This young man – he is only forty-four – has rare quality.

One thing making him attractive to Americans is his close connection with Princeton University. He did post-graduate work at Princeton after the War, and in 1937 returned to accept an honorary degree. He told Mr. Birchall of the New York Times recently that he always thinks of himself as a Princeton man, that his brother followed him there, that his nephew is a Princeton student now, and that assuredly his son will go to Princeton too.

Once in 1934 – to quote the American magazine Time – Van Zeeland and a Yale graduate worked together at a banking conference; the friend scribbled him a note to the effect that Yale footballers had just beaten Princeton 7-0. Van Zeeland sent a note back. ‘Belgian cabinet: Princeton 2; Yale 0.’ For one of his cabinet ministers, Vicomte de Warnaffe, is also a Princetonian.

Van Zeeland was born in Soignies, the seventh of eight children, in 1893. The family were Dutch burghers – but profound Roman Catholics – who emigrated to French-speaking Belgium generations ago. Van Zeeland is a strict Catholic. He went to the University of Louvain, and was taken prisoner when the War came. He spent the next years in prison camps in Germany and then, after the War, joined a mission of the Belgian Relief Commission in the United States.

A wide traveller, an earnest student, he has visited the United States several times, the U.S.S.R. once, the Near East once. His thesis at Princeton dealt with the federal reserve system; he wrote a book on Soviet Russia; in 1933 he delivered a series of lectures at Johns Hopkins for the Walter Hines Page school of international relations.

Van Zeeland, one of the most valuable of European politicians, was drafted into politics almost despite himself. From 1922 to 1935 he was quite busy at two other careers: in the Belgian National Bank, of which he became vice-governor in 1926 at the early age of thirty-three; and at the University of Louvain, where he was professor of economic science from 1928. He entered the cabinet inconspicuously as minister without portfolio, to watch economic matters; in 1935 he became prime minister and as his first major job devalued the Belgian currency. A month in 1936 excepted, he has been prime minister ever since. His general policy follows with some similarity the New Deal of Franklin Roosevelt.

Two notable events have distinguished the history of Belgium – and of Paul van Zeeland – during the past year. One was the rise and fall of a Fascist party, the ‘Rexists’ led by a young sub-Hitler, Leon Degrelle. He was a good-looking young man, stuffed with personality as well as Fascist doctrine; he got votes, so they said, by ‘Rex-Appeal’. The movement was a serious menace to Belgian democracy until Van Zeeland, who had never run for office, accepted Degrelle’s challenge to run against him in a bye-election. Van Zeeland won crushingly.

The other event, of great international importance, was the announcement made directly by King Leopold III in October 1936, that Belgium would give up the French alliance and revert to its pre-War status of neutrality. This caused some months of worry and uneasiness for French and British statesmen. The Belgian case was simple: the Belgians didn’t want to be the cockpit of the next war, yet both the Locarno Treaty and the temporary post-Locarno agreement between Britain, France, and Belgium provided that Belgium go to the defence of France if France were attacked by Germany. In April 1937 a joint Anglo-French declaration released Belgium from its Locarno obligations and at the same time renewed French and British guaranty of Belgian independence.

In other words Belgium is no longer obliged to help its big friends, but the big friends continue their pledge to help her.

Dutch and Swiss

Dr. Hendrikus Colijn is the most important of modern statesmen of the Netherlands. He has been prime minister off and on since 1925. Dr. Colijn, like his friend Van Zeeland, only entered politics after successful years in several other professions. He was born of Calvinist stock in 1869, destined by his parents to become a farmer. But he wanted to be a soldier; he enlisted in the Dutch army as a private, and went for service to the Dutch East Indies, where he spent almost twenty years.

In 1909 he returned to the Netherlands and went into business. For some years he was a director of Royal Dutch Shell and other oil companies. Concurrently politics gained his attention, and Colonel Colijn, the soldier-administrator (for a time he had been deputy governor of Sumatra) became Dr. Colijn, the leader of the 'Anti-revolutionary' party. He edited a newspaper, reflecting his strong Calvinist views, served as war minister, minister of finance, and minister of colonies, and finally reached the premiership.

Colijn's chief characteristic – omitting such personal details as that he smokes twenty-five cigars a day – is a middle-of-the-road shrewdness. He is the 'no-nonsense' type of hard-headed Dutchman, and his shrewdness was such as to command the intense respect of his sovereign, the massive Wilhelmina, one of the shrewdest persons alive herself. Colijn always headed a minority party, and led coalitions chiefly through the favour of the Queen. His colonial experience gave him perspective and a world view of politics.

By all odds the chief political preoccupation of the Netherlands, from both domestic and external points of view, is fear of Germany. Holland has an obstreperous Nazi party, led by A. A. Mussert; Dr. Colijn squashed him in the 1937 elections. Dutch conceptions of national defence had to be radically revised when Hitler came to power. For one thing, the traditional Dutch method of defence – opening the dykes – is useless in this day of aeroplanes. For another, both France and Belgium have their lines of concrete fortifications; Holland has none, and therefore in the event of war Germany might be gravely tempted to attack through the exposed Dutch (or Swiss) flanks. Holland raised her defence budget by £7,200,000 in 1937.

Dr. Colijn is one of the fathers of the so-called 'Oslo group' of powers, the states named in this chapter plus Finland, Luxembourg, and Iceland. They are parties to a convention pledging members not to raise tariff barriers without mutual consent.

On January 7, 1937, the heiress to the Dutch throne, Princess Juliana of Orange-Nassau, married young Prince Bernhard of the house of Lippe-Biesterfeld. The occasion was marked by some exceptional bad manners and diplomacy by the Nazis. The Prince wanted the song of his native principality played at the wedding, instead of the Horst Wessel Lied; the Germans were so angry that they confiscated the passports of three German princesses, relatives of the groom, who were asked to be bridesmaids at the ceremony. The Dutch, worthy folk, snapped back.

Switzerland, the oldest republic in the world, trilingual, irrefragably neutral, tough and independent, is governed by a federal council of seven men. One of them each year becomes president of the confederation; the others are the equivalent of cabinet ministers. The president cannot succeed himself except after an interval. In practice, the presidency rotates among the seven counsellors; the president to-day, Dr. Giuseppe Motta, was also president in 1915, 1920, 1927, and 1931.

Dr. Motta, a strong Catholic, was born in Ticino in the Italian part of Switzerland, the son of a hotelkeeper. He studied law at Fribourg, Munich, Heidelberg, and entered politics as a young man; for twenty years he has been a member of the federal council. He is the father of a large family, reputedly he knows Dante by heart, he gets a salary of £1,400 per year, he has a blameless record in private life, and in external politics he seems very decidedly to follow a pro-Vatican, pro-Mussolini course.

Switzerland too feels the Nazi menace. A local Nazi party, the Grey Shirts, rose in prominence after 1933; all the countries on the periphery of Germany, without exception, have seen these sub-Hitler movements crop up. Switzerland too is mending her defences. In 1936 a bill was introduced providing for a professional army – after 650 years of reliance on a national militia. Last year the defence budget was lifted to 98,500,000 francs, or almost twenty per cent of the national revenue.

CHAPTER XXXIV

HALF A LEAGUE ONWARD

'Breathes there a man with soul so dead
Who never to himself hath said
This is my own, my native land.'

NOTHING is easier than to sneer at the poor old League of Nations, foisted on the allied powers by an American, Woodrow Wilson, because he happened to care more for the United States of the World than the United States of America. Like a virgin in a bawdy house, calling piteously for a glass of lemonade (as Ben Hecht put it), Wilson roamed the corridors of Versailles, emerging finally with the League as America's only spoils of war. It gives one a start to read the Covenant to-day and see that paragraph three of Article Five still says, 'The first meeting of the Assembly and the first meeting of the Council shall be summoned by the President of the United States.'

Nothing is easier than to list the charges commonly made against the League. Speaker after speaker mounts the Assembly tribune – and tells the world what everybody already knows. Nothing happens at the Council table until the powers that be have settled the business beforehand – and in secret. What the League mostly does is try to act long after the time for action. The League does nothing but spawn a plethora of feeble committees. The League provided a means for minorities to voice their grievances, therefore minorities have been doubly nuisance-makers. The League compelled the registration of treaties; so treaties nowadays have more secret clauses than before. The League is a junta of the Versailles powers. And so on. And so on.

Some of these charges are true. But the point to make is that the countries themselves, not the League, are responsible for most of the weaknesses of the Geneva system. The League as such has no sovereign rights. It has no authority to compel a state to follow its recommendations. The League is a pool of all the member powers, but it has no executive rights over any individual country.

The League is not a super-state; it is merely a mouthpiece of member states when happily and rarely they reach agreement. The League itself decides nothing; the individual states bear all responsibility.

The Covenant, moreover, was written on the assumption that the United States of America would be a signatory. When Senator Lodge and his band of irreconcilable isolationists refused ratification of the Versailles Treaty, they torpedoed the Covenant almost beyond recovery. With the United States a League member, sanctions would effectively outlaw and isolate an errant state. But American withdrawal from the League system made sanctions all but impossible, because America, by insisting on its neutral right of trading with an aggressor, could frustrate any League blockade. The British Navy, necessarily the chief instrument of a blockade, would not risk conflict with the United States.

In assessing the value of the League one should first separate its non-political activities from those entangled in nationalist politics. That the League has done sturdy service in extra-political fields is surely undeniable. In collating statistics on a reasonable international basis, in forming the nucleus of a world approach to matters of health, agriculture, the drug traffic, transport, refugees, codification of law, its value is indisputable, and only a persimmon-minded Pharisee could minimise it. One should not forget, too, the able work of the League in finance and economics, particularly the attempt to stabilise the Danube countries after the War.

As to politics, the thing to keep in mind is that the League is an admirable mechanism for settling international disputes when – and only when – the great powers agree. It is silly to say that the League, even if it has no executive authority, cannot stop wars; it has stopped at least one war which might have been extremely dangerous – for instance the Bulgar-Greek conflict in 1925 – and it can stop others provided Great Britain, France, the Soviet Union, Italy, are united in wanting them stopped. When Mr. Eden and whoever is French foreign minister see eye to eye, the Geneva system works – swiftly and well. For instance the League prevented the Jugoslav-Hungarian outbreak in 1934 from developing into war. This averted a first-rate international crisis. But when the powers disagree, then the League is blocked.

The League's record as an administrator of doubtful territories is almost beyond reproach. Danzig, under the Irishman Sean Lester, the League's High Commissioner, is a case in point. And remember the Saar. The prime minister of Saarland was a tough and gallant Briton Geoffrey Knox. In his 'cabinet' were a Frenchman, a Saarlander, a Yugoslav, a Finn. They were neutral and impartial; they had no local axes to grind; they had no political ambitions; and they (their predecessors also) gave the Saar fifteen years of great comparative prosperity and peace.

Suppose Lithuania, say, or Austria, should be internationalised and placed under a completely impartial and disinterested extra-national cabinet. Suppose that the minister of finance was a Swede, because he was the best man in the world available for the post, and the minister of communications a Greek or Swiss, chosen for efficiency. Suppose the police were commanded by a Dane and his men were Indian, Italian, Uruguayan, or what you will, picked like the Saar 'Expeditionary' Force. The idea is so sensible that it is, of course, fantastic. It won't work because it strikes at the most 'precious' boast of a people, its nationalism. The only thing against it is human and political nature. Which makes evolution of the League heart-breakingly difficult.

The League is, as Edgar Ansel Mowrer put it, the product of thousands of years of slow ethical growth. Feeble as it may be, it 'speaks for a much larger proportion of the world than any other human institution'. It represents - I quote a recent letter in The Times - 'man's first fumbling approach to national decency, conceived in the spiritual anguish of the War.' And it has been in operation only half a generation, which in the historical process, is a very brief interval indeed. I remember President Masaryk saying to me in Prague, 'It is only fifteen years since the War - an instant's flash. Give us time - time -'

The brief history of the League may be divided into three periods. Until the Treaty of Locarno in 1925 it was for the most part the instrument of the victorious powers, strengthening the peace against the upward writhings of the vanquished. Then till 1933, when Germany departed, it laboriously struggled with the problem of disarmament; viz., the allied powers refused to obey their pledges and to disarm, and the disarmament conference collapsed. Since 1933 the major issue has been 'collective security'. This means an attempt to bring Germany into a security system on the basis of more or less equal rights; if it fails, the League will become the instrument of reversion to the balance of power and overt military alliances.

The Abyssinian dispute cut dramatically across this movement.

The greatest day in the history of the League was October 6, 1935, when Article Sixteen was invoked and sanctions against Italy were put into motion. For the first time, a major power was formally condemned for violation of the Covenant, and by a unanimous vote of the Council – despite the prophets who never dreamed that Article Sixteen could be applied – Italy was declared an outlaw state, deemed to have declared an act of war against all League states. Shades of Wilson! The League was born!

Thereafter came bitter disillusion. By July 1936 Mussolini had triumphed not only over Ethiopia but over all the League's sanctionist states. But the prestige of a person or an institution often ebbs and flows. The League was at low-water after the Abyssinian débâcle. But this was not the fault of the League, as the League, but of the great powers comprising it. The tide may some day flow full again.

Peace Palace

The League secretariat comprises six hundred and thirty-seven men and women of forty-four nationalities, and there are some queer fish among them. All take a solemn pledge to the League, and the group represents the nearest approach to an international civil service that the world has yet seen.

The secretary-general, Joseph Avenol, is a Frenchman; his two deputies are Spanish and Italian. The under-secretary general is British, the legal adviser Uruguayan, and the chiefs of section comprise two Britons, two Italians, one Greek, one Frenchman, one Dane, one Swede, one Pole, one Dutchman, one South African, and one American, the astute and amiable Arthur Sweetser. These men are the 'cabinet' of the League. In various sections the number of different nationalities is augmented. In the information section, for instance, there are men and women of seventeen countries.¹ This mêlée does not, however, produce much discord. The late secretary-general, Sir Eric Drummond, told a friend that quarrels in the staff, when they rarely occurred, were usually between people of the same nationality.

¹ Holland, the United States, Switzerland, France, Italy, Poland, Jugoslavia, Belgium, England, Canada, Australia, Sweden, Spain, China, Hungary, India, Chile. Several individuals are, moreover, multi-national; for instance, one vigorous member of the secretariat, M. Zilliacus, was born in Japan of a Finnish father and American mother; he was educated in Sweden, England, and the U.S.A.; he married a Pole and is a naturalised Englishman.

Members of the secretariat represent a cross-section of equipment as well as nationality. There are former soldiers, professors, engineers, diplomats, newspaper men, health officers, lawyers, economists. All are strenuous idealists, and all are devoted to the League. A fair share of them entered League service, young men – in the original secretariat there were only two men over forty – fresh from the War and determined to give voice to their disillusion and idealism. Some were inveterate internationalists even then; Pierre Comert, for instance, for many years head of the information section, was a teacher of French in a German University.

The chief 'personalities' commonly associated with the League are delegates from the powers, like Dr. Beneš of Czechoslovakia, and young Anthony Eden who is by all odds Geneva's star attraction. The head of the secretariat, M. Avenol, born in 1879, is French and yet has been called the Frenchman's conception of a typical Englishman. He is extremely shy, a little slow, tenacious; he never gets excited, loves England, and has a passion for bulldogs and gardening. Avenol was a financial expert, an adviser to the French treasury, who worked in England during the War on inter-ally financial problems; he was once offered the governorship of the Banque de France but he preferred Geneva. All things considered, he has done a good job.

Perish the Treaties?

The Treaty of Versailles, the alleged source of all our woes is a sturdy document running to four hundred and fifty-three pages which weighs just under three pounds. You can buy it at H.M. Stationery Office for the very respectable sum of two shillings and sixpence, and it is an interesting lot of reading matter for the money.

Some of its clauses, written in passion in 1919, seem outrageous and indefensible now, like the 'Hang the Kaiser' and war-guilt paragraphs. Large parts, you discover with some amazement, are long since out of date; the cry to revise the treaty still resounds, but as a matter of fact the document has already been so whittled down that not much except the territorial clauses are left. Reparations, Rhineland, disarmament, are no more than waste paper now. Parts VI, VII, VIII, IX, X, XI, XII, of the treaty have practically disappeared.

This serves to make more pressing the potential demand for territorial revision. The allies gave way to Germany, though with ill grace, first on the financial clauses of the treaty, then on German rearmament. Territory will not be so easy to give away. Thus the deadlock on the question of returning the mandated territories, former German colonies, to Germany.

As a matter of blunt fact, the territorial provisions of the treaties, including even those dealing with the Danube and Baltic, were not so utterly indefensible – some minor instances excepted – as is generally assumed. The basis of the settlement was self-determination; frontiers were drawn with ethnic considerations predominant. As a result, whereas in pre-War Europe something like 45,000,000 people lived under foreign domination – including the whole of what is now Poland, the whole of Czechoslovakia, the whole of the Baltic States and much of Jugoslavia – the situation to-day is that only 16,800,000 are genuine minorities. The fact cannot be denied that, as Hamilton Fish Armstrong put it, ‘vastly more people on the continent of Europe live under their own national régimes than before’. The trouble was that the allied powers overstepped themselves, and created – as we have seen – new minorities by grabbing what didn’t belong to them. But it should be pointed out that some frontier lines, like that between Hungary and Rumania, can never be drawn without leaving some miserable folk on the wrong side of the border.

Another point should be kept in mind. If Germany had won the War, the Treaty of Versailles might not have been nearly so nice a one.

War or Peace

In 1937 the Spanish civil war and its subordinate crises dominated Europe; disruptive forces were encouraged everywhere. Spain aside, let us look at Europe from the point of view of future war or peace.

The forces making for war, the source and embodiment of all indecency and evil, are roughly, the following:

First, rival nationalisms. We have noted ad nauseam the internecine hatreds of much of Europe. ‘Patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel’; war is the last refuge of a patriot. And there are many ‘profiteers in patriotism’ in Europe to-day.

Second, economic stresses. The last war caused the last economic crisis; the last economic crisis will help to cause the next war. The unity and confidence of capitalism has been shaken; national poverty is unloosing unpredictable international forces.

Third, the outward push of countries like Germany and Italy who are starved for raw materials, which coincides with their political revisionism, their nationalist urge to destroy the treaties and thus expand. Five countries in the world possess about seventy-five per cent of the total of the world's key-products. Germany, Italy and Japan are not among them.

Fourth, the difficulty of localising civil disturbances; Europe is so interlocked that a revolution in Austria with 6,500,000 people, may set 100,000,000 marching; frontiers were multiplied by Versailles, Europe 'balkanised', and the whole continent enmeshed in rickety alliances.

Fifth, the incapacity of certain peoples to develop democratically.

Sixth, the growth of armament. Millions of armed men cannot sit around with billions of dollars' worth of guns and ammunition and just twiddle their thumbs – indefinitely.

Seventh, the fact that the United States of America is not a member of the League, which would be a thousand per cent more effective with American adherence.

Eighth, the spread of Fascism, and the explosive force of personalities like Hitler.¹

The forces making for peace may similarly be outlined:

First, wars cost money, and everybody is poor. Nobody has paid for the last war – except the dead. (On the other hand, of course, domestic poverty may tempt a country – Italy for instance – to break out, both as an effort to cloak discontent at home, and, more 'legitimately', to seek wealth abroad. Also one might note that the less wealth a country has, the less it stands to lose by war.)

Second, the general tempo of the economic crisis has been an anodyne. The struggle of almost all nations to keep from drowning in the seas of their own poverty has, to a certain extent, minimised the danger of conflict. (On the other hand, note that in Austria, for instance, economic difficulties have tended to increase the chance of civil war.)

Third, as pointed out above, the peace treaties went a considerable way toward drawing a correct ethnic map of Europe, and thus removed many former sources of revolutionary and international friction. There are approximately thirty million fewer Europeans anxious to upset the status quo.

Fourth, in 1914 in Europe there were eighteen kingdoms or ¹See Chapter VII above for detailed reasons why Germany may make war.

empires, four of them ruled by absolute or nearly absolute monarchs, and only two republics. To-day there are twelve kingdoms, none of them absolute, and fifteen republics. Absolutist wars in the fashion of former centuries, arranged between royal houses almost like their marriages, are out of fashion. (On the other hand, totalitarian Fascist dictators can with equal impunity throw their countries into war.)

Fifth, a general European war would probably produce revolution and communism everywhere except in England. The knowledge that the Kremlin would very likely be the beneficiary of a new world war may, conceivably, tend to prevent one.

Sixth, in 1937, even despite Spain and the Ethiopian fiasco, the League system was by no means proved to be a failure. The machinery of the League, even with the powers disagreeing, provides a valuable central clearing-house for information and negotiation. Popular pacific opinion, especially in England, was mobilised behind the League to an extraordinary extent. It is not necessarily stupid idealism to hope that the League can eventually become strong enough to stop wars.

'In Vishnuland What Avatar?'

So now we come to the end of this long and crowded parade through Western Europe. War aside, what are the other tendencies made manifest? What chords, subordinate to the main diapason peace-or-war, are clear?

1. The status-quo group of powers, beneficiaries of the peace treaties, has begun to crack. Italy went wild on a particularist adventure; Poland played with both France and Germany; Jugoslavia began to wobble. The very preponderance in power of the treaty countries led to jealousies, differences, and secession. It seems clear that a new line-up is in process of formation.

2. Political nationalism, founded on poverty, hate, and economic jealousy, is still the dominant force determining the policy of every country.

3. Powerful personalities like Hitler, Goering, Mussolini, Kamal Ataturk, Schuschnigg, Horthy, Rydz-Smigly, King Zog, Metaxas, dominate those countries where people are too feeble or immature politically for democracy.

4. The small democratic states are those which have survived the trying arduous of the middle thirties best. Scandinavia, Switzerland, Holland, as we have noted, have a higher standard of living than their neighbours; partly because of geographic-historical considerations, they are outside the general stream of European madness – and happy for it.

5. The world economic crisis has lifted considerably. But the agricultural countries in Central Europe and the Baltic regions are still hard hit by the agrarian collapse and the industrial countries still find their markets shrivelled.

6. Liberal democracy was a handmaiden to private capitalism; the world economic crisis dealt private capitalism a staggering blow, and democracy innocently enough took the consequences. The party system, in any number of countries, was discredited, and in several states it was replaced by authoritarian régimes. Can an authoritarian government, replacing democracy, be made benevolent? To this question Western Europe replied with a resounding negative.

7. In Italy, Germany, Austria, and potentially in Spain, Fascism rose. (Jugoslavia, Hungary, Bulgaria, Poland, Albania, Turkey, Greece, are dictatorships or semi-dictatorships, but they are not Fascist in the sense of Fascism as a corporative reorganisation of politics and economy.) In several countries Fascism and/or reactionary dictatorship came to be linked with what was, in simple fact, a revolt against civilisation. 'Apostolic leadership, political hierarchy, and mass obedience founded on terror,' as Mowrer puts it, 'are its traits.'

8. Germany and Austria have come to at least a provisional understanding. This may make possible a future combination between the Fascist dictatorships of Germany and Italy, already adumbrated by the 'Rome-Berlin' axis.

9. Fascism, momentarily powerful, may be the convulsive last agonies of the capitalist order; in which case Fascism will have been merely the prelude of communism.

10. England replaced France as the chief 'League' power, by taking the lead for sanctions against Italy, through the agency of forces which included the British fleet, Lord Cecil, and fear of Germany. At the same time England began to rearm.

11. The great broad mass of middle liberals and democrats were almost everywhere perplexed by the painful necessity to turn sharply to either right or left. The good old comfortable middle ground was disappearing.

12. Left groups, despite immense obstacles, have sought to unite; in the Saar, underground in Austria, in Spain, in France, a United Left Front was organised against reaction. In almost all countries some sort of movement toward the Front Populaire idea began.

· · · · ·
And now let us turn to that other and more powerful League of Nations – the Soviet Union.

CHAPTER XXXV

STALIN

'The art of leadership is a serious matter. One must not lag behind a movement, because to do so is to become isolated from the masses. But one must not rush ahead, for to rush ahead is to lose contact with the masses. He who wishes to lead a movement must conduct a fight on two fronts – against those who lag behind and those who rush ahead.'

– JOSEF STALIN.

'No revolution can be made with silk gloves.'

– JOSEF STALIN.

STALIN is probably the most powerful single human being in the world. Even dialectical materialism demands personality to assert itself, as the case of Stalin proves. He is different from other dictators because he is not only the undisputed leader of a national state but of a movement, the Communist International, which has roots in all countries. Also he differs from Hitler and Mussolini in that he is of the second generation of dictators, having taken over authority from a predecessor, Lenin.

He was not appointed by Lenin to the job. Indeed quite the contrary. Stalin was the man whom Lenin did not want to be his successor. Lenin was quite explicit on this point. Listen:

'Comrade Stalin is too rude. . . . I propose to the comrades to find a way of removing him from that position (secretary-general of the party) and appointing another man who in all respects differs from Stalin only in superiority – namely, more patient, more loyal, more polite, and more attentive to comrades, less capricious, etc. . . .'

This was in 1924. Eleven years later Stalin was extolled by his subordinates in terms almost as extravagant as those which Lenin himself evoked. In the Soviet Press you may find him fulsomely called 'Great', 'Beloved', 'Bold', 'Wise', 'Inspirer', 'Genius'. Four cities have been named for him, Stalingrad, Stalinabad, Stalino-gorsk, Stalinsk. In speeches he had been addressed by ordinarily un-effusive folk as, 'Our Best Collective Farmer Worker', 'Our Shock-worker, Our Best of Best', and 'Our Darling, Our Guiding Star'.

Celebrations have concluded with the words, 'Long Live Our Dear Leader, Our Warmly Beloved Stalin, Our Comrade, Our Friend.'

Sources of Power

Guts. Durability. Physique. He suffers from a dilated heart, but otherwise his physical strength and endurance are enormous. He is no high-strung neurotic or somnambulist like Hitler, nor is his command of physical power closely associated with emotion, as is the case with Mussolini. Stalin is about as emotional as a slab of basalt. If he has nerves, they are veins in rock.

