PREFACE
TO THE REVISED EDITION

My father died on March 6, 1897, before he had finished correcting the proofs of the revision of this new edition. He left the work to me, and I should like to be permitted to thank all who helped in this labour of love.

The Librarians at the Nottingham, Lancaster, and Eastbourne Free Libraries must be specially mentioned. Mr. Briscoe, of the Nottingham Free Library, was a personal friend of my father's; he and his colleagues spared neither time nor trouble in searching out dates, and in supplying much useful information.

I thank, too, most warmly, the proof-reader, who has shown so much patience, and has helped me in every possible way in what might have been a very hard task; he made it not only an easy but an exceedingly pleasant one.

To all my father's friends, known and unknown, who have written such kind and encouraging letters, I can only say from the bottom of my heart, "Thanks, and ever thanks."

NELLIE COBHAM HAYMAN.

NOTE.

Some further corrections, in addition to those made in the revised edition of 1902, have been made in this new issue.

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION

THE object of this Handbook is to supply readers and speakers with a lucid but very brief account of such names as are used in allusions and references, whether by poets or prose writers,—to furnish those who consult it with the plot of popular dramas, the story of epic poems, and the outline of well-known tales. Who has not asked what such and such a book is about? and who would not be glad to have his question answered correctly in a few words? When the title of a play is mentioned, who has not felt a desire to know who was the author of it? —for it seems a universal practice to allude to the title of dramas without stating the author. And when reference is made to some character, who has not wished to know something specific about the person referred to? The object of this Handbook is to supply these wants. Thus, it gives in a few lines the story of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, of Virgil's Æneid, Lucan's Pharsalia, and the Thebaid of Statius; of Dantê's Divine Comedy, Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, and Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered; of Milton's Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained; of Thomson's Seasons; of Ossian's tales, the Nibelungen Lied of the German minnesingers, the Romance of the Rose, the Lusiad of Camoëns, the Loves of Theagênês and Charicleia by Heliodorus (fourth century), with the several story poems of Chaucer, Gower, Piers Plowman, Hawes, Spenser, Drayton, Phineas Fletcher, Prior, Goldsmith, Campbell, Southey, Byron, Scott, Moore, Tennyson, Longfellow, and so on. Far from limiting its scope to poets, the Handbook tells, with similar brevity, the stories of our national fairy tales and romances, such novels as those by Charles Dickens, Vanity Fair by Thackeray, the Rasselas of Johnson, Gulliver's Travels by Swift, the Sentimental Journey by Sterne, Don Quixote and Gil Blas, Telemachus by Fénelon, and Undine by De la Motte Fouqué. Great pains have been taken with the Arthurian stories, whether from sir T. Malory's collection or from the Mabinogion, because Tennyson has brought them to the front in his Idylls of the King; and the number of dramatic plots sketched out is many hundreds.

Another striking and interesting feature of the book is the revelation of the source from which dramatists and romancers have derived their stories, and the strange repetitions of historic incidents. Compare, for example, the stratagem of the wooden horse by which Troy was taken, with those of Abu Obeidah in the siege of Arrestan, and that of the capture of Sark from the French, p. 504. Compare, again, Dido's cutting the hide into strips, with the story about the Yakutsks, p. 182; that of Romulus and Remus, with the story of Tyro, p. 930; the Shibboleth of Scripture story, with those of the "Sicilian Vespers," and of the Danes on St. Bryce's Day, p. 1003; the story of Pisistratos and his two sons, with that of Cosmo de' Medici and his two grandsons, p. 849; the death of Marcus Licinius Crassus, with that of Manlius Nepos Aquilius, p. 434; and the famous "Douglas larder," with the larder of Wallace at Ardrossan, p. 297. Witness the numerous tales resembling that of William Tell and the apple, p. 1082; of the Pied Piper of Hamelin, p. 843; of Llewellyn and his dog Gelert, p. 410; of bishop Hatto and the rats, p. 474; of Ulysses and Polyphemos, p. 1156; and of lord Lovel's bride, p. 712. Witness, again, the parallelisms of David in his flight from Saul, and that of Mahomet from the Koreishites, p. 1035; of Jephthah and his daughter, and the tale of Idomeneus of Crete, or that of Agamemnon and Iphigenia, p. 544; of Paris and Sextus, p. 988; Salome and Fulvia, p. 955; St. Patrick preaching to king O'Neil, and St. Areed before the king of Abyssinia, p. 812; of Cleopatra and Sophonisba, with scores of others.

To ensure accuracy, every work alluded to in this large volume has been read personally by the author expressly for this Handbook, and since the compilation was commenced; for although, at the beginning, a few others were employed for the sake of despatch, the author read over for himself, while the sheets were passing through the press, the works put into their hands. The very minute references to words and phrases, book and chapter, act and scene, often to page and line, will be sufficient guarantee to the reader that this assertion is not overstated.

The work is in a measure novel, and cannot fail to be useful. It is owned that Charles Lamb has told, and told well, the Tales of Shakespeare; but Charles Lamb has occupied more pages with each tale than the Handbook has lines. It is also true that an "Argument" is generally attached to each book of an epic story; but the reading of these rhapsodies is like reading an index—few have patience to wade through them, and fewer still obtain therefrom any clear idea of the spirit of the actors, or the progress of the story. Brevity has been the aim of this Handbook, but clearness has not been sacrificed to terseness; and it has been borne in mind throughout that it is not enough to state a fact,—it must be stated attractively, and the character described must be drawn characteristically, if the reader is to appreciate it, and feel an interest in what he reads.

The unnamed book given as an authority for the various Arthurian names (see ARTHUR, GALAHAD, GAWAIN, LANCELOT, MODRED, and others) is Malory's Morte d'Arthur (for which see p. 729). In most cases where it is quoted from, the title of the book is omitted, and only the part and chapter are given.

Those verses introduced but not signed, or signed with initials only, are by the author of the Handbook. They are the Stornello Verses, p. 1048; the aspen tree (an epigram), p. 1130; Nones and Ides, p. 759; the Seven Wise Men, p. 987 ; the Seven Wonders of the World, p. 987 ; and the following translations : Lucan's "Serpents," p. 835 ; "Veni Wakefield peramænum," p. 414 ; specimen of Tyrtæos, p. 1154 ; "Vos non vobis," p. 1183 ; "Roi d'Yvetot," p. 1236 ; "Non amo te," p. 1237 ; Marot's epigram, p. 629 ; epigram on a violin, p. 1177 ; epigram on the Fair Rosamond, p. 932 ; the Heidelberg tun, p. 1145 ; "Roger Bontemps," p. 926 ; "Le bon roi Dagobert," p. 745 ; "Pauvre Jacques," p. 816 ; Virgil's epitaph, p. 1178 ; "Cunctis mare," p. 966 ; "Ni fallat fatum," p. 971 ; St. Elmo, p. 949 ; Baviad, etc., pp. 97, 652 ; several oracular responses (see EQUIVOKES, p. 327 ; WOODEN WALLS, p. 1227 ; etc.) ; and many others. The chief object of this paragraph is to prevent any useless search after these trifles.

It would be most unjust to conclude this preface without publicly acknowledging the great obligation which the author owes to the printer's reader while the sheets were passing through the press. He seems to have entered into the very spirit of the book ; his judgment has been sound, his queries have been intelligent, his suggestions invaluable, and even some of the articles were supplied by him.

E. C. BREWER.

THE READER'S HANDBOOK

¶ indicates a parallel or similar tale, and has been adopted so that those who wish to find such duplicates may do so with the least possible trouble.

Foreign books which have been naturalised (with their English translations) have been introduced in the text.

A.

AA'RON, a Moor, beloved by Tam'ora, queen of the Goths, in the tragedy of Titus Andron'icus, published amongst the plays of Shakespeare (1593).

(The classic name is Andronicus, but the character of this play is purely fictitious.)

Aaron (St.), a British martyr of the City of Legions (Newport, in South Wales). He was torn limb from limb by order of Maximia'nus Hercu'lius, general, in Britain, of the army of Diocle'tian. Two churches were founded in the City of Legions, one in honour of St. Aaron, and one in honour of his fellow-martyr St. Julius. Newport was called Caerleon by the British.

> . . . two others . . . sealed their doctrine with their blood;
> St. Julius, and with him St. Aaron, have their room
> At Carleon, suffering death by Diocletian's doom.
> Drayton : Polyolbion, xxiv. (1622).

Aas'is (3 syl.), so the queen of Sheba or Saba is sometimes called; but in the Koran she is called Balkis (ch. xxvii.).

Abad'don, an angel of the bottomless pit (Rev. ix. 11). The word is derived from the Hebrew, abad, "lost," and means the lost one. There are two other angels introduced by Klopstock in The Messiah with similar names, which must not be confounded with the angel referred to in Rev.; one is Obaddon, the angel of death, and the other Abbad'ona, the repentant devil. (See ABBADONA.)

Ab'aris, to whom Apollo gave a golden arrow, on which to ride through the air. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. a.)

Abbad'ona, once the friend of Ab'diel, was drawn into the rebellion of Satan half unwillingly. In hell he constantly bewailed his fall, and reproved Satan for his pride and blasphemy. He openly declared to the infernals that he would take no part or lot in Satan's scheme for the death of the Messiah; and during the crucifixion he lingered about the cross with repentance, hope, and fear. His ultimate fate we are not told, but when Satan and Adramelech were driven back to hell, Obaddon, the angel of death, says—

> "For thee, Abbadona, I have no orders. How long thou art permitted to remain on earth I know not, nor whether thou wilt be allowed to see the resurrection of the Lord of glory . . . but be not deceived, thou canst not view Him with the joy of the redeemed." "Yet let me see Him, let me see Him!"—Klopstock : The Messiah, xiii.

Abberville (Lord), a young nobleman, 23 years of age, who has for travelling tutor a Welshman of 65, called Dr. Druid, an antiquary, wholly ignorant of his real duties as a guide of youth. The young man runs wantonly wild, squanders his money, and gives loose rein to his passions almost to the verge of ruin, but he is arrested and reclaimed by his honest Scotch bailiff or financier, and the vigilance of his father's executor, Mr. Mortimer. This "fashionable lover" promises marriage to a vulgar, malicious city minx named Lucinda Bridgemore, but is saved from this pitfall also.—Cumberland : The Fashionable Lover (1780).

Abbot (The), the second of three novels on the Reformation. The first, called The Monastery, is by far the worst; and the third, called Kenilworth, is the best. The Abbot, Father Ambrose (q.v.), plays a very subordinate part, the hero being Roland Græme. The tale is this: Roland, a very young child, was nearly drowned by trying to save a toy-boat, but he was drawn from the river by Wolf, a dog of Lady Avenel's; and as Lady Avenel had no family, she brought up Roland as a sort of page. The indulgence shown by his kind patroness drew upon him the jealous displeasure of the rest of the household; and ultimately one spirit became so bitter that Lady Avenel, when he was between 17 and 18, dismissed him from her service. Roland, going he knew not whither, encountered Sir Halbert Glendinning, the husband of the Lady of Avenel, who took him into his service, and sent him to the regent Murray, who sent him to Lochleven, as the page of Mary queen of Scotland, who had been dethroned and sent to Lochleven as a state prisoner. He was there above a year, when Mary made her escape, was overtaken by the Reform party, and fled to England.

 Roland Græme is discovered to be the son of Julian Avenel and Catherine Græme. He married Catherine Seyton, a daughter of Lord Seyton, and was heir to the barony of Avenel. Mary of Scotland is excellently portrayed in this novel, and Queen Elizabeth in Kenilworth.

Abbotsford Club, limited to 50 members. It was founded in 1835, for the publication (in quarto) of works pertaining to Scotch history, antiquities, and literature in general. It published upwards of 30 volumes. Extinct.

Abdal-azis, the Moorish governor of Spain after the overthrow of king Roderick. When the Moor assumed regal state and affected Gothic sovereignty, his subjects were so offended that they revolted and murdered him. He married Egilona, formerly the wife of Roderick.—Southey: Roderick, etc., xxii. (1814).

Ab'dalaz'iz (Omar ben), a caliph raised to "Mahomet's bosom" in reward of his great abstinence and self-denial.—Herbelot, 690.

> He was by no means scrupulous; nor did he think with the caliph Omar ben Abdalaziz that it was necessary to make a hell of this world to enjoy paradise in the next.—W. Beckford: Vathek (1786).

Abdal'dar, one of the magicians in the Domdaniel caverns. These spirits were destined to be destroyed by one of the race of Hodei'rah (3 syl.), so they persecuted the race even to death. Only one survived, named Thalaba, and Abdaldar was appointed by lot to find him out and kill him. He discovered the stripling in an Arab's tent, and while in prayer was about to stab him to the heart, when the angel of death breathed on the would-be murderer, and he fell dead with the dagger in his hand. Thalaba drew from the magician's finger a ring which gave him command over the spirits.—Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, ii., 24 (1797).

Abdal'la, one of sir Brian de Bois Gilbert's slaves.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Abdallah, brother and predecessor of Giaf'fer (2 syl.), pacha of Aby'dos. He was murdered by the pacha.—Byron: Bride of Abydos.

Abdal'lah el Hadgi, Saladin's envoy.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Abdals or Santons, a class of religionists who pretend to be inspired with the most ravishing raptures of divine love. Regarded with great veneration by the vulgar.—Olearius, i. 971.

Abde'rian Laughter, scoffing laughter, so called from Abdēra, the birthplace of Democ'ritus, the scoffing or laughing philosopher.

Ab'diel, the faithful seraph who withstood Satan when urged to revolt.

> . . . the seraph Abdiel, faithful found
> Among the faithless; faithful only he
> Among innumerable false; unmoved,
> Unshaken, unseduced, unterrified,
> His loyalty he kept, his love, his zeal.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, v. 896, etc. (1665).

Abel Shufflebottom, the name assumed by Robert Southey in some amatory poems published in 1799.

Abellino, the hero of "Monk" Lewis's story, called the Bravo of Venice. He appears sometimes as a beggar, and sometimes as a bandit. Abellino falls in love with the niece of the doge of Venice, and marries her.

Abensberg (Count), the father of thirty-two children. When Henirich II. made his progress through Germany, and other courtiers presented their offerings, the count brought forward his thirty-two children, "as the most valuable offering he could make to his king and country."

> ¶ Cornēlia, the daughter of Scipio Africanus, is credited with similar sentiment. When a Campanian lady boasted in her presence of her magnificent jewels, Cornelia sent for her two sons, and said, "These are my jewels."

Aberdeen Philosophical Society, instituted 1840.

Abes'sa, the impersonation of abbeys and convents in Spenser's Faërie Queene, i. 3. She is the paramour of Kirkrapine, who used to rob churches and poor-boxes, and bring his plunder to Abessa, daughter of Corcēca (blindness of heart).

Abif (Hiram), one of the three grand-masters of Freemasonry. The other two were Solomon and Hiram of Tyre. Hiram, like Pharaoh, is a dynastic name, and means noble; and ab of Abif means "father;" ab-i means "my father" (see 1 Kings vii. 13; 2 Chron. ii. 12-14).

Abney, called Young Abney, the friend of colonel Albert Lee, a royalist.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, the Commonwealth).

Abou Hassan, a young merchant of Bagdad, and hero of the tale called "The Sleeper Awakened," in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. While Abou Hassan is asleep he is conveyed to the palace of Haroun-al-Raschid, and the attendants are ordered to do everything they can to make him fancy himself the caliph. He subsequently becomes the caliph's chief favourite.

¶ Shakespeare, in the induction of Taming of the Shrew, befools "Christopher Sly" in a similar way, but Sly thinks it was "nothing but a dream."

¶ Philippe le Bon, duke of Burgundy, on his marriage with Eleonora, tried the same trick.—Burton: Anatomy of Melancholy, ii. 2, 4.

Abra, the most beloved of Solomon's concubines.

> Fruits their odour lost and meats their taste,
> If gentle Abra had not decked the feast;
> Dishonoured did the sparkling goblet stand,
> Unless received from gentle Abra's hand; . . .
> Nor could my soul approve the music's tone
> Till all was hushed, and Abra sang alone.
> M. Prior: Solomon (1664-1721).

∴ Solomon had above 1000 concubines, from among the Moabites, Ammonites, Sidonians, and Hittites. The mother of Rehoboam, his successor, was Naamah, an Ammonitess (1 Kings xiv. 20, 21).

Ab'radas, the great Macedonian pirate.

> Abradas, the great Macedonian pirat, thought every one had a letter of mart that bare sayles in the ocean.—Greene: Penelope's Web (1601).

Abraham, calling his wife "sister" (Gen. xii. 11). The special correspondent of the Standard, writing from Afghanistan (March 12, 1888), says, "If a Mahometan's scruples are overcome to such an extent that he will permit a Christian physician to treat his wife, he will call her his "sister."

A'braham's Offering (Gen. xxii.). Abraham at the command of God laid his only son Isaac upon an altar to sacrifice him to Jehovah, when his hand was stayed and a ram substituted for Isaac.

¶ So Agamemnon at Aulis was about to offer up his daughter Iphigeni'a at the command of Artĕmis (Diana), when Artemis carried her off in a cloud and substituted a stag instead.

∴ This ram was one of the 10 animals taken to heaven, according to Mahomet's teaching.

Abroc'omas, the lover of An'thia in the Greek romance called De Amoribus Anthiæ et Abrocomæ, by Xenophon of Ephesus (not the historian).

Absalom. The general idea is that Absalom, fleeing through a wood, was caught by the hair of his head on the bough of a tree, and thus met his death; but the Bible says (2 Sam. xviii. 9), "Absalom rode upon a mule, and the mule went under the thick boughs of a great oak, and his head caught hold of the oak, and he was taken up between the heaven and the earth." Apparently his chin was caught by a branch of the oak, and the mule ran off. There is nothing said about his hair getting entangled in the oak. Yet every one knows the doggerel—

> Oh Absalom, oh Absalom, my son, my son,
> Hadst thou but worn a periwig, thou hadst not been undone!
> David's Lament for his Son Absalom.

Ab'salom, in Dryden's Absalom and Achit'ophel, is meant for the duke of Monmouth, natural son of Charles II. (David). Like Absalom, the duke was handsome; like Absalom, he was loved and rebellious; and, like Absalom, his rebellion ended in his death (1649-1685).

Absalom and Achit'ophel, the best political satire in the language, by Dryden, in about 1000 lines of heroic verse, in rhymes. The general scheme is to show the rebellious character of the puritans, who insisted on the exclusion of the duke of York from the succession, on account of his being a pronounced catholic, and the determination of the king to resist this interference with his royal prerogative, even at the cost of a civil war.

The great difficulty was where to find a substitute. Charles II. had no legal male offspring, and, though he had several natural sons, the duke of Monmouth was the only one who was the idol of the people. So the earl of Shaftesbury (Achitophel), an out-and-out protestant, used every effort to induce Monmouth (Absalom) to compel the king (David) to set aside the duke of York. Shaftesbury says, "Once get the person of the king into your hands, and you may compel him to yield to the people's wishes." Monmouth is over-persuaded to take up the cause "of the redress of grievances," and soon has a large following, amongst whom is Thomas Thynne (Issachar), a very wealthy man, who supplies the duke with ready money. When the rebellion grew formidable, the king called his councillors to meet him at Oxford, and told them he was resolved to defend his prerogatives by force of arms, and thus the poem ends.

 A reply in verse, entitled Azaria and Hushai (q.v.), was written by Samuel Pordage.

Mr. Tate has written a second part, which not only destroys the unity of the poem, but is of very small merit.

 The poem begins with a statement that Charles II. (David) had many natural sons, but only Monmouth (Absalom) had any chance of being his successor. He then remarks that no sort of government would satisfy puritans. They had tried several, but all had failed to please them. On the puritans' side was the earl of Shaftesbury (Achitophel), Titus Oates (Corah), and many others. On the king's side advocates of the "right divine," were the archbishop of Canterbury (Zadoc), the bishop of London (Sagan), the bishop of Rochester and dean of Westminster, the earl of Mulgrave (Abdiel), Sir George Savile (Jotham), Hyde (Hushai), Sir Edward Seymour (Amiel), and many more. Charles II. is called David; London, Jerusalem; catholics, Jebusites; puritans, Jews. France is called Egypt; its king, Pharaoh; and Holland is called Tyre.

Ab'solon, a priggish parish clerk in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. His hair was curled, his shoes slashed, his hose red. He could let blood, cut hair, and shave, could dance, and play either on the ribible or the gittern. This gay spark paid his addresses to Mistress Alison, the young wife of John, a wealthy aged carpenter; but Alison herself loved a poor scholar named Nicholas, a lodger in the house.—The Miller's Tale (1388).

Absolute (Sir Anthony), a testy, but warm-hearted old gentleman, who imagines that he possesses a most angelic temper; and when he quarrels with his son, the captain, fancies it is the son who is out of temper, and not himself. Smollett's "Matthew Bramble" evidently suggested this character. William Dowton (1764-1851) was the best actor of this part.

Captain Absolute, son of sir Anthony, in love with Lydia Languish, the heiress, to whom he is known only as ensign Beverley. Bob Acres, his neighbour, is his rival, and sends a challenge to the unknown ensign; but when he finds that ensign Beverley is captain Absolute, he declines to fight, and resigns all further claim to the lady's hand.—Sheridan: The Rivals (1775).

When you saw Jack Palmers in "captain Absolute," you thought you could trace his promotion to some lady of quality, who fancied the handsome fellow in his top-knot, and had bought him a commission.—Charles Lamb.

Abu'dah, in the Tales of the Genii, by H. Ridley, is a wealthy merchant of Bagdad, who goes in quest of the talisman of Oroma'nês, which he is driven to seek by a little old hag, who haunts him every night and makes his life wretched. He finds at last that the talisman which is to free him of this hag [conscience] is to "fear God and keep His commandments."

Abu'dah, in the drama called The Siege of Damascus, by John Hughes (1720), is the next in command to Caled in the Arabian army set down before Damascus. Though undoubtedly brave, he prefers peace to war; and when, at the death of Caled, he succeeds to the chief command, he makes peace with the Syrians on honourable terms.

Abydos (Bride of). (See BRIDE.)

Acade'mus, an Attic hero, whose garden was selected by Plato for the place of his lectures. Hence his disciples were called the "Academic sect."

The green retreats of Academus.
Akenside: Pleasures of Imagination.

Aca'dia (i.e. Nova Scotia), so called by the French from the river Shubenacadie. In 1621 Acadia was given to sir William Alexander, and its name changed; and in 1755 the old French settlers were driven into exile by George II. Longfellow has made this the subject of a poem in hexameter verse, called Evan'geline (4 syl.).

Acas'to (Lord), father of Seri'no, Casta'lio, and Polydore; and guardian of Monimia "the orphan." He lived to see the death of his sons and his ward. Polydore ran on his brother's sword, Castalio stabbed himself, and Monimia took poison.—Otway: The Orphan (1680).

Accidente! (3 syl.), a curse and oath used in France occasionally.

Accidente! ce qui veut dire en bon français: Puisse-tu mourir d'accident, sans confession, damné.—Mons Abouf: Fille de trois.

Aces'tes (3 syl.). In a trial of skill Acestês, the Sicilian, discharged his arrow with such force that it took fire from the friction of the air.—Virgil: Æneid, v.

Like Acestes' shaft of old,
The swift thought kindles as it flies.
Longfellow: To a Child.

Achates [A-ka'-tese], called by Virgil "fidus Achates." The name has become a synonym for a bosom friend, a crony, but is generally used laughingly.

He, like Achates, faithful to the tomb.
Byron: Don Juan, i. 159.

Acher'ia, the fox, went partnership with a bear in a bowl of milk. Before the bear arrived, the fox skimmed off the cream and drank the milk; then, filling the bowl with mud, replaced the cream atop. Says the fox, "Here is the bowl; one shall have the cream, and the other all the rest: choose, friend, which you like." The bear told the fox to take the cream, and thus bruin had only the mud. —A Basque Tale.

¶ A similar tale occurs in Campbell's Popular Tales of the West Highlands (iii. 98), called "The Keg of Butter." The wolf chooses the bottom when "oats" were the object of choice, and the top when "potatoes" were the sowing.

¶ Rabelais tells the same tale about a farmer and the devil. Each was to have on alternate years what grew under and over the soil. The farmer sowed turnips and carrots when the under-soil produce came to his lot, and barley or wheat when his turn was the over-soil produce.

Ac'heron, the "River of Grief," and one of the five rivers of hell; hell itself. (Greek, ἄχος ῥέω, "I flow with grief.")

Sad Acheron of sorrow, black and deep.
Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 578 (1665).

Achil'les (3 syl.), the hero of the allied Greek army in the siege of Troy, and king of the Myr'midons. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 10.)

The English Achilles, John Talbot, first earl of Shrewsbury (1373–1453).

The duke of Wellington is so called sometimes, and is represented by a statue of Achilles of gigantic size in Hyde Park, London, close to Apsley House (1769–1852).

The Achilles of Germany, Albert, elector of Brandenburg (1414–1486).

Achilles of Rome, Sicin'ius Denta'tus (put to death B.C. 450).

Achilles' Heel, the vulnerable part. It is said that when Thetis dipped her son in the river Styx to make him invulnerable, she held him by the heel, and the part covered by her hand was the only part not washed by the water. This is a post-Homeric story.

(Sometimes Ireland is called the Achilles' heel of England.)

¶ Similarly, the only vulnerable part of Orlando was the sole of his foot, and hence when Bernardo del Carpio assailed him at Roncesvallês, and found that he could not wound him, he lifted him up in his arms and squeezed him to death, as Herculês did Antæ'os.

Achilles' Spear. (See SPEAR OF . . .)

Achit'ophel, "Him who drew Achit'ophel," Dryden, author of the famous political satire of Absalom and Achitophel. "David" is Charles II.; his rebellious son "Absalom" is the king's natural son by Lucy Waters, the handsome but rebellious James duke of Monmouth; and "Achitophel" is the earl of Shaftesbury, "for close designs and crooked counsels fit" (1621–1683).

Can sneer at him who drew Achitophel.
Byron: Don Juan, iii. 100.

There is a portrait of the first earl of Shaftesbury (Dryden's "Achitophel") as lord chancellor of England, clad in ash-coloured robes, because he had never been called to the bar.—E. Yates: Celebrities, xviii.

Acida'lia, a fountain in Bœo'tia, sacred to Venus. The Graces used to bathe therein. Venus was called Acidâlia (Virgil: Æneid, i. 720).

After she weary was
With bathing in the Acidalian brook.
Spenser: Epithalamion (1595).

A'cis, a Sicilian shepherd, loved by the nymph Galate'a. The monster Polypheme (3 syl.), a Cyclops, was his rival, and crushed him under a huge rock. The blood of Acis was changed into a river of the same name at the foot of mount Etna.

 Gay has a serenata called Acis and Galatêa, which was produced at the Haymarket in 1732. Music by Handel.

Not such a pipe, good reader, as that which Acis did sweetly tune in praise of his Galatea, but one of true Delft manufacture.—W. Irving.

Ack'land (Sir Thomas), a royalist.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, the Commonwealth).

Ac'oe (3 syl.), "hearing," in the New Testament sense (Rom. x. 17), "Faith cometh by hearing." The nurse of Fido [faith]. Her daughter is Meditation. (Greek, akoê, "hearing.")

With him [Faith] his nurse went, careful Acoë,
Whose hands first from his mother's womb did take him,
And ever since have fostered tenderly.
Phin Fletcher: The Purple Island, ix. (1633).

Acras'ia, Intemperance personified. Spenser says she is an enchantress living in the "Bower of Bliss," in "Wandering Island." She had the power of transforming her lovers into monstrous shapes; but sir Guyon (temperance), having caught her in a net and bound her, broke down her bower and burnt it to ashes.—Faërie Queene, ii. 12 (1590).

Ac'rates (3 syl.), Incontinence personified in The Purple Island, by Phineas Fletcher. He had two sons (twins) by Caro, viz. Methos (drunkenness) and Gluttony, both fully described in canto vii. (Greek, akrátês, "incontinent.")

Acrates (3 syl.), Incontinence personified in The Faërie Queene, by Spenser. He is the father of Cymoch'lês and Pyroch'lês.—Bk. ii. 4 (1590).

Acres (Bob), a country gentleman, the rival of ensign Beverley, alias captain Absolute, for the hand and heart of Lydia Languish, the heiress. He tries to ape the man of fashion, gets himself up as a loud swell, and uses "sentimental oaths," i.e. oaths bearing on the subject. Thus if duels are spoken of he says, ods triggers and flints; if clothes, ods frogs and lambours; if music, ods minnums [minims] and crotchets; if ladies, ods blushes and blooms. This he learnt from a militia officer, who told him the ancients swore by Jove, Bacchus, Mars, Venus, Minerva, etc., according to the sentiment. Bob Acres is a great blusterer, and talks big of his daring, but when put to the push "his courage always oozed out of his fingers' ends." J. Quick was the original Bob Acres.—Sheridan: The Rivals (1775).

> As thro' his palms Bob Acres' valour oozed,
> So Juan's virtue ebbed, I know not how.
> Byron: Don Juan.

Acris'ius, father of Dan'aê. An oracle declared that Danaê would give birth to a son who would kill him, so Acrisius kept his daughter shut up in an apartment under ground, or (as some say) in a brazen tower. Here she became the mother of Per'seus (2 syl.), by Jupiter in the form of a shower of gold. The king of Argos now ordered his daughter and her infant to be put into a chest, and cast adrift on the sea, but they were rescued by Dictys, a fisherman. When grown to manhood, Perseus accidentally struck the foot of Acrisius with a quoit, and the blow caused his death. This tale is told by Mr. Morris in The Earthly Paradise (April).

Actæ'on, a hunter, changed by Diana into a stag. A synonym for a cuckold.

> Divulge Page himself for a secure and wilful Actæon [cuckold].
> Shakespeare: Merry Wives, etc., act iii. sc. 2 (1596).

Acte'a, a female slave faithful to Nero in his fall. It was this hetæra who wrapped the dead body in cerements and saw it decently interred.

> This Actea was beautiful. She was seated on the ground; the head of Nero was on her lap, his naked body was stretched on those winding-sheets in which she was about to fold him, to lay him in his grave upon the garden hill.—Ouida: Ariadné, i. 7.

Ac'tius Since'rus, the pen-name of the Italian poet Sannazaro, called "The Christian Virgil" (1458–1530).

Actors (Female). In 1662 Charles II. first licensed women to act women's parts, which up to that time had been performed by men and boys.

> Whereas the women's parts in plays have hitherto been acted by men in the habits of women, at which some have taken offence, we do permit and give leave for the time to come, that all women's parts be acted by women.

Actors and Actresses. The last male actor that took a woman's character on the stage was Edward Kynaston, noted for his beauty (1619–1687). The first female actor for hire was Mrs. Saunderson, afterwards Mrs. Betterton, who died in 1712.

Acts and Monuments, by John Fox, better known as "The Book of Martyrs," published in one large vol., folio, 1563. It had an immense sale. Bishop Burnet says he had "compared the book with the records, and had not discovered any errors or prevarications, but the utmost fidelity and exactness." The Catholics call the book "Fox's Golden Legends."

Ad, Ad'ites (2 syl.). Ad is a tribe descended from Ad, son of Uz, son of Irem, son of Shem, son of Noah. The tribe, at the Confusion of Babel, went and settled on Al-Ahkâf [the Winding Sands], in the province of Hadramaut. Shedâd was their first king, but in consequence of his pride, both he and all the tribe perished, either from drought or the Sarsar (an icy wind).—Sale's Koran, i.

> Woe, woe, to Irem! Woe to Ad!
> Death is gone up into her palaces!
> They fell around me. Thousands fell around.
> The king and all his people fell;
> All, all, they perished all.
> Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, i. 41, 45 (1797).

A'dah, wife of Cain. After Cain had been conducted by Lucifer through the realms of space, he is restored to the home of his wife and child, where all is beauty, gentleness, and love. Full of faith and fervent in gratitude, Adah loves her infant with a sublime eternal affection. She sees him sleeping, and says to Cain—

How lovely he appears! His little cheeks
In their pure incarnation, vying with
The rose leaves strewn beneath them.
And his lips, too.
How beautifully parted! No; you shall not Kiss him; at least not now. He will awake soon—
His hour of midday rest is nearly over.
Byron: Cain.

 According to Arabic tradition, Adah was buried at Aboucais, a mountain in Arabia.

ADAM. In Greek this word is compounded of the four initial letters of the cardinal quarters:

Arktos,	ἄρκτος	. north.
Dusis,	δύσις	. west.
Anatole,	ἀνατολή	. east.
Mesembria,	μεσημβρία	south.

The Hebrew word ADM forms the anagram of A[dam], D[avid], M[essiah].

Adam, how made. God created the body of Adam of Saizal, i.e. dry, unbaked clay, and left it forty nights without a soul. The clay was collected by Azarael from the four quarters of the earth, and God, to show His approval of Azarael's choice, constituted him the angel of death.—Rabadan.

Adam, Eve, and the Serpent. After the fall Adam was placed on mount Vassem in the east; Eve was banished to Djidda (now Gedda, on the Arabian coast); and the Serpent was exiled to the coast of Eblehh.

After the lapse of 100 years Adam rejoined Eve on mount Arafaith [place of remembrance], near Mecca.—D'Ohsson.

Death of Adam. Adam died on Friday, April 7, at the age of 930 years. Michael swathed his body, and Gabriel discharged the funeral rites. The body was buried at Ghar'ul-Kenz [the grotto of treasure], which overlooks Mecca.

His descendants at death amounted to 40,000 souls.—D'Ohsson.

When Noah entered the ark (the same writer says) he took the body of Adam in a coffin with him, and, when he left the ark, restored it to the place he had taken it from.

Adam, a bailiff, a jailor.

Not that Adam that kept the paradise, but that Adam that keeps the prison.—Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, act iv. sc. 3 (1593).

Adam, a faithful retainer in the family of sir Rowland de Boys. At the age of four score, he voluntarily accompanied his young master Orlando into exile, and offered to give him his little savings. He has given birth to the phrase, "A faithful Adam" [or man-servant].—Shakespeare: As You Like It (1598).

Adam Bede. (See BEDE.)

Adam Bell, a northern outlaw, noted for his archery. The name, like those of Clym of the Clough, William of Cloudesley, Robin Hood, and Little John, is synonymous with a good archer.

Adamas or Adamant, the mineral called corun'dum, and sometimes the diamond, one of the hardest substances known.

Albrecht was as firm as Adamas.—Schmidt: German History (translated).

Adamastor, the Spirit of the Cape. (See SPIRIT . . .)—Camoens: The Lusiad, v. (1569).

Adam'ida, a planet, on which reside the unborn spirits of saints, martyrs, and believers. U'riel, the angel of the sun, was ordered at the crucifixion to interpose this planet between the sun and the earth, so as to produce a total eclipse.

Adamida, in obedience to the divine command, flew amidst overwhelming storms, rushing clouds, falling mountains, and swelling seas. Uriel stood on the pole of the star, but so lost in deep contemplation on Golgotha, that he heard not the wild uproar. On coming to the region of the sun, Adamida slackened her course, and advancing before the sun, covered its face and intercepted all its rays.—Klopstock: The Messiah, viii. (1771).

ADAMS (John), one of the mutineers of the Bounty (1790), who settled in Tahiti. In 1814 he was discovered as the patriarch of a colony, brought up with a high sense of religion and strict regard to morals. In 1839 the colony was voluntarily placed under the protection of the British Government.

Adams (Parson), the beau-ideal of a simple-minded, benevolent, but eccentric country clergyman, of unswerving integrity, solid learning, and genuine piety; bold as a lion in the cause of truth, but modest as a girl in all personal matters; wholly ignorant of the world, being "in it but not of it."—Fielding: Joseph Andrews (1742).

His learning, his simplicity, his evangelical purity of mind, are so admirably mingled with pedantry, absence of mind, and the habit of athletic . . . exercises . . . that he may be safely termed one of the richest productions of the muse of fiction. Like don Quixote, parson Adams is beaten a little too much and too often, but the cudgel lights upon his shoulders . . . without the slightest stain to his reputation.—Sir W. Scott.

 The Rev. W. Young, editor of "Ainsworth's Latin Dictionary," is said to have been the original of Fielding's "Parson Adams."

Adams (The Narrative of Robert), who was wrecked in 1810 on the west coast of Africa, and kept in slavery for 3 years. This "marvellous but authentic" narrative was published in 1816.

Adder (Deaf). It is said in fable that the adder, to prevent hearing the voice of a charmer, lays one ear on the ground and sticks his tail into the other.

> . . . when man wolde him enchante,
> He leyeth downe one eare all flat
> Unto the grounde, and halt it fast;
> And eke that other eare als faste
> He stoppeth with his taille so sore
> That he the wordes, lasse or more,
> Of his echantèment ne hereth.
> Gower: De Confessione Amantis, i. x. (1483).

Adder's Tongue, that is, oph'ioglos'sum.

> For them that are with [by] newts, or snakes, or adders stung.
> He seeketh out an herb that's callèd adder's tongue.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Addison (Joseph), poet and satirist (1672–1719), editor of the Spectator, and author of Cato, a tragedy, which preserves the French Unities. His style has been greatly lauded, but it is too artificial and too Latinized to be a model of English composition.

> Whoever wishes to attain an English style, familiar but not coarse, and elegant but not ostentatious, must give his days and nights to the study of Addison.—Dr. Johnson.

∴ Dr. Johnson himself was far too artificial and Latinized to be an authority on such a matter.

> Never, not even by Dryden, not even by Temple, had the English language been written with such sweetness, grace, and facility.—Macaulay.

The Spanish Addison, Benedict Jerome Feyjoo (1701–1764).

Adelaide, daughter of the count of Narbonne, in love with Theodore. She is killed by her father in mistake for another.—Robert Jephson: Count of Narbonne (1782).

Adeline (Lady), the wife of lord Henry Amun'deville (4 syl.), a highly educated aristocratic lady, with all the virtues and weaknesses of the upper ten. After the parliamentary sessions this noble pair filled their house with guests, amongst which were the duchess of Fitz-Fulke, the duke of D——, Aurora Raby, and don Juan "the Russian envoy." The tale not being finished, no sequel to these names is given. (For the lady's character, see xiv. 54–56.)—Bryon: Don Juan, xii. to the end.

Ad'emar or Adema'ro, archbishop of Poggio, an ecclesiastical warrior in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 14.)

Adic'ia, wife of the soldan, who incites him to distress the kingdom of Mercilla. When Mercilla sends her ambassador, Samient, to negotiate peace, Adicia, in violation of international law, thrusts her [Samient] out of doors like a dog, and sets two knights upon her. Sir Ar'tegal comes to her rescue, attacks the two knights, and knocks one of them from his saddle with such force that he breaks his neck. After the discomfiture of the soldan, Adicia rushes forth with a knife to stab Samient, but, being intercepted by sir Artegal, is changed into a tigress.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 8 (1596).

(The "soldan" is king Philip II. of Spain; "Mercilla" is queen Elizabeth; "Adicia" is Injustice personified, or the bigotry of popery; and "Samient" the ambassadors of Holland, who went to Philip for redress of grievances, and were most iniquitously detained by him as prisoners.)

Ad'icus, Unrighteousness personified in canto vii. of The Purple Island (1633), by Phineas Fletcher. He has eight sons and daughters, viz. Ec'thros (hatred), Eris (variance) a daughter, Zelos (emulation), Thumos (wrath), Erith'ius (strife), Dichos'tasis (sedition), Envy, and Phon'os (murder); all fully described by the poet. (Greek, adikos, "an unjust man.")

Adie of Aikenshaw, a neighbour of the Glendinnings.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Adme'tus, a king of Thessaly, husband of Alcestis. Apollo, being condemned by Jupiter to serve a mortal for twelve months for slaying a Cyclops, entered the service of Admetus. James R. Lowell, of Boston, U.S., has a poem on the subject, called The Shepherd of King Admetus (1819–1892).

Ad'mirable (The): (1) Aben-Esra, a Spanish rabbin, born at Tole'do (1119–1174). (2) James Crichton (Kry-ton), the Scotchman (1551–1573). (3) Roger Bacon, called "The Admirable Doctor" (1214–1292).

Admiral Hosier's Ghost. (See HOSIER.)

Adolf, bishop of Cologne, was devoured by mice or rats in 1112. (See HATTO.)

Adolpha, daughter of general Kleiner, governor of Prague, and wife of Idenstein. Her only fault was "excess of too sweet nature, which ever made another's grief her own."—Knowles: Maid of Mariendorpt (1830).

Ad'ona, a seraph, the tutelar spirit of James, the "first martyr of the twelve."—Klopstock: The Messiah, iii. (1748).

Adon-Ai, the spirit of love and beauty, in lord Lytton's Zanoni (q.v.).

Adonais, an elegy by Percy Bysshe Shelley on John Keats (1821). As he was born in 1796, he was about 25 at his death. The Quarterly Review attacked his Endymion, and Byron, who had no love for Reviewers, says this hastened his death.

> John Keats, who was killed by one critique,
> Just as he really promised something great,
> If not intelligible without Greek,
> Contrived to talk about the gods of late, . . .
> Poor fellow, his was an untoward fate;
> 'Tis strange the mind, that very fiery particle,
> Should let itself be snuffed out by an article.

A'donbec el Hakim, the physician, a disguise assumed by Saladin, who visits sir Kenneth's sick squire, and cures him of a fever.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Ado'nis, a beautiful youth, beloved by Venus and Proser'pina, who quarrelled about the possession of him. Jupiter, to settle the dispute, decided that the boy should spend six months with Venus in the upper world, and six with Proserpina in the lower. Adonis was gored to death by a wild boar in a hunt.

Shakespeare has a poem called Venus and Adonis. Shelley calls his elegy on the poet Keats Adona'is, under the idea that the untimely death of Keats resembled that of Adonis. George IV. was called by Hunt "The fat Adonis of 50."

(Adonis is an allegory of the sun, which is six months north of the horizon, and six months south. Thammûz is the same as Adonis, and so is Osîris.)

Ado'nis Flower, the pheasant's eye or red maithes, called in French goute de sang, and said to have sprung from the blood of Adonis, who was killed by a wild boar.

> O fleur, si chère à Cythérée,
> Ta corolle fut, en naissant,
> Du sang d'Adonis colorée.
> Anonymous.

Adonis's Garden. It is said that Adonis delighted in gardens, and had a magnificent one. Pliny says (xix. 4), "Antiquitas nihil prius mirata est quam Hesperidum hortos, ac regum Adonidis et Alcinöi."

An Adonis' garden, a very short-lived pleasure; a temporary garden of cut flowers; an horticultural or floricultural show. The allusion is to the fennel and lettuce jars of the ancient Greeks, called "Adonis' gardens," because these plants were reared for the annual festival of Adonis, and were thrown away when the festival was over.

> How shall I honour thee for this success?
> Thy promises are like Adonis' gardens,
> That one day bloom'd, and fruitful were the next.
> Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act i. sc. 6 (1589).

Ad'oram, a seraph, who had charge of James the son of Alphe'us.—Klopstock: The Messiah, iii. (1748).

Adosinda, daughter of the Gothic governor of Auria, in Spain. The Moors having slaughtered her parents, husband, and child, preserved her alive for the captain of Alcahman's regiment. She went to his tent without the least resistance, but implored the captain to give her one night to mourn the death of those so near and dear to her. To this he complied, but during sleep she murdered him with his own scimitar. Roderick, disguised as a monk, helped her to bury the dead bodies of her house, and then she vowed to live for only one object, vengeance. In the great battle, when the Moors were overthrown, she it was who gave the word of attack, "Victory and Vengeance!"—Southey: Roderick, etc., iii. (1814).

Adram'elech (ch=k), one of the fallen angels. Milton makes him overthrown by U'riel and Raphaël (Paradise Lost, vi. 365). According to Scripture, he was one of the idols of Sepharvaim, and Shalmane'ser introduced his worship into Samaria. [The word means "the mighty magnificent king."]

> The Sepharvites burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech.—2 Kings xvii. 31.

Klopstock introduces him into The Messiah, and represents him as surpassing Satan in malice and guile, ambition and mischief. He is made to hate every one, even Satan, of whose rank he is jealous; and whom he hoped to overthrow, that by putting an end to his servitude he might become the supreme god of all the created worlds. At the crucifixion he and Satan are both driven back to hell by Obad'don, the angel of death.

Adraste' (2 syl.), a French gentleman, who enveigles a Greek slave named Isidore from don Pèdre. His plan is this: He gets introduced as a portrait-painter, and thus imparts to Isidore his love and obtains her consent to elope with him. He then sends his slave Zaïde (2 syl.) to don Pèdre, to craye protection for ill treatment, and Pèdre promises to befriend her. At this moment Adraste appears, and demands that Zaïde be given up to him to punish as he thinks proper. Pèdre intercedes; Adraste seems to relent; and Pèdre calls for Zaïde. Out comes Isidore instead, with Zaïde's veil. "There," says Pèdre, "take her and use her well." "I will do so," says the Frenchman, and leads off the Greek slave.—Molière: Le Sicilien ou L'Amour Peintre (1667).

Adrastus, an Indian prince from the banks of the Ganges, who aided the king of Egypt against the Crusaders. He wore a serpent's skin, and rode on an elephant. Adrastus was slain by Rinaldo. —Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, bk. xx.

Adrastus, king of Argos, the leader of the confederate army which besieged Thebes in order to place Polynices on the throne usurped by his brother Etĕŏclēs. —Statius: The Thebaid.

The siege of Thebes occurred before the siege of Troy; but Statius lived about a century after Virgil. Virgil died B.C. 19; Statius died A.D. 96.

A'dria, the Adriatic.

Fled over Adria to the Hesperian fields [Italy].
Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 520 (1665).

Adrian'a, a wealthy Ephesian lady, who marries Antiph'olus, twin-brother of Antipholus of Syracuse. The abbess Æmilia is her mother-in-law, but she knows it not; and one day when she accuses her husband of infidelity, she says to the abbess, if he is unfaithful it is not from want of remonstrance, "for it is the one subject of our conversation. In bed I will not let him sleep for speaking of it; at table I will not let him eat for speaking of it; when alone with him I talk of nothing else, and in company I give him frequent hints of it. In a word, all my talk is how vile and bad it is in him to love another better than he loves his wife" (act v. sc. 1).—Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors (1593).

Adria'no de Arma'do (Don), a pompous, fantastical Spaniard, a military braggart in a state of peace, as Parolles (3 syl.) was in war. Boastful but poor, a coiner of words but very ignorant, solemnly grave but ridiculously awkward, majestical in gait but of very low propensities.—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost (1594).

(Said to be designed for John Florio, surnamed "The Resolute," a philologist. Holofernes, the pedantic schoolmaster, in the same play, is also meant in ridicule of the same lexicographer.)

Adriat'ic wedded to the Doge. The ceremony of wedding the Adriatic to the doge of Venice was instituted in 1174 by pope Alexander III., who gave the doge a gold ring from his own finger in token of the victory achieved by the Venetian fleet at Istria over Frederick Barbarossa. The pope, in giving the ring, desired the doge to throw a similar one into the sea every year on Ascension Day in commemoration of this event. The doge's brigantine was called Bucentaur.

You may remember, scarce five years are past
Since in your brigantine you sailed to see
The Adriatic wedded to our duke.
Otway: Venice Preserved, I. 1 (1682).

Ad'riel, in Dryden's Absalom and Achit'ophel, the earl of Mulgrave, a royalist.

Sharp-judging Adriel, the Muses' friend;
Himself a muse. In sanhedrim's debate
True to his prince, but not a slave to state;
Whom David's love with honours did adorn,
That from his disobedient son were torn.
Part i. 838, etc.

(John Sheffield, earl of Mulgrave (1649-1721), wrote an Essay on Poetry.)

Adventures of Philip, "on his way through the world, showing who robbed him, who helped him, and who passed him by." A novel by Thackeray (1860). Probably suggested by Lesage's Gil Blas.

Æ'acus, king of Œno'pia, a man of such integrity and piety, that he was made at death one of the three judges of hell. The other two were Minos and Rhadaman'thus.

Ægeon, a huge monster with 100 arms and 50 heads, who with his brothers, Cottus and Gygês, conquered the Titans by hurling at them 300 rocks at once. Homer says men call him "Ægeon," but by the gods he is called Bri'areus (3 syl.).

(Milton accents the word on the first syllable, and so does Fairfax in his translation of Tasso.—See Paradise Lost, i. 746.)

Where on the Ægean shore a city stands.
Milton: Paradise Regained, iv. 048.

(And again in Paradise Lost, bk. i. 746.)

O er Ægeon seas through many a Greekish hold.
Fairfax: Tasso, canto 1, stanza 60.

N.B.—Undoubtedly the word is Ægēon. Some insist on calling Virgil's epic the Æ'neid.

Ægeon, a merchant of Syracuse, in Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors (1593).

Ægi'na, a rocky island in the Saronic gulf. It was near this island that the Athenians won the famous naval battle of Sal'amis over the fleet of Xerxēs, B.C. 480. The Athenian prows were decorated with a figure-head of Athe'nē or Minerva.

And of old
Rejoiced the virgin from the brazen prow
Of Athens o'er Æginà's gloomy surge
. . . o'erwhelming all the Persian promised glory.
Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads.

Ægyptian Thief (The), who "at the point of death killed what he loved." This was Thyāmis of Memphis, captain of a band of robbers. He fell in love with Charicl ēa, a captive; but, being surprised by a stronger band, and despairing of life, he slew her, that she might be his companion in the world of shadows. —Heliodorus: Ethiopics.

Æ'lia Læ'lia [Crispis], an inexplicable riddle, so called from an inscription in Latin, preserved in Bologna, which may be rendered thus into English:

ÆLIA LÆLIA CRISPIS.

Neither man, nor woman, nor androgyne;
Neither girl, nor boy, nor eld;
Neither harlot nor virgin;
But all [of these].

Carried off neither by hunger, nor sword, nor poison;
But by all [of them].
Neither in heaven, nor in the water, nor in the earth;
But biding everywhere.

¶ LUCIUS AGATHO PRISCUS.

Neither the husband, nor lover, nor friend;
Neither grieving, nor rejoicing, nor weeping;
But [doing] all [these]—

This—neither a pile, nor a pyramid, nor a sepulchre
That is built, he knows and knows not [which it is].
It is a sepulchre containing no corpse within it;
It is a corpse with no sepulchre containing it;
But the corpse and the sepulchre are one and the same.

It would scarcely guide a man to the solution of the "Ælia Lælia Crispis."—J. W. Draper.

Æmelia, a lady of high degree, in love with Am'ias, a squire of inferior rank. Going to meet her lover at a trysting-place, she was caught up by a hideous monster, and thrust into his den for future food. Belphœbē (3 syl.) slew "the caitiff" and released the maid (canto vii.). Prince Arthur, having slain Corflambo, released Amias from the durance of Pæa'na, Corflambo's daughter, and brought the lovers together "in peace and settled rest" (canto ix.).—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. (1596).

Æmil'ia, wife of Æge'on the Syracusian merchant, and mother of the twins called Antiph'olus. When the boys were shipwrecked, she was parted from them and taken to Ephesus. Here she entered a convent, and rose to be the abbess. Without her knowing it, one of her twins also settled in Ephesus, and rose to be one of its greatest and richest citizens. The other son and her husband Ægēon both set foot in Ephesus the same day without the knowledge of each other, and all met together in the duke's court, when the story of their lives was told, and they became again united to each other.—Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors (1593).

Æmon'ian Arts, magic, so called from Æmon'ia (Thessaly), noted for magic.

Æmonian (The). Jason was so called because his father was king of Æmonia.

Æne'as, a Trojan prince, the hero of Virgil's epic called Ænēid. He was the son of Anchi'ses and Venus. His first wife was Creu'sa (3 syl.), by whom he had a son named Asca'nius; his second wife was Lavinia, daughter of Latīnus king of Italy, by whom he had a posthumous son called Æne'as Sylvius. He succeeded his father-in-law in the kingdom, and the Romans called him their founder.

(According to Geoffrey of Monmouth, "Brutus," the first king of Britain (from whom the island was called Britain), was a descendant of Æneas. Of course this is mere fable.)

Æneas, wandering prince of Troy, a ballad in Percy's Reliques (bk. ii. 22). The tale differs from that of Virgil in some points. Æneas remained in Carthage one day, and then departed. Dido slew herself "with bloody knife." Æneas reached "an ile of Greece, where he stayed a long time," when Dido's ghost appeared to him, and reproved him for perfidy; whereupon a "multitude of uglye fiends" carried him off, "and no man knew his dying day."

∴ Virgil says that Dido destroyed herself on a funeral pile.

Æne'id, the epic poem of Virgil, in twelve books. When Troy was taken by the Greeks and set on fire, Æne'as with his father, son, and wife, took flight, with the intention of going to Italy, the original birthplace of the family. The wife was lost, and the old father died on the way; but after numerous perils by sea and land, Æneas and his son Asca'nius reached Italy. Here Latīnus, the reigning king, received the exiles hospitably, and promised his daughter Lavin'ia in marriage to Æneas; but she had been already betrothed by her mother to prince Turnus, son of Daunus, king of the Ru'tuli, and Turnus would not forego his claim. Latinus, in this dilemma, said the rivals must settle the dispute by an appeal to arms. Turnus being slain, Æneas married Lavinia, and ere long succeeded his father-in-law on the throne.

Book I. The escape from Troy; Æneas and his son, driven by a tempest on the shores of Carthage, are hospitably entertained by queen Dido.

II. Æneas tells Dido the tale of the wooden horse, the burning of Troy, and his flight with his father, wife, and son. The wife was lost and died.

III. The narrative continued; he recounts the perils he met with on his way, and the death of his father.

IV. Dido falls in love with Æneas; but he steals away from Carthage, and Dido, on a funeral pyre, puts an end to her life.

V. Æneas reaches Sicily, and witnesses there the annual games. This book corresponds to the Iliad, xxiii.

VI. Æneas visits the infernal regions. This book corresponds to Odyssey, xi.

VII. Latinus king of Italy entertains Æneas, and promises to him Lavin'ia (his daughter) in marriage; but prince Turnus had been already betrothed to her by the mother, and raises an army to resist Æneas.

VIII. Preparations on both sides for a general war.

IX. Turnus, during the absence of Æneas, fires the ships and assaults the camp. The episode of Nisus and Eury'alus. (See NISUS.)

X. The war between Turnus and Æneas. Episode of Mezentius and Lausus. (See LAUSUS.)

XI. The battle continued.

XII. Turnus challenges Æneas to single combat, and is killed.

N.B.—1. The story of Simon and taking of Troy is borrowed from Pisander, as Macrobius informs us.
2. The loves of Dido and Æneas are copied from those of Medea and Jason, in Apollonius.
3. The story of the wooden horse and the burning of Troy are from Arcti'nus of Milētus.

Æ'olus, god of the winds, which he kept imprisoned in a cave in the Æolian Islands, and let free as he wished or as the over-gods commanded.

> Was I for this nigh wrecked upon the sea,
> And twice by awkward wind from England's bank
> Drove back again unto my native clime? . . .
> Yet Æolus would not be a murderer,
> But left that hateful office unto thee.
> Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI. act v. sc. 2 (1591).

Æscula'pius, in Greek Askle'pios, the god of healing.

> What says my Æsculapius? my Galen? . . . Ha! is he dead?
> Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, act ii. sc. 3 (1601).

Æ'son, the father of Jason. He was restored to youth by Medēa, who infused into his veins the juice of certain herbs.

> In such a night,
> Medea gather'd the enchanted herbs
> That did renew old Æson.
> Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, act v. sc. 1 (before 1598).

Æsop, fabulist. His fables in Greek prose are said to have been written about B.C. 570. Æsop was a slave, and, as he was hump-backed, a hump-backed man is called "an Æsop;" hence the young son of Henry VI. calls his uncle Richard of Gloucester "Æsop."—3 Henry VI. act v. sc. 5.

∴ Æsop's fables were first translated into English by Caxton in 1484; they were paraphrased by John Ogilby in 1665, and since then by many others. (See Lowndes: Bibliographer's Manual.)

Æsop of Arabia (The), Lokman; and Nassen (fifth century).

Æsop of England (The), John Gay (1688-1732).

Æsop of France (The), Jean de la Fontaine (1621-1695).

Æsop of Germany (The), Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729-1781).

Æsop of India (The), Bidpay or Pilpay (third century B.C.).

Afer, the south-west wind. Notus is the full-south wind.

> Notus and Afer black with thund'rous clouds.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 702 (1665).

African Magician (The) pretended to Aladdin to be his uncle, and sent the lad to fetch the "wonderful lamp" from an underground cavern. As Aladdin refused to hand the lamp to the magician, he shut the lad in the cavern, and left him there. Aladdin contrived to get out of the cavern by virtue of a magic ring, and, learning the secret of the lamp, became immensely rich, built a superb palace, and married the sultan's daughter. Several years after, the African resolved to make himself master of the lamp, and accordingly walked up and down before the palace, crying incessantly, "Who will change old lamps for new?" Aladdin being on a hunting excursion, his wife sent a eunuch to exchange the "wonderful lamp" for a new one; and forthwith the magician commanded "the slaves of the lamp" to transport the palace and all it contained into Africa. Aladdin caused him to be poisoned in a draught of wine.—Arabian Nights ("Aladdin, or The Wonderful Lamp").

Af'rit or Afreet, a kind of Medusa or Lamia, the most terrible and cruel of all the orders of the deevs.—Herbelot, 66.

From the hundred chimneys of the village.
Like the Afreet in the Arabian story [Introduct. Tale],
Smoky columns tower aloft into the air of amber.
Longfellow: The Golden Milestone.

Agag, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achit'ophel, is sir Edmondbury Godfrey, the magistrate, who was found murdered in a ditch near Primrose Hill. Titus Oates, in the same satire, is called "Corah."

Corah might for Agag's murder call,
In terms as coarse as Samuel used to Saul.
Part I. 677–78.

Agamemnon, king of the Argives and commander-in-chief of the allied Greeks in the siege of Troy. Introduced by Shakespeare in his Troilus and Cressida.

James Thomson, in 1758, produced a tragedy so called; but it met with no success.

Vixêre ante Agamem'nona fortes, "There were brave men before Agamemnon;" we are not to suppose that there were no great and good men in former times. A similar proverb is: "There are hills beyond Pentland, and fields beyond Forth."

Agandecca, daughter of Starno king of Lochlin [Scandinavia], promised in marriage to Fingal king of Morven [north-west of Scotland]. The maid told Fingal to beware of her father, who had set an ambush to kill him. Fingal, being thus forewarned, slew the men in ambush; and Starno, in rage, murdered his daughter, who was buried by Fingal in Ardven [Argyle].

The daughter of the snow overheard, and left the hall of her secret sigh. She came in all her beauty, like the moon from the cloud of the east. Loveliness was around her as light. Her step was like the music of songs. She saw the youth and loved him. He was the stolen sigh of her soul. Her blue eyes rolled in secret on him, and she blessed the chief of Morven.—Ossian: Fingal, iii.

Aganip'pe (4 syl.), Fountain of the Muses, at the foot of mount Hel'icon, in Bœo'tia

From Helicon's harmonious springs
A thousand rills their mazy progress take.
Gray: Progress of Poetry.

Ag'ape (3 syl.) the fay. She had three sons at a birth, Priamond, Diamond, and Triamond. Being anxious to know the future lot of her sons, she went to the abyss of Demogorgon, to consult the "Three Fatal Sisters." Clotho showed her the threads, which "were thin as those spun by a spider." She begged the Fates to lengthen the life-threads, but they said this could not be; they consented, however, to this arrangement—

When ye shred with fatal knife
His line which is the shortest of the three,
Eftsoon his life may pass into the next;
And when the next shall likewise ended be,
That both their lives may likewise be annext
Unto the third, that his may be so trebly wext.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 2 (1590).

Agapi'da (Fray Antonio), the imaginary chronicler of The Conquest of Granada, written by Washington Irving (1829).

Ag'aric, a genus of fungi, some of which are very nauseous and disgusting.

That smells as foul-fleshed agaric in the holt [forest].
Tennyson: Gareth and Lynette.

Agast'ya (3 syl.), a dwarf who drank the sea dry. As he was walking one day with Vishnoo, the insolent ocean asked the god who the pigmy was that strutted by his side. Vishnoo replied it was the patriarch Agastya, who was going to restore earth to its true balance. Ocean, in contempt, spat its spray in the pigmy's face, and the sage, in revenge of this affront, drank the waters of the ocean, leaving the bed quite dry.—Maurice.

Ag'atha, daughter of Cuno, and the betrothed of Max, in Weber's opera of Der Freischütz. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 21.)

Agath'ocles (4 syl.), tyrant of Sicily. He was the son of a potter, and raised himself from the ranks to become general of the army. He reduced all Sicily under his power. When he attacked the Carthaginians, he burnt his ships, that his soldiers might feel assured they must either conquer or die. Agathoclês died of poison administered by his grandson (B.C. 361–289).

(Voltaire has a tragedy called Agathocle, and Caroline Pichler has an excellent German novel entitled Agathoclês.)

¶ Julian, the Roman emperor (361–363), when he crossed the Tigris, in his war against the Persians, burnt his ships; but, after many victories, was mortally wounded and died.

Agathon, the hero and title of a philosophic romance by C. M. Wieland (1733–1813). This is considered the best of his novels, though some prefer his Don Sylvio de Rosalva.

Agathos, a volume of allegorical stories by Samuel Wilberforce, bishop of Winchester, published in 1840.

Agdistes (3 syl.), the mystagog of the Acrasian bower, or the evil genius loci. Spenser says the ancients call "Self" the Agdistes of man; and the Socratic "dæmon" was his Agdistes.

> They in that place him "Genius" did call;
> Not that celestial power . . . sage Antiquity
> Did wisely make, and good Agdistes call;
> But this . . . was . . . the foe of life.
> Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 12 (1590).

Agdis'tis, a genius of human form, uniting the two sexes, and born of the stone Agdus (q.v.). This tradition has been preserved by Pausanias.

Agdus, a stone of enormous size, parts of which were taken by Deucalion and Pyrrha to throw over their heads, in order to repeople the world desolated by the Flood.—Arnobius.

Aged (The), so Wemmick's father is called. He lived in "the castle at Walworth." Wemmick at "the castle" and Wemmick in business are two "different beings."

> Wemmick's house was a little wooden cottage, in the midst of plots of garden, and the top of it was cut out and painted like a battery mounted with guns. . . . It was the smallest of houses, with queer Gothic windows (by far the greater part of them sham), and a Gothic door, almost too small to get in at. . . . On Sundays he ran up a real flag. . . . The bridge was a plank, and it crossed a chasm about four feet wide and two deep. . . . At nine o'clock every night "the gun fired, the gun being mounted in a separate fortress made of lattice-work. It was protected from the weather by a tarpaulin . . . umbrella.—Dickens: Great Expectations, xxv. (1860).

Ag'elastes (Michael), the cynic philosopher.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Ages. The Age of the Bishops, according to Hallam, was the ninth century.

The Age of the Popes, according to Hallam, was the twelfth century.

Varo recognizes Three Ages: 1st. From the beginning of man to the great Flood (the period wholly unknown). 2nd. From the Flood to the first Olympiad (the mythical period). 3rd. From the first Olympiad to the present time (the historical period). —Varo: Fragments, 219 (edit. Scaliger).

Agesila'us (5 syl.). Plutarch tells us that Agesilaus king of Sparta was one day discovered riding cock-horse on a long stick, to please and amuse his children.

¶ A very similar tale is told of George III. When the footman announced the name of the caller, George III. inquired if the stranger was a father, and being answered in the affirmative, replied, "Then let him be admitted."

A'gib (King), "The Third Calender" (Arabian Nights' Entertainments). He was wrecked on the loadstone mountain, which drew all the nails and iron bolts from his ship; but he overthrew the bronze statue on the mountain-top, which was the cause of the mischief. Agib visited the ten young men, each of whom had lost his right eye, and was carried by a roc to the palace of the forty princesses, with whom he tarried a year. The princesses were then obliged to leave for forty days, but entrusted him with the keys of the palace, with free permission to enter every room but one. On the fortieth day curiosity induced him to open this room, where he saw a horse, which he mounted, and was carried through the air to Bagdad. The horse then deposited him, and knocked out his right eye with a whisk of its tail, as it had done the ten "young men" above referred to.

Agincourt (The Battle of), a poem by Michael Drayton (1627). The metre is like that of Byron's Don Juan.

Agitator (The Irish), Daniel O'Connell (1775–1847).

Agned Cathregonion, the scene of one of the twelve battles of king Arthur. The old name of Edinburgh was Agned.

> Ebraucus, a man of great stature and wonderful strength, took upon him the government of Britain, which he held forty years. . . . He built the city of Alclud [? Dumbarton] and the town of Mount Agned, called at this time the "Castle of Maidens," or the "Mountain of Sorrow."—Geoffrey: British History, ix. 7.

Agnei'a (3 syl.), wifely chastity, sister of Parthen'ia or maiden chastity. Agneia is the spouse of Encra'tês or temperance. Fully described in canto x. of The Purple Island, by Phineas Fletcher (1633). (Greek, agneia, "chastity.")

AGNES, daughter of Mr. Wickfield the solicitor, and David Copperfield's second wife (after the death of Dora, "his child-wife"). Agnes is a very pure, self-sacrificing girl, accomplished yet domestic.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Agnes, in Molière's L'École des Femmes, the girl on whom Arnolphe tries his pet experiment of education, so as to turn out for himself a "model wife." She was brought up in a country convent, where she was kept in entire ignorance of the difference of sex, conventional proprieties, the difference between the love of men and women, and that of girls for girls, the mysteries of marriage, and so on. When grown to womanhood she quits the convent, and standing one evening on a balcony, a young man passes and takes off his hat to her, she returns the salute; he bows a second and third time, she does the same; he passes and repasses several times, bowing each time, and she does as she has been taught to do by acknowledging the salute. Of course, the young man (Horace) becomes her lover, whom she marries, and M. Arnolphe loses his "model wife." (See PINCHWIFE.)

Elle fait l'Agnès. She pretends to be wholly unsophisticated and verdantly ingenuous.—French Proverb (from the "Agnes" of Molière, L'École des Femmes, 1662).

Agnes (Black), the palfry of Mary queen of Scots, the gift of her brother Moray and so called from the noted countess of March, who was countess of Moray (Murray) in her own right.

Black Agnes (countess of March). (See BLACK AGNES.)

Agnes (St.), a young virgin of Palermo, who at the age of 13 was martyred at Rome during the Diocletian persecution of A.D. 304. Prudence (Aurelius Prudentius Clemens), a Latin Christian poet of the fourth century, has a poem on the subject. Tintoret and Domenichi'no have both made her the subject of a painting.—The Martyrdom of St. Agnes.

St. Agnes and the Devil. St. Agnes, having escaped from the prison at Rome, took shipping and landed at St. Piran Arwothall. The devil dogged her, but she rebuked him, and the large moor-stones between St. Piran and St. Agnes, in Cornwall, mark the places where the devils were turned into stone by the looks of the indignant saint.—Polwhele: History of Cornwall.

Agnes' Eve (St.), a poem by Keats (1796–1821). The story is as follows: On St. Agnes' Eve, maidens, under certain conditions, dream of their sweethearts. Magdeline, a baron's daughter, was in love with Porphyro, but a deadly feud existed between Porphyro and the baron. On St. Agnes' Eve the young knight went to the castle, and persuaded the door-keeper (an old crone) to conceal him in Agnes' chamber. Presently the young lady went to bed and fell asleep; when Porphyro, after gazing on her, played softly a ditty, at which she woke. He then induced her to leave the castle and elope with him, and long ago "those lovers fled away into the storm."

Agraman'te (4 syl.) or Ag'ramant, king of the Moors, in Orlando Innamorato, by Bojardo, and Orlando Furioso, by Ariosto. He was son of Troyano; and crossed over to ravage Gallia, and revenge his father's death on Charlemagne. He was slain by Orlando.

Agrawain (Sir) or Sir Agravain, surnamed "The Desirous" and also "The Haughty." He was son of Lot (king of Orkney) and Margawse half-sister of king Arthur. His brothers were sir Gaw'ain, sir Ga'heris, and sir Gareth. Mordred was his half-brother, being the son of king Arthur and Margawse. Sir Agravain and sir Mordred hated sir Launcelot, and told the king he was too familiar with the queen; so they asked the king to spend the day in hunting, and kept watch. The queen sent for sir Launcelot to her private chamber, and sir Agravain, sir Mordred, and twelve others assailed the door, but sir Launcelot slew them all except sir Mordred, who escaped. —Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 142–145 (1470).

Agricaltes, king of Amonia.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso.

Agrica'ne (4 syl.), king of Tartary, in the Orlando Innamorato, of Bojardo, was the father of Mandricardo. He besieges Angelica in the castle of Albracca, and is slain in single combat by Orlando. He brought into the field 2,200,000 men.

> Such forces met not, nor so wide a camp,
> When Agrican, with all his northern powers, > Besieged Albracca.
> Milton: Paradise Regained, iii. (1671).

Ag'rios, Lumpishness personified; a "sullen swain, all mirth that in himself and others hated; dull, dead, and leaden." Described in canto viii. of The Purple Island, by Phineas Fletcher (1635). (Greek, agrios, "a savage.")

Agrippi'na was granddaughter, wife, sister, and mother of an emperor. She was granddaughter of Augustus, wife of Claudius, sister of Caligula, and mother of Nero.

¶ Lam'pedo of Lacedæmon was daughter, wife, sister, and mother of a king.

Agripy'na or Ag'ripyne (3 syl.), a princess beloved by the "king of Cyprus' son, and madly loved by Orleans." —Dekker: Old Fortunatus (1600).

A'gue (2 syl.). It was an old superstition that if the fourth book of the Iliad was laid open under the head of a person suffering from quartan ague, it would cure him at once. Serēnus Sammon'icus (preceptor of Gordian), a noted physician, has amongst his medical precepts the following:—

Moeoniæ Illados quartum suppone timenti.
Præcepta, 50.

Ague-cheek (Sir Andrew), a silly old fop with "3000 ducats a year," very fond of the table, but with a shrewd understanding that "beef had done harm to his wit." Sir Andrew thinks himself "old in nothing but in understanding," and boasts that he can "cut a caper, dance the coranto, walk a jig, and take delight in masques," like a young man.—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night (1614).

Woodward (1737-1777) always sustained "Sir Andrew Ague-cheek" with infinite drollery, assisted by that expression of "rueful dismay" which gave so peculiar a zest to his Marplot.—Boaden: Life of Siddons.

Charles Lamb says that "Jem White saw James Dodd one evening in Ague-cheek, and recognizing him next day in Fleet Street, took off his hat, and saluted him with "Save you, sir Andrew!" Dodd simply waved his hand and exclaimed, "Away, fool!"

A'haback and Des'ra, two enchanters, who aided Ahu'bal in his rebellion against his brother Misnar, sultan of Delhi. Ahubal had a magnificent tent built, and Horam the vizier had one built for the sultan still more magnificent. When the rebels made their attack, the sultan and the best of the troops were drawn off, and the sultan's tent was taken. The enchanters, delighted with their prize, slept therein, but at night the vizier led the sultan to a cave, and asked him to cut a rope. Next morning he heard that a huge stone had fallen on the enchanters and crushed them to mummies. In fact, this stone formed the head of the bed, where it was suspended by the rope which the sultan had severed in the night.—James Ridley: Tales of the Genii ("The Enchanters' Tale," vi.).

Ahasue'rus, the cobbler who pushed away Jesus when, on the way to execution, He rested a moment or two at his door. "Get off! Away with you!" cried the cobbler. "Truly, I go away," returned Jesus, "and that quickly; but tarry thou till I come." And from that time Ahasuerus became the "wandering Jew," who still roams the earth, and will continue so to do until the "second coming of the Lord." This is the legend given by Paul von Eitzen, bishop of Schleswig (1547).—Greve: Memoir of Paul von Eitzen (1744). (See WANDERING JEW.)

∴ Ahasuerus is introduced in Shelley's Queen Mab (section vii.), and a note is added (vol. i. p. 234, Rossetti's edition), showing the wretchedness of "never dying." He also appears in Shelley's Revolt of Islam, in Hellas, and in the prose tale of The Assassin.

Aher'man and Ar'gen, the former a fortress, and the latter a suite of immense halls, in the realm of Eblis, where are lodged all creatures of human intelligence before the creation of Adam, and all the animals that inhabited the earth before the present races existed.—Beckford: Vathek (1786).

Ah'med (Prince), noted for the tent given him by the fairy Pari-banou, which would cover a whole army, and yet would fold up so small that it might be carried in one's pocket. The same good fairy also gave him the apple of Samarcand, a panacea for all diseases.—Arabian Nights' Entertainments ("Prince Ahmed, etc.").

¶ Solomon's carpet of green silk was large enough for all his army to stand upon, and when arranged the carpet was wafted with its freight to any place the king desired. This carpet would also fold into a very small compass.

¶ The ship Skidbladnir had a similar elastic virtue, for though it would hold all the inhabitants of Valhalla, it might be folded up like a sheet of paper.

¶ Bayard, the horse of the four sons of Aymon, grew larger or smaller as one or more of the four sons mounted it. (See AYMON.)

Aholiba'mah, granddaughter of Cain, and sister of Anah. She was loved by the seraph Samias'a, and, like her sister, was carried off to another planet when the Flood came.—Byron: Heaven and Earth.

Proud, imperious, and aspiring, she denies that she worships the seraph, and declares that his immortality can bestow no love more pure and warm than her own, and she expresses a conviction that there is a ray within her "which, though forbidden yet to shine," is nevertheless lighted at the same ethereal fire as his own.—Finden: Byron Beauties.

Ah'riman or Ahrima'nes (4 syl.), the angel of darkness and of evil in the Magian system. He was slain by Mithra.

Al'denn. So Poe calls Eden.

Tell this soul, with sorrow laden,
If within the distant Aidenn,
It shall clasp a sainted maiden,
Whom the angels name Lenore.
Edgar Poe: The Raven.

Aikwood (Ringan), the forester of sir Arthur Wardour, of Knockwinnock Castle.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Aim'well (Thomas, viscount), a gentleman of broken fortune, who pays his addresses to Dorin'da, daughter of lady Bountiful. He is very handsome and fascinating, but quite "a man of the world." He and Archer are the two beaux of The Beaux' Stratagem, a comedy by George Farquhar (1705).

I thought it rather odd that Holland should be the only "mister" of the party, and I said to myself, as Gibbet said when he heard that "Aimwell" had gone to church, "That looks suspicious" (act ii. sc. 2).—James Smith: Memoirs, Letters, etc. (1840).

Aimwell, in Farquhar's comedy of The Beaux' Stratagem, seeks to repair his fortune by marrying an heiress. In this he succeeds. (See BEAUX' STRATAGEM.)

Ainsworth and his Dictionary. (See NEWTON AND HIS DOG.)

Aircastle, in The Cozeners, by S. Foote. The original of this rambling talker was Gahagan, whose method of conversation is thus burlesqued—

Aircastle: "Did I not tell you what parson Prunello said? I remember, Mrs. Lightfoot was by. She had been brought to bed that day was a month of a very fine boy—a bad birth; for Dr. Seeton, who served his time with Luke Lancet of Gulse's——. There was also a talk about him and Nancy the daughter. She afterwards married Will Whitlow, another apprentice, who had great expectations from an old uncle in the Grenadiers; but he left all to a distant relation, Kit Cable, a midshipman aboard the Torbay. She was lost coming home in the Channel. The captain was taken up by a coaster from Rye, loaded with cheese——" [Now, pray, what did parson Prunello say? This is a pattern of Mrs. Nickleby's rambling gossip.]

Air'lie (The earl of), a royalist in the service of king Charles I.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose.

Airy (Sir George), a man of fortune, gay, generous, and gallant. He is in love with Miran'da, the ward of sir Francis Gripe, whom he marries.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Busybody (1709). (See THE BUSYBODY.)

A'jax Oïleus, son of Oïleus [O.i'.luce], generally called "the less." In consequence of his insolence to Cassan'dra, the prophetic daughter of Priam, his ship was driven on a rock, and he perished at sea.—Homer: Odyssey, iv. 507; Virgil: Æneid, i. 41.

A'jax Tel'amon. Sophoclês has a tragedy called Ajax, in which "the madman" scourges a ram he mistakes for Ulysses. His encounter with a flock of sheep, which he fancied in his madness to be the sons of Atreus, has been mentioned at greater or less length by several Greek and Roman poets. Don Quixote had a similar adventure. This Ajax is introduced by Shakespeare in his drama called Troilus and Cressida. (See ALI-FANFARON, p. 26.)

The Tuscan poet [Ariosto] doth advance
The frantic paladin of France [Orlando Furioso];
And those more ancient [Sophoclês and Seneca] do enhance Alcidês in his fury [Hercules Furens];
And others, Ajax Telamon;—
But to this time there hath been none
So bedlam as our Oberon;
Of which I dare assure you.
Drayton: Nymphidia (1563-1631).

Ajut and Anningait, in The Rambler.

Part, like Ajut, never to return.

Ala'ciel, the genius who went on a voyage to the two islands, Taciturnia and Merryland [London and Paris].—De la Dixmerie: L'isle Taciturne et l'isle Enjouée, ou Voyage du Génie Alaciel dans les deux Iles (1759).

Aladdin, son of Mustafa a poor tailor, of China, "obstinate, disobedient, and mischievous," wholly abandoned "to indolence and licentiousness." One day an African magician accosted him, pretending to be his uncle, and sent him to bring up the "wonderful lamp," at the same time giving him a "ring of safety." Aladdin secured the lamp, but would not hand it to the magician till he was out of the cave; whereupon the magician shut him up in the cave, and departed for Africa. Aladdin, wringing his hands in despair, happened to rub the magic ring, when the genius of the ring appeared before him, and asked him his commands. Aladdin requested to be delivered from the cave, and he returned home. By means of this lamp, he obtained untold wealth, built a superb palace, and married Badroul'boudour, the sultan's daughter. After a time, the African magician got possession of the lamp, and caused the palace, with all its contents, to be transported into Africa. Aladdin, who was absent at the time, was arrested and ordered to execution, but was rescued by the populace, and started to discover what had become of his palace. Happening to slip, he rubbed his ring, and, when the genius of the ring appeared and asked his orders, was instantly posted to his palace in Africa. Ultimately he poisoned the magician, regained the lamp, and had his palace restored to its original place in China.

Yes, ready money is Aladdin's lamp.
Byron: Don Juan, xii. 12.

Aladdin's Lamp, a lamp brought from an underground cavern in "the middle of China." Being in want of food, the mother of Aladdin began to scrub it, intending to sell it, when the genius of the lamp appeared, and asked her what were her commands. Aladdin answered, "I am hungry; bring me food;" and immediately a banquet was set before him. Having thus become acquainted with the merits of the lamp, he became enormously rich, and married the sultan's daughter. By artifice the African magician got possession of the lamp, and transported the palace with its contents to Africa. Aladdin poisoned the magician, recovered the lamp, and retranslated the palace to its original site.

Aladdin's Palace Windows. At the top of the palace was a saloon, containing twenty-four windows (six on each side), and all but one enriched with diamonds, rubies, and emeralds. One was left for the sultan to complete; but all the jewellers in the empire were unable to make one to match the others, so Aladdin commanded "the slaves of the lamp" to complete their work.

Aladdin's Ring, given him by the African magician, "a preservative against every evil."—Arabian Nights ("Aladdin, or the Wonderful Lamp").

Al'adine, the sagacious but cruel king of Jerusalem, slain by Raymond.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Al'adine (3 syl.), son of Aldus "a lusty knight."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, vi. 3 (1596).

Alaff, Anlaf, or Olaf, son of Sihtric, Danish king of Northumberland (died 927). When Æthelstan [Athelstan] took possession of Northumberland, Alaff fled to Ireland, and his brother Guthfrith or Godfrey to Scotland.

Our English Athelstan,
(a the Northumbrian fields, with most victorious might,
Put Alaff and his powers to more inglorious flight.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xii. (1612).

Al Araf, the great limbo between paradise and hell, for the half-good.—Al Korân, vii.

Alar'con, king of Barca, who joined the armament of Egypt against the crusaders, but his men were only half armed. —Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Alaric Cottin. Frederick the Great of Prussia was so called by Voltaire. "Alaric" because, like Alaric, he was a great warrior, and "Cottin" because, like Cottin, satirized by Boileau, he was a very indifferent poet.

Alasco, alias DR. DEMETRIUS DOBOOBIE, an old astrologer, consulted by the earl of Leicester.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Alas'nam (Prince Zeyn) possessed eight statues, each a single diamond on a gold pedestal, but had to go in search of a ninth, more valuable than them all. This ninth was a lady, the most beautiful and virtuous of women, "more precious than rubies," who became his wife.

One pure and perfect [woman] is . . . like Alasnam's lady, worth them all.—Sir W. Scott.

Alasnam's Mirror. When Alasnam was in search of his ninth statue, the king of the genii gave him a test-mirror, in which he was to look when he saw a beautiful girl. "If the glass remained pure and unsullied, the damsel would be the same, but if not, the damsel would not be wholly pure in body and in mind." This mirror was called "the touchstone of virtue."—Arabian Nights ("Prince Zeyn Alasnam").

Alas'tor, a house demon, the "skeleton in the cupboard," which haunts and torments a family. Shelley has a poem entitled Alastor, or the Spirit of Solitude. (See the next article.)

Cicero says he meditated killing himself that he might become the Alastor of Augustus, whom he hated.—Plutarch: Cicero, etc. ("Parallel Lives").

God Almighty mustered up an army of mice against the archbishop [Hatto], and sent them to persecute him as his furious Alastors.—Coryat: Crudities, 571.

Alastor, or "The Spirit of Solitude." A poem in blank verse by Percy Bysshe Shelley (1815). Alastor, in Greek = Deus Vindex, but as the name of the Spirit of Solitude, it means "The Tormentor." The poet wanders over the world admiring the wonderful works which he cannot help seeing, but finds no solution to satisfy his inquisitive mind, and nothing in sympathy with himself. In fact, the world was to him a crowded solitude, a mere Alastor, always disappointing and always tormenting him.

Al'ban (St.) of Ver'ulam hid his confessor, St. Am'phibal, and, changing clothes with him, suffered death in his stead. This was during the frightful persecution of Maximia'nus Hercu'lius, general of Diocle'tian's army in Britain, when 1000 Christians fell at Lichfield.

Alban—our proto-martyr called.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1622).

Alba'nia, the Scotch Highlands, so called from Albanact, son of Brute, the mythical Trojan king of Britain. At the death of Brute "Britain" was divided between his three sons: Locrin had England; Albanact had Albania (Scotland); and Kamber had Cambria (Wales).

He [Arthur] by force of arms Albania overrun,
Pursuing of the Picts beyond mount Caledon.
Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

Alba'nia (Turkey in Asia). It means "the mountain region," and properly comprehends Schirwan, Daghestan, and Georgia. In poetry it is used very loosely.

Alba'no's Knight, Rinaldo, whose brothers were Guichardo (the oldest), Ricardo, Richardetto, Vivian, and Alardo. His sister was Bradámant.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso.

Al'berick of MORTEMAR, the same as Theodorick the hermit of Engaddi, an exiled nobleman. He told king Richard the history of his life, and tried to dissuade him from sending a letter of defiance to the archduke of Austria.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Al'berick, the squire of prince Richard (one of the sons of Henry II. of England). —Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Albert, commander of the Britannia. Brave, liberal, and just; softened and refined by domestic ties and superior information. His ship was dashed against the projecting verge of Cape Colonna, the most southern point of Attica. And he perished in the sea, because Rodmond (second in command) grasped on his legs and could not be shaken off.

Though trained in boisterous elements, his mind
Was yet by soft humanity refined;
Each joy of wedded love at home he knew,
Abroad, confessed the father of his crew. . . .
His gens is, ever for th' event prepared,
Rose with the storm, and all its dangers shared.
Falconer: The Shipwreck, i. 2 (1758).

Albert, father of Gertrude, patriarch and judge of Wyo'ming (called by Campbell "Wy'oming"). Both Albert and his daughter were shot by a mixed force of British and Indian troops, led by one Brandt; who made an attack on the settlement, put all the inhabitants to the sword, set fire to the fort, and destroyed all the houses.—Campbell: Gertrude of Wyoming (1809).

Albert, in Goethe's romance called The Sorrows of Werther, is meant for his friend Kestner. He is a young German farmer, who marries Charlotte Buff (called "Lotte" in the novel), with whom Goethe was in love. Goethe represents himself as Werther.

Albert of Gei'erstein (Count), brother of Arnold Biederman, and president of the "Secret Tribunal." He sometimes appears as a "black priest of St. Paul's," and sometimes as the "monk of St. Victoire."—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Albertaz'zo married Alda, daughter of Otho duke of Saxony. His sons were Ugo and Fulco. From this stem springs the Royal Family of England.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Albia'zar, an Arab chief, who joined the Egyptian armament against the crusaders.

A chief in rapine, not in knighthood bred.
Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, xvii. (1575).

Albin, the primitive name of the northern part of Scotland, called by the Romans "Caledo'nia." This was the part inhabited by the Picts. The Scots migrated from Scotia (north of Ireland), and obtained mastery under Kenneth Macalpin, in 834.

Green Albin, what though he no more survey
Thy ships at anchor on the quiet shore,
Thy pellochs [porpoises] rolling from the mountain bay,
Thy lone sepulchral cairn upon the moor,
And distant isles that hear the loud Corbrechtan roar.
Campbell: Gertrude of Wyoming, i. 5 (1809).

Al'bion. In legendary history this word is variously accounted for. One derivation is from Albion, a giant, son of Neptune, its first discoverer, who ruled over the island for forty-four years.

(2) Another derivation is Al'bia, eldest of the fifty daughters of Diocle'tian king of Syria. These fifty ladies all married on the same day, and all murdered their husbands on the wedding night. By way of punishment, they were cast adrift in a ship, unmanned; but the wind drove the vessel to our coast, where these Syrian damsels disembarked. Here they lived the rest of their lives, and married with the aborigines, "a lawless crew of devils." Milton mentions this legend, and naïvely adds, "It is too absurd and unconscionably gross to be believed." Its resemblance to the fifty daughters of Dan'aos is palpable.

(3) Drayton, in his Polyolbion, says that Albion came from Rome, was "the first martyr of the land," and dying for the faith's sake, left his name to the country, where Offa subsequently reared to him "a rich and sumptuous shrine, with a monastery attached."—Song xvi.

Albion, king of Briton, when O'beron held his court in what is now called "Kensington Gardens." T. Tickell has a poem upon this subject.

Albion wars with Jove's Son. Albion, son of Neptune, warred with Her'culês, son of Jove. Neptune, dissatisfied with the share of his father's kingdom awarded to him by Jupiter, aspired to dethrone his brother, but Herculês took Jove's part, and Albion was discomfited.

Since Albion wielded arms against the son of Jove.
Drayton: Poly-olbion, iv. (1612).

Albo'rak, the animal brought by Gabriel to convey Mahomet to the seventh heaven. It had the face of a man, the cheeks of a horse, the wings of an eagle, and spoke with a human voice.

Albrac'ca, a castle of Cathay' (China), to which Angel'ica retires in grief when she finds her love for Rinaldo is not reciprocated. Here she is besieged by Ag'ricanê king of Tartary, who is resolved to win her.—Bojardo: Orlando Innamorato (1495).

Albracca's Damsel, Angel'ica. (See above.)—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Albuma'zar, an Arabian astronomer (776–88;).

Chaunteclere, our cocke, must tell what is o'clocke,
By the astrologye that he hath naturally
Conceyued and caught; for he was never taught
By Albumazar, the astronomer,
Nor by Ptholomy, prince of astronomy.
J. Skelton: Philip Sparrow (time, Henry VIII.).

(Tomkins wrote a play so called, which was performed before James I. in Trinity College Hall, March 7th, 1614. After the Restoration, this comedy was revived, and Dryden wrote a prologue to it.)

Alcai'ro, the modern name of Memphis (Egypt).

Not Babylon
Nor great Alcairo such magnificence
Equalled, in all their glories.
Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 717 (1665).

Alceste (3 syl.), Alcestis, or Alcestês, daughter of Pe'lias and wife of Admêtus. On his wedding day Admêtus neglected to offer sacrifice to Diana, but Apollo induced the Fates to spare his life, if he could find a voluntary substitute. His bride offered to die for him, but Herculês brought her back from the world of shadows.

(Euripidês has a Greek tragedy on the subject (Alcestis); Glück has an opera (Alceste), libretto by Calzabigi (1765); Philippi Quinault produced a French tragedy entitled Alceste, in 1674; and Lagrange-Chancel in 1694 produced a French tragedy on the same subject.)

(Her story is told by W. Morris, in The Earthly Paradise, June, 1868.)

¶ Longfellow, in The Golden Legend, has a somewhat similar story: Henry of Hoheneck was like to die, and was told he would recover if he could find a maiden willing to lay down her life for him. Elsie, the daughter of Gottlieb (a tenant farmer of the prince), vowed to do so, and followed the prince to Salerno, to surrender herself to Lucifer; but the prince rescued her, and made her his wife. The excitement and exercise cured the indolent young prince. This tale is from Hartmann von der Aur, the Minne-singer.

Alceste' (2 syl.), the hero of Molière's comedy Le Misanthrope (1666), not unlike Timon of Athens, by Shakespeare. Alceste is, in fact, a pure and noble mind soured by perfidy and disgusted with society. Courtesy seems to him the vice of fops,—and the usages of civilized life no better than hypocrisy. Alceste pays his addresses to Célimène, a coquette.

Alceste is an upright, manly character, but rude and impatient, even of the ordinary civilities of life.—Sir W. Scott.

Al'chemist (The), the last of the three great comedies of Ben Jonson (1610). The other two are Vol'pone (2 syl.), (1605), and The Silent Woman (1609). The object of The Alchemist is to ridicule the belief in the philosopher's stone and the elixir of life. The alchemist is "Subtle," a mere quack; and "sir Epicure Mammon" is the chief dupe, who supplies money, etc., for the "transmutation of metal." "Abel Drugger" a tobacconist, and "Dapper" a lawyer's clerk, are two other dupes. "Captain Face," alias "Jeremy," the house-servant of "Lovewit," and "Dol Common" are his allies. The whole thing is blown up by the unexpected return of "Lovewit."

Alcibi'ades (5 syl.), the Athenian general. Being banished by the senate, he marches against the city, and the senate, being unable to offer resistance, open the gates to him (B.C. 450–404). This incident is introduced by Shakespeare in Timon of Athens.

Alfred (lord) Tennyson assumed this as a pseudonym in Punch (February, 1846), a reply to Lord Lytton's New Timon.

Alcibiades of Germany, Albert margrave of Baireuth (1522–1555).

Alcibi'ades' Tables represented a god or goddess outwardly, and a Sile'nus, or deformed piper, within. Erasmus has a curious dissertation on these tables (Adage, 667, edited R. Stephens); hence emblematic of falsehood and dissimulation.

Whoso wants virtue is compared to these False tables wrought by Alcibiades;
Which noted well of all were found t've bin
Most fair without, but most deformed within.
W. Browne: Britannia's Pastorals, i. (1613).

Alci'des, Hercules, son of Alcæus; any strong and valiant hero. The drama called Hercules Furens is by Euripides. Seneca has a tragedy of the same title.

The Tuscan poet [Ariosto] doth advance
The frantic paladin of France [Orlando Furioso];
And those more ancient do enhance Alcidês in his fury.
Drayton: Nymphidia (1563–1631).

Where is the great Alcidês of the field,
Valiant lord Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury?
Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act iv. sc. 7 (1589).

Alci'na, Carnal Pleasure personified. In Bojardo's Orlando Innamorato she is a fairy, who carries off Astolfo. In Ariosto's Orlando Furioso she is a kind of Circê, whose garden is a scene of enchantment. Alcina enjoys her lovers for a season, and then converts them into trees, stones, wild beasts, and so on, as her fancy dictates.

Al'ciphron, or The Minute Philosopher, the title of a work by bishop Berkeley. So called from the name of the chief speaker, a freethinker. The object of this work is to expose the weakness of infidelity.

Al'ciphron, "the epicurean," the hero of T. Moore's romance called The Epicurean.

Like Alciphron, we swing in air and darkness, and know not whither the wind blows us.—Putnam's Magazine.

Alcme'na (in Molière, Alcmène), the wife of Amphitryon, general of the Theban army. While her husband is absent warring against the Telebo'ans, Jupiter assumes the form of Amphitryon; but Amphitryon himself returns home the next day, and great confusion arises between the false and true Amphitryon, which is augmented by Mercury, who personates Sos'ia, the slave of Amphitryon. By this amour of Jupiter, Alcmena becomes the mother of Her'culês. Plautus, Molière, and Dryden have all taken this plot for a comedy entitled Amphitryon.

Alcofri'bas, the pseudonym assumed by Rabelais in his Gargantua and Pantag'ruel. Alcofribas Nasier is an anagram of "François Rabelais."

The inestimable life of the great Gargantua, father of Pantagruel, heretofore composed by M. Alcofribas, abstractor of the quintessence, a book full of pantagruelism.—Rabelais: Introduction (1533).

Al'colomb, "subduer of hearts," daughter of Abou Albou of Damascus, and sister of Ganem. The caliph Haroun-al-Raschid, in a fit of jealousy, commanded Ganem to be put to death, and his mother and sister to do penance for three days in Damascus, and then to be banished from Syria. The two ladies came to Bagdad, and were taken in by the charitable syndec of the jewellers. When the jealous fit of the caliph was over, he sent for the two exiles. Alcolomb he made his wife, and her mother he married to his vizier. —Arabian Nights ("Ganem, the Slave of Love").

Alcuith, mentioned by Bede, is Dumbarton.

Alcy'on, "the wofullest man alive," but once "the jolly shepherd swain that wont full merrily to pipe and dance," near where the Severn flows. One day he saw a lion's cub, and brought it up till it followed him about like a dog; but a cruel satyr shot it in mere wantonness. By the lion's cub he means Daphne, who died in her prime, and the cruel satyr is death. He said he hated everything—the heaven, the earth, fire, air, and sea, the day, the night; he hated to speak, to hear, to taste food, to see objects, to smell, to feel; he hated man and woman too, for his Daphne lived no longer. What became of this doleful shepherd the poet could never ween. Alcyon is Sir Arthur Gorges. —Spenser: Daphnaida (in seven fits, 1590).

And there is that Alcyon bent to mourn,
Though fit to frame an everlasting ditty,
Whose gentle sprite for Daphne's death doth turn
Sweet lays of love to endless plaints of pity.
Spenser: Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1591).

Alcy'one or Halcyone (4 syl.), daughter of Æolus, who, on hearing of her husband's death by shipwreck, threw herself into the sea, and was changed to a kingfisher. (See HALCYON DAYS.)

¶ Hero, the lady-love of Leander, threw herself into the sea, when she discovered that her lover, Leander, was drowned in the Hellespont, which he swam across every night in order to visit her. This story is the subject of a poem (De Amore Heros, etc.) by Musæus.

Aldabel'la, wife of Orlando, sister of Oliver, and daughter of Monodan'tês.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, etc. (1516).

Aldabella, a marchioness of Florence, very beautiful and fascinating, but arrogant and heartless. She used to give entertainments to the magnates of Florence, and Fazio was one who spent most of his time in her society. Bian'ca his wife, being jealous of the marchioness, accused him to the duke of being privy to the death of Bartoldo, and for this offence Fazio was executed. Bianca died broken-hearted, and Aldabella was condemned to spend the rest of her life in a nunnery.—Dean Milman: Fazio (a tragedy, 1815).

Alden (John), one of the sons of the Pilgrim Fathers, in love with Priscilla, the beautiful puritan. (See STANDISH.)—Longfellow: Courtship of Miles Standish, ix.

Alderlievest, best beloved.

> And to mine alderlievest lorde I must endite
> A wofull case.
> Gascoigne: Voyage into Holland (1572).

Aldiborontiphoscophornio [Al'-dibbo-ron'te-fos'co-for'nio], a courtier in Chrononhotonthologos, by H. Carey (1734).

(Sir Walter Scott used to call James Ballantyne, the printer, this nickname, from his pomposity and formality of speech.)

Aldiger, son of Buo'vo, of the house of Clarmont, brother of Malagi'gi and Vivian.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Al'dine (2 syl.), leader of the second squadron of Arabs which joined the Egyptian armament against the crusaders. Tasso says of the Arabs, "Their accents were female and their stature diminutive" (xvii.).—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Al'dingar (Sir), steward of queen Eleanor, wife of Henry II. He impeached the queen's fidelity, and agreed to prove his charge by single combat; but an angel (in the shape of a little child) established the queen's innocence. This is probably a blundering version of the story of Gunhilda and the emperor Henry.—Percy: Reliques, ii. 9.

Aldo, a Caledonian, was not invited by Fingal to his banquet on his return to Morven, after the overthrow of Swaran. To resent this affront, he went over to Fingal's avowed enemy, Erragon king of Sora (in Scandinavia), and here Lorna, the king's wife, fell in love with him. The guilty pair fled to Morven, which Erragon immediately invaded. Aldo fell in single combat with Erragon, Lorna died of grief, and Erragon was slain in battle by Gaul, son of Morni.—Ossian: The Battle of Lora.

Aldovrand (Father), chaplain of sir Raymond Berenger, the old Norman warrior.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Aldrick the Jesuit, confessor of Charlotte countess of Derby.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Aldus, father of Al'adine (3 syl.), the "lusty knight."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, vi. 3 (1596).

Alea, a warrior who invented dice at the siege of Troy; at least so Isidore of Seville says. Suidas ascribes the invention to Palamēdēs.

> Alea est ludus tabulæ inventa a Græcis, in otio Trojani belli, a quodam milite, nomine ALEA, a quo et ars nomen accepit.—Isidōrus: Originum, etc., xviii. 57.

Alector'ia, a stone extracted from a capon. It is said to render the wearer invisible, to allay thirst, to antidote enchantment, and ensure love.—Mirror of Stones.

Alec'tryon, a youth set by Mars to guard against surprises; but he fell asleep, and Apollo surprised Mars and Venus in each other's embrace. Mars in anger changed Alectryon into a cock.

> And from out the neighbouring farmyard
> Loud the cock Alectryon crowed.
> Longfellow: Pegasus in Pound.

Ale'ria, one of the Amazons, and the best beloved of the ten wives of Guido the Savage.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Alessio, the young man with whom Lisa was living in concubinage, when Elvi'no promised to marry her. Elvino made the promise out of pique, because he thought Ami'na was not faithful to him; but when he discovered his error he returned to his first love, and left Lisa to marry Alessio, with whom she had been previously cohabiting.—Bellini's opera, La Sonnambula (1831).

Ale'thes (3 syl.), an ambassador from Egypt to king Al'adine (3 syl.); subtle, false, deceitful, and full of wiles.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Alexander the Corrector, Alexander Cruden (1701–1770), author of the Concordance. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 30.)

Alexander the Great, king of Macedonia (B.C. 356, 336–323).

(His life has been written by Quintus Curtius, in ten books (Latin), about A.D. 80; by Julius Valerius (Latin); by Lesfarguus, in 1639; Gaudenzio, in 1645; by Lehmann, in 1667; by Fessler, in 1797; by Mueller, in 1830; by archdeacon Williams, in 1830; by Droysen, in 1833; by Pfizer, in 1845.)

Alexander's chief Battles. Arbēla, in 331; Issus, 333; Granicus in 334, all against Darius the Persian.

Alexander's Beard. A smooth chin, or very small beard. Alexander had no perceptible beard, and hence is said to have had "an Amazonian chin."

Disguised with Alexander's beard.
Gascoyne: The Steele Glas (died 1577).

City founded by Alexander. Alexandria in Egypt, about B.C. 322.

Deformity of Alexander. One shoulder was higher than the other.

Ammon's great son one shoulder had too high.
Pope: Prologue to his Satires, 117.

Father of Alexander. His mother's husband was Philip king of Macedon; but Alexander himself claimed the god Ammon for his father.

Alexander's favourite Horse. Buceph'alos (q.v.).

Mother of Alexander. Olympias, daughter of Neoptolêmos king of Epiros.

Alexander's Runner. Ladas. This was the name of Lord Rosebery's horse in the famous race of 1894.

Successor of Alexander. Ptolemy Soter, supposed to be his half-brother (on the father's side), succeeded him in the government of Egypt.

Only two Alexanders. Alexander said, "There are but two Alexanders—the invincible son of Philip, and the inimitable Apelles, who painted him."

Alexander and Clitus. Clitus was Alexander's great friend, and saved his life in the battle of Granicus (B.C. 334). In 328 he was slain by Alexander at a banquet, when both were heated with wine.

¶ The above reminds us of Peter I. of Russia and Lefort. Lefort, a Swiss, was the great friend of Peter I., and accompanied him in his travels, when he visited various European capitals to learn the art of government. At Königsberg, while both were heated with wine, Peter threw himself on his friend, Lefort, and pierced him with his sword. No sooner had he done so than he repented, and exclaimed, "I, who want to reform my nation, cannot reform myself."

Clitus (to Alexander). Nay, frown not so; you cannot look me dead.—Lee's Tragedy.

Alexander and the Daughters of Darius. After the battle of Issus, in 333, the family of Darius fell into his hands, and he treated the ladies as queens. A eunuch, having escaped, told Darius of this noble conduct, and Darius could not but admire such magnanimity in a rival.—Arrian: Anabasis of Alexander, iv. 20.

Alexander and Diogenes. One day the king of Macedon presented himself before Diogenes the cynic, and said, "I am Alexander." "Well," replied the master of the tub, "and I am Diogenes." When the king asked if he could render him any service, Diogenes surlily replied, "Yes; get out of the sun."

Alexander and Homer. When Alexander invaded Asia Minor, he offered up sacrifice to Priam, and then went to visit the tomb of Achillês. Here he exclaimed, "O most enviable of men, who had Homer to sing thy deeds!"

Which made the Eastern conqueror to cry,
"O fortunate young man! whose virtue found
So brave a trump thy noble deeds to sound."
Spenser: The Ruins of Time (1591)

Alexander and the Olympic Games. Alexander, being asked if he would run a course at the Olympic games, replied, "Yes, if my competitors are all kings."

Alexander and Parmenio. When Darius king of Persia offered Alexander his daughter Stati'ra in marriage, with a dowry of 10,000 talents of gold, Parmenio said, "I would accept the offer, if I were Alexander." To this Alexander rejoined, "So would I, if I were Parmenio."

On another occasion the general thought the king somewhat too lavish in his gifts, whereupon Alexander made answer, "I consider not what Parmenio ought to receive, but what Alexander ought to give."

Alexander and Perdiccas. When Alexander started for Asia he divided his possessions among his friends. Perdiccas asked what he had left for himself. "Hope," said Alexander. "If hope is enough for Alexander," replied the friend, "it is enough for Perdiccas also;" and declined to accept anything.

Alexander and Raphael. Alexander encountered Raphael in a cave in the montain of Kaf, and being asked what he was in search of, replied, "The water of immortality." Whereupon Raphael gave him a stone, and told him when he found another of the same weight he would gain his wish. "And how long," said Alexander, "have I to live?" The angel replied, "Till the heaven above thee and the earth beneath thee are of iron." Alexander now went forth and found a stone almost of the weight required, and in order to complete the balance, added a little earth; falling from his horse at Ghur he was laid in his armour on the ground, and his shield was set up over him to ward off the sun. Then understood he that he would gain immortality when, like the stone, he was buried in the earth, and that his hour was come, for the earth beneath him was iron, and his iron buckler was his vault of heaven above. So he died.

Alexander and the Robber. When Dion'idês, a pirate, was brought before Alexander, he exclaimed, "Vile brigand! how dare you infest the seas with your misdeeds?" "And you," replied the pirate, "by what right do you ravage the world? Because I have only one ship, I am called a brigand, but you who have a whole fleet are termed a conqueror." Alexander commanded the man to be set at liberty.

Alexander dramatized. In 1678 Nathaniel Lee introduced his tragedy of Alexander the Great. Racine produced his tragedy (in French) in 1665.

Lee's "Alexander" was a favourite part with T. Betterton (1635–1710), Wm. Mountford (1660–1692), H. Norris (1665–1734); C. Hulet (1701 1736), and Spranger Barry (1710–1777); but J. W. Croker says that J. P. Kemble, in "Hamlet," "Coriolanus," "Alexander," and "Cato," excelled all his predecessors.—Johnson.

Alexander's Feast (or "The Power of Music"). A Pindaric ode by Dryden (1694), in honour of St. Cecilia's Day (November 22). St. Cecilia was a Roman lady who, it is said, suffered martyrdom in 230, and was regarded as the patroness of music. Dryden's poem ends with these words:

> Let old Timotheus yield the prize,
> Or both divide the crown;
> He raised a mortal to the skies,
> She drew an angel down.

He (Timotheus) "raised a mortal to the skies" is a bold way of saying, by the concord of sweet sounds, Timotheus raised his hearers from earth to heaven.

"She drew an angel down" refers to the legend that an angel left the choirs above to listen to the more ravishing music of St. Cecilia. Pope wrote a Pindoric ode on the same subject.

ALEXANDER. The Albanian Alexander, George Castriot (Scanderbeg or Iscander beg, 1404–1467).

The English Alexander, Henry V. (1388, 1413–1422). He resembled Alexander in the brevity and glory of his reign, in his great military talents, and his wonderful hold on the hearts of his people. Like Alexander's, his generosity was unbounded; like Alexander's, his life was gay and licentious; like Alexander, he was most impatient of control. And his victories over the French were like those of Alexander over the Persians.

(Captain Fluellen put the resemblance thus: Alexander was born at Macedon, and Henry V. was born at Monmouth, both which places begin with M.)

Alexander of the North, Charles XII. of Sweden (1682–1718).

The Persian Alexander, Sandjar (1117–1158).

Alexan'dra, daughter of Oronthea, queen of the Am'azons, and one of the ten wives of Elba'nio. It is from this person that the land of the Amazons was called Alexandra.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Alexan'drite (4 syl.), a species of beryl found in Siberia. It shows the Russian colours (green and red), and is named from the emperor Alexander of Russia.

Alexas, a eunuch in Cleopatra's household. Timid and cowardly, faithless and untruthful.—Dryden: All for Love, etc.

Alex'is, the wanton shepherd in The Faithful Shepherdess, a pastoral drama by John Fletcher (1610).

Alfa'der, the father of all the Æsir or celestial deities of Scandinavia, creator and governor of the universe, patron of arts and magic, etc.

Alfonso, father of Leono'ra d'Este, and duke of Ferrara. Tasso the poet fell in love with her, and the duke confined him as a lunatic for seven years in the asylum of Santa Anna; at the expiration of which period he was released through the intercession of Vincenzo Gonzago duke of Mantua. Byron refers to this in his Childe Harold, iv. 36.

Alfon'so, in Walpole's tale called The Castle of Otranto, appears as an apparition in the moonlight, dilated to a gigantic form (1769).

Alfonso XI. of Castile, whose "favourite" was Leonora de Guzman.—Donizetti: La Favorita (an opera, 1842).

Alfon'so (Don), of Seville, a man of 50 and husband of donna Julia (twenty-seven years his junior), of whom he was jealous without cause.—Byron: Don Juan, i.

Alfred as a Gleeman. Alfred, wishing to know the strength of the Danish camp, assumed the disguise of a minstrel, and stayed in the Danish camp for several days, amusing the soldiers with his harping and singing. After he had made himself master of all he required, he returned back to his own place.—William of Malmesbury (twelfth century).

¶ William of Malmesbury tells a similar story of Anlaf, a Danish king, who, he says, just before the battle of Brunanburh, in Northumberland, entered the camp of king Athelstan as a gleeman, harp in hand; and so pleased was the English king that he gave him gold. Anlaf would not keep the gold, but buried it in the earth.

Alfred, a masque, by James Thomson and David Mallet (1740). Afterwards dramatized by Mallet, and brought out at Drury Lane in 1851. Especially noted for the famous song of Rule Britannia.

(Sir Richard Blackmore wrote an historic poem in twelve books, called Alfred, 1715. H. J. Pye published, in 1801, an epic in six books, called by the same name.)

Algarsife (3 syl.) and Cam'ballo, sons of Cambuscan' king of Tartary, and Elfêta his wife. Algarsife married Theodora.

> I speak of Algarsife,
> How that he won Theodora to his wife.
> Chaucer: The Squire's Tale.

Algebar' ("the giant"). So the Arabians call the constellation Orion.

> Begirt with many a blazing star,
> Stood the great giant Algebar—
> Orion, hunter of the beast.
> Longfellow: The Occultation of Orion.

Alham'bra (The), a volume of legends and narratives by Washington Irving (1812).

> Everything in the [Alhambra] relating to myself and to the actual inhabitants of the Alhambra, is unexaggerated fact.—W. Irving.

A'li, cousin and son-in-law of Mahomet. The beauty of his eyes is proverbial in Persia, Ayn Ali ("eyes of Ali") being the highest compliment a Persian can pay to beauty.

Ali Baba, a poor Persian wood-carrier, who accidentally learned the magic words, "Open, Sesamê!" "Shut, Sesamê!" by which he gained entrance into a vast cavern, the repository of stolen wealth and the lair of forty thieves. He made himself rich by plundering from these stores; and by the shrewd cunning of Morgia'na, his female slave, the captain and his whole band of thieves were extirpated. In reward of these services, Ali Baba gave Morgiana her freedom, and married her to his own son.—Arabian Nights ("Ali Baba, or the Forty Thieves"). (See TYCHO.)

Alias. "You have as many aliases as Robin of Bagshot." (See ROBIN OF BAGSHOT.)

AL'ICE (2 syl.), sister of Valentine, in Mons. Thomas, a comedy by John Fletcher (1619). Beaumont died 1616.

Al'ice (2 syl.), foster-sister of Robert le Diable, and bride of Rambaldo the Norman troubadour in Meyerbeer's opera of Roberto il Diavolo. She came to Palermo to place in the duke's hand his mother's "will," which he was enjoined not to read till he became a virtuous man. She is Robert's good genius, and when Bertram, the fiend, claimed his soul as the price of his ill deeds, Alice, by reading the will, reclaimed him.

Al'ice (2 syl.), the servant-girl of dame Whitecraft, wife of the innkeeper at Altringham.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Al'ice, the miller's daughter, a story of happy first love told in later years by an old man who had married the rustic beauty. He was a dreamy lad when he first loved Alice, and the passion roused him into manhood. (See ROSE.)—Tennyson: The Miller's Daughter.

Al'ice (The lady), widow of Walter knight of Avenel (2 syl.).—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Al'ice [GRAY], called "Old Alice Gray," a quondam tenant of the lord of Ravenswood. Lucy Ashton visits her after the funeral of the old lord.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Alice in Wonderland, a fairy tale by "Lewis Carroll" (the assumed name of C. L. Dodgson), published in 1869. A continuation, called Through the Looking-glass, was published in 1871.

Alichi'no, a devil in Dante's Inferno.

Alick [POLWORTH], one of the servants of Waverley.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

ALICIA gave her heart to Mosby, but married Arden for his position. As a wife, she played falsely with her husband, and even joined Mosby in a plot to murder him. Vacillating between love for Mosby and respect for Arden, she repents, and goes on sinning; wishes to get disentangled, but is overmastered by Mosby's stronger will. Alicia's passions impel her to evil, but her judgment accuses her and prompts her to the right course. She halts, and parleys with sin, like Balaam, and of course is lost.—Anon.: Arden of Feversham (1592).

Ali'cia, "a laughing, toying, wheedling, whimpering she," who once held lord Hastings under her distaff; but her annoying jealousy, "vexatious days, and jarring, joyless nights," drove him away from her. Being jealous of Jane Shore, she accused her to the duke of Gloster of alluring lord Hastings from his allegiance, and the lord protector soon trumped up a charge against both; the lord chamberlain he ordered to execution for treason, and Jane Shore he persecuted for witchcraft. Alicia goes raving mad.—Rowe: Jane Shore (1713).

The king of Denmark went to see Mrs. Bellamy play "Alicia," and fell into a sound sleep. The angry lady had to say, "O thou false lord!" and she drew near to the slumbering monarch, and shouted the words into the royal box. The king started, rubbed his eyes, and remarked that he would not have such a woman for his wife, though she had no end of kingdoms for a dowry.—Cornhill Magazine (1863).

Alic'ia (The lady), daughter of lord Waldemar Fitzarse.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Alifan'faron, emperor of the island Trap'oban, a Mahometan, the suitor of Pentap'olin's daughter, a Christian. Pentapolin refused to sanction this alliance, and the emperor raised a vast army to enforce his suit. This is don Quixote's solution of two flocks of sheep coming in opposite directions, which he told Sancho were the armies of Alifanfaron and Pentapolin.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iii. 4 (1605).

¶ Ajax the Greater had a similar encounter. (See AJAX TELAMON, p. 17.)

Alin'da, daughter of Alphonso an irascible old lord of Sego'via.—John Fletcher: The Pilgrim (1621).

(Alinda is the name assumed by young Archas when he dresses in woman's attire. This young man is the son of general Archas, "the loyal subject" of the great duke of Moscovia, in a drama by John Fletcher, called The Loyal Subject, 1618.)

Aliprando, a Christian knight, who discovered the armour of Rinaldo, and informed Godfrey of it. Both inferred that Rinaldo had been slain, but they were mistaken.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Al'iris, sultan of Lower Buchar'ia, who, under the assumed name of Fer'amorz, accompanied Lalla Rookh from Delhi, on her way to be married to the sultan. He won her love, and amused the tedium of the journey by telling her tales. When introduced to the sultan, her joy was unbounded on discovering that Feramorz the poet was the sultan to whom she was betrothed.—Moore: Lalla Rookh (1817).

Alisaunder (Kyng), an Arthurian romance, included in Weber's Collection Probably of French origin.

Alisaunder (Sir), surnamed LORFELIN, son of the good prince Boudwine and his wife An'glides (3 syl.). Sir Mark king of Cornwall murdered his brother, sir Boudwine, while Alisaunder was a mere child. When Alisaunder was knighted, his mother gave him his father's doublet, "bedabbled with blood," and charged him to revenge his father's death. Alisaunder married Alis la Beale Pilgrim, and had one son, called Bellen'geius le Beuse. Instead of fulfilling his mother's charge, he was himself "falsely and feloniously slain" by king Mark.—Sir T. Malory: History of King Arthur, ii. 119-125 (1470).

Al'ison, the young wife of John, a rich old miserly carpenter. Absolon, a priggish parish clerk, paid her attention, but she herself loved a poor scholar named Nicholas, lodging in her husband's house. Fair she was, and her body lithe as a weasel. She had a roguish eye, small eyebrows, was "long as a mast and upright as a bolt," more "pleasant to look on than a flowering pear tree," and her skin "was softer than the wool of a wether."—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Miller's Tale," 1388).

Al'ison, in sir W. Scott's Kenilworth, is an old domestic in the service of the earl of Leicester at Cumnor Place.

Al Kadr (The Night of). The 97th chapter of the Koran is so entitled. It was the night on which Mahomet received from Gabriel his first revelation, and was probably the 24th of Ramadân.

Verily we sent down the Korân in the night of Al Kadr.—Al Korân, xcvii.

Al'ken, an old shepherd who instructed Robin Hood's men how to find a witch, and how she is to be hunted.—Ben Jonson: The Sad Shepherd (1637).

Alkoremmi, the palace built by the Motassem on the hill of "Pied Horses." His son Vathek added five wings to it, one for the gratification of each of the five senses.

I. THE ETERNAL BANQUET, in which were tables covered both night and day with the most tempting foods.

II. THE NECTAR OF THE SOUL, filled with the best of poets and musicians.

III. THE DELIGHT OF THE EYES, filled with the most enchanting objects the eye could look on.

IV. THE PALACE OF PERFUMES, which was always pervaded with the sweetest odours.

V. THE RETREAT OF JOY, filled with the loveliest and most seductive houris.—W. Beckford: Vathek (1784).

All Fools, a comedy by George Chapman (1605), based on Terence's Heautontirumenos.

All for Love (or "A Sinner Well Saved"), a poem in nine parts, in the form of a ballad, by Southey (1829). The legend is this: Eleĕmon, a freedman, was in love with Cyra, his master's daughter, and signed with his blood a bond to give body and soul to Satan, if Satan would give him Cyra for his wife. He married Cyra, and after the lapse of twelve years Satan came to Eleĕmon to redeem his bond. Cyra applied to St. Basil, who appointed certain penance, and when Satan came and showed Basil the bond, the bishop replied that the bond was worthless for two reasons: (1) it was made when Eleĕmon was single, but marriage made the wife one with the man, and Cyra's consent was indispensable; (2) nothing that man can do can possibly render null the work of redemption, so the blood of Eleĕmon was washed away by the blood of Christ. If sin hath abounded, grace hath superabounded.

All for Love (or "The World Well Lost"), a tragedy by Dryden (1678). Ventidius induces Antony to free himself from the wiles of Cleopatra, but the fair frail one wins him back again. Whereupon Ventidius brings forward Octavia, who succeeds for a time in regaining her husband's love. Again Cleopatra lures him away, and when Alexandria fell into the hands of Octavius Cæsar, Alexis tells Antony that Cleopatra is dead, whereupon Antony slays himself. Cleopatra (erroneously reported dead) arrives just in time to bid Antony farewell, and then kills herself with an asp.

All in the Wrong, a comedy by Murphy, adapted from the French (1761). Also the title of a novel by Theodore Hook (1839).

All the Year Round, a weekly periodical, conducted by Charles Dickens, and since his death in 1870 continued by his son. It was called "Household Words" from 1850 to 1857; then "Once a Week" (1857–1859).

All the Talents Administration, formed by lord Grenville, in 1806, on the death of William Pitt. The members were lord Grenville, the earl Fitzwilliam, viscount Sidmouth, Charles James Fox, earl Spencer, William Windham, lord Erskine, sir Charles Grey, lord Minto, lord Auckland, lord Moira, Sheridan, Richard Fitzpatrick, and lord Ellenborough. It was dissolved in 1807.

On "all the talents" vent your venal spleen.
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.

All this for a Song! (See SONG.)

All's Well that Ends Well, a comedy by Shakespeare (1598). The hero and heroine are Bertram count of Rousillon, and Hel'ena a physician's daughter, who are married by the command of the king of France; they part because Bertram thought the lady not sufficiently well-born for him. Ultimately, however, all ends well. (See HELENA.)

(The story of this play is from the Decameron, Novel ix. Day 3.)

Allan, lord of Ravenswood, a decayed Scotch nobleman.—Sir W. Scott: The Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Al'lan (Mrs.), colonel Mannering's housekeeper at Woodburne.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Al'lan [BRECK CAMERON], the sergeant sent to arrest Hamish Bean McTavish, by whom he is shot.—Sir W. Scott: The Highland Widow (time, George II.).

Allan-a-Dale, one of Robin Hood's men, introduced by sir W. Scott in Ivanhoe. (See ALLIN-A-DALE.)

Al'legory for Al'ligator, a malapropism.

She's as headstrong as an allegory on the banks of the Nile.
Sheridan: The Rivals, iii. 2 (1775).

Alle'gre (3 syl.), the faithful servant of Philip Chabot. When Chabot was accused of treason, Allegre was put to the rack to make him confess something to his master's damage; but the brave fellow was true as steel, and it was afterwards shown that the accusation had no foundation but jealousy.—G. Chapman and J. Shirley: The Tragedy of Philip Chabot (1639).

Allegro (L'), one of two exquisite poems in seven-syllable verse, by Milton. The other is called Il Penseroso. L'Allegro or Mirth dwells on the innocent delights of the country, such as the lark, the barn-door cock, the hunting-horn, the ploughman, the mower, the milkmaid, and so on.

> These delights if thou canst give,
> Mirth, with thee I mean to live.
> Milton.

Allelu'jah, wood-sorrel, so called by a corruption of its name, Juliola, whereby it is known in the south of Italy. Its official name is Luzula.

Allemayne (2 syl.), Germany, from the French Allemagne. Also written ALLEMAIN.

> Thy faithful bosom swooned with pain,
> O loveliest maiden of Allemayne.
> Campbell: The Brave Roland.

Allen (Mr. Benjamin), a young surgeon in Dickens's Pickwick Papers.

Allen (Ralph), the friend of Pope, and benefactor of Fielding.

> Let humble Allen, with an awkward shame,
> Do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame.
> Pope: Epilogue to the Satires, Dialogue I. 136.

Allen (Major), an officer in the duke of Monmouth's army.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Alley (The), i.e. the Stock Exchange Alley (London).

> John Rive, after many active years in the Alley, retired to the Continent; and died at the age of 118.—Old and New London.

All-Fair, a princess, who was saved from the two lions (which guarded the Desert Fairy) by the Yellow Dwarf, on condition that she would become his wife. On her return home she hoped to evade this promise by marrying the brave king of the Gold Mines, but on the wedding day Yellow Dwarf carried her off on a Spanish cat, and confined her in Steel Castle. Here Gold Mine came to her rescue with a magic sword, but in his joy at finding her, he dropped his sword, and was stabbed to the heart with it by Yellow Dwarf. All-Fair, falling on the body of her lover, died of a broken heart. The syren changed the dead lovers into two palm trees.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy, Fairy Tales ("The Yellow Dwarf," 1682).

Allin-a-Dale or Allen-a-Dale, of Nottinghamshire, was to be married to a lady who returned his love, but her parents compelled her to forego young Allin for an old knight of wealth. Allin told his tale to Robin Hood, and the bold forester, in the disguise of a harper, went to the church where the wedding ceremony was to take place. When the wedding party stepped in, Robin Hood exclaimed, "This is no fit match; the bride shall be married only to the man of her choice." Then sounding his horn, Allin-a-Dale with four and twenty bowmen entered the church. The bishop refused to marry the woman to Allin till the banns had been asked three times, whereupon Robin pulled off the bishop's gown, and invested Little John in it, who asked the banns seven times, and performed the ceremony.—Robin Hood and Allin-a-Dale (a ballad).

Allnut (Noll), landlord of the Swan, Lambythe Ferry (1625).

Grace Allnut, his wife.

Oliver Allnut, the landlord's son.—Sterling: John Felton (1852).

Allworth (Lady), stepmother to Tom Allworth. Sir Giles Overreach thought she would marry his nephew Wellborn, but she married lord Lovel.

Tom Allworth, stepson of lady Allworth, in love with Margaret Overreach, whom he marries.—Massinger: A New Way to pay Old Debts (1625).

> The first appearance of Thomas King was "Allworth, on the 19th October, 1748.—Beaden.

All'worthy, in Fielding's Tom Jones, a man of sturdy rectitude, large charity, infinite modesty, independent spirit, and untiring philanthropy, with an utter disregard of money or fame. Fielding's friend, Ralph Allen, was the academy figure of this character. (See ALLEN.)

Alma [the human soul], queen of "Body Castle," which for seven years was beset by a rabble rout. Spenser says, "The divine part of man is circular, and the mortal part triangular." Arthur and sir Guyon were conducted by Alma over "Body Castle."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 9 (1590).

 Prior wrote a poem called Alma, in three cantos.

Almain, Germany; in French Allemagne. (See ALLEMAYNE.)

Almansor ("the invincible"), a title assumed by several Mussulman princes, as by the second caliph of the Abbasside dynasty, named Abou Giafar Abdallah (the invincible, or al mansor). Also by the famous captain of the Moors in Spain, named Mohammed. In Africa, Yacoub-al-Modjahed was entitled "al mansor," a royal name of dignity given to the kings of Fez, Morocco, and Algiers.

> The kingdoms of Almansor, Fez, and Sus,
> Marocco and Algiers.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, xi. 403 (1665).

ALMANZOR, the caliph, wishing to found a city in a certain spot, was told by a hermit named Bagdad that a man called Moclas was destined to be its founder. "I am that man," said the caliph, and he then told the hermit how in his boyhood he once stole a bracelet and pawned it, whereupon his nurse ever after called him "Moclas" (thief). Almanzor founded the city, and called it Bagdad, the name of the hermit.—Marigny.

Alman'sor, in Dryden's tragedy of The Conquest of Grana'da (1672).

Almansor, lackey of Madelon and her cousin Cathos, the affected fine ladies in Molière's comedy of Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659).

Almansor and Alm'anzaida, a novel said to be by Sir Philip Sidney, and published in 1678, which, however, being ninety-two years after his death, renders the attributed authorship extremely suspicious.

Almavi'va (Count and countess), in the Barber of Seville and in the Mariage de Figaro. Holcroft has a wretched adaptation called The Follies of a Day. The count is a libertine, and the countess is his wife.—Hollies (1745–1809).

Alme'ria, daughter of Manuel king of Grana'da. Prince Alphonso fell in love with her, and married her; but on the very day of espousal the ship in which they were sailing was wrecked, and each thought the other had perished. Both, however, were saved, and met unexpectedly on the coast of Granada, to which Alphonso was brought as a captive. Here (under the assumed name of Osmyn) he was imprisoned, but made his escape, and invaded Granada. He found king Manuel dead; succeeded to the crown; and "the mourning bride" became converted into the joyful wife.—W. Congreve: The Mourning Bride (1697).

Almes'bury (3 syl.). It was in a sanctuary of Almesbury that queen Guenever took refuge, after her adulterous passion for sir Lancelot was made known to the king. Here she died, but her body was buried at Glastonbury, in Somersetshire.

(Almesbury, i.e. Almondsbury, in Gloucestershire.)

Almey'da, the Portuguese governor of India. In his engagement with the united fleets of Cambaya and Egypt, he had his legs and thighs shattered by chain-shot, but, instead of retreating to the rear, he had himself bound to the ship-mast, where he "waved his sword to cheer on the combatants," till he died from loss of blood.

> Whirled by the cannons' rage, in shivers torn,
> His thighs far scattered o'er the waves are borne;
> Bound to the mast the godlike hero stands,
> Waves his proud sword and cheers his woeful bands:
> Tho' winds and seas their wonted aid deny,
> To yield he knows not; but he knows to die.
> Camoens: Lusiad, x. (1569).

¶ Similar stories are told of admiral Benbow, Cynægeros brother of the poet Æschylos, Jaafer who carried the sacred banner of "the prophet" in the battle of Muta, and of some others.

Almirods (The), a rebellious people, who refused to submit to prince Pantag'ruel after his subjugation of Anarchus king of the Dipsodes (2 syl.). It was while Pantagruel was marching against these rebels that a tremendous shower of rain fell, and the prince, putting out his tongue "half-way," sheltered his whole army.—Rabelais: Pantagruel, ii. 32 (1533).

Al'naschar, the dreamer, the "barber's fifth brother." He invested all his money in a basket of glassware, on which he was to gain so much, and then to invest again and again, till he grew so rich that he would marry the vizier's daughter and live in grandeur; but, being angry with his supposed wife, he gave a kick with his foot and smashed all the ware which had given birth to his dream of wealth.—The Arabian Nights' Entertainments.

¶ Echep'ron's fable of The Shoemaker and a Ha'porth of Milk, in Rabelais; The Milkmaid and her Pail of Milk, Dodsley; and Perrette et le Pot au Lait, by La Fontaine, are similar fables.

> The leading ideas of Malvolio, in his humour of state, bear a strong resemblance to those of Alnaschar, and some of the expressions are very similar, too.—Tyrwhitt.
> To indulge in Alnaschar-like dreams of compound interest ad infinitum.—The Times.

The Alnaschar of Modern Literature, S. Taylor Coleridge, who dreamt his Kubla Khan (q.v.), and wrote it out next morning from memory (1772–1834).

∴ Most likely he had been reading Purchas's Pilgrimage, which recurred to him in his dreams. None can doubt the resemblance of the two poems.

Alnec'ma or Alnecmacht, ancient name of Connaught.

In Alnecma was the warrior honoured, the first of the race of Bolga [the Belgæ of South Ireland].—Ossian. Temora, ii.

Aloa'din (4 syl.), a sorcerer, who made for himself a palace and garden in Arabia called "The Earthly Paradise." Thalaba slew him with a club, and the scene of enchantment disappeared.—Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, vii. (1797).

A. L. O. E. (that is, A L[ady] O[f] E[ngland]), Miss Charlotte Tucker (1821–1893).

Alon'so, king of Naples, father of Ferdinand and brother of Sebastian, in The Tempest, by Shakespeare (1609).

ALONZO the brave, the name of a ballad by M. G. Lewis. The fair Imogen' was betrothed to Alonzo, but, during his absence in the wars, became the bride of another. At the wedding feast Alonzo's ghost sat beside the bride, and, after rebuking her for her infidelity, carried her off to the grave.

Alonzo the brave was the name of the knight;
The maid was the fair Imogen.
M. G. Lewis (1775–1818).

Alon'zo, a Portuguese gentleman, the sworn enemy of the vainglorious Duarte (3 syl.), in the drama called The Custom of the Country, by Beaumont and Fletcher (published in 1647).

Alonzo, the husband of Cora. He is a brave Peruvian knight, the friend of Rolla, and beloved by king Atali'ba. Alonzo, being taken prisoner of war, is set at liberty by Rolla, who changes clothes with him. At the end he fights with Pizarro and kills him.—Sheridan: Pizarro (altered from Kotzebue) (1799).

Alonzo (Don), "the conqueror of Afric," friend of don Carlos, and husband of Leonora. (For the plot, see ZANGA.)—Young: The Revenge (1721).

Alonzo Fernandez de Avellaneda, author of a spurious Don Quixote, who makes a third sally. This was published during the lifetime of Cervantes, and caused him great annoyance.

Alp, a Venetian renegade, who was commander of the Turkish army in the siege of Corinth. He loved Francesca, daughter of old Minotti, governor of Corinth, but she refused to marry a renegade and apostate. Alp was shot in the siege, and Francesca died of a broken heart.—Byron: Siege of Corinth (1816).

Alph, a river in Xanadu, mentioned by Coleridge in his Kubla Khan.

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree,
Where Alph, the sacred river, ran,
Thro' caverns measureless to man,
Down to a sunless sea.
Kubla Khan.

Alphe'us (3 syl.), a magician and prophet in the army of Charlemagne, slain in sleep by Clorida'no.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Alphe'us (3 syl.), of classic story, being passionately in love with Arethu'sa, pursued her; but she fled from him in a fright, and was changed by Diana into a fountain, which bears her name.

Alphon'so, an irascible old lord in The Pilgrim, a comedy by John Fletcher (1621).

Alphon'so, king of Naples, deposed by his brother Frederick. Sora'no tried to poison him, but did not succeed. Ultimately, he recovered his crown, and Frederick and Sorano were sent to a monastery for the rest of their lives.—John Fletcher: A Wife for a Month (1624). Beaumont died 1616.

Alphonso, son of count Pedro of Cantabria, afterwards king of Spain. He was plighted to Hermesind, daughter of lord Pelayo.

The young Alphonso was in truth an heir
Of nature's largest patrimony; rich
In form and feature, growing strength of limb,
A gentle heart, a soul affectionate,
A joyous spirit, filled with generous thoughts,
And genius heightening and ennobling all.
Southey: Roderick, etc., viii. (1814).

Alpleich or Elfenreigen, the weird spirit-song, or that music which some hear before death. Faber refers to it in his "Pilgrims of the Night"—

Hark, hark, my soul! Angelic songs are swelling.

And Pope, in The Dying Christian to his Soul, when he says—

Hark! they whisper, angels say,
Sister spirit, come away!

Alps-Vinegar. It is Livy who says that Hannibal poured hot vinegar on the Alps to facilitate his passage over the mountains. Where did he get the vinegar from? And as for the fire, Polybius says there was no means of heating the vinegar, not a tree for fire-wood.

Alqui'fe (3 syl.), a famous enchanter in Amadis of Gaul, by Vasco de Lobeira of Oporto, who died 1403.

La Noue denounces such beneficent enchanters as Alquife and Urganda, because they serve "as a vindication of those who traffic with the powers of darkness." —Francis de la Noue: Discourses, 87 (1587).

Al Rakim [rah-keem']. The meaning of this word is very doubtful. Some say it is the mountain or valley of the cave of the seven sleepers. Others think it is the name of the dog shut up in the cave with them; but probably it is a stone or metal tablet set up near the cave, containing the names of the seven sleepers and their dog Katmîr'.—Sale: Al Koran, xviii. note.

Alrinach, the demon who causes shipwrecks, and presides over storms and earthquakes. When visible it is always in the form and dress of a woman.—Eastern Mythology.

Alsa'tia, the Whitefriars' sanctuary for debtors and law-breakers. The name is taken from Alsatia (Alsace, in France), a seat of war and lawlessness when king James's son-in-law was the prince Palatine. Sir Walter Scott, in The Fortunes of Nigel, has graphically described the life and state of this rookery, but he is greatly indebted to Shadwell's comedy, The Squire of Alsatia (1640–1692).

Alscrip (Miss), "the heiress," a vulgar parvenue, affected, conceited, ill-natured, and ignorant. Having had a fortune left her, she assumes the airs of a woman of fashion, and exhibits the follies without possessing the merits of the upper ten.

Mr. Alscrip, the vulgar father of "the heiress," who finds the grandeur of sudden wealth a great bore, and in his new mansion, Berkeley Square, sighs for the snug comforts he once enjoyed as scrivener in Furnival's Inn.—Burgoyne: The Heiress (1781).

Al Sirat', an imaginary bridge between earth and the Mahometan paradise, not so wide as a spider's thread. Those laden with sin fall over into the abyss below.

Al'tamont, a young Genoese lord, who marries Calista, daughter of lord Sciol'to (3 syl.). On his wedding day he discovers that his bride has been seduced by Lotha'rio, and a duel ensues, in which Lothario is killed, whereupon Calista stabs herself. —Rowe: The Fair Penitent (1703).

 Rowe makes Sciolto three syllables always.

[John Quick] commenced his career at Fulham, where he performed the character of "Altamont," which he acted so much to the satisfaction of the manager that he desired his wife to set down young Quick a whole share, which, at the close of the performance, amounted to three shillings.—Memoir of John Quick (1832).

Altamorus, king of Samarcand', who joined the Egyptian army against the crusaders. He surrendered himself to Godfrey (bk. xx.).—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Althe'a (The divine), of Richard Lovelace, was Lucy Sacheverell, called by the poet, Lucretia.

When love with unconfinèd wings
Hovers within my gates,
And my divine Althea brings
To whisper at my grates. . . .

(The "grates" here referred to were those of a prison in which Lovelace was confined by the Long Parliament, for his petition from Kent in favour of the king.)

Althæa's Brand. The Fates told Althæa that her son Melea'ger would live just as long as a log of wood then on the fire remained unconsumed. Althæa contrived to keep the log unconsumed for many years; but when her son killed her two brothers, she threw it angrily into the fire, where it was quickly consumed, and Meleäger expired at the same time.—Ovid: Metamorphoses, viii. 4.

The fatal brand Althæa burned.
Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI. act i. sc. 1 (1591).

(Shakespeare says (2 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 2). Althæa dreamt "she was delivered of a fire-brand." This is a mistake. It was Hecuba who so dreamt. The story of Althæa and the fire-brand is given above.)

Altisido'ra, one of the duchess's servants, who pretends to be in love with don Quixote, and serenades him. The don sings his response that he has no other love than what he gives to his Dulcin'ea, and while he is still singing he is assailed by a string of cats, let into the room by a rope. As the knight was leaving the mansion, Altisidora accused him of having stolen her garters, but when the knight denied the charge, the damsel protested that she said so in her distraction, for her garters were not stolen. "I am like the man," she said, "looking for his mule at the time he was astride its back."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iii. 9, etc.; iv. 5 (1615).

Al'ton (Miss), alias Miss Clifford, a sweet, modest young lady, the companion of Miss Alscrip, "the heiress," a vulgar, conceited parvenue. Lord Gayville is expected to marry "the heiress," but detests her, and loves Miss Alton, her humble companion. It turns out that

Al'ton Locke, tailor and poet, a novel by the Rev. Charles Kingsley (1850). This novel won for the author the title of "The Chartist Clergyman."

Alzir'do, king of Trem'izen, in Africa, overthrown by Orlando in his march to join the allied army of Ag'ramant.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Am'adis of Gaul, a love-child of king Per'ion and the princess Elize'na. He is the hero of a famous prose romance of chivalry, the first four books of which (in old French) are attributed to Vasco de Lobeira of Portugal, who died 1403. Three other books were added in the same century, and were translated into Spanish in 1460 by Montal'vo, who added a fifth book. The five were rendered into French by Herberay, who increased the series to twenty-four books. Lastly, Gilbert Saunier added seven more volumes, and called the entire series Le Roman des Romans.

∴ Whether Amadis was French or British is disputed. Some maintain that "Gaul" means Wales, not France; that Elizena was princess of Brittany (Bretagne), and that Perion was king of Gaul (Wales), not Gaul (France).

Amadis de Gaul was a tall man, of a fair complexion, his aspect something between mild and austere, and had a handsome black beard. He was a person of very few words, was not easily provoked, and was soon appeased.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. i. 1 (1615).

(William Stewart Rose has a poem in three books, called Amadis of Gaul, 1803.)

As Arthur is the central figure of British romance, Charlemagne of French, and Diderick of German, so Amadis is the central figure of Spanish and Portuguese romance; but there is this difference—the tale of Amadis is a connected whole, concluding with the marriage of the hero with Oria'na. The intervening parts are only the obstacles he encountered and overcame in obtaining this consummation. In the Arthurian romances, and those of the Charlemagne series, we have a number of adventures of different heroes, but there is no unity of purpose, each set of adventures is complete in itself.

(Southey the poet has an admirable abridgment of Amadis of Gaul, and also of Palmerin of England. Bernardo Tasso wrote Amadigi di Gaula in 1560.)

Am'adis of Greece, a supplemental part of Amadis of Gaul, by Felicia'no de-Silva. There are also several other Amadises—as Amadis of Colchis, Amadis of Trebisond, Amadis of Cathay; but all these are very inferior to the original Amadis of Gaul.

The ancient fables, whose relickes doe yet remain, namely Lancelot of the Lake, Pierceforest, Tristram, Giron the Courteous, etc., doe beare witnesse of this odde vanitie. Herewith were men fed for the space of 500 yeeres, untill our language growing more polished, and our minds more ticklish, they were driven to invent some novelties wherewith to delight us. Thus came y' bookes of Amadis into light among us in this last age.—Francis de la Noue: Discourses, 87 (1587).

Amai'mon (3 syl.), one of the principal devils. Asmode'us is one of his lieutenants. Shakespeare twice refers to him, in 1 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 4, and in The Merry Wives of Windsor, act ii. sc. 2.

Amal'ahta, son of Erill'yab the deposed queen of the Hoamen (2 syl.), an Indian tribe settled on the south of the Missouri. He is described as a brutal savage, wily, deceitful, and cruel. Amalahta wished to marry the princess Goer'vyl, Madoc's sister, and even seized her by force, but was killed in his flight.—Southey: Madoc, ii. 16 (1805).

Amalthæ'a, the sibyl who offered to sell to Tarquin nine books of prophetic oracles. When the king refused to give her the price demanded, she went away, burnt three of them, and returning to the king, demanded the same price for the remaining six. Again the king declined the purchase. The sibyl, after burning three more of the volumes, demanded the original sum for the remaining three. Tarquin paid the money, and Amalthæa was never more seen. Aulus Gellius says that Amalthæa burnt the books in the king's presence. Pliny affirms that the original number of volumes was only three, two of which the sibyl burnt, and the third was purchased by king Tarquin.

Amalthe'a, mistress of Ammon and mother of Bacchus. Ammon hid his mistress in the island Nysa (in Africa), in order to elude the vigilance and jealousy of his wife Rhea. This account (given by Diodorus Sic'ulus, bk. iii., and by sir Walter Raleigh in his History of the World, I. vi. 5) differs from the ordinary story, which makes Sem'elê the mother of Bacchus, and Rhea his nurse. (Ammon is Ham or Cham, the son of Noah, founder of the African race.)

> . . . that Nyseian ile,
> Girt with the river Triton, where old Cham
> (Whom Gentiles Ammon call, and Libyan Jove)
> Hid Amalthea and her florid son,
> Young Bacchus, from his stepdame Rhea's eye.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 275 (1665).

Amanda, wife of Loveless. Lord Foppington pays her amorous attentions, but she utterly despises the conceited coxcomb, and treats him with contumely. Colonel Townly, in order to pique his lady-love, also pays attention to Loveless's wife, but she repels his advances with indignation; and Loveless, who overhears her, conscious of his own shortcomings, resolves to reform his ways, and, "forsaking all other," to remain true to Amanda, "so long as they both should live."—Sheridan: A Trip to Scarborough (1777).

Aman'da, in Thomson's Seasons, is meant for Miss Young, who married admiral Campbell.

> And thou, Amanda, come, pride of my song!
> Formed by the Graces, loveliness itself.
> "Spring," 480, 481 (1728).

> Awakened by the genial year,
> In vain the birds around me sing;
> In vain the freshening fields appear;
> Without my love there is no spring.

Amanda, the victim of Peregrine Pickle's seduction, in Smollett's novel of Peregrine Pickle (1751).

Am'ara (Mount), a place where the Abyssinian kings kept their younger sons, to prevent sedition. It was a perfect paradise enclosed with alabaster rocks, and containing thirty-four magnificent palaces.—Heylin: Microcosmus (1627).

> Where the Abassin kings their issue guard,
> Mount Amara, . . . by some supposed
> True paradise under the Ethiop line,
> By Nilus line, enclosed with shining rock
> A whole day's journey high.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 280, etc. (1665).

Am'arant. There are numerous species of this flower, those best known are called prince's feather and love lies a-bleeding, both crimson flowers. The bloody amaranth and the clustered amaranth also bear red flowers; but there is a species called the melancholy amaranth, which has a purple velvety flower. All retain their colours pretty well to the last, and the flowers endure for a long time. Pliny says (xxi. 11) that the flowers of the amaranth recover their colour by being sprinkled with water.

> Immortal amaranth, a flower which once
> In paradise, fast by the Tree of Life,
> Began to bloom. . . . With these . . . the spirits elect
> Bind their resplendent locks.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 353, etc. (1665).

Amaran'ta, wife of Bar'tolus, the covetous lawyer. She was wantonly loved by Leandro, a Spanish gentleman.—John Fletcher: The Spanish Curate (1622). Beaumont died in 1616.

Am'aranth (Greek, amarantos, "everlasting"), so called because its flowers retain their "flaming red" colour to the last. Longfellow, by a strange error, crowns the angel of death with amaranth, with which (as Milton says) "the spirits elect bind their resplendent locks," and his angel of life he crowns with asphodel, the flower of Pluto or the grave.

> He who wore the crown of asphodels . . .
> [said] "My errand is not death, but life" . . .
> [but] The angel with the amaranthine wreath
> Whispered a word, that had a sound like death.
> Longfellow: The Two Angels.

Am'aranth (Lady), in Wild Oats, by John O'Keefe, a famous part of Mrs. Pope (1740–1797).

Amaril'lis, a shepherdess in love with Per'igot (t sounded), but Perigot loved Am'oret. In order to break off this affection, Amarillis induced "the sullen shepherd" to dip her in "the magic well," whereby she became transformed into the perfect resemblance of her rival; and soon effectually disgusted Perigot with her bold and wanton conduct. When afterwards he met the true Amoret, he repulsed her, and even wounded her with intent to kill. Ultimately, the trick was discovered by Cor'in, "the faithful shepherdess," and Perigot was married to his true love.—John Fletcher: The Faithful Shepherd (1610).

Amaryllis, in Spenser's pastoral, Colin Clout's Come Home Again, is the countess-dowager of Derby. Her name was Alice, and she was the youngest of the six daughters of sir John Spenser, of Althorpe, ancestor of the noble houses of Spenser and Marlborough. After the death of the earl, the widow married sir Thomas Egerton, keeper of the Great Seal (afterwards baron of Ellesmere and viscount Brackley). It was for this very lady, during her widowhood, that Milton wrote his Arcades (3 syl.).

> No less praiseworthy are the sisters three
> The honour of the noble family
> Of which I meanest boast myself to be . . .
> Phyllis, Charyllis, and sweet Amaryllis;
> Phyllis the fair is eldest of the three,
> The next to her is bountiful Charyllis,
> But Amaryllis highest in degree.
> Spenser: Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1595).

Amaryllis, the name of a rustic beauty in the Idylls of Theocritos, and in the Eclogues of Virgil.

> To sport with Amaryllis in the shade.
> Milton.

Amasis, the ring of Amasis is the same as Polycrates' ring (q.v.).

Am'asis, Amōsis, or Aah'mes (3 syl.), founder of the eighteenth Egyptian dynasty (B.C. 1610). Lord Brooke attributes to him one of the pyramids. The three chief pyramids are usually ascribed to Suphis (or Cheops), Sen-Suphis (or Cephrenês), and Mencherês, all of the fourth dynasty.

> Amasis and Cheops how can time forgive,
> Who in their useless pyramids would live?
> Lord Brooke: Peace.

Amateur (An). Pierce Egan the younger published under this pseudonym his Real Life in London, or The Rambles and Adventures of Rob Tally-ho, Esq., and his Cousin, the Hon. Tom Dashall, through the Metropolis (1821-2).

Amaurite, a bridge in Utopia. Sir Thomas More says he could not recollect whether Raphael Hythloday told him it was 500 paces or only 300 paces long, and he requested his friend, Peter Giles, living at Antwerp, to question the adventurer about it.

Amaurot, the chief city of "Utopia" (q.v.). (Greek, amauros, "shadowy, unknown.")

Amaurots (The), a people whose kingdom was invaded by the Dipsodes (2 syl.), but Pantag'ruel, coming to their defence, utterly routed the invaders.—Rabelais: Pantagruel, ii. (1533).

Ama'via, the personification of Intemperance in grief. Hearing that her husband, sir Mordant, had been enticed to the Bower of Bliss by the enchantress Acra'sia, she went in quest of him, and found him so changed in mind and body she could scarcely recognize him; however, she managed by tact to bring him away; but he died on the road, and Amavia stabbed herself from excessive grief.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 1 (1590).

Amazia. Samuel Pordage wrote a poem entitled Azaria and Hushai, in reply to Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel (q.v.). Amazia stands for Charles II. In this reply we meet with these preposterous lines—

> All his subjects, who his fate did moan,
> With joyful hearts restored him to his throne;
> Who then his father's murderers destroyed,
> And a long, happy, peaceful reign enjoyed,
> Beloved of all, for merciful was he
> Like God, in the superlative degree! (111)

Amazo'na, a fairy, who freed a certain country from the Ogri and the Blue Centaur. When she sounded her trumpet, the sick were recovered and became both young and strong. She gave the princess Carpil'lona a bunch of gilliflowers, which enabled her to pass unrecognized before those who knew her well.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The Princess Carpillona," 1682).

Amazo'nian Chin, a beardless chin, like that of the Amazonian women. Especially applied to a beardless young soldier. (See ALEXANDER, p. 22.)

> When with his Amazonian chin he drove
> The bristled lips before him.
> Shakespeare: Coriolanus, act ii. sc. 2 (1609).

Amber, said to be a concretion of birds' tears, but the birds were the sisters of Melea'ger, called Meleag'rïdês, who never ceased weeping for their dead brother.—Pliny: Natural History, xxxvii. 2, 11.

> Around thee shall glisten the loveliest amber
> That ever the sorrowing sea-birds have wept.
> Moore: Fire-Worshippers

AM'BROSE (2 syl.), a sharper, who assumed in the presence of Gil Blas the character of a devout. He was in league with a fellow who assumed the name of don Raphael, and a young woman who called herself Camilla, cousin of donna Mencia. These three sharpers allure Gil Blas to a house which Camilla says is hers, fleece him of his ring, his portmanteau, and his money, decamp, and leave him to find out that the house is only a hired lodging.—Lesage: Gil Blas, i. 15, 16 (1715).

Am'brose (2 syl.), a female domestic servant waiting on Miss Seraphine and Miss Angelica Arthuret.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George II.).

Ambrose (Brother), a monk who attended the prior Aymer, of Jorvaulx Abbey.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Ambrose (Father), abbot of Kennaquhair, is Edward Glendinning, brother of sir Halbert Glendinning (the knight of Avenel). He appears at Kinross, disguised as a nobleman's retainer.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

 Father Ambrose (Edward Glendinning), abbot of Kennaquhair, and subsequently a servant at Kinross. The novel is called the "Abbot," but Roland Græme is the real hero and chief character.

Ambrosian Chant (The), or hymn called Ambrosiánum, mentioned by Isidore, in his De Eccl. Offic., bk. i. chap. 6. It was a chant or hymn introduced into the Church of Milan in the fourth century, and now known as the Te Deum laudámus. It is said to have been the joint work of St. Ambrose and St. Augustine. The historic fact is disputed.

Ambrosio, the hero of Lewis's romance The Monk. He is abbot of the Capuchins of Madrid, and is called "The man of holiness;" but Matilda overcame his virtue, and he goes on from bad to worse, till he is condemned to death by the Inquisition. He now bargains with Lucifer for release. He gains his bargain, it is true, but only to be dashed to pieces on a rock.

Amé'lia, a model of conjugal affection, in Fielding's novel so called (1751). It is said that the character was modelled from his own wife. Dr. Johnson read this novel from beginning to end without once stopping.

Amelia is perhaps the only book of which, being printed off betimes one morning, a new edition was called for before night. The character of Amelia is the most pleasing heroine of all the romances.—Dr. Johnson.

(Lady Mary Wortley Montague tells us that Mr. and Mrs. Booth are faithful presentments of Mr. and Mrs. Fielding.)

Amé'lia, in Thomson's Seasons, a beautiful, innocent young woman, overtaken by a storm while walking with her troth-plight lover, Cel'adon, "with equal virtue formed, and equal grace. Hers the mild lustre of the blooming morn, and his the radiance of the risen day." Amelia grew frightened, but Celadon said, "'Tis safety to be near thee, sure;" when a flash of lightning struck her dead in his arms.—"Summer" (1727).

Amé'lia, in Schiller's tragedy of The Robbers.

Or they will learn how generous worth sublimes
The robber Moor, and pleads for all his crimes;
How poor Amelia kissed with many a tear
His hand, blood-stained, but ever, ever dear.
Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, ii. (1799).

Amelia Sedley, "a dear little creature," in love with George Osborne, in Thackeray's novel of Vanity Fair.

Amelot (2 syl.), the page of sir Damian de Lacy.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

America. Names of the United States, whence derived—

Alabama, an Indian word, meaning "Here we rest." So named in 1817, from the chief river.

Annap'olis (Maryland), so named from queen Anne, in whose reign it was constituted the seat of local government.

Asto'ria (Oregon), so called from Mr. Astor, merchant, of New York, who founded here a fur-trading station in 1811. The adventure of this merchant forms the subject of Washington Irving's Astoria.

Bal'timore (3 syl.), in Maryland, is so called from lord Baltimore, who led a colony to that state in 1634.

Boston (Massachusetts), so called from Boston in Lincolnshire, whence many of the original founders emigrated.

Carolina (North and South), named originally from Charles IX. of France; but Charles II. granted the whole country to eight needy courtiers.

Carson City (Oregon) commemorates the name of Kit Carson, the Rocky Mountain trapper and guide, who died in 1871.

Charlestown (Carolina), founded in 1670, and named after Charles II.

Connecticut (Indian), so called from the chief river.

Delaware (3 syl.), in Pennsylvania, so named from lord De la Ware, who died in the bay (1703).

Flor'ida, discovered by the Spaniards on Palm Sunday, and thence called [Pascua] Florida.

Geor'gia, named in honour of George II., in whose reign the first settlement there was made.

Harrisburg (Pennsylvania), named from Mr. Harris, by whom it was first settled in 1733, under a grant from the Penn family.

Indiana, so named from the number of Indians which dwelt there (1801).

Louisiana, so named by M. de la Sale (1682), in honour of Louis XIV. of France.

Maine, so called (1638) from the French province of the same name.

Maryland, so named by lord Baltimore (1632), in compliment to Henrietta Maria, the wife of Charles I. of England.

Massachusetts (Indian) means "Blue Hills."

Nevada, so called from the Sierra Nevada mountain-chain.

New Hampshire, previously called Laconia. It received its present name from J. Mason, governor of Hampshire, to whom it was conceded in 1629.

New Jersey, so called in honour of sir G. Carteret, who had defended Jersey against the parliamentary forces in 1664.

New York, previously called New Amsterdam. It received its present name (1664) in compliment to James duke of York (afterwards James II.).

Pennsylvania ("the Penn Forest"), so called from William Penn, who, in 1681, gave to the state its constitution.

Rhode Island, so called, in 1644, in reference to the island of Rhodes. It is the smallest of the 13 original States of North America, and was colonized by the Pilgrim Fathers.

Texas (i.e. "the place of protection"), so called in 1817, because general Lallemant gave there "protection" to a colony of French refugees.

Vermont (i.e. "Verts Monts"), so called from the Green Mountains, which traverse the state.

Virginia, so called (1584) by sir Walter Raleigh, in compliment to Elizabeth, "the virgin queen."

 Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Michigan ("a lake"), Minnesota ("laughing waters"), Mississippi ("sea of waters"), Missouri, Nebraska, Ohio, Oregon, and Wisconsin, are names of rivers.

America. Nicknames of the United States' inhabitants: Alabama, lizards; Arkan'sas, tooth-picks; Californ'ia, gold-hunters; Colora'do, rovers; Connec'ticut, wooden nutmegs; Del'aware, musk-rats; Flor'ida, fly-up-the-creeks; Geor'gia, buzzards; Illinois, suckers; Indiana, hoosiers; Iowa, hawk-eyes; Kansas, jay-hawkers; Kentucky, corn-crackers; Louisiana, creoles; Maine, foxes; Maryland, craw-thumpers; Mich'igan, wolverines; Minnesot'a, gophers; Mississip'pi, tadpoles; Missou'ri, pukes; Nebras'ka, bug-eaters; Neva'da, sage hens; New Hampshire, granite boys; New Jersey, blues or clam-catchers; New York, knickerbockers; North Caroli'na, tar-boilers and tuckoes; Ohio, buck-eyes; Or'egon, web-feet and hard-cases; Pennsylva'nia, Pennanites and leather-heads; Rhode Island, gun-flints; South Caroli'na, weasels; Tennessee', whelps; Texas, beef-heads; Vermont, Green Mountain boys; Virgin'ia, beadies; Wisconsin, badgers.

American Notes, by Charles Dickens (1842). The book was well received in England, but gave great offence in America. A reply, called Change for American Notes, was published by an American lady, cutting up the book hip and thigh.

American States. The eight states, Alabama, Arkansas, Illinois, Kentucky, Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, and Wisconsin, derive their names from their respective chief rivers.

Amethyst is said to dispel drunkenness. (Greek, a, privative; methusis, "drunkenness.")

Ameu'ti, the heaven of Egyptian mythology.

> Open the gate of heaven . . . open the gate of the starry region; open the gate of Ameuti!—Inscription on the mummy opened by Pettigrew, in 1836.

Am'giad, son of Camaralzaman and Badoura, and half-brother of Assad (son of Camaralzaman and Haiatal'nefous). Each of the two mothers conceived a base passion for the other's son, and when the young princes revolted at their advances, accused them to their father of designs upon their honour. Camaralzaman ordered his emir Giondar to put them both to death, but as the young men had saved him from a lion, he laid no hand on them, but told them not to return to their father's dominions. They wandered on for a time, and then parted, but both reached the same place, which was a city of the Magi. Here by a strange adventure Amgiad was made vizier, while Assad was thrown into a dungeon, where he was designed as a sacrifice to the fire-god. Bosta'na, a daughter of the old man who imprisoned Assad, released him, and Amgiad out of gratitude made her his wife. After which the king, who was greatly advanced in years, appointed him his successor, and Amgiad used his best efforts to abolish the worship of fire and establish "the true faith."—Arabian Nights ("Amgiad and Assad").

Amhara, the kingdom in which was the "happy valley," where the Abyssinian princes were doomed to live. The valley was encompassed by mountains, and had but one entrance, which was under a cavern, concealed by woods and closed by iron gates.—Dr. Johnson: Rasselas (1759).

Am'ias, a squire of low degree, beloved by Æmilia. They agreed to meet at a given spot, but on their way thither both were taken captives—Amias by Corflambo, and Æmilia by a man-monster. Æmilia was released by Belphœbê (3 syl.), who slew "the caitiff;" and Amias by prince Arthur, who slew Corflambo. The two lovers were then brought together by the prince "in peace and settled rest."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 7, 9 (1596).

Am'idas, the younger brother of Brac'idas, sons of Mile'sio; the former in love with the dowerless Lucy, and the latter with the wealthy Philtra. The two brothers had each an island of equal size and value left them by their father, but the sea daily added to the island of the younger brother, and encroached on that belonging to Bracidas. When Philtra saw that the property of Amidas was daily increasing, she forsook the elder brother and married the wealthier; while Lucy, seeing herself jilted, threw herself into the sea. A floating chest attracted her attention; she clung to it, and was drifted to the wasted island. The chest was found to contain great riches, and Lucy gave its contents and herself to Bracidas. Amidas claimed the chest as his own by right, and the question in dispute was submitted to sir Ar'tegal. The wise arbiter decided, that whereas Amidas claimed as his own all the additions given to his island by the sea, Lucy might claim as her own the chest, because the sea had given it to her.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 4 (1596).

Am'iel, in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for sir Edward Seymour, Speaker of the House of Commons. An anagram for Ellam, "the friend of God" (2 Sam. xxiii. 34).

Who can Amiel's praise refuse?
Of ancient race by birth, but nobler yet
In his own worth, and without title great.
The sanhedrim long time as chief he ruled,
Their reason guided, and their passion cooled.
Part I. 899–903.

A'min (Prince), son of the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid; he married Am'inê, sister of Zobeide (3 syl.), the caliph's wife. —Arabian Nights' Entertainments ("The History of Amine").

Am'ina, an orphan, who walked in her sleep. (For the tale, see SONNAMBULA.)—Bellini: La Sonnambula (an opera, 1831).

Am'ine (3 syl.), half-sister of Zobei'dê (3 syl.), and wife of Amin, the caliph's son. One day she went to purchase a robe, and the seller told her he would charge nothing if she would suffer him to kiss her cheek. Instead of kissing he bit it, and Amine, being asked by her husband how she came by the wound, so shuffled in her answers that he commanded her to be put to death—a sentence he afterwards commuted to scourging. One day she and her sister told the stories of their lives to the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid, when Amin became reconciled to his wife, and the caliph married her half-sister.—Arabian Nights' Entertainments ("History of Zobeide and History of Amine").

Am'ine (3 syl.) or Am'ines (3 syl.), the beautiful wife of Sidi Nouman. Instead of eating her rice with a spoon, she used a bodkin for the purpose, and carried it to her mouth in infinitesimal portions. This went on for some time, till Sidi Nouman determined to ascertain on what his wife really fed, and to his horror discovered that she was a ghoul, who went stealthily by night to the cemetery, and feasted on the fresh-buried dead.—Arabian Nights' Entertainments ("History of Sidi Nouman").

N.B.—Amine was so hard-hearted that she led about her three sisters like a leash of greyhounds.

One of the Amine's sort, who pick up their grains of food with a bodkin.—O. W. Holmes: Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table.

Amin'tor, a young nobleman, the troth-plight husband of Aspatia, but by the king's command he marries Evad'ne (3 syl.). This is the great event of the tragedy of which Amintor is the hero. The sad story of Evadne, the heroine, gives name to the play.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Maid's Tragedy (1610).

Amis the Priest, the hero of a comic German story, in verse (thirteenth century). He was an Englishman, whose popularity excited the envy of the higher clergy; so they tried to depose him on the score of ignorance. Being brought before them, they demand answers to such questions as these: "How many days is it since Adam was placed in paradise?" but Amis fools them with his wit. The poem reminds one of the Abbot of Canterbury, and the Abbé de St. Gall.—Stricker of Austria (fourteenth century).

Am'let (Richard), the gamester in Vanbrugh's Confederacy (1695). He is usually called "Dick."

I saw Miss Pope for the second time, in the year 1799, in the character of "Flippanta," John Palmer being "Dick Amlet," and Mrs. Jordan "Corinna."—James Smith.

Mrs. Amlet, a rich, vulgar, tradeswoman, mother of Dick, of whom she is very proud, although she calls him a "sad scapegrace," and swears "he will be hanged." At last she settles on him £10,000, and he marries Corinna, daughter of Gripe the rich scrivener.

Ammo'nian Horn (The), the cornucopia. Ammon king of Lib'ya gave to his mistress Amalthe'a (mother of Bacchus) a tract of land resembling a ram's horn in shape, and hence called the "Ammonian horn" (from the giver), the "Amalthe'an horn" (from the receiver), and the "Hisperian horn" (from its locality). Almathea also personifies fertility. (Ammon is Ham, son of Noah, founder of the African race.) (See AMALTHEA.)

[Here] Amalthea pours,
Well pleased, the wealth of that Ammonian horn,
Her dower.
Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads.

Ammon's Son. Alexander the Great called himself the son of the god Ammon, but others call him the son of Philip of Macedon.

Of food I think with Philip's son, or rather Ammon's (till pleased with one world and one father).
Byron: Don Juan, v. 31.

(Alluding to the tale that when Alexander had conquered the whole world, he wept that there was no other world to conquer.)

A'mon's Son is Rinaldo, eldest son of Amon or Aymon marquis d'Este, and nephew of Charlemagne.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Am'oret, a modest, faithful shepherdess, who plighted her troth to Per'igot (t sounded) at the "Virtuous Well." The wanton shepherdess Amarillis assumed her appearance and dress, but the deception being revealed by Cor'in, "the faithful shepherdess," the lovers were happily married.—John Fletcher: The Faithful Shepherdess (1610). (See AMARILLIS, p. 33.)

Amoret'ta or Am'oret, twin-born with Belphœbê (3 syl.), their mother being Chrysog'onê (4 syl.). While the mother and her two babes were asleep, Diana took one (Belphœbê) to bring up, and Venus the other. Venus committed Amoretta to the charge of Psychê (2 syl.), and Psychê tended her as lovingly as she tended her own daughter Pleasure, "to whom she became the companion." When grown to marriageable estate, Amoretta was brought to Fairyland, and wounded many a heart, but gave her own only to sir Scudamore (bk. iii. 6). Being seized by Bu'sirane, an enchanter, she was kept in durance by him because she would not "her true love deny;" but Britomart delivered her and bound the enchanter (bk. iii. 11, 12), after which she became the tender, loving wife of sir Scudamore.