Patience. Tenacity. Concentration. His perseverance, as Walter Duranty says, is 'inhuman'. He is a slow builder of bricks, so slow that often his followers are impatient, because they do not see the outline of the finished structure he is building. His line is undeviating; he takes only 'the long view'. His ability to concentrate is very great.

Shrewdness. Cunning. Craft. He is, of course, an Oriental; moreover he admits it. 'Welcome,' he said to the first interviewer, a Japanese, whom he ever received, 'I too am an Asiatic.'

Stalin tried to suppress Lenin's testament denigrating him. He had not quite the power to do this. But presently the U.S.S.R. was flooded with five hundred thousand copies of a photograph showing Stalin and Lenin sitting on a bench together, conversing with earnest friendliness.

Stalin's double campaign, first to rid himself of the left opposition of Trotsky, Zinoviev, and Kamenev, second the right opposition of Bukharin, Rykov, and Tomsky, was a triumph not only of ruthless perseverance, but great imaginative shrewdness and subtlety.

When candour suits his purpose, no man can be more candid. He has the courage to admit his errors, something few other dictators dare do. In his article 'Dizzy from Success' he was quite frank to admit that the collectivisation of the peasants had progressed too quickly. He wrote in Leninism:

'The main thing in this matter is to have the courage to admit one's errors and to have the strength to correct them in the shortest possible time. The fear of admitting one's errors after the recent intoxication by successes, the fear of self-criticism, unwillingness to correct one's errors rapidly and decisively - that is the main difficulty.'

This book, Leninism, is one of the frankest - if long-winded - expositions of political philosophy ever written. In its eight hundred and twenty-five pages you may find record of things good, bad, and indifferent in the Soviet Union in illimitable profusion. Stalin emphasises the good, naturally, but he does not conceal the bad. The book has sold over two million copies in the Soviet Union.¹

Sense of Detail. This is very great. His wary eye penetrates to the smallest elements in the national life, and in general he tends to detail in a way neither Hitler nor Mussolini would dream of doing. Hitler, for instance, refuses to read even glowing samples of his fan mail. Stalin reads everything, down to the last paragraph in the Pravda. His day begins with perusal of local reports, carefully sifted from all parts of the Soviet Union. W. H. Chamberlin (cf. Russia's Iron Age, p. 187), certainly no friendly critic, notes that Stalin, by personal intervention, remedied injustices in spheres far removed from his normal business.

In the summer of 1933 Stalin wanted to see the building of Magnitogorsk, the industrial city created in Siberia during the Five-Year Plan, dramatised and made colourful in the newspapers. He remembered a bright feature-reporter on the Izvestia named Garry and asked what had become of him. He was found in a concentration camp! Stalin had him released, sent him to write up Magnitogorsk.

During the February 1934 congress of the communist party Stalin was listening to a speech by his first assistant, Kaganovitch. He was talking about certain text-books which had been unsatisfactory. Stalin interrupted, 'Not those text-books, but the loose-leaf text-books.' When his friend Kirov was murdered in Leningrad, in December 1934, Stalin went to Leningrad in order personally to interrogate the assassin.

Ability to handle men. He is a good political tactician, a party boss and organiser par excellence. Friends told me in Moscow in the summer of 1935 that Stalin possessed great magnetism, that you felt his antennae as soon as he entered a room. His personal as well as political intuition is very considerable. He has offended many; plenty of communists would deny that he had any sense of human relationship; yet his men work for him, loyally, and he chooses them supremely well.

Associates worship Hitler; fear Mussolini; and respect Stalin; this seems to be the gist of it.

¹ The complete works of Lenin, incidentally, in twenty-seven volumes, have sold four million sets in the U.S.S.R. since publication.

He is no orator. His speeches are simple and businesslike but long. His writing, when he tackles the dreary wastes of Marxist dialectics, particularly when he voices the ideological differences with the opposition, is heavy going; he sounds like an applicant for a Ph.D. thesis at a minor university. When, as in his recent address to graduates of the Red Army college, he avoids philosophical issues, he is much more successful – direct, simple, full of sense. Generally, he likes the question and answer method of exposition. His speeches are like catechisms. And in style he aims to hit the broad level of the masses.

His intelligence is wary, slow, thorough, rather than acute or brilliant. Yet witness his talk with H. G. Wells, wherein he more than held his own with that glib and eloquent interlocutor. And witness his remarkable interview in 1927 with an American workmen's delegation.

On this occasion he answered questions for four solid hours, and questions of great diversity and difficulty. He talked strictly extemporaneously, but with a perfect organisation of material, of a kind only possible to a man completely sure of himself. The verbatim report, about 11,800 words, comprises one of the most comprehensive and discerning statements of Soviet aims ever made; it was a tour de force quite beyond the capacity of any but an exceptionally intelligent man.

When the delegation, thoroughly exhausted, had concluded its queries, Stalin asked if he might ask questions about America – and he did so for two hours more. His questions were penetrating and showed considerable knowledge of American conditions; Stalin, single-handed, answered the delegation's questions much better than they replied to him. During this six solid hours of talk, the telephone did not ring once; no secretary was allowed to interrupt – another indication of Stalin's habit of utter concentration to the job in hand.

Zeal. Communism is strength to Stalin, and his belief in it is that of the Pope in Jesus Christ.

Ruthlessness. He is extravagantly ruthless. It is stupid or silly to deny this. The Russian terror was a wholesale punitive assault on a class. Soviet Russia differed from other dictatorships in that it assumed from the beginning the necessity of destruction of class enemies. Stalin did not, at the moment of crisis, flinch from obliterating the recalcitrant peasants by the weapon of famine. All governments, in the last analysis, rule by force. In Soviet Russia force is applied directly, and with social aims in view which are intended to benefit not only one hundred and sixty-five million Russians, but the whole human race. The end justifies the means, in the Soviet view. Stalin is perfectly frank about this. Lady Astor asked him, 'How long are you going to go on killing people?' Stalin replied, 'As long as it is necessary.'

A Soviet worthy, absent from the U.S.S.R., was asked his opinion of Stalin. He replied, 'The man is just a little too bloody for me.' Rare burst of indiscretion!

Early Career. Stalin¹ alone had the courage to stick the game out inside Russia after the collapse of the revolution of 1905. The other revolutionaries scattered into exile, and lived, like Lenin, in libraries or coffee-houses till 1917. Stalin stayed within Russia the whole time. He did the dirty work; he was 'the hall sweeper'. Thus he built up an immense acquaintance with submerged revolutionaries, and profitably was enabled to transform an underground organisation into his own party structure when he needed it.

The party. The communist party is no longer divided on questions of principle, as it was during the Trotsky episode; no opposition remains; Stalin is absolutely its boss, its master. Discipline in the party is overwhelmingly severe; and Stalin controls discipline. Party and state are one, and Stalin, as Louis Fischer puts it, 'controls every wheel and screw of the party machine.'

Note well that Stalin created the importance of the post of party secretary, not vice versa. Several men were secretaries of the party before Stalin. One was Bogdanoff, now a nonentity; one was Krestinsky, now an official in the foreign ministry. Stalin alone saw the advantages to be accrued from control of the party mechanism; thus, as he packed each office with his men, friends from underground days, his power grew.

Naturally Stalin's espionage within the party is of the best. The story is told that he turned to a comrade suffering from a disease of a peculiarly private and secret nature. 'Well,' Stalin greeted him, 'How's your — to-day?'

He is not a dictator of the first generation, I have noted, but the successor to Lenin. His tactics have always been to use Lenin as a stick to beat opponents with. In his long struggle with Trotsky, Stalin pretended never to put himself forward for his own sake, but only as the 'instrument of Lenin'; he persistently accused Trotsky of 'false Leninism', the most heinous sin in Russia, thus doubly confounding him. No man ever quoted scripture to better purpose than Stalin quoted Lenin. Mussolini and Hitler can plead only themselves for justification; Stalin always had the mighty shadow of Lenin for support.

¹ cf. Duranty Reports Russia, p. 234.

This leads to another point. The basic strength of the Soviets is that all the outside world is the enemy. Thus the Soviet State, thrown back on itself, is close-knit, cohesive, self-sufficient. It has its complete ideology, the Marx-Lenin dogma, without possibility of deviation. Stalin, representing himself as the authentic voice of dogma, is the mouthpiece not merely of the masses in Russia, but of Russians vis-à-vis the hostile world.

Finally, as Duranty says, Stalin is indispensable. 'The leader has become identical with the cause.'

Job

Stalin holds no government post, except that since January 1934 he has been one of the thirty-seven members of the Presidium of the All-Union Central Executive Committee. This is the keystone of what might be called the Soviet Parliament. The cabinet (council of people's commissars) is responsible to it – theoretically. But Stalin is not a cabinet member, commissar.

He is no longer 'secretary general' of the communist party, but merely one of five theoretically equal party 'secretaries', the others being Kaganovitch, Zhdanov, Ezhov, and Andreyev. He is, it goes without saying, one of the ten members of the Politburo, the highest party organ.

The Central Committee of the party, from which the secretaries and members of the Politburo are drawn, could – in principle – dismiss Stalin. He is theoretically subject to majority decisions of the Central Committee. In practice his dismissal is out of the question, since he controls election of the committee members.

Party and state in Soviet Russia are, I have said, one; but Stalin maintains rigid theoretical separation between party and governmental functions. Lenin was not only head of the party but chairman of the council of people's commissars – prime minister. Stalin has rejected this coalescence. He prefers to remain in the background – the party boss.

Boy of Tiflis

His real name is Yosif (Josef) Visarionovitch Dzhugashvili, and he was born in the town of Gora, near Tiflis, Georgia, in 1879. The legend is that Lenin gave him his nickname, Stalin, which is the Russian word for 'steel', as tribute to his iron durability. In reality some anonymous comrade suggested it as an 'underground' name way back in 1910 or 1911, long before Lenin knew him well.

Stalin was the son of a cobbler who had been a peasant. The family was miserably poor, probably as poor as Mussolini's, but Josef nevertheless got an education. For four years, from the ages of 15 to 19, he attended the Orthodox Theological Seminary in Tiflis, training of all things for the priesthood.

His father, like Hitler's, of blunt imagination, wanted him to follow the parental vocation. But Stalin's mother – apparently like Hitler's an exceptional woman – refused to have him become a cobbler. She insisted that Josef go to school. It is commonly thought that Stalin was expelled from the Seminary for Marxist activities. This may not be so. One story is that his mother withdrew him after four years because privation had hurt his health.

H. R. Knickerbocker has interviewed this old Georgian mother of Stalin's Ekaterina Dzhugashvili, who speaks hardly a word of Russian. She said that 'Soso', as she called him, had been quite 'a good boy' and she seemed quite bewildered at his immense success. Stalin fetched her to Moscow some years ago. She spent an unhappy month in the Kremlin, puzzled, so the story went, at her boy's prominence, because she could not discover what it was he 'did' to earn a living! Then she retreated to the Tiflis hills, morose, content.

Georgians are not Russians. Even to-day Stalin speaks Russian with a soft hint of Georgian accent. The Georgian language not only differs from Russian as much, say, as English differs from Portuguese; even the alphabets are dissimilar. The Georgians are a southern race of complex Caucasian blood; they are mountaineers, with the primitive defensive instincts of the frontiersman; tenacity, temper, are ingrained in their physiognomy; like Armenians they have their own proud national history; they have purple-black hair, and eyes black as midnight.

Stalin's motivation to revolution came first from poverty, second from his experiences in the Seminary. He detested authority as it was voiced by the cunning, dogmatic priests, who combined parochial intolerance with the backwardness of the provincial Orthodox Church. The years in the Seminary were crucially important in the formative period of Stalin's life. He left the Seminary, met Marxist friends – and his long revolutionary career began.

Those submerged nineteen years, from 1898 to 1917, were years of incessant, overwhelming labour, always to the same end – revolution; of patient, tenacious establishment of an organisation; of pain, cruelty, persecution, arrest. Both Hitler and Mussolini have seen the inside of jails. But Stalin was much more real a jailbird. Five times he was caught by the Czar's police, five times exiled. Four times, a veritable Houdini, he escaped; the 1917 revolution liberated him from the fifth imprisonment, when he was incarcerated above the Arctic circle.

Stalin assisted in actual terrorism. The party needed money and undertook a policy of 'expropriations', raids on banks which were pure robberies, nothing more, nothing less. As member of the Tiflis party committee he was partly responsible for an outrage in 1907 wherein some twenty persons were killed: his men bombed a shipment of currency, got away with £15,000. The casualties were embarrassing to Stalin's superiors, and on Lenin's insistence he was expelled from the party for a short period.

He found time – between jail sentences and exile – for much activity of less tumultuous nature. At Baku, on the Caspian Sea, he edited a Bolshevik paper, Vremia, in the Georgian language. He went to Stockholm, Cracow, and Prague, to attend party congresses. He had managed to write a book, Socialism and the National Question, as early as 1912. He was leader at this time of the Bolshevik section of the social democratic party in the Duma, and an editor of Pravda, the party newspaper; then in 1913 he was arrested and sent to his last exile.

All this was preparation. In 1917 real life began. The revolution, overnight, transformed his function – and that of thousands of others – from conspiracy to organisation, from insurrection to administration. He was a member of the Politburo from the moment of its creation, on October 10, 1917; other members, besides Lenin, were Trotsky, Zinoviev, Kamenev, Sokolnikov, Bubnov. Also he held two cabinet portfolios when the government was organised: commissar for workers and peasants inspection, and commissar for nationalities.

He was not as active as Trotsky during the civil war period, though he was a member of the revolutionary military committee, and saw service both in the Ukraine and in Petrograd against Yudenitch. In 1921 Lenin, little dreaming what use Stalin would make of it, gave him the secretary-generalship of the party.

His main work was in the sphere of nationalities. As a non-

Russian, he was peculiarly fitted for this task. Soviet Russia was a mélange of at least one hundred quite separate races and nationalities, and the job was to combine them into a stable unity while conceding some measure of provincial autonomy, at least in spirit. Stalin, under Lenin, invented the idea of the U.S.S.R. – the convenient device by which ‘independent’ and ‘autonomous’ republics became the Soviet ‘Union’, surrendering central authority to Moscow, retaining local administrative privileges.

Stalin was jealous of Trotsky from the beginning, and they came into conflict early. Duranty records that Stalin, mending a breach in the front, shot a group of officers for inefficiency, and that Trotsky, as supreme War Lord, telegraphed in protest. Stalin scrawled across the telegram, ‘Pay no attention,’ and left it to moulder in the archives.

Another anecdote of this period shows him in different mood. He was reviewing troops near Petrograd. A sullen soldier refused to salute. Stalin questioned him and the man pointed first to his own feet, wrapped in coarse burlap, soaked in snow and dirt, then at Stalin’s substantial boots. Without a word Stalin took his boots off, tossed them to the soldier, insisted on donning the soldier’s wet and stinking rags – and continued to wear them till Lenin himself made him resume normal footgear.

Stalin, says Duranty, was picked by Lenin as one of his successors because he knew the Georgian could endure. The proverb in those days said, ‘Lenin trusts Stalin; Stalin trusts no one.’ Some authorities, Paul Scheffer among them, assert that Lenin and Stalin broke about four months before Lenin’s death, because Lenin distrusted his ambition, and thought that Stalin was already intriguing to supersede him. Certainly we have seen that Lenin, in his testament, showed his disapproval of some aspects of Stalin’s character. ‘This cook,’ he wrote, ‘will make too hot a stew.’

The Georgian began to act the moment that Lenin died. He and Zinoviev carried Lenin’s coffin. This was in 1924. It took Stalin just five years to perfect his organisation, unmercifully weed out heretical opponents – whom he attacked by accusing them of deviation from the sacred ‘party line’, which he alone was competent to interpret – and establish himself as undisputed dictator of the U.S.S.R.

The Struggle with Trotsky

Stalin denies (cf. Leninism, I, p. 377) that his differences with

TROTSKY

Trotsky were personal. Nevertheless personal differences occurred. The two leaders cordially disliked each other. They came from different worlds, and not even the bridge of Marx could link them. Stalin called Trotsky an aristocrat and an actor. And Trotsky was an aristocrat, in all save the social sense, i.e., he had brains, he had courage, and he had style. Trotsky called Stalin a boor, treacherous, barbarous, politically corrupt.

It is an odd fact that such a bourgeois and 'trivial' conception as personal hatred, based on the irrationality of passion, should have been an important factor in the history of the Russian revolution. But it was so – though, of course, the personal considerations were buttressed by other factors. Trotsky detested Stalin so heartily that he studiously insulted him in public; for instance, in committee meetings he would ostentatiously pick up a newspaper and begin to read to himself whenever Stalin made a speech.

The difference in their characters was, of course, profound. Stalin, a passionate politician, above all a creature of committees; Trotsky, a lone-wolf, a violent individualist, who for twenty years could not bear to shackle himself with allegiance to either the Bolshevik or Menshevik divisions in the party. Stalin, patient as an icon; Trotsky, vivacious as a satyr. Stalin, immobile, silent, cautious; Trotsky, a lively, frank, and inveterate conversationalist. Stalin a bomb-thrower, literally; Trotsky horrified by sporadic violence. Stalin, a hard-headed practical wirepuller, unyieldingly jealous of his career; Trotsky, lover of the abstract, impulsive, vain. Stalin, a supreme organiser; Trotsky, a bad politician, incapable of compromise, very hard to work with. Observe their smiles. Stalin smiles like a tiger who has just swallowed the canary. Trotsky smiles brightly and spontaneously like a child. Observe their escapes from Siberia. Stalin went about it sombrely, efficiently, with methodical coldness; Trotsky – puff! – has disappeared into clear air; he escapes like Ariel.

Above and beyond their personal conflict was divergence in political views of extreme importance. The passion of each came to embody cardinally opposed theories of the operation of the Soviet Union. Trotsky's 'Left Opposition' arose out of the doctrine of 'permanent revolution'. He did not believe, as Stalin did, that socialism could succeed in a single state. He believed that the Marxist régime could maintain itself in Russia only if permanent, progressive revolution took place outside.

The Trotskyists were horrified at the way things went after Lenin's death. They thought that the socialisation of the U.S.S.R. was going on far too slowly. They feared that Lenin's tactical and temporary concession to capitalist forces, the N.E.P. (New Economic Policy) would continue indefinitely; they thought that communism in Russia itself, with such meagre spoils of victory, would perish without help from proletarian revolution in the external world.

Stalin took the opposite view. He said, in effect, 'You lads outside cool your heels for a couple of decades, then we'll get around to you.' Trotsky said, 'Join your Russian comrades in revolution and free yourself from your chains at once.' Stalin said, 'Russia first. When we get our state in order, then comes your turn.' Trotsky said, 'Whatever country you live in comes first.' Russia, as Stalin saw it, was settling down to the prosaic ardours of married life. But Trotsky, an incorrigible romantic, wanted permanent revolution as a perpetual honeymoon.

Stalin was, of course, right. The very considerable success of the Five-Year Plan proved that. It is easy to be wise after the event. Seven years ago, before Trotsky was expelled from Russia, before the Five-Year Plan got under way, no one could have foreseen the outcome so surely. Great credit to Stalin for his prescience, his 'long view'.

Stalin broke Trotsky and his friends by the same method he subsequently employed to break the 'Right Opposition' (which thought that the socialisation of Russia was going at too rapid a pace). He (1) controlled the party machine, (2) his interpretation of Leninism made all his opponents heretics, and therefore punishable.

Stalin's detestation of Trotsky led him to exaggerated meanness in revenge. Yet his extirpation of Trotsky's name from the official records and school-books, so that unborn generations may hardly know his name, is not as complete as one is led to believe. In his October Revolution, which is purchasable anywhere in Russia, Stalin pays tribute, albeit grudgingly, to his enemy. 'Let us admit this, it is impossible to deny that Comrade Trotsky fought well at the time of October' (p. 72).

Stalin hated Trotsky partly, in the complicated way of human beings, because he, Stalin, owes him so much: he stole part of his programme. Trotsky advocated super-industrialisation in the manner of the Five-Year Plan as far back as 1921, and he wanted to expel the kulaks (rich farmers) in 1925, a task which Stalin did not set himself till almost five years later. But that was the trouble.

Trotsky, impulsive, demanded these things prematurely, at the wrong time; Stalin had the strength to wait.

And Trotsky never seemed to realise that when Stalin said he could build socialism in a single country, the country was Russia, which is not a country at all – but a continent. Nor did it occur to Trotsky that far and away the best single advertisement for world communism, in the future, would be a Russia which was successful, stable, safe.

The Iron Will of Uncle Joe

Of course there was a famine. None can deny this any longer. It occurred in the spring of 1933, in the great grain-producing areas of the U.S.S.R., the North Caucasus and Ukraine. Communists, after preliminary hesitancy, now admit the fact of the famine, though in circumlocutory jargon. For instance, Miss Anna Louise Strong writes (New Republic, August 7, 1935), 'There was a serious grain shortage in the 1932 harvest due chiefly to inefficiencies of the organisational period of the new large-scale mechanised farming among peasants unaccustomed to machines.' This is quite a mouthful – a mouthful that the peasants didn't get.

The chief point about the famine is not – it might be said – that several million people died. Chamberlin puts the mortality as high as five or six millions. This is too high, other authorities believe. The point is that the Soviet Government was engaged in a tremendous, epochal struggle to socialise the land, for the eventual good of the peasants; the peasants, however, resisted and – terribly enough – suffered. To balk the government, they refused to harvest grain. Therefore they did not have enough to eat. And died.

The inside story of the famine is briefly this. The Five-Year Plan included 'collectivisation' of the peasantry. Russia, overwhelmingly an agrarian country, contained in 1927 almost twenty-five million peasant holdings; Stalin's plan was to unite them into socialised collective farms. The peasants would turn over implements and livestock to a farm manager, and work in common on comparatively large rather than very small holdings, assisted by tractors furnished by the state. This was the idea. On it, the future of socialism in the U.S.S.R. depended.

What happened was that the peasants, bitterly indignant, staged two major resistances to the immense forcible process of collectivisation. First, they slaughtered their livestock, rather than turn it over to the collectives. It was an extraordinary and tragic event – though not so tragic as the human starvation later. There was no organisation among the peasants, no communication; yet in hundreds of villages, separated by hundreds of miles, a simultaneous destruction of animals began. Rather than turn over their precious pigs, sheep, cattle, to the collective authorities, the peasants murdered them.

The cost was terrible. Stalin – four years late – admitted it. The agrarian economy of the Soviet Union suffered a blow from which it cannot fully recover till about 1940; it will take till then to replenish the slaughtered stock. For, once the killing began, it progressed till about fifty per cent of the animals in the Soviet Union were killed. Official figures admit that the number of horses in the country diminished from 33,500,000 in 1928 to 19,600,000 in 1932; the number of cattle from 70,500,000 to 40,700,000; sheep and goats from 146,700,000 to 52,100,000; pigs from 25,900,000 to 11,600,000.¹

The peasants, stunned by this catastrophe, sank into temporary stupor. The government – when the worst of the damage was done – retreated hastily. Probably Stalin had not realised the formidable extent of the slaughter until it was too late. . . .² The tempo of collectivisation had been far too rapid. The plan called for full collectivisation only after ten years, but within two years, in 1930, sixty-five per cent of all the farms had been collectivised. So the pace was toned down.

Even so, in 1932, the peasants, stiffening into a final vain protest, rebelled again. As if by underground agreement, another psychic epidemic spread through the rich fields of the Caucasus and Ukraine. The farmers, those still outside the collectives, were paid miserable prices; either they could buy no manufactured goods at all, or goods only of indifferent quality. They hit on a plan. They had sowed the crop, which was abundant; but they decided not to harvest all of it. They harvested exactly what they calculated they would themselves need during the winter, and left the rest to rot. ‘What was the use of slaving to produce a handsome crop, if the state simply seized it all?’

This was, of course, mutiny. It was not only defiance of Stalin; it was a threat to starve him into submission. The Soviet Government needed the grain to distribute to the industrial regions, the great cities; it needed grain for export, to pay for the machinery it had to import for the Five-Year Plan.

¹ Premier Molotov’s speech at the 1934 party congress. (cf. Socialism Victorious, p. 394-)

² He has learned his lesson, however, and admitted his mistake. New rules introduced in the autumn of 1934 permit individual peasants to keep a limited supply of livestock: one cow, two sheep, four pigs, chicken.

Even the farmers already in the collectives let their grain rot. There were few communist overseers, few trained and loyal farm managers. Word got to Moscow that the harvest, which should have been handsome, was largely lost. Stalin saw that this was a major crisis. If the peasants were permitted to get away with this, the revolution was beaten. ('Obsolete classes don't voluntarily disappear,' he told Wells.) He had to act. And did.

Government grain collectors descended on the farms, tall with weeds, and seized that small share of the crop that the peasants had saved for their own use! One by one, they visited every holding, and took every bit of grain due the government in taxes. If a man's normal crop was, say, sixty bushels, the tax might be twenty bushels. So when the government took twenty, the farmer and his family had only five – instead of twenty-five – to live on the whole winter and spring.

Russian economy is still extremely primitive. The question of grain, of bread, is a matter of life and death. When there was no grain left, the people began to die. The government might have diverted some grain from the cities – though that was a pinched, hungry year everywhere – to feed the peasants. But the government did not do so. Stalin decided that the peasants must pay the penalty for their rebellion. They had refused, blindly, stupidly, to provide grain; very well, let them starve. And they starved.

Meantime, the kulaks had been liquidated by a more direct process. These were peasants of more than average industry or ability or wealth; the capitalist farmers, 'class enemies on the agrarian front'. In 1928 there were seven hundred and fifty thousand people officially classed as kulaks in the Soviet Union. To-day there are none. They were rooted out like trees, packed into prison trains, dispatched to labour camps in far parts of the country, put to forced labour on building railways, digging canals.

The famine broke the back of peasant resistance in the U.S.S.R. Since the famine collectivisation has proceeded slowly, smoothly. From 1930 to 1935 another twenty-five per cent of the land has been socialised. All but a small fraction of the best arable land in Russia is now organised into about two hundred and fifty thousand farms.

The peasants tried to revolt. The revolt might have brought the Soviet Union down. But it collapsed on the iron will of Stalin. The peasants killed their animals, then they killed themselves.