Amoret is the type of female loveliness and wifely affection, soft, warm, chaste, gentle, and ardent; not sensual nor yet platonic, but that living, breathing, warm-hearted love which fits woman for the fond mother and faithful wife.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. (1590).

Amour'y (Sir Giles), the Grand-Master of the Knights Templars, who conspired with the marquis of Montserrat against Richard I. Saladin cut off the Templar's head while in the act of drinking.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Am'perzand, a corruption of And-as-and, i.e. "&-as-and." The symbol is the old Italian monogram et ("and"), made thus &, in which the first part is the letter e and the flourish at the end the letter t.

> State epistles, so dull and so grand,
> Mustn't contain the shortened "and."
> O my nice little amperzand!
> Nothing that Cadmus ever planned
> Equals my elegant amperzand.
> Quoted in Notes and Queries (May 5, 1877).

(Cadmus invented the original Greek alphabet.)

Am'phibal (St.), confessor of St. Alban of Verulam. When Maximia'nus Hercu'lius, general of Diocle'tian's army in Britain, pulled down the Christian churches, burnt the Holy Scriptures, and put to death the Christians with unflagging zeal, Alban hid his confessor, and offered to die for him.

> A thousand other saints whom Amphibal had taught . . .
> Were slain where Lichfield is, whose name doth rightly sound
> (There of those Christians slain), "Dead-field" or burying-ground.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1622).

Amphi'on is said to have built Thebes by the music of his lute. Tennyson has a poem called Amphion, a skit and rhyming jeu d'esprit.

> Amphion there the loud creating lyre
> Strikes, and behold a sudden Thebes aspire.
> Pope: Temple of Fame.

Amphis-bæna, a reptile which could go head foremost either way, because it had a head at each extremity. Milton uses the word in Paradise Lost, x. 524. (Greek, amphis-baina, a serpent which could go either backwards or forwards.)

> The amphis-bæna doubly armed appears,
> At either end a threatening head she rears.
> Rowe Pharsalia, ix. 696, etc. (by Lucan).

Amphitryon, a Theban general, husband of Alcme'nê. While Amphitryon was absent at war with Pter'elas king of the Tel'ebōans, Jupiter assumed his form, and visited Alcmenê, who in due time became the mother of Her'culês. Next day Amphitryon returned, having slain Pterelas, and Alcmenê was surprised to see him so soon again. Here a great entanglement arose, Alcmenê telling her husband he visited her last night, and showing him the ring he gave her; but Amphitryon declared he was with the army. This confusion was still further increased by his slave Sos'ia, who went to tell Alcmenê the news of her husband's victory, but was stopped by Mercury, who had assumed for the nonce Sosia's form; and the slave could not make out whether he was himself or not. This plot has been made a comedy by Plautus, Molière, and Dryden.

> The scenes which Plautus drew, to-night we show,
> Touched by Molière, by Dryden taught to glow.
> Prologue to Hawkesworth's version.

As an Amphitryon chez qui l'on dine, no one knows better than Ouidà the uses of a recherché dinner.—Yates: Celebrities, xix.

"Amphitryon:" Le véritable Amphitryon est l'Amphytrion où l'on dine ("The master of the feast is the master of the house"). While the confusion was at its height between the false and true Amphitryon, Socie [Sosia] the slave is requested to decide which was which, and replied—

Je ne me trompois pas, messieurs; ce mot termine
Toute l'irrésolution;
Le véritable Amphitryon
Est l'Amphitryon où l'on dine.
Molière: Amphitryon, iii. 5 (1668).

Demosthenes and Cicero
Are doubtless stately names to hear,
But that of good Amphitryon
Sounds far more pleasant to my ear.
M. A. Désaugiers (1772–1827).

Amree't, the drink which imparts immortality, or the Water of Immortality. It is obtained by churning the sea, either with the mountain Meroo or with the mountain Mandar.—Mahabharat.

"Bring forth the Amreeta-cup!" Kehama cried
To Yamen, rising sternly in his pride;
"It is within the marble sepulchre." . . .
"Take! drink!" with accents dread the spectre said.
"For thee and Kailgal hath it been assigned.
Ye only of the children of mankind."
Southey: Curse of Kehama, xxiv. 13 (1809).

Am'ri, in Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is Heneage Finch, earl of Nottingham and lord chancellor. He is called "The Father of Equity" (1621–1682).

To whom the double blessing did belong,
With Moses' inspiration, Aaron's tongue.
Part ii. 1023–4 (1682).

Amun'deville (Lord Henry), one of the "British privy council." After the sessions of parliament he retired to his country seat, where he entertained a select and numerous party, amongst which were the duchess of Fitz-Fulke, Aurora Raby, and don Juan "the Russian envoy." His wife was lady Adeline. (His character is given in xiv. 70, 71.)—Byron: Don Juan, xiii. to end.

Am'urath III., sixth emperor of the Turks. He succeeded his father, Selim II., and reigned 1574–1595. His first act was to invite all his brothers to a banquet, and strangle them. Henry IV. alludes to this when he says—

This is the English, not the Turkish court;
Not Amurath an Amurath succeeds,
But Harry, Harry.
Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. act v. sc. 2 (1598).

Amusements of Kings. The great amusement of Aretas of Arabia Petræa, was currying horses; of Artaba'nus of Persia, was mole-catching; of Domitian of Rome, was catching flies; of Ferdinand VII. of Spain, was embroidering petticoats; of Henri III., bilboquet; of Louis XVI., clock and lock making; of George IV., the game of patience.

Amyn'tas, in Colin Clout's Come Home Again, by Spenser, is Ferdinando earl of Derby, who died 1594.

Amyntas, flower of shepherd's pride forlorn.
He, whilst he lived, was the noblest swain
That ever pipèd on an oaten quill.
Spenser: Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1591).

Amyn'tor. (See AMINTOR.)

Amy Robsart. (See ROBSART.)

A'mys and Amyl'ion, the Damon and Pythias of mediæval romance. (See Ellis's Specimens of Early English Metrical Romances.)

Anab'asis, the expedition of the younger Cyrus against his brother Artaxerxes, and the retreat of his "ten thousand" Greeks, described by Xen'ophon the Greek historian.

Your chronicler, in writing this,
Had in his mind th' Anabasis.
Longfellow: The Wayside Inn (an interlude).

Anacharsis. Le voyage du Jeune Anacharsis. An historical romance by l'abbé Barthélemy (1788). It is a description of Greece in the time of Periclês and Philip, and was a labour of 30 years. The introduction is especially admired. At one time it was extremely popular, but it has not maintained its original high reputation.

 Anacharsis the Scythian, of princely rank, left his native country to travel in pursuit of knowledge. He reached Athens about B.C. 594, and became acquainted with Solon, etc. By his talents and acute observations he has been reckoned by some one of the "Seven Wise Men." Barthélemy's romance is not a translation of the Scythian's book, but an original work called Anacharsis the Younger.

Anacharsis [Cloots]. Baron Jean Baptiste Cloots assumed the prenome of Anacharsis, from the Scythian so called, who travelled about Greece and other countries to gather knowledge and improve his own countrymen. The baron wished by the name to intimate that his own object in life was like that of Anacharsis (1755–1794).

He assumed the name of "Anacharsis" in his travels, before Barthélemy had published his book.

Anachronisms. (See ERRORS.)

CHAUCER, in his tale of Troylus, at the siege of Troy, makes Pandărus refer to Robin Hood.

And to himselfe ful soberly he saied,
From haselwood there jolly Robin plaied.
Book v.

 He also makes Chryseyde talk of reading the "lives of the saints," and rejoicing that she is not a man.

In the House of Fame, Orion the giant is mistaken for Arion the musician.

CICERO (Holden's edition, De Officiis, p. 15 note). Demosthenes is said to have given up oratory at the instigation of Socrătēs. Socrates lived B.C. 460–391; Demosthĕnes, 383–322.

GILES FLETCHER, in Christ's Victory, pt. ii., makes the Tempter seem to be "a good old hermit or palmer, travelling to see some saint, and telling his beads!!"

LODGE, in The True Tragedies of Marius and Sylla (1594), mentions "the razor of Palermo" and "St. Paul's steeple," and introduces Frenchmen who "for forty crowns" undertake to poison the Roman consul.

MORGLAY makes Dido tell Æneas that she should have been contented with a son, even "if he had been a cockney dandiprat" (1582).

SCHILLER, in his Piccolomini, speaks of lightning conductors. This was at least 150 years before they were invented.

SHAKESPEARE, in his Coriolanus (act ii. sc. 1), makes Menenius refer to Galen above 600 years before he was born.

Cominius alludes to Roman plays, but no such things were known for 250 years after the death of Cominius.—Coriolanus, act ii. sc. 2.

Brutus refers to the "Marcian waters brought to Rome by Censorinus." This was not done till 300 years afterwards.

In Hamlet, the prince Hamlet was educated at Wittemberg School, which was not founded till 1502; whereas Saxo-Germanicus, from whom Shakespeare borrowed the tale, died in 1204. Hamlet was 30 years old when his mother talks of his going back to school (act i. sc. 2).

In 1 Henry IV. the carrier complains that "the turkeys in his pannier are quite starved" (act ii. sc. 5), whereas turkeys came from America, and the New World was not even discovered for a century later. Again in Henry V. Gower is made to say to Fluellen, "Here comes Pistol, swelling like a turkey-cock" (act v. sc. 1).

In Julius Cæsar, Brutus says to Cassius, "Peace, count the clock." To which Cassius replies, "The clock has stricken three." Clocks were not known to the Romans, and striking-clocks were not invented till some 1400 years after the death of Cæsar.

VIRGIL places Æneas in the port Vellnus, which was made by Curius Dentātus.

This list with very little trouble might be greatly multiplied. The hotbed of anachronisms is mediæval romance; there nations, times, and places are most recklessly disregarded. This may be instanced by a few examples from Ariosto's great poem Orlando Furioso.

N.B.—Here we have Charlemagne and his paladins joined by Edward king of England, Richard earl of Warwick, Henry duke of Clarence, and the dukes of York and Gloucester (bk. vi.). We have cannons employed by Cymosco king of Friza (bk. iv.), and also in the siege of Paris (bk. vi.). We have the Moors established in Spain, whereas they were not invited over by the Saracens for nearly 300 years after Charlemagne's death. In bk. xvii. we have Prester John, who died in 1202; and in the last three books we have Constantine the Great, who died in 337.

Anachronisms of Artists. This would furnish a curious subject. Fra Angelico, in his Crucifixion (in the Chapter House of San Muro) has, in the foreground, a man holding up the crucifix, a Dominican monk, a bishop with his crosier, and a mitred abbot blessing the people with one finger extended.

Anac'reon, the prince of erotic and bacchanalian poets, insomuch that songs on these subjects are still called anacreon'tic (B.C. 563–478).

Anacreon of Painters, Francesco Albāno or Alba'ni (1578–1660).

Anacreon of the Guillotine, Bertrand Barère de Vieuzac (1755–1841).

Anacreon of the Temple, Guillaume Amfrye, abbé de Chaulieu (1639–1720).

Anacreon of the Twelfth Century, Walter Mapes, "The Jovial Toper." His famous drinking song, "Meum est propositum . . ." has been translated by Leigh Hunt (1150–1196).

The French Anacreon. 1. Pontus de Thiard, one of the "Pleiad poets" (1521–1605). 2. P. Laujon, perpetual president of the Caveau Moderne, a Paris club noted for its good dinners, but every member was of necessity a poet (1727–1811).

The Scotch Anacreon, Alexander Scot, who flourished in 1550.

The Persian Anacreon, Mahommed Hafiz. The collection of his poems is called The Divan (1310–1389).

The Sicilian Anacreon, Giovanni Meli (1740–1815).

Anacreon Moore, Thomas Moore of Dublin (1779–1852), poet. Called "Anacreon," from his translation of that Greek poet, and his own original anacreontic songs.

Described by Mahomet and Anacreon Moore.
Byron: Don Juan, i. 204.

Anadems, crowns of flowers. (Greek, anadêma, "a head-dress.")

> With fingers neat and fine
> Brave anadems they make.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xv. (1612).

Anagnus, Inchastity personified in The Purple Island, by Phineas Fletcher (canto vii.). He had four sons by Caro, named Mæchus (adultery), Pornei'us (fornication), Acath'arus, and Asel'gês (lasciviousness), all of whom are fully described by the poet. In the battle of Mansoul (canto xi.) Anagnus is slain by Agnei'a (wifely chastity), the spouse of Encra'tes (temperance) and sister of Parthen'ia (maidenly chastity). (Greek, anagnos, "impure.") (1633.)

SIR ROGER CHARLES DOUGHTY TICHBORNE, BARONET. You horrid butcher, Orton, biggest rascal here.

A'nah, granddaughter of Cain and sister of Aholiba'mah. Japhet loved her, but she had set her heart on the seraph Azaz'iel, who carried her off to another planet when the Flood came.—Byron: Heaven and Earth.

Anah and Aholibamah are very different characters: Anah is soft, gentle, and submissive; her sister is proud, imperious, and aspiring: the one loving in fear, the other in ambition. She fears that her love makes her "heart grow impious," and that she worships the seraph rather than the Creator.—Lord Lytton.

Anak, a giant of Palestine, whose descendants were terrible for their gigantic stature. The Hebrew spies said that they themselves were mere grasshoppers compared with the Anakim.

> I felt the thews of Anakim,
> The pulses of a Titan's heart.
> Tennyson: In Memoriam, lii.

(The Titans were giants, who, according to classic fable, made war with Jupiter or Zeus, 1 syl.)

Anak of Publishers. So John Murray was called by lord Byron (1778–1843).

Anamnes'tes (4 syl.), the boy who waited on Eumnestês (Memory). Eumnestês was a very old man, decrepit and half blind, a "man of infinite remembrance, who things foregone through many ages held." When unable to "fet" what he wanted, he was helped by a little boy yclept Anamnestês, who sought out for him what "was lost or laid amiss." (Greek, eumnêstis, "good memory;" anamnêstis, "research or calling up to mind.")

> And oft when things were lost or laid amiss,
> That boy them sought and unto him did lend;
> Therefore he Anamnestes cleped is,
> And that old man Eumnestes.
> Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 9 (1590).

Anani'as, in The Alchemist, a comedy by Ben Jonson (1610).

Benjamin Johnson (1651-1742) . . . seemed to be proud to wear the poet's double name, and was particularly great in all that author's plays that were usually performed, viz. "Wasp," "Corbaccio," "Morose," and "Ananias."—Chetwood.

("Wasp" in Bartholomew Fair, "Corbaccio" in The Fox, "Morose" in The Silent Woman, all by B. Jonson.)

Anarchus, king of the Dipsodes (2 syl.), defeated by Pantag'ruel, who dressed him in a ragged doublet, a cap with a cock's feather, and married him to "an old lantern-carrying hag." The prince gave the wedding breakfast, which consisted of garlic and sour cider. His wife, being a regular termagant, "did beat him like plaster, and the ex-tyrant did not dare to call his soul his own."—Rabelais: Pantagruel, ii. 31 (1533).

Anarchy (The Masque of), by Percy Bysshe Shelley (1819). A satirical poem on what was called the "Manchester Massacres," an exaggerate expression for the injuries received by the crowd which had met at St. Peter's Field, Manchester, in defiance of the magistrates' orders, to hear "Orator Hunt" on parliamentary reform. About 80,000 persons assembled, and the military, being sent for, dispersed the mob with the backs of their swords, but 100 persons were injured either by accident or being knocked down by the crowd. Shelley took the side of the mob. (See PETERLOO.)

Anasta'sius, the hero of a novel called Memoirs of Anastasius, by Thomas Hope (1819), his master-work. It is the autobiography of a Greek, who, to escape the consequences of his crimes and villainies, becomes a regenade, and passes through a long series of adventures.

Fiction has but few pictures which will bear comparison with that of Anastasius, sitting on the steps of the lazaretto of Trieste, with his dying boy in his arms. —Encyclopædia Britannica (article "Romance").

Anastasius Grün, the pseudonym of Anton Alexander von Auersperg, a German poet (1806-1876).

Anasterax, brother of Niquee [ne.-kay], with whom he lived in illicit intercourse. The fairy Zorphee, in order to withdraw her goddaughter from this alliance, enchanted her.—Amadis de Gaul.

Anaxar'te (4 syl.), the Am'adis of Greece, a supplemental part of the Portuguese romance called Amadis of Gaul [Wales]. Amadis of Greece was written by Feliciano de Silva.

An'cho, a Spanish brownie, who haunts the shepherds' huts, warms himself at their fires, tastes their clotted milk and cheese, converses with the family, and is treated with familiarity mixed with terror. The Ancho hates church-bells.

Anchors. A frigate has six: (1) the cock-bill anchor, forward; (2) the kedger, aft; (3) the flood anchor, towards the open; (4) the ebb anchor; (5) the bower anchor, to starboard; (6) the sheet anchor, to larboard or port.

Ancient Mariner (The), a poem by Coleridge (about 1796). The man, having shot an albatross (a bird of good omen to seamen), was doomed to wander with his crew from land to land. On one of his landings he told his tale to a hermit, and whenever he rested on terra firma, he was to repeat it as a warning to others.

Swinburne says: "For absolute melody and splendour, it were hardly rash to call it the first poem in the language."

An'cor, a river of Leicestershire, running through Harshul, where Michael Drayton was born. Hence Wm. Browne calls him the shepherd

Who on the banks of Ancor tuned his pipe.
Britannia's Pastorals, l. 5 (1613).

An'derson (Eppie), a servant at the inn of St. Ronan's Well, held by Meg Dods.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

André (2 syl.), Petit-André and Trois Echelles are the executioners of Louis XI. of France. They are introduced by Sir W. Scott, both in Quentin Durward and in Anne of Geierstein.

André, the hero and title of a novel by George Sand (Mde. Dudevant). This novel and that called Consuelo (4 syl.) are considered her best (1804-1876).

An'drea Ferra'ra, a sword, so called from a famous Italian sword-maker of the name. Strictly speaking, only a broad-sword or claymore should be so called.

There's nae sic thing as standing a Highlander's Andrew Ferrara; they will slaughie aff a fellow's head at a dash slap.—G. Macklin: Love-a-la-mode (1779).

Andre'os, Fortitude personified in The Purple Island, by Phineas Fletcher (canto x.). "None fiercer to a stubborn enemy, but to the yielding none more sweetly kind." (Greek, andria or andreia, "manliness.")

An'drew, gardener at Ellangowan, to Godfrey Bertram the laird.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Andrews, a private in the royal army of the duke of Monmouth.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Andrews (Joseph), the hero and title of a novel by Fielding (1742). He is a footman who marries a maidservant. Joseph Andrews is a brother of [Richardson's] "Pamela," a handsome, model young man. Parson Adams is a delightful character (q.v.).

The accounts of Joseph's bravery and good qualities, his voice too musical to halloa to the dogs, his bravery in riding races for the gentlemen of the county, and his constancy in refusing bribes and temptation, have something refreshing in their naïveté and freshness, and prepossess one in favour of that handsome young hero.—Thackeray.

Androclus and the Lion. Androclus was a runaway Roman slave, who took refuge in a cavern. A lion entered, and instead of tearing him to pieces, lifted up its fore paw that Androclus might extract from it a thorn. The fugitive, being subsequently captured, was doomed to fight with a lion in the Roman arena, and it so happened that the very same lion was let out against him; it instantly recognized its benefactor, and began to fawn upon him with every token of gratitude and joy. The story being told of this strange behaviour, Androclus was forthwith set free.

¶ A somewhat similar anecdote is told of sir George Davis, English consul at Florence at the beginning of the nineteenth century. One day he went to see the lions of the great-duke of Tuscany. There was one which the keepers could not tame, but no sooner did sir George appear, than the beast manifested every symptom of joy. Sir George entered the cage, when the creature leaped on his shoulder, licked his face, wagged its tail, and fawned like a dog. Sir George told the great-duke that he had brought up this lion, but as it grew older it became dangerous, and he sold it to a Barbary captain. The duke said he bought it of the same man, and the mystery was cleared up.

Andromache [Androm'aky], the widow of Hector. At the downfall of Troy both she and her son Asty'anax were allotted to Pyrrhus king of Epirus, and Pyrrhus fell in love with her, but she repelled his advances. At length a Grecian embassy, led by Orestês, son of Agamemnon, arrived, and demanded that Astyanax should be given up and put to death, lest in manhood he should attempt to avenge his father's death. Pyrrhus told Andromachê that he would protect her son in defiance of all Greece if she would become his wife, and she reluctantly consented thereto. While the marriage ceremonies were going on, the ambassadors rushed on Pyrrhus and slew him, but as he fell he placed the crown on the head of Andromachê, who thus became the queen of Epirus, and the ambassadors hastened to their ships in flight.—Ambrose Phillips: The Distressed Mother (1712).

'.' "Andromache" was a favourite part with Charlotte Clarke, daughter of Colley Cibber (1710–1760), and with Mrs. Yates (1737–1787).

Androm'eda, a poem in English hexameters, by the Rev. C. Kingsley (1858). It is the old classical story of Andromeda and Perseus (2 syl.).

'.' George Chapman in 1614 published a poem on the Nuptials of Perseus and Andromeda.

Androni'ca, one of Logistilla's handmaids, noted for her beauty.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Androni'cus (Titus), a noble Roman general against the Goths, father of Lavin'ia. In the play so called, published amongst those of Shakespeare, the word all through is called Andron'icus (1593).

Marcus Andronicus, brother of Titus, and tribune of the people.

Androph'ilus, Philanthropy personified in The Purple Island, by Phineas Fletcher (1633). Fully described in canto x. (Greek, andro-philos, "a lover of mankind.")

An'eal (2 syl.), daughter of Maâ'ni, who loved Djabal, and believed him to be "hakeem'" (the incarnate god and founder of the Druses) returned to life for the restoration of the people and their return to Syria from exile in the Spo'radês. When, however, she discovered his imposture, she died in the bitterness of her disappointment.—Robert Browning: The Return of the Druses (1848).

Angel. When the Rev. Mr. Patten, vicar of Whitstable, was dying, the archbishop of Canterbury sent him £10; and the wit said, "Tell his grace that now I own him to be a man of God, for I have seen his angels."

An angel was a gold coin, worth about 5*s*.

To write like an Angel, that is like Angel [Vergecios], a Greek of the fifteenth century, noted for his caligraphy. Macklin (1690–1797) said of Goldsmith—

[He] wrote like an angel, and talked like poor poll.

L'ange de Dieu, Isabeau la belle, the "inspired prophet-child" of the Camisards.

Angels (Orders of). According to Dionysius the Areop'agite, the angels are divided into nine orders: Seraphim and Cherubim, in the first circle; Thrones and Dominions, in the second circle; Virtues, Powers, Principalities, Archangels, and Angels, in the third circle.

Novem angelorum ordines dicimus, quia videlicet esse, testante sacro eloquio, scimus Angelos, Archangelos, Virtutes, Potestates, Principatus, Dominationes, Thronos, Cherubim, atque Seraphim.—St. Gregory (the Great): Homily 34.

Angels' Visits. Norris of Bemerton (1657–1711) wrote—those joys which

Soonest take their flight
Are the most exquisite and strong,
Like angels' visits, short and bright.

Robert Blair, in 1743, wrote in his poem called The Grave, "in visits,"

Like those of angels, short and far between.

Campbell, in 1799, appropriated the simile, but without improving it. He wrote—

Like angels' visits, few and far between.

Of these the only sensible line is that by Blair. "Short and brief" is the same thing. "Few and far between" is not equal to "short and far between," though more frequently quoted.

ANGEL'ICA, in Bojardo's Orlando Innamorato (1495), is daughter of Gal'aphron king of Cathay. She goes to Paris, and Orlando falls in love with her, forgetful of wife, sovereign, country, and glory. Angelica, on the other hand, disregards Orlando, but passionately loves Rinaldo, who positively dislikes her. Angelica and Rinaldo drink of certain fountains, when the opposite effects are produced in their hearts, for then Rinaldo loves Angelica, while Angelica loses all love for Rinaldo.

Angelica, in Ariosto's Orlando Furioso (1516), is the same lady. She was sent to sow discord among the Christians. Charlemagne sent her to the duke of Bavaria, but she fled from the castle, and, being seized, was bound naked to a rock, exposed to sea-monsters. Rogëro delivered her, but again she escaped by the aid of a magic ring. Ultimately she married Medōro, a young Moor, and returned to Cathay, where Medōro succeeded to the crown. As for Orlando, he is driven mad by jealousy and pride.

> The fairest of her sex, Angelica,
> . . . sought by many prowest knights,
> Both paynim and the peers of Charlemagne.
> Milton: Paradise Regained, iii. (1671).

Angelica (The princess), called "The Lady of the Golden Tower." The loves of Parisme'nos and Angelica form an important feature of the second part of Parismus Prince of Bohemia, by Emanuel Foorde (1598).

Angel'ica, an heiress, with whom Valentine Legend is in love. For a time he is unwilling to declare himself because of his debts; but Angelica gets possession of a bond for £4000, and tears it. The money difficulty being adjusted, the marriage is arranged amicably.—Congreve: Love for Love (1695).

[Mrs. Anne Bracegirdle] equally delighted in melting tenderness and playful coquetry, in "Statira" or "Millamant;" and even at an advanced age, when she played "Angelica."—C. Dibdin.

Angelica, the troth-plight wife of Valere, "the gamester." She gives him a picture, and enjoins him not to part with it on pain of forfeiting her hand. However, he loses it in play, and Angelica in disguise is the winner of it. After much tribulation, Valere is cured of his vice, and the two are happily united by marriage.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Gamester (1705).

Angelic Doctor (The), Thomas Aquinas, called the "Angel of the Schools" (1224–1274).

It is said that Thomas Aquinas was called the Angel of the Schools from his controversy "Utrum Angelus posset moveri in extremo ad extremum non transeundo per medium." Aquinas took the negative.

Angeli'na, daughter of lord Lewis, in the comedy called The Elder Brother by John Fletcher (1637).

Angelina, daughter of don Charino. Her father wanted her to marry Clodio, a coxcomb, but she preferred his elder brother Carlos, a bookworm, with whom she eloped. They were taken captives and carried to Lisbon. Here in due time they met the fathers, who, going in search of them, came to the same spot; and as Clodio had engaged himself to Elvira of Lisbon, the testy old gentlemen agreed to the marriage of Angelina with Carlos.—Cibber: Love makes a Man (1700).

Angelique (3 syl.), daughter of Argan the malade imaginaire. (For the tale, see ARGAN.)

Angelique, the aristocratic wife of George Dandin, a French commoner. She has a liaison with a M. Clitandre, but always contrives to turn the tables on her husband. George Dandin first hears of a rendezvous from one Lubin, a foolish servant of Clitandre, and lays the affair before M. and Mde. Sotenville, his wife's parents. The baron with George Dandin call on the lover, who denies the accusation, and George Dandin has to beg pardon. Subsequently he catches his wife and Clitandre together, and sends at once for M. and Mde. Sotenville; but Angelique, aware of their presence, pretends to denounce her lover, and even takes up a stick to beat him for the "insult offered to a virtuous wife;" so again the parents declare their daughter to be the very paragon of women. Lastly, George Dandin detects his wife and Clitandre together at night-time, and succeeds in shutting his wife out of her room; but Angelique now pretends to kill herself, and when George goes for a light to look for the body, she rushes into her room and shuts him out. At this crisis the parents arrive, when Angelique accuses her husband of being out all night in a debauch; and he is made to beg her pardon on his knees.—Molière: George Dandin (1668).

An'gelo, in Shakespeare's comedy of Measure for Measure, lord-deputy of Vienna in the absence of Vincentio the duke. His betrothed lady is Maria'na. Lord Angelo conceived a base passion for Isabella, sister of Claudio; but his designs were foiled by the duke, who compelled him to marry Mariana (1603).

Angelo is the name of a goldsmith in Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors.

An'gelo, a gentleman, friend to Julio in The Captain, a drama by Beaumont and Fletcher (1613).

Anger . . . the Alphabet. It was Athenodo'rus the Stoic who advised Augustus to repeat the alphabet when he felt inclined to give way to anger.

> Un certain Grec disait à l'empereur Auguste,
> Comme une instruction utile autant que juste,
> Que, lorsqu' une aventure en colère nous met,
> Nous devons, avant tout, dire notre alphabet,
> Afin que dans ce temps la bile se tempère,
> Et qu'on ne fasse rien que l'on ne doive faire.
> Molière: L'École des Femmes, ii. 4 (1662).

Angioli'na (4 syl.), daughter of Loreda'no, and the young wife of Mari'no Faliero, the doge of Venice. A patrician named Michel Steno, having behaved indecently to some of the women assembled at the great civic banquet given by the doge, was kicked out of the house by order of the doge, and in revenge wrote some scurrilous lines against the dogaressa. This insult was referred to "The Forty," and Steno was sentenced to two months' imprisonment, which the doge considered a very inadequate punishment for the offence.—Byron: Marino Faliero.

> The character of the calm, pure-spirited Angiolina is developed most admirably. The great difference between her temper and that of her fiery husband is vividly portrayed; but not less vividly touched is that strong bond of union which exists in the common nobleness of their deep natures. There is no spark of jealousy in the old man's thoughts. He does not expect the fervour of youthful passion in his young wife; but he finds what is far better—the fearless confidence of one so innocent that she can scarcely believe in the existence of guilt. . . . She thinks Steno's greatest punishment will be the "blushes of his privacy."—Lockhart.

Anglan'te's Lord, Orlando, who was lord of Anglante and knight of Brava.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

An'glesey, i.e. Angles eà-land (the island of the English). Edwin king of Northumberland, "warred with them that dwelt in the Isle of Mona, and they became his servants, and the island was no longer called Mona, but Anglesey, the isle of the English."

An'glides (3 syl.), wife of good prince Boud'wine (2 syl.), brother to sir Mark king of Cornwall ("the falsest traitor that ever was born"). When king Mark slew her husband, Anglides and her son Alisaunder made their escape to Magounce (i.e. Arundel), where she lived in peace, and brought up her son till he received the honour of knighthood.—Sir T. Malory: Hist. of Pr. Arthur, ii. 117, 118 (1470).

An'glo-ma'nia, generally applied to a French or German imitation of the manners, customs, etc., of the English. It prevailed in France some time before the first Revolution, and was often extremely ridiculous.

Anglo-pho'bia (Greek, phobos, "fear"), hatred or dread of everything English.

Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (The). Said to have been begun at the instigation of king Alfred. It begins with Cæsar's invasion, compiled in a great measure from the Venerable Bede, who died in 901. It ends with the accession of Henry II., in 1154. It was compiled by monks, who acted as historiographers.

An'guisant, king of Erin (Ireland), subdued by king Arthur, fighting in behalf of Leod'ogran king of Cam'eliard (3 syl.).—Tennyson: Coming of King Arthur.

Angule (St.), bishop of London, put to death by Maximia'nus Hercu'lius, Roman general in Britain in the reign of Diocletian.

> St. Angule put to death, one of our holiest men,
> At London, of that see the godly bishop then.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1613).

Angurva'del, Frithiof's sword, inscribed with Runic characters, which blazed in time of war, but gleamed dimly in time of peace.

Ani'der for Anyder ("without water"), the chief river of sir Thomas More's Utopia ("no place"). (Greek, ana udor.)

Animals admitted to Heaven. According to the Moslem's creed, ten animals are admitted into paradise besides man. 1. The dog Kratim, of the seven sleepers of Ephesus. 2. Balaam's ass, which reproved the self-willed prophet. 3. Solomon's ant, which reproves the sluggard. 4. Jonah's whale. 5. The ram of Ishmael, caught by the horns, and offered in sacrifice instead of Isaac. 6. Noah's dove. 7. The camel of Saleh. 8. The cuckoo of Belkis. 9. The ox of Moses. 10. The animal called Al Borak, which conveyed Mahomet to heaven.

The follow[illegible]e sometimes added or substituted: [illegible]ass on which our Saviour rode in[illegible]alem; the ass on which the queen o[illegible] rode when she visited Solomon.

Anjou (The Fair Maid of). [illegible]dy Edith Plantagenet, who marr[illegible]earl of Huntingdon (a royal princ[illegible]nd). Edith was a kinswoman of k[illegible]r de Lion, and an attendant Berengaria.

(Sir Walter Scott has introduced her in The Talisman, 1825.)

Ann (The princess), lady of Beaujeu. —Sir W. Scott. Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.). (See ANNE.)

Anna (Donna), the lady beloved by don Otta'vio, but seduced by don Giovanni.—Mozart's opera, Don Giovanni (1787).

Annabel, in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for (Anne Scott) the duchess of Monmouth, the richest heiress of Europe.

[He] made the charming Annabel his bride.
Part i. 34.

 Monmouth ill deserved his charming bride, and bestowed what little love he had on lady Margaret Wentworth. After the execution of Monmouth, his widow married again.

Annals of the Poor, containing The Dairyman's Daughter, The Negro Servant, and other simple stories, by the Rev. Legh Richmond, published in 1814, were written in the Isle of Wight.

An'naple [BAILZOU], Effie Deans's "monthly" nurse.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

An'naple, nurse of Hobbie Elliot of the Heugh-foot, a young farmer.—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Anne (Sister), the sister of Fat'ima the seventh and last wife of Blue Beard. Fatima, having disobeyed her lord by looking into the locked chamber, was allowed a short respite before execution. Sister Anne ascended the high tower of the castle, under the hope of seeing her brothers, who were expected to arrive every moment. Fatima, in her agony, kept asking "sister Anne" if she could see them, and Blue Beard kept crying out for Fatima to use greater despatch. As the patience of both was well-nigh exhausted, the brothers came, and Fatima was rescued from death.—Charles Perrault: La Barbe Bleue.

Anne, own sister of king Arthur. Her father was Uther the pendragon, and her mother Ygerna, widow of Gorlois. She was given by her brother in marriage to Lot, consul of Londonesia, and afterwards king of Norway.—Geoffrey: British History, viii. 20, 21.

 In Arthurian romance this Anne is called Margawse (History of Prince Arthur, i. 2); Tennyson calls her Bellicent (Gareth and Lynette). In Arthurian romance Lot is always called king of Orkney.

Anne. Queen Anne's Fan. Your thumb to your nose, and fingers spread.

Anne of Geierstein, a novel of the fourteenth century, by sir Walter Scott, based on the conquest of Charles the Bad, duke of Burgundy, by the Swiss, at Nancy, and his subsequent death; after which the Swiss were free. The Secret Tribunal of Westphalia was, at the time, in full power, and the provincial of the tribunal, called "The Black Monk," was the father of Anne of Geierstein (baroness of Arnheim). These were the two opposite poles which the art of the novelist had to bring together. To this end, two Englishmen, the earl of Oxford and his son sir Arthur de Vere, travelling as merchants under the name of Philipson, are discovered bearing a letter addressed to the duke of Burgundy. They are imprisoned, and brought before the Secret Tribunal. Now, it so happened that sir Arthur and Anne had met before, and fallen in love with each other; so when sir Arthur was tried by the Secret Tribunal, Anne's father (the Black Monk) acquitted him; and when the duke of Burgundy was dead, the two "Philipsons" settled in Switzerland; and here, in due time, the "Black Monk" freely consented to the marriage of his daughter with sir Arthur, the son of the earl of Oxford. This novel was published in 1829.

Annesley, in Mackenzie's novel, called The Man of the World (1773), noted for his adventures among the Indians.

Annesley (James), the name of the "Wandering Heir" in Charles Reade's novel (1875).

Annette, daughter of Mathis and Catherine, the bride of Christian, captain of the patrol.—J. E. Ware: The Polish Jew (1874).

Annette and Lubin, by Marmontel, imitated from the Daphnis and Chloe of Longos (q.v.).

An'nie Lau'rie, eldest of the three daughters of sir Robert Laurie, of Maxwelton. In 1709 she married James Fergusson, of Craigdarroch, and was the mother of Alexander Fergusson, the hero of Burns's song The Whistle. The song of Annie Laurie was written by William Douglas, of Fingland, in the stewardry of Kirkcud'bright, hero of the song Willie was a Wanton Wag; the music was by lady John Scott. (See WHISTLE.)

An'nie Win'nie, one of the old

ubyls at Alice Gray's death; the other was Ailsie Gourlay.—Sir W. Scott: The Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Annir, king of Inis-thona (an island of Scandinavia). He had two sons (Argon and Ruro) and one daughter. One day Cor'malo, a neighbouring chief, came and begged the honour of a tournament. Argon granted the request, and overthrew him, which so vexed Cormalo that during a hunt he shot both the brothers secretly with his bow. Their dog Runa ran to the palace, and howled so as to attract attention; whereupon Annir followed the hound, and found both his sons dead, and on his return he further found that Cormalo had carried off his daughter. Oscar, son of Ossian, led an army against the villain, and slew him; then liberating the young lady, he took her back to Inis-thona, and delivered her to her father.—Ossian: The War of Inis-thona.

An'nophel, daughter of Cas'silane (3 syl.) general of Candy.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Laws of Candy (1647).

Annual Register (The), a summary of the chief historic events of the past year, first published by John Dodsley, in 1758.

Annus Mirabilis (the wonderful year of 1666), a poem of 304 four-line stanzas in alternate rhyme, by Dryden. The year referred to was noted for our victories over the Dutch and for the Great Fire of London, which followed the plague of 1665.

In June the English ruined the Dutch fleet and drove it out of the seas. In the first four days of this month the Dutch lost 15 ships, and on the 20th (at the mouth of the Thames) 24 ships, 4 admirals, and 4000 other officers and seamen. Prince Rupert greatly distinguished himself.

In September the same year occurred the Great Fire of London, which in four days laid waste 400 streets, burnt down 13,200 houses, 89 churches, the Royal Exchange, the Custom House, Guildhall, and many other public buildings.

Anselm, prior of St. Dominic, the confessor of king Henry IV.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Anselme (2 syl.), father of Valère (2 syl.) and Mariane (3 syl.). In reality he is don Thomas d'Alburci, of Naples. The family were exiled from Naples for political reasons, and, being shipwrecked, were all parted. Valère was picked up by a Spanish captain, who adopted him; Mariane fell into the hands of a corsair, who kept her a captive for ten years, when she effected her escape; and Anselme wandered from place to place for ten years, when he settled in Paris, and intended to marry. At the expiration of sixteen years they all met in Paris at the house of Har'pagon, the miser. Valère was in love with Elise (2 syl.), the miser's daughter, promised by Harpagon in marriage to Anselme; and Mariane, affianced to the miser's son Cléante (2 syl.), was sought in marriage by Harpagon, the old father. As soon as Anselme discovered that Valère and Mariane were his own children, matters were amicably arranged, the young people married, and the old ones retired from the unequal contest.—Molière: L'Avare (1667).

Anselmo, a noble cavalier of Florence, the friend of Lothario. Anselmo married Camilla, and induced his friend to try to corrupt her, that he might rejoice in her incorruptible fidelity. Lothario unwillingly undertook the task, and succeeded but too well. For a time Anselmo was deceived, but at length Camilla eloped, and the end of the silly affair was that Anselmo died of grief, Lothario was slain in battle, and Camilla died in a convent.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. 5, 6; Fatal Curiosity (1605).

An'ster (Hob), a constable at Kinross village.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Anster Fair, a mock-heroic by W. Tennant (1812). The subject is the marriage of Maggie Lauder. Frere's Monks and Giants, suggested by Anster Fair, suggested in turn Byron's Beppo.

Ant (The). Ants' eggs are an antidote to love.

Ants never sleep. Emerson says this is a "recently observed fact."—Nature, iv.

Ants have mind, etc. "In formica non modo sensus, sed etiam mens, ratio, memoria."—Pliny.

Ant (Solomon's), one of the ten animals admitted into paradise, according to the Koran, ch. xxvii. (See ANIMALS, p. 45.)

Ants lay up a store for the winter. This is an error in natural history, as ants are torpid during the winter.

Antæ'os, a gigantic wrestler of Libya (or Irassa). His strength was inexhaustible so long as he touched the earth, and was renewed every time he did touch

it. Her'culês killed him by lifting him up from the earth and squeezing him to death. (See MALEGER.)

As when earth's son Antæus . . . in Irassa strove
With Jove's Alcidês, and oft foiled, still rose,
Receiving from his mother earth new strength,
Fresh from his fall, and fiercer grapple joined,
Throttled at length i' the air, expired and fell.
Milton: Paradise Regained, IV. (1671).

¶ Similarly, when Bernardo del Carpio assailed Orlando or Rowland at Roncesvallês, as he found his body was not to be pierced by any instrument of war, he took him up in his arms and squeezed him to death.

N.B.—The only vulnerable part of Orlando was the sole of his foot.

Ante'nor, a traitorous Trojan prince, related to Priam. He advised Ulyssês to carry away the palladium from Troy; and when the wooden horse was built, it was Antenor who urged the Trojans to make a breach in the wall and drag the horse into the city.—Shakespeare has introduced him in Troilus and Cressida (1602).

Anthi'a, the lady beloved by Abroc'omas in the Greek romance called De Amoribus Anthiæ et Abrocomæ, by Xenophon of Ephesus, who lived in the fourth Christian century.

This is not Xenophon, the historian, who lived B.C. 444-359.

An'thony, an English archer in the cottage of farmer Dickson, of Douglasdale.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

An'thony, the old postillion at Meg Dods's, the landlady of the inn at St. Ronan's Well.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.). (See ANTONIO.)

Antid'ius, bishop of Jaen, martyred by the Vandals in 411. One day, seeing the devil writing in his pocket-book some sin committed by the pope, he jumped upon his back and commanded his Satanic majesty to carry him to Rome. The devil tried to make the bishop pronounce the name of Jesus, which would break the spell, and then the devil would have tossed his unwelcome burden into the sea; but the bishop only cried, "Gee up, devil!" and when he reached Rome he was covered with Alpine snow. The chronicler naïvely adds, "the hat is still shown at Rome in confirmation of this miracle."—General Chronicle of King Alphonso the Wise.

Antig'one (4 syl.), daughter of Œ'dipos and Jocas'tê, a noble maiden, with a truly heroic attachment to her father and brothers. When Œdipos had blinded himself, and was obliged to quit Thebes, Antigonê accompanied him, and remained with him till his death, when she returned to Thebes. Creon, the king, had forbidden any one to bury Polyni'cês, her brother, who had been slain by his elder brother in battle; but Antigonê, in defiance of this prohibition, buried the dead body, and Creon shut her up in a vault under ground, where she killed herself. Hæman, her lover, killed himself also by her side. Sophoclês has a Greek tragedy on the subject, and it has been dramatized for the English stage.

Then suddenly—oh! . . . what a revelation of beauty! forth stepped, walking in brightness, the most faultless of Grecian marbles, Miss Helen Faucet as "Antigonê." What perfection of Athenian sculpture! the noble figure, the lovely arms, the fluent drapery! What an unveiling of the statuesque! . . . Perfect in form; perfect in attitude.—De Quincey (1845).

The Modern Antigonê, Marie Thérèse Charlotte duchesse d'Angouleme, daughter of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette (1778-1851).

Antig'onus, a Sicilian lord, commanded by king Leontês to take his infant daughter to a desert shore and leave her to perish. Antigonus was driven by a storm to the coast of Bohemia, where he left the babe; but on his way back to the ship, he was torn to pieces by a bear.—Shakespeare: The Winter's Tale (1604).

N.B.—"The coast of Bohemia." Bohemia is quite inland, and has no "coast." It is in the middle of what was once called Germany, but is now a part of the Austrian empire.

Antig'onus (King), an old man with a young man's amorous passions. He is one of the four kings who succeeded to the divided empire of Alexander the Great.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Humorous Lieutenant (printed 1647).

Antin'ous (4 syl.), a page of Hadrian the Roman emperor, noted for his beauty.

Antin'ous (4 syl.), son of Cas'silane (3 syl.) general of Candy, and brother of An'nophel, in The Laws of Candy, Beaumont and Fletcher (printed 1647).

Anti'ochus, emperor of Greece, who sought the life of Per'iclês prince of Tyre, but died without effecting his design.—Shakespeare: Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

Anti'ope (4 syl.), daughter of Idom'eneus (4 syl.), for whom Telem'achus had a tendre. Mentor approved his choice, and I assured Telemachus that the lady was designed for him by the gods. Her charms were "the glowing modesty of her countenance, her silent diffidence, and her sweet reserve; her constant attention to tapestry or to some other useful and elegant employment; her diligence in household affairs, her contempt of finery in dress, and her ignorance of her own beauty." Telemachus says, "She encourages to industry by her example, sweetens labour by the melody of her voice, and excels the best of painters in the elegance of her embroidery."—Fénelon: Télémaque, xxii. (1700).

He [Paul] fancied he had found in Virginia the wisdom of Antiope with the misfortunes and the tenderness of Eucharis.—Bernardin de St. Pierre: Paul and Virginia (1788).

Antiph'olus. The name of two brothers, twins, the sons of Æge'on a merchant of Syracuse. The two brothers were shipwrecked in infancy; and, being picked up by different cruisers, one was taken to Syracuse, and the other to Ephesus. The Ephesian entered the service of the duke; and, being fortunate enough to save the duke's life, became a great man and married well. The Syracusian Antipholus, going in search of his brother, came to Ephesus, where a series of blunders occur from the wonderful likeness of the two brothers and their two servants called Dromio. The confusion becomes so great that the Ephesian is taken up as a mad man. It so happened that both brothers appeared before the duke at the same time; and the extraordinary likeness being seen by all, the cause of the blunders was evident, and everything was satisfactorily explained.—Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors (1593).

Antiquary (The), Jonathan Oldbuck, laird of Monkbarns. He exchanged some excellent arable land for a worthless plot of barren soil, because he fancied it was the remains of a Roman camp in the time of Julius Cæsar. In confirmation of this supposition, he discovered an old stone with the letters A. D. L. L. scratched on it. This he read "Agricola Dicavit Libens Lubens." An old beadsman, named Edie Ochiltree, here interrupted him, and said twenty years ago, at Aiken Drum's wedding, one of the masons, for a joke, cut on a stone the letters, which stood for "Aiken Drum's Lang Ladle."—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap. iv.

The Antiquary: a novel by sir W. Scott (1816). The third of the Waverley Novels, the subject is the marriage between William Lovel and Miss Wardour. Mr. Lovel accidentally meets the Antiquary (laird of Monkbarns) at a coach office in Edinburgh High Street, pays him a visit, and is introduced to sir Arthur Wardour and his daughter. Sir Arthur, his daughter, and Lovel meet on the sands at Halkethead, but being overtaken by a spring-tide are hauled up the cliffs by ropes. Further intimacy is obstructed by a letter, which compels Lovel to leave Monkbarns for Fairport, where the Antiquary returns his visit, taking with him his kinsman, captain M'Intyre. Lovel and the captain quarrel; and in the duel which ensues the captain receives a wound supposed to be deadly, so that Lovel flees and hides in a cave. Here he accidentally overhears Dousterswivel and sir Arthur Wardour in the ruins, searching for treasure. Sir Arthur receives a lawyer's letter, demanding instant payment of the money thus swindled out of him, and sheriff's officers take possession of the castle. The Antiquary comes to his rescue, and the castle is cleared. An alarm of an invasion of Fairport causes the retainers to muster in its defence. Lovel arrives, is recognized as the son of the earl of Glenallan, and marries Miss Wardour (time of George III.).

Anton (Sir). Tennyson says that Merlin gave Arthur, when an infant, to sir Anton and his lady to bring up, and they brought him up as their own son. This does not correspond with the History of Prince Arthur, which states that he was committed to the care of sir Ector and his lady, whose son, sir Key, is over and over again called the prince's foster-brother. The History furthermore states that Arthur made sir Key his seneschal because he was his foster-brother.

So the child was delivered unto Merlin, and he bare him forth unto sir Ector, and made a holy man christen him, and named him "Arthur." And so sir Ector's wife nourished him with her own breast.—Part i. 3.

So sir Ector rode to the justs, and with him rode sir Key, his son, and young Arthur that was his nourished brother.—Ibid.

"Sir," said sir Ector, "I will ask no more of you but that you will make my son, sir Key, your foster-brother, seneschal of all your lands." "That shall be done," said Arthur (ch. 4).—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur (1470).

Anton, one of Henry Smith's men in The Fair Maid of Perth, by sir W. Scott (time, Henry IV.).

Anto'niad, the name of Cleopatra's ship at the battle of Actium, so named in compliment to Mark Antony.—Plutarch

ANTONIO, a sea-captain who saved Sebastian (the brother of Viola) when wrecked off the Illyrian coast.—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night (1614).

Antonio, "the merchant of Venice," in Shakespeare's drama so called (1598). Antonio borrows of Shylock, a Jew, 3000 ducats for three months, to lend to his friend Bassanio. The conditions of the loan were these: if the money was paid within the time, only the principal should be returned; but if not, the Jew should be allowed to cut from any part he chose of Antonio's body "a pound of flesh." As the ships were delayed by contrary winds, Antonio was unable to pay within the three months, and Shylock demanded the forfeiture according to the bond. Portia, in the dress of a law-doctor, conducted the case, and when the Jew was about to cut the flesh, stopped him, saying—(1) the bond gave him no drop of blood; and (2) he must take neither more nor less than an exact pound. If he shed one drop of blood, or if he cut more or less than an exact pound, his life would be forfeited. As it was quite impossible to comply with these restrictions, the Jew was nonsuited, and had to pay a heavy fine for seeking the life of a citizen. (See SHYLOCK, for similar tales.)

Antonio, the usurping duke of Milan, brother of Prospero the rightful heir, and father of Miranda.—Shakespeare: The Tempest (1623).

Antonio, father of Proteus (2 syl.) and suitor of Julia.—Shakespeare: The Two Gentlemen of Verona (1598).

Antonio, a Swiss lad in Scott's novel called Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Antonio, a stout old gentleman, kinsman of Petruccio governor of Bologna.—Fletcher: The Chances (1620).
(This comedy was altered first by Buckingham, and then by Garrick.)

Antonio (Don), father of Carlos a bookworm, and of Clodis a coxcomb. A headstrong testy old man, who wants Carlos to sign away his birthright in favour of his younger brother, whom he designed Angelina to marry. Carlos refuses to do so, and elopes with Angelina. Clodis (the younger brother) gives his troth to Elvira of Lisbon.—Cibber: Love makes a Man (1700).

Antonio (Don), in love with Louisa, daughter of don Jerome of Seville. He is a nobleman of ancient family, but without estate.—Sheridan: The Duenna (1778).

Antonomas'ia (The princess), daughter of Archipiela king of Candaya, and his wife Maguncia. She married don Clavijo, but the giant Malambru'no, by enchantment, changed the bride into a brass monkey, and her spouse into a crocodile of some unknown metal. Don Quixote mounted the wooden horse Clavileno the Winged, to disenchant the lady and her husband, and this he effected "simply by making the attempt."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iii. 4, 5 (1615).

Antony (Mark), the Roman triumvir, in love with Cleopat'ra. By this fatal passion he lost his empire, his character as a hero, and his life.—Dryden: All for Love. (See ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA.)

Antony (Saint) lived in a cavern on the summit of Cavadonga, in Spain, and was perpetually annoyed by devils.

> Old St. Antonius from the hell
> Of his bewildered phantasy saw fiends
> In actual vision, a foul throng grotesque
> Of all horrific shapes and forms obscene,
> Crowd in broad day before his open eyes.
> Southey: Roderick, &c., xvi. (1814).

Antony and Cæsar. Macbeth says that "under Banquo his own genius was rebuked [or snubbed], as it is said Mark Antony's was by Cæsar" (act iii. sc. 1), and in Antony and Cleopatra this passage is elucidated thus—

> Thy dæmon, that's thy spirit which keeps thee, is > Noble, courageous, high, unmatchable
> Where Cæsar's is not; but near him thy angel > Becomes a fear, as being o'erpowered.
> Act ii. sc. 3.

Antony and Cleopat'ra, a tragedy by Shakespeare (1608): the illicit love of Antony (the Roman triumvir) and Cleopatra (queen of Egypt). Antony, being in Egypt, falls in love with Cleopatra, and wholly neglects his duties as one of the rulers of the vast Roman empire. During the time, his wife Fulvia dies, the Roman people become turbulent, and Sextus Pompey makes himself master of the seas. Octavius Cæsar sends to Egypt to beg Antony to return to Rome without delay. The first interview between the triumvirs was very stormy, but Agrippa suggests that Antony should marry Octavia (Cæsar's sister), lately left a widow, and urges that the alliance would knit together the two triumvirs in mutual interests.

Antony assents to the proposal, and marries Octavia. About the same time Sextus Pompey was bought over by the promise of Sicily and Sardinia, and soon after this Lepidus (the third triumvir) was deposed by Cæsar. Antony, returning to Egypt, falls again into the entanglement of the queen, and Cæsar proclaims war against him. Antony, enforced by sixty Egyptian ships, prepares to defend himself, but in the midst of the fight the sixty Egyptian ships with Cleopatra flee, and Antony follows, so that the battle of Actium was a complete fiasco. Other losses follow, and Antony kills himself by falling on his own sword. Cæsar hopes to make Cleopatra a captive, and deprives her of every weapon of offence, but the self-willed queen sends a slave to procure some asps in a basket of figs. She applies two of them, and dies. Cæsar arrives in time to see her in royal robes, and orders that Antony and Cleopatra be buried in the same tomb.

For the accent—

I will o'ertake thee, Cleopat'ra, and Weep for thy pardon.
Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, act iv. sc. 14.

Proud Cleopat'ra, when she met her Roman.
Shakespeare: Cymbeline, act ii. sc. 4.

 Dryden has a tragedy entitled All for Love, on the same subject.

An'vil (The Literary). Dr. Mayo was so called, because he bore the hardest blows of Dr. Johnson without flinching.

Aodh, last of the Culdees, or primitive clergy of Io'na, an island south of Staffa. His wife was Reullu'ra. Ulvfa'gre the Dane, having landed on the island and put many to the sword, bound Aodh in chains of iron; then, dragging him to the church, demanded where the "treasures were concealed." A mysterious figure now appeared, which not only released the priest, but took the Dane by the arm to the statue of St. Columb, which fell on him and crushed him to death. After this the "saint" gathered the remnant of the islanders together, and went to Ireland.—Campbell: Reullura.

Aon'ian Mount (The), in Bœo'tia, the haunt of the Muses. Milton says his Muse is to soar above "the Aonian mount," i.e. above the flight of fable and classic themes, because his subject was "Jehovah, lord of all."—Paradise Lost, i. 15 (1665).

Ape (1 syl.), the pseudonym of M. Pellegrini, the caricaturist of Vanity Fair. Dr. Johnson says "to ape is to imitate ludicrously;" whence the adoption of the name.

Apes. To lead Apes in Hell, to die an old maid. Thus Fadladin'ida says to Tatlanthe (3 syl.)—

Pity that you who've served so long and well
Should die a virgin, and lead apes in hell;
Choose for yourself, dear girl, our empire round,
Your portion is twelve hundred thousand pound.
H. Carey: Chrononhotonthologos.

Women, dying maids, lead apes in hell.
The London Prodigal, i. 2.

Apelles (3 syl.), a character in Lyly's drama of Alexander and Campaspe (3 syl.), noted for the song beginning thus—

Cupid and my Campaspe played
At cards for kisses.

Apel'les. When his famous painting of Venus rising out of the sea (hung by Augustus in the temple of Julius Cæsar) was greatly injured by time, Nero replaced it by a copy done by Dorotheus (4 syl.). This Venus by Apelles is called "Venus Anadyom'enê," his model (according to tradition) being Campaspê (afterwards his wife).

Apel'les and the Cobbler. A cobbler found fault with the shoe-latchet of onê of Apelles' paintings, and the artist rectified the fault. The cobbler, thinking himself very wise, next ventured to criticize the legs; but Apelles said, Ne sutor supra crepidum ("Let not the cobbler go beyond his last").

Within that range of criticism where all are equally Judges, and where Crispin is entitled to dictate to Apelles.—Encyclopædia Britannica (article "Romance").

Apelles of his Age (The). Samuel Cooper is so called in his epitaph, in old St. Pancras' Church (1609–1672).

Apeman'tus, a churlish Athenian philosopher, who snarled at men systematically, but showed his cynicism to be mere affectation, when Timon attacked him with his own weapons.—Shakespeare: Timon of Athens (1 coo).

Their affected melancholy showed like the cynicism of Apemantus, contrasted with the real misanthropy of Timon.—Sir W. Scott.

Apic'ius, an epicure in the time of Tiberius. He wrote a book on the ways of provoking an appetite. Having spent £800,000 in supplying the delicacies of the table, and having only £80,000 left, he hanged himself, not thinking it possible to exist on such a wretched pittance. Apicia, however, became a stock name for certain cakes and sauces, and his name is still proverbial in all matters of gastronomy. (See RALPH.)

(There was another of the name in the reign of Trajan, who wrote a cooking-book and manual of sauces.)

No Brahmin could abominate your meal more than I do. Hirtius and Apicius would have blushed for it. Mark Antony, who roasted eight whole boars for supper, never massacred more at a meal than you have done.—Cumberland: The Fashionable Lover, I. 1 (1780).

Apoc'rypha (The) properly means the hidden books. Writings may be so called—

(1) Because the name of the author is hidden or not certainly known.
(2) Because the book or books have not been openly admitted into the canon of Scripture.
(3) Because they are not accepted as divinely inspired, and no doctrine can be proved by them.
(4) Because they have been issued by heretics to justify their errors.

The fourteen books of the Apocrypha (sometimes bound up with our Scriptures) are included in the Septuagint version, and were accepted at the Council of Trent in 1546. In the Church of England much was excluded in 1871.

APOLLO, in Homeric mythology, is the embodiment of practical wisdom and foresight, of swift and far-reaching intelligence, and hence of poetry, music, etc.

The Apollo Belvidere, that is, the Apollo preserved in the Belvidere gallery of the Vatican, discovered in 1503 amidst the ruins of An'tium, and purchased by pope Julius II. It is supposed to be the work of Cal'amis, a Greek sculptor of the fifth century B.C.

The Apollo of Actium was a gigantic statue, which served for a beacon.

The Apollo of Rhodes, usually called the colossus, was a gigantic bronze statue, 150 feet high, made by Charês, a pupil of Lysippus, and set up B.C. 300.

Animals consecrated to Apollo, the cock, the crow, the grasshopper, the hawk, the raven, the swan, and the wolf.

Apollo, the sun.

Apollo's angry, and the heavens themselves
Do strike at my injustice.
Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, act iii. sc. 2.

Apollonius of Tyre, a British romance, printed under the care of Ben Thorpe. It is a story similar to that of "Pericles, prince of Tyre," by Shakespeare.

Apollo'nius Rhodius, author of a Greek epic poem in four books, greatly admired by the Romans, and translated into Latin by Varro. There are several English translations. One by Fawkes and Mecm, in 1780. In verse by Greene, in 1750; and by Preston, in 1803. (See ARGONAUTIC EXPEDITION, p. 58.)

N.B.—Apollonius was born in Alexandria, but he migrated to Rhodes, where he was so much admired that they called him the Rhodian. He returned to Alexandria, and was made librarian. He flourished B.C. 222–181.

Apoll'yon, king of the bottomless pit; introduced by Bunyan in his Pilgrim's Progress. Apollyon encounters Christian, by whom, after a severe contest, he is foiled (1678). (Greek, apollumi, "to ruin.")

Apostle of Free Trade, Richard Cobden (1804–1865). John Bright was also so called (1811–1889).

Apostolic Fathers (The Five): Clement of Rome, Barnabas, Hermas, Igna'tius, and Polycarp. All contemporary with the apostles. These names are not to be depended on.

Ap'petiser. A Scotchman being told that the birds called kittiewiaks were admirable appetisers, ate six of them, and then complained "he was no hungrier than he was before."

Ap'pius, in Pope's Essay on Criticism, is intended for John Dennis, the critic (1709).

> Appius reddens at each word you speak,
> And stares tremendous, with a threatening eye,
> Like some fierce tyrant in old tapestry.
> Fears most to tax an honourable fool,
> Whose right it is, uncensured to be dull.
> Pope: Essay on Criticism, 585-589.

Appius and Virginia, one of Macaulay's lays. Also a "Morality" by R. B. (1574); a tragedy by Webster (1654); a tragedy by Dennis (1705).

Apple (Prince Ahmed's), a cure for every disorder.—Arabian Nights' Entertainments ("Ahmed and Pari-banou").

The Singing Apple, the perfect embellisher of wit. It would persuade by its smell alone, and would enable the possessor to write poetry or prose, to make people laugh or cry, and discoursed such excellent music as to ravish every one.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Chery and Fairstar," 1682).

Apples of Sodom (called by Witman, oranges) are the yellow fruit of the osher or ashey tree. Tacitus (History, v. 7) and Josephus both refer to these apples. Thevenot says, "The fruit is lovely [externally], but within is full of ashes."

> The fruit of the osher or ashey tree, called "Apples or Oranges of Sodom," resembles a smooth apple or orange, hangs in clusters of three or four on a branch, and is of a yellow colour when ripe. Upon being struck or pressed, it explodes with a puff, and is reduced to the rind and a few fibres, being chiefly filled with air.—Gallery of Geography, 811.
> Like to the apples on the Dead Sea shore,
> All ashes to the taste.
> Byron: Childe Harold, iii. 34.

Apprentice's Wise Choice (An). A loving couple of Cantire had one son; but being very poor, the husband came to England, and took service with a farmer. Years rolled on, and the man resolved to return home. His master asked him which he would take—his wages or three bits of advice? and he chose the latter. The three bits of advice were these: (1) Keep in the high-road; (2) never lodge in a house where there is an old man with a young wife; and (3) do nothing rashly. On his way home he met a pedlar going the same way, who told him he would show him a short cut, but the Highlander said he would keep the high-road. The pedlar, who took the short cut, fell among thieves, and was robbed of everything. They met again, and the pedlar advised him to put up for the night at a roadside house; but when he found that the old man had lately married a young wife, he passed on. In the night the old landlord was murdered, and the pedlar was accused of the crime. At length the Highlander reached Cantire, and saw his wife caressing a young man. In his rage he would have killed the young man, but, determined to "do nothing rashly," he asked who the young man was, and discovered it was his own son. To crown all, when the Highlander opened the cake given him by his late master as a present to his wife, he found in it his wages in full.—Cuthbert Bede: The White Wife, and other Stories (1864).

¶ The following is a somewhat similar tale: A poor man, not long married, started for Maremma to earn a livelihood, and, after the lapse of some years, returned home. On his way he asked a publican for alms, and the publican replied, "Which shall I give you—three scudi or three bits of advice?" The man chose the latter, and the publican said to him, "(1) Never interfere with what does not concern you; (2) never leave the high-road for a short cut; and (3) keep your wounded pride under control till the following day." On his way home he lodged at an inn where a murder was committed, but kept a wise tongue in his head, and was suffered to depart in peace. As he journeyed on he was advised by a traveller to take a short cut, but declined doing so; and the traveller, who left him, was murdered by highwaymen. On reaching home he beheld his wife caressing a young priest, but he kept his wounded pride under control till the day following, and then discovered that the young priest was his own son. When he opened a cake given him by the publican, he found in it three scudi.—Nerucci: Sessanta Novelle Populari.

¶ Every one will remember Solomon's choice. He chose wisdom, and found riches were given in to boot.

Appul'durcombe (4 syl.), the Isle of Wight. The word is a compound of apuldre-combe ("valley of apple trees"), and not y pul dur y cum ("the lake in the valley").

April Fool. One of the most favourite London jokes was to send greenhorns to the Tower, "to see the lions washed." (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 58.)

Apule'ius, an African by birth, noted for his allegorical romance, in eleven books, of The Golden Ass (q.v.). Books iv., v., vi. contain the exquisite episode of Cupid and Psyche (q.v.). Apuleius lived about A.D. 114-190.

Aquarius, Sagittarius. Mrs. Browning says that "Aquarius" is a symbol of man suffering, and "Sagittarius" of man combatting—the passive and active forms of human labour.

> Eve. Two phantasms of two men.
> Adam. One that sustains,
> And one that strives, so the ends
> Of manhood's curse of labour.
> Mrs. Browning: A Drama of Exile (1851).

A'quilant, son of Olive're and Sigismunda; a knight in Charlemagne's army. He was called "black," and his brother Gryphon "white," from the colour of their armour.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

A'quiline (3 syl.), Raymond's steed, whose sire was the wind.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, vii. (1575).

(Solinus, Columella, and Varro relate how the Lusitanian mares "with open mouth against the breezes held, receive the gale, with warmth prolific filled, and thus inspired, their swelling wombs produce the wondrous offspring." See also Virgil: Georgics iii. 266-283.)

Aquin'ian Sage (The). Juvenal is so called, because he was born at Aqui'num, in Latium. (He flourished A.D. 100.)

Arabella, an heiress left under the charge of justice Day, whose son, Abel, aspired to her hand and fortune; but Arabella conferred both on captain Manly instead.—T. Knight: The Honest Thieves.

Arabia Felix [Araby the Blest]. The name is a blunder made by British merchants, who supposed that the precious commodities of India, bought of Arabian merchants, were the produce of Arabia.

Arabian Bird (The), the phœnix. Metaphorically, a marvellous person; one quite sui generis.

> O Anthony! O thou Arabian bird!
> Shakespeare: Anthony and Cleopatra, iii. 2.

Arabian Nights' Entertainments (The). (See THOUSAND-AND-ONE NIGHTS.)

Arachne [A-rak'-ny], a spider. Metaphorically, a weaver. "Arachne's labours," spinning and weaving. Arachne was a Lydian maiden, who challenged Minerva to compete with her in needle tapestry, and Minerva metamorphosed her into a spider.

> No orifice for a point
> As subtle as Arachne's broken woof
> To enter.
> Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, v. 2 (1602).

A'raf (Al), a sort of limbo between paradise and jehennam, for those who die without sufficient merit to deserve the former, and without sufficient demerit to be confined in the latter. Here idiots, lunatics, and infants go at death, according to the Koran.

Ar'afat (Mount), a granite hill 15 miles south-east of Mecca, where Adam (conducted by Gabriel) met Eve, after a punitive separation of 200 years. Every pilgrim to this mount enjoys the privilege of a Hadji.

 A Hadji is one who has performed his Hadj, or pilgrimage to Mecca.

Aragnol, the son of Arachnê (q.v.). He entertained a secret and deadly hatred against prince Clarion, son of Muscarol, the fly-king. And, weaving a curious net, he soon caught the gay young flutterer, and gave him his death-wound by piercing him under the left wing.—Spenser: Muiopotmos, or The Butterfly's Fate (1590).

Aram (Eugene, 2 syl.), a romance by Lytton Bulwer (lord Lytton), founded on the story of a Knaresborough schoolmaster, who (under very peculiar circumstances) committed a murder. He is described as a learned man, of kindly disposition, and blameless life. The murder so haunted him that he committed suicide.

 Thomas Hood has told the story in verse, and W. G. Wills has dramatized it.

Aramin'ta, the wife of Moneytrap, and friend of Clarissa (wife of Gripe the scrivener).—Sir John Vanbrugh: The Confederacy (1695).

Aranza (The duke of). He married Juliana, elder daughter of Balthazar. She was so haughty, arrogant, and overbearing, that, after the marriage, Aranza took her to a mean hut, which he called his home, and pretended that he was only a peasant, who had to work for his living, and expected his bride to perform the household duties. Juliana chafed for a time, but firmness, manliness, and affection won the day; and when the duke saw that she really loved him for himself, he led her to his castle and revealed to her his proper station.—J. Tobin: The Honeymoon (1804).

Ar'aphil or Ar'aphill, the poetic pseudonym of William Habington. His lady-love, Miss Lucy Herbert, he calls Castara.

Aras'pes (3 syl.), king of Alexandria, who joined the Egyptian armament against the crusaders. He was "more famed for devices than for courage."—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Arba'ces (3 syl.), king of Ibēria, in the drama called A King or no King, by John Fletcher (1619).

Arbate (2 syl.), in Racine's drama of Mithridate (3 syl., 1673).

Arbate (2 syl.), governor of the prince of Ithăca, in Molière's comedy La Princesse d'Elide (1664). In his speech to Euryle (2 syl.) prince of Ithaca, persuading him to love, he is supposed to refer to Louis XV., then 26 years of age.

> Je dirai que l'amour sied bien à vos pareil . . .
> Et qu'il est malaisé que, sans être amoureux,
> Un jeune prince soit et grand et généreux!
> Act i. sc. 1.

Ar'biter El'egantiæ. C. Petronius was appointed dictator-in-chief of the imperial pleasures at the court of Nero; and nothing was considered comme il faut till it had received the sanction of this Roman "beau Brummel."

> Behold the new Petronius of the day,
> The arbiter of pleasure and of play.
> Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.

Arbre Sec, a tree said to have dried up and withered when our Lord was crucified.—A Mediæval Christian Tradition.

Arbre Sol foretold, with audible voice, the place and manner of Alexander's death. This tree figures in all the fabulous legends of Alexander.

Arbuthnot (Epistle to Dr.), by Alexander Pope. The prologue of the Satires. It contains the famous description of Addison, under the name of "Atticus," and is most prolific in lines familiar as household words.

Arc (Joan of), or Jeanne la Pucelle, the Maid of Orleans, daughter of a rustic of Domrémy, near Vaucouleurs, in France. She was servant at an inn when she conceived the idea of liberating France from the English. Having gained admission to Charles VII., she was sent by him to raise the siege of Orleans, and actually succeeded in so doing. Schiller (1801) wrote a tragedy on the subject; Balfe (1839), an opera; Casimir Delavigne an elegy; T. Taylor (1870) a tragedy; Southey, an epic poem on her life and death; and Voltaire, a burlesque.

N.B.—In regard to her death, M. Octave Delepière, in his Doute Historique, denies the tradition of her having been burnt to death at Rouen; and Vignier discovered in a family muniment chest the "contract of marriage between" Robert des Armoise, knight, and Jeanne d'Arc, surnamed "The Maid of Orleans."

Ar'cades Ambo, both fools alike; both "sweet innocents;" both alike eccentric. There is nothing in the character of Corydon and Thyrsis (Virgil's Eclogue, vii. 4) to justify this disparaging application of the phrase. All Virgil says is that they were both "in the flower of their youth, and both Arcadians, both equal in setting a theme for song or capping it epigrammatically;" but as Arcadia was the least intellectual part of Greece, an "Arcadian" came to signify dunce, and hence "Arcades ambo" received its present acceptation.

Arca'dia, a pastoral romance in prose by sir Philip Sidney, in imitation of the Dian'a of Montemayor (1590).

Arcala'us (4 syl.), an enchanter who bound Am'adis de Gaul to a pillar in his courtyard, and administered to him 200 stripes with his horse's bridle.—Amadis de Gaul (fifteenth century).

Arca'nes (3 syl.), a noble soldier, friend of Cas'silane (3 syl.) general of Candy.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Laws of Candy (printed 1647).

Archan'gel. Burroughs, the puritan preacher, called Cromwell "the archangel that did battle with the devil."

Archas, "the loyal subject" of the great-duke of Moscovia, and general of the Moscovites. His son is colonel Theodore.

Young Archas, son of the general. Disguised as a woman, he assumes the name of Alinda.—Fletcher: The Loyal Subject (1618). Beaumont died 1616.

Archbish'op of Grana'da told his secretary, Gil Blas, when he hired him, "Whenever thou shalt perceive my pen smack of old age and my genius flag, don't fail to advertise me of it, for I don t trust to my own judgment, which may be seduced by self-love." After a fit of apoplexy, Gil Blas ventured in the most delicate manner to hint to his grace that "his last discourse had not altogether the energy of his former ones." To this the archbishop replied, "You are yet too raw to make proper distinctions. Know, child, that I never composed a better homily than that which you disapprove. Go, tell my treasurer to give you 100 ducats. Adieu, Mr. Gil Blas; I wish you all manner of prosperity, with a little more taste."—Lesage: Gil Blas, vii. 3 (1715).

Ar'cher (Francis), friend of Aimwell, who joins him in fortune-hunting. These are the two "beaux." Thomas viscount Aimwell marries Dorinda, the daughter of lady Bountiful. Archer hands the deeds and property taken from the highwaymen to sir Charles Freeman, who takes his sister, Mrs. Sullen, under his charge again.—George Farquhar: The Beaux' Stratagem (1707).

Arch'ibald (John), attendant on the duke of Argyle.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Archima'go, the reverse of holiness, and therefore Satan the father of lies and all deception. Assuming the guise of the Red Cross Knight, he deceived Una; and under the guise of a hermit, he deceived the knight himself. Archimago (Greek, archê magos, "chief magician") is introduced in bks. i. and ii. of Spenser's Faërie Queene. The poet says—

> . . . he could take
> As many forms and shapes in seeming wise
> As ever Proteus to himself could make:
> Sometimes a fowl, sometimes a fish in lake,
> Now like a fox, now like a dragon fell.
> Spenser: Faërie Queene, I. ii. 10 (1590).

Archy M'Sarcasm. (See M'SARCASM.)

Archy'tas of Tarentum made a wooden pigeon that could fly; and Regiomontânus, a German, made a wooden eagle that flew from Kœnigsberg to meet the emperor; and, having saluted him, returned whence it set out (1436–1476).

Ar'cite (2 syl.) and Pal'amon, two Theban knights, captives of duke Theseus (2 syl.). (For the tale, see PALAMON . . .) —Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (1388).

Ar'den (Enoch), the hero of a poetic tale by Tennyson (1864). He is a seaman who had been wrecked on a desert island, and, after an absence of several years, returning home, he found his wife married to another. Seeing her both happy and prosperous, he resolves not to make himself known, so he leaves the place, and dies of a broken heart.—Tennyson: Enoch Arden.

Arden (Forest of), in Shakespeare's comedy of As You Like It, is a purely imaginary place.

∴ There is a forest of Arden in Staffordshire, but Shakespeare's forest cannot possibly be the same.

Ar'den of Fev'ersham, a noble character, honourable, forgiving, affectionate, and modest. His wife Alicia, in her sleep, reveals to him her guilty love for Mosby, but he pardons her on condition that she will never see the seducer again. Scarcely has she made the promise when she plots with Mosby her husband's murder. In a planned street-scuffle, Mosby pretends to take Arden's part, and thus throws him off his guard. Arden thinks he has wronged him, and invites him to his house, but Mosby conspires with two hired ruffians to fall on his host during a game of draughts, the right moment being signified by Mosby's saying, "Now I take you." Arden is murdered; but the whole gang is apprehended and brought to justice.

This drama is based on a murder which took place in 1551. Ludwig Tieck has translated the play into German, as a genuine production of Shakespeare. Some ascribe the play to George Lillo, but Charles Lamb gives 1592 as the date of its production, and says the author is unknown.

Ardenne (Water of). This water had the power of converting love to hate. The fountain was made by Merlin to cure sir Tristram of his love for Isolt, but sir Tristram never drank of it. It is mentioned by Bojardo, in his Orlando Innamorato.

∴ Nepenthe (3 syl.) had the direct opposite effect, namely, that of turning hatred to love. (See NEPENTHE.)

> . . . that same water of Ardenne,
> The which Rinaldo drank in happy hour,
> Described by that famous Tuscan pen . . .
> . . . It had the power to change the hearts of men
> From love to hate.
> Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 3 (1596).

Ardennes (The Black d'), one of Charlemagne's paladins.

Ardven, west coast of Scotland (Argyleshire and its vicinity).

> "Go!" . . . said Starno; "go to Ardven's sea-surrounded rocks. Tell the king of Selma (Fingal, the capital of whose kingdom was Selma) . . . I give him my daughter, the loveliest maid that ever heaved a breast of snow. Her arms are white as the foam of my waves; her soul is generous and mild."—Ossian, Fingal, iii.

Areopagit'ica, a prose work by Milton in favour of "liberty of the press," published in 1644. It is powerfully written, but very temperate. The title was taken from the Areopăgos, or Mars' Hill, of Athens, a famous court of justice and equity.

Areous'ki, the Indian war-god; also war, tumult.

A cry of "Areouski!" broke our sleep.
Campbell: Gertrude of Wyoming, i. 16 (1809).

Arethu'sa, daughter of king Messina, in the drama of Philaster or Love 'ies a-bleeding, by John Fletcher (printed 1633). One of the very best.

Arethu'sa, a nymph pursued by Alphēos, the river-god, and changed into a fountain in the island of Ortygia; but the river-god pursued her still, and mingled his stream with the fountain. Ever since, "like friends once parted, grown single-hearted," they leap and flow and slumber together, "like spirits that love, but live no more."

 This fable has been exquisitely turned into poetry by Percy B. Shelley (1820).

Arethu'se (4 syl.), a Syracusian fountain, especially noted because the poet Theok'ritos was born on its banks. Milton alludes to it in his Lyc'idas, v. 85.

Argali'a, brother of Angel'ica, slain by Ferrau.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Ar'gan, the malade imaginaire and father of Angelique. He is introduced taxing his apothecary's bills, under the conviction that he cannot afford to be sick at the prices charged, but then he notices that he has already reduced his bills during the current month, and is not so well. He first hits upon the plan of marrying Angelique to a young doctor, but to this the lady objects. His brother suggests that Argan himself should be his own doctor, and when the invalid replies he has not studied either diseases, drugs, or Latin, the objection is overruled by investing the "malade" in a doctor's cap and robe. The piece concludes with the ceremonial in macaronic Latin.

When Argan asks his doctor how many grains of salt he ought to eat with an egg, the doctor answers, "Six, huit, dix, etc., par les nombres pairs, comme dans les médicaments par les nombres impairs."—Molière: Le Malade Imaginaire, ii. 9 (1673).

Argan'no, leader of the Libicanians, and an ally of Agramont.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1515).

Argan'te (3 syl.), a giantess, called "the very monster and miracle of lust." She and her twin-brother Ollyphant or Oliphant were the children of Typhœ'us and Earth. Argantē used to carry off young men as her captives, and seized "the Squire of Dames" as one of her victims. The squire, who was in fact Britomart (the heroine of chastity), was delivered by sir Sat'yrane (3 syl.).—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 7 (1590).

Argante' (2 syl.), father of Octave (2 syl.) and Zerbinette (3 syl.). He promises to give his daughter Zerbinette to Leandre (2 syl.), the son of his friend Géronte (2 syl.); but during his absence abroad the young people fall in love, unknown to their respective fathers. Both fathers storm, and threaten to break off the engagement, but are delighted beyond measure when they discover that the choice of the young people has unknowingly coincided with their own.—Molière: Les Fourberies de Scapin (1671).

(Thomas Otway has adapted this play to the English stage, and called it The Cheats of Scapin. "Argante" he calls Thrifty; "Géronte" is Gripe; "Zerbinette" he calls Lucia; and "Leandre" he Anglicizes into Leander.)

Argan'tes (3 syl.), a Circassian of high rank and undoubted courage, but fierce and a great detester of the Nazarenes. Argantēs and Solyman were undoubtedly the bravest heroes of the infidel host. Argantēs was slain by Rinaldo, and Solyman by Tancred.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Bonaparte stood before the deputies like the Argantēs of Italy's heroic poet.—Sir W. Scott.

Ar'genis, a political romance in Latin, by John Barclay (1621). It has been frequently translated into English.

Ar'genk (The halls of). Here are portrayed all the various creatures that inhabited this earth before the creation of Adam.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Ar'gentile (3 syl.), daughter of king Adelbright, and ward of Edel. Curan, a Danish prince, in order to woo her, became a drudge in her house, but, being obliged to quit her service, became a shepherd. Edel, the guardian, forcing his suit on Argentile, compelled her to flight, and she became a neatherd's maid. In this capacity Curan wooed and won her. Edel was forced to restore the possessions of his ward, and Curan became king of Northumberland. As for Edel, he was put to death.—Warner: Albion's England (1586).

Ar'gentin (Le sieur d'), one of the officers of the duke of Burgundy.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Arge'o, baron of Servia and husband of Gabrina.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Arges'tes (3 syl.), the west wind.

Wingèd Argestes, faire Aurora's sonne,
Licensed that day to leave his dungeon,
Meekly attended.
W. Brown: Britannia's Pastorals, ii. 5 (1613).

Arges'tes (3 syl.), the north-east wind; Cæ'cias, the north-west; Bo'reas, the full north.

Boreas and Cæcias and Argestes loud
. . . rend the woods, and seas upturn.
Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 699, etc. (1665).

N.B.—The exact direction of the winds in Greek and Latin it is not possible to determine. The west wind is generally called "Zephyrus," and the Romans called the north-east wind "Vulturnus." Perhaps we may reckon Boreas as full north; Auster as south; Eurus as east; and Zephyrus as west.

Ar'gillan, a haughty, turbulent knight, born on the banks of the Trent. He induced the Latians to revolt, was arrested, made his escape, but was ultimately slain in battle by Solyman.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, viii., ix. (1575).

Argon and Runo, the two sons of Annir king of Inis-thona, an island of Scandinavia. Cor'malo, a neighbouring chief, came to the island, and asked for the honour of a tournament. Argon granted the request and overthrew him, which so vexed Cormalo, that during a hunt he shot both the brothers with his bow. Their dog Runo, running to the hall, howled so as to attract attention, and Annir, following the hound, found his two sons both dead. On his return he discovered that Cormalo had run off with his daughter; but Oscar, son of Ossian, slew Cormalo in fight, and restored the young lady to her father.—Ossian: The War of Inis-thona.

Argonautic Expedition (The) or Argonau'tica, about a generation before the Trojan War. A narration in Greek hexameters and in four books of the expedition of Jason and some fifty Greek heroes from Iolcus in Thessaly to Colchis, in the Argo, a ship of fifty oars, to fetch thence the Golden Fleece, which was hung on an oak and guarded by a sleepless dragon. After many strange adventures the crew reached Colchis, and the king promised to give Jason the fleece if he would yoke to a plough the two fire-breathing bulls, and sow the dragons' teeth left by Cadmus in Thebes. Jason, by the help of Medea, a sorceress, fulfilled these conditions, became master of the fleece, and, with Medea who had fallen in love with him, secretly quitted Colchis. The return voyage was as full of adventures as the outward one, but ultimately the ship arrived at Iolcus, and was dedicated to Neptune in Corinth.

Arg'uri (in Russian Armenia). Here, according to tradition, Noah first planted the vine. (Argh urri, "he planted the vine.")

Ar'gus, the turf-writer, was Irwin Willes, who died in 1871.

Argyle' (Mac Callum More, duke of), in the reign of George I.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (1818).

Mac Callum More, marquis of Argyle, in the reign of Charles I., was commander of the parliamentary forces, and is called "Gillespie Grumach;" he disguises himself, and assumes the name of Murdoch Campbell. —Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (1819).

(Duke and duchess of Argyle are introduced also in The Heart of Midlothian, by sir W. Scott, 1818.)

Ariad'ne (4 syl.), daughter of Minos king of Crete. She gave Theseus a clew of thread to guide him out of the Cretan labyrinth. Theseus married his deliverer, but when he arrived at Naxos (Dia) forsook her, and she hanged herself.

Surely it is an Ariadné. . . . There is dawning womanhood in every line; but she knows nothing of Naxos.—Ouida: Ariadne, i. 1.

Aria'na, an ancient name of Khorassan, in Persia.

Ar'ibert, king of the Lombards (653–661), left "no male pledge behind," but only a daughter named Rhodalind, whom he wished duke Gondibert to marry, but the duke fell in love with Bertha, daughter of As'tragon, the sage. The tale being unfinished, the sequel is not known. —Davenant: Gondibert (died 1668).

Arico'nium, Kenchester, in Hereford, on the Ine. Here Offa had a palace. In poetry, Ariconium means Herefordshire, noted for its wool.

I [Hermes] conduct
The English merchant, with the buxom fleece
Of fertile Ariconium, while I clothe Sarmatian kings [Poland and Russia].
Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads.

Arideus [A-reé'-de-us), a herald in the Christian army.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

A'riel, in The Tempest, an airy spirit, able to assume any shape, or even to become invisible. He was enslaved to the witch Syc'orax, mother of Cal'iban, who overtasked the little thing, and in punishment for not doing what was beyond his strength, imprisoned him for twelve years in the rift of a pine tree, where Caliban delighted to torture him with impish cruelty. Prospero, duke of Milan and father of Miranda, liberated Ariel from the pine-rift, and the grateful spirit served the duke for sixteen years, when he was set free.

> And like Ariel in the cloven pine tree,
> For its freedom groans and sighs.
> Longfellow: The Golden Milestone.

A'riel, the sylph in Pope's Rape of the Lock. The impersonation of "fine life" in the abstract, the nice adjuster of hearts and necklaces. When disobedient he is punished by being kept hovering over the fumes of chocolate, or is transfixed with pins, clogged with pomatums, or wedged in the eyes of bodkins.

A'riel, one of the rebel angels. The word means "the Lion of God." Abdiel encountered him, and overthrew him.—Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 371 (1665).

Ariman'es (4 syl.), the prince of the powers of evil, introduced by Byron in his drama called Manfred. The Persians recognized a power of good and a power of evil: the former Yezad, and the latter Ahriman (in Greek, Oroma'zes and Ariman'nes). These two spirits are ever at war with each other. Oromazes created twenty-four good spirits, and enclosed them in an egg to be out of the power of Arimanês; but Arimanês pierced the shell, and thus mixed evil with every good. However, a time will come when Arimanês shall be subdued, and the earth become a perfect paradise.

Arimas'pians, a one-eyed people of Scythia, who adorned their hair with gold. As gold-mines were guarded by Gryphons, there were perpetual contentions between the Arimaspians and the Gryphons. (See GRYPHON.)

> Arimaspi, quos diximus uno oculo in fronte media insignes: quibus assidue bellum esse circa metalla cum gryphis, ferarum volucri genere, quale vulgo traditur, erwente ex cuniculis aurum, mire cupiditate et feris custodientibus, et Arimaspis rapientibus, multi, sed maxime illustres Herodotus et Aristeas Proconnesius scribunt.—Pliny, Nat. Hist., vii. 2.

Ar'ioch ["a fierce lion"], one of the fallen angels overthrown by Abdiel.—Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 371 (1665).

Ariodan'tes (5 syl.), the beloved of Geneu'ra, a Scotch princess. Geneura being accused of incontinence, Ariodantes stood forth her champion, vindicated her innocence, and married her.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

(Ariodantes was made duke of Albania.)

Ari'on. William Falconer, author of The Shipwreck, speaks of himself under this pseudonym (canto iii.). He was sent to sea when a lad, and says he was eager to investigate the "antiquities of foreign states." He was junior officer in the Britannia, which was wrecked against the projecting verge of cape Colonna, the most southern point of Attica, and was the only officer who survived.

> Thy woes, Arion, and thy simple tale
> O'er all the hearts shall triumph and prevail.
> Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, ii. (1799).

Ari'on, a Greek musician, who, to avoid being murdered for his wealth, threw himself into the sea, and was carried to Tæ'naros on the back of a dolphin.

Ari'on, the wonderful horse which Herculês gave to Adrastos. It had the gift of human speech, and the feet on the right side were the feet of a man.

¶ The two horses of Achilles possessed the power of human speech. Balaam's ass had the same gift. (See SPEECH ascribed to dumb animals.)

Ario'sto of the North, sir Walter Scott (1771-1832).

> And, like the Ariosto of the North,
> Sang ladye-love and war, romance and knightly worth.
> Byron: Childe Harold, iv. 40.

Aristæ'us, protector of vines and olives, huntsmen and herdsmen. He instructed man also in the management of bees, taught him by his mother Cyrênê.

> In such a palace Aristæus found
> Cyrenê, when he bore the plaintive tale
> Of his lost bees to her maternal ear.
> Cowper: The Ice Palace of Anne of Russia.

Aristar'chus, any critic. Aristarchus of Samothrace was the greatest critic of antiquity. His labours were chiefly directed to the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer. He divided them into twenty-four books each, marked every doubtful line with an obelos, and every one he considered especially beautiful with an asterisk. (Fl. B.C. 156; died aged 72.)

> The whole region of belles lettres fell under my inspection . . . There, sirs, like another Aristarch, I dealt out fame and damnation at pleasure.—S. Foote: The Liar, i. 2.

"How, friend!" replied the archbishop, "has it [the homily] met with any Aristarchus [severe critic]?"—Lesage: Gil Blas, vii. 4 (1715).

Aristo (2 syl.), brother of Chrysale (2 syl.), not a savant, but a practical tradesman. He sympathizes with Henriette, his womanly niece, against his sister-in-law Philaminte (3 syl.) and her daughter Armande (2 syl.), who are femmes savantes.—Molière: Les Femmes Savantes (1672).

Aristeas, a poet who continued to appear and disappear alternately for above 400 years, and who visited all the mythical nations of the earth. When not in the human form, he took the form of a stag.—Greek Legend.

Aristi'des (The British), Andrew Marvell, an influential member of the House of Commons in the reign of Charles II. He refused every offer of promotion, and a direct bribe tendered to him by the lord treasurer. Dying in great poverty, he was buried, like Aristidês, at the public expense (1620–1678).

Aristip'pus, a Greek philosopher of Cyre'nê, who studied under Soc'ratês, and set up a philosophic school of his own, called "he'donism" (ἡδονή, "pleasure").

 C. M. Wieland has an historic novel in German, called Aristippus, in which he sets forth the philosophical dogmas of this Cyrenian (1733–1813).

An axiom of Aristippos was, Omnis Aristippum decuit color, et status, et res (Horace, Epist., i. 17. 23); and his great precept was, Mihi res, non me rebus subjungere (Horace, Epist., i. 1. 18).

I am a sort of Aristippus, and can equally accommodate myself to company and solitude, to affluence and frugality.—Lesage: Gil Blas, v. 12 (1715).

Aristobu'lus, called by Drayton Aristob'ulus (Rom. xvi. 10), and said to be the first that brought to England the "glad tidings of salvation." He was murdered by the Britons.

The first that ever told Christ crucified to us,
By Paul and Peter sent, just Aristob'ulus . . .
By the Britons murdered was.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1622).

Aristom'enes (5 syl.), a young Messenian of the royal line, the "Cid" of ancient Messe'nia. On one occasion he entered Sparta by night to suspend a shield in the temple of Pallas. On the shield were inscribed these words: "Aristomenês from the Spartan spoils dedicates this to the goddess."

¶ A similar tale is told of Fernando Perez del Pulgar, when serving under Ferdinand of Castile at the siege of Grana'da. With fifteen companions he entered Granada, then in the power of the Moors, and nailed to the door of the principal mosque with his dagger a tablet inscribed, "Ave, Maria!" then galloped back before the guards recovered from their amazement.—Washington Irving: Conquest of Granada, 91.

Aristoph'anes (5 syl.), a Greek who wrote fifty-four comedies, eleven of which have survived to the present day (B.C. 443–380). He is called "The Prince of Ancient Comedy," and Menander "The Prince of New Comedy" (B.C. 342–291).

The English or Modern Aristophanês, Samuel Foote (1722–1777).

The French Aristophanês, J. Baptiste Poquelin de Molière (1622–1673).

Aristotle. The mistress of this philosopher was Hepyllis; of Plato, Archionassa; and of Epicurus, Leontium.

Aristotle of China, Tehuhe, who died A.D. 1200, called "The Prince of Science."

Aristotle of Christianity, Thos. Aqui'nas, who tried to reduce the doctrines of faith to syllogistic formulæ (1224–1274).

Aristotle of the Nineteenth Century, George Cuvier, the naturalist (1769–1832).

Ar'istotle in Love. Godfrey Gobilyve told Sir Graunde Amoure that Aristotle the philosopher was once in love, and the lady promised to listen to his prayer if he would grant her request. The terms being readily accepted, she commanded him to go on all-fours; and then, putting a bridle into his mouth, mounted on his back, and drove him about the room till he was so angry, weary, and disgusted, that he was quite cured of his foolish attachment.—Hawes: The Pastime of Plesure, xxix. (1555).

Armado (Don Adriano de), a pompous military bully and braggart, in Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost. This man was chosen by Ferdinand, the king of Navarre, when he resolved to spend three years in study with three companions, to relate in the interim of his studies "in high-born words the worth of many a knight from tawny Spain lost in the world's debate."

His humour is lofty, his discourse peremptory, his tongue filed, his eye ambitious, his gait majestical, and his general behaviour vain, ridiculous, and thrasonical. . . . He drawerth out the thread of his verbosity finer than the staple of his argument.—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, act v. sc. 2 (1594).

Armande (2 syl.), daughter of Chrysale (2 syl.) and sister of Henriette.

Armande is a femme savante, and Henriette a "thorough woman." Both love Clitandre; but Armande loves him platonicly, while Henriette loves him with womanly affection. Clitandre prefers the younger sister, and, after surmounting the usual obstacles, marries her.—Molière: Les Femmes Savantes (1672).

Armi'da, in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered. A sorceress, who seduced Rinaldo and other crusaders from the siege of Jerusalem. Rinaldo was conducted by her to her splendid palace, where he forgot his vows, and abandoned himself to sensual joys. Carlo and Ubaldo were sent to bring him back, and he escaped from Armida; but she followed him, and, not being able to allure him back again, set fire to her palace, went to Egypt, and offered to marry any one who would kill Rinaldo. She herself discharged an arrow at him, and attempted to kill herself but was prevented by Rinaldo, to whom she became reconciled.

Her father was Arbilan of humble race, her mother was Chariclēa queen of Damascus; both died while Armida was a mere child. Her uncle was Hidrastes (3 syl.) king of Damascus.

> Withdrew itself from his, but left behind
> A little pressure . . . but ne'er magician's wand
> Wrought change with all Armida's fairy art,
> Like what this light touch left on Juan's heart.
> Byron: Don Juan, I. 71.

N.B.—When the young queen of Frederick William of Prussia rode about in military costume to incite the Prussians to arms against Napoleon, the latter wittily said, "She is Armida in her distraction setting fire to her own palace."

(Both Glück and Rossini have taken the story of Armida as the subject of an opera.)

Armida's Girdle. Armida had an enchanted girdle, which, "in price and beauty," surpassed all her other ornaments; even the cestus of Venus was less costly. It told her everything; "and when she would be loved, she wore the same."—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered 1575).

ARMSTRONG (Archie), court jester to James I., introduced in The Fortunes of Nigel, by sir Walter Scott (1822).

Armstrong (Grace), the bride-elect of Hobbie Elliot of the Heugh-foot, a young farmer.—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Arm'strong (John), called "The Laird's Jock." He is the laird of Mangerton. This old warrior witnesses a national combat in the valley of Liddesdale, between his son (the Scotch chieftain) and Foster (the English champion), in which young Armstrong is overthrown. —Sir W. Scott: The Laird's Jock (time, Elizabeth).

Armstrong (Johnny), a ballad, the tale of which is as follows: James V. of Scotland, in an expedition against the borderers, in 1529, came in contact with Johnny Armstrong, the freebooter, and his horsemen. Armstrong craved pardon and permission to enter the royal service; but the king replied—

> Thou shalt have no pardon, [but]
> To-morrow morning by ten o' the clock
> Ye all shall hang on the gallows-tree.

A fight, of course, ensued, "and every man was slain." Their graves are still pointed out in Carlenrig churchyard.

Ar'naut, an Albanian mountaineer. The word means "a brave man."

> Stained with the best of Arnaut blood.
> Byron: The Giaour, 526.

Arnheim (2 syl.). The baron Herman von Arnheim, Anne of Geierstein's grandfather.

Sibilla of Arnheim, Anne's mother.

The baroness of Arnheim, Anne of Geierstein.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Ar'no, the river of Florence, the birthplace of both Dantê and Boccaccio.

> At last the Muses rose . . . and scattered . . . as they flew,
> Their blooming wreaths from fair Valclusa's bowers [Petrarch]
> To Arno's myrtle border.
> Akenside: Pleasures of Imagination, ii.

AR'NOLD, the deformed son of Bertha, who hates him for his ugliness. Weary of life, he is about to make away with himself, when a stranger accosts him, and promises to transform him into any shape he likes best. He chooses that of Achillês, and then goes to Rome, where he joins the besieging army of Bourbon. During the siege, Arnold enters St. Peter's of Rome just in time to rescue Olimpia; but the proud beauty, to prevent being taken captive by him, flings herself from the high altar on to the pavement, and is taken up apparently lifeless. As the drama was never completed, the sequel is not known.—Byron: The Deformed Transformed.

Ar'nold, the torch-bearer at Rotherwood.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Ar'nold of Benthuysen, disguised as a beggar, and called "Ginks."—Fletcher: The Beggar's Bush (1622).

Arnold (Matthew). His creed for the regeneration of man is contained in the three words, "Light, Sweetness, and Culture." Dante speaks of "Light, Grace, and Mercy;" but neither approaches St. Paul's triplet, "Faith, Hope and Charity."

Arnoldo, son of Melchtal, patriot of the forest cantons of Switzerland. He was in love with Mathilde (3 syl.), sister of Gessler, the Austrian governor of the district. When the tyranny of Gessler drove the Swiss into rebellion, Arnoldo joined the insurgents; but after the death of Gessler he married Mathilde, whose life he had saved when it was imperilled by an avalanche.—Rossini: Guglielmo Tell (1829).

Arnol'do, a gentleman contracted to Zeno'cia, a chaste lady, dishonourably pursued by the governor, count Clodio.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Custom of the Country (printed 1647).

Ar'nolphe (2 syl.), a man of wealth, who has a crotchet about the proper training of girls to make good wives, and tries his scheme on Agnes, whom he adopts from a peasant's hut, and whom he intends in time to make his wife. She was brought up, from the age of four years, in a country convent, where difference of sex and the conventions of society were wholly ignored. But when removed from the convent, she treated men like school-girls, nodded to them familiarly, kissed them, and played with them. Being told by her guardian that married women have more freedom than maidens, she asked him to marry her; however, a young man named Horace fell in love with her, and made her his wife, so Arnolphe, after all, profited nothing by his pains.—Molière: L'École des Femmes (1662).

> Dans un petit couvent loin de toute pratique
> Je le fis élever selon ma politique
> C'est-à-dire, ordonnant quels soins on emploeroit
> Pour le rendre idiote autant qu'il se pourroit.
> Act I. 2.

Arnolpho, a German duke slain by Rodomont.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso.

Ar'not (Andrew), one of the yeomen of the Balafré [Ludovic Lesly].—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Arod, in the second part of Absalom and Achitophel, by Tate and Dryden, is meant for sir William Waller, who detected the "Meal-tub Plot."

> In the sacred annals of our plot,
> Industrious Arod never be forgot.
> The labours of this midnight magistrate
> May vie with Corah's [Titus Oates] to preserve the state.
> Part ii. 533, etc. (1682).

Aron'teus (4 syl.), an Asiatic king, who joined the Egyptian armament against the crusaders.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Aroun'dight, the sword of sir Lancelot of the Lake.

Arpa'sia, the betrothed of Mone'sês, a Greek, but made by constraint the bride of Baj'azet sultan of Turkey. Bajazet commanded Monêsês to be bow-strung in the presence of Arpasia, to frighten her into subjection, but she died at the sight.—Rowe: Tamerlane (1702).

Ar'rant Knave (An), a corruption of the Anglo-Saxon nearo-cnâpa ("great knave"). Similarly, nearo-brégd ("great fear"); nearo-gráp ("great grip"); nearo-wrence ("great deceit"), etc.

Ar'rot (Dame), the weasel in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498).

Arrow in the Fable (The). "The arrow, like that in the fable, has to be aimed at a mark which the archer's eye is allowed to see only as reflected on some other substance." The allusion is to the Parthians, who shot behind them when in flight. It is said that each Parthian horseman carried on his back a "reflecting plate of metal," in which the man behind saw reflected those in pursuit. He shot, therefore, over his left shoulder, guided by the reflection of the foe in the back of the man before him.

Arrow Festival (The), instituted by Zoroaster to commemorate the flight of the arrow shot from the top of the Peak of Demavend, in Persia, with such miraculous prowess as to reach the banks of the Oxus, causing the whole intervening country to be ceded to Persia.

Arrow shot a Mile. Robin Hood and Little John "frequently shot an arrow a measured mile" (1760 yards).

> Tradition informs us that in one of Robin Hood's peregrinations, attended by Little John, he went to dine at Whitby Abbey with the abbot Richard . . . they went to the top of the abbey, and each of them shot an arrow, which fell not far from Whitby-lathe, and a pillar was set up by the abbot where each arrow was found . . . both fell more than a measured mile from the abbey.—Charlton: History of Whitby, York, 146.

Ar'saces (3 syl.), the patronymic name of the Persian kings, from Arsaces, their great monarch. It was generally added to some distinctive name or appellation, as the Roman emperors added the name of Cæsar to their own.

Cujus memoriæ hunc honorem Parthi tribuerunt ut omnes exinde reges suos Arsăcis nomine nuncupent.—Justin: Historiarum Philippicæ, xli.

Arse'tes (3 syl.), the aged eunuch who brought up Clorinda, and attended on her.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Ar'taban, the French type of nobiliary pride.

Ar'tamenes (3 syl.) or Le Grand Cyrus, "a long-winded romance," by Mdlle. Scudéri (1607–1701).

Artaxam'inous (5 syl.), king of Utopia, married to Griskinissa, whom he wishes to divorce for Distaffi'na. But Distaffina is betrothed to general Bombastês, and when the general finds that his "fond one" prefers "half a crown" to himself, he hates all the world, and challenges the whole race of man by hanging his boots on a tree, and daring any one to displace them. The king, coming to the spot, reads the challenge, and cuts the boots down, whereupon Bombastês falls on his majesty, and "kills him," in a theatrical sense, for the dead monarch, at the close of the burletta, joins in the dance, and promises, if the audience likes, "to die again to-morrow." —Rhodes: Bombastes Furioso.

Ar'tchila Mur'tchila, the magic words which "Fourteen" was required to pronounce when he wished to get any specific object "into his sack."—A Basque Legend. (See FOURTEEN.)

Ar'tegal, a mythic king of Britain in the Chronicle of Geoffrey of Monmouth. Milton introduces him in his mythical History of Britain in six books (1670).

Ar'tegal or Arthegal (Sir), son of Gorlois prince of Cornwall, stolen in infancy by the fairies, and brought up in Fairyland. Brit'omart saw him in Venus's looking-glass, and fell in love with him. She married him, and became the mother of Aurelius Conan, from whom (through Cadwallader) the Tudor dynasty derives descent. The wanderings of Britomart, as a lady knight-errant and the impersonation of chastity, is the subject of book iii. of the Faërie Queene; and the achievements of sir Artegal, as the impersonation of justice, is the subject of bk. v.

"Sir Artegal's first exploit was to decide to which claimant a living woman belonged. This he decided according to Solomon's famous judgment respecting "the living and dead child" (canto 1). His next was to destroy the corrupt practice of bribery and toll (canto 2). His third was the exposing of Braggadoccio and his follower Trompart (canto 3). He had then to decide to which brother a chest of money found at sea belonged—whether to Bracidas or Am'idas; he gave judgment in favour of the former (canto 4). He then fell into the hands of Rad'igund queen of the Amazons, and was released by Britomart (cantos 5 and 6), who killed Radigund (canto 7). His last and greatest achievement was the deliverance of Ire'na (Ireland) from Grantorto (rebellion), whom he slew (canto 12).

(This rebellion was that called the earl of Desmond's, in 1580. Before bk. iv. 6, Artegal is spelt Arthegal, but never afterwards.)

N.B.—"Sir Artegal" is meant for lord Gray of Wilton, Spenser's friend. He was sent in 1580 into Ireland as lord-lieutenant, and the poet was his secretary. The marriage of Artegal with Britomart means that the justice of lord Gray was united to purity of mind or perfect integrity of conduct.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. (1596).

Artemis'ia, daughter of Lygdămis and queen of Carla. With five ships she accompanied Xerxes in his invasion of Greece, and greatly distinguished herself in the battle of Salămis by her prudence and courage. (This is not the Artemisia who built the Mausoleum.)

Our statues . . . she
The foundress of the Babylonian wall [Semirămis],
The Carian Artemisia, strong in war.
Tennyson: The Princess, ii.

Artemis'ia, daughter of Hecatomnus and sister-wife of Mausō'lus. Artemisia was queen of Caria, and at the death of her fraternal husband raised a monument to his memory (called a mausolē'um), which was one of the "Seven Wonders of the World." It was built by four different architects: Scopas, Timotheus, Leocharês, and Bruxis.

This made the four rare masters which began
Fair Artemysia's husband's dainty tomb
(When death took her before the work was done,
And so bereft them of all hopes to come),
That they would yet their own work perfect make E'en for their workes, and their self-glories sake.
Lord Brooke: An Inquiry upon Fame, etc. (1554–1628).

Artful Dodger, the sobriquet of John Dawkins, a young thief, up to every sort of dodge, and a most marvellous adept in villainy.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Arthgallo, a mythical British king, brother of Gorbonian, his predecessor on the throne, and son of Mor'vidus, the tyrant who was swallowed by a sea-monster. Arthgallo was deposed, and his brother El'idure was advanced to the throne instead.—Geoffrey: British History, iii. 17 (1142).

ARTHUR (King), parentage of. His father was Uther the pendragon, and his mother Ygernê (3 syl.), widow of Gorloïs duke of Cornwall. Ygernê had been a widow only three hours, knew not that the duke was dead (pt. i. 2), and her marriage with the pendragon was not consummated till thirteen days afterwards. When the boy was born Merlin took him, and he was brought up as the foster-son of sir Ector (Tennyson says "sir Anton"), till Merlin thought proper to announce him as the lawful successor of Uther, and had him crowned. Uther lived two years after his marriage with Ygernê.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 2, 6 (1470).

Wherefore Merlin took the child
And gave him to sir Anton, an old knight
And ancient friend of Uther; and his wife
Nursed the young prince, and reared him with her own.
Tennyson: Coming of Arthur.

Coming of Arthur. Leod'ogran, king of Cam'eliard (3 syl.), appealed to Arthur to assist him in clearing his kingdom of robbers and wild beasts. This being done, Arthur sent three of his knights to Leodogran, to beg the hand of his daughter Guenever in marriage. To this Leodogran, after some little hesitation, agreed, and sir Lancelot was sent to escort the lady to Arthur's court.

Arthur not dead. According to tradition Arthur is not dead, but rests in Glastonbury, "till he shall come again, full twice as fair, to rule over his people." (See BARBAROSSA.)

According to tradition, Arthur never died, but was converted into a raven by enchantment, and will, in the fulness of time, appear again in his original shape, to recover his throne and sceptre. For this reason there is never a raven killed in England.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. ii. 5 (1605).

Arthur's Twelve Battles (or victories over the Saxons). 1. The battle of the river Glem (i.e. the glen of Northumberland). 2 to 5. The four battles of the Duglas (which falls into the estuary of the Ribble). 6. The battle of Bassa, said to be Bashall Brook, which joins the Ribble near Clithere. 7. The battle of Celidon, said to be Tweeddale. 8. The battle of Castle Gwenion (i.e. Caer Wen, in Wedale, Stow). 9. The battle of Caerleon, i.e. Carlisle; which Tennyson makes to be Caerleon-upon-Usk. 10. The battle of Trath Treroit, in Anglesey, some say the Solway Frith. 11. The battle of Agned Cathregonion (i.e. Edinburgh). 12. The battle of Badon Hill (i.e. the Hill of Bath, now Bannerdown).

Then bravely chanted they
The several twelve pitched fields he [Arthur] with the Saxons fought.
Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

Arthur, one of the Nine Worthies. Three were Gentiles: Hector, Alexander, and Julius Cæsar; three were Jews: Joshua, David, and Judas Maccabæus; three were Christians: Arthur, Charlemagne, and Godfrey of Bouillon.

Arthur's Body found. In 1189 the body of king Arthur was found in Glastonbury Abbey, 16 feet under the surface. It was found under a stone, bearing the inscription, Hic jacit sepultus inclitus rex Arthurus in Insula Avallonia. The body had crumbled into dust, but a lock of golden-red hair was found, supposed to be that of his wife.—Sharon Turner: History of the Anglo-Saxons, p. 107.

Arthur's Butler, sir Lucas or Lucan, son of duke Corneus; but sir Griflet, son of Cardol, assisted sir Key and sir Lucas "in the rule of the service."—History of Prince Arthur, i. 8 (1470).

Arthur's Dagger, Carnwenhan.

Arthur's Dog, Caval.

Arthur's Drinking-Horn. No one who was unchaste or unfaithful could drink from this horn. Lai du Corn and Morte d'Arthur. (See CHASTITY.)

Arthur's Foster-Father and Mother, sir Ector and his lady. Their son, sir Key (his foster-brother), was his seneschal or steward.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 3, 8 (1470).

N. B.—Tennyson makes sir Anton the foster-father of Arthur.

Arthur's Lance, Rhomgomyant.

Arthur's Mare, Llamrei, which means "bounding, curvetting, spumador."

Arthur's Round Table. It contained seats for 150 knights. Three were reserved, two for honour, and one (called the "siege perilous") for sir Galahad, destined to achieve the quest of the sangreal. If any one else attempted to sit in it, his death was the certain penalty

 There is a table so called at Winchester, and Henry VIII. showed it to François I. as the very table made by Merlin for Uther the pendragon.

And for great Arthur's seat, her Winchester prefers,
Whose old round table yet she vaunteth to be hers.
Drayton: Polyolbion, ii. (1612).

Arthur's Shield, Pridwin. Geoffrey calls it Priwen, and says it was adorned with the picture of the Virgin Mary.—British History, ix. 4 (1142).

∴ In the Mabinogion it is called Wenebgwrthucher.

Arthur's Sisters [half-sisters], Morgause or Margawse (wife of king Lot); Elain (wife of king Nentres of Carlot); and Morgan le Fay, the "great clark of Nigromancy," who wedded king Vrience, of the land of Corê, father of Ewayns le Blanchemayne. Only the last had the same mother (Ygraine or Ygernê) as the king.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 2.

Arthur's Sons—Urien, Llew, and Arawn. Borre was his son by Lyonors, daughter of the earl Sanam.—History of Prince Arthur, i. 15. Mordred was his son by Elain, wife of king Nentres of Carlot. In some of the romances collated by sir T. Malory he is called the son of Margause and Arthur; Margause being called the wife of king Lot, and sister of Arthur. This incest is said to have been the cause of Mordred's hatred of Arthur. —Pt. i. 17, 36, etc.

(In the Welsh "Triads," Llew is called Llacheu. He is said to have been "most valiant and learned.")

Arthur's Spear, Rone. Geoffrey calls it Ron. It was made of ebony.—British History, ix. 4 (1142). (See LANCE.)

His spere he nom an honde tha Ron wes ihaten.
Layamon: Brut. (twelfth century).

Arthur's Sword, Escal'ibur or Excal'iber. Geoffrey calls it Caliburn, and says it was made in the isle of Avallon.—British History, ix. 4 (1142).

The temper of his sword, the tried Escalabour,
The bigness and the length of Rone, his noble spear,
With Pridwin, his great shield.
Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

Arthur (King), in the burlesque opera of Tom Thumb, has Dollallolla for his queen, and Huncamunca for his daughter. This dramatic piece, by Henry Fielding, the novelist, was produced in 1730, but was altered by Kane O'Hara, author of Midas, about half a century later.

Arthur's Harp, a Lyræ, which forms a triangle with the Pole-star and Arcturus.

Dost thou know the star
We call the "Harp of Arthur" up in heaven?
Tennyson: The Last Tournament.

Arthur's Seat, the hill which overhangs Edinburgh.

Nor hunt the bloodhounds back to Arthur's seat!
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.

Arthurian Romances.

King Arthur and the Round Table, a romance in verse (1096).

The Holy Graal (in verse, 1100).

Titurel or The Guardian of the Holy Graal, by Wolfram von Eschenbach. Titurel founded the temple of Graalburg as a shrine for the holy graal.

The Romance of Parzival, prince of the race of the kings of Graalburg. By Wolfram of Eschenbach (in verse). This romance was translated into French by Chrétien de Troyes in 1170. It contains 4018 eight-syllable lines.

Launcelot of the Lake, by Ulrich of Zazikoven, contemporary with William Rufus.

Wigalois or The Knight of the Wheel, by Wirnd of Graffenberg. This adventurer leaves his mother in Syria, and goes in search of his father, a knight of the Round Table.

Iwain or The Knight of the Lion, and Ereck, by Hartmann von der Aue (thirteenth century).

Tristan and Yseult (in verse, by Master Gottfried of Strasburg (thirteenth century). This is also the subject of Luc du Gast's prose romance, which was revised by Elie de Borron, and turned into verse by Thomas the Rhymer, of Ercildoune, under the title of the Romance of Tristram.

Merlyn Ambroise, by Robert de Borron.

Roman des diverses Quêtes de St. Graal, by Walter Mapes (prose).

A Life of Joseph of Arimathea, by Robert de Borron.

La Mort d'Artur [d'Arthur], by Walter Mapes.

The Idylls of the King, by Tennyson, in blank verse, containing "The Coming of Arthur," "Gareth and Lynette," "Geraint and Enid," "Merlin and Vivien," "Lancelot and Elaine," "The Holy Graal," "Peleas and Estarre" (2 syl.), "The Last Tournament," "Guinevere" (3 syl.), and "The Passing of Arthur," which is the "Morte d'Arthur" with an introduction added to it.

(The old Arthurian Romances have been collated and rendered into English by sir Thomas Malory, in three parts. Part i. contains the early history of Arthur and the beautiful allegory of Gareth and Linet; part ii. contains the adventures of sir Tristram; and part iii. the adventures of sir Launcelot, with the death of Arthur and his knights. Sir Frederick Madden and J. T. K. have also contributed to the same series of legends.)

 Sources of the Arthurian Romances. The prose series of romances called Arthurian owe their origin to: 1. The legendary chronicles composed in Wales or Brittany, such as De Excidio Britanniæ of Gildas. 2. The chronicles of Nennius (ninth century). 3. The Armoric collections of Walter [Cale'nius] or Gauliter, archdeacon of Oxford. 4. The Chrontcon sive Historia Britonum of Geoffrey of Monmouth. 5. Floating traditions and metrical ballads and romances. (See CHARLEMAGNE and MABINOGION.)

The story of king Arthur, of course, has been represented in sundry forms. There is an opera by Dryden, music by Purcell (1691); a play by Hathaway (1598); an heroic poem entitled Prince Arthur (1695), by sir Richard Blackmore, followed in 1697 by King Arthur; a poem in twelve books by Edward, lord Lytton; Idylls of the King, by Tennyson; Death of King Arthur, a ballad.

Ar'thuret (Miss Seraphina the papist, and Miss Angelica), two sisters in sir W. Scott's novel called Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Arts (The fine) and Genius. Sir Walter Scott was wholly ignorant of pictures, and quite indifferent to music. Rogers felt no pleasure in paintings, and music gave him positive discomfort. Sir Robert Peel detested music. Byron and Tasso cared nothing for architecture, and Byron had no ear for music. Mde. de Staël could not appreciate scenery. Pope and Dr. Johnson, like Scott and Byron, had no ear for music, and could scarcely discern one tune from another; Pope preferred a street-organ to Handel's Messiah.

Ar'turo (lord Arthur Talbot), a cavalier affianced to Elvi'ra "the puritan," daughter of lord Walton. On the day appointed for the wedding, Arturo has to aid Enrichetta (Henrietta, widow of Charles I.) in her escape, and Elvira, supposing he is eloping with a rival, temporarily loses her reason. On his return, Arturo explains the circumstances, and they vow never more to part. At this juncture Arturo is arrested for treason, and led away to execution; but a herald announces the defeat of the Stuarts, and free pardon of all political offenders; whereupon Arturo is released, and marries "the fair puritan."—Bellini's opera, I Puritani (1834).

Ar'turo [BUCKLAW]. So Frank Hayston is called in Donizetti's opera of Lucia di Lammermoor (1835). (See HAYSTON.)

Ar'undel, the steed of sir Bevis of Southampton, given him by his wife Josian, daughter of the king of Armenia. Probably the word is meant for Hirondelle, a swallow.—Drayton: Polyolbion, ii. (1612).

Arundel Castle, called Magounce (2 syl.).

She [Anglides] came to a castle that was called Magounce, and now is called Arundell, in Southsea.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 118 (1470).

Ar'valan, the wicked son of Keha'ma, slain by Ladur'lad for attempting to dishonour his daughter Kail'yal (2 syl.). After this, his spirit became the relentless persecutor of the holy maiden, but holiness and chastity triumphed over sin and lust. Thus when Kailyal was taken to the bower of bliss in paradise, Arvalan borrowed the dragon-car of the witch Lor'rimite (3 syl.) to carry her off; but when the dragons came in sight of the holy place they were unable to mount, and went perpetually downwards, till Arvalan was dropped into an ice-rift of perpetual snow. When he presented himself before her in the temple of Jagannaut, she set fire to the pagoda. And when he caught the maiden waiting for her father, who was gone to release the glendoveer from the submerged city of Baly, Baly himself came to her rescue.

"Help, help, Kehama! help!" he cried.
But Baly tarried not to abide
That mightier power. With irresistible feet
He stampt and cleft the earth. It opened wide,
And gave him way to his own judgment-seat.
Down like a plummet to the world below
He sank . . . to punishment deserved and endless woe.
Southey: Curse of Kehama, xvii. 19 (1809).

Arvi'da (Prince), a noble friend of Gustavus Vasa. Both Arvida and Gustavus are in love with Christi'na, daughter of Christian II. king of Scandinavia. Christian employs the prince to entrap Gustavus; but when he approaches him the better instincts of old friendship and the nobleness of Gustavus prevail,—so that Arvida not only refuses to betray his friend, but even abandons to him all further rivalry in the love of Christina.—H. Brooke: Gustavus Vasa (1730).

Arvir'agus, the husband of Do'rigen. Aurĕlius tried to win her love, but Dorigen made answer that she would never listen to his suit till the rocks that beset the coast were removed, "and there n'is no stone y-seen." By the aid of magic, Aurelius caused all the rocks of the coast to disappear, and Dorigen's husband insisted that she should keep her word. When Aurelius saw how sad she was, and was told that she had come in obedience to her husband's wishes, he said he would rather die than injure so true a wife and noble a gentleman.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Franklin's Tale," 1388).

(This is substantially the same as Boccaccio's tale of Dianora and Gilberto, day x. 5. See DIANORA.)

Arvir'agus, younger son of Cym'beline (3 syl.) king of Britain, and brother of Guide'rius. The two in early childhood were kidnapped by Bela'rius, out of revenge for being unjustly banished, and were brought up by him in a cave. When they were grown to manhood, Belarius, having rescued the king from the Romans, was restored to favour. He then introduced the two young men to Cymbeline, and told their story, upon which the king was rejoiced to find that his two sons whom he thought dead were both living.—Shakespeare: Cymbeline (1605).

Aryan Languages (The)—

1. Sanskrit, whence Hindustanee.
2. Zend, ,, Persian.
3. Greek, ,, Romaic.
4. Latin, ,, Italian, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Wallachian (Romance).
5. Keltic, ,, Welsh, Irish, Gaelic.
6. Gothic, ,, Teutonic, English, Scandinavian.
7. Slavonic, ,, European Russian, and Austrian.

As You Like It, a comedy by Shakespeare, published in 1600. One of the French dukes, being driven from his dukedom by his brother, went with certain followers to the forest of Arden (a purely hypothetical place), where they lived a free-and-easy life, chiefly occupied in the chase. The deposed duke had one daughter, named Rosalind, whom the usurper kept at court as the companion of his own daughter Celia, and the two cousins were very fond of each other. At a wrestling match Rosalind fell in love with Orlando, who threw his antagonist, a giant and professional athlete. The usurping duke (Frederick) banished Rosalind from the court, but her cousin Celia resolved to go to Arden with her; so Rosalind in boy's clothes (under the name of Ganimed), and Celia as a rustic maiden (under the name of Alie'na), started to find the deposed duke. Orlando being driven from home by his elder brother, also went to the forest of Arden, and was taken under the duke's protection. Here he met the ladies, and a double marriage was the result—Orlando married Rosalind, and his elder brother Oliver married Celia. The usurper retired to a religious house, and the deposed duke was restored to his dominions.—(1598.)

Asaph. So Tate calls Dryden, in Absalom and Achitophel.

While Judah's throne and Zion's rock stand fast,
The song of Asaph and his fame shall last.
Part ii. 1064 (1682).

Asaph (St.), a British [i.e. Welsh] monk of the sixth century, abbot of Llan-Elvy, which changed its name to St. Asaph, in honour of him.

So bishops can she bring, of which her saints shall be:
As Asaph, who first gave that name unto that see.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1622).

Ascal'aphos, son of Achĕron, turned into an owl for tale-telling and trying to make mischief.—Greek Fable.

Asca'nio, son of don Henrique (2 syl.), in the comedy called The Spanish Curate, by John Fletcher (1622).

As'capart or As'cupart, an enormous giant, thirty feet high, who carried off sir Bevis, his wife Jos'ian, his sword Morglay, and his steed Ar'undel, under his arm. Sir Bevis afterwards made Ascapart his slave, to run beside his horse. The effigy of sir Bevis is on the city gates of Southampton.—Drayton: Polyolbion, ii. (1612).

He was a man whose huge stature thews, sinews, and bulk . . . would have enabled him to enact "Colbrand," "Ascapart," or any other giant of romance, without raising himself nearer to heaven even by the altitude of a chopin.—Sir W. Scott.

Those Ascaparts, men big enough to throw
Charing Cross for a bar.
Dr. Donne (1573-1631).

Thus imitated by Pope (1688-1744)—

Each man an Ascapart of strength to toss
For quoits both Temple Bar and Charing Cross.

Ascræ'an Sage, or Ascræan Poet, Hesiod, who was born at Ascra, in Bœo'tia. Virgil calls him "The Old Ascræan."

Hos tibi dant calamos, en accipe, Musæ
Ascræo quos ante seni.
Bucolic, vii. 20.

As'ebie (3 syl.), Irreligion personified in The Purple Island (1633), by Phineas Fletcher (canto vii.). He had four sons: Idol'atros (idolatry), Phar'makeus (3 syl.) (witchcraft), Hæret'icus, and Hypocrisy; all fully described by the poet. (Greek, asebeia, "impiety.")

Asel'ges (3 syl.), Lasciviousness personified. One of the four sons of Anag'nus (inchastity), his three brothers being Mæchus (adultery), Pornei'us (fornication), and Acath'arus. Seeing his brother

Porneius fall by the spear of Parthen'ia (maidenly chastity), Aselgês rushes forward to avenge his death; but the martial maid caught him with her spear, and tossed him so high i' the air "that he hardly knew whither his course was bent." (Greek, asêlgês, "intemperate, wanton.") —Phineas Fletcher: The Purple Island, xi. (1633).

As'en, strictly speaking, are only the three gods next in rank to the twelve male Asir; but the word is not unfrequently used for the Scandinavian deities generally.

As'gard, the fortress of the Æsir, or Scandinavian deities. It is situate in the heavenly hills, between the Earth and the Rainbow-bridge (Bi'rost). The river is Nornor, overshadowed by the famous ash tree Ygdrasil'. Above the Rainbow dwelt the "Mysterious Three."

As'gil's Translation. John Asgill wrote a book on the possibility of man being translated into eternal life without dying. The book, in 1707, was condemned to be burnt by the common hangman.

> Here's no depending upon old women in my country, . . and a man may as safely trust to Asgil's translation as to his great-grandmother not marrying.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Busybody, ii. 2 (1709).

Ash'field (Farmer), a truly John Bull farmer, tender-hearted, noble-minded but homely, generous but hot-tempered. He loves his daughter Susan with the love of a woman. His favourite expression is "Behave pratty," and he himself always tries to do so. His daughter Susan marries Robert Handy, the son of sir Abel Handy.

Dame Ashfield, the farmer's wife, whose bête noire is a neighbouring farmer named Grundy. What Mrs. Grundy will say, or what Mrs. Grundy will think or do, is dame Ashfield's decalogue and gospel.

Susan Ashfield, daughter of farmer and dame Ashfield. — Morton: Speed the Plough (1798).

Ash'ford (Isaac), "a wise, good man, contented to be poor."—Crabbe: Parish Register (1807).

Ash'taroth, a general name for all Syrian goddesses. (See ASTORETH.)

> [They] had general names
> Of Baälim and Ashtaroth: those male,
> These feminine.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 422 (1665).

Ash'ton (Sir William), the lord keeper of Scotland, and father of Lucy Ashton.

Lady Eleanor Ashton, wife of sir William.

Colonel Sholto Douglas Ashton, eldest son of sir William.

Lucy Ashton, daughter of sir William, betrothed to Edgar (the master of Ravenswood); but being compelled to marry Frank Hayston (laird of Bucklaw), she tries to murder him in the bridal chamber, and becomes insane. Lucy dies, but the laird recovers.—Sir W. Scott: The Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

(This has been made the subject of an opera by Donizetti, called Lucia di Lammermoor, 1835.)

Asia, the wife of that Pharaoh who brought up Moses. She was the daughter of Mozahem.—Sale: Al Korân, xx. notes.

Asia, wife of that Pharaoh who knew not Joseph. Her husband tortured her for believing in Moses; but she was taken alive into paradise.—Sale: Al Korân, lxvi. note.

"Mahomet says, "Among women four have been perfect: Asia, wife of Pharaoh; Mary, daughter of Imrân; Khadîjah, the prophet's first wife; and Fâtima, his own daughter."

Asir' or rather Æsir, the celestial deities of Scandinavian mythology, viz. Odin, Thor, Baldr, Tyr, Bragi, Heimdall, Vidar, Vali, Ullur, and Forsetti.

Sometimes the goddesses Frigga (wife of Odin), Sif (wife of Thor), and Idu'na are ranked among the Æsir; but Ni'ord, with his wife Shado, their son Frey and daughter Frega, do not belong to the celestials but to the Vanir.

As'madai (3 syl.), the same as Asmode'us (4 syl.), the lustful and destroying angel, who robbed Sara of her seven husbands (Tobit iii. 8). Milton makes him one of the rebellious angels overthrown by Uriël and Ra'phaël. Hume says the word means "the destroyer."—Paradise Lost, vi. 365 (1665).

Asmode'us (4 syl.), the demon of vanity and dress, called in the Talmud "king of the devils." As "dress" is one of the bitterest evils of modern life, it is termed "the Asmodeus of domestic peace," a phrase employed to express any "skeleton" in the house of a private family.

(In the book of Tobit Asmodeus falls in love with Sara, daughter of Rag'uël, and causes the successive deaths of seven husbands each on his bridal night; but when Sara married Tobit, Asmodeus was driven into Egypt by a charm made of the heart and liver of a fish burnt on perfumed ashes.)

N.B.—Milton makes it a word of 4 syl. with the accent on the penult; but Tennyson makes the word either Asmo'deus (3 syl.), or Asmo'dĕus (4 syl.), with the accent on the second syl.

Better pleased
Than Asmodĕus with the fishy fume.
Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 168.

Abaddon and Asmŏdeus caught at me.
Tennyson: St. Simeon Stylites.

Asmode'us, a "diable bon-homme," with more gaiety than malice; not the least like Mephistophelês. He is the companion of Cle'ofas, whom he carries through the air, and shows him the inside of houses, where they see what is being done in private or secrecy without being seen. Although Asmodeus is not malignant, yet with all his wit, acuteness, and playful malice, we never forget the fiend even when he is most engaging.

(Such was the popularity of the Diable Boiteux, by Lesage, that two young men fought a duel in a bookseller's shop over the only remaining copy—an incident worthy to be recorded by Asmodeus himself.)

Miss Austen gives us just such a picture of domestic life as Asmodeus would present could he remove the roof of many an English home.—Encyc. Brit. (art. "Romance").

(Asmodĕus must not be confounded with Asmonæus, surnamed "Maccabæus." See HAMMER.)

Aso'tus, Prodigality personified in The Purple Island (1633), by Phineas Fletcher, fully described in canto viii. (Greek, asōtos, "a profligate.")

Aspa'sia, a maiden, the very ideal of ill-fortune and wretchedness. She is the troth-plight wife of Amintor, but Amintor, at the king's request, marries Evad'ne (3 syl.). Women point with scorn at the forsaken Aspasia, but she bears it all with patience. The pathos of her speeches is most touching, and her death forms the tragical event which gives name to the drama.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Maid's Tragedy (1610).

Asphal'tic Pool (The), the Dead Sea. So called from the asphalt or bitu'men abounding in it. The river Jordan empties itself into this "pool."—Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 411 (1665).

As'phodel, in the language of flowers, means "regret." It is said that the spirits of the dead sustain themselves with the roots of this flower. It was planted by the ancients on graves, and both Theophilus and Pliny state that the ghosts beyond Achĕron roam through the meadows of Asphodel, in order if possible to reach the waters of Lethê or Oblivion. The asphodel was dedicated to Pluto. Longfellow strangely enough crowns his angel of death with amaranth, with which the "spirits elect bind their resplendent locks," and his angel of life with asphodel, the flower of "regret" and emblem of the grave.

He who wore the crown of asphodels . . .
(said) "My errand is not death, but life" . . .
(but) The angel with the amaranthine wreath
Whispered a word that had a sound like death.
Longfellow: The Two Angels.

As'pramont, a place mentioned by Ariosto in his Orlando Furioso, in the department of the Meuse (1516).

Jousted in Aspramont and Mont'alban [Montauban].
Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 583 (1665).

As'pramonte (3 syl.), in sir W. Scott's Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

The old knight, father of Brenhilda.

The lady of Aspramonte, the knight's wife.

Brenhilda of Aspramonte, their daughter, wife of count Robert.

As'rael or Az'rael, an angel of death. He is immeasurable in height, insomuch that the space between his eyes equals a 70,000 days' journey.—Mohammedan Mythology.

Ass (An), emblem of the tribe of Issachar. In the old church at Totnes is a stone pulpit, divided into compartments, containing shields decorated with the several emblems of the Jewish tribes, of which this is one.

Issachar is a strong ass, couching down between two burdens.—Gen. xlix. 14.

Ass. Three of these animals are by different legends admitted into heaven: 1. The ass on which Christ rode on His journey to Jerusalem on the day of palms. 2. The ass on which Balaam rode, and which reproved the prophet, "speaking with the voice of a man." 3. The ass of Aaz'is queen of Sheba or Saba, who came to visit Solomon. (See ANIMALS, p. 45.)

Ass's Ears. Midas was chosen to decide a trial of musical skill between Apollo and Pan. The Phrygian king gave his verdict in favour of Pan, whereupon Apollo changed his ears to those of an ass. The servant who used to cut the king's hair, discovering the deformity, was afraid to whisper the secret to any one, but, not being able to contain himself, dug a hole in the earth, and, putting his mouth into it, cried out, "King Midas has ass's ears." He then filled up the hole, and felt relieved. Tennyson makes the barber a woman

> No livelier than the dame
> That whispered, "Asses' ears" [sic], among the sedge,
> "My sister."
> The Princess, ii.

As'sad, son of Camaral'zaman and Haiatal'nefous (5 syl.), and half-brother of Amgiad (son of Camaralzaman and Badoura). Each of the two mothers conceived a base passion for the other's son, and, when the young men repulsed their advances, accused them to their father of gross designs upon their honour. Camaralzaman commanded his vizier to put them both to death; but instead of doing so, he conducted them out of the city, and told them not to return to their father's kingdom (the island of Ebony). They wandered on for ten days, when Assad went to a city in sight to obtain provisions. Here he was entrapped by an old fire-worshipper, who offered him hospitality, but cast him into a dungeon, intending to offer him up a human victim on the "mountain of fire." The ship in which he was sent being driven on the coast of queen Margiana, Assad was sold to her as a slave, but being recaptured was carried back to his old dungeon. Here Bosta'na, one of the old man's daughters, took pity on him, and released him; and ere long Assad married queen Margiana, while Amgiad, out of gratitude, married Bostana.—Arabian Nights ("Amgiad and Assad").

As'sidos, a plant in the country of Prester John. It not only protects the wearer from evil spirits, but forces every spirit to tell its business.

Astag'oras, a female fiend, who has the power of raising storms.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Astar'te (3 syl.), the Phœnician moon-goddess, the Astoreth of the Syrians.

> With these
> Came Astoreth, whom the Phœnicians called
> Astarte, queen of heaven, with crescent horns.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 438 (1665).

As'tarte (2 syl.), an attendant on the princess Anna Comne'na.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Astarte (2 or 3 syl.), beloved by Manfred.—Byron: Manfred.

> We think of Astarte as young, beautiful, innocent,—guilty, lost, murdered, judged, pardoned; but still, in her permitted visit to earth, speaking in a voice of sorrow, and with a countenance yet pale with mortal trouble. We had but a glimpse of her in her beauty and innocence, but at last she rises before us in all the mortal silence of a ghost, with fixed, glazed, and passionless eyes, revealing death, judgment, and eternity.—Professor Wilson.

(2 syl.) The lady Astarte his? Hush! who comes here? (3 syl.) . . . The same Astarte? No. (iii. 4.) [(iii. 4.)

As'tery, a nymph in the train of Venus; the lightest of foot and most active of all. One day the goddess, walking abroad with her nymphs, bade them go gather flowers. Astery gathered most of all; but Venus, in a fit of jealousy, turned her into a butterfly, and threw the flowers into the wings. Since then all butterflies have borne wings of many gay colours.—Spenser: Muiopotmos or the Butterfly's Fate (1590).

Ast'olat, Guildford, in Surrey.

The Lily Maid of Astolat, Elaine, in Tennyson's Idylls of the King.

Astol'pho, the English cousin of Orlando; his father was Otho. He was a great boaster, but was generous, courteous, gay, and singularly handsome. Astolpho was carried to Alci'na's isle on the back of a whale; and when Alcina tired of him, she changed him into a myrtle tree, but Melissa disenchanted him. Astolpho descended into the infernal regions; he also went to the moon, to cure Orlando of his madness by bringing back his lost wits in a phial.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Astolpho's Book. The fairy Log'istilla gave him a book, which would direct him aright in all his journeyings, and give him any other information he required.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, viii.

Astolpho's Horn. The gift of Logistilla. Whatever man or beast heard it, was seized with instant panic, and became an easy captive.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, viii.

As'ton (Sir Jacob), a cavalier during the Commonwealth; one of the partisans of the late king.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (period, Commonwealth).

As'ton (Enrico). So Henry Ashton is called in Donizetti's opera of Lucia di Lammermoor (1835). (See ASHTON.)

As'torax, king of Paphos and brother of the princess Calis.—John Fletcher: The Mad Lover (1617).

As'toreth, the moon-goddess of Syrian mythology; called by Jeremiah, "the Queen of Heaven," and by the Phœnicians, "Astar'tê." (See ASHTAROTH, p. 68.)

With these [the host of heaven] in troop
Came Astoreth, whom the Phœnicians called
Astarté, queen of heaven, with crescent horns.
Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 438 (1665).

(Milton does not always preserve the difference between Ashtaroth and Astoreth; for he speaks of the "mooned Ashtaroth, heaven's queen and mother.")

Astræ'a, Mrs. Aphra Behn, an authoress. She published the story of Prince Oroonoka (died 1689).

The stage how loosely does Astræa tread!
Pope.

Hymns of Astræa, a series of twenty-six acrostics in honour of queen Elizabeth, by sir John Davies (1570–1626).

As'tragon, the philosopher and great physician, by whom Gondibert and his friends were cured of the wounds received in the faction fight stirred up by prince Oswald. Astragon had a splendid library and museum. One room was called "Great Nature's Office," another "Nature's Nursery," and the library was called "The Monument of Vanished Mind." Astragon (the poet says) discovered the loadstone and its use in navigation. He had one child, Bertha, who loved duke Gondibert, and to whom she was promised in marriage. The tale being unfinished, the sequel is not known. —Davenant: Gondibert (died 1668).

Astree (2 syl.), a pastoral romance by Honore D'Urfé (1616), very celebrated for giving birth to the pastoral school, which had for a time an overwhelming power on literature, dress, and amusements. Pastoral romance had reappeared in Portugal fully sixty years previously in the pastoral romance of Montemayer called Diana (1552); and Longos, in the fifteenth century, had produced a beautiful prose pastoral called The Loves of Daphnis and Chloe, but both these pastorals stand alone, while that of D'Urfé is the beginning of a long series.

(The Romance of Astrée is very celebrated.)

Astringer, a falconer. Shakespeare introduces an astringer in All's Well that Ends Well, act v. sc. 1. (From the French austour. Latin austercus, "a goshawk.") A "gentle astringer" is a gentleman-falconer.

We usually call a falconer who keeps that kind of hawk [the goshawk] an austringer.—Cowell: Law Dictionary.

As'tro-flammante (5 syl.), queen of the night. The word means "flaming star."—Mozart: Die Zauberflöte (1791).

Astronomer (The), in Rasselas, an old enthusiast, who believed himself to have the control and direction of the weather. He leaves Imlac his successor, but implores him not to interfere with the constituted order.

"I have possessed," said he to Imlac, "for five years the regulation of the weather, and the distribution of the seasons: the sun has listened to my dictates, and passed from tropic to tropic by my direction; the clouds, at my call, have poured their waters, and the Nile has overflowed at my command: I have restrained the rage of the Dog-star, and mitigated the fervour of the Crab. The winds alone . . have hitherto refused my authority. . . . I am the first of human beings to whom this trust has been imparted."—Dr. Johnson: Rasselas, xli.–xliii. (1759).

As'trophel, sir Philip Sidney. "Phil. Sid." may be a contraction of philos sidus, and the Latin sidus being changed to the Greek astron, we get astron philos ("star-lover"). The "star" he loved was Penelope Devereux, whom he calls Stella ("star"), and to whom he was betrothed. Spenser wrote a pastoral elegy called Astrophel, to the memory of sir Philip Sidney.

But while as Astrophel did live and reign,
Amongst all swains was none his paragon.
Spenser: Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1591).

Astyn'ome (4 syl.) or Chryseïs, daughter of Chrysês priest of Apollo. When Lyrnessus was taken, Astynomê fell to the share of Agamemnon, but the father begged to be allowed to ransom her. Agamemnon refused to comply. Whereupon the priest invoked the anger of his patron god, and Apollo sent a plague into the Grecian camp. This was the cause of contention between Agamemnon and Achillês, and forms the subject of Homer's epic The Iliad.

As'wad, son of Shedad king of Ad. When the angel of death destroyed Shedad and all his subjects, Aswad was saved alive because he had shown mercy to a camel which had been bound to a tomb to starve to death, that it might serve its master on the day of resurrection.—Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer (1797).

Asy'lum Chris'ti. So England was called by the Camisards during the scandalous religious persecutions of the "Grand Monarque" (Louis XIV.).

Ataba'lipa, the last emperor of Peru, subdued by Pizarro, the Spanish general. Milton refers to him in Paradise Lost, xi. 409 (1665).

At'ala, the name of a novel by François René Châteaubriand. It was published in 1801, and created universal admiration. Like his novel called René, it was designed as an episode to his Génie du Christianisme. His wanderings through the primæval woods of North America are described in Atala and René also.

(This has nothing to do with Attila, king of the Huns (by Corneille); nor with Athalie, queen of Judah, the subject of Racine's great tragedy.)

Atalanta, of Arcadia, wished to remain single, and therefore gave out that she would marry no one who could not outstrip her in running; but if any challenged her and lost the race, he was to lose his life. Hippom'enês won the race by throwing down golden apples, which Atalanta kept stopping to pick up. William Morris has chosen this for one of his tales in the Earthly Paradise (March).

In short, she thus appeared like another Atalanta.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Fortunio," 1682).

Atalanta in Calydon. A dramatic poem by Algernon C. Swinburne (1864).

Atalantis. "Secret Memoirs of Persons of Quality" in the court of 1688, by Mrs. de la Rivière Manley (1736). It is full of party scandal; not unfrequently new minting old lies.

As long as Atalantis shall be read.
Pope: Rape of the Lock.

Atali'ba, the inca of Peru, most dearly beloved by his subjects, on whom Pizarro made war. An old man says of the inca—

The virtues of our monarch alike secure to him the affection of his people and the benign regard of Heaven.—Sheridan: Pizarro, ii. 4 (from Kotzebue), (1799).

Atba'ra or Black River, called the "dark mother of Egypt." (See BLACK RIVER.)

Ate (2 syl.), goddess of revenge.

With him along is come the mother-queen,
An Ate, stirring him to blood and strife.
Shakespeare: King John, act ii. sc. 1 (1596).

Ate (2 syl.), "mother of debate and all dissension," the friend of Duessa. She squinted, lied with a false tongue, and maligned even the best of beings. Her abode, "far under ground hard by the gates of hell," is described at length in bk. iv. 1. When sir Blandamour was challenged by Braggadoccio (canto 4), the terms of the contest were that the conqueror should have "Florimel," and the other "the old hag Até," who was always to ride beside him till he could pass her off to another.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. (1596).

Atell'an Fables (The), in Latin Atella'næ Fabulæ, a species of farce performed by the ancient Romans, and so called from Atella, in Campania. They differed from comedy because no magistrates or persons of rank were introduced; they differed from the tabernariæ or genre drama, because domestic life was not represented in them; and they differed from the mimes, because there was neither buffoonery nor ribaldry. They were not performed by professional actors, but by Roman citizens of rank; were written in the Oscan language, and were distinguished for their refined humour.

They were supposed to be directly derived from the ancient mimi of the Atellan Fables.—Scott: The Drama.

A'tha, a country in Connaught, which for a time had its own chief, and sometimes usurped the throne of Ireland. Thus Cairbar (lord of Atha) usurped the throne, but was disseated by Fingal, who restored Conar king of Ulster. The war of Fingal with Cairbar is the subject of the Ossianic poem Tem'ora, so called from the palace of that name where Cairbar murdered king Cormac. The kings of the Fir-bolg were called "lords of Atha."—Ossian.

Ath'alie (3 syl.), daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, and wife of Joram king of Judah. She massacred all the remnant of the house of David; but Joash escaped, and six years afterwards was proclaimed king. Athalie, attracted by the shouts, went to the temple, and was killed by the mob. This forms the subject and title of Racine's chef-d'œuvre (1691), and was Mdlle. Rachel's great part.

Atheist's Tragedy (The), by Cyril Tourneur. The "atheist" is D'Amville, who murdered his brother Montferrers for his estates (1611).

Ath'elstane (3 syl.), surnamed "The Unready," thane of Coningsburgh.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

 "Unready" does not mean unprepared, but injudicious (from Anglo-Saxon, ræd, "wisdom, counsel").

Athe'na [Juno] once meant "the air," but in Homer this goddess is the representative of civic prudence and military skill. Athêna, in Greek mythology, is the armed protectress of states and cities.

Athenæum (The), "a Magazine of Literary and Miscellaneous Information," edited by John Aikin (1807–1809).

Re-started by James Silk Buckingham in 1829.

Athe'nian Bee. Plato was so called from the honeyed sweetness of his composition. It is said that a bee settled on his lips while he was an infant asleep in his cradle, and indicated that "honeyed words" would fall from his lips, and flow from his pen. Sophoclês is called "The Attic Bee."

Athenodo'rus, the Stoic, told Augustus the best way to restrain unruly anger is to repeat the alphabet before giving way to it.

> The sacred line he did but once repeat,
> And laid the storm, and cooled the raging heat.
> Tickell: The Horn-book.

Ath'ens.

German Athens, Saxe-Weimar.

Athens of Ireland, Belfast.

Modern Athens, Edinburgh. So called from its resemblance to the Acropolis, when viewed from the sea opposite.—Willis.

Mohammedan Athens, Bagdad in the time of Haroun-al-Raschid.

Athens of the New World, Boston, noted for its literature and literary institutions.

Athens of the North, Copenhagen, unrivalled (for its size) in the richness of its literary and antique stores, the number of its societies for the encouragement of arts, sciences, and general learning, together with the many illustrious names on the roll of its citizenship.

Athens of Switzerland, Zurich. So called from the number of protestant refugees who resorted thither, and inundated Europe with their works on controversial divinity. Coverdale's Bible was printed at Zurich in 1535; here Zuinglius preached, and here Lavater lived.

Athens of the West. Cor'dova, in Spain, was so called in the Middle Ages.

Ath'liot, the most wretched of all women.

> Her comfort is (if for her any be),
> That none could show more cause of grief than she.
> W. Browne: Britannia's Pastorals, ii. 5 (1613).

Ath'os. Dinoc'ratês, a sculptor, proposed to Alexander to hew mount Athos into a statue representing the great conqueror, with a city in his left hand, and a basin in his right to receive all the waters which flowed from the mountain. Alexander greatly approved of the suggestion, but objected to the locality.

> And hew out a huge monument of pathos
> As Philip's son proposed to do with Athos.
> Bryon: Don Juan, xii. 86.

Athos is one of the musketeers in Three Musketeers, by Dumas.

Athun'ree, in Connaught, where was fought the great battle between Felim O'Connor on the side of the Irish, and William de Bourgo on the side of the English. The Irish lost 10,000 men, and the whole tribe of the O'Connors fell except Fe'lini's brother, who escaped alive.

Athun'ree (Lord), a libertine with broken coffers; a man of pleasure, who owned "no curb of honour, and who possessed no single grace but valour." —Knowles: Woman's Wit (1838).

Atimus, Baseness of mind personified in The Purple Island (1633), by Phineas Fletcher. "A careless, idle swain . . . his work to eat, drink, sleep, and purge his reins." Fully described in canto viii. (Greek, atimos, "one dishonoured.")

A'tin (Strife), the squire of Pyr'ochlês.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 4, 5, 6 (1590).

Atlante'an Shoulders, shoulders broad and strong, like those of Atlas, which support the world.

> Sage he [Beëlzebub] stood,
> With Atlantean shoulders, fit to bear
> The weight of mightiest monarchies.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 305 (1665).

Atlantes (3 syl.), the magician and sage who educated Rogêro in all manly virtues.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Atlan'tis. Lord Bacon wrote an allegorical fiction called Atlantis, or The New Atlantis. It is an island in the Atlantic, on which the author feigns that he was wrecked. There found he every model arrangement for the promotion of science and the perfection of man as a social being.

> A moral country? But I hold my hand—
> For I disdain to write an Atalantis [sic].
> Byron: Don Juan, xi. 87.

Atlas' Shoulders, enormous strength. Atlas king of Mauritania is said to support the world on his shoulders.

> Change thy shape and shake off age . . . Get thee Medea's kettle (q.v.) and be boiled anew, come forth with . . . callous hands, a chine of steel, and Atlas' shoulders.—Congreve: Love for Love, iv. (1695).

Atom (The History and Adventures of an), by Smollett (1769). A satire on the political parties of England from 1754 to the dissolution of lord Chatham's administration. Chatham himself is severely handled.

Atossa. It is doubtful to whom Pope alludes in his Moral Essays, ii.—

But what are these to great Atossa's mind?

Atossa, daughter of Cyrus, was the wife of Darius Hystaspis, and their son was Xerxes. As Xerxes was the son of Ahasuĕrus and Vashti (Old Testament), and Vashti was the daughter of Cyrus, it would seem that Ahasuerus was the same as Darius, and Vashti as Atossa.

∴ It is supposed that Pope referred either to the duchess of Marlborough or to the duchess of Buckingham. He calls the former Sappho, but Sappho's great friend was Atthis, not Atossa.

At'ropos, one of the Fates, whose office it was to cut the thread of life with a pair of scissors.

. . . nor shines the knife,
Nor shears of Atropos before their vision.
Byron: Don Juan, ii. 64.

Attala's Wife, Cerca.

Attic Bee (The), Sophoclês (B.C. 495–405). Plato is called "The Athe'nian Bee."

Attic Boy (The), referred to by Milton in his Il Penseroso, is Ceph'alus or Kephalos, beloved by Aurora (Morn), but married to Pro'cris. He was passionately fond of hunting.

Till civil-suited Morn appear,
Not tricked and flounced, as she was wont
With the Attic boy to hunt,
But kerchiefed in a comely cloud.
Il Penseroso (1638).

Attic Muse (The), Xenophon, the historian (B.C. 444–359).

At'ticus (The English), Joseph Addison (1672–1719).

Who but must laugh if such a man there be,
Who would not weep if Atticus were he?
Pope: Prologue to the Satires.

The Christian Atticus, Reginald Heber, bishop of Calcutta (1783–1826).

The Irish Atticus. George Faulkner (1700–1775) is satirized under this name in a series of letters by the earl of Chesterfield.

At'tila, one of the tragedies of Pierre Corneille (1667). This king of the Huns, usually called the "Scourge of God," must not be confounded with "Athalie," daughter of Jezebel and wife of Joram, the subject and title of Racine's chef-d'œuvre, and Mdlle. Rachel's chief character.

Attreba'tes (4 syl.), Drayton makes it 3 syl. The Attrebates inhabited part of Hampshire and Berkshire. The primary city was Callĕba (Silchester).—Richard of Cirencester, vi. 10.

The Attrebates in Bark unto the bank of Thames.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xvi. (1612).

∴ "In Bark" means in Berkshire.

Atys, a Phrygian shepherd, transformed into a fir tree. Catullus wrote a poem in Latin on the subject, and his poem has been translated into English by Leigh Hunt (1784–1859).

∴ William Whitehead (1715–1785) wrote an heroic poem entitled Atys and Adrastus; but this Atys was quite another person. The Phrygian shepherd was son of Nana, but Whitehead's Atys was son of Crœsus. The former was metamorphosed by Cybĕle (3 syl.) into a fir tree; the latter was slain by Adrastos (not the king of Argos, but son of Gordius), who accidentally killed him while hunting, and was so distressed at the accident that he put an end to his own life.

Aubert (Thérèse), the chief character of a romance by C. Nodier (1819). The story contains the adventures of a young royalist in the French Revolution, who disguised himself in female attire to escape discovery.

Aubrey, a widower for 18 years. At the death of his wife he committed his infant daughter to the charge of Mr. Bridgemore a merchant, and lived abroad. He returned to London after an absence of 18 years, and found that Bridgemore had abused his trust; and his daughter had been obliged to quit the house and seek protection with a Mr. Mortimer.

Augusta Aubrey, daughter of Mr. Aubrey, in love with Francis Tyrrel, the nephew of Mr. Mortimer. She is snubbed and persecuted by the vulgar Lucinda Bridgemore, and most wantonly persecuted by lord Abberville; but after passing through many a most painful visitation, she is happily married to the man of her choice.—Cumberland: The Fashionable Lover (1780).

Au'bri's Dog showed a most unaccountable hatred to Richard de Macaire, snarling and flying at him whenever he appeared in sight. Now, Aubri had been murdered by some one in the forest of Bondy, and this animosity of the dog directed suspicion towards Richard de Macaire. Richard was taken up, and condemned to single combat with the dog, by whom he was killed. In his dying moments he confessed himself to be the murderer of Aubri. (See DOG.)

Le combat entre Macaire et le chien eut lieu à Paris, dans l'île Louviers. On place ce fait merveilleux en 1371, mais . . . il est bien antérieur, car il est mentionné dès le siècle précédent par Albéric des Trois-Fontaines.—Boudlet: Dict. Universel, etc.

Auburn, the name of Goldmith's Deserted Village. Supposed to be Lissoy, in Kilkenny West, Ireland, where Goldsmith's father was the pastor.

Sweet Auburn, loveliest village of the plain.
Goldsmith: The Deserted Village (1770).

Auch'termuch'ty (John), the Kinross carrier.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Audhum'bla, the cow created by Surt to nourish Ymir. She supplied him with four rivers of milk, and was herself nourished by licking dew from the rocks. —Scandinavian Mythology.

Audley. Is John Audley here? In Richardson's travelling theatrical booth this question was asked aloud, to signify that the performance was to be brought to a close as soon as possible, as the platform was crowded with new-comers, waiting to be admitted (1766–1836).

¶ The same question was asked by Shuter (in 1759), whose travelling company preceded Richardson's.

Au'drey, a country wench, who jilted William for Touchstone. She is an excellent specimen of a wondering shegawky. She thanks the gods that "she is foul," and if to be poetical is not to be honest, she thanks the gods also that "she is not poetical."—Shakespeare: As You Like It (1598).

The character of "Audrey," that of a female fool, should not have been assumed [i.e. by Miss Pope, in her last appearance in public]; the last line of the farewell address was, "And now poor Audrey bids you all farewell" (May 16, 1808).—James Smith: Memoirs, etc. (1840).

Au'gean Stables. Augĕas king of the Epēans, in Elis, kept 3000 oxen for thirty years in stalls which were never cleansed. It was one of the twelve labours of Her'culēs to cleanse these stables in one day. This he accomplished by letting two rivers into them.

If the Augean stable [of dramatic impurity] was not sufficiently cleansed, the stream of public opinion was fairly directed against its conglomerated impurities.—Sir W. Scott: The Drama.

AUGUSTA. London [Trinobantina] was so called by the Romans.

Where full in view Augusta's spires are seen,
With flowery lawns and waving woods between,
A humble habitation rose, beside
Where Thames meandering rolls his ample tide.
Falconer: The Shipwreck, l. 3 (1756).

Augus'ta, mother of Gustavus Vasa. She is a prisoner of Christian II. king of Denmark; but the king promises to set her free if she will induce her son (Gustavus) to submission. Augusta refuses. In the war which followed, Gustavus defeated Christian, and became king of Sweden. —H. Brooke: Gustavus Vasa (1730).

Augusta, a title conferred by the Roman emperors on their wives, sisters, daughters, mothers, and even concubines. It had to be conferred; for even the wife of an Augustus was not an Augusta until after her coronation.

1. EMPRESSES. Livia and Julia were both Augusta; so were Julia (wife of Tiberius), Messalina, Agrippina, Octavia, Poppæa, Statilia, Sabina, Domitilla, Domitia, and Faustĭna. In imperials the wife of an emperor is spoken of as Augusta: Serenissima Augusta conjux nostra; Divina Augusta, etc. But the title had to be conferred; hence we read, "Domitian uxorem suam Augustam jussit nuncupari;" and "Flavia Titiana, eadem die, uxor ejus [i.e. Pertinax] Augusta est appellata."

2. MOTHERS or GRANDMOTHERS. Antonia, grandmother of Caligula, was created Augusta. Claudius made his mother Antonia Augusta after her death. Heliogab'alus had coins inscribed with "Julia Mæsa Augusta," in honour of his grandmother; Mammæa, mother of Alexander Sevērus, is styled Augusta on coins; and so is Helĕna, mother of Constantine.

3. SISTERS. Honorius speaks of his sister as "venerabilis Augusta germana nostra." Trajan has coins inscribed with "Diva Marciana Augusta."

4. DAUGHTERS. Mallia Scantilla the wife, and Didia the daughter of Didius Julianus, were both Augusta. Titus inscribed on coins his daughter as "Julia Sabina Augusta;" there are coins of the emperor Decius inscribed with "Herennia Etruscilla Augusta," and "Sallustia Augusta," sisters of the emperor Decius.

5. OTHERS. Matidia, niece of Trajan, is called Augusta on coins; Constantine Monomachus called his concubine Augusta.

Augusta, the lady to whom lord Byron, in 1816, addressed several stanzas and epistles. She was a relative, and married colonel Leigh.

Augus'tan Age, the golden age of a people's literature, so called because, while Augustus was emperor, Rome was noted for its literary giants.

The Augustan Age of England, the Elizabethan period. That of Anne is called the "Silver Age."

The Augustan Age of France, that of Louis XIV. (1610-1740).

The Augustan Age of Germany, nineteenth century.

The Augustan Age of Portugal, from John the Great to John III. (1385-1557). In this period Brazil was occupied; the African coast explored; the sea-route to India was traversed; and Camoens flourished.

Augusti'na, the Maid of Saragoza. She was only 22 when, her lover being shot, she mounted the battery in his place; and the French, after a siege of two months, were obliged to retreat, August 15, 1808.

Such were the exploits of the Maid of Saragoza, who by her valour elevated herself to the highest rank of heroines. When the author was at Seville, she walked daily on the Prado, decorated with medals and orders, by order of the Junta.—Byron.

Augustine. The Ladder of St. Augustine, a poem by Longfellow.

Augustus Dunshunner, W. E. Aytoun (1813-1865).

Auld Lang Syne. Robert Burns, in a letter to Mr. Thomson, dated September, 1793, says, "One song more, and I have done. 'Auld Lang Syne.' The air is but mediocre, but . . . the old song . . . which has never been in print, nor even in MS. until I took it down from an old man's singing, is enough to recommend any air."

Auld Robin Gray was written (1771) by lady Anne Barnard, to raise a little money for an old nurse. Lady Anne's maiden name was Lindsay, and her father was earl of Balcarras.

Aullay, a monster horse with an elephant's trunk. The creature is as much bigger than an elephant as an elephant is larger than a sheep. King Baly of India rode on an aullay.

The aullay, hugest of four-footed kind,
The aullay-horse, that in his force,
With elephantine trunk, could bind
And lift the elephant, and on the wind
Whirl him away, with sway and swing,
E'en like a pebble from a practised sling.
Southey: Curse of Kehama, xvi. 2 (1809).

Aumerle [O-murl'], a French corruption of Albemarle (in Normandy).

Aurelia Darnel, in Smollett's novel of Sir Launcelot Greaves. His best female character. She is both lady-like and womanly.

Aurelius. (See ARVIRAGUS, p. 65.)

Aurelius, elder brother of Uther the pendragon, and uncle of Arthur; but he died before the hero was born.

Even sicke of a flixe [ill of the flux] as he was, he caused himself to be carried forth on a litter; with whose presence the people were so encouraged, that encountering with the Saxons they wan the victorie.—Holinshed: History of Scotland, 99.

. . . once I read
That stout Pendragon on his litter sick
Came to the field, and vanquished his foes.
Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act iii. sc. 2 (1589).

Aurora Leigh, a novel in blank verse by Elizabeth B. Browning (1856). Aurora Leigh is an orphan child sent from Italy to the care of an aunt in England. She falls in love with Romney Leigh, a "social reformer," who proposes marriage, but is rejected. Romney then gives himself up to socialistic work, and has a child by Marian Erle (a working girl). He would have married her, but was prevented by lady Waldemar. Aurora, in the mean time, being left penniless by the death of her aunt, supports herself by her writings, goes to Italy, and takes charge of Marian's child. Romney sets up a socialistic establishment, but the house is burnt down by the settlers; Romney loses his eyesight, retires to Italy, comes upon Marian, and offers her marriage to compensate for the evil he has done her. His proposal is rejected, and he finally marries Aurora Leigh.

Aurora Raby, a wealthy English orphan, a "rose with all its sweetest leaves yet unfolded."—Byron: Don Juan, canto xv.

Auro'ra's Tears, the morning dew. These tears are shed for the death of her son Memnon, slain by Achilles at the siege of Troy.

Auso'nia, Italy, so called from Auson, son of Ulysses.

. . . romantic Spain,—
Gay lilied fields of France, or more refined,
The soft Ausonia's monumental reign.
Campbell: Gertrude of Wyoming, ii. 15 (1809).

Austin, the assumed name of the lord of Clarinsal, when he renounced the world and became a monk of St. Nicholas. Theodore, the grandson of Alfonso, was his son, and rightful heir to the possessions and title of the count of Narbonne. —Jephson: Count of Narbonne (1782).

Aus'tria and the Lion's Hide. There is an old tale that the archduke of Austria killed Richard I., and wore as a spoil the lion's hide which belonged to our English monarch. Hence Faulconbridge (the natural son of Richard) says jeeringly to the archduke—

> Thou wear a lion's hide! doff it for shame,
> And hang a calf-skin on those recreant limbs.
> Shakespeare: King John, act iii. sc. 1 (1596).

(The point is better understood when it is borne in mind that fools and jesters were dressed in calf-skins.)

Austrian Army awfully arrayed (An). (See P, for this and several other alliterative poems.)

Aus'trian Lip (The), a protruding under jaw, with a heavy lip disinclined to shut close. It came from kaiser Maximilian I., son of kaiser Frederick III., and was inherited from his grandmother Cimburgis, a Polish princess, duke of Masovia's daughter, and hence called the "Cimburgis Under Lip."

¶ A similar peculiarity occurs in the family of sir Gideon Murray of Elibank. He had taken prisoner a young gentleman named Scoto, whom he was about to hang; but his wife persuaded him to commute the sentence into a marriage with their daughter "Meg of the muckle mouth." Meg made him a most excellent wife, but the "muckle mouth" descended to their posterity for many generations.

Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table (The), a series of essays contributed by Oliver Wendell Holmes to the first twelve numbers of the Atlantic Monthly, and republished in 1858. The essays are discursive, poetical, philosophical, imaginative, and amusing.

It was followed by The Professor at the Breakfast-Table (1870), and The Poet at the Breakfast-Table (1872).

Autol'ycus, the craftiest of thieves. He stole the flocks of his neighbours, and changed their marks. Sis'yphos outwitted him by marking his sheep under their feet.

Autol'ycus, a pedlar and witty rogue, in The Winter's Tale, by Shakespeare (1604).

Av'alon or Avallon, Glastonbury, generally called the "isle of Avalon." The abode of king Arthur, Oběron, Morgaine la Fée, and the Fees generally; sometimes called the "island of the blest." It is very fully described in the French romance of Ogier le Danois. Tennyson calls it Avil'lion (q.v.). Drayton, in his Polyolbion, styles it "the ancient isle of Avălon," and the Romans "insula Avalonia."

> O three-times famous isle! where is that place that might > Be with thyself compared for glory and delight,
> Whilst Glastonbury stood?
> Drayton: Polyolbion, iii. (1612).

Avan'turine or Aven'turine (4 syl.), a variety of rock-crystal having a spangled appearance, caused by scales of mica or crystals of copper. The name is borrowed from that of the artificial gold-spangled glass obtained in the first instance par aventure ("by accident").

> . . . and the hair
> All over glanced with dew-drop or with gem,
> Like sparkles in the stone avanturine.
> Tennyson: Gareth and Lynette.

Avare (L'). The plot of this comedy is as follows: Harpagon the miser and his son Cléante (2 syl.) both want to marry Mariane (3 syl.), daughter of Anselme, alias don Thomas d'Albarci, of Naples. Cléante gets possession of a casket of gold belonging to the miser, and hidden in the garden. When Harpagon discovers his loss, he raves like a madman, and Cléante gives him the choice of Mariane or the casket. The miser chooses the casket, and leaves the young lady to his son. The second plot is connected with Elise (2 syl.), the miser's daughter, promised in marriage by the father to his friend Anselme (2 syl.); but Elise is herself in love with Valère, who, however, turns out to be the son of Anselme. As soon as Anselme discovers that Valère is his son, who he thought had been lost at sea, he resigns to him Elise; and so in both instances the young folks marry together, and the old ones give up their unnatural rivalry.—Molière: L'Avare (1667).