Stalin the Human Being

Let no one think that Stalin is a thug. It would be idle to pretend that he could take a chair in fine arts at Harvard; nevertheless his learning is both broad and deep, especially in philosophy and history. One is instinctively tempted to consider this reticent Georgian as a roughneck, a man of instincts and muscle, not of brains. But his speeches quote Plato and Don Quixote; he knew about the monkey trial at Dayton and the composition of Lloyd George's shadow-cabinet and the unionisation of workers in America; in his talk with Wells he showed as much knowledge of Cromwell and the Chartists as Wells himself.

In 1933 he shocked and horrified a deputation of Bolshevik writers by telling them their work was rubbish, because it had no broad basis in general culture. 'Read Shakespeare, Goethe, and the other classics, as I do,' he said.

Nor are his manners bad. He sees visitors only very rarely, but one and all they report his soberness, his respectful attention to their questions, his attempt to put them at their ease. His speeches are full of a curious sort of sardonic courtliness; for instance he refers to capitalists usually as 'Messieurs the Bourgeoisie'.¹ He restrains his personal appearances to the minimum; once, during the crucial period of the Five-Year Plan, he made no speech or public appearance for eighteen months.

He has a sense of humour, though it is heavy to western ears; that he has a sense of humour at all differentiates him from Hitler or Mussolini. Shaw reports his keen sense of comedy. Addressing the 1930 congress of the party, he ticked off the Right Opposition of Bukharin and Rykov by asserting that if Bukharin saw a cockroach he proceeded at once to smell catastrophe, foreseeing the end of the Soviet Union in one month. 'Rykov supported Bukharin's theses on the subject,' said Stalin, 'with the reservation, however, that he had a very serious difference with Bukharin, namely that the Soviet Government will perish, in his opinion, not in one month, but in one month and two days.'

¹ Incidentally, an odd point, he sometimes speaks of himself in the third person. cf. Leninism, I. 300, and II. 225.

At the 1934 congress he took time out to deal with those who indulge in the great Russian habit of talkativeness:

I had a conversation with one such comrade, a very respected comrade, but an incorrigible chatterbox, who was capable of submerging any living cause in a flood of talk. Well, here is the conversation:

I: How are you getting on with the sowing?

He: With the sowing, Comrade Stalin? We have mobilised ourselves.

I: Well, and what then?

He: We have put the question bluntly.

I: And what next?

He: There is a turn, Comrade Stalin; soon there will be a turn.

I: But still?

He: We can observe some progress.

I: But for all that, how are you getting on with the sowing?

He: Nothing has come of the sowing as yet, Comrade Stalin.

Stalin makes occasional pretences to humility. When Wells asked him what he was doing to change the world, he answered mildly, 'Not so very much.' And he concluded the interview by saying, 'Much more could have been done had we Bolsheviks been cleverer.'¹

Stalin, has, however, permitted and encouraged his own virtual deification. Pictures of him share the place of honour everywhere with Lenin. His photograph leaps at one from buildings in Moscow, illuminated at night like theatre advertisements. Worship of him is Byzantine. Obviously he could stop the public expression of adulation very easily. He does not do so. One reason may be his shrewd Orientalism; the flattery, the pictures, are a good political weapon; he knows the Russians understand a master. Or perhaps he likes them.

Private Life

He lives, as is well known, in the Kremlin when he is in Moscow. The Kremlin is not a building but a compound, a walled fortress, containing forty or fifty buildings, churches, barracks, gardens. Stalin lives in three rooms. He does not, however, as is generally believed, work in the Kremlin. The legend that Stalin, a virtual prisoner, stays always within Kremlin walls, is nonsensical. He does much of his daily work outside the Kremlin, in the building of the central committee of the party, on Staraya Ploshad, in the busiest part of Moscow.

¹ Duranty says that Stalin made him change a phrase in their draft interview 'inheritor of the mangle of Lenin', to 'faithful servant of Lenin'. A dictator Stalin certainly is, but not a flaming egoist.

Also he spends much time in the country, at his datcha, or country villa. This is about an hour from Moscow, in the region of Usova-Arkangelskaya, near the Moskva river. The house belonged to a former millionaire, a gold miner and merchant, who had a persecution complex, and therefore surrounded the ten-acre estate with a heavy wall. Stalin has not torn down the wall.

The region of the datcha is, indeed, heavily guarded, and so is the Moscow road leading to it. Stalin usually drives there in three cars, Packards, going very fast; he sits as a rule with the chauffeur, and the position of his car in the procession is changed daily. Picknickers and sightseers in the vicinity are told politely to move on.

Yet Stalin is not as conspicuously guarded as Hitler or Mussolini. He exposes himself much more than they do. He has several times been seen returning to the Kremlin from the Opera on foot, walking with friends through the crowded square. And at least twice a year, on May 1 and November 7, the two great Soviet holidays, Stalin stands on the tomb of Lenin and literally several million people pass him at a range of about thirty yards.

He cares nothing for pomp or ceremony. He does not wear a uniform, but a dark olive-green jacket buttoned at the neck, riding-breeches, and boots. When he goes out, he wears a cap with a visor. Not an official uniform, this costume has nevertheless been widely imitated throughout most of Russia; the high people in the party, all the sycophants and flatterers, have faithfully copied it, and wear it as a proof of devotion to the chief.

Stalin's usual routine is to work hard for about a week or longer, then go to the datcha for two or three days to rest. He has few relaxations; but he likes opera and ballet, and attends the Bolshoi Theatre often; sometimes a movie catches his fancy, and he saw Chapayev, a film of the civil wars, four times. He reads a great deal, and plays chess occasionally. He smokes incessantly, and always a pipe; the gossip in Moscow is that he likes Edgeworth tobacco, but is a little hesitant to smoke publicly this non-Soviet product. At dinner he keeps his pipe lit next to his plate, puffs between courses. He is fond of alcohol, especially brandy, and holds his liquor well.

His attitude to sex is quite normal and healthy. He has married twice. He is rather naïve, apparently. One evening, dropping in to see his friend Karl Radek, he noted on the table a German pseudo-scientific picture-book cloaking pornography as science. Stalin turned the pages idly, saw one of the 'position' illustrations. He turned to his friend: 'Tell me, Radek: do people really do this sort of thing?'

Records of his first wife are lost in the mists of pre-revolutionary days. She died of pneumonia in 1917. In those days love was more or less an instrument of the class war; the old Bolsheviki paid little attention to the forms of marriage. By this first wife, Stalin had a son, now about twenty-five. He has not turned out too well. He did badly at technical school – the rumour has it that he spent most of his time playing billiards with a classmate, the son of Menzhinsky, late head of the G.P.U. – and Stalin, annoyed, packed him off to work in a factory at Tiflis.

In 1919 Stalin dropped in to see an old revolutionary friend in Leningrad, Sergei Alliluiev (the name means Hallelujah), a locksmith. He met his daughter, a seventeen-year-old girl Nadyezhda (Nadya), and married her. By her he had two children, a boy Vassily, now fourteen, and a girl, Svetlana, nine. Mrs. Stalin entered the Promakademia, or school for industrial arts, in 1929, studying the manufacture of artificial silk. There was no publicity attached to this; she worked like anyone else, and even battled her way into the ordinary street-cars, instead of using a Kremlin Packard. Her ambition was to become head of the rayon trust.

On November 8, 1932, in sudden and seemingly mysterious circumstances, Nadyezhda Alliluiev Stalin died suddenly. She had been seen, apparently in normal health, at the Opera only a few days before. The news of her death was announced without elaboration, and she was buried (not, curiously enough, cremated) in the churchyard of the Convent of New Virgins.

Reports were quick to spread that she tasted all food prepared for Stalin and had been poisoned. But the facts seem to be that she had been having acute intestinal pains for several days, and had neglected them. She did not wish to trouble her husband with what she thought was a minor ailment. Probably she was somewhat afraid of him. . . . She sought to hide her pain, keep the tough spirit of the Bolsheviki. The ailment was appendicitis, and by the time she admitted she was ill, it was too late, and she died of peritonitis.

Stalin's relation to his younger children is quite paternal, but he has taken pains that in school they are treated exactly as other children. He has never visited the school, which is one of three model schools in Russia; it is called School No. 25, and is on Pimenovsky Street, just off Tverskaya. The boy had seven fairs, five goods, on his last report-card; no very goods or excellents. His best subject was literature.

Money, Attitudes, Friends

Stalin's salary is about 1,000 roubles per month, the equivalent of which, outside Russia in 1936, was about £6 15s. He is completely uninterested in money. Like all the Soviet leaders he is a poor man; no breath of financial scandal has ever touched any of them. Salaries of communists are adjusted by category, this system having replaced the former rule whereby no man in the party could earn more than 225 roubles per month. There is no upward limit; the average is 600. No communist may accept a salary for more than one post, no matter how many he holds; and no member of the party is allowed to retain royalties from books.

On the other hand, Stalin could, like the Czars, eat off gold plate if he so wished. There is no wealth in all of Russia that he could not have, if he wanted it. He lives modestly, but his datcha is the Soviet equivalent of the country home of an American millionaire. He has servants, motor-cars, books.

His attitude toward conventional religion is purely negative. His religion, like that of all the dictators, is his work; communism is enough faith for him. Stalin has said, "The party cannot be neutral toward religion, because religion is something opposite to science." Nevertheless, it is noteworthy that he permitted his wife an almost orthodox religious burial. He is the only dictator who may be said thoroughly to have read the Bible; he did so, of course, in his seminary days.

He has few friends. Voroshilov and Kaganovitch are the two closest. He is on thee-and-thou footing with old colleagues in the party, but it is hard to address him intimately because there is no ordinary diminutive for Yosif, his Christian name. People who know him well call him 'Yosif Visarionovitch'; others simply say Tovarish (Comrade) Stalin. He has no title. Secretaries or interpreters show no fear of him. They are excited, perhaps, if they have never seen him before, but not afraid. There is no grovelling around Stalin. And he can stand criticism.

He seldom sees outsiders. William C. Bullitt, the American Ambassador, dined with him once. Until Bullitt arrived in Moscow, Stalin had never received a foreign diplomat; even Lord Chilston, the British Ambassador, had not met him until Anthony Eden's visit in the spring of 1935. Retiring, uncommunicative, in eighteen years he has seen only seven journalists – two Germans, two Japanese, three Americans – for formal interviews.

He 'received' Bullitt in typical and indirect fashion. Voroshilov had arranged a dinner-party, and Stalin simply dropped in. He was cheery and cordial, toasted everybody around the table, talked with great intelligence and knowledge of America, and relaxed, smoking his pipe, while the commissars sat at piano, singing songs almost like brothers in a fraternity.

Lately Stalin has given evidence that he may come out of his shell. He visited the new Metro unannounced; he spoke over the radio recently for the first time; he has even kissed babies – final concession to popularity – in the Culture Park. When he received Eden, Laval, and Beneš in the spring and summer of 1935, he jointly signed the communiqués with Molotov.

This may be partly explained by his growing popularity. He is not loved, as Lenin was loved, but as the revolution grows more successful, as the standard of living rises, even rigid non-communists are being won over. The new subway in Moscow brought forth many half-unwilling grunts of approval from the population; the attitude was, 'Guess the fellow has something to him after all.'

Also, Stalin has taken a new tack lately, as defender of the people's rights, the champion of men as men – even non-party men. In May 1935, he denounced the 'heartless bureaucracy' and said that 'first of all we must learn to value people, to value cadres, to value every worker capable of benefiting our common cause. It is time to realise that of all the valuable capital the world possesses, the most value and decisive is people.'

As a symbol of the former contempt for men, which he deplored, Stalin told this little story:

'I recall an incident in Siberia, where I was at one time in exile. It was in the spring, at the time of the spring floods. About thirty men went to the river to pull out timber which had been carried away by the vast, swollen river. Towards evening they returned to the village, but with one comrade missing. When asked where the thirtieth man was, they unconcernedly replied that the thirtieth man had "remained there". To my question, "How do you mean, remained there?" they replied with the same unconcern, "Why ask – drowned, of course." And thereupon one of them began to hurry away, saying, "I have got to go and water the mare." When I reproached them for having more concern for animals than for men, one of them, amid the general approval of the rest, said, "Why should we be concerned about men? We can always make men. But a mare – just try and make a mare."'

But this concession to humanity comes very late, after terrible struggles, terrible sacrifices. If Stalin can relax now and search for human values, well and good. But his historical mission was quite different. Stalin is the man who took over the Russian revolution and made it work. Human values temporarily collapsed. He is the creator of the 'iron age', the genius of the Five-Year Plan, the man who, by industrialising Russia, made socialism possible in a single state.

CHAPTER XXXVI

MEN AROUND STALIN

'Among the masses of the people, we (the communists) are but drops in the ocean and we will be able to govern only when we properly express that which the people appreciate. Without this the communist party will not lead the proletariat, the proletariat will not take the lead of the masses, and the whole machine will fall to pieces.'

— LENIN.

'The mills of our revolution grind well.'

— STALIN.

YOU may not know the names of the men in this chapter, these men around Stalin. They are not morphiniacs, hysterics, thugs, adventurers for personal power, cynics, or neurotic misfits. But Kaganovitch is as important to Russia as Goering is to Germany; Molotov, Zhdanov, Chubar, Mikoyan, Voroshilov, are as noteworthy in their way as Goebbels, Himmler, Frick, or Hess. They have no genius for personal publicity. Their personalities hardly exist. They are servants of the state, able and disinterested; they exist only for their jobs, and they do their jobs extremely well.

Many of these men — who rule one-sixth the land surface of the globe — were workmen with their hands, manual labourers, fifteen or twenty years ago. Of the ten present members of the Politburo, four never went to school at all; not one has a university education. This may account, incidentally, for much of the subsidiary confusion in Russian business affairs — the red tape, bureaucracy, lack of technique, lack of facility. Even so, a neutral diplomat in Moscow, in a position to know, told me that he thought the members of the Politburo were personally as able as any governing body in the world.

The lives of most of Stalin's men follow a similar pattern. They were workmen who turned revolutionary, and all but the youngest of them have a history, like Stalin, of underground political activity.

The most important fact in their lives was the date when they entered the communist party; as a rule, their hierarchical position depends on this. Several have been in prison, and their prison sentences are proud badges of distinction.

'Their penal servitude is not a stigma,' wrote a well-informed anonymous commentator,¹ 'but a token of their new nobility. They are proud of their criminal record as the emblem of their new aristocracy. Yet the leaders of the Bolshevist régime are "good" men in the most ominous meaning of that word. They are fanatics with a single track mind. . . . The comparison with the early Church militant and the Jesuit order is irresistible. The Bolsheviks are latter-day saints and crusaders, but of a material not a spiritual world, and they are the most thorough-going reformers and moralists in history – in their own way. Some of them drink, some have mistresses, but their morality is of another kind. They are the first autocratic rulers in history who do not use their power for personal profit. They do not graft; those who do get shot. They have no castles, no titles, no purple robes; they live in a couple of rooms on a standard below that of an American bricklayer; they are pledged to personal poverty and service.'

Of course, careerism may become a career in itself; abolish property as a social motive, and a substitute immediately arises – power. The highest public reward a communist may receive is having a town or – more often – a factory named for him.² But power is dear to all men, even Bolsheviks. Instead of wealth, communists are apt to measure ambition in terms of jobs, power.

Out of the Central Committee of the party, numbering seventy-seven members and sixty-eight alternates, the Politburo is chosen, its supreme organ. There are ten regular members of the Politburo, four alternates. They are friends; they have a common background, common aims; and they are the central directorate of the Soviet Union. Technically, Stalin has no more voice than other members.

Members of the Politburo put on a sort of show at every congress of the party. They take the stage and hold a public meeting before the audience of party members. Within the iron circumscription of 'the party line', argument, disagreement, discussion may be very lively. Members of the Politburo interrupt each other vigorously; the audience is entitled to heckle, and often does. The analogy would be for a British cabinet meeting to be held in the House of Commons, with backbenchers entitled to join free and vehement discussion.

¹ In Not to be Repeated, New York 1932.

² cf. Kaganovitch Ball-Bearing Plant, near Moscow; Molotov Automobile Factory, in Gorki (formerly Nizhni-Novgorod).

The Politburo is not, however, the cabinet. A Politburo member may also be a cabinet member. But most cabinet ministers have not reached the dizzy height of Politburo membership. Cabinet ministers are government officials; Politburo members are party officials. Cabinet ministers in the Soviet Union have purely administrative functions, with no voice in the general sphere of political policy and management, unless they are members of the Politburo too.

Trotsky, Zinoviev, Kamenev, Bukharin, were all members of the Politburo – once. But these flaming names have crumbled into party dust. The age of the intellectuals is over, the age of brilliant but doctrinaire visionaries. The men whom Stalin wants are technicians, organisers, men of practical action.

Two Politburo men are Georgians (Stalin and Ordzhonikidze); one, Mikoyan, is an Armenian; one Kaganovitch, is a Jew; one alternate member (Rudzutak) is a Lett; the others are Russian, of various breeds. It is frequently alleged that Russia is run by Jews. Nothing could be further from the truth. All the Jews except Kaganovitch (a comparative new-comer) are out: Trotsky (whose real name was Bronstein), Zinoviev (Apfelbaum), and Kamenev (Rosenfeld). Litvinov is a Jew, but he is not a member of the Politburo.

The Politburo is assembled with great care and skill, so that its members form a sort of interlocking net over Soviet activity. No neater system of ramifying authority has ever been devised. This was part of Stalin's slow, laborious effort to get all the threads in his own hands. Every member of the Politburo is a member of the Central Executive Committee of the U.S.S.R. Suppose we go through the Politburo man by man, and see how it is 'packed'.

First there is Molotov. He is president of the council of people's commissars, in other words prime minister. Thus the functions of the cabinet are focused from the Politburo. He is also president of STO, the Council of Labour and Defence, probably the most powerful official government organ in the U.S.S.R.

Next there is Kalinin. He is the president of the central executive committee of the R.S.F.S.R. (Russia proper) and senior president of the central executive committee of the U.S.S.R. – thus the top dignitary of the country. He carries to the Politburo the outward symbol of government.

Next – my order is arbitrary – is Voroshilov, the minister of war. He brings to the Politburo the Red Army. Ordzhonikidze, another member is commissar of heavy industry, which likewise fits neatly in the Politburo fold. Mikoyan is food commissar. Kaganovitch is boss of transportation. Chubar, forecast as Molotov's eventual successor, is vice-president of both the cabinet and STO.

Kossior, another member, is predominantly a party man, and a very important one, because he is the boss of the Ukraine. Zhdanov, an alternate, is party boss in Leningrad, in succession to Kirov, who was murdered. Another alternate, Eikhe, is boss of East Siberia. And Andreyev, another party man (though for a time he was commissar of railways) is, like Stalin, a secretary of the party, and – if necessary! – can bring the machine itself into line.

Attention to this list shows two strange omissions. No man from the G.P.U. (secret police) is in the Politburo, and no man representative of the field of foreign affairs. Another point is the comparative youth of all the members except Kalinin, who is sixty. Kaganovitch is forty-two, Voroshilov fifty-four, Molotov forty-five, Chubar forty-four, Andreyev and Mikoyan only forty. The average age is 46.7.¹ It is far and away the youngest group of men of such illimitable power in the world.

White Hope of the Jews

Toward the end of 1935 the greatest shortage in the Soviet Union was not of bread, or houses, or newsprint, or textile fabrics – but of railway tickets. A British diplomat I know was stranded in the Crimea and unable to return to Moscow for some days, simply because he could not buy transportation on the trains. The reason was that Lazar Moiseyevitch Kaganovitch had been appointed by Stalin to reform the Soviet railway system, expedite essential shipments of grain and freight. Kaganovitch did the job with his accustomed thoroughness. Passengers may have to wait, but daily freight loadings increased thirty-one per cent, from fifty-six thousand in February to seventy-four thousand at the end of August.

The railways were in such a mess because the rolling stock was antiquated, trackage – over such enormous distances – was insufficient, and the personnel slovenly. In 1934 there were sixty-two thousand 'mishaps', some of them serious wrecks, on the Soviet railway system. Engineers and switchmen convicted of carelessness were shot. This was no remedy – it simply made the survivors nervous and caused more wrecks – and Kaganovitch stopped it.

It is quite a habit of Stalin to give Kaganovitch all the hardest jobs. He was appointed head of the Moscow Soviet and also chief of the party organisation in Moscow to clear this most important of Tammany Halls of Trotskyists: his Moscow machine became the strongest in the Soviet Union. He built the Moscow Subway, no mean feat. And it was he who was charged by Stalin with enforcing the grain collections in the tragic autumn of 1932; he took city workers and Red Army men out into the fields, seized every pood of wheat the government could claim.

¹ Compare average age of the British cabinet, which is 55.5.

Kaganovitch is black-haired, black-moustached, tall and powerful in physique, somewhat melodramatic in facial features. He is the best orator in the Soviet Union, and he inherits something of Trotsky's magnetism. He is the only member of the Politburo the report of whose speeches are punctuated with the remarks 'Laughter', or 'Loud Laughter'.

He has, indeed, a considerable gift for pungent comedy. His speech to the last party congress was devoted largely to an attack on faulty management, bureaucracy, inefficiency. He mentioned that the People's Commissariat of Agriculture had twenty-nine boards and two hundred and two sectors. (A voice: 'Oh! Oh!') Kaganovitch went on, 'That's nothing. Each sector manages the whole of the U.S.S.R.' (Laughter.)

He made great play by describing two officials in a rope factory, one named Neoslabny (the word in Russian means 'indefatigable'), the other Prelestnikov ('charming'). One was in charge of the knot-tying department, the other of the knot-untying department. As one tied knots, the other untied them (laughter). . . . And he mentioned a government department known as the Sector for the Supervision of Fulfilment of Decisions, which took five months to perform a job it should have done in five days. The initials of this department form the Russian equivalent of the word S.L.E.E.P. Kaganovitch mentioned this, and brought the house down.

'The plan for the Red Dawn Knitted Goods Mills,' said Kaganovitch, 'was examined in five different commissariats and boards, and also in forty-six sectors. The mills received nineteen different sets of instructions every one of which contradicted all the others. The plans were altered over and over again. The result was that the factory worked without any plan. The plan for 1933 was finally endorsed on January 4, 1934. The plan for 1933 was only one year and four days late.' (Laughter.)

He is merciless in flaying inefficiency. On one occasion he caustically described an order for 'haberdashery' which included dog-collars – and enough dog-collars ‘to clothe all the dogs in the region in collars from head to foot’ – and a shipment of tons of lamp burners without lamp glasses, lamp glasses without lamp burners.

Kaganovitch: ‘And so the red tape is spun out.’

Stalin (interrupting): ‘And then the document is put in the files.’

‘The Central Committee, the members of the Politburo, the leader of our party, Comrade Stalin, do not criticise in order that after the congress things may remain as they were before,’ Kaganovitch concluded. ‘Either you really manage to mobilise the apparatus in order to fulfil the task set by the party, or the party will do it over your head.’

The details of Kaganovitch’s life are interesting in that they so typically represent the careers of many younger communists. He was born in the Ukraine in 1893, and had only two years of elementary school, then went to work for a living, first as an ordinary factory labourer, then as an apprentice saddler. He entered the party in 1911, and fought through the civil wars. He held party posts in Samara, Nizhni-Novgorod, and Turkestan, and in 1922 attracted Stalin’s attention, to become chief of the party organisation in the Ukraine. Stalin brought him to Moscow in 1928.

When he became commissar for ways of communication (the official name of the railways job) he had to give up his presidency of the Moscow Soviet. But he has plenty of other positions. He is a member of the Politburo of the party, of the organisation bureau, and of the central committee. He is on the presidium of the Central Executive Committee of the U.S.S.R. and of the R.S.F.S.R. And he is an executive of the Red Trade Unions, and of STO, the council for labour and defence.

His sister is – or was – a close friend of Stalin’s, not an unimportant point.

Boss of the Red Army

Kleminti Efremovich Voroshilov, the chief military man of the Soviet Union, is minister of war. He was born of a workman’s family, like Kaganovitch, and he went to work in a mine at the age of six. He never went to school. Talk of self-made men! Born in 1881, he joined the party as early as 1903, and thus ranks among the veterans. As a boy he was arrested for refusing to take off his hat to a Czarist officer. Then he began his career as an active revolutionary; in the revolution of 1905 he was chairman of the soviet of workers deputies in Lugansk.

He lived, like Stalin, half underground till 1917. Then he organised the first red detachments in the civil wars in the Ukraine. He became commander first of the fifth Ukrainian Army, then of the tenth, and in 1919 was appointed leader of cavalry for the whole Soviet Union. In 1924-1925 he was commander of the Moscow military district. He was on Stalin's side, not Trotsky's, and when the war commissarship became vacant, Stalin saw that Voroshilov got it. His country house is in the neighbourhood of Stalin's, and the two are very close friends.

Voroshilov is the most popular leader in the Soviet Union. He is not ambitious, not a politician, and his personality is pleasing. He is blond, short in the waist, and looks almost like a cherub. He is not an intriguer, not a wirepuller; no fanatic, no intellectual; an idealist; the most personable of the commissars.

When Trotsky, mounted in the Red Square, reviewed troops, the crowd cried 'What a man!' When Voroshilov does it, they cry, 'What a horse!' So the joke goes. But in fact Voroshilov is very popular in the army. He is not a notably strict disciplinarian, but his men respect him because he allows no cliques or favouritism; he is the guardian of fair play. Also, he is a crack shot, and his sharpshooters like to think that their chief is as good as they are.

He is too easy-going to be very quick-witted. At the last party congress he rambled on, speaking of difficulties in transport. 'Which difficulties are greater,' he asked, 'the subjective or the objective? Undoubtedly the subjective ones are greater. In what do they consist? In disorganisation and in the absence of elementary discipline. I don't know if I am revealing secrets. . . .' (Laughter and applause.)

Quick as a bee, Kaganovitch, on the platform, caught this break. He interrupted: 'Even if you did reveal something, we would not have the right to forbid revelations at the party congress. . . .'

Voroshilov may be slow in speech, but he has all the jargon pat. He calls the kulaks working at forced labour the 'army of heroic canal diggers'.