Avatar', the descent of Brahma to this earth. It is said in Hindû mythology that Brahma has already descended nine times in various forms. He is yet to appear once more, when he will assume the figure of a warrior upon a white horse, and will cut off all incorrigible offenders.

> Nine times have Brahma's wheels of lightning hurled
> His awful presence o'er the alarmed world;
> Nine times hath Guilt, through all his giant frame,
> Convulsive trembled, as the Mighty came;
> Nine times hath suffering Mercy spared in vain,—
> But Heaven shall burst her starry gates again.
> He comes! dread Brahma shakes the sunless sky . .
> Heaven's fiery horse, beneath his warrior-form,
> Paws the light clouds, and gallops on the storm.
> Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, i. (1799).

AVENEL (2 syl.), Julian Avenel, the usurper of Avenel Castle.

Lady Alice Avenel, widow of sir Walter.

Mary Avenel, daughter of lady Alice. She marries Halbert Glendinning.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (date 1559).

Avenel (Sir Halbert Glendinning, knight of), same as the bridegroom in The Monastery.

The lady Mary of Avenel, same as the bride in The Monastery.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Avenel (The White Lady of), a spirit mysteriously connected with the Avenel family, as the Irish banshee is with true Mile'sian families. She announces good or ill fortune, and manifests a general interest in the family to which she is attached, but to others she acts with considerable caprice; thus she shows unmitigated malignity to the sacristan and the robber. Any truly virtuous mortal has commanding power over her.

Noon gleams on the lake,
Noon glows on the fell;
Awake thee, awake,
White maid of Avenel!
Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Avenel (Dick), in lord Lytton's My Novel (1853). A big, blustering, sharp Yankee, honest, generous, and warm-hearted.

Aven'ger of Blood, the man who had the birthright, according to the Jewish polity, of taking vengeance on him who had killed one of his relatives.

. . . the Christless code,
That must have life for a blow.
Tennyson: Maud, II. i. 1.

Av'icen or Abou-ibn-Sina, an Arabian physician and philosopher, born at Shiraz, in Persia (980–1037). He composed a treatise on logic, and another on metaphysics. Avicen is called both the Hippo'cratês and the Aristotle of the Arabs.

Of physicke speake for me, king Avicen . . .
Yet was his glory never set on shelfe,
Nor never shall, whyles any worlde may stande
Where men have minde to take good bookes in hande.
Gascoigne: The Fruits of Warre, lvii. (died 1557).

Avil'ion ["the apple island"], near the terrestrial paradise. (See AVALON.)

Where falls not hail, or rain, or any snow,
Nor ever wind blows loudly; but it lies
Deep-meadowed, happy, fair with orchard-lawns
And bowery hollows crowned with summer sea,
Where I [Arthur] will heal me of my grievous wound.
Tennyson: Morte d'Arthur.

Ayl'mer (Mrs.), a neighbour of sir Henry Lee.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Ay'mer (Prior), a jovial Benedictine monk, prior of Jorvaulx Abbey.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Ay'mon, duke of Dordŏna (Dordogne). He had four sons, Rinaldo, Guicciardo, Alardo, and Ricciardetto (i.e. Renaud, Guiscard, Alard, and Richard), whose adventures are the subject of a French romance entitled Les Quatre fils Aymon, by Huon de Villeneuve (1165–1223).

The old legend was modernized in 1504, and Balfe wrote an opera on the subject (1843).

Ayrshire Bard (The), Robert Burns, the Scotch poet (1759–1796).

As'amat-Bat'uk, pseudonym of M. Thiebland, war correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette in 1870.

Azari'a and Hush'ai, a reply in verse to Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, by Samuel Pordage. The characters common to the two satires are—

	By Pordage.	By Dryden.
Charles II.	Amasia	David
Cromwell	Zabad	Saul
Dryden	Shimei	Asaph (in part II.)
Monmouth (duke of)	Azaria	Absolom
Shaftesbury (earl of)	Hushai	Achitophel
Titus Oates	Libni	Corah

 Hence "Azaria and Hushai" are Monmouth and Shaftesbury in Pordage's reply, but "Absalom and Achitophel" represent them in Dryden's satire.

Aza'zel, one of the ginn or jinn, all of whom were made of "smokeless fire," that is, the fire of the Simoom. These jinn inhabited the earth before man was created, but on account of their persistent disobedience were driven from it by an army of angels. When Adam was created, and God commanded all to worship him, Azâzel insolently made answer, "Me hast Thou created of fire, and him of earth: why should I worship him?" Whereupon God changed the jinnee into a devil, and called him Iblis or Despair. In hell he was made the standard-bearer of Satan's host.

Upreared
His mighty standard; that proud honour claimed
Azâzel as his right.
Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 534 (1665).

Az'la, a suttee, the young widow of Ar'valan, son of Keha'ma.—Southey: Curse of Kehama, i. 10 (1809).

Az'o, husband of Parisi'na. He was marquis d'Este, of Ferrara, and had already a natural son, Hugo, by Bianca, who died of a broken heart because she was not made his bride. Hugo was betrothed to Parisina before she married the marquis, and after she became his mother-in-law they loved on still. One night Azo heard Parisina in sleep express her love for Hugo, and the angry marquis condemned his son to death. Although he spared his bride, no one ever knew what became of her.—Byron: Parisina.

Az'rael (3 syl.), the angel of death (called Raphael in the Gospel of Barnabas).—Al Korân.

Az'tecas, an Indian tribe, which conquered the Hoamen (2 syl.), seized their territory, and established themselves on a southern branch of the Missouri, having Az'tlan as their imperial city. When Madoc conquered the Aztecas in the twelfth century, he restored the Hoamen, and the Aztecas migrated to Mexico. —Southey: Madoc (1805).

∴ Cortez conquered Mexico, and extirpated the Aztecs in 1520.

Az'tlan, the imperial city of the Az'tecas, on a southern branch of the Missouri. It belonged to the Hoamen (2 syl.), but this tribe being conquered by the Aztecas, the city followed the fate of war. When Madoc led his colony to North America, he took the part of the Hoamen, and, conquering the Aztecas, restored the city and all the territory pertaining thereto to the queen Erill'yab, and the Aztecas migrated to Mexico. The city Aztlan is described as "full of palaces, gardens, groves, and houses" (in the twelfth century).—Southey: Madoc (1805).

Azuce'na, a gipsy. Manri'co is supposed to be her son, but is in reality the son of Garzia (brother of the conte di Luna).—Verdi: Il Trovato're (1853).

Azyoru'ca (4 syl.), queen of the snakes and dragons. She resides in Patala, or the infernal regions.—Hindû Mythology.

> There Azyoruca veiled her awful form
> In those eternal shadows. There she sat,
> And as the trembling souls who crowd around
> The judgment-seat received the doom of fate,
> Her giant arms, extending from the cloud,
> Drew them within the darkness.
> Southey: Curse of Kehama, xxiii. 15 (1809).

B.

Baal, plu. Baalim, a general name for all the Syrian gods, as Ash'taroth was for the goddesses. The general version of the legend of Baal is the same as that of Adônis, Thammuz, Osiris, and the Arabian myth of El Khouder. All allegorize the sun, six months above and six months below the equator. As a title of honour, the word Baal, Bal, Bel, etc., enters into a large number of Phœnician and Carthaginian proper names, as Hannibal, Hasdru-bal, Bel-shazzar, etc.

> . . . [the] general names
> Of Baälim and Ashtaroth: those male;
> These female.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 422 (1665).

Baalbec of Ireland, Kilmallock in Limerick, noted for its ruins.

Bab (Lady), a waiting-maid on a lady so called, who assumes the airs with the name and address of her mistress. Her fellow-servants and other servants address her as "lady Bab," or "Your ladyship." She is a fine wench, "but by no means particular in keeping her teeth clean." She says she never reads but one "book, which is Shikspur." And she calls Lovel and Freeman, two gentlemen of fortune, "downright hottenpots."—Rev. J. Townley: High Life Below Stairs (1763).

Ba'ba, chief of the eunuchs in the court of the sultana Gulbey'az.—Byron: Don Juan, v. 28, etc. (1820).

Baba (Ali), who relates the story of the "Forty Thieves" in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. He discovered the thieves' cave while hiding in a tree, and heard the magic word, "Ses'amê," at which the door of the cave opened and shut.

Cassim Baba, brother of Ali Baba, who entered the cave of the forty thieves, but forgot the pass-word, and stood crying, "Open, Wheat!" "Open, Barley!" to the door, which obeyed no sound but "Open, Sesamê!"

Baba Mus'tapha, a cobbler who sewed together the four pieces into which Cassim's body had been cleft by the forty thieves. When the thieves discovered that the body had been taken away, they sent one of the band into the city, to ascertain who had died of late. The man happened to enter the cobbler's stall, and falling into a gossip, heard about the body which the cobbler had sewed together. Mustapha pointed out to him the house of Cassim Baba's widow, and the thief marked it with a piece of white chalk. Next day the cobbler pointed out the house to another, who marked it with red chalk. And the day following he pointed it out to the captain of the band, who, instead of marking the door, studied the house till he felt sure of recognizing it.—Arabian Nights ("Ali Baba, or The Forty Thieves").

Bababalouk, chief of the black eunuchs, whose duty it was to wait on the sultan, to guard the sultanas, and to superintend the harem.—Habesci: State of the Ottoman Empire, 155, 156.

Ba'bel ["confusion"]. There is a town in Abyssinia called Habesh, the Arabic word for "confusion." This town is so called from the great diversity of races by which it is inhabited: Christians, Jews, and Mohammedans, Ethiopians, Arabians, Falashas (exiles), Gallas, and Negroes, all consort together there.

Babes in the Wood, insurrectionary hordes which infested the mountains of Wicklow and the woods of Enniscarthy towards the close of the eighteenth century. (See CHILDREN IN THE WOOD.)

Babie, old Alice Gray's servant-girl. —Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Babie'ca (3 syl.), the Cid's horse.

I learnt to prize Babieca from his head unto his hoof.
The Cid (1126).

Baboon (Philip), Philippe Bourbon, duc d'Anjou.

Lewis Baboon, Louis XIV., "a false loon of a grandfather to Philip duke of Anjou, and one that might justly be called a Jack-of-all-trades."

Sometimes you would see this Lewis Baboon behind his counter, selling broad-cloth, sometimes measuring linen; next day he would be dealing in mercery-ware; high heads, ribbons, gloves, fans, and lace, he understood to a nicety . . . nay, he would descend to the selling of tapes, garters, and shoe-buckles. When shop was shut up, he would go about the neighbourhood, and earn half-a-crown, by teaching the young men and maidens to dance. By these means he had acquired immense riches, which he used to squander away at back-sword [in mar.], quarter-staff, and cudgel-play, in which he took great pleasure.—Dr. Arbuthnot: History of John Bull, ii. (1712).

Bab'ylon. Cairo in Egypt was so called by the crusaders. Rome was so called by the puritans; and London was, and still is, so called by some, on account of its wealth, luxury, and dissipation. The reference is to Rev. xvii. and xviii.

Babylonian Wall. The foundress of this wall (two hundred cubits high, and fifty thick) was Semiramis, mythic foundress of the Assyrian empire. She was the daughter of the fish-goddess Der'ceto of Ascalon, and a Syrian youth.

Our statues . . . she
The foundress of the Babylonian wall.
Tennyson: The Princess, ii.

Bacbuc or Babouc, the oracle of the "Holy Bottle of Lanternland."—Rabelais: Pantagruel.

Bacchan'tes (3 syl.), priestesses of Bacchus.

Round about him [Bacchus] fair Bacchantês,
Bearing cymbals, flutes, and thyrses,
Wild from Naxian groves, or Zanté's
Vineyards, sing delirious verses.
Longfellow: Drinking Song.

Bacchus, in the Lusiad, an epic poem by Camoens (1569), is the personification of the evil principle which acts in opposition to Jupiter, the lord of Destiny. Mars is made by the poet the guardian power of Christianity, and Bacchus of Mohammedanism.

Bacharach [Back-a-rack], a red wine, so called from a town of the same name in the Lower Palatinate. Pope Pius II. used to import a tun of it to Rome yearly, and Nuremberg obtained its freedom at the price of four casks of it a-year. The word Bacharach means "the altar of Bacchus" (Bacchi ara), the altar referred to being a rock in the bed of the river, which indicated to the vine-growers what sort of year they might expect. If the head of the rock appeared above water, the season would be a dry one, and a fine vintage might be looked for; if not, it would be a wet season, and bad for the grapes.

. . . that ancient town of Bacharach,—
The beautiful town that gives us wine,
With the fragrant odour of Muscadine.
Longfellow The Golden Legend.

Backbite (Sir Benjamin), nephew of Crabtree, very conceited and very censorious. His friends called him a great poet and wit, but he never published anything, because "'twas very vulgar to print;" besides, as he said, his little productions circulated more "by giving copies in confidence to friends."—Sheridan: School for Scandal (1777).

When I first saw Miss Pope she was performing "Mrs. Candour," to Miss Farren's "lady Teazle," King as "sir Peter," Parsons "Crabtree," Dodd "Backbite," Baddeley "Moses," Smith "Charles," and John Palmer "Joseph" [Surface].—James Smith Memoirs, etc.

Bacon of Theology, bishop Butler, author of The Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, etc. (1692–1752).

Bacrack. (See BACHARACH.)

Bactrian Sage (The), Zoroas'ter or Zerdusht, a native of Bactria, now Balkh (B.C. 589–513).

Bade'bec (2 syl.), wife of Gargantua and mother of Pan'tagruel'. She died in giving him birth, or rather in giving birth at the same time to 900 dromedaries laden with ham and smoked tongues, 7 camels laden with eels, and 25 waggons full of leeks, garlic, onions, and shallots.—Rabelais: Pantagruel, ii. 2 (1533).

Badger (Will), sir Hugh Robsart's favourite domestic.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Badger (Mr. Bayham), a medical practitioner at Chelsea, under whom Richard Carstone pursues his studies.

Mr. Badger was a crisp-looking gentleman, with "surprised eyes;" very proud of being Mrs. Badger's "third," and always referring to her former two husbands, captain Swosser and professor Dingo.—C. Dickens: Bleak House (1853).

Badinguet [Bad'-en-gay], one of the many nicknames of Napoleon III. It was the name of the mason in whose clothes he escaped from the fortress of Ham (1808, 1851-1873). Napoleon's party was nicknamed Badingueux; the empress's party was nicknamed Montijoeux and Montijocrisses.

Ba'don, Bath. The twelfth great victory of Arthur over the Saxons was at Badon Hill (Bannerdown).

They sang how he himself [king Arthur] at Badon bore that day,
When at the glorious goal his British sceptre lay.
Two days together how the battle strongly stood;
Pendragon's worthy son [king Arthur] . . .
Three hundred Saxons slew with his own valiant hand.
Drayton: Polyolbion, v. (1612).

Badou'ra, daughter of Gaiour (a syl.) king of China, the "most beautiful woman ever seen upon earth." The emperor Gaiour wished her to marry, but she expressed an aversion to wedlock. However, one night by fairy influence she was shown prince Camaral'zaman asleep, fell in love with him, and exchanged rings. Next day she inquired for the prince, but her inquiry was thought so absurd that she was confined as a mad woman. At length her foster-brother solved the difficulty thus: The emperor having proclaimed that whoever cured the princess of her [supposed] madness should have her for his wife, he sent Camaralzaman to play the magician, and imparted the secret to the princess by sending her the ring she had left with the sleeping prince. The cure was instantly effected, and the marriage solemnized with due pomp. When the emperor was informed that his son-in-law was a prince, whose father was sultan of the "Island of the Children of Khal'edan, some twenty days' sail from the coast of Persia," he was delighted with the alliance.—Arabian Nights ("Camaralzaman and Badoura").

Badroul'boudour, daughter of the sultan of China, a beautiful brunette. "Her eyes were large and sparkling, her expression modest, her mouth small, her lips vermilion, and her figure perfect." She became the wife of Aladdin, but twice nearly caused his death; once by exchanging "the wonderful lamp" for a new copper one, and once by giving hospitality to the false Fatima Aladdin killed both these magicians.—Arabian Nights ("Aladdin, or The Wonderful Lamp").

Bæ'tica or Bætic Vale, Grana'da and Andalusia, or Spain in general. So called from the river Bætis or Guadalquivir.

While o'er the Bætic vale
Or thro' the towers of Memphis [Egypt], or the palms
By sacred Ganges watered, I conduct
The English merchant.
Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads.

Bagdad. A hermit told the caliph Almanzor that one Moclas was destined to found a city on the spot where he was standing. "I am that man," said the caliph, and he then informed the hermit how in his boyhood he once stole a bracelet, and his nurse ever after called him "Moclas," the name of a well-known thief.—Marigny.

Bagshot, one of a gang of thieves who conspire to break into the house of lady Bountiful.—Farquhar: The Beaux' Stratagem (1705).

Bagstock (Major Joe), an apoplectic retired military officer, living in Princess's Place, opposite to Miss Tox. The major had a covert kindness for Miss Tox, and was jealous of Mr. Dombey. He speaks of himself as "Old Joe Bagstock," "Old Joey," "Old J.," "Old Josh," "Rough and tough Old Jo," "J. B.," "Old J. B.," and so on. He is also given to over-eating, and to abusing his poor native servant.—C. Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Bah'adar, master of the horse to the king of the Magi. Prince Am'giad was enticed by a collet to enter the minister's house, and when Bahadar returned, he was not a little surprised at the sight of his uninvited guest. The prince, however, explained to him in private how the matter stood, and Bahadar, entering into the fun of the thing, assumed for the nonce the place of a slave. The collet would have murdered him, but Amgiad, to save the minister, cut off her head. Bahadar, being arrested for murder, was condemned to death, but Amgiad came forward and told the whole truth; whereupon Bahadar was instantly released, and Amgiad created vizier.—Arabian Nights ("Amgiad and Assad").

Bahman (Prince), eldest son of the sultan Khrossou-schah of Persia. In infancy he was taken from the palace by the sultana's sisters, and set adrift on a canal; but being rescued by the superintendent of the sultan's gardens, he was brought up, and afterwards restored to the sultan. It was the "talking bird" that told the sultan the tale of the young prince's abduction.

Prince Bahman's Knife. When prince Bahman started on his exploits, he gave to his sister Parizâdê (4 syl.) a knife, saying, "As long as you find this knife clean and bright, you may feel assured that I am alive and well; but if a drop of blood falls from it, you may know that I am no longer alive."—Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters," the last tale).

Bailey, a sharp lad in the service of Todger's boarding-house. His ambition was to appear quite a full-grown man. On leaving Mrs. Todger's, he became the servant of Montague Tigg, manager of the "Anglo-Bengalee Company."—C. Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Bailie (General), a parliamentary leader.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Bailie (Giles), a gipsy; father of Gabrael Faa (nephew to Meg Merrilies).—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Bailiff's Daughter of Islington (in Norfolk). A squire's son loved the bailiff's daughter, but she gave him no encouragement, and his friends sent him to London, "an apprentice for to binde." After the lapse of seven years, the bailiff's daughter, "in ragged attire," set out to walk to London, "her true love to inquire." The young man on horseback met her, but knew her not. "One penny, one penny, kind sir!" she said. "Where were you born?" asked the young man. "At Islington," she replied. "Then prithee, sweetheart, do you know the bailiff's daughter there?" "She's dead, sir, long ago." On hearing this the young man declared he'd live an exile in some foreign land. "Stay, oh stay, thou goodly youth," the maiden cried; "she is not really dead, for I am she." "Then farewell grief and welcome joy, for I have found my true love, whom I feared I should never see again."—Percy: Reliques of English Poetry, ii. 8.

Baillif (Herry), mine host in the Canterbury Tales, by Chaucer (1388). When the poet begins the second fit of the "Rime of Sir Thopas," mine host exclaims—

> No mor of this for Goddês dignitie!
> For thou makest me so wery . . . that > Mine eeres aken for thy nasty speeche.
> v. 15327, etc. (1388).

Bailsou (Ann'aple), the nurse of Effie Deans in her confinement.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Baiser-Lamourette [Lamourette's Kiss], a short-lived reconciliation.

> Il y avait (20 juin, 1792), scission entre les membres de l'Assemblée. Lamourette les exhorta à se reconcilier. Persuadés par son discours, ils s'embrassèrent les uns les autres. Mais cette réconciliation ne dura pas deux jours; et elle fut bientôt ridiculisé sous le nom de Baiser-Lamourette.—Bouillet: Dict. d'Hist., etc.

Bajar'do, Rinaldo's steed.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Baj'azet, surnamed "The Thunderbolt" (il derim), sultan of Turkey. After subjugating Bulgaria, Macedonia, Thessaly, and Asia Minor, he laid siege to Constantinople, but was taken captive by Tamerlane emperor of Tartary. He was fierce as a wolf, reckless, and indomitable. Being asked by Tamerlane how he would have treated him had their lots been reversed, "Like a dog," he cried. "I would have made you my footstool when I mounted my saddle, and, when your services were not needed, would have chained you in a cage like a wild beast." Tamerlane replied, "Then to show you the difference of my spirit, I shall treat you as a king." So saying, he ordered his chains to be struck off, gave him one of the royal tents, and promised to restore him to his throne if he would lay aside his hostility. Bajazet abused this noble generosity; plotted the assassination of Tamerlane; and bowstrung Mone'ses. Finding clemency of no use, Tamerlane commanded him to be used "as a dog, and to be chained in a cage like a wild beast."—Rowe: Tamerlane (a tragedy, 1702).

 This was one of the favourite parts of Spranger Barry (1719–1777) and of J. Kemble (1757–1823).

Bajaset, a black page at St. James's Palace.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Bajura, Mahomet's standard.

Baker (The), and the "Baker's Wife." Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette were so called by the revolutionary party, because on the 6th October, 1789, they ordered a supply of bread to be given to the mob which surrounded the palace at Versailles, clamouring for bread.

Ba'laam (2 syl.), the earl of Huntingdon, one of the rebels in the army of the duke of Mommouth.

And therefore, in the name of dulness, be
The well-hung Balaam.
Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, pt. i. ll. 573, 574.

Ba'laam, a "citizen of sober fame," who lived near the monument of London. While poor he was "religious, punctual, and frugal;" but when he became rich and got knighted, he seldom went to church, became a courtier, "took a bribe from France," and was hung for treason. —Pope: Moral Essays, iii.

Balaam's Ass. (See ARION, p. 59.)

Balacla'va, a corruption of bella chiare ("beautiful port"), so called by the Genoese, who raised the fortress, some portions of which still exist.

Balaclava Charge. (See CHARGE OF THE LIGHT BRIGADE.)

Balafré (Le), alias Ludovic Lesly, an old archer of the Scottish Guard at Plessis les Tours, one of the castle palaces of Louis XI. Le Balafré is uncle to Quentin Durward.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

 Henri, son of François second duke of Guise, was called Le Balafré ("the gashed"), from a frightful scar in the face from a sword-cut in the battle of Dormans (1575).

Balak, in the second part of Dryden and Tate's Absalom and Achitophel (line 395, etc.), was meant for Dr. Burnet, author of the History of the Reformation. He exceedingly disliked Charles II. ("David"); but was made bishop of Salisbury by William III. in 1689. He died in 1715, in the seventy-second year of his age.

The Second Part of Absalom and Achitophel (by Tate) was published in the autumn of 1682.

Balâm', the ox on which the faithful feed in paradise. The fish is call Nûn, the lobes of whose liver will suffice for 70,000 men.

Balan', brother of Balyn or Balin le Savage (q.v.), two of the most valiant knights that the world ever produced.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 31 (1470).

Balan, "the bravest and strongest of all the giant race." Am'adis de Gaul rescued Gabrioletta from his hands.—Vasco de Lobeira: Amadis de Gaul, iv. 129 (fourteenth century).

Balance (Justice), the father of Sylvia. He had once been in the army, and as he had run the gauntlet himself, he could make excuses for the wild pranks of young men.—G. Farquhar: The Recruiting Officer (1704).

Ba'land of Spain, a man of gigantic strength, who called himself "Fierabras." —Mediæval Romance.

Balchris'tie (Jenny), housekeeper to the laird of Dumbiedikes.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Balclu'tha, a town belonging to the Britons on the river Clyde. It fell into the hands of Comhal (Fingal's father), and was burnt to the ground.

"I have seen the walls of Balclutha," said Fingal, "but they were desolate. The fire had resounded in the halls: and the voice of the people is heard no more . . . The thistle shook there its lonely head: the moss whistled in the wind, and the fox looked out from the windows."—Ossian: Carthon.

Baldassa're (4 syl.), chief of the monastery of St. Jacopo di Compostella. —Donizetti: La Favorita (1842).

Bal'der, the god of light, peace, and day, was the young and beautiful son of Odin and Frigga. His palace, Briedablik ("wide-shining"), stood in the Milky Way. He was slain by Höder, the blind old god of darkness and night, but was restored to life at the general request of the gods.—Scandinavian Mythology.

Balder the beautiful
God of the summer sun.
Longfellow: Tegnér's Death.

(Sydney Dobell has a poem entitled Balder, published in 1854.)

Bal'derstone (Caleb), the favourite old butler of the master of Ravenswood, at Wolf's Crag Tower. Being told to provide supper for the laird of Bucklaw, he pretended that there were fat capon and good store in plenty, but all he could produce was "the hinder end of a mutton ham that had been three times on the table already, and the heel of a ewe-milk kebbuck [cheese]" (ch. vii.).—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Baldrick, an ancestor of the lady Eveline Berenger "the betrothed." He was murdered, and lady Eveline assured Rose Flammock that she had seen his ghost frowning at her.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Bal'dringham (The lady Ermengarde of), great-aunt of lady Eveline Berenger "the betrothed."—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

BALDWIN, the youngest and comeliest of Charlemagne's paladins, nephew of sir Roland.

Baldwin, the restless and ambitious duke of Bologna, leader of 1200 horse in the allied Christian army. He was Godfrey's brother, and very like him, but not so tall.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

∴ He is introduced by sir Walter Scott in Count Robert of Paris.

Baldwin. So the Ass is called in the beast-epic entitled Reynard the Fox (the word means "bold friend"). In pt. iii. he is called "Dr." Baldwin (1498).

Bald'win, tutor of Rollo ("the bloody brother") and Otto, dukes of Normandy, and sons of Sophia. Baldwin was put to death by Rollo, because Hamond slew Gisbert the chancellor with an axe and not with a sword. Rollo said that Baldwin deserved death "for teaching Hamond no better."—Beaumont: The Bloody Brother (published 1639).

Baldwin (Count), a fatal example of paternal self-will. He doted on his elder son, Biron, but, because he married against his inclination, disinherited him, and fixed all his love on Carlos his younger son. Biron fell at the siege of Candy, and was supposed to be dead. His wife Isabella mourned for him seven years, and being on the point of starvation, applied to the count for aid, but he drove her from his house like a dog. Villeroy (a syl.) married her, but Biron returned the following day. Carlos, hearing of his brother's return, employed ruffians to murder him, and then charged Villeroy with the crime; but one of the ruffians impeached. Carlos was arrested, and Isabella, going mad, killed herself. Thus was the wilfulness of Baldwin the source of infinite misery. It caused the death of his two sons, as well as of his daughter-in-law.—Southern: The Fatal Marriage (1692).

Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury (1184–1190), introduced by sir W. Scott in The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Baldwin de Oyley, esquire of sir Brian de Bois Guilbert (Preceptor of the Knights Templars).—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Balfour (John), of Burley. A leader of the Covenanters' army. Disguised for a time as Quentin Mackell of Irongray.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Balin (Sir), or "Balin le Savage," knight of the two swords. He was a Northumberland knight, and being taken captive, was imprisoned six months by king Arthur. It so happened that a damsel girded with a sword came to Camelot at the time of sir Balin's release, and told the king that no man could draw it who was tainted with "shame, treachery, or guile." King Arthur and all his knights failed in the attempt, but sir Balin drew it readily. The damsel begged him for the sword, but he refused to give it to any one. Whereupon the damsel said to him, "That sword shall be thy plague, for with it shall ye slay your best friend, and it shall also prove your own death." Then the Lady of the Lake came to the king, and demanded the sword, but sir Balin cut off her head with it, and was banished from the court. After various adventures he came to a castle where the custom was for every guest to joust. He was accommodated with a shield, and rode forth to meet his antagonist. So fierce was the encounter that both the combatants were slain, but Balin lived just long enough to learn that his antagonist was his dearly beloved brother Balan, and both were buried in one tomb.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 27–44 (1470).

∴ "The Book of Sir Balin le Savage" is part i. ch. 27 to 44 (both inclusive) of sir T. Malory's History of Prince Arthur.

Balinverno, one of the leaders in Agramant's allied army.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Ba'liol (Edward), usurper of Scotland, introduced in Redgauntlet, a novel by sir W. Scott (time, George II.).

Ba'liol (Mrs.), friend of Mr. Croftangry, in the introductory chapter of The Fair Maid of Perth, a novel by sir W. Scott (time, Henry IV.).

Ba'liol (Mrs. Arthur Bethune), a lady of quality and fortune, who had a house called Baliol Lodging, Canongate, Edinburgh. At death she left to her cousin Mr. Croftangry two series of tales called The Chronicles of Canongate (q.v.), which he published.—Sir W. Scott: The Highland Widow (introduction, 1827).

Baliol College, Oxford, was founded (in 1263) by John de Baliol, knight, father of Baliol king of Scotland.

Balisar'da, a sword made in the garden of Orgagna by the sorceress Faleri'na; it would cut through even enchanted substances, and was given to Roge'ro for the express purpose of "dealing Orlando's death."—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, xxv. 15 (1516).

He knew with Balisarda's lightest blows,
Nor helm, nor shield, nor cuirass could avail,
Nor strongly tempered plate, nor twisted mail.
Bk. xxiii.

Baliverso, the basest knight in the Saracen army.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Balk or Balkh ["toembrace"], Omurs, surnamed Ghil-Shah ("earth's king"), founder of the Paishdadian dynasty. He travelled abroad to make himself familiar with the laws and customs of other lands. On his return he met his brother, and built on the spot of meeting a city, which he called Balk; and made it the capital of his kingdom.

Balkis, the Arabian name of the queen of Sheba, who went from the South to witness the wisdom and splendour of Solomon. According to the Koran, she was a fire-worshipper. It is said that Solomon raised her to his bed and throne. She is also called queen of Saba or Aaziz. —Al Korân, xxvi. (Sale's notes).

She fancied herself already more potent than Balkis and pictured to her imagination the genii falling pros trate at the foot of her throne.—W. Beckford: Vathek

 Solomon, being told that her legs were covered with hair "like those of an ass," had the presence-chamber floored with glass laid over running water filled with fish. When Balkis approached the room, supposing the floor to be water, she lifted up her robes and exposed her hairy ankles, of which the king had been rightly informed.—Jallalo 'dinn.

Ballendi'no (Don Antonio), in Ben Jonson's comedy called The Case is Altered (1597). Probably intended to ridicule Anthony Munday, the dramatist, who lived 1554–1633, a voluminous writer.

Bal'lenkeiroch (Old), a Highland chief and old friend of Fergus M'Ivor.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Balmung, the sword of Siegfried, forged by Wieland the smith of the Scandinavian gods. In a trial of merit, Wieland cleft Amilias (a brother smith) to the waist; but so fine was the cut that Amilias was not even conscious of it till he attempted to move, when he fell asunder into two pieces.—Nibelungen Lied.

Balni-Barbi, the land of projectors, visited by Gulliver.—Swift: Gulliver's Travels (1726).

Balrud'dery (The laird of), a relation of Godfrey Bertram, laird of Ellangowan. —Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Balsam of Fierabras. "This famous balsam," said don Quixote, "only costs three rials [about sixpence] for three quarts." It was the balsam with which the body of Christ was embalmed, and was stolen by sir Fierabras [Fe-a'-ra-brah]. Such was its virtue, that one single drop of it taken internally would instantly heal the most ghastly wound.

"It is a balsam of balsams: it not only heals all wounds, but even defies death itself. If thou should'st see my body cut in two, friend Sancho, by some unlucky backstroke, you must carefully pick up that half of me which falls on the ground, and clap it upon the other half before the blood congeals, then give me a draught of the balsam of Fierabras, and you will presently see me as sound as an orange."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. ii. 2 1605).

BALTHA'ZAR, a merchant, in Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors (1593).

Baltha'zar, a name assumed by Portia, in Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice (1598).

Baltha'zar, servant to Romeo, in Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet (1597).

Baltha'zar, servant to don Pedro, in Shakespeare's Much Ado about Nothing (1600).

Baltha'zar, one of the three "kings" shown in Cologne Cathedral as one of the "Magi" led to Bethlehem by the guiding star. The word means "lord of treasures." The names of the other two are Melchior ("king of light"), and Gaspar or Caspar ("the white one"). Klopstock, in The Messiah, makes six "Wise Men," and none of the names are like these three.

Balthasar, father of Juliana, Volantê, and Zam'ora. A proud, peppery, and wealthy gentleman. His daughter Juliana married the duke of Aranza; his second daughter, Volante (3 syl.), married the count Montalban; and Zamora married signor Rinaldo.—J. Tobin: The Honeymoon (1804).

Baltic (The Battle of the), a lyric by Thomas Campbell (1809). This battle (April 10, 1801) was in reality the bombardment of Copenhagen by lord Nelson and admiral Parker. In their engagement with the Danish fleet, 18 out of 23 ships of the line were taken and destroyed by the British. The poem says—

Of Nelson and the North
Sing the glorious day's renown,

When to battle fierce came forth
All the might of Denmark's crown . . .
It was ro of April mora . . .
[When fell the Danes] in Elsinore.

Balue (Cardinal), in the court of Louis XI. of France (1420–1491), introduced by sir W. Scott in Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Balugantes (4 syl.), leader of the men from Leon, in Spain, and in alliance with Agramant.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Balveny (Lord), kinsman of the earl of Douglas.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Balwhidder [Bāl'-wither], a Scotch presbyterian pastor, filled with all the old-fashioned national prejudices, but sincere, kind-hearted, and pious. He is garrulous and loves his joke, but is quite ignorant of the world, being "in it but not of it."—Galt: Annals of the Parish (1821).

The Rev. Micah Balwhidder is a fine representation of the primitive Scottish pastor; diligent, blameless, loyal, and exemplary in his life, but without the fiery zeal and "kirk-filling eloquence" of the supporters of the Covenant.—R. Chambers: English Literature, ii. 591.

Baly, one of the ancient and gigantic kings of India, who founded the city called by his name. He redressed wrongs, upheld justice, was generous and truthful, compassionate and charitable, so that at death he became one of the judges of hell. His city in time got overwhelmed with the encroaching ocean, but its walls were not overthrown, nor were the rooms encumbered with the weeds and alluvial of the sea. One day a dwarf, named Vamen, asked the mighty monarch to allow him to measure three of his own paces for a hut to dwell in. Baly smiled, and bade him measure out what he required. The first pace of the dwarf compassed the whole earth, the second the whole heavens, and the third the infernal regions. Baly at once perceived that the dwarf was Vishnû, and adored the present deity. Vishnu made the king "Governor of Pad'alon" or hell, and permitted him once a year to revisit the earth, on the first full moon of November.

Baly built
A city, like the cities of the gods,
Being like a god himself. For many an age
Hath ocean warred against his palaces,
Till overwhelmed they lie beneath the waves,
Not overthrown.
Southey: Curse of Kehama, xv. 1 (1809).

Bampton Lectures (The), founded by John Bampton, canon of Salisbury, who died in 1751. These lectures were designed to confirm the Catholic faith and confute heresies. The first of the series was delivered in 1780.

Ban, king of Benwick [Brittany], father of sir Launcelot, and brother of Bors king of Gaul. This "shadowy king of a still more shadowy kingdom" came over with his royal brother to the aid of Arthur, when, at the beginning of his reign, the eleven kings leagued against him (pt. i. 8).

Yonder I see the most valiant knight of the world, and the man of most renown; for such two brethren as are king Ban and king Bors are not living.—Sir T. Malory. History of Prince Arthur, i. 14 (1470).

Ban'agher, a town in Ireland, on the Shannon (King's County). It formerly sent two members to parliament, and was a pocket borough. When a member spoke of a rotten borough, he could devise no stronger expression than That beats Banagher, which passed into a household phrase.

Banastar (Humfrey), brought up by Henry duke of Buckingham, and advanced by him to honour and wealth. He professed to love the duke as his dearest friend; but when Richard III. offered £1000 reward to any one who would deliver up the duke, Banastar betrayed him to John Mitton, sheriff of Shropshire, and he was conveyed to Salisbury, where he was beheaded. The ghost of the duke prayed that Banaster's eldest son, "reft of his wits might end his life in a pigstye;" that his second son might "be drowned in a dyke" containing less than "half a foot of water;" that his only daughter might be a leper; and that Banaster himself might "live in death and die in life."—Sackville: A Mirrour for Magistraytes ("The Complaynt," 1587).

Banberg (The bishop of), introduced in Donnerhugel's narrative.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Banbury Cheese. Bardolph calls Slender a "Banbury cheese" [Merry Wives of Windsor, act i. sc. 1]; and in Jack Drum's Entertainment we read, "You are like a Banbury cheese, nothing but paring." The Banbury cheese alluded to was a milk cheese, about an inch in thickness.

Bandy-legged, Armand Gouffé (1775–1845), also called Le panard du dix-neuvième siècle. He was one of the founders of the "Caveau moderne."

Bane of the Land [Landschaden], the name given to a German robber-knight on account of his reckless depredations on his neighbours' property. He was placed under the ban of the empire for his offences.

Bango'rian Controversy, a theological paper-war begun by Dr. Hoadly, bishop of Bangor, the best reply being by Law. The subject of this controversy was a sermon preached before George I., on the text, "My kingdom is not of this world" (1717).

Banks, a farmer, the great terror of old mother Sawyer, the witch of Edmonton.—The Witch of Edmonton (by Rowley, Dekker, and Ford, 1658).

Banks o' Yarrow (The), a "Scotch" ballad, describing how two brothers-in-law designed to fight a duel on the banks of Yarrow, but one of them laid an ambush and slew the other. The anguish of the widow is the chief charm of the ballad.

Ban'natyne Club, a literary club which takes its name from George Bannatyne. It was instituted in 1823 by sir Walter Scott, and had for its object the publication of rare works illustrative of Scottish history, poetry, and general literature. The club was dissolved in 1859.

Bannockburn (in Stirling), famous for the great battle between Bruce and Edward II., in which the English army was totally defeated, and the Scots regained their freedom (June 24, 1314).

> Departed spirits of the mighty dead! . . .
> Oh! once again to Freedom's cause return
> The patriot Tell, the Bruce of Bannockburn.
> Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, i. (1799).

Banquo, a Scotch general of royal extraction, in the time of Edward the Confessor. He was murdered at the instigation of king Macbeth, but his son Fleance escaped, and from this Fleance descended a race of kings who filled the throne of Scotland, ending with James I. of England, in whom were united the two crowns. It was the ghost of Banquo which haunted Macbeth. The witches on the blasted heath hailed Banquo as—

> (1) Lesser than Macbeth, and greater.
> (2) Not so happy, yet much happier.
> (3) Thou shalt get kings, though thou be none.
> Shakespeare: Macbeth, act i. sc. 3 (1606).

(Historically, no such person as Banquo ever existed, and therefore Fleance was not the ancestor of the house of Stuart.)

Ban'shee. (See BENSHEE.)

Bantam (Angelo Cyrus), grand-master of the ceremonies at "Ba-ath," and a very mighty personage in the opinion of the élite of Bath.—C. Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Banting. Doing Banting means living by regimen for the sake of reducing superfluous fat. William Banting, an undertaker, was at one time a very fat man, but he resolved to abstain from beer, farinaceous foods, and all vegetables, his chief diet being meat (1796–1878).

Bap, a contraction of Bap'homet, i.e. Mahomet. An imaginary idol or symbol which the Templars were accused of employing in their mysterious religious rites. It was a small human figure cut in stone, with two heads, one male and the other female, but all the rest of the figure was female. Specimens still exist.

Bap'tes (2 syl.), priests of the goddess Cotytto, whose midnight orgies were so obscene as to disgust even the very goddess of obscenity. (Greek, bapto, "to baptize," because these priests bathed themselves in the most effeminate manner.)—Juvenal: Satires, ii. 91.

Baptis'ta, a rich gentleman of Padua, father of Kathari'na "the shrew" and Bianca.—Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew (1594).

Baptisti Damiotti, a Paduan quack, who shows in the enchanted mirror a picture representing the clandestine marriage and infidelity of sir Philip Forester.—Sir W. Scott: Aunt Margaret's Mirror (time, William III.).

Bar of Gold. A bar of gold above the instep is a mark of sovereign rank in the women of the families of the deys, and is worn as a "crest" by their female relatives.

> Around, as princess of her father's land,
> A like gold bar, above her instep rolled,
> Announced her rank.
> Byron: Don Juan, iii. 72 (1820).

Bar'abas, the faithful servant of Ralph de Lascours, captain of the Uran'ia. His favourite expression is "I am afraid;" but he always acts most bravely when he is afraid. (See BARRABAS.)—E. Stirling: The Orphan of the Frozen Sea (1856).

Bar'adas (Count), the king's favourite, first gentleman of the chamber, and one of the conspirators to dethrone Louis XIII., kill Richelieu, and place the duc d'Orléans on the throne of France. Baradas loved Julie, but Julie married the chevalier Adrien de Mauprat. When Richelieu fell into disgrace, the king made count Baradas his chief minister; but scarcely had he done so when a despatch was put into his hand, revealing the conspiracy, and Richelieu ordered the instant arrest of the conspirator.—Lord Lytton: Richelieu (1839).

Barak el Hadgi, the fakir', an emissary from the court of Hyder Ali.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Barata'ria, the island-city over which Sancho Panza was appointed governor. The table was presided over by Dr. Pedro Rezio de Ague'ro, who caused every dish set before the governor to be whisked away without being tasted,—some because they heated the blood, and others because they chilled it, some for one evil effect, and some for another, so that Sancho was allowed to eat nothing.

Sancho then arrived at a town containing about a thousand inhabitants. They gave him to understand that it was called the Island of Barataria, either because Barataria was really the name of the place, or because he obtained the government barato, i.e. "at a cheap rate." On his arrival near the gates of the town, the municipal officers came out to receive him. Presently after, with certain ridiculous ceremonies, they presented him with the keys of the town, and constituted him perpetual governor of the island of Barataria.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iii. 7, etc. (1615).

Barbara Allan, a ballad by Allan Ramsay (1724); inserted in Percy's Reliques. The tale is that sir John Grehme was dying out of love to Barbara Allan. Barbara went to see him, and, drawing aside the curtain, said, "Young man, I think ye're dyan'." She then left him; but had not gone above a mile or so when she heard the death-bell toll.

O mither, mither, mak' my bed . . .
Since my love died for me to-day,
I se die for him to-morrow.

Barbarossa ["red beard"], surname of Frederick I. of Germany (1121–1190). It is said that he never died, but is still sleeping in Kyffhäuserberg in Thuringia. There he sits at a stone table with his six knights, waiting the "fulness of time," when he will come from his cave to rescue Germany from bondage, and give her the foremost place of all the world. His beard has already grown through the table-slab, but must wind itself thrice round the table before his second advent. (See MANSUR, CHARLEMAGNE, ARTHUR, DESMOND, SEBASTIAN I., to whom similar legends are attributed.)

Like Barbarossa, who sits in a cave,
Taciturn, sombre, sedate, and grave.
Longfellow: The Golden Legend.

¶ Ogier the Dane, one of Charlemagne's paladins, was immured with his crown in a vault at Cronenberg Castle, till his beard grew through a stone table, which was burst in two when he raised his head upon the spell being dissolved.—Torfæns: History of Norway, vol. i. bk. 8.

Barbarossa, a tragedy by John Brown. This is not Frederick Barbarossa, the emperor of Germany (1121–1190), but Horuc Barbarossa, the corsair (1475–1519). He was a regenade Greek, of Mitylênê, who made himself master of Algeria, which was for a time subject to Turkey. He killed the Moorish king; tried to cut off Selim the son, but without success; and wanted to marry Zaphi'ra, the king's widow, who rejected his suit with scorn, and was kept in confinement for seven years. Selim returned unexpectedly to Algiers, and a general rising took place; Barbarossa was slain by the insurgents; Zaphira was restored to the throne; and Selim her son married Irenê the daughter of Barbarossa (1742).

Bar'bary (St.), the patron saint of arsenals. When her father was about to strike off her head, she was killed by a flash of lightning.

Bar'bary (Roan), the favourite horse of Richard II.

Bolingbroke rode on roan Barbary,
That horse that thou so often hast bestrid!
Shakespeare: Richard II. act v. sc. 5 (1597).

Bar'bason, the name of a demon mentioned in The Merry Wives of Windsor, act ii. sc. 2 (1596).

I am not Barbason; you cannot conjure me.—Shakespeare: Henry V. act ii. sc. 1 (1599).

Barco'chebah, an antichrist.

Shared the fall of the antichrist Barcochebah.—Professor Selwin: Ecce Homo.

Bard (The), a Pindaric ode by Gray (1757), founded on a tradition that Edward I., having conquered Wales, ordered all its bards to be put to death. A bard is supposed to denounce the king, and predict the evil which would befall his race, which would be superseded by the Tudors, "the genuine kings" of Britain; when Wales will give us Elizabeth, "the glory" of the world; and a future dazzling to "his aching sight."

Bard of Avon, Shakespeare, born and buried at Stratford-upon-Avon (1564–1616). Also called the Bard of all Times.

N.B.—Beaumont also died in 1616.

Bard of Ayrshire, Robert Burns, a native of Ayrshire (1759–1796).

Bard of Hope, Thomas Campbell, author of The Pleasures of Hope (1777–1844).

Bard of the Imagination, Mark Akenside, author of The Pleasures of the Imagination (1721–1770).

Bard of Memory, S. Rogers, author of The Pleasures of Memory (1762–1855).

Bard of Olney, W. Cowper [Coo'-per], who lived for many years at Olney, in Bucks. (1731–1800).

Bard of Prose, Boccaccio (1313–1375).

> He of the hundred tales of love.
> Byron. Childe Harold, iv. 56 (1818).

Bard of Rydal Mount, William Wordsworth, who lived at Rydal Mount; also called the Poet of the Excursion, from his principal poem (1770–1850).

Bard of Twickenham, Alexander Pope, who lived at Twickenham (1688–1744).

Bards. The ancient Gaels thought that the soul of a dead hero could never be happy till a bard had sung an elegy over the deceased. Hence when Cairbar, the usurper of the throne of Ireland, fell, though he was a rebel, a murderer, and a coward, his brother Cathmor could not endure the thought of his soul being unsung to rest. So he goes to Ossian, and gets him to send a bard "to give the soul of the king to the wind, to open to it the airy hall, and to give joy to the darkened ghost."—Ossian: Temora, ii.

Bardell (Mrs.), landlady of "apartments for single gentlemen" in Goswell Street. Here Mr. Pickwick lodged for a time. She persuaded herself that he would make her a good second husband, and on one occasion was seen in his arms by his three friends. Mrs. Bardell put herself in the hands of Messrs. Dodson and Fogg (two unprincipled lawyers), who vamped up a case against Mr. Pickwick of "breach of promise," and obtained a verdict against the defendant. Subsequently Messrs. Dodson and Fogg arrested their own client, and lodged her in the Fleet.—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Barde'sanist (4 syl.), a follower of Barde'san, founder of a Gnostic sect in the second century.

Bar'dolph, corporal of captain Sir John Falstaff in 1 and 2 Henry IV. and in The Merry Wives of Windsor. In Henry V. he is promoted to lieutenant, and Nym is co-poral. Both are hanged. Bardolph is a bravo, but great humorist; he is a low-bred, drunken swaggerer, wholly without principle, and always poor. His red, pimply nose is an everlasting joke with sir John and others. Sir John in allusion thereto calls Bardolph "The Knight of the Burning Lamp." He says to him, "Thou art our admiral, and bearest the lantern in the poop." Elsewhere he tells the corporal he had saved him a "thousand marks in links and torches, walking with him in the night betwixt tavern and tavern."—Shakespeare.

> We are much of the mind of Falstaff's tailor. We must have better assurance for sir John than Bardolph's.—Macaulay.

(The reference is to 2 Henry IV. act i. sc. 2. When Falstaff asks Page, "What said Master Dumbleton about the satin for my short cloak and slops?" Page replies, "He said, sir, you should procure him better assurance than Bardolph. He . . . liked not the security.")

Bardon (Hugh), the scout-master in the troop of lieutenant Fitzurse.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Barère (2 syl.), an advocate of Toulouse, called "The Anacreon of the Guillotine." He was president of the Convention, a member of the Constitutional Committee, and chief agent in the condemnation to death of Louis XVI. As member of the Committee of Public Safety, he decreed that "Terror must be the order of the day." In the first empire Barère bore no public part, but at the restoration he was banished from France, and retired to Brussels (1755–1841).

> The filthiest and most spiteful Yahoo was a noble creature compared with Barrière [sic] of history.—Macaulay.

Bar'guest, a goblin armed with teeth and claws. It would sometimes set up in the streets a most fearful scream in the "dead waste and middle of the night." The faculty of seeing this monster was limited to a few, but those who possessed it could by the touch communicate the "gift" to others.—Fairy Mythology, North of England.

Bar'gulus, an Illyrian robber or pirate.

> Bargulus, Illyrius latro, de quo est apud Theopompum magnas opes habuit.—Cicero: De Officiis, ii. 11.

Barioondo, one of the leaders of the Moorish army. He was slain by the duke of Clarence.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Barker (Mr.), friend to Sowerberry. Mrs. Barker, his wife.—W. Brough: A Phenomenon in a Smock Frock.

Bar'kis, the carrier who courted [Clara] Peggot'ty, by telling David Copperfield when he wrote home to say to his nurse, "Barkis is willin'." Clara took the hint and became Mrs. Barkis.

He dies when the tide goes out, confirming the superstition that people can't die till the tide goes out, or be born till it is in. The last words he utters are "Barkis is willin'."—Dickens: David Copperfield, xxx. (1849).

(Mrs. Quickly says of sir John Falstaff, "'A parted even just between twelve and one, e'en at the turning o' the tide."—Henry V. act ii. sc. 3, 1599.)

Bar'laham and Josaphat, the heroes and title of a minnesong, the object of which was to show the triumph of Christian doctrines over paganism. Barlaham is a hermit who converts Josaphat, an Indian prince. This "lay" was immensely popular in the Middle Ages, and has been translated into every European language.—Rudolf of Ems (a minnesinger, thirteenth century).

("Barlaham," frequently spelt "Barlaam." The romance was originally in Greek, ninth century, and erroneously ascribed to John Damascene. There was a Latin version in the thirteenth century, to which Rudolf was indebted. For plot, see JOSAPHAT.)

Barley (Bill), Clara's father. Chiefly remarkable for drinking rum, and thumping on the floor. He lived at Chink's Barn, Mill-pond Bank.

His dinner consisted of two mutton-chops, three potatoes, some split peas, a little flour, 2 ozs. of butter, a pinch of salt, and a lot of black pepper, all stewed together, and eaten hot.

Clara Barley, daughter of the above. A "pretty, gentle, dark-eyed girl," who marries Herbert Pocket.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1861).

Barleycorn (Sir John), Malt-liquor personified. His neighbours vowed that sir John should die, so they hired ruffians to "plough him with ploughs and bury him;" this they did, and afterwards "combed him with harrows and thrust clods on his head," but did not kill him. Then with hooks and sickles they "cut his legs off at the knees," bound him like a thief, and left him "to wither with the wind," but he died not. They now "rent him to the heart," and having "mowed him in a mow," sent two bravos to beat him with clubs, and they beat him so sore that "all his flesh fell from his bones," but yet he died not. To a kiln they next hauled him, and burnt him like a martyr, but he survived the burning. They crushed him between two stones, but killed him not. Sir John bore no malice for this ill usage, but did his best to cheer the flagging spirits even of his worst persecutors.

∴ This song, from the English Dancing-Master (1651), is generally ascribed to Robert Burns, but all that the Scotch poet did was slightly to alter parts of it. The same may be said of "Auld Lang Syne" (see p. 76), "Ca'. the Yowes," "My Heart is Sair for Somebody," "Green grow the Rashes, O!" and several other songs, set down to the credit of Burns.

Barlow, the favourite archer of Henry VIII. He was jocosely created by the merry monarch "duke of Shoreditch," and his two companions "marquis of Islington" and "earl of Pancras."

Barlow (Billy), a jester, who fancied himself a "mighty potentate." He was well known in the east of London, and died in Whitechapel workhouse. Some of his sayings were really witty, and some of his attitudes truly farcical.

Bar'mecide Feast, a mere dream-feast; an illusion; a castle in the air. Schacabac "the hare-lipped," a man in the greatest distress, one day called on the rich Barmecide, who in merry jest asked him to dine with him. Barmecide first washed in hypothetical water, Schacabac followed his example. Barmecide then pretended to eat of various dainties, Schacabac did the same, and praised them highly, and so the "feast" went on to the close. The story says Barmecide was so pleased that Schacabac had the good sense and good temper to enter into the spirit of the joke without resentment, that he ordered in a real banquet, at which Schacabac was a welcome guest.—Arabian Nights ("The Barber's Sixth Brother").

Bar'nabas (St.), a disciple of Gamaliel, cousin of St. Mark, and fellow-labourer with St. Paul. He was martyred at Salamis, A.D. 63. St. Barnabas' Day is June 11.—Acts iv. 36, 37.

Bar'naby (Widow), the title and chief character of a novel by Mrs. Trollope (1839). The widow is a vulgar, pretentious husband-hunter, wholly without principle. Widow Barnaby has a sequel called The Barnabys in America, or The Widow Married, a satire on America and the Americans (1840).

Barnaby, an old dance with a quick movement.

> "Bounce!" cries the port-hole; out they fly,
> And make the world dance "Barnaby."

Barnaby Rudge, a half-witted lad, whose companion was a raven. He was allured into joining the Gordon rioters, and was condemned to death, but reprieved. —Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841). (See RUDGE.)

Barnacle, brother of old Nicholas Cockney, and guardian of Priscilla Tomboy of the West Indies. Barnacle is a tradesman of the old school, who thinks the foppery and extravagance of the "Cockney" school inconsistent with prosperous shop-keeping. Though brusque and even ill-mannered, he has good sense and good discernment of character.—The Romp (altered from Bickerstaff's Love in the City).

Barn-burners, ultra-radicals or destructives, who burnt the barns in order to reform social and political abuses. These wiseacres were about as sapient as the Dutchman who burnt down his barns to get rid of the rats which infested them.

Barnardine, introduced in the last scene of Measure for Measure, but only to be reprieved by the duke.

> Sirrah, thou art said to have a stubborn soul,
> That apprehends no further than this world,
> And squar'st thy life according.
> Shakespeare: Measure for Measure, act v. sc. 1.

Barne Bishop (A), a boy-bishop. Barne = a child.

Barnes (1 syl.), servant to colonel Mannering, at Woodburne.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

"Barnevelt (Esdras) Apoth," the pseudonym assumed by Pope, when, in 1715, he published a Key to his Rape of the Lock.

Barney, a repulsive Jew, who waited on the customers at the low public-house frequented by Fagin and his associates. Barney always spoke through his nose.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Barn'stable (Lieutenant), in the British navy, in love with Kate Plowden, niece of colonel Howard of New York. The alliance not being approved of, Kate is removed from England to America, but Barnstable goes to America to discover her retreat. In this he succeeds, but, being seized as a spy, is commanded by colonel Howard to be hung to the yardarm of an American frigate called the Alacrity. Scarcely is the young man led off, when the colonel is informed that Barnstable is his own son, and he arrives at the scene of execution just in time to save him. Of course after this he marries the lady of his affection.—E. Fitzball: The Pilot (a burletta).

Barnwell (George), the chief character and title of a tragedy by George Lillo. George Barnwell is a London apprentice, who falls in love with Sarah Millwood of Shoreditch, who leads him astray. He first robs his master of £200. He next robs his uncle, a rich grazier at Ludlow, and murders him. Having spent all the money of his iniquity, Sarah Millwood turns him off and informs against him. Both are executed (1732).

 For many years this play was acted on boxing-night, as a useful lesson to London apprentices.

> A gentleman . . . called one day on David Ross (1728-1790) the actor, and told him his father, who lay at the point of death, greatly desired to see him. When the actor was at the bed-side, the dying man said, "Mr. Ross, some forty years ago, like 'George Barnwell,' I wronged my master to supply the unbounded extravagance of a 'Millwood.' I took her to see your performance, which so shocked me that I vowed to break the connection and return to the path of virtue. I kept my resolution, replaced the money I had stolen, and found a 'Maria' in my master's daughter. I soon succeeded to my master's business, and have bequeathed you £1000 in my will."—Pitheum: Chronicles of Crime.

Baron (The old English), a romance by Clara Reeve (1777).

Barons (The Last of the), an historical novel by lord Lytton (1843). Supposed to be during the time of the "Wars of the Roses." The hero is Richard Neville earl of Warwick, called the "King-Maker," whose downfall is the main gist of the story. It is an excellent romance.

Barons (Wars of the), an insurrection of the barons against Henry III. It broke out in 1262, and terminated in 1265, when Simon de Montfort was slain in the battle of Evesham.

 Sometimes the uprising of the barons (1215-1216) to compel king John to sign Magna Charta, is called "The Barons' War," or "The War of the Barons."

Bar'rabas, the rich "Jew of Malta." He is simply a human monster, who kills in sport, poisons whole nunneries, and invents infernal machines. Shakespeare's

"Shylock" has a humanity in the very whirlwind of his resentment, but Marlowe's "Barrabas" is a mere ideal of that "thing" which Christian prejudice once deemed a Jew. (See BARABAS, p. 87.)—Marlowe: The Jew of Malta (1586).

Bar'rabas, the famous robber and murderer set free instead of Christ by desire of the Jews. Called in the New Testament Barab'bas. Marlowe calls the word "Barrabas" in his Jew of Malta; and Shakespeare says—

> Would any of the stock of Bar'rabas
> Had been her husband, rather than a Christian!
> Merchant of Venice, act iv. sc. 1 (1598).

Barry Cornwall, the pseudonym of Bryan Waller Procter. It is an imperfect anagram of his name (1788–1874).

Barsad (John), alias Solomon Pross, a spy.

> He had an aquiline nose, but not straight, having a peculiar inclination towards the left cheek; expression, therefore, sinister.—Dickens: A Tale of Two Cities ii. 16 (1859).

Barsis'a (Santon), in The Guardian, the basis of the story called The Monk, by M. G. Lewis (1796).

Barston, alias captain Fenwicke, a jesuit and secret correspondent of the countess of Derby.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Barthol'omew (Brother), guide of the two Philipsons on their way to Strasburg.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Barthol'omew (St.). His day is August 24, and his symbol a knife, in allusion to the knife with which he is said to have been flayed alive.

Bartholomew Fair, a comedy by Ben Jonson (1614). It gives a good picture of the manners and amusements of the times.

Bartholomew Massacre. The great slaughter of the French huguenots [protestants] in the reign of Charles IX., begun on St. Bartholomew's Eve, 1572, In this persecution we are told some 30,000 persons were massacred in cool blood. Some say more than double that number.

Bartholomew Pigs. Nares says these pigs were real animals roasted and sold piping hot in the Smithfield fair. Dr. Johnson thinks they were the "tidy boar-pigs" made of flour with currants for their eyes. Falstaff calls himself

> A little tidy Bartholomew boar-pig.
> Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 4 (1598).

Bartoldo, a rich old miser, who died of fear and want of sustenance. Fazio rifled his treasures, and, at the accusation of his own wife, was tried and executed.—Dean Milman: Fazio (1815).

Bartole (2 syl.), a French lawyer of the fourteenth century, whose authority amongst French barristers is equal to that of Blackstone in our own courts. Hence the French proverb, He knows his "Bartole" as well as a cordelier his "Dormi." The Dormi is an anonymous compilation of sermons, for the use of the cordeliers, or preaching monks.

> Bartole, or Bartolus of Sasso-Ferrato, in Umbria (1313–1356), practised law in Pisa and Perouse. His great book was Commentaries on the Corpus Juris Civilis. Bartole was called "The Coryphæus of the Interpreters of Law."

Bartole or Bartoldo, a man who sees nothing in anything, quite used up. This is not the lawyer referred to above, but Bartoldo or Bartole, the hero of an Italian tale by Crocê, and very popular in the early part of the seventeenth century. This Bartoldo was a comedian by profession, and replies to everything, "I see nothing in it." He treats kings and princes with no more ceremony than he does beggars and sweeps. From this character comes the French phrase, Résolu comme Bartole, "qui veut dire, un homme qui rien ne déconcerte."—Hilaire de Gai.

Bar'tolus, a covetous lawyer, husband of Amaran'ta.—Fletcher: The Spanish Curate (1622).

Barton (Sir Andrew), a Scotch sea-officer, who had obtained in 1511 letters of marque for himself and his two sons, to make reprisals upon the subjects of Portugal. The council-board of England, at which the earl of Surrey presided, was daily pestered by complaints from British merchants and sailors against Barton, and at last it was decided to put him down. Two ships were therefore placed under the commands of sir Thomas and sir Edward Howard—an engagement took place, and sir Andrew Barton was slain, bravely fighting. A ballad in two parts, called "Sir Andrew Barton," is inserted in Percy's Reliques, II. ii. 12.

Baruch. Dites, donc, avez-vous lu Baruch? Said when a person puts an unexpected question, or makes a startling proposal. It arose thus: Lafontaine went one day with Racine to tenebræ, and was given a Bible. He turned at random to the "Prayer of the Jews," in Baruch, and was so struck with it that he said aloud to Racine, "Dites, donc, who was this Baruch? Why, do you know, man, he was a fine genius;" and for some days afterwards the first question he asked his friends was, Dites, donc, Mons., avez-vous lu Baruch?

Barzil'lai (3 syl.), the duke of Ormond, a friend and firm adherent of Charles II. As Barzillai assisted David when he was expelled by Absalom from his kingdom, so Ormond assisted Charles II. when he was in exile.

> Barzillai, crowned with honours and with years, . . .
> In exile with his god-like prince he mourned,
> For him he suffered, and with him returned.
> Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, l. 756–760.

Bas Bleu [Bah . . .]. A Bas Bleu is a book-wise woman. In 1786 Hannah More published a poem called "The Bas Bleu, or Conversation," in praise of the Bas Bleu Club, which met at the house of Mrs. Montagu, its foundress. The following couplet is memorable—

> In men this blunder still you find,
> All think their little set "Mankind."

Basa-Andre, the wild woman, a sorceress, married to Basa-Jaun, a sort of vampire. Basa-Andre sometimes is a sort of land mermaid (a beautiful lady who sits in a cave combing her locks with a golden comb). (See below.)

Basa-Jaun, a wood-sprite, married to Basa-Andre, a sorceress. Both hated the sound of church-bells. Three brothers and their sister agreed to serve him, but the wood-sprite used to suck blood from the finger of the girl; and the brothers resolved to kill him. This they accomplished. The Basa-Andre induced the girl to put a tooth into each of the foot-baths of her brothers, and, lo! they became oxen. The girl, crossing a bridge, saw Basa-Andre, and said if she did not restore her brothers she would put her into a red-hot oven; so Basa-Andre told the girl to give each brother three blows on the back with a hazel wand, and on so doing they were restored to their proper forms.—Rev. W. Webster: Basque Legends, 49 (1877).

Bashful Man (The), a comic drama by W. T. Moncrieff. Edward Blushington, a young man just come into a large fortune, was so bashful and shy that life was a misery to him. He dined at Friendly Hall, and made all sorts of ridiculous blunders. His college chum, Frank Friendly, sent word to say that he and his sister Dinah, with sir Thomas and lady Friendly, would dine with him at Blushington House. After a few glasses of wine, Edward lost his shyness, made a long speech, and became the accepted suitor of Dinah Friendly.

Basil, the blacksmith of Grand Pré, in Acadia (now Nova Scotia), and father of Gabriel the betrothed of Evangeline. When the colony was driven into exile in 1713 by George II., Basil settled in Louisiana, and greatly prospered; but his son led a wandering life, looking for Evangeline, and died in Pennsylvania of the plague. — Longfellow: Evangeline (1849).

Basil (Count), a drama by Joanna Baillie (1802). One of her series on the Passions.

Ba'sile (2 syl.), a calumniating, niggardly bigot in Le Mariage de Figaro, and again in Le Barbier de Séville, both by Beaumarchais. "Basile" and "Tartuffe" are the two French incarnations of religious hypocrisy. The former is the clerical humbug, and the latter the lay religious hypocrite. Both deal largely in calumny, and trade in slander.

Basil'ia, an hypothetical island in the northern ocean, famous for its amber. Mannert says it is the southern extremity of Sweden, erroneously called an island. It is an historical fact that the ancients drew their chief supply of amber from the shores of the Baltic.

Basil'ikon Doron, a collection of precepts on the art of government. It was composed by James I. of England for the benefit of his eldest son, Henry, and published in 1599.

Basilis'co, a bully and a braggart, in Soliman and Perseda (1592). Shakespeare has made "Pistol" the counterpart of "Basilisco."

> Knight, knight, good mother, Basilisco-like.
> Shakespeare: King John, act i. sc. 1 (1596).

(That is, "my boasting like Basilisco has made me a knight, good mother.")

Bas'ilisk, supposed to kill with its gaze the person who looked on it. Thus Henry VI. says to Suffolk, "Come, basilisk, and kill the innocent gazer with thy sight."

> Natus in ardenti Lydiæ basiliscus arena
> Vulnerat aspectu, luminibusque nocet.
> Marbodæus.

Basilius, a neighbour of Quiteria, whom he loved from childhood; but when grown up, the father of the lady forbade him the house, and promised Quiteria in marriage to Camacho the richest man of the vicinity. On their way to church they passed Basilius, who had fallen on his sword, and all thought he was at the point of death. He prayed Quiteria to marry him, "for his soul's peace," and as it was deemed a mere ceremony, they were married in due form. Up then started the wounded man, and showed that the stabbing was only a ruse, and the blood that of a sheep from the slaughter-house. Camacho gracefully accepted the defeat, and allowed the preparations for the general feast to proceed.

Basilius is strong and active, pitches the bar admirably, wrestles with amazing dexterity, and is an excellent cricketer. He runs like a buck, leaps like a wild goat, and plays at skittles like a wizard. Then he has a fine voice for singing, he touches the guitar so as to make it speak, and handles a foil as well as any fencer in Spain.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. ii. 4 (1615).

Baskerville (A), an edition of the New Testament and Latin classics, brought out by John Baskerville, a famous printer (1706–1775).

Basket. Paul escaped from Damascus by being "let down over the wall in a basket" (Acts ix. 25). Caroloscadt, the image-breaker, in 1524, escaped his persecutors at Rotenburg, by "being let down over the wall in a basket."—Milman: Ecclesiastical History, iv. p. 266.

Basrig or Bagsecg, a Scandinavian king, who with Halden or Halfdene (2 syl.) king of Denmark, in 871, made a descent on Wessex. In this year Ethelred fought nine pitched battles with the Danes. The first was the battle of Englefield, in Berkshire, lost by the Danes; the next was the battle of Reading, won by the Danes; the third was the famous battle of Æscesdun or Ashdune (now Ashton), lost by the Danes, and in which king Bagsecg was slain.

And Ethelred with them [the Danes] nine sundry fields that fought . . .
Then Reading ye regained, led by that valiant lord,
Where Basrig ye outbraved, and Halden sword to sword.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xii. (1613).

Next year (871) the Danes for the first time entered Wessex. . . . The first place they came to was Reading. . . . Nine great battles, besides smaller skirmishes, were fought this year, in some of which the English won, and in others the Danes. First, alderman Æthelwulf fought the Danes at Englefield, and beat them. Four days after that there was another battle at Reading . . . where the Danes had the better of it, and Æthelwulf was killed. Four days afterwards there was another more famous battle at Æscesdun . . . and king Æthelred fought against the two kings, and slew Bagsecg with his own hand.—E. A. Freeman: Old English History (1869).
See Asser: Life of Alfred (ninth century).

Bassa'nio, the lover of Portia, successful in his choice of the three caskets, which awarded her to him as wife. It was for Bassanio that his friend Antonio borrowed 3000 ducats of the Jew Shylock, on the strange condition that if he returned the loan within three months no interest should be required, but if not, the Jew might claim a pound of Antonio's flesh for forfeiture.—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice (1598).

Bas'set (Count), a swindler and forger, who assumed the title of "count" to further his dishonest practices.—C. Cibber: The Provoked Husband (1728).

Bassia'nus, brother of Satur'nius emperor of Rome, in love with Lavin'ia daughter of Titus Andron'icus (properly Andronicus). He is stabbed by Deme'trius and Chiron, sons of Tam'ora queen of the Goths.—(?) Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus (1593).

Bassi'no (Count), the "perjured husband" of Aurelia, slain by Alonzo.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Perjured Husband (1700).

Bastard. Homer was probably a bastard. Virgil was certainly one. Neoptol'emos was the bastard son of Achillês by Dêidamia (5 syl.). Romulus and Remus, if they ever existed, were the love-sons of a vestal. Brutus the regicide was a bastard. Ulysses was probably so, Teucer certainly, and Darius gloried in the surname of Nothos.

Bastard (The), in English history is William I., natural son of Robert le Diable. His mother was a peasant-girl of Falaise.

Bastard of Orleans, Jean Dunois, a natural son of Louis duc d'Orléans (brother of Charles VI.), and one of the most brilliant soldiers France ever produced (1403–1468). Béranger mentions him in his Charles Sept.

Bastille. The prisoner who had been confined in the Bastille for sixty-one years was A. M. Dussault, who was incarcerated by cardinal Richelieu.

Bat. In South Staffordshire that slaty coal which will not burn, but which lies in the fire till it becomes red hot, is called "bat;" hence the expression, Warm as a bat.

Bata'via, Holland or the Netherlands. So called from the Bata'vians, a Celtic tribe, which dwelt there.

. . . void of care,
Batavia rushes forth; and as they sweep
On sounding skates, a thousand different ways,
The thaw gay land is maddened all with joy.
Thomson: Seasons ("Winter," 1728).

Bates (1 syl.), a soldier in the army of Henry V., under sir Thomas Erpingham. He is introduced with Court and Williams as sentinels before the English camp at Agincourt, and the king unknown comes to them during the watch, and holds with them a conversation respecting the impending battle.—Shakespeare: Henry V. act iv. sc. 1 (1599).

Bates (Charley), generally called "Master Bates," one of Fagin's "pupils," training to be a pickpocket. He is always laughing uproariously, and is almost equal in artifice and adroitness to "The Artful Dodger" himself.—C. Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Bates (Frank) the friend of Whittle. A man of good plain sense, who tries to laugh the old beau out of his folly.—Garrick: The Irish Widow (1757).

BATH, called by the Romans Aquæ Solis ("waters of the sun"), and by the Anglo-Saxons Achamunnum ("city of the sick"). (See BADON, p. 81.)

Bath (Major), a poor but high-minded gentleman, who tries to conceal his poverty under a bold bearing and independent speech.—Fielding: Amelia (1751).

 G. Colman the Younger has made major Bath his model for lieutenant Worthington, in his comedy entitled The Poor Gentleman (1802).

Bath (King of), Richard Nash, generally called Beau Nash (q.v., p. 100).

Bath (The Maid of), Miss Linley, a beautiful and accomplished singer, who married Richard B. Sheridan, the statesman and dramatist.

Bath (The Wife of), one of the pilgrims travelling from Southwark to Canterbury, in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. She tells her tale in turn, and chooses "Midas" for her subject (1388). Modernized by Dryden.

Bathos, or "The Art of Sinking," by Pope, contributed to The Proceedings of the Scriblerius Club.

Bath'sheba, duchess of Portsmouth, a favourite court lady of Charles II. As Bathsheba, the wife of Uri'ah, was criminally loved by David, so Louisa P. Keroual (duchess of Portsmouth) was criminally loved by Charles II.

> My father [Charles II.], whom with reverence I name . . .
> Is grown in Bathsheba's embraces old.
> Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, ll. 708–711.

Batra-chomyo-machia, or "The Battle of the Frogs and Mice," by Pigres. A Greek skit on Homer's Iliad. The tale is this: A Mouse having escaped from a weasel, stopped on the bank of a pond to drink, when a Frog invited the Mouse to pay him a visit. The Mouse consented, and mounted on the Frog's back to get to Frog Castle. When in the middle of the pond an otter appeared, and so terrified Mr. Froggie that he dived under water, leaving his friend Mousie to struggle in the water till he was drowned. A comrade, who witnessed the scene, went and told the Mouse-king, who instantly declared war against the Frogs. When arrayed for battle, a band of gnats sounded the attack, and after a bloody battle the Frogs were defeated; but an army of land-crabs coming up saved the race from extermination, and the victorious Mice made the best of their way in terrible disorder. The name of the Mouse-king was Troxartes (3 syl.), probably a pun on Tros, a Trojan. Translated into English verse by T. Parnel (1679–1718). (See BATTLE OF THE FROGS AND MICE, p. 96.)

> The Mice were the Trojans, the Frogs the Greeks, who came across the sea to the siege. They won the "battle," but immediately returned in terrible disorder.

Battar (Al), i.e. the trenchant, one of Mahomet's swords.

Battle of Barnet, 14th April, 1471, was certainly one of the most decisive ever fought, although it finds no place amongst professor Creasy's list of "decisive battles." It closed for ever the Age of Force, the potentiality of the barons, and opened the new era of trade, literature, and public opinion. Here fell Warwick, the "king-maker," "last of the barons;" and thenceforth the king had no peer, but king was king, lords were lords, and commons the people.

Battle of Life (The), a love-story by Dickens (1847). (See JEDDLER.)

Battle of Prague, a piece of descriptive music, very popular in the first quarter of the nineteenth century. It was composed by Franz Kotzwara of Prague, born 1791.

Battle of Wartburg (The), the annual contest of the minnesingers for the prize offered by Hermann, margraf of Wartburg, near Gotha, in Germany, in the twelfth century. There is a minnesong so called, celebrating the famous contests of Walter von Vogelweide and Wolfram von Eschenbach with Heinrich von Ofterdingen. Heinrich lost the former and won the latter.

Battle of the British Soldier (The), Inkerman, November 5, 1854.

Battle of the Frogs and Mice (The), a skit by G. Rollenhagen, a master-singer (fourteenth century). No doubt suggested by the Batra-chomyomachia (q.v., p. 95), sometimes absurdly attributed to Homer. The German tale runs thus: King Mouse's son, on a visit to king Frog, recounted all the news of Mouse-land, and in return king Frog told his guest all the news of Frog-moor, and then proposed a visit to Frog Park. As they were crossing a pool, prince Mouse slipped from the Frog's back into the water and was drowned. Whereupon king Mouse declared a war of extermination against king Frog.

Battle of the Giants, Marignano, September, 1515. François I. won this battle over the Swiss and the duke of Milan. The French numbered 26,000 men, the Swiss 20,000. The loss of the former was 6000, and of the latter 10,000. It is called "the Battle of the Giants" because the combatants on both sides were "mighty men of war," and strove for victory like giants.

Battle of the Nations, or of the Peoples (The), the terrible conflict at Leipsig, 16th, 18th, 19th October, 1813, between Napoleon and the allied armies of Austria, Russia, Prussia, and Sweden, numbering 240,000 men. The French army consisted of 180,000 men. In the heat of the battle, the German battalions (10,000 men strong) in alliance with the French deserted, and Napoleon was utterly defeated. Each side lost about 40,000 men.

The bridge over the Elster, blown up by a mine, was the most disastrous part of this sanguinary war.

Battle of the Three Emperors, Austerlitz, 2nd December, 1805. So called because the emperor Napoleon, the emperor of Russia, and the emperor of Austria were all present. Napoleon won the fight.

Battle of the West (Great), the battle between king Arthur and Mordred. Here the king received his death-wound.

For battle of the books, of the herrings, of the moat, of the standard, of the spurs, etc., see Dictionary of Phrase and Fable.

Battles (The Fifteen Decisive), according to professor Creasy, are—

(1) Mar'athon (B.C. 490), in which the Greeks under Milti'adēs defeated Darius the Persian, and turned the tide of Asiatic invasion.

(2) Syracuse (B.C. 413), in which the Athenian power was broken and the extension of Greek domination prevented.

(3) Arbe'la (B.C. 331), by which Alexander overthrew Darius and introduced European habits into Asia.

(4) Metau'rus (B.C. 207), in which the Romans defeated Hannibal, and Carthage came to ruin.

(5) Armin'ius (A.D. 9), in which the Gauls overthrew the Romans under Varus, and Gaul became independent.

(6) Chalons (A.D. 451), in which Attila, "The Scourge of God," was defeated by Actius, and Europe saved from utter devastation.

(7) Tours (A.D. 732), in which Charles Martel overthrew the Saracens, and broke from Europe the Mohammedan yoke.

(8) Hastings (A.D. 1066), by which William the Norman became possessed of the English crown.

(9) Orléans (A.D. 1429), by which Joan of Arc raised the siege of the city and secured the independence of France.

(10) Armada (The) (A.D. 1588), which crushed the hopes of Spain and of the papacy in England.

(11) Blenheim (A.D. 1704), in which Marlborough, by the defeat of Tallard, broke off the ambitious schemes of Louis XIV.

(12) Pultowa (A.D. 1709), in which Charles XII. of Sweden was defeated by Peter the Great of Russia, and the stability of the Muscovite empire was established.

(13) Sarato'ga (A.D. 1777), in which general Gates defeated Burgoyne, and decided the fate of the American Revolution, by making France their ally.

(14) Valmy (A.D. 1792), in which the allied armies under the duke of Brunswick were defeated by the French Revolutionists, and the revolution was suffered to go on.

(15) Waterloo (A.D. 1815), in which Wellington defeated Napoleon and saved Europe from becoming a French province.

(See BATTLE OF BARNET, p. 95.)

Battles. J. B. Martin, of Paris, painter of battle-scenes, was called by the French M. des Batailles (1659-1735).

Battle for Battle-axe.

The word battle . . . seems to be used for battle-axe in this unnoticed passage of the Psalms: "There brake He the arrows of the bow, the shield, the sword, and the battle [axe]."—Rev. T. Whitaker: Gibbon's History Reviewed (1791).

Battle-Bridge, King's Cross, London. Called "Battle" from being the site of a battle between Alfred and the Danes; and called "King's Cross" from a wretched statue of George IV., taken down in 1842. The historic name of "Battle Bridge" was changed in 1871, by the Metropolitan Board, for that of "York Road." Miserabile dictu!

Battus, a shepherd of Arcadia. Having witnessed Mercury's theft of Apollo's oxen, he received a cow from the thief to ensure his secrecy; but, in order to test his fidelity, Mercury reappeared soon afterwards, and offered him an ox and a cow if he would blab. Battus fell into the trap, and was instantly changed into a touchstone.

When Tantalus in hell sees store and staves;
And senseless Battus for a touchstone serves.
Lord Brooke: Treatise on Monarchie, lv.

Bau'cis and Phile'mon, an aged Phrygian woman and her husband, who received Jupiter and Mercury hospitably when every one else in the place had refused to entertain them. For this courtesy the gods changed the Phrygians' cottage into a magnificent temple, and appointed the pious couple over it. They both died at the same time, according to their wish, and were converted into two trees before the temple.—Greek and Roman Mythology.

Baul'die (2 syl.), stable-boy of Joshua Geddes the quaker.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Baul'die (2 syl.), the old shepherd in the introduction of The Black Dwarf, by sir W. Scott (time, Anne).

Bav'iad (The), a satire by W. Gifford on the Della Cruscan school of poetry (1794). It was followed in 1800 by The Mæviad. The words "Baviad" and "Mæviad" were suggested by Virgil, Eclogue, iii. 90, 91.

He may with foxes plough, and milk he-goats,
Who praises Bavius or on Mævius dotes.
E. C. B.

Bavian Fool (The), one of the characters in the old morris-dance. He wore a red cap faced with yellow, a yellow "slabbering-bib," a blue doublet, red hose, and black shoes. He represented an overgrown baby, but was a tumbler, and mimicked the barking of a dog. The word "Bavian" is derived from bavon, a "bib for a slabbering child" (see Cotgrave's French Dictionary). In modern French bave means "drivel," "slabbering," and the verb baver "to slabber," but the bib is now called bavette.

Bavie'ca, the Cid's horse. He survived his master two years and a half, and was buried at Valencia. No one was ever allowed to mount him after the death of the Cid.

The duke of Wellington's horse, Copenhagen, was pensioned off after the battle of Waterloo.

Bavie'ca [i.e. "Booby"]. When Rodrigo was taken in his boyhood to choose a horse, he passed over the best steeds, and selected a scrubby-looking colt. His godfather called the boy a booby [baviéca] for making such a silly choice, and the name was given to the horse.