His main difficulty as the man responsible for the defence of the Soviet Union is transport. Thus it is a good thing that he works on terms of the greatest cordiality and intimacy with Kaganovitch, though they might easily be rivals. Backwardness in transportation is one of the reasons for the abnormal size of the Soviet army, 940,000 men - the largest standing army in the world. It is really two armies, one in the east (Manchuria), one in the west, on the Polish border. Both armies are necessary, because in the event of war the immense distances in Russia and Siberia, plus inefficiency and inadequacy of the railway system, would make the transfer of even one division from front to front a long, laborious process.

The Red Army is one of the ablest in the world. It is strong in man power, full of gusto and spirit, well equipped, well led. It is more highly mechanised than any army in Europe. In 1929 its average mechanised horsepower per man was 2.6; in 1930, 3.7, and in 1933-7.74. This figure beats those of France, Great Britain, and, it is believed, Germany. Moreover, according to Voroshilov, seventy per cent of Red Army personnel are 'technicians'.

The Other Incomparable Max

'When Litvinov comes here, Roosevelt must stand firm on one point. We cannot recognise Soviet Russia until it acknowledges and repudiates its debts in the good, sound, capitalist way.'

- (HOWARD BRUBAKER - before American recognition of the U.S.S.R.)

This unpluckable burr in the flesh of western Europe, this man who had the temerity to go to a disarmament conference and really suggest disarmament, has become such a stable citizen in the past few years - so portly, so well-groomed, so worldly-wise and diplomatically substantial - that one is apt to forget his origins and early years. Maxim Maximovitch Litvinov has not always been known as Maxim Maximovitch Litvinov. At one time or other he owned the following noms de révolution - Papasha; Felike, David Mordecai Finkelstein; Litvinov Harrison; Luvinye; M. G. Harrison; Gustav Graf. And his real name is Moysheev Vallakh.

Litvinov, the cleverest foreign minister alive, was born in 1876 in Bialystok, then in Russia, now part of Poland. He came of a bourgeois Jewish family and received a regular high school education. He was drafted into the Czarist army - a little known fact - and served five years as a common soldier. His army experience turned him into a revolutionary, and in 1901 he was arrested and sentenced to exile in Siberia. As slippery physically then as he is diplomatically now, he escaped while en route to prison and fled to Switzerland. He met Lenin, and in 1903 joined the party.

For a considerable interval his life was, like that of Stalin, compact of revolutionary adventure, lucky escapes, long and patient hours of research and preparation, political conspiracy, wile and counterwile, and enough colourful episode to fill a movie. He returned illegally to Russia and after the collapse of the 1905 revolution was entrusted with shipping contraband arms to a secret depot on the island of Nargan, near Reval.

1906 he spent more tranquilly editing the legal newspaper New Life in St. Petersburg. In 1907 adventure called again; he was the agent sent abroad by the revolutionary party to market the notes and bonds Stalin had procured for the movement in the bank raid at Tiflis. Litvinov got to Paris with the revolutionary booty, disposed of it, and later was expelled from France. He returned to Russia briefly. Then he went to London and lived in exile, close to Lenin, for almost ten years.

His life was brilliantly dual. By day he was a publisher's clerk, seemingly absorbed in the highly bourgeois routine of reading manuscript, correcting proof, making out accounts; by night a philosopher, a revolutionary, amongst the émigrés. He earned his living first in the publishing house, then as a purchasing agent for – of all things – a German electrical and munitions firm, the Siemens-Schuckert Company. So came his bread and butter. The food of his soul came from Lenin.

Immediately the Bolshevik revolution occurred in 1917 Litvinov was appointed the plenipotentiary representative of the Soviets in Great Britain. But in August 1918 he was arrested and imprisoned as hostage for Bruce Lockhart, the British Agent whom the Bolsheviks had jailed in Moscow. Lockhart was presently released, and Litvinov returned to the U.S.S.R., becoming a member of the collegium of the Narkomindel (foreign office). He was assistant commissar under Chicherin till 1930, since then commissar.

Litvinov's years from 1918 to 1935 were packed with incessant travel, incessant negotiation. The record of his trips and treaties is prodigious. In 1918 he visited Stockholm, in 1919 Reval, in 1920 Copenhagen, in 1921 Reval again, arranging shrewd post-War settlements. He went to Genoa and the Hague in 1922, as member of Soviet delegations, and also made the agreement with the American Relief Commission. In 1925 he concluded commercial treaties with Germany and Norway; in 1926 he began his annual explosive visits to the disarmament pourparlers at Geneva, and provoked the successive amusement, indignation, rage, and finally respect of the western powers. He went to Washington in 1933 to negotiate recognition between America and the U.S.S.R.; and in 1934 he saw Soviet Russia into the League of Nations.

Litvinov is fat. He speaks English with a heavy accent. His chief quality is an inveterate stubbornness in argument, which arises from his unvaryingly consistent point of view, plus an elasticity and sense of style in negotiation that few statesmen in Europe can equal. More and more, he is sought on Geneva commissions for all sorts of business, because his stubborn and wary intelligence¹ makes him useful in every kind of tangle.

In 1915, while he was in exile in London, Litvinov married the celebrated Ivy, niece of Sir Sidney Low. She is the first lady of the Soviets, hostess at the official receptions which Litvinov gives as foreign minister. It is not an asset to him that his wife is an Englishwoman. She caused a minor tempest when, some years ago, she wrote for a Berlin newspaper a feuilleton describing with admiration some of the pleasant things about Berlin—the wide clean streets, bright shop-windows, and so forth. The Bolshevik Press in Moscow saw it and stormed at Litvinov for harbouring a little bourgeois in the home.

Their family life is happy, if record of the telephone conversation he had with her from Washington to Moscow is any indication. Let those who believe that Bolsheviks eat babies for breakfast listen in:

L. Hello.

Ivy. Hello, darling. I can hear you beautifully

L. Speak slowly, will you?

Ivy. Where are you?

L. In the White House. . . . President Roosevelt asked me to give you his regards.

Ivy. Thank you very much, regards to him. . . . Mischa would like to say a word to you.

L. Mischa is with you? Hello, Mischa. How are your studies?

Mischa. Very nice. How are you, papa?

L. What kind of weather are you having?

Ivy. Beautiful, clear snow. . . . How is everything in the delegation — all well?

L. Yes.

Ivy. When shall we see you? . . .

L. Love and kisses. Good-bye.

Litvinov is not as important inside Russia as out. He is regarded as a technician, almost as an engineer; a man whose knowledge of foreign affairs and skill and experience in negotiation make him indispensable as a specialist. He is not, as I have mentioned, a member of the Politburo. In fact, he did not even become a member of the Central Committee of the communist party till the eighteenth party congress, in February 1934. There are seventy-one members to this committee. So, from the strict hierarchical point of view, Litvinov was, until last year, not one of the seventy-one men who really rule Soviet Russia. On the other hand, on his sixtieth birthday in July 1936 he was awarded the Order of Lenin – the supreme Soviet decoration.

¹ Example of his realism and wit: In private conversation during the Locarno crisis in London, deploring the failure of sanctions against Italy as a deterrent towards Germany, he said: 'We thought we were rehearsing for a play, but if there isn't going to be a play why rehearse?'

Females of the Species

Ivy Litvinov is rather untypical of Soviet women, because she has no job herself. Stalin's wife worked. So do several other important men's wives, and many women, quite in their own right, have established successful careers. In no country in Europe is it so easy for a woman of intelligence and character to make good outside the home.

The wives of Rosengoltz (head of the foreign trade commissariat), Bubnov (minister of education in the R.S.F.S.R.), and Krylenko (minister of justice) have jobs. Madame Bubnov is a saleswoman in a Torgsin store, i.e. shop where goods are sold for foreign currency. The wife of Kalinin, president of the U.S.S.R., is manager of a state farm near Novosibirsk. Molotov's wife, Pauline Semyonova Zhemchuzhna, is head of the Soviet trust which manufactures powder, rouge, lipstick.

Naziezda Kroupskaya, Lenin's widow, lives and works in the Kremlin still; she is assistant commissar of education in the R.S.F.S.R. Madame V. N. Yakovleva is minister of finance in the R.S.F.S.R. – one of the most important and strenuous jobs in the world to be held by a woman. Pelegeya Yakovlevna Voronova, a party member since 1917 and a former textile worker, is assistant commissar for light industry for the U.S.S.R. A veteran Bolshevik, Klavdiya Ivanovna Nikolaeva, formerly a workwoman in a factory, member of the party since 1909, is chief of division of propaganda and mass work of the central committee of the party. Madame Alexandra Kollontay is Soviet minister to Sweden.

As a rule leading Bolsheviks do not, except among intimates, go out with their wives; for that matter, they seldom entertain or receive formal entertainment themselves. Women do not participate in social activity unless by reason of their own merit of position. No outsider can recall ever having seen Kaganovitch's wife, or Voroshilov's. No one pays attention. The matter of marriage is not of sufficient importance to be inserted in the party Who's Who.

Kalinin

Michael Ivanovitch Kalinin, born in 1875 in the province of Tver, son of a peasant, was sent off to work for his living at the age of sixteen, as a stable boy and second footman on the near-by estate of a wealthy aristocrat. He migrated to St. Petersburg, became a factory workman there. He joined the party in 1898. To-day he is chairman of the All-Union Central Executive Committee, and thus 'President of Russia'.

His titular importance is greater than his actual power. Yet his influence, particularly on Stalin personally, is apt to be underestimated; his opinion carries weight, especially in matters concerning the peasants. Kalinin, a peasant himself, who still wears peasant clothes, is an authority on agrarian life, and the peasants trust him. It is Kalinin who, as formal head of the Soviet Union, receives diplomats when they present themselves at the Kremlin.

Kalinin announced Lenin's death. Duranty's description of his speech and the emotion it evoked should be imperishable.

Molotov

When I was first in Moscow in 1928, Molotov had recently become a member of the Politburo, and scarcely anyone knew his name. He was predominantly a party man, 'Stalin's shadow', and his function in the Politburo seemed to be to watch party affairs. One by one the giants of those days, Rykov and Bukharin and Tomsky, were dismissed; and in the twinkling of a shadow, it seemed, the inconspicuous Molotov had become chairman of the council of people's commissars, the job he still holds—prime minister.

Rykov, his predecessor as premier, was the single leading Bolshevik with a university education; and Molotov never went even to grammar school. Bukharin¹ was a dazzling theoretician orator, writer of polemics; and Molotov, as Lenin called him, was 'the best filing clerk in the Soviet Union'. But Stalin knew the kind of man he wanted. He liked Molotov for several reasons. For one thing, he had like Stalin himself stuck it out inside Russia during the long underground period, never once having retreated to easy exile.

¹ Rykov and Bukharin have been reinstated to important jobs, but they have not been readmitted to the Politburo. Rykov is a cabinet minister; Bukharin is editor of Izvestia.

'Molotov' is a pseudonym, like Stalin; it means 'hammer'. His real name is Vlacheslav V. Skriabin. He was born in 1890 of a workers family, and entered the party in 1906. In February 1917 he was chairman of the Bolshevik faction of the Petrograd soviet. From that time on he has had the full confidence of Stalin. It is quite likely that he might take precedence over Kaganovitch or Voroshilov if Stalin died, and so – behind his back – people called him 'the Czarevitch'.

He has a fine forehead, and looks and acts like a French professor of medicine – orderly, precise, a bit pedantic. His importance is sometimes not appreciated; he is by no means a mere figurehead, but a man of first-rate intelligence and influence. Molotov is a vegetarian and a teetotaller. Stalin gives him much of the dirty work to do.¹ He had the nasty job of admitting how many cattle and hogs were killed by the peasants before the famine.

Other Leaders of the Soviets

Grigori (Sergo) Konstantinovitch Ordzhonikidze is a Georgian, close to Stalin, and commissar of heavy industry. He was born in 1886, and educated in the primary schools of Tiflis; he joined the party in 1903. His department bore the brunt of the industrial end of the Five-Year Plan; for that reason, perhaps, it housed more jealousy and bureaucracy than other ministries; it suffered from lack of experts, a shortage in personnel. Next to Voroshilov, he is the most personable of Stalin's men. On one of his Siberian imprisonments, he met and married an Eskimo woman, and still lives with her. He and Voroshilov are very close friends. He is a good organiser, and has held an unusual number of important jobs: commissar of labour and peasant inspection, vice-president of the cabinet, president of the supreme council of national economy, chairman of the control commission of the party.²

Quite a different type of personality and career is represented by Karl Bernardovitch Radek, the best known Soviet writer on foreign affairs. He was dismissed from the party in 1925 for Trotskyism, and only readmitted in 1930. He is not a member of the Politburo; nevertheless his influence in his field is considerable – Stalin, for instance, consults him often on foreign issues. Radek is a Pole, born in Lvov, Galicia, in 1885, who began party activity

¹ As Hitler, for instance, made Hess give the first apologia for the events of June 30.

² Ordzhonikidze died suddenly in February 1937.

in 1901. After the usual vicissitudes in Russia he settled in Berlin in 1907 and with Rosa Luxembourg founded the left wing of the German social democratic party. He laboured for international communism in Switzerland, Berlin, and Stockholm. His reputation as a brilliant polemicist and journalist is world-wide.

Most of the other leaders follow the same pattern. Poverty in youth; self-education; manual labour; revolutionary activity; punishment before 1917 and success thereafter, plus murderously hard work and untiring, unfaltering devotion, obsession to the cause. Any of a dozen men deserve detailed mention – but their careers vary only in detail. Let us give a line to one or two.

A. A. Andreyev, youthful and energetic, is a Politburo member and also one of the secretaries of the party; he is only forty. He has been on the central committee of the party since 1922. His father is a janitor; he had only two years of schooling. Andrei Sergeievitch Bubnov was the man who organised the work of education in the Red Army, so that it is now only one per cent illiterate. V. V. Chubar, once a mechanic, a party member since 1907, is vice-president of the cabinet. Robert Indrikhovitch Eikhe has been a farm hand, ship's stoker, miner, and locksmith – and is now an alternate in the Politburo. Anastasi Ivanovitch Mikoyan, an Armenian, member of the Politburo and people's commissar for the food industry, was the son of a Tiflis labourer. Russia is a workman's state, and workmen make it work.

And look at Y. E. Rudzutak, son of a peasant worker in Latvia, once a full member of the Politburo, now an alternate, and still very close to Stalin, he was a mechanic in a tool factory. P. P. Postyshev, an alternate in the Politburo and a party member since 1904, is an electrician by trade. Stanislav Kossior, the boss of the Ukraine, was a manual labourer. Andrei Alexandrovitch Zhdanov, in the party since 1915, new head of the Leningrad organisation, was born in 1896, son of a school-teacher; latterly he has been spoken of as Stalin's eventual successor. Finally one should mention V. I. Mezhlauk, former president of the state planning commission, the man behind the Five-Year Plans, and one of his first assistants, V. V. Osinski, a brilliant economist and organiser. They are not yet in the Politburo, but Mezhlauk especially – an attractive personality – is one of the most important men in Russia. In 1937 Mezhlauk became Commissar of Heavy Industry.

The Gay-Pay-Oo

A vast lot of nonsense has been written about the G.P.U. Of course, terror played a considerable role in the evolution of the U.S.S.R., and the Gay-Pay-Oo, the secret police, was the instrument of terror. Stalin himself has defined its function in no uncertain terms:

'The G.P.U. is the punitive organ of the Soviet government: it is more or less similar to the Committee of Public Safety which existed during the great French revolution. It punishes primarily spies, plotters, terrorists, bandits, speculators, forgers. It is something in the nature of a military political tribunal set up for the purpose of protecting the interests of the revolution from attacks on the part of counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie and their agents.'

— Leninism, I. p. 419.

Note well that the G.P.U. has powers, not merely to arrest, but, as Stalin admits, to punish. It is judge, jury, executioner, all in one. And, as Fischer says, it possessed rights and prerogatives within itself like no other Soviet body, and sometimes used them to excess.

But, on the other hand, the G.P.U. is not exclusively a political police. One hears mostly stories of its melodramatic activities. It is much more, however, than a force that engages in espionage and shoots traitors. The G.P.U. numbers about two hundred thousand picked men, and is in a sense a superior cadre of the Red Army; it guards frontiers, patrols railways, and the like. Probably not five per cent of the entire organisation is utilised in secret service.

The terror in Russia is an agent of social aims, as the Bolsheviks put it. Better to kill a few people—even if by chance they are innocent—than risk a counter-revolution in which many thousands may die, and which might kill the Soviet experiment. There is a big streak of the Oriental in Russians, with a concomitant Oriental contempt for the value of individual life. Moreover, one should not forget that the Bolsheviks drew a terrible lesson from the Paris Commune, when thirty thousand communards were executed by the reaction.

Provided you were not, in the pre-1932 days, a kulak, or to-day an obvious counter-revolutionary, the G.P.U. will pay little attention to you. In many cases, communists are more afraid of the G.P.U. than non-communists. The G.P.U. watches comrades within the party, checking their every thought and gesture, more closely than the ordinary law-abiding citizen outside the party. But if you are a member of a 'condemned class' – you are out of luck.

The first leader of the G.P.U. was a friend of Lenin's named Dzhherzhinsky, a Pole of enormous ability and fanaticism. He was a policeman-mystic, one of the most extraordinary characters of modern times. He died, to be succeeded by a more commonplace man, Menzhinsky. When Menzhinsky in turn died, his place was taken by G. G. Yagoda, a careerist and wire-puller, corrupt and unscrupulous, whom Stalin got rid of in 1937. His successor, Yezhov, is one of Stalin's closest associates.

The G.P.U. became a bit of a nuisance to the Kremlin during the Yagoda period. It stupidly arrested foreign engineers, and shocked foreign public opinion by wanton slaughter of Russian professors and intellectuals accused of 'sabotage'. It failed to un-cloak for many years the activities of a remarkable spy named Konar, a Polish agent who succeeded in becoming Soviet Assistant Commissar of Agriculture. Stalin decided to curtail the powers of the G.P.U. On July 10, 1934, it was reorganised with considerably restricted authority; the name G.P.U. disappeared; it was no longer allowed to impose the death penalty without trial; and its title was changed to 'Commissariat of Home Affairs'.

Six months later, on December 1, 1934, Stalin's best friend Sergei Mironovich Kirov, member of the Politburo and boss of Leningrad was shot and killed by a communist assassin – the first assassination or attempted assassination of a Bolshevik notability since Fanny Kaplan's shooting of Lenin in 1918. This gave the G.P.U. chance to reassert itself – unpleasantly.

Stalin heard the news and took the first train to Leningrad, Voroshilov accompanying him. Panic struck Moscow. The Soviet Union had a bad attack of nerves. Kirov's assassin, it was discovered, was not a 'White', but a communist himself, a young man named Leonid Nikolaiev. The heads of the G.P.U. in Leningrad were jailed for negligence. Nikolaiev was questioned, tried, and with thirteen alleged accomplices, shot.

The reason for Kirov's assassination was a confused mélange of personal and political forces. Nikolaiev had been dismissed from the communist party in one of its periodic purges, then, after a brief stay in the wilderness, reinstated. He was a theorist, a radical, and apparently he had objected with some heat to the growing development of 'socialist inequality'. Besides he had personal difficulties with Kirov, who, it seemed, did not keep a promise to get him a better job.

Kirov was an extraordinary person. He was an orphan. The legend is that he was suckled by a sow. He was born in 1886, brought up in an orphan asylum; he joined the party in 1904, and after the revolution became one of Stalin's first henchmen; he was entrusted with the clean-up of Zinovievists in Leningrad, as Kaganovitch swept the Trotskyists out of Moscow. He was harsh, vital, impressive, cunning, uncouth, bold – a great leader of men; and his death removed a powerful figure from the party.

The G.P.U. resumed its usual capers after Kirov's death. It was the 'Commissariat of Home Affairs' in name, but the good old G.P.U. in spirit still. One hundred and three persons were summarily executed, as well as the thirteen said to have been Nikolaiev's accomplices. It was not pretended that the hundred and three had anything whatever to do with the Kirov case. They were, however, not innocent men and women picked off the streets, as was alleged. All were in prison at the time Kirov was shot; all were accused of some crime or other, from conspiracy to assassinate Stalin to espionage on behalf of foreign powers; all had been convicted of some offence.

Stalin then dissolved the Society of Old Bolsheviks, an organisation founded by Lenin's friends in 1922 and including only the party fathers, those with more than eighteen solid years in the revolutionary movement. These Old Bolsheviks, 'radicals', were a nuisance to Stalin. The Kirov murder was a perfect pretext for wiping up old scores. On a quite different level, Stalin followed the technique of Hitler after June 30; he made use of an artificial panic in the country to undertake Draconian steps for which otherwise he had small excuse.

Then came the arrest of the veteran dissident-communists Zinoviev and Kamenev, charged with complicity in the Kirov plot.

Succession

Kirov was the man being trained by Stalin as his successor. He is dead; and the succession would now seem to be between Kaganovitch, Voroshilov, and Molotov. Neither is a satisfactory candidate: Kaganovitch is a Jew, Voroshilov is too limited in interests, Molotov not big enough a personality.

If Stalin should die, the party, not one man, would take over. Personal rivalries, like those that followed the death of Lenin, are perfectly possible, but it is extremely unlikely that they could disrupt the régime. Discipline is strict, and the party is unanimous within itself on major issues. There is no obvious candidate for power in Russia, like Goering in Germany, simply because no man in the U.S.S.R. can be unduly prominent if he is conspicuously ambitious. The party is the great leveller. The Soviet State could hardly be more affected by the death of Stalin than it was by the death of Lenin. The régime will carry on.

THE RUSSIAN TRIALS

IN August 1936 a series of treason trials began in the U.S.S.R. that perplexed and indeed stupefied the western world. Old Bolsheviks like Zinoviev and Kamenev were tried and shot; so were important vice-commissars like Pyatakov and generals like Tukhachevsky, who was considered the second military man in the Soviet Union. Incredibly sensational details were alleged: that Trotsky was negotiating with Hitler, that such well-known leaders as Radek and Sokolnikov plotted the overthrow of the Stalinist government, that generals who had devoted their lives to the Red Army sold out to Germany and Japan. The plotters found guilty were given short shrift. It seemed that friends of the Soviet Union were confronted with two alternatives equally unpleasant, that (a), the opposition to Stalin was much more serious than anyone had believed, reaching in fact the very heart of the army and the state, or (b), Stalin was a ruthless murderer getting rid of Trotskyist or other opponents by means of the most monstrous frame-up of modern times.

Let us dismiss at outset some of the fairy-tales. Stalin, some whisperers had it, was mortally ill, and was extirpating the last remnants of opposition while he was still alive; according to other 'reports' he had suddenly gone 'insane'. Such patent nonsense was easily rebutted. It was said that the prisoners were tortured, hypnotised, drugged (in order to make them give false confessions) and – a choice detail – impersonated by actors of the Moscow Art theatre! But the trials occurred immediately the preliminary investigations were concluded, and they took place before hundreds of witnesses, many of them experienced correspondents, in open court. The prisoners testified that they were well-treated during the investigation. Radek, indeed, says that it was he who tortured the prosecutor, by refusing to confess month after month. Pressure there certainly was, in the manner of police investigation all over the world, but no evidence of torture.

The trials, the Trotskyists assert, were a colossal frame-up. The prisoners were induced to confess, they say, on a promise of immunity and a pardon after the trial – if they talked freely – and then double-crossed and shot. This is hardly conceivable from a close reading of the testimony. It certainly could not have occurred in the second trial, when the defendants must have known that the first batch, despite their confessions, were sentenced to death and duly executed.

Stalin, one should remember, is no fool. He could not have wanted those trials. He had nothing to gain from them beyond the object forced on him – elimination of treason. As interpreted abroad the trials were a disaster to his prestige and a serious encumbrance to his foreign policy. They weakened Russia just when Russia needed to be strong.

Any defendant in either of the first two trials, if he were being unjustly accused or the victim of a frame-up, could have shouted out his story in open court. There were dozens of journalists to hear. The defendants knew they were doomed. If innocent, they could have made a fight of it.

An important point to keep in mind is the peculiarity of Russian legal procedure. It differs drastically from ours, and resembles to some extent the French system, where the real ‘trial’ is the preliminary investigation; the final court session does not so much determine guilt as decide what penalty shall be attached to the guilty. In Russia, a prisoner is not brought to what we call a ‘trial’ until he has confessed. Within the circumscriptions of Russian procedure the trials were perfectly fair. The defendants had the right of legal defence; they had the privilege of cross-examining witnesses; they talked with the greatest vivacity and freedom. The attitude of the court was severe but not coercive. The closing speech of the prosecutor, A. Y. Vyshinsky, was violent enough, but during the testimony he treated the defendants with reasonable consideration. For instance:

Vyshinsky: Accused Pyatakov, perhaps you are tired.

Pyatakov: No, I can go on.

The President: I propose to adjourn at three o’clock.

Vyshinsky: I do not object, but perhaps it is tiring for the accused?

Pyatakov: How much longer?

The President: Fifty minutes.

Vyshinsky then resumes the questioning.

The confessions, in both the first and second trials, bewildered observers because it seemed literally inconceivable (a) that men like Sokolnikov, Smirnov, Radek, Serebryakov, and so on could possibly be traitors, and (b) that they should have so meekly gone to conviction without a struggle. Point (a) we shall come to later on. As to point (b), the defendants did struggle. It lasted during all the preliminary examination. The British jurist and M.P. Denis Pritt has pointed out how Zinoviev and Kamenev gave way only grudgingly, little by little over more than a year, finally giving up and confessing only when presented with incontrovertible evidence. Radek held out two and a half months. Muralov, an old Trotskyist, held out eight months. Radek says of him, 'I was convinced he would rather perish in prison than say a single word.'

The impression held widely abroad that the defendants all told the same story, that they were abject and grovelling, that they behaved like sheep in the executioner's pen, isn't quite correct. They argued stubbornly with the prosecutor; in the main they told only what they were forced to tell; they disagreed often with one another. Boguslavsky describes his 'horror and disgust' at Radek. Muralov contradicts another defendant. There is nothing faintly abject in Radek's last plea, or Muralov's.