Ba'vius, any vile poet. (See MÆVIUS.)

Qui Bavium non odit, amet tua carmina, Mævi,
Atque idem jungat vulpes, et mulgeat hircos.
Virgil: Eclogue, iii. 90, 91.

May some choice patron bless each grey goose-quill!
May every Bavius have his Bufo still!
Pope: Prologue to the Satires.

Bawtry. Like the saddler of Bawtry, who was hanged for leaving his liquor (Yorkshire Proverb). It was customary for criminals on their way to execution to stop at a certain tavern in York for a "parting draught." The saddler of Bawtry refused to accept the liquor, and was hanged. If, however, he had stopped a few minutes at the tavern, his reprieve, which was on the road, would have arrived in time to save him.

Ba'yard, Le chevalier sans peur et sans reproche (1476–1524).

The British Bayard, sir Philip Sidney (1554–1584).

The Polish Bayard, prince Joseph Poniatowski (1763–1814).

The Bayard of India, sir James Outram (1803–1863). So called by sir C. Napier.

The Bayard of the Netherlands, Louis of Nassau (seventeenth century), brother of William of Orange, and founder of the Dutch Republic.

Ba'yard, a horse of incredible speed, belonging to the four sons of Aymon. If only one mounted, the horse was of the ordinary size, but increased in proportion as two or more mounted. (The word means "bright bay colour.")—Villeneuve: Les Quatre-Fils-Aymon.

Bayard, the steed of Fitz-James.—Sir W. Scott: Lady of the Lake, v. 18 (1810).

Bayar'do, the famous steed of Rinaldo, which once belonged to Amādis of Gaul. It was found in a grotto by the wizard Malagigi, along with the sword Fusberta, both of which he gave to his cousin Rinaldo.

> His colour bay, and hence his name he drew—
> Bayardo called. A star of silver hue
> Emblazed his front.
> Tasso · Rinaldo, ll. 220 (1562).

Bayes (1 syl.), the chief character of The Rehearsal, a farce by George Villiers, duke of Buckingham (1671). Bayes is represented as greedy of applause, impatient of censure, meanly obsequious, regardless of plot, and only anxious for claptrap. The character is meant for John Dryden, and several passages of his plays are well parodied.

·.· C. Dibdin, in his History of the Stage, states that Mrs. Mountford played "Bayes" "with more variety than had ever been thrown into the part before."

> No species of novel-writing exposes itself to a severer trial, since it not only resigns all Bayes' pretensions "to elevate the imagination," . . . but places its productions within the rangs of [general] criticism.—Encyc. Brit. (article "Romance").

Dead men may rise again, like Bayes' troops, or the savages in the Fantocini. In the farce above referred to, a battle is fought between foot-soldiers and great hobby-horses. At last Drawcansir kills all on both sides. Smith then asks Bayes "How are they to go off?" "As they came on," says Bayes, "upon their legs." Whereupon the dead men all jump up alive again.

Bayeux Tapestry, said to be the work of English damsels retained in the court of Matilda, the Conqueror's wife. When Napoleon contemplated the invasion of England in 1803, he caused this record to be removed to Paris, where it was exhibited in the National Museum. Having served its purpose, it was returned to Bayeux. Facsimiles by Stothard were published in the Vetusta Monumenta, at the expense of the Society of Antiquaries. The original is preserved in the Hôtel of the Prefecture of Bayeux (Normandy), and is called Toile de St. Jean. It is coiled round a windlass, and consists of linen worked with wools. It is 20 inches broad, 214 feet long, and contains 72 compartments.

1st compartment, Edwardus Rex: the Confessor is giving audience to two persons, one of whom is Harold. 2nd, Harold, with a hawk in his hand (a mark of nobility) and his hounds, on his way to Bosham. 3rd, Ecclesia: a Saxon church, with two figures about to enter. 4th, Harold embarking. 5th, the voyage to Normandy. 6th, disembarking on the coast of Normandy. 7th and 8th, seizure of Harold by the count of Ponthieu. 9th, Harold remonstrating with Guy, the count, upon his unjust seizure. 10th to 20th, scenes connected with the sojourn of Harold at the court of William. 26th, Harold swearing fidelity to William, with each hand on a shrine of relics. 27th, Harold's return. 28th, his landing. 29th, presents himself to king Edward. 30th to 32nd, the sickness of the Confessor, his death, and his funeral procession to Westminster Abbey. 33rd, the crown offered to Harold. 34th, Harold on the throne, and Stigant the archbishop. 35th, the comet. 36th, William orders a fleet to be built. 55th, orders the camp at Hastings to be constructed. 71st, death of Harold. 72nd, duke William triumphant. Although 530 figures are represented in this tapestry, only three of them are women.

Baynard (Mr.), introduced in an episode in the novel called Humphry Clinker, by Smollett (1771).

Bayswater (London), that is, Bayard's Watering, a string of pools and ponds which now form the Serpentine.

Bea'con (Tom), groom to Master Chiffinch (private emissary of Charles II.). —Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Beadle. The running banquet of two beadles, a public whipping. (See Henry VIII. act v. sc. 3.)

Bea'gle (Sir Harry), a horsy country gentleman, who can talk of nothing but horses and dogs. He is wofully rustic and commonplace. Sir Harry makes a bargain with lord Trinket to give up Harriet to him in exchange for his horse. (See GOLDFINCH.)—Colman: The Jealous Wife (1761).

Beak. Sir John Fielding was called "The Blind Beak" (died 1780).

Bean Lean (Donald), alias Will Ruthven, a Highland robber-chief. He also appears disguised as a pedlar on the road-side leading to Stirling. Waverley is rowed to the robber's cave, and remains there all night.

Alice Bean, daughter of Donald, who attended on Waverley during a fever.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

BEAR (The), emblem of ancient Persia. The golden lion was the emblem of ancient Assyria.

Where is th' Assyrian lion's golden hide,
That all the East once grasped in lordly paw?
Where that great Persian bear, whose swelling pride
The lion's self tore out with ravenous jaw?
P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, vii. (1633).

Bear (The), Russia, its cognizance being a bear.

France turns from her abandoned friends afresh,
And soothes the Bear that prowls for patriot flesh.
Campbell: Poland.

Bear (The Brave). Warwick is so called from his cognizance, which was a bear and ragged staff.

Bear (The Great), called "Hellicê."

Night on the earth poured darkness, on the sea
The wakeful sailor to Orion's star
And Hellicê turned heedful.
Apollonius Rhodius Argonautics.

Bearcliff (Deacon), at the Gordon Arms or Kippletringam inn, where colonel Mannering stops on his return to England, and hears of Bertram's illness and distress.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Bearded (The). (1) Geoffrey the crusader. (2) Bouchard of the house of Montmorency. (3) Constantine IV. (648-685). (4) Master George Killingworthe of the court of Ivan the Terrible of Russia, whose beard (says Hakluyt) was five feet two inches long, yellow, thick, and broad. Sir Hugh Willoughby was allowed to take it in his hand.

The Bearded Master. Soc'ratês was so called by Persius (B.C. 468-399).

Handsome Beard, Baldwin IV. earl of Flanders (1160-1186).

John the Bearded, John Mayo, the German painter, whose beard touched the ground when he stood upright.—Mémorial Portatif (1829).

Bearnais (Le), Henri IV. of France, so called from his native province, Le Béarn (1553-1610).

BEATRICE, wife of Ludov'ico Sforza.

Beatrice, daughter of Ferdinando king of Naples, sister of Leonora duchess of Ferrara, and wife of Mathias Corvi'nus of Hungary.

Beatrice, niece of Leonato governor of Messi'na, lively and light-hearted, affectionate and impulsive. Though wilful, she was not wayward; though volatile, not unfeeling; teeming with wit and gaiety, she was affectionate and energetic. At first she disliked Benedick, and thought him a flippant conceited coxcomb; but overhearing a conversation between her cousin Hero and her gentlewoman, in which Hero bewails that Beatrice should trifle with such deep love as that of Benedick, and should scorn so true and good a gentleman, she said, "Sits the wind thus? then farewell contempt. Benedick, love on; I will requite you." This conversation of Hero's was a mere ruse, but Benedick had been caught by a similar trick played by Claudio. The result was they sincerely loved each other, and were married.—Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing (1600).

Miss Helen Faucit's impersonations are nature itself. "Juliet," "Rosalind," divine "Imogen," "Beatrice," all crowd upon our fancy.—Dublin University Magazine (1846).

Beatrice Cenci, the Beautiful Parricide (q.v., p. 100).

Beatrice d'Este, canonized at Rome.

Be'atrice Portina'ri, a child eight years old, to whom Dantê at the age of nine was ardently attached. She was the daughter of Folco Portina'ri, a rich citizen of Florence. Beatrice married Simoni de Bardi, and died before she was 24 years old (1266-1290). Dantê married Gemma Donati, and his marriage was a most unhappy one. His love for Beatrice remained after her decease. She was the fountain of his poetic inspiration, and in his Divina Commedia he makes her his guide through paradise.

Dantê's Beatrice and Milton's Eve
Were not drawn from their spouses you conceive.
Byron: Don Juan, iii. 10 (1820).

(Milton, whose first wife was Mary Powell, of Oxfordshire, was as unfortunate in his choice as Dantê.)

Beau Brummel, George Bryar. Brummel (1778-1840).

Beau Clark, a billiard-marker at the beginning of the nineteenth century. He was called "The Beau," assumed the name of Beauclerc, and paid his addresses to a protegée of lord Fife.

Beau Clincher, in Farquhar's comedy called The Constant Couple (1700).

Beau Fielding, called "Handsome Fielding" by Charles II., by a play on his name, which was Hendrome Fielding. He died in Scotland Yard.

Beau Hewitt was the original of sir

George Etherege's "sir Fopling Flutter," in the comedy called The Man of Mode, or Sir Fopling Flutter (1676).

Beau Nash, Richard Nash, called also "King of Bath;" a Welsh gentleman, who for many years managed the bath-rooms of Bath, and conducted the balls with unparalleled splendour and decorum. In his old age he sank into poverty (1674–1761). Appointed master of the ceremonies in 1704.

Beau d'Orsay (Le), father of count d'Orsay, whom Byron calls "Jeune Cupidon."

Beau Seant, the Templars' banner, half white and half black; the white signified that the Templars were good to Christians, the black that they were evil to infidels.

Beau Tibbs, in Goldsmith's Citizen of the World, a dandy noted for his finery, vanity, and poverty (1760).

Beauclerk, Henry I. king of England (1068, 1100–1135).

Beaufort, the lover of Maria Wilding, whom he ultimately married.—A. Murphy: The Citizen (a farce, 1761).

Beaufort (Cardinal), bishop of Winchester, great-uncle to Henry VI. His death-raving is quite harrowing; and Warwick says—

> So bad a death argues a monstrous life.
> Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI. act iii. sc. 3.

Beaufort (Robert), in lord Lytton's Night and Morning, a novel (1841).

Beaujeu (Mons. le chevalier de), keeper of a gambling-house to which Dalgarno took Nigel.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Beaujeu (Mons. le comte de), a French officer in the army of the Chevalier Charles Edward, the Pretender.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Beaumains ["big hands"], a nickname which sir Kay (Arthur's steward) gave to Gareth when he was kitchen drudge in the palace. "He had the largest hands that ever man saw." Gareth was the son of king Lot and Margawse (king Arthur's sister). His brothers were sir Gaw'ain, sir Agravain, and sir Gaheris. Mordred was his half-brother.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 120 (1470).

(His achievements are given under the word "Gareth," q.v.)

Tennyson, in his Gareth and Lynette, makes sir Kay tauntingly address Lancelot thus, referring to Gareth—

> Fair and fine, forsooth!
> Sir Fine-face, sir Fair-hands! But see thou to it
> That thine own fineness, Lancelot, some fine day,
> Undo thee not.

Be it remembered that Kay himself called Gareth "Beaumains" from the extraordinary size of the lad's hands; but the taunt put into the mouth of Kay by the poet indicates that the lad prided himself on his "fine" face and "fair" hands, which is not the case. If "fair hands" is a translation of this nickname, it should be "fine hands," which bears the equivocal sense of big and beautiful.

Beau'manoir (Sir Lucas), grand-master of the Knights Templars.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Beaupré [Bo-pray'], son of judge Vertaigne (2 syl.) and brother of Lamifra. —Beaumont and Fletcher: The Little French Lawyer (printed 1647).

Beauseant, in The Lady of Lyons, by Bulwer Lytton [lord Lytton] (1838).

Beauté (2 syl.). La dame de Beauté. Agnes Sorel, so called from the château de Beauté, on the banks of the Marne, given to her by Charles VII. (1409–1450).

Beautiful (The) or La Bella. So Florence is called. France is spoken of by Frenchmen as La Belle France.

Beautiful Corisande (3 syl.), Diane comtesse de Guiche et de Grammont. She was the daughter of Paul d'Andouins, and married Philibert de Gramont, who died in 1580. The widow outlived her husband twenty-six years. Henri IV., before he was king of Navarre, was desperately smitten by La belle Corisande; and when he was at war with the League, she sold her diamonds to raise for him a levy of 20,000 Gascons (1554–1620).

(The letters of Henri to Corisande are still preserved in the Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal, and were published in 1769.)

Beautiful Parricide (The), Beatrice Cenci, daughter of a Roman nobleman, who plotted the death of her father because he violently defiled her. She was executed in 1605. Shelley has a tragedy on the subject, entitled The Cenci. Guido Reni's "The Execution of the Cenci," is one of the most interesting paintings in Rome.

Beauty (Queen of). So the daughter of Schems'eddin Mohammed, vizier of Egypt, was called. She married her cousin, Bed'reddin Hassan (q.v.), son of Nour'eddin Ali, vizier of Basora.—Arabian Nights ("Noureddin Ali," etc.).

Beauty and the Beast (La Belle et la Bête), from Les Contes Marines of Mde. Villeneuvre (1740), the most beautiful of all nursery tales. A young and lovely woman saved her father by putting herself in the power of a frightful but kind-hearted monster, whose respectful affection and melancholy overcame her aversion to his ugliness, and she consented to become his bride. Being thus freed from enchantment, the monster assumed his proper form and became a young and handsome prince. Well known in Italy. Modernized by Miss Thackeray, in her Two Old Friends, etc. (1868).

∴ The moral is that love gives beauty to the eyes of the lover.

Beauty of Buttermere (3 syl.), Mary Robinson, who married John Hatfield, a heartless impostor executed for forgery at Carlisle, in 1803.

Beaux' Stratagem (The), by Geo. Farquhar. Thomas viscount Aimwell and his friend Archer (the two beaux), having run through all their money, set out fortune-hunting, and come to Lichfield as "master and man." Aimwell pretends to be very unwell, and as lady Bountiful's hobby is tending the sick and playing the leech, she orders him to be removed to her mansion. Here he and Dorinda (daughter of lady Bountiful) fall in love with each other, and finally marry. Archer falls in love with Mrs. Sullen, the wife of squire Sullen, who had been married fourteen months but agreed to a divorce on the score of incompatibility of tastes and temper. This marriage forms no part of the play; all we are told is that she returns to the roof of her brother, sir Charles Freeman (1707).

Bed of Ware, a large bed, capable of holding twelve persons. Tradition assigns it to Warwick, the "king-maker." It was 12 feet square; but in 1895 it was shortened 3 feet. It is now (1897) at Rye House, where it is exhibited at ad. a head. Alluded to by Shakespeare in Twelfth Night, act iii. sc. 2.

¶ The bed of Og, king of Bashan, was 9 cubits by 4. If a cubit was 18 inches, it was 13½ feet by 6. It was made of iron.

It seems incredible that the cubit was 18 inches. (See under GIANTS (Goliath).)

¶ In the Great Exhibition of 1851 (London), a state bed from Vienna was exhibited, 11 feet by 9. It was 13 feet high, and made of zebra wood.

¶ There is a huge bed at the White Hart inn, Scole, Norfolk. (See Notes and Queries, August 8, 1896, p. 113.)

Bede (Adam), an excellent novel by George Eliot (Mrs. T. W. Cross, née Evans) (1859).

Bede (Cuthbert), the Rev. Edward Bradley, author of The Adventures of Mr. Verdant Green, an Oxford Freshman (1857).

Bedegrain (Castle of), in Sherwood. It was a royal castle, belonging to king Arthur.

Bed'er ["the full moon"], son of Gulna'rê (3 syl.), the young king of Persia. As his mother was an under-sea princess, he was enabled to live under water as well as on land. Beder was a young man of handsome person, quick parts, agreeable manners, and amiable disposition, who fell in love with Giauha'rê. (For the rest of the tale, see GIAUHARE.)—Arabian Nights ("Beder and Giauharê").

Bed'er or Bedr, a valley noted for the victory gained by Mahomet, in which "he was assisted by 3000 angels led by Gabriel mounted on his horse Haiz'um."—Sale: Al Koran.

Bed'ivere (Sir) or Bed'iver, king Arthur's butler and a knight of the Round Table. He was the last of Arthur's knights, and was sent by the dying king to throw his sword Excalibur into the mere. Being cast in, it was caught by an arm "clothed in white samite," and drawn into the stream.—Tennyson: Morte d'Arthur.

Tennyson's Morte d'Arthur is a very close and in many parts a verbal rendering of the same tale in Sir Thomas Malory's Morte d'Arthur, iii. 168 (1470).

Bedlam Beggars, lunatics or mad men belonging to Bethlehem Hospital This institution was designed for six lunatics, but in 1641 the number admitted was forty-four, and applications were so numerous that many were dismissed half cured. These "ticket-of-leave" men used to wander about as vagrants, singing "mad songs" and dressed in the oddest manner, to excite compassion.

He swears he has been in Bedlam, and will talk frantikely of purpose. You see pinnes stuck in sundry places in his naked flesh, especially in his armes, which paine he gladly puts himselfe to only to make you believe he is out of his wits. He calls himselfe . . .

"Poore Tom,' and coming near anybody calls out "Poore Tom is a-cold." . . . Some do nothing but sing songs fashioned out of their owne braines; some will dance; others will doe nothing but either laugh or weepe; others are dogged . . . and spying but a small company in a house . . . will compel the servants through feare to give them what they demand.—Decker: Bellman of London.

Bed'ouins [Bed'-winz], nomadic tribes of Arabia. In common parlance, "the homeless street poor." Gutter-children are called "Bedouins" or "street Arabs."

Bed'reddin' Has'san of Baso'ra, son of Nour'eddin Ali grand vizier of Basora, and nephew to Schems'eddin Mohammed vizier of Egypt. His beauty was transcendent and his talents of the first order. When twenty years old his father died, and the sultan, angry with him for keeping from court, confiscated all his goods, and would have seized him if he had not made his escape. During sleep he was conveyed by fairies to Cairo, and substituted for an ugly groom (Hunchback) to whom his cousin, the Queen of Beauty, was to have been married. Next day he was carried off by the same means to Damascus, where he lived for ten years as a pastry-cook. Search was made for him, and the search-party, halting outside the city of Damascus, sent for some cheese-cakes. When the cheese-cakes arrived, the widow of Noureddin declared that they must have been made by her son, for no one else knew the secret of making them, and that she herself had taught it him. On hearing this, the vizier ordered Bedreddin to be seized "for making cheese-cakes without pepper," and the joke was carried on till the party arrived at Cairo, when the pastry-cook prince was reunited to his wife, the Queen of Beauty.—Arabian Nights ("Noureddin Ali," etc.).

Bedver, king Arthur's butler.—Geoffrey: British History, ix. 13. (See BEDIVERE.)

Bedwin (Mrs.), housekeeper to Mr. Brownlow. A kind, motherly soul, who loved Oliver Twist most dearly.—C. Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Bee. The ancient Egyptians symbolized their kings under this emblem. The honey indicated the reward they gave to the meritorious, and the sting the punishment awarded to the unworthy.

As the Egyptians used by bees
To express their ancient Ptolemies.
S. Butler: Hudibras, III. 2.

 In the empire of France the royal mantle and standard were thickly sown with golden bees instead of "Louis flowers." In the tomb of Child'eric more than 300 golden bees were discovered in 1653. Hence the emblem of the French empire.

Bee, an American word introduced in the latter half of the nineteenth century, to signify a voluntary competitive examination: thus—

A Spelling Bee meant a competition in spelling.

A Husking Bee, a competition in stripping husks from the ears of maize.

A Musical Bee, a competition in singing or playing music "at sight," etc., etc.

These "Bees," immensely popular at first, rapidly subsided.

Bee-line, the straightest or shortest distance between two points. This is an American expression, equivalent to "As the crow flies;" but crows do not always fly in a direct line, as bees do when they seek their home.

Sinners, you are making a bee-line from time to eternity, and what you have once passed over you will never pass over again.—Dow: Lay Sermons.

Bee of Attica, Soph'oclês the dramatist (B.C. 495–405).

The Bee of Attica rivalled Æschylus when in possession of the stage.—Sir W. Scott: The Drama.

The Athenian Bee, Plato the philosopher (B.C. 428–347). It is said that when Plato was in his cradle a swarm of bees lighted on his mouth.

¶ A similar tale is told of St. Ambrose; but, not to be outdone by a pagan, the Christian biographer says that the bees flew in and out of his mouth, and that the event prognosticated his great eloquence. The same is said of St. Dominick.

Bee Painted (A) by Quintin Matsys on the outstretched leg of a fallen angel painted by Mandyn. It was so life-like that when the old artist returned to his studio he tried to frighten it away with his pocket-handkerchief. (See FLY PAINTED.)

¶ Hans Holbein, journeying to England, and finding himself at Strasburg without money, dashed off a picture, and on a conspicuous part thereof painted a bee. He sold his picture to a native dealer, who was both surprised and delighted on discovering the conceit.

Bees (The Fable of the), or "The Grumbling Hive." First published in octo-syllabic rhyme, running to the length of 400 lines, and afterwards produced in prose. The object of the fable is to show that opposition and difference of opinion tends to elicit good results. A dead calm is certainly undesirable.—Bernard de Mandeville (1714).

Beef'ington (Milor), in Canning's burlesque called The Rovers. Casimir is a Polish emigrant, and Beefington an English nobleman exiled by the tyranny of king John.—Anti-Jacobin.

"Will without power," said the sagacious Casimir to Milor Beefington, "is like children playing at soldiers."—Macaulay.

Be'elzebub (4 syl.), called "prince of the devils" (Matt. xii. 24), worshipped at Ekron, a city of the Philistines (2 Kings i. 2), and made by Milton second to Satan.

One next himself in power and next in crime—
Beëlzebub.
Paradise Lost, I. 80 (1665).

Bee'nie (2 syl.), chambermaid at Old St. Ronan's inn, held by Meg Dods.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Befa'na, the good fairy of Italian children. She is supposed to fill their shoes and socks with toys when they go to bed on Twelfth Night. Some one enters the bedroom for the purpose, and the wakeful youngsters cry out, "Ecco la Befana!" According to legend, Befana was too busy with house affairs to take heed of the Magi when they went to offer their gifts, and said she would stop for their return; but they returned by another way, and Befana every Twelfth Night watches to see them. The name is a corruption of Epiphania.

Beg ["lord"], a title generally given to lieutenants of provinces under the grand signior, but rarely to supreme princes. Occasionally, however, the Persian emperors have added the title to their names, as Hagmet beg, Alman beg, Morad beg, etc.—Selden: Titles of Honour, vi. 70 (1672).

Beg (Callum), page to Fergus M'Ivor, in Waverley, a novel by sir W. Scott (time, George II.).

Beg (Toshach), MacGillie Chattanach's second at the combat.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Beggar of Bethnal Green (The), a drama by S. Knowles (recast and produced, 1834). Bess, daughter of Albert, "the blind beggar of Bethnal Green," was intensely loved by Wilford, who first saw her in the streets of London, and subsequently, after diligent search, discovered her in the Queen's Arms inn at Romford. It turned out that her father Albert was brother to lord Woodville, and Wilford was his truant son, so that Bess was his cousin. Queen Elizabeth sanctioned their nuptials, and took them under her own conduct. (See BLIND.)

This play is founded on the ballad The Beggar's Daughter (q.v.).

Beggars (King of the), Bampfylde Moore Carew, who succeeded Clause Patch (1693, 1730–1770).

Beggar's Bush (The), a comedy by John Fletcher (1622).

Beggar's Daughter (The). "Bessee the beggar's daughter of Bethnal Green" was very beautiful, and was courted by four suitors at once—a knight, a country squire, a rich merchant, and the son of an innkeeper at Romford. She told them all they must first obtain the consent of her poor blind father, the beggar of Bethnal Green, and all slunk off except the knight, who went and asked leave to marry "the pretty Bessee." The beggar gave her for a "dot" £3000, and £100 for her trousseau, and informed the knight that he (the beggar) was Henry, son and heir of sir Simon de Montfort, and that he had disguised himself as a beggar to escape the vigilance of spies, who were in quest of all those engaged on the barons' side in the battle of Evesham.—Percy: Reliques, II. ii. 10.

As the value of money was about twelve times what it now is, this "dot" would equal £36,000. (See BEGGAR OF BETHNAL GREEN.)

Beggar's Opera (The), by Gay (1727). The beggar is captain Macheath. (For plot, see MACHEATH.)

Beggar's Petition (The), a poem by the Rev. Thomas Moss (1769). It begins—

Pity the sorrows of a poor old man,
Whose trembling limbs have borne him to your door;
Whose days are dwindled to the shortest span;
Oh, give relief, and Heaven will bless your store!
Stanza 1.

Beguines [Ba-gweens' or beg-eens'], the earliest of all lay societies of women united for religious purposes. Brabant says the order received its name from St. Begga, daughter of Pepin, who founded it at Namur, in 696; but it is more likely to be derived from their beguins, or linen caps.

Beh'ram, captain of the ship which was to convey prince Assad to the "mountain of fire," where he was to be offered up in sacrifice. The ship being driven on the shores of queen Margia'na's kingdom, Assad became her slave, but was recaptured by Behram's crew, and carried back to the ship. The queen next day gave the ship chase. Assad was thrown overboard, and swam to the city whence he started. Behram also was drifted to the same place. Here the captain fell in with the prince, and re-conducted him to the original dungeon. Bosta'na, a daughter of the old fire-worshipper, taking pity on the prince, released him; and, at the end, Assad married queen Margiana, Bostana married prince Amgiad (half-brother of Assad), and Behram, renouncing his religion, became a Mussulman, and entered the service of Amgiad, who became king of the city. — Arabian Nights ("Amgiad and Assad").

Bela'rius, a nobleman and soldier in the army of Cym'beline (3 syl.) king of Britain. Two villains having sworn to the king that Belarius was "confederate with the Romans," he was banished, and for twenty years lived in a cave; but he stole away, out of revenge, the king's two infant sons, Guide'rius and Arvir'agus. When these two princes were grown to manhood, a battle was fought between the Romans and Britons, in which Cymbeline was made prisoner; but Belarius coming to the rescue, the king was liberated and the Roman general in turn was made captive. Belarius was now reconciled to Cymbeline, and, presenting to him the two young men, told their story; whereupon they were publicly acknowledged to be the sons of Cymbeline and princes of the realm.—Shakespeare: Cymbeline (1605).

Belch (Sir Toby), uncle of Olivia the rich countess of Illyria. He is a reckless roisterer of the old school, and a friend of sir Andrew Ague-cheek.—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night (1614).

Belcour, a foundling adopted by Mr. Belcour, a rich Jamaica merchant, who at death left him all his property. He was in truth the son of Mr. Stockwell, the clerk of Belcour, senior, who clandestinely married his master's daughter, and afterwards became a wealthy merchant. On the death of old Belcour, the young man came to England as the guest of his unknown father, and falling in love with Miss Dudley, married her. He was hot-blooded, impulsive, high-spirited, and generous, his very faults serving as a foil to his noble qualities; ever erring and repenting, offending and atoning for his offences.—Cumberland: The West Indian (1771).

Be'led, one of the six Wise Men of the East, lead by the guiding star to Jesus. He was a king, who gave to his enemy, who sought to dethrone him, half of his kingdom, and thus turned a foe into a fast friend.—Klopstock: The Messiah, v. (1747).

Belen, the mont St. Michael, in Normandy. Here nine druidesses used to sell arrows to sailors "to charm away storms." These arrows had to be discharged by a young man 25 years old.

Belerma, the lady whom Durandarte served for seven years as a knight-errant and peer of France. When, at length, he died at Roncesvallês, he prayed his cousin Montesi'nos to carry his heart to Belerma.

> I saw a procession of beautiful damsels in mourning, and white turbans on their heads. In the rear came a lady with a veil so long that it reached the ground: her turban was twice as large as the largest of the others; her eyebrows were joined, her nose was rather flat, her mouth wide, but her lips of a vermilion colour. Her teeth were thin-set and irregular, though very white; and she carried in her hand a fine linen cloth, containing a heart. Montesinos informed me that this lady was Belerma.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. ii. 6 (1615).

Bele'ses (3 syl.), a Chaldean soothsayer and Assyrian satrap, who told Arba'ces (3 syl.) governor of Me'dia that he would one day sit on the throne of Nineveh and Assyria. His prophecy came true, and Belesês was rewarded with the government of Babylon.—Byron: Sardanapalus (1819).

Belfab'orac, the palace of the emperor of Lilliput, in the middle of Mildendo, the metropolis of the empire.—Swift: Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Lilliput," 1726).

Belfield (Andrew), the elder of two brothers, who married Violetta (an English lady born in Lisbon), and deserted her. He then promised marriage to Lucy Waters, the daughter of one of his tenants, but had no intention of making her his wife. At the same time, he engaged himself to Sophia, the daughter of sir Benjamin Dove. The day of the wedding arrived, and it was then discovered that he was married already, and that Violetta his wife was actually present.

Robert Belfield, the younger of the two brothers, in love with Sophia Dove. He went to sea in a privateer under captain Ironside, his uncle, and changed his name to Lewson. The vessel was wrecked on the Cornwall coast, and he renewed his acquaintance with Sophia, but heard that she was engaged in marriage to his brother. As, however, it was proved that his brother was already married, the young lady willingly abandoned the elder for the younger brother.—R. Cumberland: The Brothers (1769).

Bel'ford, a friend of Lovelace (2 syl.). They made a covenant to pardon every sort of liberty which they took with each other.—Richardson: Clarissa Harlowe (1749).

Belford, in The Clandestine Marriage, by George Colman and Garrick (1760). Hazlitt says of this play, "it is nearly without a fault."

Belford (Major), the friend of colonel Tamper, and the plighted husband of Mdlle. Florival.—G. Colman the Elder: The Deuce is in Him (1762).

Belfry of Bruges (The), a poem by Longfellow. It begins thus—

In the market-place of Bruges (2 syl.) stands the belfry old and brown,
Thrice consumed and thrice rebuilded, still it watches o'er the town.

Belge (2 syl.), the mother of seventeen sons. She applied to queen Mercilla for aid against Geryon'eo, who had deprived her of all her offspring except five.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 10 (1596).

 "Belge" is Holland; the "seventeen sons" are the seventeen provinces which once belonged to her; "Geryoneo" is Philip II. of Spain; and "Mercilla" is queen Elizabeth.

Belgrade' (2 syl.), the camp-suttler. So called because she commenced her career at the siege of Belgrade. Her dog's name was Clumsey.

Be'lial, last or lowest in the hierarchy of hell. (See RIMMON.) Moloch was the fiercest of the infernal spirits, and Belial the most timorous and slothful. The lewd and profligate, disobedient and rebellious, are called in Scripture "sons of Belial."

Belial came last, than whom a spirit more lewd
Fell not from heaven, or more gross to love
Vice for itself (l. 490, etc.) . . . though his tongue
Dropt manna, and could make the worse appear
The better reason . . . but to nobler deeds
Timorous and slothful.
Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 112 (1665).

 Belial means "the lawless one," that is, one who puts no restraint on his evil propensities.

Belia'nis of Greece (Don), the hero of an old romance of chivalry on the model of Am'adis de Gaul. It was one of the books in don Quixote's library; but was not one of those burnt by the curé as pernicious and worthless.

"Don Bellanis," said the curé, "with its two, three, and four parts, hath need of a dose of rhubarb to purge off that mass of bile with which he is inflamed. His Castle of Fame and other impertinences should be totally obliterated. This done, we would show him lenity in proportion as we found him capable of reform. Take don Bellanis home with you, and keep him in close confinement."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. i. 6 (1605).

BELINDA, niece and companion of lady John Brute. Young, pretty, full of fun, and possessed of £10,000. Heart-free married her.—Vanbrugh: The Provoked Wife (1697).

Belin'da, the heroine of Pope's Rape of the Lock. This mock heroic is founded on the following incident: Lord Petre cut a lock of hair from the head of Miss Arabella Fermor, and the young lady resented the liberty as an unpardonable affront. The poet says Belinda wore on her neck two curls, one of which the baron cut off with a pair of scissors borrowed of Clarissa; and when Belinda demanded that it should be delivered up, it had flown to the skies and become a meteor there. (See BERENICE, p. 112.)

Belinda, daughter of Mr. Blandford, in love with Beverley the brother of Clarissa. Her father promised sir William Bellmont that she should marry his son George, but George was already engaged to Clarissa. Belinda was very handsome, very independent, most irreproachable, and devotedly attached to Beverley. When he hinted suspicions of infidelity, she was too proud to deny it; but her pure and ardent love instantly rebuked her for giving her lover causeless pain.—Murphy: All in the Wrong (1761).

Belin'da, the heroine of Miss Edgeworth's novel of the same name. The object of the tale is to make the reader feel what is good, and pursue it (1803).

Belin'da, a lodging-house servant-girl, very poor, very dirty, very kind-hearted, and shrewd in observation. When married, Mr. Middlewick the butter-man set her husband up in business in the butter line.—H. J. Byron: Our Boys (1875).

Beline (2 syl.), second wife of Argan the malade imaginaire, and stepmother of Angelique, whom she hates. Beline pretends to love Argan devotedly, humours him in all his whims, calls him "mon fils," and makes him believe that if he were to die it would be the death of her. Toinette induced Argan to put these protestations to the test by pretending to be dead. He did so, and when Beline entered the room, instead of deploring her loss, she cried in ecstasy—

"Le ciel en soit loué! Me voilà délivrée d'un grande fardeau! . . . de quoi servait-il sur la terre? Un homme incommode à tout le monde, malpropre, dégoûtant . . . mouchant, toussant, crachant toujours, sans esprit, ennuyeux, de mauvaise humeur, fatiguant sans cesse les gens, et grondant jour et nuit servantes et valets" (iii. 18).

She then proceeded to ransack the room for bonds, leases, and money; but Argan, starting up, told her she had taught him one useful lesson for life, at any rate.—Molière: La Malade Imaginaire (1673).

Belisa'rius, the greatest of Justinian's generals. Being accused of treason, he was deprived of all his property, and his eyes were put out. In this state he retired to Constantinople, where he lived by begging. The story says he fastened a label to his hat, containing these words, "Give an obolus to poor old Belisarius." Marmontel has written a tale called Belisaire, which has helped to perpetuate these fables, originally invented by Tzetzês or Cæsios, a Greek poet, born at Constantinople in 1120.

Bélise (2 syl.), sister of Philaminte (3 syl.), and, like her, a femme savante. She imagined that every one was in love with her.—Molière: Les Femmes Savantes (1672).

BELL (Adam), a wild, north-country outlaw, noted, like Robin Hood, for his skill in archery. His place of residence was Englewood Forest, near Carlisle; and his two comrades were Clym of the Clough [Clement of the Cliff] and William of Cloudesly (3 syl.). William was married, but the other two were not. When William was captured at Carlisle and was led to execution, Adam and Clym rescued him, and all three went to London to crave pardon of the king, which, at the queen's intercession, was granted them. They then showed the king specimens of their skill in archery, and the king was so well pleased that he made William a "gentleman of fe," and the two others yeomen of the bedchamber. —Percy: Reliques ("Adam Bell," etc.), I. ii. 1.

Bell (Bessy). Bessy Bell and Mary Gray were the daughters of two country gentlemen near Perth. When the plague broke out in 1666 they built for themselves a bower in a very romantic spot called Burn Braes, to which they retired, and were supplied with food, etc., by a young man who was in love with both of them. The young man caught the plague, communicated it to the two young ladies, and all three died.—Allan Ramsay: Bessy Bell and Mary Gray (a ballad).

Bell. Anne, Charlotte, and Emily Brontë assumed the names of Acton, Currer, and Ellis Bell (first half of the nineteenth century). Currer Bell, who married the Rev. Arthur Bell Nicholls, was the author of Jane Eyre.

It will be observed that the initial letter of both names is in every case preserved throughout—Acton (Anne), Currer (Charlotte), Ellis (Emily), and Bell (Brontë).

Bell (Peter), the subject of a "tale in verse" by Wordsworth (1798). Shelley wrote a burlesque upon it, entitled Peter Bell the Third.

Bell Battle (The). The casus belli was this: Have the local magistrates power to allow parish bells to be rung at their discretion, or is the right vested in the parish clergyman? This squabble was carried on with great animosity in the parish of Paisley in 1832. The clergyman, John Macnaughton, brought the question before the local council, which gave it in favour of the magistrates; but the court of sessions gave it the other way, and when the magistrates granted a permit for the bells to be rung, the court issued an interdict against them.

For nearly two years the Paisley bell battle was fought with the fiercest zeal. It was the subject of every political meeting, the theme of every board, the gossip at tea-tables and dinner-parties, and the children delighted in chalking on the walls, "Please to ring the bell" (May 14, 1832, to September 10, 1834).—Newspaper paragraph.

Bell-the-Cat, sobriquet of Archibald Douglas, great earl of Angus, who died in 1514.

The mice, being much annoyed by the persecutions of a cat, resolved that a bell should be hung about her neck to give notice of her approach. The measure was agreed to in full council, but one of the sager mice inquired, "Who would undertake to bell the cat?" When Lauder told this fable to a council of Scotch nobles, met to declaim against one Cochran, Archibald Douglas started up, and exclaimed in thunder, "I will;" and hence the sobriquet referred to.—Sir W. Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, xxii.

Bells, Those Evening Bells, a poem by T. Moore. The bells referred to were those of Ashbourne parish church, Derbyshire.—National Airs, 1.

To shake one's bells, to defy, to resist, to set up one's back. The allusion is to the little bells tied to the feet of hawks. Immediately the hawks were tossed, they were alarmed at the sound of the bells, and took to flight.

Neither the king, nor he that loves him best . . .
Dare stir a wing if Warwick shake his bells.
Shakespeare: 3 Henry VI. act I. sc. 1 (1590).

Seven bells (half-past 7), breakfast-time; eight bells (noon), dinner-time; three bells (half-past 5), supper-time.

Eight bells (the highest number) are rung at noon and every fourth hour afterwards. Thus they are sounded at 12, 4, and 8 o'clock. For all other parts of the day an Even number of bells announce the hours, and an Odd number the half-hours. Thus 12½ is 1 bell; 1 o'clock is 2 bells; 1½ is 3 bells; 2 o'clock is 4 bells; 2½ is 5 bells; 3 o'clock is 6 bells; 3½ is 7 bells. Again, 4½ is 1 bell; 5 o'clock is 2 bells; 5½ is 3 bells; 6 o'clock is 4 bells; 6½ is 5 bells; 7 o'clock is 6 bells; 7½ is 7 bells. Again, 8½ is 1 bell; 9 o'clock is 2 bells; 9½ is 3 bells; 10 o'clock is 4 bells; 10½ is 5 bells; 11 o'clock is 6 bells; 11½ is 7 bells. Or, 1 bell sounds at 12½, 4½, 8½; 2 bells sound at 1, 5, 9; 3 bells sound at at 1½, 5½, 9½; 4 bells sound at 2, 6, 10; 5 bells sound at 2½, 6½, 10½; 6 bells sound at 3, 7, 11; 7 bells sound at 3½, 7½, 11½; 8 bells sound at 4, 8, 12 o'clock.

Bells tolled Backwards. This was the tocsin of the French, first used as an alarm of fire, and subsequently for any uprising of the people. In the reign of Charles IX. it was the signal given by the court for the Bartholomew slaughter. In the French Revolution it was the call to the people for some united attack against the royalists.

Old French, toquer, "to strike," seing or sing, "a church-bell."

Bella Wilfer, a lovely, wilful, lively, spoilt darling, who loved every one, and whom every one loved. She married John Rokesmith (i.e. John Harmon).—C. Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1864).

Bellair, in Etherege's comedy of The Man of Mode (1676). Supposed to represent the author himself.

Bellamy, a steady young man, looking out for a wife "capable of friendship, love, and tenderness; with good sense enough to be easy, and good nature enough to like him." He found his beau-ideal in Jacintha, who had besides a fortune of £30,000.—Ben Hoadly, M.D.: The Suspicious Husband (1761).

Bella'rio, the assumed name of Euphrasia, when she put on boy's apparel that she might enter the service of prince Philaster, whom she greatly loved. —Fletcher: Philaster, or Love Lies-a-bleeding (1622). An excellent tragedy.

Bellaston (Lady), a profligate, from whom Tom Jones accepts support. Her conduct and conversation may be considered a fair photograph of the "beauties" of the court of Louis XV.—Fielding: History of Tom Jones, a Foundling (1750).

The character of Jones, otherwise a model of generosity, openness, and manly spirit, mingled with thoughtless dissipation, is unnecessarily degraded by the nature of his intercourse with lady Bellaston.—Encyclopædia Britannica (article "Fielding").

Belle Cordière (La), Louise Labé, who married Ennemond Perrin, a wealthy rope-maker (1526-1566).

Belle Corisande (La), Diane comtesse de Guiche et de Grammont (1554-1620).

Belle France (La), a pet way of alluding to France, similar to our Merry England.

Belle the Giant. It is said that the giant Belle mounted on his sorrel horse at a place since called mount Sorrel. He leaped one mile, and the spot on which he lighted was called Wanlip (one-leap); thence he leaped a second mile, but in so doing "burst all" his girths, whence the spot was called Burstall; in the third leap he was killed, and the spot received the name of Bellegrave.

Belle's Stratagem (The). The "belle" is Letitia Hardy, and her stratagem was for the sake of winning the love of Doricourt, to whom she had been betrothed. The very fact of being betrothed to Letitia set Doricourt against her, so she went unknown to him to a masquerade, where Doricourt fell in love with "the beautiful stranger." In order to consummate the marriage of his daughter, Mr. Hardy pretends to be "sick unto death," and beseeches Doricourt to wed Letitia before he dies. Letitia meets her betrothed in her masquerade dress, and unbounded is the joy of the young man to find that "the beautiful stranger" is the lady to whom he has been betrothed.—Mrs. Cowley: The Belle's Stratagem. (See BEAUX' STRATAGEM.)

Bellefontaine (Benedict), the wealthy farmer of Grand Pré [Nova Scotia] and father of Evangeline. When the inhabitants of his village were driven into exile, Benedict died of a broken heart as he was about to embark, and was buried on the seashore.—Longfellow: Evangeline (1849).

Bel'lenden (Lady Margaret), an old lady, mistress of the Tower of Tillietudlem, and devoted to the house of Stuart.

Old major Miles Bellenden, brother of lady Margaret.

Miss Edith Bellenden, granddaughter of lady Margaret, betrothed to lord Evendale, of the king's army, but in love with Morton (a leader of the Covenanters, and the hero of the novel). After the death of lord Evendale, who is shot by Balfour, Edith marries Morton, and this terminates the tale.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Beller'ophon, son of Glaucos. A kind of Joseph, who refused the amorous solicitations of Antēa, wife of Prœtos (2 syl.) king of Argos. Antea accused him of attempting to dishonour her, and Prœtos sent him into Lycia with letters desiring his destruction. Accordingly, he was set several enterprises full of hazard, which, however, he surmounted. In later life he tried to mount up to heaven on the winged horse Pegăsus, but fell, and wandered about the Alei'an plains till he died.—Homer: Iliad, vi.

> As once
> Bellerophon . . . dismounted in the Alcian field . . . Erroneous there to wander and forlorn.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, vii. 17, etc. (1665).

Letters of Bellerophon, a treacherous letter, pretending to recommend the bearer, but in reality denouncing him; like the letter sent by Prœtos to the king of Lycia, requesting him to kill the bearer (Bellerophon).

¶ PAUSA'NIAS the Spartan, in his treasonable correspondence with Xerxes, sent several such letters. At last the bearer bethought that none of the persons sent ever returned; and, opening the letter, found it contained directions for his own death. It was shown to the ephors, and Pausanias in alarm fled to a temple, where he was starved to death.

¶ DE LACY, being sent by king John against De Courcy, was informed by two of the servants that their master always laid aside his armour on Good Friday. De Lacy made his attack on that day, and sent De Courcy prisoner to London. The two servants now asked De Lacy for passports from Ireland and England, and De Lacy gave them Letters of Bellerophon, exhorting "all to whom these presents come to spit on the faces of the bearers, drive them forth as hounds, and use them as it behoved the betrayers of their masters to be treated."—Cameos of English History ("Conquest of Ireland").

¶ The Letter of Uriah (2 Sam. xi. 14) was of a similar character. It pretended to be one of friendship, but was in reality a death-warrant.

Beller'ophon (4 syl.), the English man-of-war under the command of captain Maitland. After the battle of Waterloo, Bonaparte set out for Rocheford, intending to seek refuge in America; but the Bellerophon being in sight and escape impossible, he made a virtue of necessity by surrendering himself, and was forthwith conveyed to England.

Belle'rus, a Cornish giant, whence the Land's End is called Bellerium. Milton in his Lycidas suggests the possibility that Edward King, who was drowned at sea, might be sleeping near Bellerium or the Land's End, on mount St. Michael, where an archangel ordered a church to be built.

> Sleepst [thou] by the fable of Bellĕrus old,
> Where the great vision of the guarded mount
> Looks towards Namancos [old Castile].
> Milton: Lycidas, 160, etc. (1638).

Belleur', companion of Pinac and Mirabel ("the wild goose"), of stout blunt temper; in love with Rosalu'ra, a daughter of Nantolet.—Fletcher: The Wild Goose Chase (1619, printed 1652).

Bellicent, daughter of Gorloïs lord of Tintag'il and his wife Ygernē or Igerna. As the widow married Uther the pendragon, and was then the mother of king Arthur, it follows that Bellicent was half-sister of Arthur. Tennyson in Gareth and Lynette says that Bellicent was the wife of Lot king of Orkney, and mother of Gaw'ain and Mordred, but this is not in accordance either with the chronicle or the history; for Geoffrey in his Chronicle says that Lot's wife was Anne, the sister (not half-sister) of Arthur (viii. 20, 21), and sir T. Malory, in his History of Prince Arthur, says—

> King Lot of Lothian and Orkney wedded Margawse; Nentres, of the land of Carlot, wedded Elain; and that Morgan le Fay was [Arthur's] third sister.—Pt. I. a, 35, 96.

Bel'lin, the ram, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox. The word means "gentleness" (1.498).

Bellingham, a man about town.—Boucicault: After Dark (1868).

> I was engaged for two years at St. James's Theatre, acting "Charles Surface" eighty nights, "Bellingham" a couple of hundred nights, and had two special engagements for "Mercutio" at the Lyceum.—Walter Lacy.

Bellisant, sister of king Pepin of France, and wife of Alexander emperor of Constantinople. Being accused of infidelity, the emperor banished her, and she took refuge in a vast forest, where she became the mother of Valentine and Orson.—Valentine and Orson.

Bellmont (Sir William), father of George Bellmont; tyrannical, positive, and headstrong. He imagined it is the duty of a son to submit to his father's will, even in the matter of matrimony.

George Bellmont, son of sir William, in love with Clarissa, his friend Beverley's sister; but his father demands of him to marry Belinda Blandford, the troth-plight wife of Beverley. Ultimately all comes right.—Murphy: All in the Wrong (1761).

Bello'na's Handmaids, Blood, Fire, and Famine.

> The goddesse of warre, called Bellona, had these thre handmaids ever attendynge on her: BLOOD, FIRE, and FAMINE, which thre damosels be of that force and strength that every one of them alone is able and sufficient to torment and afflict a proud prince; and they all joyned together are of puissance to destroy the most populous country and most richest region of the world.—Hall: Chronicle (1530).

Bellum (Master), war.

> A difference [is] 'twixt broyles and bloudie warres,—
> Yet have I shot at Maister Bellum's butte,
> And thrown his ball, although I toucht no tutte [benefit].
> Gascoigne: The Fruites of Warre, 94 (died 1577).

Belmont (Sir Robert), a proud, testy, mercenary country gentleman; friend of his neighbour sir Charles Raymond.

Charles Belmont, son of sir Robert, a young rake. He rescued Fidelia, at the age of 12, from the hands of Villard, a villain who wanted to abuse her; and, taking her to his own home, fell in love with her, and in due time married her. She turns out to be the daughter of sir Charles Raymond.

Rosetta Belmont, daughter of sir Robert, high-spirited, witty, and affectionate. She was in love with colonel Raymond, whom she delighted in tormenting.—Ed. Moore: The Foundling (1748).

Belmour (Edward), a gay young man about town.—Congreve: The Old Bachelor (1693).

Belmour (Mrs.), a widow of "agreeable vivacity, entertaining manners, quickness of transition from one thing to another, a feeling heart, and a generosity of sentiment." She it is who shows Mrs. Lovemore the way to keep her husband at home, and to make him treat her with that deference which is her just due.—Murphy: The Way to Keep Him (1760).

Beloved Disciple (The), John, to whom the Fourth Gospel is attributed.—John xiii. 23, etc.

Beloved Physician (The), supposed to be Luke the evangelist.—Col. iv. 14.

Bel-phegor, a Moabitish deity, whose orgies were celebrated on mount Phegor, and were noted for their obscenity.

Belphœ'be (3 syl.). "All the Graces rocked her cradle when she was born." Her mother was Chrysog'onê (4 syl.), daughter of Amphisa of fairy lineage, and her twin-sister was Amoretta. While the mother and her babes were asleep, Diana took one (Belphœbê) to bring up, and Venus took the other.

 Belphœbê is the "Diana" among women, cold, passionless, correct, and strong-minded. Amoret is the "Venus," but without the licentiousness of that goddess,—warm, loving, motherly, and wifely. Belphœbê was a lily; Amoret a rose. Belphœbê a moonbeam, light without heat; Amoret a sunbeam, bright and warm and life-giving. Belphœbê would go to the battle-field, and make a most admirable nurse or lady-conductor of an ambulance; but Amoret would prefer to look after her husband and family, whose comfort would be her first care, and whose love she would seek and largely reciprocate.—See Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii., iv. (1590).

 "Belphœbê" is queen Elizabeth. As queen she is Gloriana, but as woman she is Belphœbê the beautiful and chaste.

> Either Gloriana let her choose,
> Or in Belphœbê fashioned to be;
> In one her rule; in the other her rare chastitie.
> Spenser: Faërie Queene (introd. to bk. iii.)

Belshazzar, a drama by Milman (1822); a drama by Hannah More (Sacred Dramas) (1782); Byron (The Vision of Belshazzar).

Belted Will, lord William Howard, warden of the western marches (1563–1640).

> His Bilboa blade, by Marchmen felt,
> Hung in a broad and studded belt;
> Hence in rude phrase the Borderers still > Called noble Howard "Belted Will."
> Sir W. Scott.

Belten'ebros (4 syl.). Amadis of Gaul assumes the name when he retires to the Poor Rock, after receiving a cruel letter from Oria'na his lady-love.—Vasco de Lobeira: Amadis de Gaul, ii. 6 (before 1400).

> One of the most distinguishing testimonies which that hero gave of his fortitude, constancy, and love, was his retiring to the Poor Rock when in disgrace with his mistress Oriana, to do penance under the name of Beltenebros, or the Lovely Obscure.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iii. 11 (1605).

Belvawney (Miss), of the Portsmouth Theatre. She always took the part of page, and wore tights and silk stockings. —Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Belvide'ra, daughter of Priu'li a senator of Venice. She was saved from the sea by Jaffier, eloped with him, and married him. Her father then discarded her, and her husband joined the conspiracy of Pierre to murder the senators. He told Belvidera of the plot, and Belvidera, in order to save her father, persuaded Jaffier to reveal the plot to Priuli, if he would promise a general free pardon. Priuli gave the required promise, but notwithstanding, all the conspirators, except Jaffier, were condemned to death by torture. Jaffier stabbed Pierre to save him from the dishonour of the wheel, and then killed himself. Belvidera goes mad and dies.—Otway: Venice Preserved (1682).

We have to check our tears, although well aware that the "Belvidera" with whose sorrows we sympathize is no other than our own inimitable Mrs. Siddons.—Sir W. Scott: The Drama.

(The actor Booth used to speak in rapture of Mrs. Porter's "Belvidera." It obtained for Mrs. Barry the title of famous; Miss O'Neill and Miss Helen Faucit were both great in the same part.)

Ben [LEGEND], sir Sampson Legend's younger son, a sailor and a "sea-wit," in whose composition there enters no part of the conventional generosity and open frankness of a British tar. His slang phrase is "D'ye see," and his pet oath "Mess!"—W. Congreve: Love for Love (1695). I cannot agree with the following sketch:—

What is Ben—the pleasant sailor which Bannister gives us—but a piece of satire . . . a dreamy combination of all the accidents of a sailor's character, his contempt of money, his credulity to women, with that necessary estrangement from home? . . . We never think the worse of Ben for it, or feel it as a stain upon his character.—C. Lamb.

C. Dibdin says, "If the description of Thom. Doggett's performance of this character be correct, the part has certainly never been performed since to any degree of perfection."

Ben Israel (Nathan) or Nathan ben Samuel, the physician and friend of Isaac the Jew.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Ben Joc'hanan, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for the Rev. Samuel Johnson, who, it is said, suffered a scandalous amour under his own roof.

Let Hebron, nay, let hell produce a man
So made for mischief as Ben Jochanan.
A Jew of humble parentage was he,
By trade a Levite, though of low degree.
Dryden and Tate: pt. ii. 351-354 (1682).

Benai'ah (3 syl.), in Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for general George Edward Sackville. As Benaiah, captain of David's guard, adhered to Solomon against Adonijah, so general Sackville adhered to the duke of York against the prince of Orange (1590-1652).

Nor can Benaiah's worth forgotten lie,
Of steady soul when public storms were high.
Dryden and Tate: pt. ii. 819, 820 (1682).

Benas'kar or Bennaskar, a wealthy merchant and magician of Delhi. —James Ridley: Tales of the Genii ("History of Mahoud," tale vii., 1751).

Benbow (Admiral). In an engagement with the French near St. Martha on the Spanish coast in 1701, admiral Benbow had his legs and thighs shivered into splinters by chain-shot; but, supported in a wooden frame, he remained on the quarter-deck till morning, when Du Casse sheered off.

¶ Similar acts of heroism are recorded of Almeyda the Portuguese governor of India; of Cynægeros brother of the poet Æschylos; of Jaafer the standard-bearer of "the prophet" in the battle of Muta; of Widdrington (q.v.); and of some others. (See JAAFER.)

Benbow, an idle, generous, free-and-easy sot, who spent a good inheritance in dissipation, and ended life in the workhouse.

Benbow, a boon companion, long approved
By jovial sets, and (as he thought) beloved,
Was judged as one to joy and friendship prone,
And deemed injurious to himself alone.
Crabbe: Borough, xvi. (1810).

Ben'demeer', a river that flows near the ruins of Chil'minar' or Istachar', in the province of Chusistan in Persia.

Bend-the-Bow, an English archer at Dickson's cottage.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Benedick, a wild, witty, and light-hearted young lord of Padua, who vowed celibacy, but fell in love with Beatrice and married her. It fell out thus: He went on a visit to Leonato governor of Messina; here he saw Beatrice, the governor's niece, as wild and witty as himself, but he disliked her, thought her pert, forward, and somewhat ill-mannered withal. However, he heard Claudio speaking to Leonato about Beatrice, saying how deeply she loved Benedick, and bewailing that so nice a girl should break her heart with unrequited love. This conversation was a mere ruse, but Benedick believed it to be true, and resolved to reward the love of Beatrice with love and marriage. It so happened that Beatrice had been entrapped by a similar conversation which she had overheard from her cousin Hero. The end was they sincerely loved each other, and became man and wife.—Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing (1600).

A married man is called a Benedick.

Benefit-Play. The first actress indulged with a benefit-play was Mrs. Elizabeth Barry (1682–1733).

Ben'engel'i (Cid Hamet), the hypothetical Moorish chronicler from whom Cervantes pretends he derived the account of the adventures of don Quixote.

The Spanish commentators . . . have discovered that cid Hamet Benengeli is after all no more than an Arabic version of the name of Cervantes himself. Hamet is a Moorish prefix, and Benengeli signifies "son of a stag" in Spanish Cervanteno.—Lockhart.

Benengeli (Cid Hamet), Thomas Babington lord Macaulay. His signature in his Fragment of an Ancient Romance (1826).

Benev'olus, in Cowper's Task, is John Courtney Throckmorton, of Weston Underwood.

Benjie (Little), or Benjamin Colthred, a spy employed by Cristal Nixon, the agent of Redgauntlet.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Ben'net (Brother), a monk at St. Mary's convent.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Ben'net (Mrs.), a demure, intriguing woman in Amelia, a novel by Fielding (1751).

Ben'oiton (Madame), a woman who has been the ruin of the family by neglect. In the "famille Benoiton" the constant question was, "Où est Madame?" and the invariable answer, "Elle est sortie." At the dénouement the question was asked again, and the answer was varied thus: "Madam has been at home, but is gone out again."—La Famille Benoiton.

Ben'shee or Banshee, the domestic spirit of certain Irish families. The benshee takes an interest in the prosperity of the family to which it is attached, and intimates to it approaching disaster or death by wailings or shrieks. The Scotch Bodach Glay, or "grey spectre," is a similar spirit. (See WHITE LADY.)

How oft has the Benshee cried!
How oft has death untied
Bright links that glory wove,
Sweet bonds entwined by love!
T. Moore: Irish Melodies, ii.

Bentinck Street (London), named after William Bentinck, second duke of Portland, who married Margaret, only child of Edward second earl of Oxford and Mortimer.

Benvo'lio, nephew to Montague, and Romeo's friend. A testy, litigious fellow, who would quarrel about goat's wool or pigeon's milk. Mercutio says to him, "Thou hast quarrelled with a man for coughing in the street, because he hath wakened thy dog that hath lain asleep in the sun" (act iii. sc. 1).—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet (1598).

Ben'wicke (2 syl.), the kingdom of king Ban, father of sir Launcelot. It was situated in that extremely shadowy locality "beyond seas;" but whether it was Brittany or Utopia, "non nostrum tantas componĕre lites."

Probably it was Brittany, because it was across the channel, and was in France. Ban king of Benwicke was brother of Bors king of Gaul.—Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 8 (1470).

Beowulf, the name of an Anglo-Saxon epic poem of the sixth century. It received its name from Beowulf, who delivered Hrothgar king of Denmark from the monster Grendel. This Grendel was half monster and half man, and night after night stole into the king's palace called Heorot, and slew sometimes as many as thirty of the sleepers at a time. Beowulf put himself at the head of a mixed band of warriors, went against the monster and slew it. This epic is very Ossianic in style, is full of beauties, and is most interesting.—Kemble's Translation.

(A. D. Wackerbarth published in 1849 a metrical translation of this Anglo-Saxon poem, of considerable merit; and T. Arnold, in 1876, published an edition of the fragment, consisting of 6337 lines.)

Beppo. Byron's Beppo is the husband of Laura, a Venetian lady. He was taken captive in Troy, turned Turk, joined a band of pirates, grew rich, and after several years returned to his native land. He found his wife at a carnival ball with a cavaliero, made himself known to her, and they lived together again as man and wife. (Beppo is a contraction of Guiseppe, as Bill is of William. 1818.)

Beppo, in Fra Diavolo, an opera by Auber (1836).

Be'ralde (2 syl.), brother of Argan the malade imaginaire. He tells Argan that his doctors will confess this much, that the cure of a patient is a very minor consideration with them, "toute l'excellence de leur art consiste en un pompeux galimatias, en un spécieux babil, qui vous donne des mots pour des raisons, et des promesses pour des effets." Again he says, "presque tous les hommes meurent de leur remèdes et non pas de leurs maladies." He then proves that Argan's wife is a mere hypocrite, while his daugher is a true-hearted, loving girl; and he makes the invalid join in the dancing and singing provided for his cure.—Molière: Le Malade Imaginaire (1673).

Berch'ta ["the white lady"], a fairy of Southern Germany, answering to Hulda ("the gracious lady") of Northern Germany. After the introduction of Christianity, Berchta lost her first estate and lapsed into a bogie.

Berecyn'thian Goddess (The). Cybělê is so called from mount Berecyn'tus, in Phrygia, where she was held in especial adoration. She is represented as crowned with turrets, and holding keys in her hand.

> Her helmed head
> Rose like the Berecynthian goddess crowned
> With towers.
> Southey: Roderick, etc., li. (1814).

N.B.—Virgil gives the word both Cybële and Cybēle—

> Hinc mater cultrix Cybĕlē Corybantiaque æra.
> Æneid, iii. 111.
> Occurrit comitum: Nymphæ, quas alma Cybēle.
> Æneid, x. 220.

Berecyn'thian Hero (The), Midas king of Phrygia, so called from mount Berecyn'tus (4 syl.), in Phrygia.

Berenga'ria, queen-consort of Richard Cœur de Lion, introduced in The Talisman, a novel by sir W. Scott (1825). Berengaria died 1230.

Berenger (Sir Raymond), an old Norman warrior, living at the castle of Garde Doloureuse.

The lady Eveline Berenger, sir Raymond's daughter, betrothed to sir Hugo de Lacy. Sir Hugo cancels his own betrothal in favour of his nephew (sir Damian de Lacy), who marries the lady Eveline "the betrothed."—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Bereni'ce (4 syl.), sister-wife of Ptolemy III. She vowed to sacrifice her hair to the gods if her husband returned home the vanquisher of Asia. On his return, she suspended her hair in the temple of the war-god, but it was stolen the first night, and Conon of Samos told the king that the winds had carried it to heaven, where it still forms the seven stars near the tail of Leo, called Coma Berenices.

Pope, in his Rape of the Lock, has borrowed this fable to account for the lock of hair cut from Belinda's head, the restoration of which the young lady insisted upon. (See BELINDA, p. 105.)

Bereni'ce (4 syl.), a Jewish princess, daughter of Agrippa. She married Herod king of Chalcis, then Polemon king of Cilicia, and then went to live with Agrippa II. her brother. Titus fell in love with her and would have married her, but the Romans compelled him to renounce the idea, and a separation took place. Otway (1672) made this the subject of a tragedy called Titus and Berenicē; and Jean Racine (1670), in his tragedy of Bérénice, has made her a sort of Henriette d'Orléans.

(Henriette d'Orléans, daughter of Charles I. of England, married Philippe duc d'Orléans, brother of Louis XIV. She was brilliant in talent and beautiful in person, but being neglected by her husband, she died suddenly after drinking a cup of chocolate, probably poisoned.)

Beresi'na (4 syl.). Every streamlet shall prove a new Beresina (Russian): meaning "every streamlet shall prove their destruction and overthrow." The allusion is to the disastrous passage of the French army in November, 1812, during their retreat from Moscow. It is said that 12,000 of the fugitives were drowned in the stream, and 16,000 were taken prisoners by the Russians.

Beril. (See BERYL.)

Beringhen (The Sieur de), an old gourmand, who preferred patties to treason; but cardinal Richelieu banished him from France, saying—

> Sleep not another night in Paris,
> Or else your precious life may be in danger.
> Lord Lytton: Richelieu (1839).

Berin'thia, cousin of Amanda; a beautiful young widow attached to colonel Townly. In order to win him she plays upon his jealousy by coquetting with Loveless.—Sheridan: A Trip to Scarborough (1777).

Berke'ley (The Old Woman of), a woman whose life had been very wicked. On her death-bed she sent for her son who was a monk, and for her daughter who was a nun, and bade them put her in a strong stone coffin, and to fasten the coffin to the ground with strong bands of iron. Fifty priests and fifty choristers were to pray and sing over her for three days, and the bell was to toll without ceasing. The first night passed without much disturbance. The second night the candles burnt blue, and dreadful yells were heard outside the church. But the third night the devil broke into the church and carried off the old woman on his black horse.—Southey: The Old Woman of Berkeley (a ballad from Olaus Magnus).

Dr. Sayers pointed out to us in conversation a story related by Olaus Magnus of a witch whose coffin was confined by three chains, but nevertheless was carried off by demons. Dr. Sayers had made a ballad on the subject; so had I; but after seeing The Old Woman of Berkeley, we awarded it the preference.—W. Taylor.

Berkeley Square (London), so called in compliment to John lord Berkeley of Stratton.

Berke'ly (The lady Augusta), plighted to sir John de Walton governor of Douglas Castle. She first appears under the name of Augustine, disguised as the son of Bertram the minstrel, and the novel concludes with her marriage to De Walton, to whom Douglas Castle had been surrendered.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Berkley (Mr.), an English bachelor of fortune, somewhat advanced in age, "good humoured, humane, remarkable for good common sense, but very eccentric."—Longfellow: Hyperion (1839).

Berkshire Lady (The), Miss Frances Kendrick, daughter of Sir William Kendrick, second baronet; his father was created baronet by Charles II. The line, "Faint heart never won fair lady," was the advice of a friend to Mr. Child, the son of a brewer, who sought the hand of the lady.—Quarterly Review, cvi. 205-245.

Berme'ja, the Insula de la Torre, from which Am'adis of Gaul starts when he goes in quest of the enchantress-damsel, daughter of Finetor, the necromancer.

Bermu'das, a cant name for one of the purlieus of the Strand, at one time frequented by vagabonds, thieves, and all evil-doers who sought to lie perdu.

Bernard. Solomon Bernard, engraver of Lions (sixteenth century), called Le petit Bernard. Claude Bernard of Dijon, the philanthropist (1588-1641), is called Poor Bernard. Pierre Joseph Bernard, the French poet (1710-1775), is called Le gentil Bernard.

Bernard, an ass; in Italian, Bernardo. In the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox, the sheep is called "Bernard," and the ass is "Bernard l'archiprêtre" (1498).

Bernar'do, an officer in Denmark, to whom the ghost of the murdered king appeared during the night-watch at the royal castle.—Shakespeare: Hamlet (1596).

Bernardo del Carpio, one of the most favourite subjects of the old Spanish minstrels. The other two were The Cid and Lara's Seven Infants. Bernardo del Carpio was the person who assailed Orlando (or Rowland) at Roncesvallês, and, finding him invulnerable, took him up in his arms and squeezed him to death, as Hercules did Antæ'os.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. ii. 13 (1615).

 The only vulnerable part of Orlando was the sole of the foot.

Mrs. Hemans wrote a ballad so called.

Bernesque Poetry, like lord Byron's Don Juan, is a mixture of satire, tragedy, comedy, serious thought, wit, and ridicule. L. Pulci was the father of this class of rhyme (1432-1487); but Francesco Berni of Tuscany (1490-1537) so greatly excelled in it, that it is called Bernesque, from his name.

Bernit'ia with Dei'ra constituted Northumbria. Bernitia included Westmoreland, Durham, and part of Cumberland. Deira contained the other part of Cumberland, with Yorkshire and Lancashire.

Two kingdoms which had been with several thrones enstalled.
Bernitia hight the one, Diera [sic] th' other called.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xvi. (1613).

Ber'rathon, an island of Scandinavia.

Berser'ker, grandson of the eight-handed Starka'der and the beautiful Alfhil'dê. He was so called because he wore "no shirt of mail," but went to battle unharnessed. He married the daughter of Swaf'urlam, and had twelve sons. (Bær-syrce, Anglo-Saxon, "bare of shirt;" Scotch, "bare-sark.")

You say that I am a Berserker, and . . . bare-sark I go to-morrow to the war, and bare-sark I win that war or die.—Rev. C. Kingsley: Hereward the Wake, i. 249.

BERTHA, the supposed daughter of Vandunke (a syl.) burgomaster of Bruges, and mistress of Goswin a rich merchant of the same city. In reality, Bertha is the duke of Brabant's daughter Gertrude, and Goswin is Flores, son of Gerrard king of the beggars. — Fletcher: The Beggars' Bush (1622).

Ber'tha, daughter of Burkhard duke of the Alemanni, and wife of Rudolf II. king of Burgundy beyond Jura. She is represented on monuments of the time as sitting on her throne spinning.

You are the beautiful Bertha the Spinner, the queen of Helvetia; . . .
Who as she rode on her palfrey, o'er valley and meadow and mountain,
Ever was spinning her thread from the distaff fixed to her saddle.
She was so thrifty and good, that her name passed into a proverb.
Longfellow: Courtship of Miles Standish, viii.

Bertha, alias AGATHA, the betrothed of Hereward (3 syl.) one of the emperor's Varangian guards. The novel concludes with Hereward enlisting under the banner of count Robert, and marrying Bertha.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Ber'tha, the betrothed of John of Leyden. When she went with her mother to ask count Oberthal's permission to marry, the count resolved to make his pretty vassal his mistress, and confined her in his castle. She made her escape and went to Munster, intending to set fire to the palace of "the prophet," who, she thought, had caused the death of her lover. Being seized and brought before the prophet, she recognized in him her lover, and exclaiming, "I loved thee once, but now my love is turned to hate," stabbed herself and died.—Meyerbeer: Le Prophète (an opera, 1849).

Bertha, the blind daughter of Caleb Plummer, in Dickens's Christmas story The Cricket on the Hearth (1845).

Berthe au Grand-Pied, mother of Charlemagne, so called from a club-foot.

Bertold (St.), the first prior-general of Carmel (1073–1188). We are told in the Bréviare des Carmes that the goodness of this saint so spiritualized his face that it seemed actually luminous: "son âme se reflétait sur sa figure qui paraissait comme environnée des rayons de soleil."

Till oft converse with heavenly habitants
Begin to cast a beam on th' outward shape . . .
And turn it by degrees to the soul's essence.
Milton: Comus.

Bertoldo (Prince), a knight of Malta, and brother of Roberto king of the Two Sicilies. He is in love with Camiola "the maid of honour," but could not marry without a dispensation from the pope. While matters were at this crisis, Bertoldo laid siege to Sienna, and was taken prisoner. Camiola paid his ransom, but before he was released the duchess Aurelia requested him to be brought before her. Immediately the duchess saw him, she fell in love with him, and offered him marriage; and Bertoldo, forgetful of Camiola, accepted the offer. The betrothed then presented themselves before the king. Here Camiola exposed the conduct of the knight; Roberto was indignant; Aurelia rejected her fiancé with scorn; and Camiola took the veil.—Massinger: The Maid of Honour (1637).

Bertol'do, the chief character of a comic romance called Vita di Bertoldo, by Julio Cesare Crocê, who flourished in the sixteenth century. It recounts the successful exploits of a clever but ugly peasant whom nothing astonishes. Hence the phrase, Imperturbable as Bertolde (never disconcerted). This jeu d'esprit was for two centuries as popular in Italy as Robinson Crusoe is in England.

Bertoldo's Son, Rinaldo.—Tasso Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

BERTRAM (Baron), one of Charlemagne's paladins.

Ber'tram, count of Rousillon. While on a visit to the king of France, Hel'ena, a physician's daughter, cured the king of a disorder which had baffled the court physicians. For this service the king promised her for husband any one she chose to select, and her choice fell on Bertram. The haughty count married her, it is true, but deserted her at once, and left for Florence, where he joined the duke's army. It so happened that Helena also stopped at Florence while on a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Jacques le Grand. In Florence she lodged with a widow whose daughter Diana was wantonly loved by Bertram. Helena obtained permission to receive his visits in lieu of Diana, and in one of these visits exchanged rings with him. Soon after this the count went on a visit to his mother, where he saw the king, and the king observing on his finger the ring he had given to Helena, had him arrested on the suspicion of murder. Helena now came forward to explain matters, and all was well, for all ended well.—Shakespeare: All's Well that Ends Well (1598).

I cannot reconcile my heart to "Bertram," a man noble without generosity, and young without truth; who marries Helena as a coward, and leaves her as a profligate. When she is dead by his unkindness he sneaks home to a second marriage, is accused by a woman whom he has wronged, defends himself by falsehood, and is dismissed to happiness.—Dr. Johnson.

Bertram (Sir Stephen), an austere merchant, very just but not generous. Fearing lest his son should marry the sister of his clerk (Charles Ratcliffe), he dismissed Ratcliffe from his service, and being then informed that the marriage had been already consummated, he disinherited his son. Sheva the Jew assured him that the lady had £10,000 for her fortune, so he relented. At the last all parties were satisfied.

Frederick Bertram, only son of sir Stephen; he marries Miss Ratcliffe clandestinely, and incurs thereby his father's displeasure, but the noble benevolence of Sheva the Jew brings about a reconciliation, and opens sir Bertram's eyes to "see ten thousand merits," a grace for every pound.—Cumberland: The Jew (1776).

Bertram (Count), an outlaw, who becomes the leader of a band of robbers. Being wrecked on the coast of Sicily, he is conveyed to the castle of lady Imogine, and in her he recognizes an old sweetheart to whom in his prosperous days he was greatly attached. Her husband (St. Aldobrand), who was away at first, returning unexpectedly, is murdered by Bertram; Imogine goes mad and dies; and Bertram puts an end to his own life.—C. Maturin: Bertram (a tragedy, 1816).

Bertram (Mr. Godfrey), the laird of Ellangowan.

Mrs. Bertram, his wife.

Harry Bertram, alias captain Vanbeest Brown, alias Dawson, alias Dudley, son of the laird, and heir to Ellangowan. Harry Bertram is in love with Julia Mannering, and the novel concludes with his taking possession of the old house at Ellangowan and marrying Julia.

Lucy Bertram, sister of Harry Bertram. She marries Charles Hazlewood, son of sir Robert Hazlewood, of Hazlewood.

Sir Allen Bertram, of Ellangowan, an ancestor of Mr. Godfrey Bertram.

Denis Bertram, Donohoe Bertram, and Lewis Bertram, ancestors of Mr. Godfrey Bertram.

Captain Andrew Bertram, a relative of the family.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Bertram, the English minstrel, and guide of lady Augusta Berkely. When in disguise, the lady Augusta calls herself Augustine, the minstrel's son.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Ber'tram, one of the conspirators against the republic of Venice. Having "a hesitating softness, fatal to a great enterprise," he betrayed the conspiracy to the senate.—Byron: Marino Faliero (1819).

Bertra'mo, the fiend-father of Robert le Diable. After alluring his son to gamble away all his property, he met him near St. Ire'nê, and Hel'ena seduced him to join in "the Dance of Love." When at last Bertramo came to claim his victim, he was resisted by Alice (the duke's foster-sister), who read to Robert his mother's will. Being thus reclaimed, angels celebrated the triumph of good over evil.—Meyerbeer: Roberto il Diavolo (an opera, 1831).

Bertrand, a simpleton and a villain. He is the accomplice of Robert Macaire, a libertine of unblushing impudence, who sins without compunction.—Daumier: L'Auberge des Adrets.

Bertrand du Gueslin, a romance of chivalry, reciting the adventures of this connétable de France, in the reign of Charles V.

Bertrand du Gueslin in prison. The prince of Wales went to visit his captive Bertrand; and, asking him how he fared, the Frenchman replied, "Sir, I have heard the mice and the rats this many a day, but it is long since I heard the song of birds," i.e. I have been long a captive and have not breathed the fresh air.

¶ The reply of Bertrand du Gueslin brings to mind that of Douglas, called "The Good sir James," the companion of Robert Bruce, "It is better, I ween, to hear the lark sing than the mouse cheep," i.e. It is better to keep the open field than to be shut up in a castle.

Bertulphe (2 syl.), provost of Bruges, the son of a serf. By his genius and energy he became the richest, most honoured, and most powerful man in Bruges. His arm was strong in fight, his wisdom swayed the council, his step was proud, and his eye untamed. Bertulphe had one child, the bride of sir Bouchard, a knight of noble descent. Now, Charles "the Good," earl of Flanders, had made a law (1127) that whoever married a serf should become a serf, and that serfs were serfs till manumission. By these absurd decrees Bertulphe the provost, his daughter Constance, and his knightly son-in-law were all serfs. The result was that the provost slew the earl and then himself; his daughter went mad and died; and Bouchard was slain in fight.—Knowles: The Provost of Bruges (1836).

Ber'wine (2 syl.), the favourite attendant of lady Er'mengarde (3 syl.) of Baldringham, great-aunt of lady Eveline "the betrothed."—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Be'ryl, a kind of crystal, much used at one time by fortune-tellers, who looked into the beryl and then uttered their predictions.

> . . . and, like a prophet,
> Looks in a glass that shews what future evils . . .
> Are now to have no successive degree,
> But where they live, to end.
> Shakespeare: Measure for Measure, act I. sc. 2 (1603).

Ber'yl Mol'ozane (3 syl.), the lady-love of George Geith. All beauty, love, and sunshine. She has a heart for every one, is ready to help every one, and is by every one beloved; yet her lot is most painfully unhappy, and ends in an early death.—F. G. Trafford [Mrs. Riddell]: George Geith (1864).

Besieger (The), Demetrius Polic'rates (4 syl.), king of Macedon (died B.C. 522).

> Since the days of Demetrius Poliorcetes, no man had besieged so many cities.—Motley: The Dutch Republic, pt. iii. 2.

Beso'nian (A), a scoundrel. From the Italian, bisognoso, "a needy person, a beggar."

> Proud lords do tumble from the towers of their high descents; and be trod under feet of every inferior besonian.—Thomas Nash: Pierce Pennylesse, his Supplication, etc. (1592).

Bess (Good queen), Elizabeth (1533, 1558–1603).

Bess, the daughter of the "blind beggar of Bethnal Green," a lady by birth, a sylph for beauty, an angel for constancy and sweetness. She was loved to distraction by Wilford, who turns out to be the son of lord Woodville; and as Bess was the daughter of lord Woodville's brother, they were cousins. Queen Elizabeth sanctioned their nuptials, and took them under her own especial conduct. —S. Knowles: The Beggar of Bethnal Green (1834).

Bess o' Bedlam, a female lunatic vagrant; the male lunatic vagrant being called a Tom o' Bedlam.

Bessus, governor of Bactria, who seized Dari'us (after the battle of Arbe'la) and put him to death. Arrian says, Alexander caused the nostrils of the regicide to be slit, and the tips of his ears to be cut off. The offender, being then sent to Ecbat'ana in chains, was put to death.

> Lo! Bessus, he that armde with murderer's knyfe
> And traytrous hart agaynst his royal king,
> With bluddy hands bereft his master's life . . .
> What booted him his false usurped raygne . . .
> When like a wretche led in an iron chayne,
> He was presented by his chiefest friende
> Unto the foes of him whom he had slayne?
> Sackville: A Mirrour for Magistraytes ("The Complaynt," 1587).

Bes'sus, a cowardly bragging captain, a sort of Bobadil or Vincent de la Rosa. Captain Bessus, having received a challenge, wrote word back that he could not accept the honour for thirteen weeks, as he had already 212 duels on hand, but he was much grieved he could not appoint an earlier day.—Fletcher: King or No King (a tragedy, 1619).

> Rochester I despise for want of wit . . .
> So often does he aim, so seldom hit . . .
> Mean in each action, loud in every limb,
> Manners themselves are mischievous in him . . .
> [Oh] what a Bessus has he always lived!
> Dryden: Essay upon Satire.

Bessy Bell. (See BELL, p. 106.)

Bestiaries, a class of books immensely popular in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, when symbolism was much in vogue, and sundry animals were made symbols, not only of moral qualities, but of religious doctrines. Thus the unicorn with its one horn symbolized Christ (the one Saviour), the gospel (or one way of salvation); and the legend that it could be caught only by a virgin symbolized "God made man" being born of the virgin Mary.

Beth Gelert. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 128.)

Bétique (2 syl.) or Bæ'tica (Grana'da and Andalusia), so called from the river Bætis (Guadalquiver). Ado'am describes this part of Spain to Telem'achus as a veritable Utopia.—Fénelon Aventures des Télémaque, viii. (1700).

Betrothed (The), one of the Tales of the Crusaders, by sir W. Scott (1825); time, Henry II. of England. The lady Eveline, daughter of sir Raymond, was for three years "betrothed" to sir Hugo de Lacy (the crusader), but ultimately married his nephew, sir Damian de Lacy. The tale is as follows: Gwenwin, a Welsh prince, living in Powys Castle, asked the hand of lady Eveline in marriage, but the alliance was declined by her father. Whereupon Gwenwyn besieged sir Raymond's castle, and lady Eveline saw her father fall, slain by the Welsh prince. Sir Hugo de Lacy came to the rescue, dispersed the Welsh army, proposed marriage, and being accepted, lady Eveline was placed in a convent under charge of her aunt till the marriage could be consummated. Sir Hugo was now ordered to the Holy Land for three years on a crusade, and lady Eveline had to wait for his return. On one occasion she was treacherously induced to join a hawking party; and, being seized by emissaries of the Welsh prince, was confined in a "cavern." Sir Damian de Lacy rescued her, but, being severely wounded, was confined to his bed and nursed by the lady. When sir Hugo returned, he soon found out how the land lay, and magnanimously cancelled his own betrothal in favour of his nephew. Sir Damian married the betrothed, and so the novel ends.

Better to Reign in Hell than Serve in Heaven.—Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 263 (1665).

¶ Julius Cæsar used to say he would rather be the first man in a country village than the second at Rome. (See CÆSAR, p. 165.)

Betty Doxy. Captain Macheath says to her, "Do you drink as hard as ever? You had better stick to good wholesome beer; for, in troth, Betty, strong waters will in time ruin your constitution. You should leave those to your betters."—Gay: The Beggar's Opera, ii. 1 (1727).

Betty Foy, "the idiot mother of an idiot boy."—Wordsworth (1770–1850).

Betty [Hint], servant in the family of sir Pertinax and lady McSycophant. She is a sly, prying tale-bearer, who hates Constantia (the beloved of Egerton McSycophant), simply because every one else loves her.—Macklin: The Man of the World (a comedy, 1764).

Betu'bium, Dumsby or the Cape of St. Andrew, in Scotland.

> The north-inflated tempest foams
> O'er Orka's or Betubium's highest peak.
> Thomson: The Seasons ("Autumn," 1730).

Betula Alba, common birch. The Roman lictors made fasces of its branches, and also employed it for scourging children, etc. (Latin, batulo, "to beat.")

> The college porter brought in a huge quantity of that betulineous tree, a native of Britain, called Betula alba, which furnished rods for the school.—Lord W. R. Lennox: Celebrities, etc., i. 43.

Beulah, that land of rest which a Christian enjoys when his faith is so strong that he no longer fears or doubts. Sunday is sometimes so called. In Bunyan's allegory (The Pilgrim's Progress) the pilgrims tarry in the land of Beulah after their pilgrimage is over, till they are summoned to cross the stream of Death and enter into the Celestial City.

> After this, I beheld until they came unto the land of Beulah, where the sun shineth night and day. Here, because they were weary, they betook themselves awhile to rest; but a little while soon refreshed them here, for the bells did so ring, and the trumpets sounded so melodiously that they could not sleep. . . . In this land they heard nothing, saw nothing, smelt nothing, tasted nothing that was offensive.—Bunyan: The Pilgrim's Progress, i. (1678).

Beuves (1 syl.) or Buo'vo of Ay'gremont, father of Malagigi, and uncle of Rinaldo. Treacherously slain by Gano.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Beuves de Hantone, the French form for Bevis of Southampton (q.v.).

Bev'an (Mr.), an American physician, who befriends Martin Chuzzlewit and Mark Tapley in many ways during their stay in the New World.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Bev'erley, "the gamester," naturally a good man, but led astray by Stukely, till at last he loses everything by gambling, and dies a miserable death.

Mrs. Beverley, the gamester's wife. She loves her husband fondly, and clings to him in all his troubles.

Charlotte Beverley, in love with Lewson, but Stukely wishes to marry her. She loses all her fortune through her brother "the gamester," but Lewson notwithstanding marries her.—Edw. Moore: The Gamester (1753).

> Mr. Young was acting "Beverley" with Mrs. Siddons. . . . In the 4th act "Beverley" swallows poison; and when "Bates" comes in and says to the dying man, "Jarvis found you quarrelling with Lawson in the streets last night," "Mrs. Beverley" replies, "No, I am sure he did not." To this "Jarvis" adds, "And if I did——" when "Mrs. Beverley" interrupts him with, "'Tis false, old man; they had no quarrel. . . ." In uttering these words, Mrs. Siddons gave such a piercing shriek of grief that Young was unable to utter a word from a swelling in his throat.—Campbell: Life of Siddons.

Beverley, brother of Clarissa, and the lover of Belinda Blandford. He is extremely jealous, and catches at trifles light as air to confirm his fears; but his love is most sincere, and his penitence most humble when he finds out how causeless his suspicions are. Belinda is too proud to deny his insinuations, but her love is so deep that she repents of giving him a moment's pain.—Murphy: All in the Wrong (a comedy, 1761).

Young's countenance was equally well adapted for the expression of pathos or of pride; thus in such parts as "Hamlet," "Beverley," "The Stranger" . . . he looked the men he represented.—New Monthly (1822).

Bev'il, a model gentleman, in Steele's Conscious Lovers.

Whate'er can deck mankind
Or charm the heart, in generous Bevil shewed.
Thomson: The Seasons ("Winter," 1726).

Bevil (Francis, Harry, and George), three brothers—one an M.P., another in the law, and the third in the Guards—who, unknown to each other, wished to obtain in marriage the hand of Miss Grubb, the daughter of a rich stock-broker. The M.P. paid his court to the father, and obtained his consent; the lawyer paid his court to the mother, and obtained her consent; the officer paid his court to the young lady, and, having obtained her consent, the other two brothers retired from the field.—O'Brien: Cross Purposes.

Be'vis, the horse of lord Marmion.—Sir W. Scott: Marmion (1808).

Be'vis (Sir) of Southampton. Having, while still a lad, reproved his mother for murdering his father, she employed Saber to kill him; but Saber only left him on a desert land as a waif, and he was brought up as a shepherd. Hearing that his mother had married Mor'dure (2 syl.), the adulterer, he forced his way into the marriage hall and struck at Mordure; but Mordure slipped aside, and escaped the blow. Bevis was now sent out of the country, and being sold to an Armenian, was presented to the king. Jos'ian, the king's daughter, fell in love with him; they were duly married, and Bevis was knighted. Having slain the boar which made holes in the earth as big as that into which Curtius leapt, he was appointed general of the Armenian forces, subdued Brandamond of Damascus, and made Damascus tributary to Armenia. Being sent, on a future occasion, as ambassador to Damascus, he was thrust into a prison, where were two huge serpents; these he slew, and then effected his escape. His next encounter was with Ascupart, the giant, whom he made his slave. Lastly, he slew the great dragon of Colein, and then returned to England, where he was restored to his lands and titles. The French call him Beuves de Hantone.—Drayton: Polyolbion, ii. (1612).

The Sword of Bevis of Southampton was Morglay, and his steed Ar'undel. Both were given him by his wife Josian, daughter of the king of Armenia.

Beza'liel, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for the marquis of Worcester, afterwards duke of Beaufort. Bezaliel, the famous artificer, "was filled with the Spirit of God to devise excellent works in every kind of workmanship;" and of the marquis of Worcester, Tate says—

. . . so largely Nature heaped her store,
There scarce remained for arts to give him more.
Dryden and Tate: Part ii. read from 941 to 966 (1682)

Bezo'nian, a beggar, a rustic. (Italian, bisognoso, "necessitous.") Pistol (in 2 Henry IV. act v. sc. 3) so calls Justice Shallow.

The ordinary tillers of the earth, such as we call husbandmen; in France, peasants; in Spaine, bezonyans; and generally cloutshoe.—Markham: English Husbandman, 4.

Bian'ca, the younger daughter of Baptista of Pad'ua, as gentle and meek as her sister Katherine was violent and irritable. As it was not likely any one would marry Katherine "the shrew," the father resolved that Bianca should not marry before her sister. Petruchio married "the shrew," and then Lucentio married Bianca.—Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew (1594).

Bian'ca, a courtezan, the "almost" wife of Cassio. Iago, speaking of the lieutenant, says—

And what was he?
Forsooth, a great arithmetician,
One Michael Cassio, a Florentine,
A fellow almost damn'd in a fair wife.
Shakespeare: Othello, act i. sc. 1 (1611).

Bian'ca, wife of Fazio. When her husband wantons with the marchioness Aldabella, Bianca, out of jealousy, accuses him to the duke of Florence of being privy to the death of Bartol'do, an old miser. Fazio being condemned to death, Bianca repents of her rashness, and tries to save her husband, but not succeeding, goes mad and dies.—Dean Milman: Fazio (1815).

Bibbet (Master), secretary to major-general Harrison, one of the parliamentary commissioners.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

"Bible" Butler, alias Stephen Butler, grandfather of Reuben Butler the presbyterian minister (married to Jeanie Deans).—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Bible in Spain (The), a prose work by George Borrow (1844), giving graphic pictures of high, middle, and low life in Spain.

Biblia Sauperum. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 132.)

Bib'lis, a woman who fell in love with her brother Caunus, and was changed into a fountain near Mile'tus.—Ovid: Metamorphoses, ix. 662.

Not that [fountain] where Biblis dropt, too fondly light,
Her tears and self may dare compare with this.
P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, v. (1633).

Bib'ulus, a colleague of Julius Cæsar, but a mere cipher in office; hence his name became a household word for a nonentity.

Bickerstaff (Isaac), a pseudonym assumed by dean Swift, in the paper-war with Partridge the almanac-maker (1709).

Richard Steele, editor of The Tatler, entitled his periodical "The lucubrations of Isaac Bickerstaff, esq., astrologer" (1709–1711).

Bickerton (Mrs.), landlady of the Seven Stars inn of York, where Jeanie Deans stops on her way to London, whither she is going to plead for her sister's pardon.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Bid'denden Maids (The), two sisters named Mary and Elizabeth Chulkhurst, born at Biddenden in 1100. They were joined together by the shoulders and hips, and lived to the age of 34. Some say that it was Mary and Elizabeth Chulkhurst who left twenty acres of land to the poor of Biddenden. This tenement is called "Bread and Cheese Land," because the rent derived from it is distributed on Easter Sunday in doles of bread and cheese. Halstead says, in his History of Kent, that it was the gift of two maidens named Preston, and not of the Biddenden Maids.

Biddy, servant to Wopsle's great-aunt, who kept an "educational institution." A good, honest girl, who falls in love with Pip, was loved by Dolge Orlick, but married Joe Gargery.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

Biddy [Bellair] (Miss), "Miss in her teens," in love with captain Loveit. She was promised in marriage by her aunt and guardian to an elderly man whom she detested; and during the absence of captain Loveit in the Flanders war, she coquetted with Mr. Fribble and captain Flash. On the return of her "Strephon," she set Fribble and Flash together by the ears; and while they stood menacing each other but afraid to fight, captain Loveit entered and sent them both to the right-about.—Garrick: Miss in Her Teens (1753).

Bide-the-Bent (Mr. Peter), minister of Wolf's Hope village.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Bid'more (Lord), patron of the rev. Josiah Cargill, minister of St. Ronan's.

The Hon. Augustus Bidmore, son of lord Bidmore, and pupil of the rev. Josiah Cargill, Miss Augusta Bidmore, daughter of lord Bidmore; beloved by the rev. Josiah Cargill.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Bie'derman (Arnold), alias count Arnold of Geierstein [Gī'-er-stine], landamman of Unterwalden. Anne of Geierstein, his brother's daughter, is under his charge.

Bertha Biederman, Arnold's late wife.

Ru'diger Biederman, Arnold Biederman's son.

Ernest Biederman, brother of Rudiger.

Sigismund Biederman, nicknamed "The Simple," another brother.

Ulrick Biederman, youngest of the four brothers.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Bi-forked Letter of the Greeks, Y (capital U), which resembles a bird flying.

[The birds] flying, write upon the sky
The bi-forked letter of the Greeks.
Longfellow: The Wayside Inn (prelude).

Bi'frost, the bridge which spans heaven and earth. The rainbow is this bridge, and its colours are attributed to the precious stones which bestud it.—Scandinavian Myth.

Big-en'dians (The), a hypothetical religious party of Lilliput, who made it a matter of "faith" to break their eggs at the "big end." Those who broke them at the other end were considered heretics, and called Little-endians.—Dean Swift: Gulliver's Travels (1726).

Big'low Papers (The), a series of satirical poems in "Yankee dialect," by Hosea Biglow (James Russell Lowell, of Boston, U.S.). First series, 1848; second series, 1864.

Big'ot (De), seneschal of prince John.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

"We will not forget it," said prince John . . . "De Bigot," he added to his seneschal, "thou wilt word this . . . summons so courteously as to gratify the pride of these Saxons . . . although, by the boans of Becket, courtesy to them is casting pearls before swine."—Chap. xiii.

Big'ot, in C. Lamb's Essays, is John Fenwick, editor of the Albion newspaper

Big-Sea-Water, lake Superior, also called Gitchê Gu'mee.

> Forth upon the Gitche Gumee,
> On the shining Big-Sea-Water . . .
> All alone went Hiawatha.
> Longfellow: Hiawatha, VIII.

Bi'lander, a boat used in coast navigation [By-land-er].

> Why choose we then like bilanders to creep
> Along the coast, and land in view to keep,
> When safely we may launch into the deep?
> Dryden: Hind and the Panther (1687).

Bil'bilis, a river in Spain. The high temper of the best Spanish blades is due to their being dipped into this river, the water of which is extremely cold.

> Help me, I pray you, to a Spanish sword,
> The trustiest blade that e'er in Bilbilis
> Was dipt.
> Southey: Roderick, etc., XXV. (1814).

Bilbo, a Spanish blade noted for its flexibility, and so called from Bilba'o, where at one time the best blades were made.

Bilboes (2 syl.), a bar of iron with fetters annexed to it, by which mutinous sailors were at one time linked together. Some of the bilboes taken from the Spanish Armada are preserved in the British Museum. They are so called, not because they were first made at Bilba'o, in Spain, but from the entanglements of the river on which Bilbao stands. These "entanglements" are called The Bilboes. Beaumont and Fletcher compare the marriage knot to bilboes.

Bil'dai (2 syl.), a seraph and the tutelar guardian of Matthew the apostle, the son of wealthy parents and brought up in great luxury.—Klopstock: The Messiah, iii. (1748).

Billee' (Little), a comic ballad by Thackeray, telling how three sailors of Bristol city went to sea, and, having eaten all their food, resolved to make a meal of Little Billee; but the lad eluded his fate.

> There were three sailors of Bristol city
> Who took a boat and went to sea.
> But first with beef and captain's biscuit
> And pickled pork they loaded she.
> There was gorging Jack and guzzling Jimmy,
> And the younger he was little Billee.
> Now when they had got as far as the Equator
> They'd nothing left but one split pea.

Note.—This is supposed to be the correct version of the first two verses.

Billings (Josh.). A. W. Shaw so signs His Book of Sayings (1866).

Billingsgate (3 syl.). Beling was a friend of "Brennus" the Gaul, who owned a wharf called Beling's-gate. Geoffrey of Monmouth derives the word from Belin, a mythical king of the ancient Britons, who "built a gate there, B.C. 400" (1142).

Billy Barlow, a merry Andrew, so called from a semi-idiot, who fancied himself "a great potentate." He was well known in the east of London, and died in Whitechapel workhouse. Some of his sayings were really witty, and some of his attitudes truly farcical.

Billy Black, the conundrum-maker. —The Hundred-pound Note.

When Keeley was playing "Billy Black" at Chelmsford, he advanced to the lights at the close of the piece, and said, "I've one more, and this is a good 'un. Why is Chelmsford Theatre like a half-moon? D'ye give it up? Because it is never full."—Records of a Stage Veteran.

Bimater ["two-mother"]. Bacchus was so called because at the death of his mother during gestation, Jupiter put the fœtus into his own thigh for the rest of the time, when the infant Bacchus was duly brought forth.

Bimbister (Margery), the old Ranzelman's spouse.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Bimini [Be'-me-nee], a fabulous island, said to belong to the Baha'ma group, and containing a fountain possessed of the power of restoring youth. This island was an object of long search by the Spanish navigator Juan Ponce de Leon (1460–1521).

Bind'loose (John), sheriff's clerk and banker at Marchthorn.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Bing'en (Bishop of), generally called bishop Hatto. The tale is that during the famine of 970, he invited the poor to his barn on a certain day, under the plea of distributing corn to them; but when the barn was crowded he locked the door and set fire to the building; for which iniquity he was himself devoured by an army of mice or rats. His castle is the Mouse-tower on the Rhine. Of course, this is a mere fable, suggested by the word "Mouse-tower," which means the tower where tolls are collected. The toll on corn was very unpopular.

> They almost devour me with kisses,
> Their arms about me entwine,
> Till I think of the bishop of Bingen,
> In his Mouse-tower on the Rhine.
> Longfellow: The Children's Hour.

Binks (Sir Bingo), a fox-hunting baronet, and visitor at the Spa.

Lady Binks, wife of sir Bingo, but before marriage Miss Rachael Bonnyrigg. Visitor at the Spa with her husband.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Bi'on, the rhetorician, noted for his acrimonious and sharp sayings.

Bionis sermonibus et sale nigro.
Horace: 2 Epistles, ii. 60.

Biondel'lo, one of the servants of Lucentio the future husband of Bianca (sister of "the shrew"). His fellow-servant is Tra'nio.—Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew (1594).

Birch. "Dr. Birch and his Young Friends." A "Christmas Tale" by Thackeray (1849).

Birch (Harvey), a prominent character in The Spy, a novel by J. F. Cooper (1821).

Birch'over Lane (London), so called from Birchover, the builder, who owned the houses there.

Bird (The Little Green), of the frozen regions, which could reveal every secret and impart information of events past, present, or to come. Prince Chery went in search of it, so did his two cousins, Brightsun and Felix; last of all went Fairstar, who succeeded in obtaining it, and liberated the princes who had failed in their attempts.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Princess Chery," 1682).

This tale is a mere reproduction of "The Two Sisters," the last tale of the Arabian Nights, in which the bird is called "Bulbul-hezar, the talking bird."

Bird Singing to a Monk. The monk was Felix.—Longfellow: Golden Legend, ii.

Archbishop Trench has written a version of this legend in verse; bishop Ken tells the same story in verse; and cardinal Newman repeats it in his Grammar of Assent.

Bird Told Me (A Little). "A bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter" (Eccles. x. 20). In the old Basque legends a "little bird" is introduced "which tells the truth." The sisters had deceived the king by assuring him that his first child was a cat, his second a dog, and his third a bear; but the "little bird" told him the truth—the first two were daughters and the third a son. This little truth-telling bird appears in sundry tales of great antiquity; it is introduced in the tale of "Princess Fairstar" (Comtesse D'Aulnoy) as a "little green bird who tells everything;" also in the Arabian Nights (the last tale, called "The Two Sisters").

I think I hear a little bird who sings,
"The people by-and-by will be the strongest."
Byron: Don Juan, viii. 30 (1821).

¶ When Kenelm or Cenhelm was murdered by the order of his sister Cwenthryth, "at the very same hour a white dove flew to Rome, and, lighting on the high altar of St. Peter's, deposited there a letter containing a full account of the murder." So the pope sent men to examine into the matter, and a chapel was built over the dead body, called "St. Kenelm's Chapel to this day" (Shropshire).

Bire'no, the lover and subsequent husband of Olympia queen of Holland. He was taken prisoner by Cymosco king of Friza, but was released by Orlando. Bireno, having forsaken Olympia, was put to death by Oberto king of Ireland, who married the young widow.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, iv., v. (1516).

Bire'no (Duke), heir to the crown of Lombardy. It was the king's wish he should marry Sophia, his only child, but the princess loved Pal'adore (3 syl.), a Briton. Bireno had a mistress named Alin'da, whom he induced to personate the princess, and in Paladore's presence she cast down a rope-ladder for the duke to climb up by. Bireno has Alinda murdered to prevent the deception being known, and accuses the princess of inchastity—a crime in Lombardy punished by death. As the princess is led to execution, Paladore challenges the duke, and kills him. The villainy is fully revealed, and the princess is married to the man of her choice, who had twice saved her life.—Jephson: The Law of Lombardy (1779).

Birmingham of Belgium, Liège.

Birmingham of Russia, Tula, south of Moscow.

Birmingham Poet (The), John Freeth, the wit, poet, and publican, who wrote his own songs, set them to music, and sang them (1730–1808).

Birnam Wood. Macbeth said he was told—

. . . "Fear not, till Birnam wood
Do come to Dunsinane;" and now a wood
Comes towards Dunsinane.
Shakespeare: Macbeth, act v. sc. 5.

This has been often repeated in history, as by Alexander, the Spanish mutineers, Hassan, and others.

¶ When Alexander marched against Darius, he commanded his soldiers "ut inciderent ramos arbŏrum . . . easque inferent equōrum pedibus . . . quos videntes Persæ ab excelsis montibus stupēbant. '—Historia Alexandri Magni (1490).

¶ At the siege of Antwerp, 1576, the Spanish mutineers wore green branches when they came from Alost, and looked like a moving wood approaching the citadel.—Motley: The Dutch Republic, iv. 5.

For Hassan's incident, see Notes and Queries (March 13, 1880).

BIRON, a merry mad-cap young lord, in attendance on Ferdinand king of Navarre. Biron promised to spend three years with the king in study, during which time no woman was to approach his court; but no sooner has he signed the compact than he falls in love with Rosaline. Rosaline defers his suit for twelve months and a day, saying, "If you my favour mean to get, for twelve months seek the weary beds of people sick."

> A merrier man,
> Within the limit of becoming mirth,
> I never spent an hour's talk withal.
> His eye begets occasion for his wit:
> For every object that the one doth catch,
> The other turns to a mirth-moving jest;
> Which his fair tongue (conceit's expositor)
> Delivers in such apt and gracious words,
> That aged ears play truant at his tales,
> And younger hearings are quite ravished.
> Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, act ii. sc. 1 (1594)

Biron (Charles de Gontaut duc de), greatly beloved by Henri IV. of France. He won immortal laurels at the battles of Arques and Ivry, and at the sieges of Paris and Rouen. The king loaded him with honours: he was admiral of France, marshal, governor of Bourgoyne, duke and peer of France. This too-much honour made him forget himself, and he entered into a league with Spain and Savoy against his country. The plot was discovered by Lafin; and although Henri wished to pardon him, he was executed (1602, aged 40). George Chapman has made him the subject of two tragedies, entitled Biron's Conspiracy and Biron's Tragedy (1557–1634).

Biron, eldest son of count Baldwin, who disinherited him for marrying Isabella, a nun. (For the rest of the tale, see ISABELLA.)—Southern: Isabella, or the Fatal Marriage.

During the absence of the elder Macready, his son took the part of "Biron" in Isabella. The father was shocked, because he desired his son for the Church; but Mrs. Siddons remarked to him, "In the Church your son will live and die a curate on £50 a year, but if successful, the stage will bring him in a thousand."—Donaldson: Recollections.

Biron (Harriet), the object of sir Charles Grandison's affections.

One would prefer Dulcinea del Toboso to Miss Biron as soon as Grandison becomes acquainted with the amiable, delicate, virtuous, unfortunate Clementina.—Epilogue of the Editor on the Story of Habib and Dorathilgoase.

Birth. It was lord Thurlow who called high birth "the accident of an accident."

Birtha, the motherless daughter and only child of As'tragon the Lombard philosopher. In spring she gathered blossoms for her father's still, in autumn berries, and in summer flowers. She fell in love with duke Gondibert, whose wounds she assisted her father to heal. Birtha, "in love unpractised and unread," is the beau-ideal of innocence and purity of mind. Gondibert had just plighted his love to her when he was summoned to court, for king Aribert had proclaimed him his successor and future son-in-law. Gondibert assured Birtha he would remain true to her, and gave her an emerald ring which he told her would lose its lustre if he proved untrue. Here the tale breaks off, and as it was never finished the sequel is not known.—Sir W. Davenant: Gondibert (an heroic poem, 1651).

Bise, a wind prevalent in those valleys of Savoy which open to the sea. It especially affects the nervous system.

Biser'ta, formerly called U'tica, in Africa. The Saracens passed from Biserta to Spain, and Charlemagne in 800 undertook a war against the Spanish Saracens. The Spanish historians assert that he was routed at Fontarabia (a strong town in Biscay); but the French maintain that he was victorious, although they allow that the rear of his army was cut to pieces.

> Or whom Biserta sent from Afric shore,
> When Charlemain with all his peerage fell
> By Fontarabia.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 585 (1665).

Bishop. Burnt milk is called by Tusser "milk that the bishop doth ban." Tyndale says when milk or porridge is burnt "we saye the bishope hath put his fote in the potte," and explains it thus, "the bishopes burn whom they lust."

Bishops. The seven who refused to read the declaration of indulgence published by James II. and were by him imprisoned for recusancy, were archbishop Sancroft (Canterbury), bishops Lloyd (St. Asaph), Turner (Ely), Kew (Bath and Wells), White (Peterborough), Lake (Chichester), Trelawney (Bristol). Being tried, they were all acquitted (June, 1688).

Bishop Middleham, who was always declaiming against ardent drinks, and advocating water as a beverage, killed himself by secret intoxication.

Bisto'nians, the Thracians; so called from Biston (son of Mars), who built Bisto'nia on lake Bis'tonis.

> So the Bistonian race, a maddening train,
> Exult and revel on the Thracian plain.
> Pitt's Statius, ll.

Bit'elas (3 syl.), sister of Fairlimb, and daughter of Rukenaw the ape, in the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox (1498).

Bi'ting Remark (A). Near'chos ordered Ze'no the philosopher to be pounded to death in a mortar. When he had been pounded some time, he told Nearchos he had an important communication to make to him, but as the tyrant bent over the mortar to hear what he had to say, Zeno bit off his ear. Hence the proverb, A remark more biting than Zeno's.

Bit'tlebrains (Lord), friend of sir William Ashton, lord-keeper of Scotland.

Lady Bittlebrains, wife of the above lord.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Bit'zer, light porter in Bounderby's bank at Coketown. He was educated at M'Choakumchild's "practical school," and became a general spy and informer. Bitzer finds out the robbery of the bank, and discovers the perpetrator to be Tom Gradgrind (son of Thomas Gradgrind, Esq., M.P.), informs against him, and gets promoted to his place.—Dickens: Hard Times (1854).

Bizarre [Be-zar'], the friend of Orian'a, for ever coquetting and sparring with Duretete [Dure-tait], and placing him in awkward predicaments.—Farquhar: The Inconstant (1702).

Miss Farren's last performances were "Bizarre," March 26, 1797, and "Lady Teazle" on the 28th.—Memoirs of Elizabeth Countess of Derby (1809).

Black Ag'nes, the countess of March, noted for her defence of Dunbar during the war which Edward III. maintained in Scotland (1333–1338).

> She kept a stir in tower and trench,
> That brawling, boist'rous Scottish wench,
> Came I early, came I late,
> I found Black Agnes at the gate.

Sir Walter Scott says, "The countess was called 'Black Agnes' from her complexion. She was the daughter of Thomas Randolph, earl of Murray."—Tales of a Grandfather, i. 14. (See BLACK PRINCE.)

Black Ag'nes, the palfrey. (See AGNES, p. 15.)

Black Bartholomew, the day when 2000 presbyterian pastors were ejected. They had no alternative but to subscribe to the articles of uniformity or renounce their livings. Amongst their number were Calamy, Baxter, and Reynolds, who were offered bishoprics, but refused the offer.

Black Bess, the famous mare of Dick Turpin, which, according to tradition, carried him from London to York.

Black Charlie, sir Charles Napier (1786–1860).

Black Clergy (The), monks, in contradistinction to The White Clergy, or parish priests, in Russia.

Black Colin Campbell, general Campbell, in the army of George III., introduced by sir W. Scott in Redgauntlet.

Black Death, fully described by Hecker, a German physician. It was a putrid typhus, and was called Black Death because the bodies turned black with rapid putrefaction. (See Cornhill, May, 1865.)

In 1348–9 at least half of the entire population of England died. Thus 57,000 out of 60,000 died in Norwich; 7000 out of 10,000 died in Yarmouth; 17 out of 21 of the clergy of York; 2,500,000 out of 5,000,000 of the entire population.

Between 1347 and 1350 one-fourth of all the population of the world was carried off by this pestilence. Not less than 25,000,000 perished in Europe alone, while in Asia and Africa the mortality was even greater. It came from China, where fifteen years previously it carried off 5,000,000. In Venice the aristocratic, died 100,000; in Florence the refined, 60,000; in Paris the gay, 50,000; in London the wealthy, 100,000; in Avignon, a number wholly beyond calculation.

N.B.—This form of pestilence has never occurred a second time.

Black Douglas, William Douglas, lord of Nithsdale, who died 1390.

He was tall, strong, and well made, of a swarthy complexion, with dark hair, from which he was called "The Black Douglas."—Sir W. Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, xi.

Black Dwarf (The), a romance by sir Walter Scott (1816). The "Black Dwarf" is called "Elshander the Recluse," or "Cannie Elshie, the Wise Wight of Mucklestane Moor," but is in reality sir Edward Manley. The tale runs thus: Isabella Vere, daughter of Richard Vere (laird of Ellieslaw, and head of a Jacobite conspiracy) tried to compel his daughter to marry sir Frederick Langley, one of his chief followers. She resisted and was carried off to Westburnflat, but was rescued by Patrick Earnscliff (laird of Earnscliff). Being persuaded to consult the Black Dwarf, she goes to his hut, and he promises to prevent the obnoxious marriage. When the wedding preparations of sir F. Langley were all completed, the Black Dwarf suddenly appeared on the scene, declared himself to be sir Edward Manley, and forbade the marriage. Miss Vere ultimately married Patrick Earnscliff, and all went merry as a marriage-bell.

It is said that the "Black Dwarf" is meant for David Ritchie, whose cottage was and still is on Manor Water, in the county of Peebles.

Black-eyed Susan, a ballad by John Gay. Also a drama by Douglas Jerrold (1822).

The ballad begins—

> All in the Downs the fleet was moored,
> The streamers waving in the wind,
> When Black-eyed Susan came on board.

Black Flag (A) was displayed by Tamerlane when a besieged city refused to surrender, meaning that "mercy is now past, and the cito is devoted to utter destruction."

Black George, the gamekeeper in Fielding's novel called The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling (1750).

Black George, George Petrowitsch of Servia, a brigand; called by the Turks Kara George, from the terror he inspired.

Black Horse (The), the 7th Dragoon Guards (not the 7th Dragoons). So called because their facings (or collar and cuffs) are black velvet. Their plumes are black and white; and at one time their horses were black, or at any rate dark bay.

Black Jack, a large flagon.

> But oh, oh, oh! his nose doth show
> How oft Black Jack to his lips doth go.
> Simon the Cellarer.

Black Knight of the Black Lands (The), sir Peread. Called by Tennyson "Night" or "Nox." He was one of the four brothers who kept the passages of Castle Dangerous, and was overthrown by sir Gareth.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur. i. 126 (1470); Tennyson: Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette").

Black lord Clifford, John ninth lord Clifford, son of Thomas lord Clifford. Also called "The Butcher" (died 1461).

Black Prince, Edward prince of Wales, son of Edward III. Froissart says he was styled black "by terror of his arms" (c. 169). Similarly, lord Clifford was called "The Black Lord Clifford" for his cruelties (died 1461). George Petrowitsch was called by the Turks "Black George" from the terror of his name. The countess of March was called "Black Agnes" from the terror of her deeds, and not (as sir W. Scott says) from her dark complexion. Similarly, "The Black Sea" (q.v.), or Axinus, as the Greeks once called it, received its name from the inhospitable character of the Scythians. The "Black Wind," or Sherki, is an easterly wind, so called by the Kurds, from its being such a terrible scourge.

N.B.—Fulc was called Black, or Nerra, for his ill deeds. He burnt his wife at the stake; waged the bitterest war against his son; despatched twelve assassins to murder the minister of the French king; and revolted even the rude barbarians of the times in which he lived by his treason, rapine, and bloodshed.

Shirley falls into the general error—

> Our great third Edward . . . and his brave son . . .
> In his black armour.
> Edward the Black Prince, iv. 1 (1640).

He wore gilt or "gold" armour.)

Black River or ATBA'RA, of Africa, so called from the quantity of black earth brought down by it during the rains. This earth is deposited on the surface of the country in the overflow of the Nile, and hence the Atbara is regarded as the "dark mother of Egypt."

Black Sea (The), once called by the Greeks Axinus ("inhospitable"), either because the Scythians on its coast were inhospitable, or because its waters were dangerous to navigation. It was afterwards called Euxinus ("hospitable") when the Greeks themselves became masters of it. The Turks called it The Black Sea, either a return to its former name, or from its black rock.

Black Thursday, the name given in the colony of Victoria, Australia, to Thursday, February 6, 1851, when the most terrible bush fire known in the annals of the colony occurred. It raged over an immense area. One writer in the newspapers of the time said that he rode at headlong speed for fifty miles, with fire raging on either side of his route. The heat was felt far out at sea, and many birds fell dead on the decks of coasting vessels. The destruction of animal life and farming stock in this conflagration was enormous.

Blacks (The), an Italian faction of the fourteenth century. The Guelphs of Florence were divided into the Blacks who wished to open their gates to Charles de Valois, and the Whites who opposed him. Dante the poet was a "White," and as the "Blacks" were the predominant party, he was exiled in 1302, and during his exile wrote his immortal poem, the Divina Commedia.

Black'acre (Widow), a masculine, litigious, pettifogging, headstrong woman. — Wyckerly: The Plain Dealer (1677).

Blackchester (The countess of), sister of lord Dalgarno.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Blackfriar's Bridge (London) was once called "Pitt's Bridge." This was the bridge built by R. Mylne in 1780, but the name never found favour with the general public.

Blackguards (Victor Hugo says), soldiers condemned for some offence in discipline to wear their red coats (which were lined with black) inside out. The French equivalent, he says, is Blaquers. —L'Homme qui Rit, II. iii. 1.

It is quite impossible to believe this to be the true derivation of the word. Other suggestions will be found in the Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 141.

Blackless (Tomalin), a soldier in the guard of Richard Cœur de Lion. —Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Blackmantle (Bernard), Charles Molloy Westmacott, author of The English Spy (1826).

Black'pool (Stephen), a power-loom weaver in Bounderby's mill at Coketown. He had a knitted brow and pondering expression of face, was a man of the strictest integrity, refused to join the strike, and was turned out of the mill. When Tom Gradgrind robbed the bank of £150, he threw suspicion on Stephen Blackpool, and while Stephen was hastening to Cokeburn to vindicate himself, he fell into a shaft known as "the Hell Shaft," and, although rescued, died on a litter. Stephen Blackpool loved Rachel, one of the hands, but had already a drunken, worthless wife.—Dickens: Hard Times (1854).

Blacksmith (The Flemish), Quintin Matsys, the Dutch painter (1460–1529).

Blacksmith (The Learned), Elihu Burritt, United States (1811–1879).

Blacksmith's Daughter (The), lock and key.

Place it under the care of the blacksmith's daughter. —Dickens: Tale of Two Cities (1859).

Blackwood's Magazine. The vignette on the wrapper of this magazine is meant for George Buchanan, the Scotch historian and poet (1506–1582). He is the representative of Scottish literature generally.

The magazine originated in 1817 with William Blackwood of Edinburgh, publisher.

Bladamour, the friend of Paridel the libertine.—Spenser: Faërie Queene.

Blad'derskate (Lord) and lord Kaimes, the two judges in Peter Peeble's lawsuit. — Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Bla'dud, father of king Lear. Geoffrey of Monmouth says that Bladud, attempting to fly, fell on the temple of Apollo, and was dashed in pieces. Hence when Lear swears "By Apollo" he is reminded that Apollo was no friend of the kings (act i. sc. 1). Bladud, says the story, built Bath (once called Badon), and dedicated to Minerva the medicinal spring which is called "Bladud's Well."

Blair (Adam), the hero of a novel by J. G. Lockhart, entitled Adam Blair, a Story of Scottish Life (1822). It is the story of a Scotch minister who "fell from grace," but after a season of penitence was restored to his pastorate.

Blair (Father Clement), a Carthusian monk, confessor of Catherine Glover "the fair maid of Perth."—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Blair (Rev. David), sir Richard Philips, author of The Universal Preceptor (1816), Mother's Question Book, etc. Philips issued books under a legion of false names.

Blaise, a hermit, who baptized Merlin the enchanter.

Blaise (St.), patron saint of woolcombers, because he was torn to pieces with iron wool-combs.

Blaise (Mrs. Mary), an hypothetical comic elegy full of puns, by Oliver Goldsmith (1765). The character of this jeu d'esprit may be gleaned from the two lines following—

The king himself has followed her—
When she has gone before.

BLANCHE (1 syl.), niece of king John, in Shakespeare's historic tragedy of King John (1623).

Blanche, one of the domestics of lady Eveline "the betrothed."—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Blanche (La reine), the queen of France during the first six weeks of her widowhood. During this period of mourning she spent her time in a closed room, lit only by a wax taper, and was dressed wholly in white. Mary, the widow of Louis XII., was called La reine Blanche during her days of mourning, and is sometimes (but erroneously) so called afterwards.

Blanche (Lady) makes a vow with lady Anne to die an old maid, and of course falls over head and ears in love with Thomas Blount, a jeweller's son, who enters the army and becomes a colonel. She is very handsome, ardent, brilliant, and fearless.—Knowles: Old Maids (1841).

Blanche'fleur (2 syl.), the heroine of Boccaccio's prose romance called Il Filocopo. Her lover "Florês" is Boccaccio himself, and "Blanchefleur" was the daughter of king Robert. The story of Blanchefleur and Florês is substantially the same as that of Dor'igen and Aurēlius, by Chaucer, and that of "Diano'ra and Ansaldo," in the Decameron.

Bland'amour (Sir), a man of "mickle might," who "bore great sway in arms and chivalry," but was both vainglorious and insolent. He attacked Brit'omart, but was discomfited by her enchanted spear; he next attacked sir Ferraugh, and having overcome him, took from him the lady who accompanied him, "the False Florimel."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 1 (1596).

Blande'ville (Lady Emily), a neighbour of the Waverley family, afterwards married to colonel Talbot.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Bland'ford, the father of Belin'da, who he promised sir William Bellmont should marry his son George. But Belinda was in love with Beverley, and George Bellmont with Clarissa (Beverley's sister). Ultimately matters arranged themselves, so that the lovers married according to their inclinations.—Murphy: All in the Wrong (1761).

Blan'dimun, the faithful man-servant of the fair Bellisant, and her attendant after her divorce.—Valentine and Orson.

Blandi'na, wife of the churlish knight Turpin, who refused hospitality to sir Calepine and his lady Sere'na (canto 3). She had "the art of a suasive tongue," and most engaging manners; but "her words were only words, and all her tears were water" (canto 7).—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. (1596).

Blandish, a "practised parasite." His sister says to him, "May you find but half your own vanity in those you have to work on!" (act i. 1).

Miss Letitia Blandish, sister of the above, a fawning timeserver, who sponges on the wealthy. She especially toadies Miss Alscrip "the heiress," flattering her vanity, fostering her conceit, and encouraging her vulgar affectations.—Burgoyne: The Heiress (1781).

Blane (Niell), town piper and publican.

Jenny Blane, his daughter.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Bla'ney, a wealthy heir, ruined by dissipation.—Crabbe: Borough (1810).

Blarney (Lady), one of the flash women introduced by squire Thornhill to the Primrose family.—Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield (1765).

Blas'phemous Balfour. Sir James Balfour, the Scottish judge, was so called from his apostasy (died 1583).

Bla'tant Beast (The), the personification of slander or public opinion. The beast had 100 tongues and a sting. Sir Artegal muzzled the monster, and dragged it to Faëry-land, but it broke loose and regained its liberty. Subsequently sir Cal'idore (3 syl.) went in quest of it.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. and vi. (1596).

 "Mrs. Grundy" is the modern name of Spenser's "Blatant Beast."

Blath'ers and Duff, detectives who investigate the burglary in which Bill Sikes had a hand. Blathers relates the tale of Conkey Chickweed, who robbed himself of 327 guineas.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Blat'tergrowl (The Rev. Mr.), minister of Trotcosey, near Monkbarns.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, Elizabeth).

Bleak House, a novel by C. Dickens (1852). The main story is the interminable law-suit of Jarndyce v. Jarndyce (q.v.).

Bleeding-heart Yard (London). So called because it was the place where the devil cast the bleeding heart of lady Hatton (wife of the dancing chancellor), after he had torn it out of her body with his claws.—Dr. Mackay: Extraordinary Popular Delusions.

Blefus'cu, an island inhabited by pigmies. It was situated north-east of Lilliput, from which it was parted by a channel 800 yards wide.—Dean Swift: Gulliver's Travels (1726).

"Blefuscu" is France, and the inhabitants of the Lilliputian court, which forced Gulliver to take shelter there rather than have his eyes put out, is an indirect reproach upon that [sic] of England, and a vindication of the flight of Ormond and Bolingbroke to Paris.—Sir W. Scott.

Bleise (1 syl.) of Northumberland, the historian of king Arthur's court.

Merlin told Bleise how king Arthur had sped at the great battle, and how the battle ended; and told him the names of every king and knight of worship that was there. And Bleise wrote the battle word for word as Merlin told him, how it began and by whom, and how it ended, and who had the worst. All the battles that were done in king Arthur's days, Merlin caused Bleise to write them. Also he caused him to write all the battles that every worthy knight did of king Arthur's court.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 15 (1470).

Blem'myes (3 syl.), a people of Africa, fabled to have no head, but having eyes and mouth in the breast. (See GAORA.)

Blemmyis traduntur capita abesse ore et oculis pectori affixis.—Pliny.

¶ Ctesias speaks of a people of India near the Ganges, sine cervice, oculos in humeris habentes. Mela also refers to a people quibus capita et vultus in pectore sunt.

Blenheim (The battle of), a poem by John Dennis, to whom the duke of Marlborough gave £100 (1705).

Another by Southey (1798), supposed to be told by Kasper—

It was a summer's evening,
Old Kasper's work was done;
And he before his cottage door
Was sitting in the sun. . . .

The ballad goes on to tell all the horrors of the war, and the burden is nevertheless "It was a famous victory."

Blenheim Spaniels. The Oxford electors are so called, because for many years they obediently supported any candidate which the duke of Marlborough commanded them to return. Lockhart broke through this custom by telling the people the fable of the Dog and the Wolf. The dog, it will be remembered, had on his neck the marks of his collar, and the wolf said he preferred liberty.

(The race of the little dog called the Blenheim spaniel has been preserved ever since Blenheim House was built for the duke of Marlborough in 1704.)

Blet'son (Master Joshua), one of the three parliamentary commissioners sent by Cromwell with a warrant to leave the royal lodge to the Lee family.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Bleys, called Merlin's master, but he . . . taught him naught . . . the scholar ran

Before his master; and so far that Bleys
Laid magic by; and sat him down and wrote
All things and whatsoever Merlin did
In one great annal book.
Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("The Coming of Arthur").

Bli'fil, a noted character in Fielding's novel called The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling (1750).

∴ Blifil is the original of Sheridan's "Joseph Surface," in the School for Scandal (1777).

Bligh (William), captain of the Bounty, so well known for the mutiny, headed by Fletcher Christian, the mate (1790).

Blimber (Dr.), head of a school for the sons of gentlemen, at Brighton. It was a select school for ten pupils only; but there was learning enough for ten times ten. "Mental green peas were produced at Christmas, and intellectual asparagus all the year round." The doctor was really a ripe scholar, and truly kind-hearted; but his great fault was over-tasking his boys, and not seeing when the bow was too much stretched. Paul Dombey, a delicate lad, succumbed to this strong mental pressure.

Mrs. Blimber, wife of the doctor, not learned, but wishing to be thought so. Her pride was to see the boys in the largest possible collars and stiffest possible cravats, which she deemed highly classical.

Cornelia Blimber, the doctor's daughter, a slim young lady, who kept her hair short and wore spectacles. Miss Blimber "had no nonsense about her," but had grown "dry and sandy with working in the graves of dead languages." She married Mr. Feeder, B.A., Dr. Blimber's usher.—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Blind Author (A). Robert Wauchope, appointed archbishop of Armagh by Paul III., in 1543, was blind from his birth, and died 1551.

Blind Bard on the Chian Strand (The). So Coleridge calls Homer. Byron calls him "The blind old man of Scio's rocky isle," in his Bride of Abydos. Also called "The man of Chios," Melesigenês, Mæonidês, etc. (See these words.)

Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green, Henry, son and heir of sir Simon de Montfort. At the battle of Evesham the barons were routed, Montfort slain, and his son Henry left on the field for dead. A baron's daughter discovered the young man, nursed him with care, and married him. The fruit of the marriage was "pretty Bessee, the beggar's daughter." Henry de Montfort assumed the garb and semblance of a blind beggar, to escape the vigilance of king Henry's spies.

N.B.—Day produced, in 1659, a drama called The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green; and S. Knowles, in 1834, produced his amended drama on the same subject. There is [or was], in the Whitechapel Road, a public-house sign called the Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green.—History of Sign-boards. (See BLINDE.)

Blind Chapel Court (Mark Lane, London) is a corruption of Blanch Apple-[ton]. In the reign of Richard II. it was part of the manor of a knight named Appleton.

Blind Emperor (The), Ludovig III. of Germany (830, 890-934).

Blind Harper (The), John Parry, who died 1739.

¶ J. Stanley, musician and composer, was blind from his birth (1713-1786).

Blind Harry, a Scotch minstrel of the fifteenth century, blind from infancy. His epic of Sir William Wallace runs to 11,861 lines. He was minstrel in the court of James IV.

Blind Mechanician (The). John Strong, a great mechanical genius, was blind from his birth. He died at Carlisle, aged 66 (1732-1798).

Blind Men's Dinner. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 116.) The joke forms the subject of one of Sacchetti's tales. It is also told by Sozzini; but is of Indian origin.

Blind Naturalist (The), F. Hüber (1750-1830).

Blind Poet (The), Luigi Groto, an Italian poet, called Il Cieco (1541-1585). John Milton (1608-1674).

Homer is called The Blind Old Bard (fl. B.C. 960).

Blind Traveller (The), lieutenant James Holman. He became blind at the age of 25; nevertheless he travelled round the world, and published an account of his travels (1787-1857).

Blinde Beggar of Alexandria (The), a drama by George Chapman (1598).

Blin'kinsop, a smuggler in Redgauntlet, a novel by sir W. Scott (time, George III.).

Blister, the apothecary, who says, "Without physicians, no one could know whether he was well or ill." He courts Lucy by talking shop to her.—Fielding: The Virgin Unmasked (a farce, 1740).

Blithe-Heart King (The). David is so called by Cædmon.

Those lovely lyrics written by his hand
Whom Saxon Cædmon calls "The Blithe-heart King."
Longfellow: The Poet's Tale (ref. is to Ps. cxlviii. 9).

Block (Martin). One of the committee of the Estates of Burgundy, who refused supplies to Charles the Bold, duke of Burgundy.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Blok (Nikkel), the butcher, one of the insurgents at Liège.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Blondel de Nesle [Neel], the favourite minstrel of Richard Cœur de Lion. He chanted the Bloody Vest in presence of queen Berengaria, the lovely Edith Plantagenet.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Blon'dina, the mother of Fairstar and two boys at one birth. She was the wife of a king; but the queen-mother hated her, and, taking away the three babes, substituted three puppies. Ultimately her children were restored to her, and the queen-mother was duly punished, with her accomplices.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Princess Fairstar," 1682).

Blood (Colonel Thomas), emissary of the duke of Buckingham (1628-1680), introduced by sir W. Scott in Peveril of the Peak, a novel (time, Charles II.).

Blood (The Court of). "The twelve judges of the Tumult," established in the Netherlands by the duke of Alva, in 1557. —Motley: The Dutch Republic.

Blood (General), Zisca, the Hannibal of Bohemia, who was totally blind.

Blood-Bath (1520), a massacre of the Swedish nobles and leaders, which occurred three days after the coronation of Christian II. king of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. The victims were invited to attend the coronation, and were put to the sword, under the plea of being enemies of the true Church. In this massacre fell both the father and brother-in-law of Gustavus Vasa. The former was named Eric Johansson, and the latter Brahe (2 syl.).

¶ This massacre reminds us of the "Bloody Wedding" (q.v.), or slaughter of huguenots during the marriage ceremonies of Henri of Navarre and Marguerite of France, in 1572.

Bloods (The Five): (1) The O'Neils of Ulster; (2) the O'Connors of Connaught; (3) the O'Briens of Thomond; (4) the O'Lachlans of Meath; and (5) the M'Murroughs of Leinster. These are the five principal septs or families of Ireland, and all not belonging to one of these five septs were (even down to the reign of Elizabeth) accounted aliens or enemies, and could "neither sue nor be sued."

¶ William Fitz-Roger, being arraigned (4th Edward II.) for the murder of Roger de Cantilon, pleads that he was not guilty of felony, because his victim was not of "free blood," i.e. one of the "five bloods of Ireland;" and the plea was admitted by the jury to be good.

Robertus de Waley, tried at Waterford for slaying John M'Gillimorry, in the time of Edward II., confessed the fact, but pleaded that he could not thereby have committed felony, "because the deceased was a mere Irishman, and not one of the five bloods."—Sir John Davies.

Bloody (The), Otho II. emperor of Germany (955, 973–983).

Bloody-Bones, a bogie.

As bad as Bloody-bones or Lunsford [i.e. sir Thomas Lunsford, governor of the Tower, the dread of every one].—S. Butler: Hudibras.

Bloody Brother (The), a tragedy by Beaumont (printed 1639). The "bloody brother" is Rollo duke of Normandy, who killed his brother Otto and several other persons. Rollo was himself killed ultimately by Hamond captain of the guard. (See APPENDIX, Fletcher.)

Bloody Butcher (The). The duke of Cumberland, second son of George II., was so called from his barbarities in the suppression of the rebellion in favour of Charles Edward, the young pretender. "Black Clifford" was also called "The Butcher" for his cruelties (died 1461).

Bloody Hand, Cathal, an ancestor of the O'Connors of Ireland.

Bloody Mary, queen Mary of England, daughter of Henry VIII. and elder half-sister of queen Elizabeth. So called on account of the sanguinary persecutions carried on by her against the protestants. It is said that 200 persons were burnt to death in her short reign (1553–1558).

Bloody Wedding (The), that of Henri of Navarre with Marguerite, sister of Charles IX. of France. Catharine de Medici invited all the chief protestant nobles to this wedding, but on the eve of the festival of St. Bartholomew (August 24, 1572), a general onslaught was made on all the protestants of Paris, and next day the same massacre was extended to the provinces. The number which fell in this wholesale slaughter has been estimated at between 30,000 and 70,000 persons of both sexes.

Bloomfield (Louisa), a young lady engaged to lord Totterly the beau of 60, but in love with Charles Danvers the embryo barrister.—C. Selby: The Unfinished Gentleman (1841).

Blougram's Apology (Bishop), a poem by Robert Browning on the question whether a clergyman "who doubts the articles of the Christian faith is justified in retaining his living." The answer given is that "disbelief is only doubt, and in all charges the criminal is allowed the benefit of a doubt."

No Christian doctrine is capable of mathematical, scientific, or experimental proof.

Blount (Nicholas), afterwards knighted; master of the horse to the earl of Sussex.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Blount (Sir Frederick), a distant relative of sir John Vesey. He had a great objection to the letter r, which he considered "wough and wasping." He dressed to perfection, and, though not "wich," prided himself on having the "best opewa-box, the best dogs, the best horses, and the best house" of any one. He liked Georgina Vesey, and as she had £10,000, he thought he should do himself no harm by "mawywing the girl."—Lord Lytton: Money (1840).

Blount (Master), a wealthy jeweller of Ludgate Hill, London. An old-fashioned tradesman, not ashamed of his calling. He had two sons, John and Thomas; the former was his favourite.

Mistress Blount, his wife. A shrewd discerning woman, who loved her son Thomas, and saw in him the elements of a rising man.

John Blount, eldest son of the Ludgate jeweller. Being left successor to his father, he sold the goods and set up for a man of fashion and fortune. His vanity and snobbism were most gross. He had good-nature, but more cunning than discretion; he thought himself far-seeing, but was most easily duped. "The phaeton was built after my design, my lord," he says, "mayhap your lordship has seen it." "My taste is driving, my lord, mayhap your lordship has seen me handle the ribbons." "My horses are all bloods, my lord, mayhap your lordship has noticed my team." "I pride myself on my seat in the saddle, mayhap your lordship has seen me ride." "If I am superlative in anything, 'tis in my wines." "So please your ladyship, 'tis dress I most excel in. . . . 'tis walking I pride myself in." No matter what is mentioned, 'tis the one thing he did or had better than any one else. This conceited fool was duped into believing a parcel of men-servants to be lords and dukes, and made love to a lady's maid, supposing her to be a countess. (See BOROUGHCLIFF, p. 138.)

Thomas Blount, John's brother, and one of nature's gentlemen. He entered the army, became a colonel, and married lady Blanche. He is described as having "a lofty forehead for princely thought to dwell in, eyes for love or war, a nose of Grecian mould with touch of Rome, a mouth like Cupid's bow, ambitious chin dimpled and knobbed."—Knowles: Old Maids (1841).

Blouzelin'da or BLOWZELINDA, a shepherdess in love with Lobbin Clout, in The Shepherd's Week.

> My Blouzelinda is the blithest lass,
> Than primrose sweeter, or the clover-grass . . .
> My Blouzelind's than gilliflower more fair,
> Than daisie, marygold, or kingcup rare.
> Gay: Pastoral, I. (1714).

> Sweet is my toil when Blowzelind is near,
> Of her bereft 'tis winter all the year . . .
> Come, Blowzelinda, ease thy swain's desire,
> My summer's shadow, and my winter's fire.
> Ditto.

Blower (Mrs. Margaret), the shipowner's widow at the Spa. She married Dr. Quackleben, "the man of medicine" (one of the managing committee at the Spa).—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Blucher was nicknamed "Marshal Forwards" for his dash and readiness in the campaign of 1813.

BLUE (Dark), the Oxford boat crew (see BOAT COLOURS); Eton, in cricket.

Blue (Light), the Cambridge boat crew (see BOAT COLOURS); Harrow, in cricket.

Blue (True). When it is said that anything or person is True blue or True as Coventry blue, the reference is to a blue cloth and blue thread made in Coventry, noted for its fast colour. Lincoln was no less famous for its green cloth and dye.

True blue has also reference to untainted aristocratic descent. This is derived from the Spanish notion that the really high-bred have bluer blood than those of meaner race. Hence the French phrases, Sang bleu ("aristocratic blood"), Sang noir ("plebeian blood"), etc.

As a very general rule, "blue" is, in parliamentary elections, the badge colour of the tory party.

Blue Beard (La Barbe Bleue), from the contes of Charles Perrault (1697). The chevalier Raoul is a merciless tyrant, with a blue beard. His young wife is entrusted with all the keys of the castle, with strict injunctions on pain of death not to open one special room. During the absence of her lord the "forbidden fruit" is too tempting to be resisted, the door is opened, and the young wife finds the floor covered with the dead bodies of her husband's former wives. She drops the key in her terror, and can by no means obliterate from it the stain of blood. Blue Beard, on his return, commands her to prepare for death, but by the timely arrival of her brothers her life is saved and Blue Beard put to death.

N.B.—Dr. C. Taylor thinks Blue Beard is a type of the castle-lords in the days of knight-errantry. Some say Henry VIII. (the noted wife-killer) was the "academy figure." Others think it was Giles de Retz, marquis de Laval, marshal of France in 1429, who (according to Mézeray) murdered six of his seven wives, and was ultimately strangled in 1440.

Another solution is that Blue Beard was count Conomar', and the young wife Triphy'na, daughter of count Guerech. Count Conomar was lieutenant of Brittany in the reign of Childebert. M. Hippolyte Violeau assures us that in 1850, during the repairs of the chapel of St. Nicolas de Bieury, some ancient frescoes were discovered with scenes from the life of St. Triphyna: (1) The marriage; (2) the husband taking leave of his young wife and entrusting to her a key; (3) a room with an open door, through which are seen the corpses of seven women hanging; (4) the husband threatening his wife, while another female [sister Anne] is looking out of a window above; (5) the husband has placed a halter round the neck of his victim, but the friends, accompanied by St. Gildas, abbot of Rhuys in Brittany, arrive just in time to rescue the future saint.—Pélerinages de Bretagne.

(Ludwig Tieck brought out a drama in Berlin, on the story of Blue Beard. The incident about the keys and the doors is similar to that mentioned by "The Third Calender" in the Arabian Nights. The forty princesses were absent for forty days, and gave king Agib the keys of the palace during their absence. He had leave to enter every room but one. His curiosity led him to open the forbidden chamber and mount a horse which he saw there. The horse carried him through the air far from the palace, and with a whisk of its tail knocked out his right eye. The same misfortune had befallen ten other princes, who warned him of the danger before he started.)

¶ Campbell has a "Blue Beard" story in his Tales of the Western Highlands, called "The Widow and her Daughters."

¶ A similar one is No. 3 of Bernoni's, and No. 39 of Visentini's collection of Italian stories.

Blue Flag (A) in the Roman empire was a warning of danger. Livy speaks of it in his Annals.

Blue-Gowns. King's bedesmen, or privileged Scotch mendicants, were so called from their dress. On the king's birthday each of these bedesmen had given to him a cloak of blue cloth, a penny for every year of the king's life, a loaf of bread, and a bottle of ale. No new member has been added since 1833.

Blue Hen, a nickname for the state of Delaware, United States. The term arose thus: Captain Caldwell, an officer of the 1st Delaware Regiment in the American War for Independence, was very fond of game-cocks, but maintained that no cock was truly game unless its mother was a "blue hen." As he was exceedingly popular, his regiment was called "The Blue Hens," and the term was afterwards transferred to the state and its inhabitants.

Your mother was a blue hen, no doubt; a reproof to a braggart, especially to one who boasts of his ancestry.

Blue Knight (The), sir Persaunt of India, called by Tennyson "Morning Star" or "Phosphorus." He was one of the four brothers who kept the passages of Castle Perilous, and was overthrown by sir Gareth.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 131 (1470); Tennyson: Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette").

(It is evidently a blunder in Tennyson to call the Blue Knight "Morning Star," and the Green Knight "Evening Star." The reverse is correct, and in the old romance the combat with the Green Knight was at day-break, and with the Blue Knight at sunset.)

Blue Moon. Once in a blue moon, very rarely indeed. The expression is a modification of "the Greek Kalends," which means "never," because there were no Greek Kalends.

Blue Roses, unattainable luxuries or indulgences. There are no such things as blue roses.

The blue rose of German romance represented the ideal and unattainable.

Blue-Skin. Joseph Blake, an English burglar, was so called from his complexion. He was executed in 1723.

Blue-Stocking (A). (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 152.)

Bluff (Captain Noll), a swaggering bully and boaster. He says, "I think that fighting for fighting's sake is sufficient cause for fighting. Fighting, to me, is religion and the laws."

"You must know, sir, I was resident in Flanders the last campaign . . . there was scarce anything of moment done, but a humble servant of yours . . . had the greatest share in't. . . . Well, would you think it, in all this time . . . that rascally Gazette never so much as once mentioned me? Not once, by the wars! Took no more notice of Noll Bluff than if he had not been in the land of the living."—Congreve: The Old Bachelor (1693).

Bluff Hal or BLUFF HARRY, Henry VIII. (1491, 1509-1547).

Ere yet in scorn of Peter's pence,
And numbered bead and shrift,
Bluff Hall he broke into the spence [a larder],
And turned the cowls adrift.

Tennyson.

Blumine, a young hazel-eyed, beautiful, and high-born maiden, with whom Teufelsdrockh falls in love. Carlyle: Sartor Resartus (1838).

Blunder. The bold but disastrous charge of the British Light Brigade at Balacla'va is attributed to a blunder; even Tennyson says of it, "Some one hath blundered;" but Thomas Woolner, with less reserve, says—

A general
May blunder troops to death, yea, and receive
His senate's vote of thanks.
My Beautiful Lady.

Blun'derbore (3 syl.), the giant who was drowned because Jack scuttled his boat.—Jack the Giant-killer.

Blunt (Colonel), a brusque royalist, who vows "he'd woo no woman," but falls in love with Arbella an heiress, woos and wins her. T. Knight, who has converted this comedy into a farce, with the title of Honest Thieves, calls colonel Blunt "captain Manly."—Hon. Sir R. Howard: The Committee (1670).

Blunt (Major-general), an old cavalry officer, rough in speech, but brave, honest, and a true patriot.—Shadwell: The Volunteers (1690).

Blushington (Edward), a bashful young gentleman of 25, sent as a poor scholar to Cambridge, without any expectations; but by the death of his father and uncle left all at once as "rich as a nabob." At college he was called "the sensitive plant of Brasenose," because he was always blushing, He dines by invitation at Friendly Hall, and commits ceaseless blunders. Next day his college chum, Frank Friendly, writes word that he and his sister Dinah, with sir Thomas and lady Friendly, will dine with him. After a few glasses of wine, he loses his bashful modesty, makes a long speech, and becomes the accepted suitor of the pretty Miss Dinah Friendly. —Moncrieff: The Bashful Man.

Bo or Bok, says Warton, was a fierce Gothic chief, whose name was used to frighten children. This needs confirmation.

Boadice'a, wife of Præsu'tagus king of the Ice'ni. For the better security of his family, Præsutagus made the emperor of Rome coheir with his daughters; whereupon the Roman officers took possession of his palace, gave up the princesses to the licentious brutality of the Roman soldiers, and scourged the queen in public. Boadicea, roused to vengeance, assembled an army, burnt the Roman colonies of London, Colchester [Camalodunum], Verulam, etc., and slew above 80,000 Romans. Subsequently, Sueto'nius Paulinus defeated the Britons, and Boadicea poisoned herself, A.D. 61.

(J. Fletcher wrote a tragedy called Boadicea in 1611; and Glover one in 1758.)

Boaner'ges (4 syl.), a declamatory pet parson, who anathematizes all except his own "elect." "He preaches real rousing-up discourses, but sits down pleasantly to his tea, and makes himself friendly."—Mrs. Oliphant: Salem Chapel.

A protestant Boanerges, visiting Birmingham, sent an invitation to Dr. Newman to dispute publicly with him in the Town Hall.—E. Yates: Celebrities, xxii.

 Boanerges or "sons of thunder" is the name given by Jesus Christ to James and John, because they wanted to call down fire from heaven to consume the Samaritans.—Luke ix. 54.

Boar (The), Richard III., so called from his cognizance.

The bristled boar, in infant gore,
Wallows beneath the thorny shade.
Gray: The Bard (1757).

In contempt Richard III. is called The Hog, hence the popular distich—

The Cat, the Rat, and Lovell the dog,
Rule all England under the Hog.

("The Cat" is Catesby, and "the Rat" Ratcliffe.)

Boar (The Blue). This public-house sign (Westminster) is the badge of the Veres earls of Oxford.

The Blue Boar Lane (St. Nicholas, Leicester) is so named from the cognizance of Richard III., because he slept there the night before the battle of Bosworth Field.

Boar of Ardennes (The Wild), in French Le Sanglier des Ardennes (2 syl.), was Guillaume comte de la Marck, so called because he was as fierce as the wild boar he delighted to hunt. The character is introduced by sir W. Scott in Quentin Durward, under the name of "William count of la Marck."

Boar's Head (The). This tavern, immortalized by Shakespeare, stood in Eastcheap (London), on the site of the present statue of William IV. It was the cognizance of the Gordons, who adopted it because one of their progenitors slew, in the forest of Huntley, a wild boar, the terror of all the Merse (1093).

Boating Colours. College Clubs: CAMBRIDGE: Caius, black and light blue; St. Catherine's, claret and yellow; Christ's, blue and white; Clare, black and gold; Corpus, white and cherry; Downing, magenta and black; Emmanuel, cherry and blue; Fitzwilliam Hall, red and green; Jesus, red and black; King's, purple and white; Lady Margaret (St. John's), scarlet and white; Magdalene, French grey and indigo; Pembroke, dark blue and light blue; Peterhouse, blue and white; Queens', green and white; Sidney Sussex, blue and magenta; 1st Selwyn, red and gold; 1st Trinity, dark blue; 3rd Trinity, dark blue and white; Trinity Hall, black and white.

OXFORD: Balliol, red and white; Brasenose, black and yellow; Christ Church, dark blue and white; Corpus Christi, blue and red; Exeter, magenta and black; Hertford, red and white; Jesus, green and white; Keble, red, white, and blue; Lincoln, dark and light blue; Magdalen, scarlet; Merton, blue and magenta; New College, violet and orange; Oriel, white and dark blue; Pembroke, cerise, white, and dark blue; Queen's, blue and white, three red eagles on breast pocket; St. John's, blue and white; Trinity, blue and white; University, dark blue and yellow; Wadham, light blue; Worcester, black, pink, and white; St. Catherine's (unattached students), French grey and magenta.

Boaz and Jachin, two brazen pillars, which were set up by Solomon at the entrance of the temple built by him. Boaz, which means "strength," was on the left hand, and Jachin, which means "stability," on the right.—1 Kings vii. 21.

(The names of these two pillars are adopted in the craft called "Free Masonry.")

Bob'adil (Captain), an ignorant, clever, shallow bully, thoroughly cowardly, but thought by his dupes to be an amazing hero. He lodged with Cob (the water-carrier) and his wife Tib. Master Stephen was greatly struck with his "dainty oaths," such as "By the foot of Pharaoh!" "Body of Cæsar!" "As I am a gentleman and a soldier!" His device to save the expense of a standing army is inimitable for its conceit and absurdity—

"I would select no more to myself throughout the land; gentlemen they should be, of a good spirit and able constitution. I would choose them by an instinct, . . . and I would teach them the special rules . . . till they could play [fence] very near as well as myself. This done, say the enemy were 40,000 strong, we so would . . . challenge so of the enemy; . . . kill them; challenge so more, kill them; so more, kill them too; . . . every man his 10 a day, that's 10 score . . . 200 a day; five days, a thousand; 40,000, 40 times 5, 200 days; kill them all."—Ben Jonson; Every Man in His Humour, iv. 7 (1598).

Since his [Henry Woodward, 1717–1777] time the part of "Bobadil" has never been justly performed. It may be said to have died with him.—Dr. Doran.

 The name was probably suggested by Bobadilla first governor of Cuba, who superseded Columbus sent home in chains on a most frivolous charge. Similar characters are "Metamore" and "Scaramouch" (Molière); "Parollès" and "Pistol" (Shakespeare); "Bessus" (Beaumont and Fletcher). (See also BASILISCO, BOROUGHCLIFF, CAPTAIN BRAZEN, CAPTAIN NOLL BLUFF, SIR PETRONEL FLASH, SACRIPANT, VINCENT DE LA ROSE, etc.)

Bodach Glay or "Grey Spectre." A house-demon of the Scotch, similar to the Irish benshee.

Bodkin. Hamlet says a man may "his quietus make with a bare bodkin." Chaucer uses "bodkin" for a dagger (p. 165); but the nut-brown maid killed her rival with a "bodkin from her headgear." (See LORD THOMAS.)

Bodleian Library (The), Oxford, founded by sir Thomas Bodley in 1597.

Bœ'mond, the Christian king of Antioch, who tried to teach his subjects arts, law, and religion. He was of the Norman race, Roge'ro's brother, and son of Roberto Guiscar'do.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Bœo'tian Ears, ears unable to appreciate music and rhetoric. Bœotia was laughed at by the Athenians for the dulness and stupidity of its inhabitants.

"This is having taste and sentiment. Well, friend, I assure thee thou hast not got Bœotian ears" [because he praised certain extracts read to him by an author]. —Lesage: Gil Blas, vii. 3 (1715).

Bœuf (Front de), a gigantic ferocious follower of prince John.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Boffin (Nicodemus), "the golden dustman," foreman of old John Harmon, dustman and miser. He was "a broad, round-shouldered, one-sided old fellow, whose face was of the rhinoceros build, with over-lapping ears." A kind, shrewd man was Mr. Boffin, devoted to his wife, whom he greatly admired. Being residuary legatee of John Harmon, dustman, he came in for £100,000. Afterwards, John Harmon, the son, being discovered, Mr. Boffin surrendered the property to him, and lived with him.

Mrs. Boffin, wife of Mr. N. Boffin, and daughter of a cat's-meat man. She was a fat, smiling, good-tempered creature, the servant of old John Harmon, dustman and miser, and very kind to the miser's son (young John Harmon). After

Mr. Boffin came into his fortune she became "a high flyer at fashion," wore black velvet and sable, but retained her kindness of heart and love for her husband. She was devoted to Bella Wilfer, who ultimately became the wife of young John Harmon, alias Rokesmith.—C. Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1864).

Bo'gio, one of the allies of Charlemagne. He promised his wife to return within six months, but was slain by Dardinello.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Bogle Swindle (The), a gigantic swindling scheme, concocted at Paris by fourteen sharpers, who expected to clear by it at least a million sterling. This swindle was exposed by O'Reilly in the Times newspaper, and the corporation of London thanked the proprietors of that journal for their public services.

Bo'gus, sham, forged, fraudulent, as bogus currency, bogus transactions; said to be a corruption of Borghese, a swindler, who, in 1837, flooded the North American States with counterfeit bills, bills on fictitious banks, and sham mortgages.—Boston Daily Courier.

(Some think the word a corruption of bogie; Lowell suggests the French word bagasse. The corresponding French term is Passe muscade.)

Bohe'mia, any locality frequented by journalists, artists, actors, opera-singers, spouters, and other similar characters.

Bohemian (A), a gipsy, from the French notion that the first gipsies came from Bohemia.

A Literary Bohemian, an author of desultory works and irregular life.

Never was there an editor with less about him of the literary Bohemian.—Fortnightly Review ("Paston Letters").

Bohemian Literature, desultory reading.

A Bohemian Life, an irregular, wandering, restless way of living, like that of a gipsy.

Bo'hemond, prince of Antioch, a crusader.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Bois'gelin (The young countess de), introduced in the ball given by king René at Aix.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Bois-Guilbert (Sir Brian de), a preceptor of the Knights Templars. He offers insult to Rebecca, and she threatens to cast herself from the battlements if he touches her. When the castle is set on fire by the sibyl, sir Brian carries off Rebecca from the flames. The Grand-Master of the Knights Templars charges Rebecca with sorcery, and she demands a trial by combat. Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert is appointed to sustain the charge against her, and Ivanhoe is her champion. Sir Brian being found dead in the lists, Rebecca is declared innocent.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Boisterer, one of the seven attendants of Fortu'nio. His gift was that he could overturn a windmill with his breath, and even wreck a man-of-war.

Fortunio asked him what he was doing. "I am blowing a little, sir," answered he, "to set those mills at work." "But," said the knight, "you seem too far off." "On the contrary," replied the blower, "I am too near, for if I did not restrain my breath I should blow the mills over, and perhaps the hill too on which they stand."—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Fortunio," 1682).

Bold Beauchamp [Beech'-um], a proverbial phrase, similar to "an Achilles," "a Hector," etc. The reference is to Thomas de Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, who, with one squire and six archers, overthrew a hundred armed men at Hogges, in Normandy, in 1346.

So had we still of ours, in France that famous were,
Warwick, of England then high-constable that was,
. . . So hardy, great and strong,
That after of that name it to an adage grew,
If any man himself adventurous happed to shew,
"Bold Beauchamp" men him termed, if none so bold as he.

Drayton: Polyolbion, xviii. (1613).

¶ A similar story is told of the captal de Buch, who, with forty followers, cleared Meaux of La Jacquerie, 7000 of whom were either slain or trampled to death (1358).

Bold Stroke for a Husband, a comedy by Mrs. Cowley. There are two plots: one a bold stroke to get the man of one's choice for a husband, and the other a bold stroke to keep a husband. Olivia de Zuniga fixed her heart on Julio de Melesina, and refused or disgusted all suitors till he came forward. Donna Victoria, in order to keep a husband, disguised herself in man's apparel, assumed the name of Florio, and made love as a man to her husband's mistress. She contrived by an artifice to get back an estate which don Carlos had made over to his mistress, and thus saved her husband from ruin (1782).

Bold Stroke for a Wife. Old Lovely, at death, left his daughter Anne £30,000, but with this proviso, that she was to forfeit the money if she married without the consent of her guardians. Now, her guardians were four in number, and their characters so widely different that "they never agreed on any one thing." They were sir Philip Modelove, an old beau; Mr. Periwinkle, a silly virtuoso; Mr. Tradelove, a broker on 'Change; and Mr. Obadiah Prim, a hypocritical quaker. Colonel Feignwell contrived to flatter all the guardians to the top of their bent, and won the heiress. —Mrs. Centlivre (1717).

Bol'ga, the southern parts of Ireland, so called from the Fir-bolg or Belgæ of Britain, who settled there. Bolg means a "quiver," and Fir-bolg means "bowmen."

> The chiefs of Bolga crowd round the shield of generous Cathmor.—Ossian: Temora, ii.

Bolster, a famous Wrath, who compelled St. Agnes to gather up the boulders which infested his territory. She carried three apronfuls to the top of a hill, hence called St. Agnes' Beacon. (See WRATH'S HOLE.)

Bol'ton (Stawarth), an English officer in The Monastery, a novel by sir W. Scott (time, Elizabeth).

Bolton Ass. This creature is said to have chewed tobacco and taken snuff. —Dr. Doran.

Bomba (King), a nickname given to Ferdinand II. of Naples, in consequence of his cruel bombardment of Messi'na in 1848. His son, who bombarded Palermo in 1860, is called Bombali'no ("Little Bomba").

> A young Sicilian, too, was there . . .
> [Who] being rebellious to his liege,
> After Palermo's fatal siege,
> Across the western seas he fled
> In good king Bomba's happy reign.
> Longfellow: The Wayside Inn (prelude).

Bombardin'ian, the general of the forces of king Chrononhotonthologos. He invites the king to his tent, and gives him hashed pork. The king strikes him, and calls him traitor. "Traitor, in thy teeth!" replies the general. They fight, and the king is killed.—H. Carey: Chrononhotonthologos (a burlesque, 1734).

Bombastes Furioso, general of Artaxam'inous (king of Utopia). He is plighted to Distaffi'na, but Artaxaminous promises her "half-a-crown" if she will forsake the general for himself. "This bright reward of ever-daring minds" is irresistible. When Bombastes sees himself flouted, he goes mad, and hangs his boots on a tree, with this label duly displayed—

> Who dares this pair of boots displace,
> Must meet Bombastes face to face.

The king, coming up, cuts down the boots, and Bombastes "kills him." Fusbos, seeing the king fallen, "kills" the general; but at the close of the farce the dead men rise one by one, and join the dance, promising, if the audience likes, "to die again to-morrow."—Rhodes: Bombastes Furioso (1790).

 This farce is a travesty of Orlando Furioso, and "Distaffina" is Angelica, beloved by Orlando, whom she flouted for Medoro a young Moor. On this Orlando went mad, and hung up his armour on a tree, with this distich attached thereto—

> Orlando's arms let none displace,
> But such who'll meet him face to face.

¶ In The Rehearsal, by the duke of Buckingham, Bayes' troops are killed, every man of them, by Drawcansir, but revive, and "go off on their legs."

> See the translation of Don Quixote, by C. H. Wilmot esq., ii. 363 (1764).

Bombastes Furioso (The French), capitaine Fracasse.—Théophile Gautier.

Bombas'tus, the family name of Paracelsus. He is said to have kept a small devil prisoner in the pommel of his sword.

> Bombastus kept a devil's bird
> Shut in the pommel of his sword,
> That taught him all the cunning pranks
> Of past and future mountebanks.
> S. Butler: Hudibras, ii. 3.

Bon Gaultier Ballads, parodies of modern poets, by W. E. Aytoun and [sir] Theodore Martin (1854).

Bo'naparte's Cancer. Napoleon I. and III. suffered from an internal cancer.

> I . . . would much rather have a sound digestion
> Than Buonaparte's cancer.
> Byron: Don Juan, bk. 14 (1821).

Bonas'sus, an imaginary wild beast, which the Ettrick shepherd encountered. (The Ettrick shepherd was James Hogg, the Scotch poet.)—Noctes Ambrosianæ (No. xlviii., April, 1830).

Bondman (The), a tragedy by Massinger (1624). The hero is Pisander, and the heroine Cleora.

Bone-setter (The), Sarah Mapp (died 1736).

Bo'ney, a familiar contradiction of Bo'naparte (3 syl.), used by the English in the early part of the nineteenth century by way of depreciation. Thus Thom. Moore speaks of "the infidel Boney."

Bonhomme (Jacques), a peasant who interferes with politics; hence the peasants' rebellion of 1358 was called La Jacquerie. The words may be rendered "Jimmy" or "Johnny Goodfellow."

BONIFACE (St.), an Anglo-Saxon whose name was Winifrid or Winfrith, born in Devonshire. He was made archbishop of Mayence by pope Gregory III., and is called "The Apostle of the Germans." St. Boniface was murdered in Friesland by some peasants, and his day is June 5 (680–755).

. . . in Friesland first St. Boniface our best,
Who of the see of Mentz, while there he sat possessed,
At Dockum had his death, by faithless Frisians slain.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1622).

Bon'iface (Father), ex-abbot of Kennaquhair. He first appears under the name of Blinkhoodie in the character of gardener at Kinross, and afterwards as the old gardener at Dundrennan. (Kennaquhair, that is, "I know not where.")—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Bon'iface (The abbot), successor of the abbot Ingelram, as Superior of St. Mary's Convent.—Sir W. Scott, The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Bon'iface, landlord of the inn at Lichfield, in league with the highwaymen. This sleek, jolly publican is fond of the cant phrase, "as the saying is." Thus: "Does your master stay in town, as the saying is?" "So well, as the saying is, I could wish we had more of them." "I'm old Will Boniface; pretty well known upon this road, as the saying is." He had lived at Lichfield "man and boy above eight and fifty years, and not consumed eight and fifty ounces of meat." He says—

"I have fed purely upon ale. I have eat my ale, drank my ale, and I always sleep upon my ale."—Farquhar: The Beaux' Stratagem, l. 1 (1707).

 Hence Boniface has become a common term for a publican.

Bonne Reine, Claude de France, daughter of Louis XII. and wife of François I. (1499–1524).

Bonnet (Je parle à mon), "I am talking to myself."

Harpagon. A qui tu parle?
La Fléche. Je parle à mon bonnet.
Molière: L'Avare, l. 3 (1667).

Bonnet Rouge, a red republican, so called from the red cap of liberty which he wore.

Bonnivard (François de), the prisoner of Chillon, in Byron's poem. He was one of six brothers, five of whom died violent deaths. The father and two sons died on the battle-field; one was burnt at the stake; three were imprisoned in the dungeon of Chillon, near the lake of Geneva. Two of the three died, and François was set at liberty by Henri the Bearnais. They were incarcerated by the duke-bishop of Savoy for republican principles (1496–1570).

Bonstet'tin (Nicholas), the old deputy of Schwitz, and one of the deputies of the Swiss confederacy to Charles duke of Burgundy.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Bon'temps (Roger), the personification of that buoyant spirit which is always "inclined to hope rather than fear," and in the very midnight of distress is ready to exclaim, "There's a good time coming: wait a little longer." The character is the creation of Béranger.

Vous, pauvres pleins d'envie,
Vous, riches désireux;
Vous, dont le char dévie
Après un cours heureux;
Vous, qui perdrez peut-être
Des titres éclatans,
Eh gai! prenez pour maître
Le gros Roger Bontemps.
Béranger (1814).

Bon'thron (Anthony), one of Ramorny's followers; employed to murder Smith, the lover of Catherine Glover ("the fair maid of Perth"), but he murdered Oliver instead, by mistake. When charged with the crime, he demanded a trial by combat, and being defeated by Smith, confessed his guilt and was hanged. He was restored to life, but being again apprehended, was executed.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Bon Ton, a farce by Garrick. Its design is to show the evil effects of the introduction of foreign morals and foreign manners. Lord Minikin neglects his wife, and flirts with Miss Tittup. Lady Minikin hates her husband, and flirts with colonel Tivy. Miss Tittup is engaged to the colonel. Sir John Trotley, who does not understand bon ton, thinks this sort of flirtation very objectionable. "You'll excuse me, for such old-fashioned notions, I am sure" (1760).

Boo'by (Lady), a vulgar upstart, who tries to seduce her footman, Joseph Andrews. Parson Adams reproves her for laughing in church. Lady Booby is a caricature of Richardson's "Pamela."—Fielding: Joseph Andrews (1742).

Book of Martyrs (The), by John Fox (1562). Also called the Acts and Monuments.

Books (The Battle of the). (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 103.)

Books (Enormous prices given for rare). The highest price ever given was £3990 for a copy in vellum of the Mazarine Bible. Another copy was bought by Lord Ashburnham, at Parker's sale, in 1873, for £3400. Mr. Quaritch, the bookseller, gave £2000 for one on paper in 1887; and one, slightly damaged, fetched £2000 in 1889.

At the auction of the duke of Roxburgh, Caxton's first book, called Recuyell of the Historyes of Troye, fetched £1000; and a first edition of Boccaccio's Decameron fetched £2200.

Boone (1 syl.), colonel [afterwards "general"] Daniel Boone, in the United States service, was one of the earliest settlers in Kentucky, where he signalized himself by many daring exploits against the Red Indians (1735–1820).

Of all men, saving Sylla the man-slayer . . .
The general Boone, the back-woodsman of Kentucky,
Was happiest amongst mortals anywhere, etc.
Byron: Don Juan, viii. 61–65 (1821).

Booshal'looh (Neil), cowherd to Ian Eachin M'Ian, chief of the clan Quhele.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Boo'tes (3 syl.), Arcas son of Jupiter and Calisto. One day his mother, in the semblance of a bear, met him, and Arcas was on the point of killing it, when Jupiter, to prevent the murder, converted him into a constellation, either Boötês or Ursa Major.—Pausanias: Itinerary of Greece, viii. 4.

Doth not Orion worthily deserve
A higher place . . .
Than frail Boötês, who was placed above
Only because the gods did else foresee
He should the murderer of his mother be?
Lord Brooke: Of Nobility.