No fair-minded person can read the verbatim report of the second trial and still believe the confessions could have been fabricated. No artifice, no ingenuity, could erect any such 579 closely knit pages on a series of false confessions. As Malcolm Cowley says, the trial could be accepted as a fake 'only on the assumption that Marlowe and Webster had a hand in staging it'. The details fit together like a brightly coloured and complicated mosaic; they make an architecture as solid as a bridge. A thorough reading of the testimony leads irresistibly to one conclusion, remarkable as it may seem: that the defendants confessed for one reason only, that they were guilty.¹

The first trial, with the old Bolsheviks Zinoviev, Kamenev, and Smirnov as the chief defendants, opened on August 19, 1936. It was heard by the military collegium of the supreme court, with V. V. Ulrich as the presiding judge and Vyshinsky as prosecutor. The defendants were accused of forming a terrorist 'Centre' in Leningrad, instigated by Trotsky and devoted to counter-revolution and conspiracy against the U.S.S.R., of planning the assassination of Stalin and other leaders, and actively conniving the murder of Kirov. All sixteen defendants were found guilty and executed.

¹ By confession, too, they may have hoped to get lighter sentences.

The high point of this trial was the examination of Zinoviev:

Vyshinsky: When was the united centre organised?

Zinoviev: In the summer of 1932.

Vyshinsky: What were its activities?

Zinoviev: Its main activities consisted of making preparations for terrorist acts.

Vyshinsky: Against whom?

Zinoviev: Against the leaders.

Vyshinsky: That is, against Comrades Stalin, Voroshilov, and Kaganovitch? Was it your centre that organised the assassination of Comrade Kirov? Was the assassination of Sergei Mironovitch Kirov organised by your centre, or by some other organisation?

Zinoviev: Yes, by our centre.

Vyshinsky: In that centre there were you, Kamenev, Smirnov, Mrachkovsky and Ter-Vaganyan?

Zinoviev: Yes.

Vyshinsky: So you all organised the assassination of Kirov?

Zinoviev: Yes.

Vyshinsky: So you all assassinated Comrade Kirov?

Zinoviev: Yes.

Vyshinsky: Sit down.

This trial, not the second one, provoked the most furious of the Trotskyist 'frame-up' charges. It seemed odd, for one thing, that the 'centre' was organised in 1932, whereas Kirov was murdered in December 1934 and the trial took place only in 1936. Zinoviev and Kamenev were arrested after the murder and sentenced to exile, then brought back, arrested again, and tried again. And the testimony – of which no verbatim record exists in English – indicated some remarkable contradictions. For instance Smirnov was apparently in jail in 1933, during which time he was supposed to have been plotting with the 'centre'; there seems to be considerable confusion about the false Honduras passport of another defendant; another, Holtzman, testified that he met Sedov, Trotsky's son, in the Hotel Bristol in Copenhagen in 1932, when in fact no hotel by this name existed in Copenhagen. Sedov asserts that he was never in Copenhagen in his life.

The second trial, much more convincing, and of which a full record exists in various languages, occurred January 23–30, 1937, before the same court and the same prosecutor. The defendants, seventeen in all, included Y. L. Piatakov, the assistant commissar of heavy industry; Gregory Sokolnikov, the assistant commissar of foreign affairs; Y. A. Livshitz, the assistant commissar of railways; such well-known old-line Bolsheviks (and Trotskyites) as Muralov and Serebryakov, and of course Radek. Thirteen of the seventeen were sentenced to death and shot; Sokolnikov and Radek got ten years – Radek literally talked himself out of the death penalty in an inordinately fascinating last plea; two dupes, Arnold (an unbelievable character, a sort of cross between the Four Marx Brothers and the people in Gorki's Lower Depths) and Stroilov, got lesser sentences.

The indictment was a good deal broader than that of the first trial. The defendants were accused of sabotage and wrecking, of selling information of military importance to Japan and Germany, of plots to murder Molotov and other members of the government, and of conspiracy with Germany and Japan whereby, if the plotters usurped power in the Soviet Union, the Ukraine was to be surrendered to Germany and the Maritime Province to Japan, presumably as a price for non-interference while Stalin was being overthrown. Nothing more sensational or – at first sight – incredible could be imagined.

As unfolded inexorably in the testimony, the story begins when Pyatakov, a known Trotskyist who had spent long periods in opposition and exile, secretly saw Sedov, Trotsky's son, in Berlin in 1931. Sedov sounded Pyatakov out; Pyatakov returned to Russia and cautiously, with infinite slowness and secrecy, communicated with Radek, Sokolnikov, and the others. Gradually a 'parallel' or 'reserve' centre – first of conspiracy, then of terrorism – was formed, to back up the Zinoviev group and carry on if the Zinovievites were exposed and crushed.

Vyshinsky tried hard to find out how the alleged conspirators disclosed themselves to one another:

Vyshinsky: What gave Rataichak reasons for disclosing himself to you?

Pyatakov: Two persons had spoken to me. . . .

Vyshinsky: Did he disclose himself to you, or did you disclose yourself to him?

Pyatakov: Disclosure may be mutual.

Vyshinsky: Did you disclose yourself first?

Pyatakov: Who first, he or I – the hen or the egg – I don't know.

He tried hard to pin Radek down, to make Radek too disclose more fully the inter-relations of the group.

Vyshinsky: These actions of yours were deliberate?

Radek: Apart from sleeping, I have never in my life committed any undeliberate actions.

Vyshinsky: And this, unfortunately, was not a dream?

Radek: Unfortunately it was not a dream.

Some of the conspirators seem desperately unhappy at their own role in the plot, as it tightens and develops. For instance Sokolnikov:

'Just imagine. I am conducting official negotiations at the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs. The conversation draws to a close. The interpreters have left the room. The official representative of a certain foreign state, Mr. —, suddenly turned to me and asked: Am I informed about the proposals Trotsky has made to his government. . . . How does Trotsky visualise that? How can I, as Assistant People's Commissar, conduct such negotiations? This is an absolutely impossible situation.'

Trotsky, according to the testimony, was the heart and soul of the conspiracy. He sent letters to Radek, concealed in books or shoes; one of the intermediaries was the journalist Vladimir Romm, formerly Izvestia correspondent in Washington, who says he met Trotsky in Paris. Pyatakov, unless he was lying, took a secret aeroplane trip from Berlin to Oslo, and there saw Trotsky, in December 1935. Trotsky, questioned by the John Dewey commission in Mexico, denied flatly either that he met Romm or saw Pyatakov. Trotsky was not in Paris at all when Romm was there, he insists. It is a question of taking the word of one against the other. But it is illuminating to note that in his testimony Trotsky says it is sometimes necessary in modern society for politicians to tell something less than the complete truth. 'Everybody from time to time is obliged not to say the truth,' he confesses.

Pyatakov revealed—according to his testimony—how, among other things, the Trotskyist movement outside Russia was financed. For instance; in his official capacity as assistant commissar of heavy industry, Pyatakov (incidentally Lenin in his will called Pyatakov one of the ablest men in Soviet Russia), gave orders for machinery to German firms and promised to pay more than the normal price; the difference went to the Trotskyists, through Sedov and other agents. But Pyatakov says the plot was not engineered 'purely for the sake of Trotsky's beautiful eyes'.

Trotsky's close connection with German Fascists is constantly alleged. It seems beyond belief, but half a dozen times in the testimony Hitler's first aid, Rudolf Hess, is named as the German negotiator. The court was extremely careful to keep mention of compromising diplomatic details from the public sessions. Time and again the defendants were rebuked for mentioning foreigners' names.

Radek: I informed him (Sokolnikov) of the directives and asked about the specific fact regarding —.' (Name cut from the record.)

The President: Accused Radek, are you trying to provoke us?

Radek: I am not trying to provoke you; this will not occur again.

Vyshinsky: Such behaviour on the part of the accused Radek places me in a very difficult position during the course of the investigation.

The President: Quite so.

Vyshinsky: You are a man sufficiently well-versed in politics to understand that it is forbidden to speak about certain things in Court; this must be accepted as a demand of the law.

Radek: I deeply apologise; this will not occur again.

The President: I consider that if Radek repeats anything of this kind, this question will have to be dealt with in camera.

Radek: I repeat that this will not occur again.

The plot developed although inefficiently. Sabotage did occur. Trains were wrecked, soldiers killed. Details came out in testimony that make the flesh creep; officials of the railways deliberately slowing up car loadings, disrupting freight schedules, stalling trains, (the chief train-wrecker, Knyazev, confessed to getting 15,000 roubles from a Japanese agent); engineers ruining chemical factories by burning out their furnaces and sabotaging work in the mines; one defendant, Shestov, described how he ordered the murder of an honest official who suspected sabotage in the coal industry.

But by the middle of 1935 the conspirators began to lose their enthusiasm. Trotsky himself, according to Radek, saw that they could not bring Stalin down by these means. In the most emotional and moving passages in the trial Radek describes his gradual awareness that he and his colleagues have made a terrible mistake. He debates what to do. It is very difficult for the conspirators to meet; in the whole course of the affair Radek, Pyatakov, and Sokolnikov actually see one another and confer only two or three times. Radek comes finally to a conclusion.

Vyshinsky: What did you decide?

Radek: The first step to take would be to go to the Central Committee of the Party, to make a statement, to name all the persons. This I did not do. It was not I that went to the G.P.U., but the G.P.U. that came for me.

Vyshinsky: An eloquent reply.

Radek: A sad reply.

It would be obtuse to deny or gloss over weaknesses in the testimony. For instance the prosecutor went back to Kirov over and over again, but he could never make Radek or Sokolnikov at least admit they had any connection with the assassination or knowledge of it. Again, it may well be asked why the conspirators, with years to work in, were so inadequate and bungling; aside from sabotage which was after all minor, they accomplished little. The one attempted assassination, that of Molotov, with which they were charged, sounds 'fishy' in the extreme. But the man in charge of it was Arnold, an exceedingly fishy character.

Again, there was very little actual evidence. Prime evidence would have been the letters Trotsky sent to Radek. But Radek says he burned them (as he might prudently do).

Granting that the confessions were genuine, of which there can be little sincere doubt, one may attempt to construct a 'theory' as follows:

1. Every important defendant in the first and second trials was a Zinovievite or a Trotskyist. Radek, Pyatakov, Sokolnikov, Serebryakov, had been Trotskyists for years. Radek joined the Trotsky faction in 1923, went into exile, and only recanted in 1929; he was readmitted to grace in 1930. Their opposition to Stalin was ingrained and inexpugnable; they were Trotskyists to the bone; when they saw things going badly according to their lights, it was perfectly reasonable for them to turn back to their old leader.

2. Moreover, these old revolutionaries, quite apart from the fact that they were Trotskyists and therefore dissidents, were conspirators by nature, conspirators born and bred. From their very earliest days they had breathed the air of plot and counterplot. The day of their eminence passed; Stalin wanted engineers and administrators; they were naturally disgruntled. In a polite state like Russia, one should remember, discontent can be expressed only by conspiracy. And Radek and company were congenitally incapable of giving conspiracy up.

3. The Trotskyists – outside Russia at least – made no effort to conceal their violent hatred of the Stalinist régime. They were far beyond such 'bourgeois' considerations as orthodox patriotism. As Cowley says, Russia wasn't 'their' country any more. They were world revolutionaries, and they no longer regarded the U.S.S.R. as a revolutionary or communist state. They had the same aim as Germany and Japan, to overthrow the Stalinist régime. Stalin was as much an enemy to them as Hitler. And they were willing to co-operate even with Hitler, an obvious ally, for their supreme goal – Stalin's destruction.

4. Radek and the others testified over and over again – the central issue of the trial – that they felt war to be inevitable in 1933 or 1934 and that the Russians would be inevitably defeated. They thought that things were going very badly, and that when the crash came the Soviet Union would not survive it. Therefore, as good world revolutionaries, they deemed it their duty to get to work and perfect an underground organisation that would survive the war, so that revolutionary communism would not altogether perish. Also, if war came, they might themselves have had a chance at getting power in Russia, and therefore an attempt to buy the Germans off, buy the Japanese off, was natural.

5. So much for Radek and his friends inside. As regards Trotsky outside, an anti-Trotskyist could probably add two more considerations: (a) Trotsky was actively eager for a German war against the U.S.S.R., and he hoped that the U.S.S.R. would lose – therefore he sought to weaken it by sabotage; (b) his ambition and his lust for office were such that he was quite willing to give up the Ukraine and the Maritime Provinces as a price for power. One should not forget that Trotsky fought the Czar during the Great War much as he fights Stalin now, that Lenin crossed Germany with German aid in a German sealed train, and that Trotsky signed the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk giving an immense amount of Russian territory to Germany.

6. Finally – and very importantly – it is quite possible that the trials were exploited inside Russia to impress the Russian masses. The government may have exaggerated the crimes of the victims in order to simplify the issue. The overthrow of capitalism in the U.S.S.R., the partition of the country, may possibly have been added to the indictment to give the crimes of the conspirators a final and overwhelming smear of black. Stalin was eager to clean out the Trotskyists once for all, they were conveniently in his hands, and he neglected no factor to make the job as thorough and complete as possible. After all, the aim of Trotsky was to destroy him.

The third trial, that of the generals, was of a different category; proceedings were secret and the testimony has not been published. Announcement simply came on June 11, 1937, that eight high officers of the Red Army, including young Marshal Tukhachevsky, had been arrested, tried for traitorous behaviour, and promptly shot. Among the eight were General Putna, formerly the Russian military attaché in Berlin and London (he was named as a conspirator in the second trial), General Yakir, the commander of the Leningrad military district, General Uborovitch, former commander in White Russia, General Eidemann, the head of Osoaviakhim, and General Feldman, the chief of the personnel division of the general staff. The generals were accused of treasonable relations with Germany and Japan, and the betrayal of the Red Army in the event of war.

This shocked world opinion warmly. It seemed incredible that men like Tukhachevsky, who had devoted the totality of their lives to the defence of the Soviet Union, could be guilty of wantonly planning its defeat. Tukhachevsky, only forty-four, had a brilliant revolutionary and military career; he was one of the great heroes of the Soviet Union. Dissident careerists like Zinoviev and Kamenev, no longer prominent, were one thing; eight young generals including Tukhachevsky and Yakir were quite another. Many friends of Russia, even if unwillingly, accepted the first two trials; they found it difficult to swallow the third.

But investigation, so far as investigation was possible, began to disclose a number of enlightening details. Tukhachevsky, brilliant and ambitious, wanted power for himself; he and Voroshilov were on bad terms, it is said; a general impression in military circles is that Tukhachevsky planned a 'palace' coup d'état to get rid of Stalin and set up a dictatorship himself. Stalin got him first.

All eight of the generals had had close relations at one time with the German Reichswehr. The Red Army and the German Army worked intimately together before 1932, it should be remembered; every year Russian officers went to Germany for training and study; even after Hitler, the two general staffs had a cordial respect for each other. Generals Kork and Feldman, with obviously German names, were Baltic Germans; General Uborovitch attended the German manoeuvres after the Nazi party congress last year; both Kork and Putna had been military attachés in Berlin. Putna's activities were exposed in the second trial.

Few people think that Tukhachevsky could have sold out to Germany, or promised the defeat of his own army in the event of war; but it is quite possible that he envisaged some arrangement with the Reichswehr independently of Stalin. He wanted the Red Army and the German Army to work together; politics prevented this. He was known to be an opponent of the Franco-Soviet pact, and the French distrusted him. One suggestion is that the Reichswehr planned to overthrow Hitler just as Tukhachevsky wanted to overthrow Stalin, the two armies to refrain from interference with each other.

The trials are a remarkable and by no means a pleasant episode. Accompanying them came a witch-hunt, a widespread purge; hundreds of officials, minor and major, were accused of sabotage, tracked down all over the country, and exiled or shot. Prominent and important men, like Marshal Gamarnik, committed suicide. A reign of something near terror came back to Russia. The trials showed very sharply that things were not as tranquil inside the Soviet Union as one had come to believe.

But on the other hand the great bulk and mass of the 170,000,000 people of the U.S.S.R. seemed unimpressed by the trials; the rank and file of the people paid little attention to them. The New York Times correspondent, Harold Denny, brings interesting testimony on this point. After all, most of the defendants were Trotskyists, occupying posts on sufferance and without great influence. The solid party organisation was untouched. For instance, not a single one of those tried – except Radek – is so much as mentioned in the preceding chapter, which I wrote in 1935 and which attempted to sketch the men who really count, who are intimately close to Stalin. Again, it is a pity to lose eight generals, but they were eight out of about four hundred. Stalin showed his impregnability by, among other things, daring to strike against the military. No other dictator has done this. The trials were a misfortune, but it would be wrong to assume that they wounded Russia critically. Stalin must have been shaken, but he easily survived the shock.

EDITOR'S NOTE: – Early in 1938, another series of Russian treason trials captured newspaper headlines and aroused even a greater furore than the previous ones. For among the eighteen condemned to die for plotting the overthrow of the Stalin régime and the dismemberment of the Soviet Union were such prominent figures as G. G. Yagoda, one-time head of the G.P.U., Alexei I. Rykov, ex-premier, Nicolai Bukharin, once a member of the Politburo, former editor of the newspapers Pravda and Izvestia, and leader of the alleged plot.

The deaths of these people increase to forty-seven the number shot after three treason trials within eighteen months. Soviet newspapers indicate that the purge of followers of the executed men will continue.

CHAPTER XXXVIII

'DURANTY'S INFERNO'

'Give me four years to teach the children, and the seed I have sown will never be uprooted.'

— LENIN.

THE things that one most objects to in the Soviet Union are, as a rule, Russian and not communist characteristics—cruelty, slovenliness, crudity in mechanical technique, espionage, red-tape, dirt, backwardness, administrative inefficiency. It is interesting to read Baedeker's Russia, the 1914 edition. You will find that you had to leave your passport with the police in those days too, and that to depart the country you had to have an exit visa. The communists have done their best to eliminate some of the tedious and cumbersome nuisances that have always disfigured some aspects of Russian life. But even the whole weight of the Kremlin cannot, apparently, make the porter of any Moscow hotel efficient—or his telephone. The late Frank Wise, M.P., brought back a pleasant story from one of his Russian trips; he visited the central headquarters of the supreme electricity board of the U.S.S.R. and found the electric bell outside the offices marked 'Not Working'. It is the despair of many communists that Karl Marx had his first try-out in, of all countries, Russia; that Das Kapital had to undergo its first concrete translation into a language as formidably difficult as Russian.

I visited Moscow in the summer of 1935, after seven years away. Stupid bureaucracy delayed my visa. Infuriating collapse of the entire telephone system seemed to attend my every effort to get a number. (But I don't know Russian, and the fault was maybe mine.) The derogations of the preceding paragraph were often in my mind. I saw plenty of crudity, squalor, and confusion. But these were pin-pricks. Moscow was, in 1935 as well as 1928, the most refreshing city on the Continent.

The things I most noticed must have been obvious to any other non-Russian returning after a comparatively long absence. First, the considerable increase in the standard of living. It is still, it goes without saying, low compared to that of any western country—miserably low – but the factor of advance since 1928, despite the intervening rigours of the Five-Year Plan, is impressive. Better clothes on the people; well-stocked shops; the food better and more abundant; automobiles on the streets – even traffic lights! In 1928 an automobile was a rare sight on the streets of Moscow. Since 1928 the Gorki factory has turned out about 100,000 Fords – which run.

Second, one was bound to notice an advance, not merely in the physical appearance of the people but (so far as an outsider could judge) in their morale, their spirit. The Park Culturii was jammed with young men and women, brightly dressed (compared to 1928) and with brighter faces, all of them with eager and in fact tempestuous vitality experimenting in ways of relaxation in this Bolshevik version of Coney Island. Amazing place! When the Russians decide to build an amusement park the flood-gates of the fanatic open wide. The three most popular side-shows were (1) the parachute jump, (2) the tear-gas booth, (3) the rickety wooden dance-hall where good Consomols – members of the youth organisation – spent a rouble each learning 'western' dances like the rumba. And I saw a performance of Carmen, in the open air before twenty thousand people, with eighteen live horses and one dead bull in the cast, that was as completely exhilarating an adventure in rapport between actors and audience as anything I have ever witnessed.

Third, the impression was quite general that the purely revolutionary phase of Soviet activity was slowing down. The revolution is over. The régime is stable. One of my best informed friends said that Soviet Russia had become the dullest country on earth; it was charted, organised, planned out to the last detail, and thus perfectly predictable; it was cut, dried, and bound – a ham in a sack.

Closely associated with this was a fourth point, the gradual emergence of Russia, in the view of Russians, as a national state. Be it remembered that the official name of the country, adopted after the revolution, is still U.S.S.R. – Union of Soviet Socialist Republics – a name with a profoundly centripetal connotation, a label envisaging the permanent possibility of expansion outside Russia, of merger with other states. But more and more the present forces are centrifugal. Russia is being thrown in on herself. The Red Army may be taught to fight – eventually – for the international proletariat, but it is the Soviet State, the Russian Fatherland, which it must first of all defend. 'Patriotism', in the crass sense of the term, hardly existed in the U.S.S.R. ten years ago. It does now. Even the Pravda runs editorials on 'Mother Russia'.

Fifth, no one can fail to appreciate Soviet – or Russian – vitality. Perhaps the most important single point to make about the U.S.S.R. to-day is that it is the only modern dictatorship which has survived a tremendous internal crisis. Neither Mussolini nor Hitler has suffered such a crisis yet. And the Soviet crisis – the resistance of the peasants to industrialisation – was none the less severe in that it was self-inflicted. The Soviets have survived seventeen terrible years. Despite civil wars, despite two major famines, the population has increased by twenty-three million people since 1918, and is increasing now at the rate of almost three million per year. In a generation, in other words, the Soviet Union, in its present borders, will be two hundred million people strong.

Piatiletka

The Five-Year Plan was not a Five-Year Plan at all. This is the 'low-down' on it. I have alluded to the plan several times in these chapters; let us spare a paragraph or two in brief description of the way it works and what it means. The fact is that all economy in Russia is regulated by planning, to infinity and beyond; successive plans, spaced into five-year periods for convenience, are, as Duranty says, part of a single programme, which is continuous.

The Plan was the invention of no single man, though Stalin is fond of pointing out that he suggested an electrification programme to Lenin as far back as 1921; it grew naturally and inevitably out of the nature of the Soviet system; and it was put into effect so gradually that even well-informed correspondents in Russia did not know that the first Plan had begun until it was under way. The theoretician most largely responsible for its origin, as far as any one person can take the credit, was probably Osinski; the practical man of affairs who most decisively executes its workings is Mezhlauk, sometimes called the 'ablest man in the Soviet Union'.

Stalin announced that the first plan was 93.7 per cent successful. He was referring to industrial results, and probably he exaggerated. Even so, it was a tremendous, unprecedented effort; the only thing in the world quite to be compared to it was the expansion of the United States in the frontier period. Industrial output quadrupled in four years, an 'outstanding and unsurpassed achievement'. The production of steel increased forty per cent in four years, of pig iron eighty-four per cent. Tractor, automobile, engineering, aviation, industries were created out of nothing. Entire new cities were built on the Siberian steppes, or in the Urals, like Magnitogorsk, an industrial colossus that will probably become the largest steel plant in Europe. Enough machinery was imported to enable the U.S.S.R. to maintain succeeding five-year plans without any but a small share of foreign aid. Mines were developed – with the not unimportant result that the U.S.S.R. now possesses the third largest gold reserve in the world. Unemployment ceased. All this, too, at a time when the capitalist powers were ravaged by an economic crisis of unprecedented severity and scope.

The Plan had important political results, because it helped to make Russia a strong national state, and as Chamberlin points out, it thrust the Soviet centre of gravity eastward. The object of the Plan was to industrialise a largely agrarian country. Nicely, the greatest mineral deposits were found in regions hitherto almost inaccessible, tucked away in remote parts of Siberia. Here the heart of new Russia throbs – geographically impregnable. This is important from a military point of view.

The costs of the Plan were of course enormous. Tens of millions of people did not have enough to eat; the cruel hungry bottom of subsistence was reached. Human values were utterly replaced by industrial values; when human beings resisted, they were ruthlessly destroyed, as we have seen. In communist jargon, the first Five-Year Plan was a period of 'postponed consumption'. Sacrifice, in other words, had to precede sufficiency. Also, great as was the success of the Plan, it by no means produced enough material to satisfy the people. Domestic production was intensified, but Russia still remains the largest market in the world.

In the second plan, now in progress, the tempo of activity is very much relaxed. The second plan is not so much publicised as the first. Its aim is to complete the collectivisation of agriculture by 1937, and to stress the production of consumers' goods, rather than heavy industrial products, in order to lessen the terrible need in Russia for such items as – to choose at random – nails, decent paper, rope, kitchen-ware, plumbing utensils, scientific and medical supplies, boots, metal-ware. It hopes to double the food supply in the cities and reduce retail prices something like thirty-five per cent. And it may – pray the Soviet lord – contain provision for housing, because the outrageous and appalling condition of housing in Moscow and the bigger cities is a disgrace to the Soviet Union – and honest sovietites admit it.

'I Contradict Myself? Very Well, I Contradict Myself!'

The basis of Soviet economy is production for use, not profit. 'Each man shall work according to his abilities and receive according to his needs.' The communist party considers itself a sort of central organisation with authority over the whole nation to distribute both activity and rewards according to this formula. It mercilessly extracts profits from labourers and peasants – for instance Knickerbocker has calculated that the profit of the government on grain is one thousand per cent – but these profits are all ploughed back into the business. There are no private gains. The interests of the country as a whole, as determined by the communist party, are the only criterion. The communists accept nominal managerial salaries for their labour. These salaries are minuscule. Communists, as a rule, get much less than non-communist technicians whom they hire. The theory is that all fruits of production are pooled for redistribution to the common good. Political democracy is extinct. But economic democracy – theoretically – is complete.

Naturally the operation of this process and modifications to it made necessary by temporary contingencies have produced a considerable number of paradoxes, of contradictions. Ferreting them out is a favourite Moscow indoor sport.

For instance, Soviet citizens may inherit private property – although Soviet law¹ limits the heirs-presumptive to direct descendants of the deceased, or persons in direct connection by marriage or adoption. Disinheritance of minors under eighteen is not allowed. The testator may, if he wishes (it doesn't happen very often) leave his property to the state.