Booth, husband of Amelia. Said to be a drawing of the author's own character and experiences. He has all the vices of Tom Jones, with an additional share of meanness.—Fielding: Amelia (1751).

Boots of the Holly-tree Inn. (See COBB.)

Borach'io, a follower of don John of Aragon. He is a great villain, engaged to Margaret, the waiting-woman of Hero.—Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing (1600).

Borach'io, a drunkard. (Spanish, borracho, "drunk;" borrachuelo, "a tippler.")

"Why, you stink of wine! D'ye think my niece will ever endure such a borachio? You are an absolute borachio."—Congreve: The Way of the World (1700).

Borachio (Joseph), landlord of the Eagle hotel, in Salamanca.—Jephson: Two Strings to your Bow (1792).

Bor'ak (Al), the animal brought by Gabriel to convey Mahomet to the seventh heaven. The word means "lightning." Al Borak had the face of a man, but the cheeks of a horse; its eyes were, like jacinths, but brilliant as the stars; it had eagle's wings, glistened all over with radiant light, and spoke with a human voice. This was one of the ten animals (not of the race of man) received into paradise. (See ANIMALS, p. 45.)

Borak was a fine-limbed, high-standing horse, strong in frame, and with a coat as glossy as marble. His colour was saffron, with one hair of gold for every three of tawny; his ears were restless and pointed like a reed; his eyes large and full of fire; his nostrils wide and steaming; he had a white star on his forehead, a neck gracefully arched, a mane soft and silky, and a thick tail that swept the ground.—Croquemitaine, ii. 9.

Borax, Nosa, or Crapon'dinus, a stone extracted from a toad. It is the antidote of poison.—Mirror of Stones.

. . . the toad, ugly and venomous,
Wears yet a precious jewel in his head.
Shakespeare: As You Like It, act ii. sc. 1 (1600).

Border Minstrel (The), sir Walter Scott (1771–1832).

My steps the Border Minstrel led.
Wordsworth: Yarrow Revisited.

Border States (of North America): Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri. So called because they bordered upon the line of Free States and Slave-holding States. The term is now an anachronism.

Border-thief School (The), a term applied by Thomas Carlyle, in his Sartor Resartus, to sir W. Scott and others, who celebrated the achievements of free-booters, etc., like Rob Roy. Defoe and Ainsworth made Jack Sheppard such a hero. Dick Turpin and Cartouche belong to the same school, as also Robin Hood and other outlaws. (See PICARESCO SCHOOL.)

Bore (1 syl.), a tidal wave. The largest are those of the Ganges (especially the Hooghly branch), Brahmaputra, and Indus. In Great Britain, the Severn, Trent, Wye, Solway, the Dee in Cheshire, Clyde, Dornoch Frith, and Lune. That of the Trent is called the "Eager;" evidently derived from the Norse word Aegir (the God of Storms).

Bo'reas, the north wind. He lived in a cave on mount Hæmus, in Thrace.

Cease, rude Boreas, blustering railer.
G. A. Stephens: The Shipwreck.

Bor'gia (Lucrezia di), duchess of Ferra'ra, wife of don Alfonso. Her natural son Genna'ro was brought up by a fisherman in Naples; but when he grew to manhood a stranger gave him a paper from his mother, announcing to him that he was of noble blood, but concealing his name and family. He saved the life of Orsi'ni in the battle of Rim'ini, and they became sworn friends. In Venice he was introduced to a party of nobles, all of whom had some tale to tell against Lucrezia: Orsini told him she had murdered her own brother; Vitelli, that she had caused his uncle to be slain; Liverotto, that she had poisoned his uncle Appia'no; Gazella, that she had caused one of his relatives to be drowned in the Tiber. Indignant at these acts of wickedness, Gennaro struck off the "B" from the escutcheon of the duke's palace at Ferrara, changing the name Borgia into Orgia. Lucrezia prayed the duke to put to death the man who had thus insulted their noble house, and Gennaro was condemned to death by poison. Lucrezia, to save him, gave him an antidote, and let him out of prison by a secret door. Soon after his liberation the princess Negroni, a friend of the Borgias, gave a grand supper, to which Gennaro and his companions were invited. At the close of the banquet they were all arrested by Lucrezia, after having drunk poisoned wine. Gennaro was told he was the son of Lucrezia, and died. Lucrezia no sooner saw him die than she died also.—Donizetti: Lucrezia di Borgia (an opera, 1835).

Born at Sea. All persons born at sea are registered in the parish of Stepney, a borough of the Tower Hamlets.

Borough (The), in ten-syllable verse with rhymes, in twenty-four letters, by George Crabbe (1810).

Bor'oughcliff (Captain), a vulgar Yankee, boastful, conceited, and slangy. "I guess," "I reckon," "I calculate," are used indifferently by him, and he perpetually appeals to sergeant Drill to confirm his boastful assertions: as, "I'm a pretty considerable favourite with the ladies; aren't I, sergeant Drill?" "My character for valour is pretty well known; isn't it, sergeant Drill?" "If you once saw me in battle, you'd never forget it; would he, sergeant Drill?" "I'm a sort of a kind of a nonentity; aren't I, sergeant Drill?" etc. He is made the butt of Long Tom Coffin. Colonel Howard wishes him to marry his niece Katharine, but the young lady has given her heart to lieutenant Barnstaple, who turns out to be the colonel's son.—E. Fitzball: The Pilot. (See JOHN BLOUNT, p. 130.)

Borre (1 syl.), natural son of king Arthur, and one of the knights of the Round Table. His mother was Lyonors, an earl's daughter, who came to do homage to the young king.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 15 (1470).

 Sir Bors de Ganis is quite another person, and so is king Bors of Gaul.

Borrioboo'la Gha, in Africa. (See JELLYBY, MRS.)

Borro'meo (Charles), cardinal and archbishop of Milan. Immortalized by his self-devotion in ministering at Mil'an to the plague-stricken (1538–1584).

¶ St. Roche, who died 1327, devoted himself in a similar manner to those stricken with the plague at Piacenza; and Mompesson to the people of Eyam. In 1720–22 H. Francis Xavier de Belsunce was indefatigable in ministering to the plague-stricken of Marseilles.

Borrowing. Who goeth a-borrowing, goeth a-sorrowing.—Tusser: Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, xv. 8 and again xlii. 6 (1557).

Bors (King) of Gaul, brother of king Ban of Benwicke [? Brittany]. They went to the aid of prince Arthur when he was first established on the British throne, and Arthur promised in return to aid them against king Claudas, "a mighty man of men," who warred against them.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur (1470).

There are two brethren beyond the sea, and they kings both . . . the one hight king Ban of Benwicke, and the other hight king Bors of Gaul, that is, France.—Pt. i. 8.

(Sir Bors was of Ganis, that is, Wales, and was a knight of the Round Table. So also was Borre (natural son of prince Arthur), sometimes called sir Bors.)

Bors (Sir), called sir Bors de Ganis, brother of sir Lionell and nephew of sir Launcelot. "For all women was he a virgin, save for one, the daughter of king Brandeg'oris, on whom he had a child, hight Elaine; save for her, sir Bors was a clean maid" (ch. iv.). When he went to Corbin, and saw Galahad the son of sir Launcelot and Elaine (daughter of king Pelles), he prayed that the child might prove as good a knight as his father, and instantly a vision of the holy greal was vouchsafed him ; for—

There came a white dove, bearing a little censer of gold in her bill . . . and a maiden that bear the Sancgreall, and she said, "Wit ye well, sir Bors, that this child . . . shall achieve the Sancgreall" . . . then they kneeled down . . . and there was such a savour as all the spicery in the world had been there. And when the dove took her flight, the maiden vanished away with the Sancgreall.—Pt. iii. 4.

 Sir Bors was with sir Galahad and sir Percival when the consecrated wafer assumed the visible and bodily appearance of the Saviour. And this is what is meant by "achieving the holy greal ;" for when they partook of the wafer their eyes saw the Saviour enter it.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 101, 102 (1470).

N.B.—This sir Bors must not be confounded with sir Borre, a natural son of king Arthur and Lyonors (daughter of the earl Sanam, pt. i. 15), nor yet with king Bors of Gaul, i.e. France (pt. i. 8).

Bortell, the bull, in the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox (1498).

Bos'can-[Almoga'và], a Spanish poet of Barcelona (1500–1543). His poems are generally bound up with those of Garcilasso. They introduced the Italian style into Castilian poetry.

Sometimes he turned to gaze upon his book,
Boscan, or Garcilasso.
Bryon: Don Juan, I. 95 (1819).

Boscobel, or the preservation and escape of Charles II. after the battle of Worcester. J. Blouht (?) professes his account to be a truthful narrative. Ainsworth wrote a novel called Boscobel, or The Royal Oak (1872).

Sir W. Scott's Woodstock contains an account of the escape of Charles II. after the battle of Worcester, and carries on the romance to the death of Cromwell, the return of the king, and his death.

Boscobel Tracts (The), relative to the hairbreadth escapes of Charles II. in the forty days between the battle of Worcester and his escape to France. Dr. Copleston, bishop of Llandaff, wrote the Introduction (1827).

Bosmi'na, daughter of Fingal king of Morven (north-west coast of Scotland). —Ossian.

Boss, of Arthurian legend, is Boscastle, in Cornwall, on the Bristol Channel. Bude is also in Cornwall, on the Bristol Channel.

When the long wave broke
All down the thundering shores of Bude and Boss.
Tennyson: Idylls of the King.

Bossu (René le), French scholar and critic (1631–1680).

And for the epic poem your lordship bade me look at, upon taking the length, breadth, height, and depth of it, and trying them at home upon an exact scale of Bossu's, 'tis out, my lord, in every one of its dimensions. —Sterne (1768).

(I think Sterne means the Abbé Bossut, the mathematician. His critic tried the book on its "length, breadth, height, and depth;" or perhaps he wishes to confound the two authors.)

Bossut (Abbé Charles), a celebrated mathematician (1730–1814).

(Sir Richard Phillips assumed a host of popular names, amongst others that of M. l'Abbé Bossut in several educational works in French.)

Bosta'na, one of the two daughters of the old man who entrapped prince Assad in order to offer him in sacrifice on "the fiery mountain." His other daughter was named Cava'ma. The old man enjoined these two daughters to scourge the prince daily with the bastinado, and feed him with bread and water till the day of sacrifice arrived. After a time, the heart of Bostana softened towards her captive, and she released him. Whereupon his brother Amgiad, out of gratitude, made her his wife, and became in time king of the city in which he was already vizier.—Arabian Nights ("Amgiad and Assad").

Bostock, a coxcomb, cracked on the point of aristocracy and family birth. His one and only inquiry is, "How many quarterings has a person got?" Descent from the nobility with him covers a multitude of sins, and a man is no one, whatever his personal merit, who "is not a sprig of the nobility."—J. Shirley: The Ball (1642).

Bosworth Field, an historical poem in heroic couplets, by sir J. Beaumont (1629).

Botanic Garden (The), a poem in two parts, by Dr. Erasmus Darwin, with scientific and other notes (1791).

Bot'any (Father of English), W. Turner, M.D. (1520–1568).

J. P. de Tournefort is called The Father of Botany (1656–1708).

(Anthony de Jussieu lived 1686–1758, and his brother Bernard 1699–1777.)

Botany-Bay Eclogues, by Southey (1794).

Bothwell (Sergeant), alias Francis

Stewart, in the royal army.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Bothwell (Lady), sister of lady Forester.

Sir Geoffrey Bothwell, the husband of lady Bothwell.

Mrs. Margaret Bothwell, in the introduction of the story. Aunt Margaret proposed to use Mrs. Margaret's tombstone for her own.—Sir W. Scott: Aunt Margaret's Mirror (time, William III.).

Bothwell, a novel by James Grant (1851); an historic tale in verse by Aytoun (1856); a tragedy by Swinburne (1874). Of course, all these are of the days of Mary queen of Scots.

Bottled Beer, Alexander Nowell, author of a celebrated Latin catechism which first appeared in 1570, under the title of Christianæ pietatis prima Institutio, ad usum Scholarum Latine Scripta. In 1560 he was promoted to the deanery of St. Paul's (1507–1602). — Fuller: Worthies of England ("Lancashire").

Bottom (Nick), an Athenian weaver, a compound of profound ignorance and unbounded conceit, not without good nature and a fair dash of mother-wit. When the play of Piramus and Thisbe is cast, Bottom covets every part; the lion, Thisbê, Pyrămus, all have charms for him. In order to punish Titan'ia, the fairy-king made her dote on Master Bottom, on whom Puck had placed an ass's head. — Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

When Goldsmith, jealous of the attention which a dancing monkey attracted in a coffee-house, said, "I can do that as well," and was about to attempt it, he was but playing "Bottom."—R. G. White.

Bottomless Pit (The), a ludicrous sobriquet of William Pitt, who was remarkably thin (1759–1806).

Boubekir' Muez'in, of Bagdad, "a vain, proud, and envious iman, who hated the rich because he himself was poor." When prince Zeyn Alasnam came to the city, he told the people to beware of him, for probably he was "some thief who had made himself rich by plunder." The prince's attendant called on him, put into his hand a purse of gold, and requested the honour of his acquaintance. Next day, after morning prayers, the iman said to the people, "I find, my brethren, that the stranger who is come to Bagdad is a young prince possessed of a thousand virtues, and worthy the love of all men. Let us protect him, and rejoice that he has come among us."—Arabian Nights ("Prince Zeyn Alasnam").

Bouchard (Sir). (See BERTULPHE.)

Bou'illon (Godfrey duke of), a crusader (1058–1100), introduced in Count Robert of Paris, a novel by sir W. Scott (time, Rufus).

Bounce (Mr. T.), a nickname given in 1837 to T. Barnes, editor of the Times (or the Turnabout, as it was called).

Pope's dog was called "Bounce." (See DOG.)

Bound'erby (Josiah), of Coketown, banker and mill-owner, the "Bully of Humility," a big, loud man, with an iron stare and metallic laugh. Mr. Bounderby is the son of Mrs. Pegler, an old woman to whom he pays £30 a year to keep out of sight, and in a boasting way he pretends that "he was dragged up from the gutter to become a millionaire." Mr. Bounderby marries Louisa, daughter of his neighbour and friend, Thomas Gradgrind, Esq., M.P. — Dickens: Hard Times (1854).

Bountiful (Lady), widow of sir Charles Bountiful. Her delight was curing the parish sick and relieving the indigent.

My lady Bountiful is one of the best of women. Her late husband, sir Charles Bountiful, left her with £1000 a year; and I believe she lays out one-half on't in charitable uses for the good of her neighbours. In short, she has cured more people in and about Lichfield within ten years than the doctors have killed in twenty; and that's a bold word.—Farquhar: The Beaux' Stratagem, i. 1 (1705).

Bounty (Mutiny of the), in 1790, headed by Fletcher Christian. The mutineers finally settled in Pitcairn Island (Polynesian Archipelago). In 1808 all the mutineers were dead except one (Alexander Smith), who had changed his name to John Adams, and became a model patriarch of the colony, which was taken under the protection of the British Government in 1839. [Adams died 1829, aged 65.] Lord Byron, in The Island, has made the "mutiny of the Bounty" the basis of his tale, but the facts are greatly distorted.

In Notes and Queries, January 10, 1880, is given a list, etc., of all the crew. Corrected, etc., January 31.

Bous'trapa, a nickname given to Napoleon III. It is compounded of the first syllables of Bou[logne], Stra[sbourg], Pa[ris]; and alludes to his escapades in 1840, 1836, 1851 (coup d'état).

(No man ever lived who was distinguished by more nicknames than Louis Napoleon. Beside the one above mentioned, he was called Badinguet, Man of December, Man of Sedan, Ratipol, Man of Silence, Verhuel, etc.; and after his escape from the fortress of Ham he called himself le count Arenenberg.)

Bow Church (London). Stow gives two derivations: (1) He says it was so called because it was the first church in London built on arches. This is the derivation most usually accepted. (2) He says also it took its name from certain stone arches supporting a lantern on the top of the tower.

Bower of Bliss, a garden belonging to the enchantress Armi'da. It abounded in everything that could contribute to earthly pleasure. Here Rinal'do spent some time in love-passages with Armi'da, but he ultimately broke from the enchantress and rejoined the war.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Bower of Bliss, the residence of the witch Acras'ia, a beautiful and most fascinating woman. This lovely garden was situated on a floating island filled with everything which could conduce to enchant the senses, and "wrap the spirit in forgetfulness."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 12 (1590).

Bowkit, in The Son-in-Law.

In the scene where Cranky declines to accept Bowkit as son-in-law on account of his ugliness, John Edwin, who was playing "Bowkit" at the Haymarket, uttered in a tone of surprise, "Ugly?" and then advancing to the lamps, said with infinite impertinence, "I submit to the decision of the British public which is the ugliest of us three: I, old Cranky, or that gentleman there in the front row of the balcony box?"—Cornhill Magazine (1867).

Bowley (Sir Joseph), M.P., who facetiously called himself "the poor man's friend." His secretary is Fish.—Dickens: The Chimes (1844).

Bowling (Lieutenant Tom), an admirable naval character in Smollett's Roderick Random. Dibdin wrote a naval song in memoriam of Tom Bowling, beginning thus—

Here a sheer hulk lies poor Tom Bowling,
The darling of the crew . . .

Bowyer (Master), usher of the black rod in the court of queen Elizabeth.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Bowzybe'us (4 syl.), the drunkard, noted for his songs in Gay's pastorals, called The Shepherd's Week. He sang of "Nature's Laws," of "Fairs and Shows," "The Children in the Wood," "Chevy Chase," "Taffey Welsh," "Rosamond's Bower," "Lilly-bullĕro," etc. The 6th pastoral is in imitation of Virgil's 6th Bucolic, and Bowzybĕus is a vulgarised Silēnus.

That Bowzybeus, who with jocund tongue,
Ballads, and roundelays, and catches sung.
Gay: Pastoral, vi. (1714).

Box and Cox, a farce by J. M. Morton, the principal characters of which are Box and Cox.

Boy and the Mantle (The), a ballad in Percy's Reliques. It tells us how a boy entered the court of king Arthur while he was keeping his Christmas feast at "Carleile," and, producing a mantle, said no lady who was not leal and chaste could put it on. Queen Guenever tried, but utterly failed, and only Cradock's wife succeeded. He then drew his wand across a head of brawn, and said no cuckold knight could cut it. Sir Cradock only succeeded. Lastly, he drew forth a gold cup, and said no cuckold could drink therefrom. Here again sir Cradock alone of all the company contrived to drink from that cup. So sir Cradock became possessed of the mantle, the brawn's head, and the golden drinking-cup.

Boy Archbishop (The). A child of only five years old was made archbishop of Rheims. The see of Narbonne was purchased for a boy of ten. Pope Benedict IX. is said to have been only twelve when he was raised to St. Peter's chair.—Hallam, vol. ii. p. 248.

Boy Bachelor (The), William Wotton, D.D., admitted at St. Catherine's Hall, Cambridge, before he was ten, and to his degree of B.A. when he was twelve and a half (1666–1726).

This was by no means a unique instance—
Henry Philpotts, C.C.C., matriculated at the age of 13 (1791).
James lord Abinger, at the age of 13½.
John Kelle, C.C.C., at the age of 14, in 1808.
Richard Bethell, Wadham, Oxford, aged 14, 1814.
Lord Westbury, Oxford, at the age of 14, 1818.
Edward Copleston, C.C.C., at the age of 15, 1791.

Boy Bishop (The), St. Nicholas, the patron saint of boys (fourth century).

(There was also an ancient custom of choosing a boy from the cathedral choir on St. Nicholas' Day (December 6) as a mock bishop. This boy possessed certain privileges, and if he died during the year was buried in pontificalibus. The custom was abolished by Henry VIII. In Salisbury Cathedral visitors are shown a small sarcophagus, which the verger says was made for a boy bishop.)

Boy Crucified. It is said that some time during the dark ages, a boy named

Werner was impiously crucified at Bacharach on the Rhine, by the Jews. A little chapel erected to the memory of this boy stands on the walls of the town, close to the river. Hugh of Lincoln and William of Norwich are instances of a similar story.

> See how its currents gleam and shine . . .
> As if the grapes were stained with the blood
> Of the innocent boy who, some years back,
> Was taken and crucified by the Jews
> In that ancient town of Bacharach.
> Longfellow: The Golden Legend.

Boyet', one of the lords attending on the princess of France.—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost (1594).

Boyle's Lectures, founded by the hon. Robert Boyle, for any "minister" who shall preach eight sermons in a year in defence of the Christian religion, as opposed to atheism, deism, paganism, or Mohammedanism, or the Jewish faith. The first course was preached in 1692, by Richard Bentley. All the lectures up to 1739 have been printed in 3 vols. folio. In 1846 the course of lectures by the Rev. F. D. Maurice were published under the title of The Religions of the World. Many courses since then have been delivered.

Boythorn (Laurence), a robust gentleman with the voice of a Stentor, a friend of Mr. Jarndyce. He would utter the most ferocious sentiments, while at the same time he fondled a pet canary on his finger. Once on a time he had been in love with Miss Barbary, lady Dedlock's sister; but "the good old times—all times when old are good — were gone." —Dickens: Bleak House (1853).

("Laurence Boythorn" is a photograph of W. S. Landor; as "Harold Skimpole," in the same story, is drawn from Leigh Hunt.)

Bos, Charles Dickens. It was the nickname of a pet child dubbed Moses, in honour of "Moses Primrose" in the Vicar of Wakefield. Children called the name Boses, which got shortened into Bos (1812–1870).

> Who the dickens "Bos" could be
> Puzzled many a learned elf;
> But time revealed the mystery,
> And "Bos" appeared as Dickens' self.
> Epigram on the Carthusian.

(Sketches by Bos, by Charles Dickens, (1836), two series. The first sketch is called Mr. Minns and his Cousin.)

Bozzy, James Boswell, the gossipy biographer of Dr. Johnson (1740–1795).

Braban'tio, a senator of Venice, father of Desdemo'na; most proud, arrogant, and overbearing. He thought the "insolence" of Othello in marrying his daughter unpardonable, and that Desdemona must have been drugged with love-potions so to demean herself.—Shakespeare: Othello (1611).

Brac'cio, commissary of the republic of Florence, employed in picking up every item of scandal he could find against Lu'ria the noble Moor, who commanded the army of Florence against the Pisans. The Florentines hoped to find sufficient cause of blame to lessen or wholly cancel their obligations to the Moor, but even Braccio was obliged to confess "This Moor hath borne his faculties so meek, hath been so clear in his great office, that his virtues would plead like angels, trumpet-tongued," against the council which should censure him.—R. Browning: Luria (a poetical drama, 1879).

Brac'idas and Am'idas, the two sons of Mile'sio, the former in love with the wealthy Philtra, and the latter with the dowerless Lucy. Their father at death left each of his sons an island of equal size and value, but the sea daily encroached on that of the elder brother and added to the island of Amidas. The rich Philtra now forsook Bracidas for the richer brother, and Lucy, seeing herself forsaken, jumped into the sea. A floating chest attracted her attention, she clung to it, and was drifted to the wasted island, where Bracidas received her kindly. The chest was found to contain property of great value, and Lucy gave it to Bracidas, together with herself, "the better of them both." Amidas and Philtra claimed the chest as their right, and the dispute was submitted to sir Ar'tegal. Sir Artegal decided that whereas Amidas claimed as his own all the additions which the sea had given to his island, so Lucy might claim as her own the chest which the sea had given into her hands.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 4 (1596).

Bracy (Sir Maurice de), a follower of prince John. He sues the lady Rowen'a to become his bride, and threatens to kill both Cedric and Ivanhoe if she refuses. The interview is intercepted, and at the close of the novel Rowena marries Ivanhoe.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Brad'amant, daughter of Amon and Beatrice, sister of Rinaldo, and niece of Charlemagne. She was called the Virgin

Knight. Her armour was white, and her plume white. She loved Roge'ro the Moor, but refused to marry him till he was baptized. Her marriage with great pomp and Rogero's victory over Rodomont, form the subject of the last book of Orlando Furioso. Bradamant possessed an irresistible spear, which unhorsed any knight with a touch. Britomart had a similar spear.—Bojardo: Orlando Innamorato (1495); Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Brad'bourne (Mistress Lilias), waiting-woman of lady Avenel (2 syl.), at Avenel Castle.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Bradwardine (Como Cosmyne), baron of Bradwardine and of Tully Veolan. He is very pedantic, but brave and gallant.

Rose Bradwardine, his daughter, the heroine of the novel, which concludes with her marriage with Waverley, and the restoration of the manor-house of Tully Veolan.

Malcolm Bradwardine of Inchgrabbit, a relation of the old baron.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Brady (Martha), a young "Irish widow," 23 years of age, and in love with William Whittle. She was the daughter of sir Patrick O'Neale. Old Thomas Whittle, the uncle, a man of 63, wanted to oust his nephew in her affections, for he thought her "so modest, so mild, so tender-hearted, so reserved, so domestic. Her voice was so sweet, with just a soupçon of the brogue to make it enchanting." In order to break off this detestable passion of the old man, the widow assumed the airs and manners of a boisterous, loud, flaunting, extravagant, low Irish-woman, deeply in debt, and abandoned to pleasure. Old Whittle, thoroughly frightened, induced his nephew to take the widow off his hands, and gave him £5000 as a douceur for so doing.—Garrick: The Irish Widow (1757).

Braes of Yarrow (The), an old Scotch ballad. W. Hamilton wrote an imitation of it in 1760. Scott and Hogg have celebrated this stream and its legends; and Wordsworth wrote a poem called Yarrow Revisited, in 1835.

Brag (Jack), a vulgar boaster, who gets into good society, where his vulgarity stands out in strong relief.—Theodore Hook: Jack Brag (a novel).

Brag (Sir Jack), general John Burgoyne (died 1792). A ballad.

Braganza (The), the largest diamond in existence, its weight being 1680 carats. It is uncut, and its value is £58,350,000. It is now among the crown jewels of Portugal.

 It is thought that this diamond, which is the size of a hen's egg, is in reality a white topaz.

Braganza (Juan duke of). In 1580 Philip II. of Spain claimed the crown of Portugal, and governed it by a regent. In 1640 Margaret was regent, and Velasquez her chief minister, a man exceedingly obnoxious to the Portuguese. Don Juan and his wife Louisa of Braganza being very popular, a conspiracy was formed to shake off the Spanish yoke. Velasquez was torn to death by the populace, and don Juan of Braganza was proclaimed king.

Louisa duchess of Braganza. Her character is thus described—

Bright Louisa,
To all the softness of her tender sex,
Unites the noblest qualities of man:
A genius to embrace the amplest schemes . . .
Judgment most sound, persuasive eloquence . . .
Pure piety without religious dross,
And fortitude that shrinks at no disaster.
Jephson: Braganza, I. (1775).

Mrs. Bellamy took her leave of the stage May 24, 1785. On this occasion Mrs. Yates sustained the part of the "duchess of Braganza," and Miss Farren spoke the address.—F. Reynolds

Bragela, daughter of Sorglan, and wife of Cuthullin (general of the Irish army, and regent during the minority of king Cormac).—Ossian: Fingal.

Braggado'chio, personification of the intemperance of the tongue. For a time his boasting serves him with some profit, but being found out he is stripped of his borrowed plumes. His shield is claimed by Mar'inel; his horse by Guyon; Talus shaves off his beard; and his lady is shown to be a sham Florimel.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 8 and 10, with v. 3.

(It is thought that Philip of Spain was the academy figure of "Braggadochio.")

Braggadochio's Sword, San'glamore (3 syl.).

Bragh [brɔxw]. Go bragh! (Irish) "for ever!"

One dying wish my bosom can draw;
Erin! an exile bequeaths thee his blessing.
Land of my forefathers, Erin go bragh!
Campbell: Exile of Erin.

Bragmar'do (Janotus de), the sophister sent by the Parisians to Gargantua, to remonstrate with him for carrying off the bells of Notre-Dame to suspend round the neck of his mare for jingles.—Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantag'ruel, ii. (1533).

Brain'worm, the servant of Kno'well, a man of infinite shifts, and a regular Proteus (2 syl.) in his metamorphoses. He appears first as Brainworm; afterwards as Fitz-Sword; then as a reformed soldier whom Knowell takes into his service; then as justice Clement's man; and lastly as valet to the courts of law, by which devices he plays upon the same clique of some half-dozen men of average intelligence.—Ben Jonson: Every Man in His Humour (1598).

Brakel (Adrian), the gipsy mountebank, formerly master of Fenella, the deaf-and-dumb girl.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Bramble (Matthew), an "odd kind of humourist," "always on the fret," dyspeptic, and afflicted with the gout, but benevolent, generous, and kind-hearted.

Miss Tabitha Bramble, an old maiden sister of Matthew Bramble, of some 45 years of age, noted for her bad spelling. She is starch, vain, prim, and ridiculous; soured in temper, proud, imperious, prying, mean, malicious, and uncharitable. She contrives at last to marry captain Lismaha'go, who is content to take "the maiden" for the sake of her £4000.

"She is tall, raw-boned, awkward, flat-chested, and stooping; her complexion is sallow and freckled; her eyes are not grey, but greenish, like those of a cat, and generally inflamed; her hair is of a sandy or rather of a dusty hue; her forehead low; her nose long, sharp, and towards the extremity always red in cold weather; her lips skinny; her mouth extensive; her teeth straggling and loose, of various colours and conformations; and her long neck shrivelled into a thousand wrinkles."—Smollett: The Expedition of Humphry Clinker (1771).

 "Matthew Bramble" is "Roderick Random" grown old, somewhat cynical by experience of the world, but vastly improved in taste.

Smollett took some of the incidents of the family tour from "Anstey's New Bath Guide."—Chambers: English Literature, ii.

Bramble (Sir Robert), a baronet living at Blackberry Hall, Kent. Blunt and testy, but kind-hearted; "charitable as a Christian, and rich as a Jew;" fond of argument and contradiction, but detesting flattery; very proud, but most considerate to his poorer neighbours. In his first interview with lieutenant Worthington "the poor gentleman," the lieutenant mistook him for a bailiff come to arrest him, but sir Robert nobly paid the bill for £500 when it was presented to him for signature as sheriff of the county.

 "Sir Robert Bramble" is the same type of character as Sheridan's "sir Anthony Absolute."

Frederick Bramble, nephew of sir Robert, and son of Joseph Bramble a Russian merchant. His father having failed in business, Frederick was adopted by his rich uncle. He is full of life and noble instincts, but thoughtless and impulsive. Frederick falls in love with Emily Worthington, whom he marries.—Colman: The Poor Gentleman (1802).

Bra'mine (2 syl.) and Bra'min (The), Mrs. Elizabeth Draper and Laurence Sterne. Sterne being a clergyman, and Mrs. Draper being born in India, suggested the names. Ten of Sterne's letters to Mrs. Draper are published, and called Letters to Eliza.

Bran, the dog of Lamderg the lover of Gelchossa (daughter of Tuathal).—Ossian: Fingal, v.

 Fingal king of Morven had a dog of the same name, and another named Luäth. (See DOG.)

Call White-breasted Bran and the surly strength of Luäth.—Ossian: Fingal, vi.

It is not Bran, but Bran's brother. It is not Simon Pure, but only somewhat like him.

Brand (Alice), wife of lord Richard. (See URGAN.)

Brand (Sir Denys), a county magnate, who apes humility. He rides a sorry brown nag "not worth £5," but mounts his groom on a race-horse "twice victor for a plate."—Crabbe: Borough (1810).

Bran'damond of Damascus, whom sir Bevis of Southampton defeated.

That dreadful battle where with Brandamond he fought,
And with his sword and steed such earthly wonders wrought
As e'en among his foes him admiration won.
Drayton: Polyolbion, ii. (16ss).

Bran'dan (Island of St) or ISLAND OF SAN BORAN'DAN, a flying island, so late as 1755 set down in geographical charts west of the Canary group. In 1721 an expedition was sent by Spain in quest thereof. The Spaniards say their king Rodri'go has retreated there, and the Portuguese affirm that it is the retreat of their don Sebastian. It was called St. Brandan from a navigator of the sixth century, who went in search of the "Islands of Paradise."

Its reality was for a long time a matter of firm belief . . . the garden of Armi'da, where Rinaldo was detained, and which Tasso places in one of the Canary Isles, has been identified with San Borandan.—Washington Irving.

(If there is any truth at all in the legend, the island must be ascribed to the Fata Morgana.)

Brandan (St.), a poem by Matthew Arnold. It relates that Judas did an act of charity to a leper at Joppa, and therefore was let out of hell for a day.

Bran'deum, plu. Brandea, a piece of cloth enclosed in a box with relics, which thus acquired the same miraculous powers as the relics themselves.

Pope Leo proved this fact beyond a doubt, for when some Greeks ventured to question it, he cut a brandeum through with a pair of scissors, and it was instantly covered with blood.—Brady: Clavis Calendaria, 182.

Bran'dimart, brother-in-law of Orlando, son of Monodantês, and husband of For'delis. This "king of the Distant Islands" was one of the bravest knights in Charlemagne's army, and was slain by Gradasso.—Bojardo: Orlando Innamorato (1495); Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Brandley (Mrs.) of Richmond, Surrey. The lady who undertakes to introduce Estella (q.v.) into society.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1861).

Brandons, lighted torches. St. Valentine's day was called Dominica de brandonbus, because boys, at one time, used to carry about lighted torches on that day, i.e. "Cupid's lighted torches."

Brandt, the leader of the Indians who destroyed the village of Wyoming, Pennsylvania, in 1788. Campbell represents him as a monster of cruelty.—Gertrude of Wyoming (1809).

Brandy Nan, queen Anne, who was very fond of brandy (1664, 1702–1714).

Brandy Nan, brandy Nan, left [all] in the lurch,
Her face to the gin-shop, her back to the church.
Written on the statue of queen Anne in St. Paul's [plant.

Brangtons (The), vulgar, jealous, malicious gossips in Evelina, a novel by Miss Burney (1778).

Branno, an Irishman, father of Evirallin. Evirallin was the wife of Ossian and mother of Oscar.—Ossian.

Brass, the roguish confederate of Dick Amlet, and acting as his servant.

"I am your valet, 'tis true; your footman sometimes . . . but you have always had the ascendant, I confess. When we were school-fellows, you made me carry your books, make your exercise, own your rogueries, and sometimes take a whipping for you. When we were fellow-'prentices, though I was your senior, you made me open the shop, clean my master's boots, cut last at dinner, and eat all the crusts. In your sins, too, I must own you still kept me under; you soared up to the mistress, while I was content with the maid."—Sir J. Vanbrugh: The Confederacy, iii. 1 (1695).

Brass (Sampson), a knavish, servile attorney, affecting great sympathy with his clients, but in reality fleecing them without mercy.

Sally Brass, Sampson's sister, and an exaggerated edition of her brother.—Dickens: Old Curiosity Shop (1840).

Bravassa (Miss), of the Portsmouth Theatre. Supposed to be a great beauty.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Brave (The), Alfonzo IV. of Portugal (1290–1357).

The Brave Fleming, John Andrew van der Mersch (1734–1792).

The Bravest of the Brave, Marshal Ney, Le Brave des Braves (1769–1815).

Brawn. One day a little boy came into king Arthur's court, and, drawing his wand over a boar's head, exclaimed, "There's never a cuckold's knife can cut this head of brawn!" and, lo! no knight except sir Cradock was able to carve it.—Percy: Reliques, III. iii. 8. (See BOY AND THE MANTLE, p. 141.)

Bray (Mr.), a selfish, miserly old man, who dies suddenly of heart-disease, just in time to save his daughter being sacrificed to Arthur Gride, a rich old miser.

Madeline Bray, daughter of Mr. Bray, a loving, domestic, beautiful girl, who marries Nicholas Nickleby.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Bray (Vicar of), supposed by some to be Simon Aleyn, who lived (says Fuller) "in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth. In the first two reigns he was a protestant, in Mary's reign a catholic, and in Elizabeth's a protestant again." No matter who was king, Simon Aleyn resolved to live and die "the vicar of Bray" (1540–1588).

Others think the vicar was Simon Symonds, who (according to Ray) was an independent in the protectorate, a high churchman in the reign of Charles II., a papist under James II., and a moderate churchman in the reign of William III.

Others again give the cap to one Pendleton.

∴ The well-known song was written by an officer in colonel Fuller's regiment, in the reign of George I., and seems to refer to some clergyman of no very distant date.

Bray'more (Lady Caroline), daughter of lord Fitz-Balaam. She was to have married Frank Rochdale, but hearing that her "intended" loved Mary Thornberry, she married the hon. Tom Shuffleton.—Colman: John Bull (1805).

Braywick, the town of asses. An alderman of Braywick, having lost his donkey, went fourteen days in search of it; then meeting a brother alderman, they agreed to retire to the two opposite sides of a mountain and bray, in hopes that the donkey would answer, and thus reveal its place of concealment. This led to a public scandal, insomuch that the people of Braywick had to take up arms in order to avenge themselves on those who jeered at them.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. ii. 7 (1615).

Brazen (Captain), a kind of Bobadil. A boastful, tongue-doughty warrior, who pretends to know everybody; to have a liaison with very wealthy, pretty, or distinguished woman; and to have achieved in war the most amazing prodigies.

He knows everybody at first sight; his impudence were a prodigy, were not his ignorance proportionable. He has the most universal acquaintance of any man living, for he won't be alone, and nobody will keep him company twice. Then he's a Cæsar among the women; Veni, vidi, vici, that's all. If he has but talked with the maid, he swears he has [corrupted] the mistress; but the most surprising part of his character is his memory, which is the most prodigious and the most trifling in the world.—Farquhar: The Recruiting Officer, iii. 1 (1705).

Brazen Age, the age of war and violence. The age of innocence was the golden age; then followed the silver age; then the brazen age; and the present is the iron age, or the age of hardware and railroads.

Brazen Head. The first on record is one which Silvester II. (Gerbert) possessed. It told him he would be pope, and not die till he had sung mass at Jerusalem. When pope he was stricken with his death-sickness while performing mass in a church called Jerusalem (999–1003).

The next we hear of was made by Rob. Grosseteste (1175–1253).

The third was the famous brazen head of Albertus Magnus, which cost him thirty years' labour, and was broken to pieces by his disciple Thomas Aqui'nas (1193–1280).

The fourth was that of friar Bacon. It spoke thrice. If Bacon heard it speak, he would succeed, if not, he would fail. While Bacon slept, Milis was set to watch, and the head spoke twice: "Time was," it said, and half an hour later, "Time is." Still Bacon slept, and another half-hour transpired, when the head exclaimed, "Time's past," fell to the ground and was broken to pieces. Byron refers to it, not quite correctly, in the lines—

Like friar Bacon's brazen head, I've spoken,
"Time is, time was, time's past [†]"
Don Juan, I. 217 (1819).

Another was made by the marquis of Vilena of Spain (1384–1434). And a sixth by a Polander, a disciple of Escotillo an Italian.

Brazen Head (The), a gigantic head kept in the castle of the giant Fer'ragus of Portugal. It was omniscient, and told those who consulted it whatever they desired to know, past, present, or future. —Valentine and Orson.

Bread Street (London) was the bread-market in the time of Edward I. Here Milton was born.

Breaking a Stick is part of the marriage ceremony of the American Indians, as breaking a glass is still part of the marriage ceremony of the Jews.—Lady Augusta Hamilton: Marriage Rites, etc., 292, 298.

In one of Raphael's pictures we see an unsuccessful suitor of the Virgin Mary breaking his stick, and this alludes to the legend that the several suitors of the "virgin" were each to bring an almond stick which was to be laid up in the sanctuary over night, and the owner of the stick which budded was to be accounted the suitor God ordained, and thus Joseph became her husband.—B. H. Cowper: Apocryphal Gospel ("Pseudo-Matthew's Gospel," 40, 41).

In Florence is a picture in which the rejected suitors break their sticks on the back of Joseph.

Breo'an, a mythical king of Wales. He had twenty-four daughters by one wife. These daughters, for their beauty and purity, were changed into rivers, all of which flow into the Severn. Brecknockshire, according to fable, is called after this king. (See next art.)

Brecan was a prince once fortunate and great (Who dying lent his name to that his noble seat),
With twice twelve daughters blest, by one and only wife.
They, for their beauties rare and sanctity of life,
To rivers were transformed; whose pureness doth declare
How excellent they were by being what they are . . .
. . . [they] to Severn shape their course.
Drayton: Polyolbion, v. (1612).

Brec'han (Prince), father of St. Cadock and St. Canock, the former a martyr and the latter a confessor.

Then Cadock, next to whom comes Canock, both which were Prince Brechan's sons, who gave the name to Brecknockshire;
The first a martyr made, a confessor the other.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1622).

Breck (Alison), an old fishwife, friend of the Mucklebackits.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Breck (Angus), a follower of Rob Roy M'Gregor the outlaw.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Breeches Bible (The), 1557. It was printed by Whittingham, Gilby, and Sampson. So called, because Gen. iii. 7 runs thus: "The eyes of them bothe were opened, . . . and they sewed figge-tree leaves together and made themselves breeches."

Breeches Review (The). The Westminster Review was so called, because Francis Place, an important shareholder, was a breeches-maker.

Bren'da [TROIL], daughter of Magnus Troil and sister of Minna.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Breng'wain, the confidante of Is'olde (2 syl.) wife of sir Mark king of Cornwall. Isolde was criminally attached to her nephew sir Tristram, and Brengwain assisted the queen in her intrigues.

Breng'wain, wife of Gwenwyn prince of Powys-land.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Brenta'no (A), one of inconceivable folly. The Brentanos (Clemens and Bettina) are wild erratic Germans, in whom no absurdity is inconsistent. Bettina's book, Goethe's Correspondence with a Child (1835), is a pure fabrication.

At the point where the folly of others ceases, that of the Brentanos begins.—German Proverb.

Brentford (The two kings of). In the duke of Buckingham's farce called The Rehearsal (1671), the two kings of Brentford enter hand-in-hand, dance together, sing together, walk arm-in-arm, and to heighten the absurdity, the actors represent them as smelling at the same nosegay (act ii. 2).

Some say this was a skit on Charles II. and James (afterwards James II.). Others think the persons meant were Boabdelin and Abdalla, the two contending kings of Granada.

Bres'an, a small island upon the very point of Cornwall.

Upon the utmost end of Cornwall's furrowing beak,
Where Besan from the land the tilting waves doth break.
Drayton: Polyolbion, i. (1612)

Breton. Entêté comme le Breton. French proverbial expression.

Breton (Captain), "a spirited and enterprising soldier of fortune," the lover of Clara.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Wonder (a comedy, 1713).

Bretwalda, the over-king of the Saxon rulers, established in England during the heptarchy. In Germany the over-king was called emperor. The bretwalda had no power in the civil affairs of the under-kings, but in times of war or danger formed an important centre. ("Walda" is Anglo-Saxon for "ruler.")

Brewer of Ghent (The), James van Artevelde, a great patriot. His son Philip fell in the battle of Rosbecq (fourteenth century).

Brian de Bois Guilbert (Sir), preceptor of the Knights Templars. He offers insult to Rebecca, the Jew's daughter, but she repels him with scorn, and, rushing to the battlement, threatens to cast herself over if he touches her.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Bria'na, the lady of a castle who demanded for toll "the locks of every lady and the beard of every knight that passed." This toll was established because sir Crudor, with whom she was in love, refused to marry her till she had provided him with human hair sufficient to "purfle a mantle" with. Sir Crudor, having been overthrown in knightly combat by sir Calidore, who refused to give "the passage pay," is made to release Briana from the condition imposed on her, and Briana swears to discontinue the discourteous toll.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, vi. 1 (1596).

Bri'anor (Sir), a knight overthrown by sir Artegal, the "Salvage Knight."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 5 (1596).

Briar'eos (4 syl.), usually called Briareus [Bri'-a-ruce], the giant with a hundred hands. Hence Dryden says, "And Briareus, with all his hundred hands" (Virgil, vi.); but Milton writes the name Briarĕos (Paradise Lost, i. 199).

Then, called by thee, the monster Titan came,
Whom gods Briareos men Ægĕon name.
Pope: Iliad, i.

Bri'areus (Bold), Handel (1685–1757).

Bri'areus of Languages, cardinal Mezzofanti, who was familiar with fifty-eight different languages. Byron calls him "a walking polyglot" (1774–1849).

Bribo'ci, inhabitants of Berkshire and the adjacent counties.—Cæsar: Commentaries.

Brick (Jefferson), a very weak, pale young man, the war correspondent of the New York Rowdy Journal, of which colonel Diver was editor.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Bride-catching. It is a common Asiatic custom for the bridegroom to give chase to the bride, either on foot, on horseback, or in a canoe. If the bridegroom catches the fugitive, he claims her as his bride, otherwise the match is broken off. The classical tales of Hippom'enês and Atalanta will instantly recur to the reader's memory.

¶ In mythical times the savage was wont to waylay and hunt his bride; and having, as the poet says, seized her by the hair, "to nuptials rude he bore her."

A girl is first mounted, and rides off at full speed. Her lover pursues, and if he overtakes her she becomes his wife. No Kalmuck girl is ever caught unless she chooses to be so.—Dr. Clarke.

In Turcomania the maiden carries a lamb and kid, which must be taken from her in the chase. In Singapore the chase is made in canoes.—Cameron.

Bride of Aby'dos (The), Zulei'ka (3 syl.), daughter of Giaffer (2 syl.) pacha of Abydos. She is the troth-plight bride of Selim; but Giaffer shoots the lover, and Zuleika dies of a broken heart.—Byron: Bride of Abydos (1813).

Bride of Lammermoor (The), Lucy Ashton, in love with Edgar master of Ravenswood, but compelled to marry Frank Hayston laird of Bucklaw. She tries to murder him on the bridal night, and dies insane the day following.—Sir W. Scott: The Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

(The Bride of Lammermoor is one of the most finished of Scott's novels, presenting a unity of plot and action from beginning to end. The old butler, Caleb Balderston, is exaggerated and far too prominent, but he serves as a foil to the tragic scenes.)

In The Bride of Lammermoor we see embodied the dark spirit of fatalism—that spirit which breathes on the writings of the Greek tragedians when they traced the persecuting vengeance of destiny against the houses of Laius and Atreus. From the time that we hear the prophetic rhymes the spell begins, and the clouds blacken round us, till they close the tale in a night of horror.—Macaulay.

Bride of the Sea. Venice is so called from the ancient ceremony of the doge marrying the city to the Adriatic by throwing a ring into it, pronouncing these words, "We wed thee, O sea, in token of perpetual dominion."

Bridewell was a king's palace before the Conquest. Henry I. gave the stone for rebuilding it. Its name is from St. Bride (or Bridget), and her holy well. The well is now represented by an iron pump in Bride Lane.

Bridge. The imaginary bridge between earth and the Mohammedan paradise is called "All Sirat'."

¶ The rainbow bridge which spans heaven and earth in Scandinavian mythology is called "Bif'rost."

Bridge of Gold. According to German tradition, Charlemagne's spirit crosses the Rhine on a golden bridge, at Bingen, in seasons of plenty, and blesses both corn-fields and vineyards.

Thou standest, like imperial Charlemagne,
Upon thy bridge of gold.
Longfellow: Autumn.

Bridge of Sighs, the covered passage-way which connects the palace of the doge in Venice with the State prisons. Called "the Bridge of Sighs" because the condemned passed over it from the judgment-hall to the place of execution. Hood has a poem called The Bridge of Sighs.

The bridge in St. John's College, Cambridge, has been facetiously called "The Bridge of Grunts," the Johnians being nicknamed "pigs" or "hogs"—at least they were so in my time.

Bridges of Cane, in many parts of Spanish America, are thrown over narrow streams.

Wild-cane arch high flung o'er gulf profound.
Campbell: Gertrude of Wyoming, ii. 16 (1809).

Bridgemore (Mr.), of Fish Street Hill, London. A dishonest merchant, wealthy, vulgar, and purse-proud. He is invited to a soirée given by lord Abberville, "and counts the servants, gapes at the lustres, and never enters the drawing-room at all, but stays below, chatting with the travelling tutor."

Mrs. Bridgemore, wife of Mr. Bridgemore, equally vulgar, but with more pretension to gentility.

Miss Lucinda Bridgemore, the spiteful, purse-proud, malicious daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Bridgemore, of Fish Street Hill. She was engaged to lord Abberville, but her money would not outbalance her vulgarity and ill-temper, so the young "fashionable lover" made his bow and retired.—Cumberland: The Fashionable Lover (1780).

Bridgenorth (Major Ralph), a roundhead and conspirator; neighbour of sir Geoffrey Peveril of the Peak, a staunch cavalier.

Mrs. Bridgenorth, the major's wife.

Alice Bridgenorth, the major's daughter and heroine of the novel, who marries Julian Peveril, a cavalier.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

BRIDGET (Miss), the mother of Tom Jones, in Fielding's novel called The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling (1750).

It has been wondered why Fielding should have chosen to leave the stain of illegitimacy on the birth of his hero . . . but had Miss Bridget been privately married . . . there could have been no adequate motive assigned for keeping the birth of the child a secret from a man so reasonable and compassionate as Allworthy.—Encyc. Britannica (article "Fielding").

Bridget (Mrs.), in Sterne's novel called The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, Gent. (1759).

Bridget (Mother), aunt of Catherine Seyton, and abbess of St. Catherine.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Bridget (May), the milkwoman at Falkland Castle.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Bridge'ward (Peter), the bridge-keeper of Kennaquhair ("I know not where").—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Bridgeward (Peter), warder of the bridge near St. Mary's Convent. He refuses a passage to father Philip, who is carrying off the Bible of lady Alice.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Bridgewater Treatises (The), founded by the right hon. and Rev. F. H. Egerton, eighth earl of Bridgewater. The subject of these treatises is to show the "power, wisdom, and goodness of God in creation." There have been eight treatises published (1833–1836). A ninth (by Babbage) was published in 1837.

Paley's Evidences was for many years a standard book in the University of Cambridge; but it will not bear the test of modern criticism.

Bridle. John Gower says that Rosiphele princess of Armenia, insensible to love, saw in a vision a troop of ladies splendidly mounted, but one of them rode a wretched steed, wretchedly accoutred except as to the bridle. On asking the reason, the princess was informed that the lady on the wretched horse was disgraced for cruelty to her lovers, but that the bridle had been recently given her because she had for the last month shown symptoms of true love. Moral: Hence let ladies warning take—

> Of love that they be not idle,
> And bid them think of my bridle.
> Confessio Amantis ("Episode of Rosiphele," 1385–1400).

Bridlegoose (Judge), a judge who decided the causes brought before him, not by weighing the merits of the case, but by the more simple process of throwing dice.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, iii. 39 (1545).

∴ Beaumarchais, in his Marriage of Figaro (1784), has introduced this judge under the name of "Brid'oison." The person satirized by Rabelais is the chancellor Poyet.

Bri'dlesly (Joe), a horse-dealer at Liverpool, of whom Julian Peveril bought a horse.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Brid'oison [Bree-dwoy-zŏng'], a stupid judge in the Mariage de Figaro, a comedy in French, by Beaumarchais (1784).

Bridoon (Corporal), in lieutenant Nosebag's regiment.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Brien'nius (Nicephorus), the Cæsar of the Grecian empire, and husband of Anna Comne'na (daughter of Alexius Comnēnus, emperor of Greece).—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Brigado're (4 syl.), sir Guyon's horse. The word means "Golden-bridle."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 3 (1596).

Brigan'tes (3 syl.), called by Drayton Brig'ants, the people of Yorkshire, Lancashire, Westmoreland, Cumberland, and Durham.

> Where in the Britons' rule of yore the Brigants swayed,
> The powerful English established . . . Northumberland [Northumbria].
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xvi. (1623).

Briggs, one of the ten young gentlemen in the school of Dr. Blimber when Paul Dombey was a pupil there. Briggs was nicknamed the "Stoney," because his brains were petrified by the constant dropping of wisdom upon them.—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Brigliadoro [Bril'-ye-dor'-ro], Orlando's steed. The word means "Golden-bridle."—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Sir Guyon's horse, in Spenser's Faërie Queene, is called by the same name (1596). (See BRIGADORE.)

Brigs of Ayr (The), a poetical chat between the Old and New Bridge across the river Doon, at Ayr, by Burns.

Brilliant (Sir Philip), a great fop, but brave soldier, like the famous Murat. He would dress with all the finery of a vain girl, but would share watching, toil, and peril with the meanest soldier. "A butterfly in the drawing-room, but a lion on the battle-field." Sir Philip was a "blade of proof; you might laugh at the scabbard, but you wouldn't at the blade." He falls in love with lady Anne, reforms his vanities, and marries.—Knowles: Old Maids (1841).

Brilliant Madman (The), Charles XII. of Sweden (1682, 1697-1718).

Brillianta (The lady), a great wit in the ancient romance entitled Tirante le Blanc, author unknown.

Here [in Tirante le Blanc] we shall find the famous knight don Kyrie Elyson of Montalban, his brother Thomas, the knight Fonseca, . . . the stratagems of the widow Tranquil . . . and the witticisms of lady Brillianta. This is one of the most amusing books ever written.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. i. 6 (1605).

Bris (Il conte di San), governor of the Louvre. He is father of Valenti'na and leader of the St. Bartholomew massacre. —Meyerbeer: Les Huguenots (1836).

Brisac' (Justice), brother of Miramont.

Charles Brisac, a scholar, son of justice Brisac.

Eustace Brisac, a courtier, brother of Charles.—Fletcher: The Elder Brother (a comedy, printed in 1637).

Brise'is (3 syl.), whose real name was Hippodami'a, was the daughter of Brisês, brother of the priest Chrysês. She was the concubine of Achillês; but when Achillês bullied Agamemnon for not giving Chrysē'is to her father, who offered a ransom for her, Agamemnon turned upon him and said he would let Chryseis go, but should take Briseis instead.—Homer: Iliad, i.

Ovid in his Heroïdes, 4 syl.) has a letter in hexameter and pentameter verses, supposed to be addressed by Briseis to Achilles, and imploring him to take her back, as Agamemnon has consented to give her up, if he (Achilles) will return to the war.

Brisk, a good-natured conceited coxcomb, with a most voluble tongue. Fond of saying "good things," and pointing them out with such expressions as "There I had you, eh?" "That was pretty well, egad, eh?" "I hit you in the teeth there, egad!" His ordinary oath was "Let me perish!" He makes love to lady Froth.—Congreve: The Double Dealer (1694).

Bris'kie (2 syl.), disguised under the name of Putskie. A captain in the Muscovite army, and brother of general Archas "the loyal subject" of the great-duke of Moscovia.—Fletcher: The Loyal Subject (1618).

Bris'sotin, one of the followers of Jean Pierre Brissot, an advanced revolutionist. The Brissotins were subsequently merged in the Girondists, and the word dropped out of use.

Bristol Boy (The), Thomas Chatterton the poet, born at Bristol. Also called "The Marvellous Boy." Wordsworth calls him "the wondrous boy who perished in his pride" (1752-1770).

Bristol Man's Gift, a present of something which the giver pronounces to be of no use or no value to himself.

Britain, according to the British triads, was called first "The green waterfort" (Clas Merddyn); this was before it was populated. Its next name was "The honey isle" (Y Vêl Ynys). But after it was brought under one head by Prydain son of Aedd, it was called "Prydain's isle" (Ynys Prydain).

It has also been called "Hyperbo'rea," "Atlan'tica," "Cassit'eris," "Roma'na," and "Thulê." Also "Yr Ynys Wen" ("the white island"), and some will have that the word Albion is derived from the Latin, albus, "white," and that the island was so called from "its white cliffs"—an etymology only suited to fable.

Bochart says Baratanic ("country of tin"), a Phœnician word, contracted into B'ratan', is the true derivation.

N.B.—Britain, in Arthurian romance, always means Brittany. England is called Logris or Logria.

Britain (Benjamin), in Dickens's Battle of Life (1846).

Britan'nia. The Romans represented the island of Great Britain by the figure of a woman seated on a rock, from a fanciful resemblance thereto in the general outline of the island. The idea is less poetically expressed by "An old witch on a broomstick."

(The effigy of Britannia on our copper coin dates from the reign of Charles II. (1672), and was engraved by Roetier from a drawing by Evelyn.)

It is not known for certainty which of the court favourites of Charles II. is meant to be represented by the effigy. Some say Frances Theresa Stuart, duchess of Richmond; others think it is intended for Barbara Villiers, duchess of Cleveland; but as the effigy was first struck on the coin in 1672, and Louise de Querouaille was created duchess of Portsmouth in 1673, probably the French favourite was honoured by being selected for the academy figure.

Britannia, the name of the ship under the command of captain Albert, in Falconer's poem called The Shipwreck. It was dashed to pieces on the projecting verge of cape Colonna, the most southern point of Attica (1756).

Britannia Redivi'vus, a poem on the birth of James [II.] by Dryden.

Britannia's Pastorals, by W. Browne. Book i. published in 1613; book ii., in 1616; and book iii., in 1652.

British Apollo (The), containing answers to 2000 questions on arts and sciences, some serious and some humorous (1740), by a "Society of Gentlemen."

British History of Geoffrey of Monmouth, is a translation of a Welsh Chronicle. It is in nine books, and contains a "history" of the Britons and Welsh from Brutus, great-grandson of the Trojan Æneas to the death of Cadwallo or Cadwallader in 688. This Geoffrey was first archdeacon of Monmouth, and then bishop of St. Asaph. The general outline of the work is the same as that given by Nennius three centuries previously. Geoffrey's Chronicle, published about 1143, formed a basis for many subsequent "historical" works. A compendium by Diceto is published in Gale's Chronicles.

N.B.—It has its value as an ancient chronicle, but is wholly worthless as a history of facts.

British Lion (The), the spirit or pugnacity of the British nation, as opposed to John Bull, which symbolizes the substantiality, obstinacy, and solidity of the British nation, with all its prejudices and national peculiarities. To rouse John Bull is to tread on his corns, to rouse the British Lion is to blow the war-trumpet in his ears. The British Lion also means the most popular celebrity of the British nation for the time being.

Our glorious constitution is owing to the habit which the British Lion observes of sitting over his wine after dinner.—W. Jerdan.

British Pausanias (The), W. Camden, the antiquary (1551-1623).

British Soldiers' Battle (The), the battle of Inkerman, November 5, 1854.

For stubborn valour, for true old English resolution to fight it out to the last, amid every disadvantage and against almost overwhelming odds, men will for ages point to Inkerman, "The British Soldiers' Battle."—Sir E. Creasy: The Fifteen Decisive Battles (preface).

Brit'omart, the representative of chastity. She was the daughter and heiress of king Ryence of Wales, and her legend forms the third book of the Faërie Queene. One day, looking into Venus's looking-glass, given by Merlin to her father, she saw therein sir Artegal, and fell in love with him. Her nurse Glaucê (2 syl.) tried by charms "to undo her love," but "love that is in gentle heart begun no idle charm can remove." Glaucê, finding her "charms" ineffectual, took her to Merlin's cave in Carmarthen, and the magician told her she would be the mother of a line of kings (the Tudors), and after twice 400 years one of her offspring, "a royal virgin," would shake the power of Spain. Glaucê now suggested that they should start in quest of sir Artegal, and Britomart donned the armour of An'gela (queen of the Angles), which she found in her father's armoury, and taking a magic spear which "nothing could resist," she sallied forth. Her adventures allegorize the triumph of chastity over impurity: Thus in Castle Joyous, Malacasta (lust), not knowing her sex, tried to seduce her, "but she flees youthful lust, which wars against the soul." She next overthrew Marinel, son of Cym'oent. Then made her appearance as the Squire of Dames. Her last achievement was the deliverance of Am'oret (wifely love) from the enchanter Būsirane. Her marriage is deferred to bk. v. 6, when she tilted with sir Artegal, who "shares away the ventail of her helmet with his sword," and was about to strike again when he became so amazed at her beauty that he thought she must be a goddess. She bade the knight remove his helmet, at once recognized him, consented "to be his love, and to take him for her lord."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. (1590).

She charmed at once and tamed the heart,
Incomparable Britomart.
Sir W. Scott.

Briton (Colonel), a Scotch officer, who sees donna Isabella jump from a window in order to escape from a marriage she dislikes. The colonel catches her, and takes her to the house of donna Violante, her friend. Here he calls upon her, but don Felix, the lover of Violante, supposing Violante to be the object of his visits, becomes jealous, till at the end the mystery is cleared up, and a double marriage is the result.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Wonder (1714).

Broad Grins, a series of farcical tales in verse by G. Colman the younger (1797).

Broadside (A). To constitute a broadside, the matter should be printed on the entire sheet, on one side of the paper only, not in columns, but in one measure. It matters not which way of the paper the printing is displayed, or what the size of type, provided the whole is presented to the eye in one view. Although the entire matter of a broadside must be contained on one side of a sheet of paper, an endorsement may be allowed.

Brob'dingnag, a country of enormous giants, to whom Gulliver was a tiny dwarf. They were as tall "as an ordinary church steeple," and all their surroundings were in proportion.

Yon high church steeple, yon gawky stag,
Your husband must come from Brobdingnag.
Kane O'Hara: Midas (1764).

Brock (Adam), in Charles XII., an historical drama by Planché (1828).

Broken Feather. A broken feather in his wing, a scandal connected with one's name, a blot on one's 'scutcheon.

If an angel were to walk about, Mrs. Sam Hurst would never rest till she had found out where he came from.
And perhaps whether he had a broken feather in his wing.—Mrs. Oliphant: Phœbe, jun., ii. 6.

Broken-Girth-Flow (Laird of), one of the Jacobite conspirators in The Black Dwarf, a novel by sir W. Scott (time, Anne).

Broken Heart (The), a tragedy by John Ford (1633). (See CALANTHA.)

Broker of the Empire (The). Dari'us, son of Hystaspês, was so called by the Persians from his great care of the financial condition of his empire.

Bro'mia, wife of Sosia (slave of Amphitryon), in the service of Alcme'na. A nagging termagant, who keeps her husband in petticoat subjection. She is not one of the characters in Molière's comedy of Amphitryon.—Dryden: Amphitryon (1690).

Bromton's Chronicle (time, Edward III.), that is, "The Chronicle of John Bromton," printed among the Decem Scriptores, under the titles of "Chronicon Johannis Bromton," and "Johanensis Historia a Johanne Bromton," abbot of Jerevaux, in Yorkshire. It commences with the conversion of the Saxons by St. Augustin, and closes with the death of Richard I. in 1199. Selden has proved that the chronicle was not written by Bromton, but was merely brought to the abbey while he was abbot.

Bronté (2 syl.). (See BELL.)

Bron'tes (2 syl.), one of the Cyclops, hence a blacksmith generally. Called Bronteus (2 syl.) by Spenser, Faërie Queene, iv. 5 (1596).

Not with such weight, to frame the forky brand,
The ponderous hammer falls from Brontês' hand.
Jerusalem Delivered, xx. (Hool's translation).

Bronze (1 syl.). The Age of Bronze. A poem in heroic verse on Napoleon, his victories, his fall, and the effects produced by liberating the spirit of Liberty. Clause iii. contains some excellent lines—

But where is he, the modern, mightier far,
Who, born no king, made monarchs draw his car? . . .

Bronzely (2 syl.), a mere rake, whose vanity was to be thought "a general seducer."—Mrs. Inchbald: Wives as they Were, and Maids as they Are (1797).

Bron'zomarte (3 syl.), the sorrel steed of sir Launcelot Greaves. The word means a "mettlesome sorrel."—Smollett: Sir Launcelot Greaves (1756).

Brook (Master), the name assumed by Ford when sir John Falstaff makes love to his wife. Sir John, not knowing him, confides to him every item of his amour, and tells him how cleverly he has duped Ford by being carried out in a buck-basket before his very face.—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor (1601).

Brook Street (Grosvenor Square, London) is so called from a brook or stream which at one time ran down that locality.

Broo'ker, the man who stole the son of Ralph Nickleby out of revenge, called him "Smike," and put him to school at Dotheboys Hall, Yorkshire. His tale is told pp. 594-5 (original edit.).—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Brother Jon'athan. When Washington was in want of ammunition, he called a council of officers; but no practical suggestion being offered, he said, "We must consult brother Jonathan," meaning his excellency Jonathan Trumbull, the elder governor of the state of Connecticut. This was done, and the difficulty surmounted. "To consult brother Jonathan" then became a set phrase, and "Brother Jonathan" became the "John Bull" of the United States.—Bartlett: Dictionary of Americanisms.

Brother Sam, the brother of lord Dundreary, the hero of a comedy based on a German drama, by John Oxenford, with additions and alterations by E. A. Sothern and T. B. Buckstone.—Supplied by T. B. Buckstone, esq.

Brothers (The), a comedy by Richard Cumberland (1769). (For the plot, see BELFIELE, BROTHERS.)

∴ Wordsworth has a poem with the same title, written in 1800.

Brougham's Plaid Trousers. The story goes that lord Brougham [Broom] once paid a visit to a great cloth factory in the north, and was so pleased with one of the patterns that he requested to be supplied with "a dozen pieces for his own use," meaning, of course, enough for a dozen pairs of trousers. The clothier sent him "a dozen pieces," containing several hundred yards, so that his lordship was not only set up for life in plaid for trousers, but had enough to supply a whole clan.

Browdie (John), a brawny, big-made Yorkshire corn-factor, bluff, brusque, honest, and kind-hearted. He befriends poor Smike, and is much attached to Nicholas Nickleby. John Browdie married Matilda Price, a miller's daughter.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

BROWN (Vanbeest), lieutenant of Dirk Hatteraick.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Brown (Jonathan), landlord of the Black Bear at Darlington. Here Frank Osbaldistone meets Rob Roy at dinner.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Brown (Mrs.), the widow of the brother-in-law of the hon. Mrs. Skewton. She had one daughter, Alice Marwood, who was first cousin to Edith (Mr. Dombey's second wife). Mrs. Brown lived in great poverty, her only known vocation being "to strip children of their clothes, which she sold or pawned."—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Brown (Mrs.), a "Mrs. John Bull," with all the practical sense, kind-heartedness, absence of conventionality, and the prejudices of a well-to-do but half-educated Englishwoman of the middle shop class. She passes her opinions on all current events, and travels about, taking with her all her prejudices, and despising everything which is not English. — Arthur Sketchley [Rev. George Rose].

Brown (Yellowish). (See ISABELLA.)

Brown the Younger (Thomas), the nom de plume of Thomas Moore, in The Two-penny Post-bag, a series of witty and very popular satires on the prince regent (afterwards George IV.), his ministers, and his boon companions. Also in The Fudge Family in Paris, and in The Fudges in England (1835).

Brown, Jones, and Robinson, three Englishmen who travel together. Their adventures, by Richard Doyle, were published in Punch. In them is held up to ridicule the gaucherie, the contracted notions, the vulgarity, the conceit, and the general snobbism of the middle-class English abroad.

Browne (General) paid a visit to lord Woodville. His bedroom for the night was the "tapestried chamber," where he saw the apparition of "the lady in the sacque;" and next morning he relates his adventure.—Sir W. Scott: The Tapestried Chamber (time, George III.).

Browne (Hablot Knight) illustrated some of Dickens's novels, and took the pseudonym of "Phiz" (1812-1882).

Brown's School Days (Tom), a story by T. Hughes (1856).

Browns. To astonish the Browns, to do or say something regardless of the annoyance it may cause or the shock it may give to Mrs. Grundy. Anne Boleyn had a whole clan of Browns, or "country cousins," who were welcomed at court in the reign of Elizabeth. The queen, however, was quick to see what was gauche, and did not scruple to reprove them for uncourtly manners. Her plainness of speech used quite to "astonish the Browns."

Brownists. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 181.)

Brownlow, a most benevolent old gentleman, who rescued Oliver Twist from his vile associates. He refused to believe in Oliver's guilt of theft, although appearances were certainly against him, and he even took the boy into his service.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Brox'mouth (John), a neighbour of Happer the miller.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Bruce (The), an epic poem by John Barbour (1376). There was published an edition in 1869. It is in octo-syllabic verse, and runs to about 14,000 lines. The subject is the adventures of Robert I. of Scotland.

Bruce and the Spider. The popular tradition is that in the spring of 1305, Robert Bruce was crowned at Scone king of Scotland; but, being attacked by the English, he retreated first to the wilds of Athole, and then to the little island of Rathlin, off the north coast of Ireland, and all supposed him to be dead. While lying perdu in Rathlin, he one day noticed a spider near his bed try six times to fix its web on a beam in the ceiling. "Now shall this spider (said Bruce) teach me what I am to do, for I also have failed six times." The spider made a seventh effort, and succeeded; whereupon Bruce left the island (in the spring of 1307), and collecting together 300 followers, landed at Carrick, and at midnight surprised the English garrison in Turnberry Castle; he next overthrew the earl of Gloucester, and in two years made himself master of well-nigh all Scotland, which Edward III. declared in 1328 to be an independent kingdom. Sir Walter Scott tells us, in his Tales of a Grandfather (p. 26, col. 2), that in remembrance of this incident, it has always been deemed a foul crime in Scotland for any of the name of Bruce to injure a spider.

"I will grant you, my father, that this valiant burgess of Perth is one of the best-hearted men that draws breath . . . He would be as loth, in wantonness, to kill a spider, as if he were a kinsman to king Robert of happy memory."—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth, ch. ii. (1828).

¶ Frederick the Great and the Spider. While Frederick II. was at Sans Souci, he one day went into his ante-room, as usual, to drink a cup of chocolate, but set his cup down to fetch his handkerchief from his bedroom. On his return he found a great spider had fallen from the ceiling into his cup. He called for fresh chocolate, and next moment heard the report of a pistol. The cook had been suborned to poison the chocolate, and, supposing his treachery had been found out, shot himself. On the ceiling of the room in Sans Souci a spider has been painted (according to tradition) in remembrance of this story.

¶ Mahomet and the Spider. When Mahomet fled from Mecca, he hid in a certain cave, and the Koreishites were close upon him. Suddenly an acacia in full leaf sprang up at the mouth of the cave, a wood-pigeon had its nest in the branches, and a spider had woven its net between the tree and the cave. When the Koreishites saw this, they felt persuaded that no one could have recently passed that way, and went on.

¶ A kindred story is told of David, who was saved from the hand of Saul in pursuit of him, by the web of a spider over the mouth of a cave in the desert of Ziph.

Bru'el, the name of the goose, in the tale of Reynard the Fox. The word means the "Little roarer" (1498).

Bru'in, the name of the bear, in the best-epic called Reynard the Fox. Hence a bear in general. The word means the "Brown one" (1498).

Bru'in, one of the leaders arrayed against Hudibras. He is meant for one Talgol, a Newgate butcher, who obtained a captain's commission for valour at Naseby. He marched next to Orsin [Joshua Gosling, landlord of the bear-gardens at Southwark]. — S. Butler: Hudibras, i. 3 (1663).

Bruin (Mrs. and Mr.), daughter and son-in-law to sir Jacob Jollup. Mr. Bruin is a huge bear of a fellow, and rules his wife with scant courtesy.—Foote: The Mayor of Garratt (1763).

Brulgrud'dery (Dennis), landlord of the Red Cow, on Muckslush Heath. He calls himself "an Irish gintleman bred and born." He was "brought up to the church," i.e. to be a church beadle, but lost his place for snoring at sermon-time. He is a sot, with a very kind heart, and is honest in great matters, although in business he will palm off an old cock for a young capon.

Mrs. Brulgruddery, wife of Dennis, and widow of Mr. Skinnygauge, former landlord of the Red Cow. Unprincipled, self-willed, ill-tempered, and over-reaching. Money is the only thing that moves her, and when she has taken a bribe she will whittle down the service to the finest point.—Colman: John Bull (1805).

Brumo, a place of worship in Craca (one of the Shetland Isles).

Far from his friends they placed him in the horrid circle of Brumo, where the ghosts of the dead howl round the stone of their fear.—Ossian: Fingal, vi.

Brun'cheval "the Bold," a paynim knight, who tilted with sir Satyrane; both were thrown to the ground together at the first encounter.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 4 (1596).

Brunell'o, a deformed dwarf, who at the siege of Albracca stole Sacripan'te's charger from between his legs without his knowing it. He also stole Angelica's magic ring, by means of which he released Roge'ro from the castle in which he was imprisoned. Ariosto says that Agramant gave the dwarf a ring which had the power of resisting magic.—Bojardo: Orlando Innamorato (1495); and Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

"I," says Sancho, "slept so soundly upon Dapple, that the thief had time enough to clap four stakes under the four corners of my pannel, and to lead away the beast from under my legs without waking me."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. i. 4 (1615).

Brunenburg (Battle of), referred to in Tennyson's King Harold, is the victory obtained in 938 by king Athelstan over the Danes.

Brunetta, mother of Chery (who married his cousin Fairstar).—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Princess Fairstar," 1682).

Brunetta, the rival beauty of Phyllis. On one occasion Phyllis procured a most marvellous fabric of gold brocade in order to eclipse her rival; but Brunetta arrayed her train-bearer in a dress of the same material, and cut in the same fashion. Phyllis was so annoyed that she went home and died.—The Spectator.

Brunhild, queen of Issland, who made a vow that none should win her who could not surpass her in three trials of skill and strength: (1) hurling a spear; (2) throwing a stone; and (3) jumping. Günther king of Burgundy undertook the three contests, and by the aid of Siegfried succeeded in winning the martial queen. First, hurling a spear that three men could scarcely lift: the queen hurled it towards Günther, but Siegfried, in his invisible cloak, reversed its direction, causing it to strike the queen and knock her down. Next, throwing a stone so huge that twelve brawny men were employed to carry it: Brunhild lifted it on high, flung it twelve fathoms, and jumped beyond it. Again Siegfried helped his friend to throw it further, and in leaping beyond the stone. The queen, being fairly beaten, exclaimed to her liegemen, "I am no longer your queen and mistress; henceforth are ye the liegemen of Günther" (lied vii.). After marriage Brunhild was so obstreperous that the king again applied to Siegfried, who succeeded in depriving her of her ring and girdle, after which she became a very submissive wife.—The Nibelungen Lied.

Bru'no (Bishop), bishop of Herbipolita'num. Sailing one day on the Danube with Henry III. emperor of Germany, they came to Ben Strudel ("the devouring gulf"), near Grinon Castle, in Austria. Here the voice of a spirit clamoured aloud, "Ho! ho! Bishop Bruno, whither art thou travelling? But go thy ways, bishop Bruno, for thou shalt travel with me to-night." At night, while feasting with the emperor, a rafter fell on his head and killed him. Southey has a ballad called Bishop Bruno, but it deviates from the original legend given by Heywood in several particulars: It makes bishop Bruno hear the voice first on his way to the emperor, who had invited him to dinner; next, at the beginning of dinner; and thirdly, when the guests had well feasted. At the last warning an ice-cold hand touched him, and Bruno fell dead in the banquet-hall.

Brush, the impertinent English valet of lord Ogleby. If his lordship calls, he never hears unless he chooses; if his bell rings, he never answers it till it suits his pleasure. He helps himself freely to all his master's things, and makes love to all the pretty chambermaids he comes into contact with.—Colman and Garrick: The Clandestine Marriage (1766).

Bruss (Robert the), an historical poem by Barbour, father of the Scotch vernacular poets. This Robert was Robert I. of Scotland (1276, 1306–1329). John Barbour lived 1316–1395. The full title of his poem is The Gestes of king Robert Bruce; it consists of 14,000 lines, and may be divided into twenty books. The verses are octosyllabic like Scott's Marmion, etc.

Brut (Le), a metrical chronicle of Maître Wace, canon of Caen, in Normandy. It contains the earliest history of England, and other historical legends (twelfth century).

Brute (1 syl.), the first king of Britain (in mythical history). He was the son of Æneas Silvius (grandson of Ascanius and great-grandson of Æneas of Troy). Brute called London (the capital of his adopted country) Troynovant (New Troy). The legend is this: An oracle declared that Brute should be the death of both his parents; his mother died in childbirth, and at the age of 15 Brute shot his father accidentally in a deer-hunt. Being driven from Alba Longa, he collected a band of old Trojans and landed at Totness, in Devonshire. His wife was Innogen, daughter of Pandra'sus king of Greece. His tale is told at length in the Chronicles of Geoffrey of Monmouth, in the first song of Drayton's Polyolbion, and in Spenser's Faërie Queene, ii.

Brute (Sir John), a coarse, surly, ill-mannered brute, whose delight was to "provoke" his young wife, who he tells as "is a young lady, a fine lady, a witty lady, and a virtuous lady, but yet I hate her." In a drunken frolic he intercepts a tailor taking home a new dress to lady Brute; he insists on arraying himself therein, is arrested for a street row, and taken before the justice of the peace. Being asked his name, he gives it as "lady John Brute," and is dismissed.

Lady Brute, wife of sir John. She is subjected to divers indignities, and insulted morn, noon, and night, by her surly, drunken husband. Lady Brute intrigues with Constant, a former lover; but her intrigues are more mischievous than vicious.—Vanbrugh: The Provoked Wife (1697).

The coarse pot-house valour of "sir John Brute" (Garrick's famous part) is well contrasted with the fine-lady airs and affectation of his wife. [Surely this must be an error. It applies to "lady Fanciful," but not to "lady Brute."]—R. Chambers: English Literature, ii. 398.

Brute Green-Shield, the successor of Ebranc king of Britain. The mythical line is: (1) Brute, great-great-grandson of Ænēas; (2) Locrin, his son; (3) Guendolen, the widow of Locrin; (4) Ebranc; (5) Brute Green-Shield. Then follow in order Leil, Hudibras, Bladud, Leir [Shakespeare's "Lear"], etc.

. . . of her courageous kings,
Brute Green-Shield, to whose name we providence impute
Divinely to revive the land's first conqueror, Brute.
Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1613).

Brute's City, London, called Troynovant or Trinovant (New Troy).

The goodly Thames near which Brute's city stands,
Drayton: Polyolbion, xvi. (1613).

(Of course Trinovant is so called from the Trinovantês or Trinobantês, a Celtic tribe settled in Essex and Middlesex when Cæsar invaded the island.)

Bru'ton Street (London), so called from Bruton, in Somersetshire, the seat of John lord Berkeley of Stratton.

Brutus (Lucius Junius), first consul of Rome, who condemned his own two sons to death for joining a conspiracy to restore Tarquin to the throne from which he had been banished. This subject was dramatized by N. Lee (1679) and John H. Payne, under the title of Brutus, or The Fall of Tarquin (1820). Alfieri, in 1783, wrote an Italian tragedy on the same subject. In French we have the tragedies of Arnault (1792) and Ponsard (1843). (See LUCRETIA.)

The elder Kean on one occasion consented to appear at the Glasgow Theatre for his son's benefit. The play chosen was Payne's Brutus, in which the father took the part of "Brutus" and Charles Kean that of "Titus." The audience sat suffused in tears during the pathetic interview, till "Brutus" falls on the neck of "Titus," exclaiming, in a burst of agony, "Embrace thy wretched father!" when the whole house broke forth into peals of approbation. Edmund Kean then whispered in his son's ear, "Charlie, we are doing the trick."—W. C. Russell: Representative Actors, 476.

¶ Junius Brutus. So James Lynch Fitz-Stephen has been called, because (like the first consul of Rome) he condemned his own son to death for murder; and, to prevent a rescue, caused him to be executed from the window of his own house in Galway (1493).

The Spanish Brutus, Alfonso Perez de Guzman, governor of Tarifa in 1293. Here he was besieged by the infant don Juan, who had revolted against his brother, king Sancho IV.; and, having Guzman's son in his power, threatened to kill him unless Tarifa was given up to him. Guzman replied, "Sooner than be guilty of such treason, I will lend Juan a dagger to slay my son;" and so saying tossed his dagger over the wall. Sad to say, Juan took the dagger, and assassinated the young man there and then (1258-1309).

Brutus (Marcus), said to be the son of Julius Cæsar by Servilia.

Brutus' bastard hand
Stabb'd Julius Cæsar.
Shakespeare: Henry VI. act iv. sc. 1 (1591).

This Brutus is introduced by Shakespeare in his tragedy of Julius Cæsar, and the poet endows him with every quality of a true patriot. He loved Cæsar much, but he loved Rome more.

John P. Kemble seems to me always to play best those characters in which there is a predominating tinge of some over-mastering passion. . . . The patrician pride of "Coriolanus," the stoicism of "Brutus," the vehemence of "Hotspur," mark the class of characters I mean.—Sir W. Scott.

In the life of C. M. Young, we are told that Edmund Kean in "Hamlet," "Coriolanus," "Brutus" . . . never approached within any measurable distance of the learned and majestic Kemble.

Brutus. Et tu, Brute! Shakespeare, on the authority of Suetōnius, puts these words into the mouth of Cæsar when Brutus stabbed him. Shakespeare's drama was written in 1607, and probably he had seen The True Tragedy of Richard duke of York (1600), where these words occur; but even before that date H. Stephens had said—

Jule Cesar, quand il vit que Brutus aussi estoit de ceux qui luy tirient des coups d'espee, luy dit, Kai sy teknon! c'est à dire. . . . Et toy mon fils, en es tu aussi.—Deux Dial. du Nouveau Lang. Franc (1583).

Brutus and Cicero. Cicero says, "