Soviet citizens may, another point not generally known, own property in the form of houses – though under severe restrictions. Small houses in town and also datchas in the country, may be bought (if there are any buyers) and are absolute individual property of the purchaser, but one person may not own more than one house and one datcha. Land may not be owned. The land of the U.S.S.R. is nationalised, the property of the state.

A Soviet citizen may buy the ownership to an apartment in a co-operative house, but he is subject to eviction if – I quote Barnes – he 'commits a crime, indulges in illicit private trade, or becomes a priest or counter-revolutionary'. He may, in certain rare cases, lease land from municipal authorities if he uses it for building purposes.

¹ For the background of this section I am indebted to Mr. Ralph Barnes.

A Soviet citizen may own a library or art collection, if he registers it with the authorities. He may buy an automobile – if he can afford it. He may own a sailing-boat, yacht, or launch. Theoretically, he may own an aeroplane, but in practice it is virtually impossible for a private individual to obtain one.

A Soviet citizen may even hire the services of another. Personal servants – domestics – are allowed. He may, with great risk, go into private business and employ labour (for instance a neighbourhood cobbler may have one assistant) but in such cases his business is so heavily taxed that profits are virtually impossible. A professional man, doctor or lawyer, may have a private practice provided he is not in state service.

There is no limit – in theory – to the salary anyone may receive, nor to the amount of capital anyone may accumulate. There are no opportunities for investment, however, except in state bonds. These bonds pay interest, exactly as do bonds in capitalist countries, and a good rate too – eight per cent. Savings banks are encouraged, and in 1935 no fewer than forty-three million depositors throughout the Soviet Union used them. They pay eight to ten per cent interest.

Above all, sharp differences are possible in earning power. The janitor in Sovkino – the movie company – gets, perhaps, 150 roubles per month; the star may get 15,000. Piece-work exists in factories, in order to encourage production. Artists, literary men, may earn very large sums for Russia, though there is very little they can do with their incomes – in paper roubles – after they get it. A playwright, Vasily V. Shkvarin, author of a bourgeois comedy Another Man's Child, which swept the provinces, earned 200,000 roubles in royalties in 1934. A journalist named Michael Koltzoff, editor of the comic paper Oganok (Little Light) is reputed to earn 30,000 roubles per month. Izvestia, the chief Soviet newspaper, pays 500 roubles each for feuilletons.

One should keep in mind, however, that incomes such as these are still extremely rare. Earning power may vary in the Soviet Union, according to artistic or technical proficiency, but the extremes, as Fischer points out, are very close. No such 'spread' is conceivable in the U.S.S.R. as exists in Britain or America between say, a clerk in a factory and its owner. Among all the one hundred and sixty-five million Russians, there are probably not ten men who earn £5,000 per year.

And two vitally important elements in this issue of 'socialist inequality' should never be forgotten.

1. No man in the Soviet Union has any individual control of the means of production. A man may accumulate and transfer wealth, but not the means of producing wealth.

2. No man in the Soviet Union may exploit labour for private profit. Interest may be paid on bonds, yes, but this interest does not represent private dividends on the use of labour.

These safeguards, as may readily be seen, are so potent that Stalin has no reason to worry from the 'contradictions', which affect only a comparatively small percentage of the population, and which were, in fact, deliberately introduced as a spur to production.

'Stampede to Common Sense'

Perhaps as a result of relaxation from the extreme ardours of the Five-Year Plan, a considerable revaluation of old Soviet value is going on.

The Pravda (shades of Lenin!) has come to print touching editorials about love and motherhood. Divorce is still easy, but a strenuous effort is being made to improve the level of family life. Abortions, formerly encouraged, are now prohibited. Children, once taught to pretend complete independence of their parents, are being encouraged to attitudes of filial duty and devotion. Alimony payments for the support of children of divorced parents are strictly enforced. A new law inflicts imprisonment of one year for desertion of a child, and cases of 'sexual hooliganism' may be strictly punished.

In education, a movement led by Stalin himself (who has insisted on standardised text-books) has restored examinations in schools and universities; teachers and professors are encouraged to enforce discipline, instead of the opposite; degrees like Ph.D. once abolished, are now granted again. It was impossible ten years ago to get a liberal education in the Soviet Union. The whole emphasis was on economics from a strictly Marxist point of view and on natural science. Now history is being taught objectively, geography also, and there is a powerful movement to revive interest in study of the classics. The University of Moscow has courses on Shelley and Keats.

In regard to the arts, too, something of a counter-revolution has taken place. In June 1935, a musical conductor of the extremist type now considered old-fashioned cut two movements from a symphony on the ground that they were 'bourgeois'. He was severely rebuked. Shakespeare had a good season in Moscow in 1935. A company of Bashkirs from Orenburg dazzled Moscow with a performance of Othello. And the Theatre of the Revolution, for the benefit of the Consomols, put on Romeo and Juliet to show the youthful audience what true love should be. The text was not mutilated. But servants of the Montagues and Capulets were made to fraternise in the first act – to illustrate proper proletarian solidarity!

LITVINOV

1935 was, in fact, for Moscow, a giddy year. The G.P.U. arrested its first two theatre-ticket speculators. A fashion designer from New York, Elizabeth Hawes, superintended the first Soviet fashion show. In the Park Kulturi the first Bal Masqué in the history of the Soviet Union was a baroque success. Playthings for children were manufactured without benefit of propaganda. A foreign ambassador played tennis with a Soviet-manufactured racket, and introduced the game of baseball to the Soviet Union. A shop on one of Moscow's main streets, Kuznetzky Most, displayed a gown priced at 1,000 roubles – seven months' pay for a Soviet workman. And more and more the importance of the individual came to be stressed, even in collective work.

What the Boss Thinks

Stalin's own considered definition of the Soviet system is perhaps worth quoting:

'The Soviet economy,' he writes in Leninism (II, p. 307), 'means that:

'1. The power of the capitalist class has been overthrown and has been replaced by the power of the working class.

'2. The tools and means of production, the land, factories, etc., have been taken away from the capitalists and handed over to the working class and to the peasantry.

'3. The development of production is subordinated, not to the principle of competition and the safeguarding of capitalist profit, but to the principle of planned guidance and systematic improvement of the material and cultural level of the toilers.

'4. The distribution of the national income takes place – in the interests of systematically raising the material position of the workers and peasants, and extending socialist production in town and country.

'5. The systematic improvement of the material position of the toilers and the ceaseless growth of their requirements (purchasing power) – guarantees the working class against crises of overproduction, against the growth of unemployment, etc.

‘6. The working class is the master of the country, working not for the capitalists, but for its own class.’

Stalin is very eager to point out that the Russian revolution of 1917 differs from all other revolutions in history in that not a mere transfer of political sovereignty occurred, not the substitution of one party for another, but the replacement of one economic order by an entirely different one on an international, not a national, basis. This, Harold Laski has said, is the ‘seminal’ fact of modern history.

Stalin thinks that a communist society will eventually have the following results:

‘a. There will be no private ownership of the means of production, but social, collective ownership;

‘b. there will be no classes or state, but workers in industry and agriculture managing their economic affairs as a free association of toilers;

‘c. national economy will be organised according to plan, and will be based on the highest technique in both industry and agriculture;

‘d. science and art will enjoy conditions conducive to their highest development;

‘e. the individual, freed from bread and butter cares, and of necessity of cringing to the “powerful of the earth”, will become really free.’

– Stalin On Technology, p. 13.

Stalin considers that the problems of production in both industry and agriculture have been solved. Now facing him are two other issues – distribution and transport.

Democracy

Radicals enamoured blindly of the Soviet cause do it more harm than good by wantonly inaccurate colouring of information. Recently I read an argument, citing figures of the Soviet ‘elections’, designed to show that the U.S.S.R. was more of a democracy than the U.S.A. All the article omitted to mention was (1) the ‘vote’ was not by secret ballot, but by show of hands, (2) it ‘elected’ men to serve on a body which by no conceivable stretch of the imagination could be said to have legislative powers.

But in the summer of 1936, a new and very serious effort toward the evolution of Soviet democracy was made. This was the publication of the new Constitution, scheduled to come in force after a ceremonial sitting of the Congress of Soviets in 1937. The Constitution, a vitally important document, was drawn up by a committee on constitutional reform which was set up in July 1935 and of which Stalin himself was chairman. The ten vice-chairmen comprised a formidable list of Soviet chieftains: Litvinov, Radek, Vyshinsky, Voroshilov, Molotov, Bukharin, Akulov (the chief prosecuting attorney, who by a new arrangement has theoretical powers even over the G.P.U.), Chubar, Zhdanov, Kaganovitch. For a year the committee worked.

The new Constitution provides for creation of two-chamber parliament much like that of the western democracies. The lower house will be elected by universal popular suffrage, the upper house chosen from representatives of the various national minorities. The parliament will pass laws in the regular manner of such bodies, call new elections, and, in general, be the source of the power of the state. This marks a very broad change from the present system, and is proof of absolute confidence by the régime that it is unshakably stable.

Moreover, the rights of citizens are safeguarded in what, for the Soviet Union, is a revolutionary manner. 'The Constitution guarantees paid employment, leisure, and free education to all the inhabitants of the country,' without exception even of kulaks or other 'class enemies'. Civil liberties are emphasised. Citizens are assured of inviolability of person and home (an innovation indeed if it works!) and the powers of the G.P.U. are sharply curtailed. Finally, there are promises of free speech, a free press, and freedom of public assembly. It may take some time, it goes without saying, before these latter provisions are fully applied.

But the new Constitution is a considerable portent. And it should be something of an answer to those liberals who complain that the middle ground of democracy has disappeared between the extremes of Fascism and communism. If the new constitution works, it will no longer be fair to say that communism, in the matter of civil liberties, is 'just as bad' as Fascism. There will be new point to a choice between the two extremes.

It is incorrect, incidentally, to repeat the usual assertion that communists form only two per cent of Russia's population. The proper figure is nearer ten per cent. In estimating the total population, one includes babies, children, women; one should do likewise in numbering the communists. There are only 1,872,488 full adult party members, and 835,298 candidates. But the Consomols, of whom there are about 4,000,000, the Pioneers, about 6,000,000 and the Octobrists, the children, like Mussolini's Wolf-Cubs, of kindergarten and early school age should be included as communists. The general opinion is that the number of party members is bound soon to be widened, as more and more Consomols reach party age.

Associated with the issue of 'democracy' throughout the broad spaces of the Soviet Union is that of exclusive control by Stalin and his men at the top in Moscow. The ruling directorate is small enough to run a terrible risk of losing touch with the country as a whole. No man could say that they have betrayed their guardianship so far; but as the present hierarchy hardens, congeals, into a permanent pyramidal structure, the chance increases of its isolation from the masses. Russia is ruled by a party machine. It may become, as someone put it, a dictatorship not of – but over – the proletariat.

Jokes

A peasant queues up to see Lenin's body in the Red Square mausoleum, comes out again. 'What did you think of him?' a friend asks. Reply: 'He's just like us, dead but not yet buried.'

Another peasant watches the construction of a new short-wave radio station. The technician explains that any voice in the microphone will be heard over the entire world. The peasant pleads to be allowed the supreme thrill of trying it. He asks to be permitted to say just one word – only one. Permission granted. The peasant steps up to the microphone and shouts – 'Help!'

The G.P.U. was 'liberalised'; all agents were instructed to show the greatest courtesy to the common folk. A man in a street-car sneezed. A G.P.U. agent on the platform, peering into the car, snorted angrily, 'Who did that – who was it who sneezed?' Terror in the car. Friends urge the luckless fellow who sneezed to give himself up, confess his sin, in order to save the whole car from arrest. He speaks up, quavering, 'I sneezed.' The G.P.U. man bellowed: 'Gesundheit! Your good health!'

Stalin had lice in his hair. No means, mechanical, medicinal, chemical, could extirpate them. Desperate, Stalin called Radek into consultation. Radek said: 'Simple. Collectivise one louse. The others will run away.'

When the intelligentsia and the old 'technical bureaucracy' were being severely scrutinised and punished the joke ran: 'My wife and I have three sons. One is an engineer. The other is a professor of bacteriology. The third is also in Siberia.'

A horde of rabbits jumped out of the Soviet Union across the Polish border. The Poles expressed surprise and consternation. 'Ah,' the rabbits explained, 'the G.P.U. has issued orders to arrest all giraffes in Russia.' 'But,' remonstrated the Polish customs officers, 'you are not giraffes.' The rabbits replied: 'Yes, but try to prove it to the G.P.U.'

A terrible turmoil was heard outside Stalin's private office. The boss was denouncing someone with a tornado of violent epithets. Fifteen minutes it lasted. The terrified doorman peered within. He looked for the comrade whom Stalin must have been chastising. No one except Stalin was there. 'Where is the man you were denouncing?' timidly inquired the doorman. Stalin replied: 'I have just finished my daily quarter of an hour of self-criticism.'

Foreign Affairs

The foreign policy of the Soviet Union can be expressed in one word – peace. As well as anybody, Karl Radek has elaborated this word into a paragraph:

'The object of the Soviet Government is to save the soil of the first proletarian state from the criminal folly of a new war. To this end the Soviet Union has struggled with the greatest determination and consistency for sixteen years. The defence of peace and of the neutrality of the Soviet Union against all attempts to drag it into the whirlwind of a new world war is the central problem of Soviet foreign policy. The Soviet Union follows the policy of peace because peace is the best condition for building up a socialist society.'

– Foreign Affairs, January 1934.

The Soviet Union has two potential enemies, Japan and Germany, and its concrete policy, severely realistic, is designed to check danger from these countries. The Russians made every kind of concession to appease and mollify the Japanese, for instance the sale of the Chinese Eastern Railway in Manchuria for about one-eighth its value. When pressure from Japan was particularly acute, the Soviets offset it by establishing friendly relations with the United States. When the Japanese danger receded, the U.S.S.R., though eager for friendship with America, and delighted at American recognition, tended to neglect the new rapprochement with Washington, because it was not so pertinently valuable.

The United States, likewise nervous following Japanese inroads into China, found the resumption of Soviet-American relations a political convenience. When, some weeks after recognition, the relations between Japan and Soviet Russia tended consequentially to improve, the Americans in Moscow found themselves greeted less cordially by the Russians. 'The Japanese,' one American put it, 'have let us down.'

On the other front the Soviet Union is faced by the relentless hostility of Germany. Their territories do not adjoin, but Poland, which fills much of the space between them, is – for the time being – a German ally. The Baltic States are similar buffers between the Soviet Union and Germany. Therefore it is of great consequence to the U.S.S.R. to see that these small states, especially Lithuania, retain their independence.

For a long period the policy of the Soviet Union was predicated on friendship with Germany. In Germany the Soviets hoped for communist revolution; Germany, like the U.S.S.R., was practically an outlaw state; the Russians sympathised with Germany's struggle to free herself from the shackles of Versailles; above all, France and Poland – back in the neolithic '20's – were allies, and allies presumably against Germany and the Soviet Union. The four countries stretched across Europe, France-Germany-Poland-Russia, mutual and successive checks against each other.

It was very neat. It was too neat. It did not last. Hitler ended it. From 1933 on, Germany under Hitler became Russia's enemy, mortal and implacable; therefore the Russians had to make a quick and profound bouleversement. A complete and drastic turn-about was essential. This they accomplished with the realism, the finesse, of a Napoleon on a battlefield.

First, the Russians, by surviving the Five-Year Plan, made themselves valuable militarily as allies. Second, by allowing the Communist International to languish forlorn, they achieved a sort of spasmodic respectability. Recognition by the United States, in November 1933, was an important step. Recognition by other last-ditch countries followed. Then Litvinov contrived to bring Russia into the League. There followed the treaties with France and Czechoslovakia. Anthony Eden visited Moscow and shook hands with Stalin. Litvinov declared, 'Peace is indivisible,' and Russian commissars drank the health of George V of England. God Save the King! The job was done.

Russia, the outcast, the pariah, the chief of revisionist powers – certainly the idea of world revolution connoted revisionism! – thus became, in the short space of three years, the newest addition to the countries in the status quo group. Not only this. The treaties signed with Laval of France and Beneš of Czechoslovakia were virtually military treaties. No one knows the terms of the military protocols, but the idea was to surround Germany, as far as possible, with a ring of steel.

If Germany should attack France, would Russia give complete expression to the alliance and invade Germany? Impossible: the frontiers do not adjoin. But this is exactly the importance of Czechoslovakia in the arrangement. Prague could be utilised as a base for Soviet aeroplanes bombing the industrial regions of Saxony and Berlin. If Germany should, through Lithuania or Poland, attack Russia, would France march to the aid of her Russian ally by invading the Rhineland and Ruhr? No one knows. But the Russians hope so. Meantime, a more serious worry is the embryo British flirtation with Germany, which, if it is fulfilled, would be disastrous to Russian policy.

Communists in Britain to some extent, in France more so, were worried and alarmed following the Stalin-Eden-Laval-Beneš conversations. Stalin told French communists to cease attacking French institutions, in fact to support the French army. This meant, for the time being, the collapse of French communism as a militant opposition. Stalin felt that this price was worth paying. The first duty of communists everywhere – according to his reasoning – was to protect themselves from Fascism. Hitler was the greatest of all menaces to communism. The first bulwark of communism was the U.S.S.R. Therefore, French communists had to sacrifice their local position, and their hopes of revolution in France, to insure action by France and the French army against Hitler to protect the Soviet Union.

Because communists the world over felt short-sighted alarm and dismay at these manœuvres, Stalin decided to convoke a congress of the Communist International in Moscow in the summer of 1935. This was the first congress since 1928. It was tossed by Stalin as a sop to world revolution extremists. It did not do much, except appoint Georgi Dimitrov, hero of the Reichstag fire, general secretary – and advise British communists to unite with the bourgeois labour party, and American communists (in order to avoid Fascism) to vote for Roosevelt.

Metternich, Bertrand Russell says, persuaded Alexander I that the principle of legitimacy was more important than Russian national interests. Hitler – indirectly – has persuaded Stalin that Russian national interests are more important than communist internationalism.

One should not, however, assume that Stalin and his men have forsworn the idea of world revolution ultimately. Probably it still lurks deeply in the hinterpart of their minds. The treaties with bourgeois states should not blind one to the fact that world revolution is basic in fundamental Soviet philosophy. Similarly the 'stampede' to common sense should not blind one to the essential socialist nature of the Soviet Government. Russia is not a communist state yet. It is far from having produced a strictly socialist or classless society. The most violent communist could not claim that Lenin's programme in Russia has been fulfilled. But the advance toward socialism has been enormous.

THE END

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

ABOUT two-thirds of this book, I should think, is the result of direct evidence accumulated by my own eyes and ears. For the rest I have a hundred sources to thank. It is difficult to list them. If this book dealt with a dead instead of a living period, I should have had merely to consult documents in the regular manner of research. But I have been dealing with very contemporary figures and the best information to be had about them can be collected only by word of mouth. A book may be written about Napoleon purely from written records. A chapter about Mussolini, it is obvious on the other hand, should be based partly on written records, but also on the evidence of people who know him, have talked to him, and can report their observations first-hand.

In every capital I have written about, friends and acquaintances have generously collaborated by giving me a word-of-mouth treasury of intimate material and ideas. I have winnowed and checked this material as carefully as possible. The friends who helped me may be counted by the score. I cannot mention their names, because many are residents of countries ruled by dictatorship, and it would be invidious to mention some, who might be named freely, and not others. In addition, other friends have carefully read and checked every part of the manuscript.

To these loyal and generous colleagues in twenty countries, salaam!

As to books and documents, I have referred to hundreds – and I must have read several thousand newspaper and magazine clippings on each important country – but I don't want to burden this long manuscript with a formal bibliography. However, the following books have been particularly valuable, some of them in fact indispensable:

Allen, Jay: Spain. Speech before the Chicago Council of Foreign Relations, Chicago 1936.

Anonymous: Recovery Through Revolution, New York 1933.

Anonymous: Not to be Repeated, New York 1932.

Anonymous: Heil! Bristol 1934.

Armstrong, Hamilton Fish: Europe Between Wars? New York 1934.

- Armstrong, H. C.: Grey Wolf, London 1934.
 Baldwin, Stanley: On England, London 1926.
 Bauer, Otto: Austrian Democracy under Fire, Prague 1934.
 Beneš, Eduard: My War Memoirs, London 1928.
 Broad, Lewis and Russel, Leonard: The Way of the Dictators, London 1935.
 Čapek, Karel: President Masaryk Tells His Story, Prague 1934.
 Chamberlin, W. H.: Russia's Iron Age, Boston 1934.
 Childs, Marquis W.: Sweden, the Middle Way, New Haven 1936.
 Cole, G. D. H.: Intelligent Man's Review of Europe To-day, London 1933.
 Crane, John O.: The Little Entente, New York 1931.
 Cripps, Sir S.: Problems of Socialist Transition, London 1934.
 Dalton, Hugh: Practical Socialism for Britain, London 1935.
 Duranty, Walter: Duranty Reports Russia, New York 1934.
 Duranty, Walter: Europe – War or Peace, London 1935.
 Dutt, R. Palme: Fascism and Social Revolution, New York 1934.
 Eden, Anthony: Places in the Sun, London 1926.
 Fischer, Louis: Soviet Journey, New York 1934.
 Fischer, Louis: The War in Spain, New York 1937.
 Finer, Herman: Mussolini's Italy, London 1935.
Fortune, Italian Number (July 1934), New York 1934.
 Fox, Ralph: Portugal Now, London 1936.
 Gedye, G. E. R.: Heirs to the Habsburgs, Bristol 1932.
 Harris, H. Wilson: What the League of Nations Is, London 1925.
 Heiden, Konrad: A History of National Socialism, London 1934.
 Henri, Ernst: Hitler Over Europe, New York 1934.
 Hitler, Adolf: My Struggle, London 1933.
 Horrabin, J. F.: An Atlas of Current Affairs, London 1934.
 Horrabin, J. F.: An Atlas of European History, London 1935.
 Howe, Quincy: World Diary, 1929–1934, New York 1934.
 Jackson, J. H.: The Post-War World, London 1935.
 Jerrold, Douglas: England, Bristol 1935.
 Kaganovitch, L. M.: Various Pamphlets, Moscow 1932–35.
 Keyserling, H.: Europe, New York 1928.
 Knickerbocker, H. R.: Will War Come in Europe? London 1934.
 Krutch, J. W.: Was Europe a Success? New York 1934.
 Landau, Rom: Pilsudski, Hero of Poland, London 1930.
 Laski, H. J.: Communism, London 1927.
 Laski, H. J.: Politics, Philadelphia 1931.
 Lefebure, Victor: Scientific Disarmament, London 1932.
 Livingston, A.: The Peace Ballot, London 1935.
 Ludwig, Emil: Talks with Mussolini, London 1933.
 Madariaga, S. de: Spain, London 1931.
 Markham, R. H.: Meet Bulgaria, Sofia 1932.
 Martin, William: Europe as I see It To-day, New York 1931.
 Masaryk, T. G.: The Making of a State, London 1927.
 Messinger, J.: Death of Dollfuss, London 1935.
 Mirsky, Dmitri: The Intelligentsia of Great Britain, London 1935.
 Morrison, Herbert: Practical Socialism in Great Britain, London 1933.
 Mosley, Oswald: The Greater Britain, London 1934.

- Mowrer, Edgar A.: Germany Puts the Clock Back, New York 1933.
 Mussolini, Benito: My Autobiography, New York 1928.
 Mussolini, Benito: Political and Social Doctrine of Fascism, New York 1935.
 Reed, Douglas: The Burning of the Reichstag, New York 1934.
Report of Court Proceedings, Case of Anti-Soviet Trotskyite Centre, Moscow 1937.
Report of Court Proceedings, Case of Trotskyite-Zinovievite Terrorist Centre, Moscow 1936.
 Rintelen, Capt. von: The Dark Invader, New York 1933.
 Rothery, Agnes: Denmark, Kingdom of Reason, New York 1937.
 Rudlin, W. A.: Growth of Fascism in Great Britain, London 1935.
 Russell, Bertrand: Freedom versus Organisation, 1814-1914, New York 1934.
 Schachtman, Max: Behind the Moscow Trial, New York 1936.
 Schevill, F.: A History of Europe, Chicago 1926.
 Siegfried, A.: France, A Study in Nationality, New Haven 1930.
 Siegfried, A.: England's Crisis, London 1933.
 Simonds, Frank H. and Emeny, Brooks: Price of Peace, London 1935.
 Stalin-Wells: Stalin-Wells Talk, London 1934.
 Stalin and Others: Socialism Victorious, Moscow 1934.
 Stalin, Joseph: Leninism, Moscow 1934.
 Stalin, Molotov and Litvinov: Our Foreign Policy, Moscow 1934.
 Stalin, J.: Various Pamphlets, Moscow 1932-35.
 Steed, Wickham: The Real Stanley Baldwin, London 1932.
 Strachey, John: Menace of Fascism, London 1934.
 Thompson, Dorothy: I Saw Hitler, New York 1932.
 Trevelyan, G. M.: History of England, London 1927.
 Trotsky, Leon: Where is Britain Going? London 1926.
 Trotsky, Leon: History of the Russian Revolution, London 1934.
 Trotsky, Leon: The Revolution Betrayed, New York 1937.
 Various Authors: Great Contemporaries, London 1935.
 Various Authors: What Would be the Character of a New War, London 1933.
 Union of Democratic Control: The Secret International, London 1932.
 Union of Democratic Control: Patriotism, Ltd., London 1933.
 Vergin, Fedor: Subconscious Europe, London 1932.
 'Vigilantes': Inquest on Peace, London 1935.
 Wells, H. G.: Outline of History, London 1932.
 Werth, Alexander: France in Ferment, New York 1934.
 Wheeler-Bennett, J. W.: The Disarmament Deadlock, London 1934.
 White, Freda: War in Spain, A Short Account, London 1937.
 World Committee: Brown Book of the Hitler Terror, London 1933.
 Zimmern, A.: The Third British Empire, London 1926.

As to pamphlets, those of the Foreign Policy Association (New York), and of the Royal Institute of International Affairs (London) were most valuable. Among newspapers, I used most the Manchester Guardian, The Times, the Evening Standard, and the Daily Telegraph. The diary columns of the latter two were very helpful. And my debt to the New Statesman in the English chapters is manifest.

This book has been written fresh and as a whole, and all from a consistent point of view. I had, of course, covered some of the same ground in magazine articles, as well as in dispatches to the Chicago Daily News. Thus I should mention that Vanity Fair gave hospitality to some early views of Madame Lupescu, Mr. Eden, General Goering and others; Foreign Affairs allowed me to discuss in its pages Dr. Dollfuss and the Habsburg problem; the Nation let me say what I thought about Central Europe for many years. Harper's Magazine published some of the material in this book on Spain, the Reichstag Fire trial, and the arms traffic, as well as an essay called 'Policy by Murder'. The chapters on Blum and de Valera appeared in the Strand Magazine. I have also used a few passages from sections I wrote of an anonymous book on Europe, called Not to be Repeated.

I have my newspaper, the Chicago Daily News, to thank for the wide opportunity it has given me the past dozen years to work in almost every country in Europe. The News, with its admirable tradition of foreign news reporting, gave me a free hand from Scandinavia to Palestine, from Moscow to London and back again, and I spent five eventful years in Vienna as Daily News correspondent in Central Europe and the Balkans. Of course the News is not responsible for any sentiments or opinions in this book. Nor, except for an occasional sentence, is there any reproduction of Daily News material. But, for the opportunities they freely gave me, I have the publisher and editors to thank.

Finally, this book would have been impossible to write except for the patient and generous collaboration of my wife.

INDEX

- Abdication Crisis, The, 250-63
 Abereger, 337
 Abyssinia, 95, 97, 137, 149, 194, 199, 206, 214, 215, 216, 218-9, 222-35, 276, 284, 285
 Abyssinia and League of Nations, 226, 448-9, 453
Action Française, 140, 144, 153, 159, 161, 166, 169
 Adamic, Louis, 398
 Adams, Henry, 44
 Adler, Viktor, 316, 356
 Agricultural Policy, German, 89
 Agriculture in Spain, 174
 Aitken, W. M., see Beaverbrook, Lord
 Akulov, 515
 Alba, The Duke of, 174, 176-7
 Albania, 409-12
 Albrecht, Dr., 60
 Aldermann, 60
 Alexander of Jugoslavia, King, 39, 40, 149, 202, 214, 285, 393-400, 402, 403, 405, 406, 413, 415
 Alexander III, Czar, 426
 Alfonso XIII, King, 174-5
 Ali Rasa, 421
 Allen, Jay, 183, 185
 Alliluev, S., 473
 Aloisi, Baron, 203, 210, 228
 Alpine Montangesellschaft, 134, 331, 337
 Alsace-Lorraine, 136
 America and Russia, 517-8
 America and the League of Nations, 446, 447, 452
 Amery, L. S., 302
 Amman, Max, 22
 Andreyev, A. A., 461, 480, 490
 Anglo-French Alliance, Offer of, 276, 287
 Anglo-German Naval Pact, The, 248, 439
 Anglo-German Naval Treaty, 101, 138, 248
Angriff, The, 79, 80
 Annunzio, d', 207, 215, 217, 218
 Anschluss, Effect of, 317
 Aosta, The Duke of, 217
 Araquistáin, Luis, 176
 Aras, Dr. Twefik, 423
Arbeiter Zeitung, 327, 328, 330, 332, 352
 Arif, Colonel, 420
 Armament Firms, Inter-relations of, 132
 Armament Manufacture, International, 134
 Armament, Probable Result of, 452
 Armaments, Profits on, 133
 Armstrong, Hamilton Fish, 451
 Arnold, 499, 502
 Assassination, Psychology of, 399-401
 Astor, Lady, 241, 281, 460
 Atlee, Major, 260, 297, 300
 Austria, 98, 99, 139, 177, 210, 292, 316-77
 Austrian Aristocratic Families, 362-4
 Austrian Civil War (July 1934), 31, 327-9, 335
Austrian Democracy Under Fire, 331
 Authority Complex, 38-40
Avanti, The, 196, 197, 200
 Avenol, Joseph, 449, 450
 Averescu, General, 387
 Ayala, R. P. de, 176
 Azaña, Manuel, 175-7, 178-9, 188, 189
 Baar, Major, 343
 Badoglio, Marshal, 218, 235
 Bakhunin, 188
 Balabanov, Madame A., 195, 196
 Balance of Power, The, 246-7
 Balbo, Italo, 65, 198, 213, 214, 216-8
 Baldwin, Alfred, 269
 Baldwin, Mrs., 253, 260, 273
 Baldwin, Oliver, 273
 Baldwin, Stanley, 233-4, 239, 240, 242, 244, 245, 253-62, 264-77, 282, 285, 301
Balcares (cruiser), 191
 Balearic Islands, The, 185, 191
 Balkan Entente, The, 391, 392, 415, 417
 Balkans, The, 376-7, 403-4
 Benjamin, René, 186
 Banque de France, 122, 125, 127-31, 144, 147, 156, 164, 245
 Barnes, Ralph, 510
 Bartlett, Vernon, 228
 Barthou, Louis, 138, 140, 147, 149, 400
 Bauer, Otto, 326, 329-34
 Bavaria, 17, 29,
 B.B.C., The, 290
 Beaverbrook, Lord, 241, 294
 Beck, Colonel Josef, 154, 248, 425, 427, 429, 431
 Beck, Dr., 63
 Bedi, Alcibiades, 410
 Bela Kun, 364, 365, 404
 Belgium, 93, 94, 95, 139, 441-3
 Beneš, Dr., 202, 362, 372-3, 375, 450, 475, 519
 Bergery, Gaston, 169, 170
 Bernack, 332
 Bernadotte, Marshal, 438
 Bernays, Robert, 279, 302
 Bernhard of Lippe-Biesterfeld, Prince, 444
 Bethlen, Count Stephen, 364, 366
 Bevan, Aneurin, 300
 Bevin, Ernest, 299
 Bianchi, 215
 Bianu, 391
 Bibesco, Princess Elizabeth, 114
 Bibliography, 521-4
 Birchall, F. T., 442

- Birkenhead, Lord, 270, 272, 276
 Birth-rate, French, German, etc., 135
 Black Hand, The, 405-6
 Bloc National, 144
 Blomberg, General von, 44, 67, 72, 74, 90, 91, 92, 96
 Blumel, 119
 Blum, Léon, 113-26, 128, 135, 141, 143, 165, 167, 170-1
 Blum, Mme, 114, 118, 119
 Blum, René, 115
 Bogdanoff, 460
 Boguslavsky, 497
 Bolsheviks, Society of Old, 493
 Bonar Law, 245, 265, 270, 272, 294
 Boncour, Paul-, 143, 154
 Bono, Marshal E. de, 213, 214, 217-8, 219
 Borah, Senator, 371
 Boris of Bulgaria, King, 395, 412-5
 Borrow, George, 178
 Bose, F. von, 63, 65, 103
 Bouisson, 143, 148
 Bradford, The Bishop of, 253-4
 Branting, Hjalmar, 439
 Bratianu, George, 387
 Bratianu, Jon, 379, 380
 Braun, 50
 Braunthal, 333
 Bredow, Von, 64, 65
 Brest-Litovsk, Treaty of, 503
 Briand, 121, 137, 138, 139, 144, 145, 146, 147, 198
 Britain and Portugal, 193
 Britain and Spain, 190-2
 Britain, France and Germany, 95, 246-7
 British Armament Programme, 243
 British Foreign Policy and Germany, 99
 British Imperialism, 230-1
Brown Book, The, 58
 Brubaker, Howard, 55, 376, 484
 Brückner, Lieut., 19, 25, 26, 29, 86, 87
 Brüning, 44, 45, 46, 48, 49, 51, 54, 64, 71, 98, 147
 Bubnov, A. S., 463, 490
 Bukharin, 457, 471, 479, 488, 505, 515
 Bulgaria, 139, 376, 407, 412-5
Bulletin of International News, The, 100, 207, 327
 Bullitt, William C., 474-5
 Bundeskanzleramt, Seizure of the, 340-2
 Buresch, Dr., 320

 Caballero, Francisco Largo, 175, 189, 190
 Cadere, 391
 Caillaux, Joseph, 143, 146, 153-4
 Calmette, Gaston, 153
 Canary Islands, The, 185
Candide, 186
 Canterbury, The Archbishop of, 87, 244, 261,
 262-3
 Čapek, Karel, 371, 372, 373
 Capitalism and Fascism, 210-1
 Capitalism, Hitler and, 111-2
 Carbuccia, H. de, 166

 Carlists, 173
 Carnarvon, Lord, 206
 Carnegie, Mrs. W. H., 267
 Carol of Rumania, King, 262, 378-92, 393, 413
 Cartel des Gauches, 146
 Castiglione, Camillio, 352
 Castillo, Lieutenant, 180
 Catholicism in Germany, 22, 23, 30, 63
 Catholicism in Spain, 173, 175, 179, 181
 Cecil, Lord, 232, 267, 276, 283, 285-6, 454
 C.E.D.A., 179-80
 Centre in France, The, 156
 Chamberlain, Joseph, 264-5
 Chamberlain, A. Neville, 216, 245, 264-77,
 282, 284, 285, 292, 293
 Chamberlain, Mrs. A. Neville, 265, 266
 Chamberlain, Sir A., 227, 247, 264, 265, 272,
 276, 285, 293
 Chamberlin, W. H., 458, 467, 509
 Chautemps, Camille, 126, 143, 144, 159, 160, 161
 Cheron, Henri, 154
 Chesterton, G. K., 252
 Chiappe, Jean, 153, 154, 160-1, 162, 166-7, 169
Chicago Tribune, 183
 Chicherin, 485
 Childs, Marquis, 436
 Chilston, Lord, 475
 Christian of Denmark, King, 437
 Chubar, V. V., 477, 480, 490, 515
 Churchill, Randolph, 243
 Churchill, Winston, 243, 257, 268, 272, 274,
 275, 276, 282, 283, 289, 293-4
 Ciano, Constanzo, 96, 215
 Ciano, Galeazzo, 201, 215, 216, 233
 Citrine, Sir Walter, 299-300
 Citroën, 127
 Clemenceau, 121, 144, 148, 150, 154, 155, 156, 401
 Clichy Riots, The, 165
 Clynes, J. R., 279
 Codreanu, C., 386, 387
 Colc, G. D. H., 238
 Colijn, Dr. Hendrikus, 443-4
 Collective Security, 138, 448
 Comert, Pierre, 450
 Comité des Forges, 129-34, 159
 Commons, English House of, 237, 253
 Communism and Private Property, 510-1
 Communism in England, 300-1
 Communism in France, 122
 Communism in Spain, 189, 191
 Communist Methods in Germany, 82
 Communists in Russia, Number of, 515-6
 Condescu, General, 390
 Confederación Nacional de Trabajo (C.N.T.), 188
 Confédération Générale du Travail (C.G.T.), 169, 170
 Confédération Générale du Travail Unitaire
 (C.G.T.U.), 169
 Constantine of Greece, King, 379, 416
 Constantinescu, 400
 Cortes, The, 176, 189

- Cosgrave, Mr., 305, 306, 312
 Cot, Pierre, 153
 Coty, François, 127, 166
 Council for Labour and Defence (STO), 479, 480, 482
 Cowley, Malcolm, 497, 502
 Credit Anstalt, 292, 317, 318
 Cripps, Sir Stafford, 295, 296, 298-9
 Critchley, General, 243
 Croats and Serbs, 402-3
 Croix de Feu, 125, 162-5
 Cummings, A. J., 297, 299
 Curtius, 317
 Curzon, Lady Cynthia, 303
 Curzon, Lord, 239, 245, 272-3, 303
 Czar of Russia, The, 283, 395, 426, 503
 Czechoslovakia, 98, 137, 139, 322, 362, 367, 368-77, 518, 519

Daily Express, The, 200, 241, 294
Daily Herald, The, 204, 279, 304
Daily Mail, The, 17, 228, 241
Daily Telegraph, The, 25, 234
 Daladier, Edouard, 120, 123, 126, 143, 152-3, 154, 161, 162, 167
 Dalimier, Albert, 154, 160
 Dalton, Hugh, 236, 292, 295
 D'Annunzio, 207, 215, 217, 218
 Danzig, 30, 97, 98, 433
 Danzig Election, 30
 Danube Pact, The, 375-6
 Daranyi, Dr. Kaloman, 366
 Darbley, R., 129
 Darré, R. Walter, 32, 74, 88-9
 Daudet, L., 166
 Davidson, J. C. C., 270
 Dawes Plan, The, 151
 Dawson, Geoffrey, 241, 245, 248
 Dawson of Penn, Lord, 243
Death of Dollfuss, The, 338
 Déat, Marcel, 120, 121, 168
 De Bono, Marshal E., 213, 214, 217-8, 219
 Deflation, German, 45
 De Fontages, Madame, 201
 Degrelle, Léon, 443
 De la Rocque, Casimir, 123, 163-6
 De la Rocque, Pierre, 163
 De la Warr, Earl, 267
 Delbos, Yvon, 120
 Dell, Robert, 146
 De los Rios, Fernando, 175, 177
 Del Sartre, Real, 166
 Del Vayo, Julio A., 176, 189
 De Madariaga, Salvador, 175
 Democracy in France, 143, 178
 Democracy in Russia, 514-5
 Denain, General, 138
 Deniken, 184
 Denmark, 98, 99, 135, 435-41
 Denny, Harold, 505
 Derby, Lord, 245
 De Rivera, Primo, 180
 De Rothschild, A., 129
 De Rothschild, E., 129
 De Unamuno, Miguel, 175, 179
 Deutsch, Julius, 327, 332, 333
Deutschland (battleship), 191
 Deval, Jacques, 24
 Devaluation of the Franc, 125
 De Valera, Eamon, 261, 305-15
 De Valera, Mrs., 307-8
 De Valera, Vivian, 307
 De Vecchi, 213
 De Warnaffe, Vicomte, 442
 De Wendel, François, 120-32, 164
 Dewey Commission, John, 500
 Dictators, 38, 39, 40, 98, 205, 214, 223, 305, 395, 421
 Dietrich, 19
 Diez, 342
 Dimitrescu, Poui, 382
 Dimitrijevitch, Colonel D., 405, 406
 Dimitrov, 58-60, 285, 519
 Djavid Bey, 420
 Djemal, 421
 Dobler, 338
 Dollfuss, Engelbert, 18, 31, 38, 39, 40, 100, 113, 194, 210, 214, 219, 319-25, 326-35, 336-52, 353, 355, 356, 400, 426
 Dollfuss and Mussolini, 324, 325
 Dollfuss and Naziism, 335
 Dollfuss Murder, German Co-operation in, 18, 337, 338
 Dollfuss, Murder of, 336-52
 Domingo, Marcelino, 179
 Dopolavoro Movement, 215
 Dorgères, Henri, 168
 Doriot, Jacques, 168
 Double Cross, The, 363
 Doumergue, Gaston, 128, 130, 138, 143, 144, 151, 155, 158, 168, 170
 Drexler, Anton, 17, 41, 42
 Drummond, Sir E., 203, 449
 Dubarry, 160
 Duca, Jon, 382, 385, 387, 400
 Duchemin, R., 129
 Duff Cooper, A., 244, 267, 287
Duranty Reports Russia, 460
 Duranty, Walter, 457, 460, 461, 464, 471, 488, 508
 Dzherzhinsky, 492
 Dzhugashvili, Ekaterina, 462

 Ebbutt, Norman, 96
 Ebert, 46, 48
 Eckhart, Dietrich, 105
 Economic Position of Germany, 107, 111-2
 Eden, Anthony, 28, 95, 113, 149, 228, 230, 232, 234, 244, 267, 284-5, 286, 287, 447, 450, 475, 518, 519
 Eden, Edward, 284
 Eden, Mrs. Anthony, 284
 Eden, Sir William, 284
 Eden, William Nicholas, 284
 Edge, Walter, 140
 Edward VIII, H.M. King, 246, 250-9, 302
 Eibel, Captain, 343, 344
 Eidemann, General, 504

- Eikhe, Robert I., 480, 490
 Election of 1936, Spanish, 178, 189
 Elections, German, 31
 Elena, Queen, 214
 Elizabeth, H.M. Queen, 252, 262
 Elizabeth, Princess, 262
 Ellenbogen, 196
 Elliot, Walter, 244, 286, 298, 301
 Emanuele III, King, 206, 214
 England, Ruling Classes in, 236-49
 Enver, 421
 Epstein, 76
 Ernst, Karl, 62, 63, 67
 Essad Pasha, 409, 410
 Estonia, 432, 433
 Eugene, Prince, 438
 European Trends, 452, 453
Evening News, The, 216
Evening Standard, The, 283, 294
 Ezhov, 461
- Fabre, Emile, 161
 Falangistas (Fascists), 173
 Faranacci, Roberto, 198, 215
 Farnan, Dr., 308
 Fasci di Combattimento, 197
 Fascism and Labour, 211
 Fascism and the 'Front Populaire', 159-71
 Fascism in Bulgaria, 414
 Fascism in England, 223, 298-9, 302-4
 Fascism in France, 122, 124, 125, 131, 165-6, 169-71
 Fascism in Germany, 183, 197
 Fascism in Spain, 172, 180, 182, 183, 187, 188, 191
 Fascism, Policy of, 197, 198, 207, 210-2
 Fascism, Policy of Italian, 210-2
 Fascism, Rise of, 197-8, 452, 454
 Fascist Party, Secretaries of the Italian, 215
 Fascists, British Union of, 303
 Faupal, General, 182
 Faure, Paul, 134
 February 6 in France, 153, 161-3, 169
 Feder, Gottfried, 17, 41-2
 Federation des Anciens Combattants, 166
 Federación Anarquista Ibera (F.A.I.), 188
 Feldman, General, 504
 Ferdinand, Archduke Franz, 359-60
 Ferdinand of Rumania, King, 379, 380, 386, 389, 413
 Fey, Major Emil, 324, 326, 329, 333, 335, 339, 342-51
 Fiedler, 62
 Financial Crisis of 1931, English, 280
 Financial Crisis of 1935, French, 130
 Financial Policy, French, 127-31
 Financial position, German, 109, 111-2
 Finer, Dr., 196-7, 200, 205-6, 217
 Finland, 432-3, 444
 Fischer, Louis, 178, 460, 491, 506, 511
 Fisher, Sir W., 241
 Five-Year Plan, The, 194, 220, 458, 466, 467, 469, 470, 476, 489, 507-9, 518
- Flandin, Pierre-Etienne, 119, 122, 130, 138, 143, 147, 156-7
 Flanner, Janet, 161, 169, 229
 Floyar-Rajchmann, H., 425
 Foch, Marshal, 135, 157, 163
 Fock, Baroness Karin, 75-6
 Fodor, M. W., 340, 417
 Fontages, Madame de, 201
Foreign Affairs, 438, 517
 Foreign Policy, British, 246-7
 Foreign Policy, French, 140, 149, 150, 171
 Foreign Policy, German, 27, 92-103, 105-6, 293-4
 Foreign Policy, Hungarian, 367
 Foreign Policy, Italian, 224
 Foreign Policy, Jugoslavian, 406-8
 Foreign Policy, Polish, 431
 Foreign Policy, Russian, 517-20
 Foreign Policy, Turkish, 423
 Four-Year Plan (German), 76
 France and Germany, 94, 95, 135-7, 140, 519
 France and League of Nations, 138-9, 150
 France and Russia, 122, 518-9
 France and Spain, 181, 190-2
France in Ferment, 148
 Franco, General F., 173, 178, 180-7, 188, 190-2, 235
 Franco, Ramon, 185
 François-Marsal, 143
 Franco-Soviet Pact, 93, 95, 139, 140, 151, 392, 504
 Franco-Soviet Treaty of Mutual Assistance, 139
 Frank, Dr., 323
 Franz Eher & Co., 22
 Frauenfeld, 336, 337, 351
 Frederick, Crown Prince, 438
 Freemasonry in France, 126, 144, 159, 161
 Freemasonry in Spain, 179, 187
 French Electoral System, 143-4
 French Fear of Germany, 135-7
 French Hitler, The, 163-5
 French Policy, 136-40
 French Psychology, 136, 141
 French Strikes (1936), 123, 124
 'Frente Popular', in Spain, 178, 180, 187, 188
 Frick, Dr. W., 32, 42, 74, 84, 85, 477
 Frick, Friedrich, 104
 Fritsch, Von, 91
 Front Paysan, 168
 'Front Populaire', 113, 122-4, 125, 126, 127, 131, 140, 144, 152, 168, 170-1
 Frot, Eugène, 153, 162, 167
 Führer Prinzip (Leader Principle), 29, 30, 63, 69, 74
 Funder, Dr., 343, 349
- Gallacher, Willie, 300-1
 Gamarnik, Marshal, 505
 Gandhi, 283, 289, 302
 Garrigue, Miss Charlotte, 370
 Garry, 458
 Garvin, J. L., 186, 241, 276, 288
 Gasset, J. O. y, 175
 Gauch, Professor, 82

- Gazetta Polska*, 425
 Gdynia, 433
 Gedyc, G. E. R., 326, 341, 396
 General Strike, Austrian, 328-9
 General Strike of 1926, English, 239-40, 276, 287, 289
 George V, H.M. King, 245-6, 252, 422, 578
 George VI, H.M. King, 102, 216, 252, 258, 262, 269
 George of Greece, King, 244, 416-7
 Georgiev, Vlada, 399-400
 Gerl, Josef, 335
 German and English Relationships, 99
 German Economic Position, 107, 111-2
 German Military Organisation, 66-7
 German Nationalists, 53
 German Participation in Spanish Civil War, 172, 173, 181, 182, 183, 184, 190-2
 German Republic, Causes of downfall, 45-54
 German Steel Trust, 104, 107, 134
 Germany and Austria, 139, 317, 318, 322, 323, 324-5, 337, 351, 357
 Germany and France, 94, 95, 135-7, 140, 519
 Germany and Japan, 95, 96
 Germany and Jugoslavia, 408
 Germany and League of Nations, 27, 30, 90, 99, 103, 137
 Germany and Poland, 106, 431, 432, 433
 Germany and Russia, 97, 296, 502, 503, 504, 517-9
 Germany and Rumania, 392
 Germany and Spain, 172, 173, 181, 182, 183, 184, 190-2
 Germany, and Treaty of Versailles, 16, 27, 65, 84, 90, 98, 248-9, 450-1
 Germany, Future policy towards, 96-9
 Germany's Military Resources, 92
 Gheorgiev, Colonel K., 414-5
 Gibraltar, 180, 181, 191
 Gibson, Miss, 204
 Giolitti, 197, 214, 217
 Giovanna of Savoy, Princess, 412, 413
 Giunta, 215
 Giurati, 215
 Goebbels, Dr., 19, 28, 29, 32, 33, 68, 73, 74, 77, 79-83, 85, 87, 111, 317, 357
 Goebbels, Frau, 21, 79, 81
 Goemboes, Gen. Julius, 362, 363, 365-6, 419
 Goering, 19, 26, 29, 32, 33, 50, 56-8, 59, 65, 66, 68-9, 73-8, 81, 85, 86, 96, 100, 103, 106, 137, 214, 285, 317, 453, 477
 Goering, Frau, 76, 81
 Gollancz, Ltd., Victor, 243
 Gompers, Samuel, 441
 Gorecki, General R., 425
 G.P.U., The, 473, 480, 491-3, 501, 513, 515, 516, 517
 Grand Fascist Council, 211, 213, 215
 Grandi, Dino, 214, 219-20, 227
 Graziani, General, 218
 Great Britain and Abyssinia, 226-30, 285
 Great Britain and Germany, 247-9, 282
 Great Britain and Italy, 224, 233-5
 Great Britain and Spain, 190-2
Great Contemporaries, 287, 421
 Greece, 224, 244, 392, 415, 416-7
 Greiser, 235, 433
Gringoire, The, 166, 229
 Groener, General, 49
 Guardia, Major La, 96
 Guerard, Albert, 143
 Gunther, Frances, 27, 97, 136, 148, 328, 330-1, 357-8
 Gustav of Sweden, King, 437, 439
 Haakon of Norway, King, 437
 Habicht, 323, 325, 327, 336, 337, 351
 Habsburg, Archduke Anton, 384
 Habsburg, Dr. Otto, 358-62, 407
 Habsburg, ex-Emperor Karl, 359, 360, 365-6
 Habsburg, ex-Empress Zita, 358-62
 Habsburgs, The, 358-62
 Hackett, Francis, 196, 203, 207
 Hadzidimov, 399
 Haig, 287
 Hailé Selassié, 95, 227, 228, 235
 Hailsham, Lord, 245
 Haldane, Lord, 100
 Halifax, Lord, 232, 267, 276, 283, 285-6, 454
 Hammerstein, Von, 46
 Hammond, J. L., and Barbara, 302
Handelsblatt, Amsterdam, 342
 Hansfstaengl, P., 18, 81
 Hankey, Sir M., 241-2, 245
 Hansson, Per Albin, 439
 Hard, Bill, 371
 Hawes, Elizabeth, 513
 Hayn, Hans, 63
 Hearst, William, 259
 Hecht, Ben, 456
 Hedvick, 347
 Heiden, Konrad, 18, 23, 28, 29, 41, 63, 79, 105
Heil, 17, 77, 84, 87, 106
 Heimwehr, The Austrian, 319, 324, 326-9, 331-2, 335, 342-3, 354-5
 Heines, Edmund, 29, 63, 69, 74, 84
Heirs to the Habsburgs, 326
 Helene of Greece, Princess, 379, 380, 384
 Helldorf, Von, 88
 Henderson, Arthur, 243, 279, 296, 302
 Henlein, Konrad, 374-5
Herald Tribune, The New York, 342
 Herr, Lucien, 117
 Herriot, Edouard, 116, 123, 143, 144, 148, 150-2, 279
 Hess, Rudolf, 19, 29, 32, 74, 85-6, 88, 89, 110, 477, 500
 Himmler, 65, 67, 69, 73, 86, 477, 489
 Hindenburg, Von, 19, 29, 30, 42, 45-7, 48-51, 53-4, 56, 72, 91, 100, 106, 201, 351, 419
 Hindenburg, Oskar von, 46-7
 Hitler, Adolf, 15-42, 43-7, 48-54, 55, 56, 62, 63, 64, 65, 67-70, 72, 73, 74, 77, 78, 79, 80, 82, 85-92, 93-106, 109-12, 113, 122, 138, 139, 140, 149, 171, 192, 194, 195, 197, 199, 201, 204, 205, 209, 210, 213, 223, 231, 235, 247, 248, 275, 283, 302, 305, 317, 319, 322, 350, 351, 356, 365, 387, 392, 406, 419,

- Hitler, Adolf, continued
 453, 458, 461, 463, 472, 489, 495, 502, 504, 518, 519
 Hitler, Alois, 35-7
 Hitler, Klara, see 'Poelzl, Klara'
 Hitler, Paula (Paula Hiedler), 35
 Hitler and Austria, 319, 322-3, 325, 350-1
 Hitlerism, Industrial support of, 45
 Hitler's Parentage, 34-8
 Hitler's Peace Plan, 94
 Hoare-Laval Plan, 232-5, 284, 293
 Hoare, Sir S., 228, 230, 232-5, 267, 282-4, 287
 Hodza, Dr. Milan, 375
 Hoisti, Dr. Rudolf, 432
 Holland, 98, 99, 443-4
 Holzweber, 343, 344, 345, 348, 349, 350, 351
 Homosexuality in Germany, 68, 69, 84, 100
 Hoover, President, 131, 147
 Hore-Belisha, Leslie, 267
 Horne, Sir Robert, 272
 Horthy, Admiral, 362, 363-5, 453
 Hottinguer, Baron, 129
 Houston, Lady, 257
 Hudl, 345, 348-9
 Hugenberg, 53, 56, 57
Humanité, L', 117, 118, 140
 Humpel, Hofrat, 344
 Hungary, 139, 285, 322, 325, 362, 366, 367,
 376, 415
 Hungary and the Habsburgs, 359-60
 Huss, John, 196
 Huxley, Aldous, 175
- Iceland, 444
 Ileana of Rumania, Princess, 384
 Imperial Conference at Ottawa, 265
 I.M.R.O., 399
 Independent Labour Party, The, 295, 301
 Indian Statutory Commission, 289, 300
 Industrial Power in France, 131-2
 Inflation, German, 44
 Inge, Dean, 233, 243
 Ingrid, Princess, 438
 Innitzer, Cardinal, 355
Inquest on Peace, 230, 289
 Inskip, Sir Thomas, 287-8
 International Brigade in Spain, 173, 183
 Irish Free State, 305, 310, 312, 315
 Irish Free State, New Constitution of, 315
 Iron Guard, The, 382, 383, 385, 386, 387, 391
 Irwin, Lord, see Halifax, Lord
 Ismet Pasha, 422
 Italian Participation in Spanish Civil War,
 172, 173, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 190-2
 Italo-Turkish War (1911-12), 199
 Italy, 96, 135, 139, 194-221, 423
 Italy and Albania, 410, 411
 Italy and Jugoslavia, 407, 411, 412
 Italy and Spain, 172, 173, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 190-2
 Italy, Austria and Germany, 323
 Italy, Internal Conditions of, 222-3
 Italy, The King of, 206, 214, 413
Izvestia, 458, 488, 500, 505, 511
- Jackson, J. Hampden, 401
 Japan, 95, 96, 137, 141, 248, 268, 289
 Japan and Russia, 502, 503, 504, 517, 518
 Jaurès, Jean, 117, 118
 Jeans, Sir James, 286
 Jedrejewicz, W., 425
 Jefferson, Thomas, 176, 178
 Jerrold, Douglas, 238
 Jeunesses Patriotes, 162, 166
 Jewish Persecution in Austria, 366
 Jews in Germany, 22, 23, 24, 25, 27, 30, 43, 44, 55, 79, 84, 85, 87, 88
 Joesten, Joachim, 438
 Joffre, 157
 Jones, Bettina Shaw, 170
 Jorga, Professor Nicolas, 384-5
 Jouhaux, Leon, 170
Journal, Le, 179
Judenkennner, 83
 Jugoslavia, 137, 139, 224, 285, 362, 367, 375,
 376, 392, 393-408, 415
 Jugoslavia and Germany, 408
 Jugoslavia and Italy, 407, 411, 412
 Juliana of Orange-Nassau, Princess, 444
 Jung, Edgar, 63, 103
- Kadrówska, 424, 425
 Kaganovitch, L. M., 214, 458, 461, 474, 477,
 478, 479-82, 483, 489, 493, 498, 515
 Kahr, Von, 64, 65
 Kalinin, Michael I., 64, 65, 479, 480, 488
 Kallio, Kyosti, 432
 Kamal Ataturk, 34, 38, 39, 40, 194, 195, 305,
 416, 418-23, 426, 453
 Kamenev, 457, 463, 479, 493, 495, 497, 498, 504
 Kaplan, Fanny, 492
 Karageorgeovitch Family, The, 396, 397
 Karolyi, Count Julius, 363, 364
 Karl, Ex-Emperor, 359, 360, 365-6
 Karwinsky, 342, 343, 346
 Kasprzycki, General T., 425, 428
 Kellogg Pact, The, 137, 276
 Kent, The Duke of, 417
 Keppler, Wilhelm, 109
 Kerensky, 125
 Keynes, J. M., 243
 Kings and Dictators, 415-6
 Kipling, Rudyard, 270
 Kirov, Sergei M., 400, 458, 480, 492-3, 497, 498, 501
 Klagges, Dietrich, 42
 Klausner, Dr., 63, 65
 Knatchbull-Hugessen, Sir Hughe, 268
 Knickerbocker, H. R., 28, 33, 108, 223, 462, 510
 Knox, Geoffrey, 448
 Knyazev, 501
 Koc, Colonel Adam, 425
 Koerner, General, 333
 Koltzoff, Michael, 511
 Konar, 492
 Kondylis, 416
 Kork, General, 504

- Koscalkowski, Marjan Zyndram-, 425, 429, 430
 Kossior, Stanislav, 480, 490
 Kraussner, F. von, 63
 Krestinsky, 460
 Kreuger, 440
 Krim, Abdel, 134, 163
 Krupp, 134
 Kunze, 336, 348, 350

 Labour and Armaments, English, 296
 Labour Government in England, The, 260-1,
 276, 292, 296, 297, 304
 Labour in Spain, 179-80
 Labour in Italy, 198
 La Guardia, Mayor, 96
La Lotta di Classi, 196
 Lambrino, Zizi, 379
 Lansbury, George, 297
 Laski, Harold J., 244, 248, 273, 514
 Lateran Treaty, The, 202, 296
 Latifé Hanum, 422
 Latvia, 432, 433
 Lausanne Conference, 219
 Lausanne, Treaty of, 422
 Laval, Pierre, 121, 122, 125, 131, 140, 144-50, 151, 156, 169, 228-9, 233, 284, 475, 519
 Laval, José, 149
 Law, Bonar, 245, 265, 270, 272, 294
 Layton, Sir Walter, 243
 League of Nations Reconstruction Loan, 320
 League of Nations, The, 27, 30, 90, 99, 133,
 137, 138, 149-50, 151, 176, 196, 228-32,
 246, 289, 391, 399, 433, 446-55
 League of Nations Union, 232
 Lebrun, Albert, 158
 Lee, Jennie, 300
Leipzig Incident, The, 192, 267
 Lenin, 125, 194, 195, 214, 301, 456, 457, 460-4,
 466, 471, 475, 484, 485, 488, 493, 494, 503,
 520
Leninism, 457-8, 464, 470, 491, 513
 Leopold III, King, 443
 Lerroux, Alejandro, 179, 185, 188
 Lester, Sean, 447
 Lewis, John L., 171
 Ley, Dr., 32, 85, 88, 89
Life, 174, 180
 Lippmann, Walter, 25
 Lithuania, 427, 432, 433, 434, 518
 Lithuania, Future of, 97, 98, 433-4
 Little Entente, The, 99, 137, 367, 375, 376,
 391-2, 407, 431
 Litvinov, Maxim M., 251, 301, 423, 479, 484-7, 515, 518
 Litvinov, Madame, 486, 487
 Livshitz, Y. A., 498
 Llano, General G. Q. de, 186
 Lloyd George, David, 198, 243, 265, 266, 267, 272, 288, 289, 290, 294, 312, 313
 Lloyd, Lord, 302
 Locarno Powers, 95
 Locarno, Treaty of, 93, 137, 277, 443, 448
 Lockhart, Bruce, 485

 Lodge, Senator, 447
 Londonderry, Lord, 274, 279
 London Economic Conference, 323
 London Naval Conference, 233
 Los Rios, Fernando de, 175, 177
 Lothian, Lord, 247, 248
 Low, David, 234, 243
 Low, Sir Sidney, 486
 Lubbe, Marinus van der, 57-62
 Ludwig, Emil, 202, 203, 204, 207, 213, 401
 Lupescu, Magda, 378, 380-3, 385-7, 390-3
 Lutzke, 68
 Luxembourg, 444
 Luxembourg, Rosa, 490
 Lyautey, Marshal, 163, 166

 Macdonald, G. B., 269
 MacDonald, Jimmie, 279
 MacDonald, J. Ramsay, 151, 241, 242, 245,
 267, 274, 276, 278-82, 283, 287, 288, 295, 301
 MacDonald, Malcolm, 267
 Mackensen, Von, 65
 Madariaga, Salvador de, 175
 Maglione, Mgr., 121, 122
 Mallet, E., 129
 Maltoni, Rosa, 195
Manchester Guardian, The, 68, 176, 220, 225, 298, 340
 Manchuria, 137, 141, 517
 Mandel, Georges, 155, 156
 Maniu, Juliu, 380, 382, 387-90, 406
 Manolescu, Colonel, 390
 Marañón, Dr. G., 175
 March, Juan, 179
 March on Rome, The, 198, 214, 218
 Marek, 339
 Marie of Rumania, Queen, 379, 385, 386, 393
 Marinetti, F. T., 224
 Maritime Province, The, 499, 503
 Markievitz, Countess, 306
 Marquet, Adrien, 120, 121, 167, 168
 Maurin, Joaquin, 189
 Marx, Karl, 117, 188, 195, 207, 295, 506
 Marxists, 43, 173
 Marxist Vote in Germany, 31
 Mary, H.M. Queen, 257-8, 260, 261
 Masaryk, Thomas Garrigue, 204, 368-72, 373, 421, 448
 Masaryk, Jan, 371
 Matchek, Vladimir, 387, 397, 406
 Matsoaka, 289
 Matteotti, 198-9, 215, 296
 Maud'huy, De, 164
 Maurras, Charles, 166
 Maxton, J., 301
 Mediterranean, Power in the, 182, 191, 216,
 224, 230, 242, 268
Mein Kampf, 21, 22, 24, 29, 30, 44, 88, 99, 204, 322
 Meissner, 46, 47
 Memel, 97, 433, 434
 Mencken, H. L., 251
 Menzhinsky, 473, 492

- Mestrovic, 371
 Metaxas, General, 416-7, 453
 Metternich, 518
 Mezhlaik, V. I., 490, 508
 Michael of Rumania, King, 380, 384, 393-4
 Miedzinski, Boguslav, 425
 Mihailov, Ivan, 399, 414
 Miklas, President, 333, 346
 Mikoyan, Anastasi I., 477, 479, 480, 490
 Millerand, 143
 Milner, Lord, 283
 Mirabaud, Paul, 129
 Mirabaud, Pierre, 129
 Mircea, 379
 Mirsky, 295
 Mohrenschild, Von, 62
 Mola, General, 187
 Molotov, 468, 475, 477, 478, 479, 480, 488-9, 493, 499, 502, 515
 Montenegro, 409
 Moreau, 128
 Moret, Clement, 130
Morning Post, The, 228
 Moroccan Troops in Spain, 180-1
 Morocco, 181, 182, 185, 191
 Morrison, Herbert, 296-7, 298, 299
 Morrison, W. S., 267
 Moscicki, Ignacy, 429
 Mosley, Sir Oswald, 257, 302-3
 Motta, Dr. Giuseppe, 445
 Mowrer, E. A., 30, 123, 141, 448, 454
 Mrachkovsky, 498
 Müller, Ludwig, 90, 91
 Müller, Reichbishop, 23, 91
 Munch, Dr., 438
 Munich, Attempted Revolution in 1923, 41, 75, 77, 355
 Munich Putsch of 1923, The, 17, 41, 75, 77, 86, 353
 Munitions, 132, 133
 Muralov, 497, 498
 Music, Hitler and, 18, 78, 395
 Mussert, A. A., 444
 Mussolini, Alessandro, 195
 Mussolini, Anna-Maria, 201, 202
 Mussolini, Arnaldo, 201, 202, 203
 Mussolini, Benito, 16, 19, 22, 26, 27, 38, 39, 40, 51, 65, 96, 97, 99, 113, 138, 149, 156, 171, 194-235, 268, 276, 296, 297, 302, 324, 325, 335, 337, 351, 356, 358, 365, 401, 407, 411, 419, 421, 426, 449, 453, 458, 461, 463, 472
 Mussolini, Bruno, 201
 Mussolini, Donna Rachele, 200
 Mussolini, Edda, 201, 202, 205
 Mussolini, Romano, 201, 226
 Mussolini and Austria, 351, 355, 367
 Mussolini and Hitler, 210
 Mussolini and Italy, 361
 Mussolini and Jugoslavia, 407, 411
Mussolini's Italy, 197
 Mussolini's Parentage, 195
 Mussolini, Vittorio, 201
 Mustafa Kemal, see Kamal Ataturk
 National Council of Corporations, 211
 National Government, The English, 242, 266, 275, 277, 278, 280, 288, 290, 293, 296, 299
 Nazi Invasion of Austria, 323
 Nazi Party Organisation, 73-4
 Nazi Policy, 98-9
 Nazi Revolution, Basis and Principles of, 23, 24, 27, 29, 30-2, 41, 49, 64
 Naziism, Foundation and Growth of, etc., 30, 31, 32, 45, 47, 48, 49, 55-7, 62-72
 Naziism in Austria, 322, 325, 331, 336-7, 342, 348, 350-1, 357
 Naziism in Danzig, 434
 Naziism in Scandinavian States, 438
 Naziism in Switzerland, 445
 Necker, 129
 Negrin, Dr. Juan, 190
 Neoslaby, 481
 Neo-Socialists in France, 167
 N.E.P., 466
 Netherlands, The, 443-4
 Neudeck, 45-7
 Neufelize, J. de, 129
 Neurath, Baron von, 74, 96, 100-1, 102, 251
 Neustädter-Stürmer, 344-6, 348, 350
 Neutrals, The Notable, 435-45
New Bases of Racial Research, 83
New Leader, The, 230
New Republic, The, 225, 467
New Life, The, 485
New Statesman, The, 160, 237, 290, 296
New York Times, The, 216, 341, 442, 505
News Chronicle, 26, 183, 297
 Newspaper Proprietors Association, The, 254
 Nicholas of Rumania, Prince, 383, 384, 389, 390
 Nietzsche, Friedrich, 195, 207, 208, 427
 Nikolaiev, Leonid, 492
 Nin, Andres, 189
 Noli, Monsignor Fan, 410, 411
 Non-Intervention Pact, The, 190-2
 Non-Intervention in Spain, 190-2
 Norman, Sir Montagu, 245, 291-3
 Norway, 436-9, 441
Not to be Repeated, 150, 478
 N.S.D.A.P., Foundation of, 41
 Nygaardsvold, Johan, 441
 Nyon Conference, The, 192
 Nypels, George, 204, 342
 Oberfohren, 58
Observer, The, 186, 241, 276
 O'Connell, Kathleen, 308
 Occupation of Rhineland, 27, 90, 93-5, 98, 99, 123, 138, 140
 Occupation of the Factories in Italy, The (1920), 198
October Revolution, The, 466
 Olaf, Crown Prince, 438
 Olga, Princess, 397
On England, 240
 Ordzhonikidze, Grigori, 479-80, 489
 Ormsby-Gore, 244, 267, 287
 Ortega y Gasset, J., 175

- Osinski, V. V., 490, 508
 Otto, Prince, 358-62, 407
 Oxford, Lord, 239, 245
 Oxford and Asquith, Countess of, 244
- Pacific Character of French, 135
 Paderewski, 151-2, 429, 430
 Paganism in Germany, 23, 24
 Painlevé, Paul, 146, 148
 Papan, Franz von, 17, 44, 45, 46, 48-51, 53, 54, 56, 57, 58, 63, 64, 74, 81, 99, 101, 102-5, 351, 357
 Parrott, 393
 Parti Social Française (P.S.F.), 165
 Party of Marxist Unification (P.O.U.M.), 189, 190, 301
 Patriotism, Ltd., 134
 Päts, Konstantin, 432
 Paul-Boncour, Joseph, 143, 154
 Paul of Yugoslavia, Prince, 394, 397, 398
 Pavone, General, 218-9
 Peace Ballot, The, 232
 Peace, Forces making for, 452, 453
 Pehrsson, Axel, 440
 Perovitch, Ivan, 398
 Pétain, Marshal, 138, 158
 Peter II of Yugoslavia, King, 393, 394, 396, 397
 Pieracki, 400, 429
 Pietsch, Albert, 109
 Pilsudski, 34, 38, 39, 214, 305, 416, 421, 423, 424-30, 434
 Pilsudski, Jadwiga, 427
 Pilsudski, Wanda, 427
 Pius XI, Pope, 296, 324
 Planetta, Otto, 347, 351, 400
 Plebiscites, German, 30, 31
 Poelzl, Klara, 35-7
 Poincaré, 120, 121, 131, 144, 147, 150
 Poland, 97, 137, 139, 157, 366, 375, 424-34, 517
 Polish Corridor, The, 27, 98, 99, 371, 433
 Polish-Soviet Non-Aggression Treaty, 431
 Politburo, Members of the, 461, 463, 477-82
 Political Parties, French, 143-4
 Politics and Religion, German, 40
 Pollitt, H., 301
 Polska Organizacja Wojskowa (P.O.W.), 424, 425
Popolo d'Italia, 197, 201, 202, 204, 215
 Popov, 58, 60
 Portugal, 182, 191, 192-3
 Postyshev, P. P., 490
 Poulenc, C., 129
 P.O.U.M., 189, 190, 301
 P.O.W., 424, 425
Pravda, 458, 463, 505, 508, 512
 Precup, Colonel V., 382, 389
 Prelestnikov, 481
 Pressard, M., 126, 160
 Press in France, The, 140-1
 Press, Control of the German, 81
 Price, Ward, 228
 Prieto, Indelacio, 189
 Prince, Dr., 161
 Princep, 401, 405
 Pritt, Denis, 497
 Probst, Adelbert, 63
 Pro-German Influences in England, 248-9, 251, 261, 290
 Propaganda, Nazi, 80
 Protestantism in Germany, 22, 23, 30
 Prussian Social Democrats, 50
 Prystor, Colonel B., 425, 426, 429
 Pujo, Maurice, 166
Punch, 244
 Putna, General, 503, 504
Putsch, Failure of Austrian, 349-50
 Pyatakov, Y. L., 495, 499, 500, 501, 502
- Radek, Karl B., 473, 489-90, 495, 497, 499-503, 505, 515, 516, 517
 Raditch, 402, 403
 Rataichak, 499
 Rathenau, 366
 Raupel, Angela, 36
Real Stanley Baldwin, The, 270
 Rearmament, German, 90
 Rearmament Programme, British, 243, 268
 'Red Week', 196
 Reed, Douglas, 55-6
Reichspost, The, 330, 343, 349
 Reichstag, Dissolution of the, 48-50
 Reichstag Fire and Trial, The, 55-62
 Reichswehr, The, 31, 32, 42, 62, 67, 91, 92, 504
 Reith, Sir John, 290
 Religious Issue in France, 144
 Religious Persecution in Germany, 22, 23, 30
 Renard, Jules, 115, 121
 Renaudel, 120, 121
 Renner, Dr., 321, 333
 Renoult, 160
 Rentenmark, 110
 Revolution in a Police State, 31
 Reynaud, Paul, 156
 Rheinmetall, 134
 Rhineland, Occupation of the, 27, 90, 93-5, 98, 99, 123, 138, 140
 Ribbentrop, Frau von (Anna Henkel), 102
 Ribbentrop, Fräulein von, 102
 Ribbentrop, J. von, 19, 93, 95, 101-2, 251
 Rickett, F. W., 226
 Rieth, Dr., 345, 346, 349, 351
 Rintelen, Captain von, 103-4
 Rintelen, Dr. Anton, 336-8, 340, 341, 343-5, 348-52
 Rios, Fernando de los, 175, 177
 Ripoldi, 352
 Rist, C., 128
 Rivera, Primo de, 180
 Robles, J. M. Gil, 179, 180, 185
 Robert, Maître, 156
Robotnik, 426
 Rocque, Casimir de la, 123, 163-6
 Rocque, Pierre de la, 163
 Rochm, Captain, 16, 19, 27, 33, 62-70, 84, 87, 205, 400
 Rome-Berlin Axis, The, 95-6, 140, 207, 216, 454

- Barm Vladimir, 500
 Roosevelt, F. D., 126, 202, 443, 519
 Roosevelt, Theodore, 305
 Rosenberg, Alfred, 74, 84, 85, 89, 101, 105-6, 148, 387
 Rossoni, Edmondo, 216
 Rothermere, Lord, 241, 257, 304
 Rothschild, A. de, 129
 Rothschild, E. de, 129
 Rousseau, Jean Jacques, 151, 176, 178
 Roustemi, Aveni, 410
 Royal Commissions, 244
 Royalists, French, 166
 Rudzutak, Y. E., 479, 490
 Ruhr, 44, 151, 519
 Rumana, 137, 139, 224, 367, 375, 376, 378-92, 445
 Russell, Bertrand, 175, 194, 519
 Russia, 456-520
 Russia, Advances in, 507-8
 Russia and America, 517-8
 Russia and Germany, 97, 296, 502, 503, 504, 517-9
 Russia and Japan, 502, 503, 504, 517, 518
 Russia, Chief Men in, 575
 Russia, Hitler's enmity to, 97-8
 Russian Cabinet Ministers, 478-9
 Russian Characteristics, 506
 Russian Famine (1933), 467-9
 Russian Military Strength, 483-4
 Russian Ministers' Wives, 487
 Russian Participation in Spanish Civil War, 172, 173, 183, 190-2
 Russian Railways, 480-1
 Russian Trials, The, 505
 Rykov, 457, 470, 488, 505

 Saar, The, 30, 31, 99, 136, 149, 448
 Salazar, Prof. Dr. Antonio de, 192-3
 Salengro, 124
 Salisbury, Lord, 245
 Salter, Sir Arthur, 243
 SA, The (Brown Shirts), 19, 29, 31-2, 41, 48, 49, 62, 63-7, 68, 69, 70, 74, 80, 86, 89, 92, 106
 Samuel, Sir Herbert, 289
 Sanctions, 93, 219, 228, 230-2, 407, 449
 Sander, 70
 Sandler, Dr., 441
 Sanjurjo, General, 177, 182, 185
 Sarateanu, 390
 Sarfatti, Margherita, 202
 Sarraut, Albert, 121, 122, 143, 154
 Sarte, Real del, 166
 Sassoon, Sir Philip, 267
 Saveanu, Madame, 383
 Scandinavian States, The, 435-41
 Schacht, Dr., 19, 32, 74, 81, 98, 101, 106, 108-12, 247, 292
 Schaub, 25
 Scheffer, Paul, 464
 Schirach, B. von, 88
 Schlamperci, 346, 357
 Schleicher, Kurt von, 32, 44, 45, 46, 47-51, 53-4, 64, 65, 69, 70, 85, 99, 400
 Schleicher, Elisabeth von, 64, 69
 Schmidt, Willi, 64, 65
 Schneider, E., 128, 132-4
 Schneider et Cie, 132, 133
 Schneidhuber, August, 63
 Schober, Dr., 319, 321
 Schreck, 25
 Schroeder, Baron von, 53, 102
 Schuschnigg Dictatorship, The, 356
 Schuschnigg, Frau, 354
 Schuschnigg, K. von, 34, 305, 335, 346, 348, 350, 353-5, 356-8, 453
 Schutzbund, 319, 324, 326, 331-4, 357
 Second Internationale, The, 167, 330
Secret International, 134
 Seeckt, Von, 49, 91
 Seignobos, 136
 Seipel, Monsignor Ignaz, 320, 321, 327, 330, 353, 355
 Seitz, Karl, 333
 Seldes, George, 209
 Sembat, Marcel, 118
 Serebryakov, 497, 499, 502
 Sergeant, M., 128
 Severing, 50
 Shaw, Bernard, 196, 470
 Sheppard, Canon 'Dick', 244
 Shestov, 501
 Shkvarin, Vasily V., 511
 Siegfried, A., 143, 156
 Sikorski, General, 425
 Simon, Sir John, 100, 242, 267, 285, 286, 288-9, 298, 300
 Simonds, Frank H., 28
 Simpson, Ernest A., 252
 Simpson, Mrs. B. W., 251-63
 Sinclair, Sir Archibald, 289
 Skoda, 134
 Slawek, Colonel V., 425, 429
 Slocombe, George, 204
 Smetona, Antanas, 433
 Smirnov, 497, 498
 Smith, F. E., 270
 Smuts, General, 232
 Snowden, Philip, 154, 278, 289, 292
Socialism and the National Question, 463
 Socialism in England, 295
 Socialism in Austria, 329-30
Socialism Victorious, 468
 Socialist Revolution in Austria, 326-35
 Sokolnikov, G., 463, 495, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502
 Solidarité Française, 162, 166
 Sonnemann, Emmy, 76
 Sotelo, Calvo, 180
 Soviet Economy, The basis of, 509-12
 Sovietism, Changes in, 512
 Soviet System, Stalin's Definition of the, 461, 513, 514

DATE OF ISSUE

This book must be returned within 3, 7, 14 days of its issue. A fine of ONE ANNA per day will be charged if the book is overdue.

4 23.6.48

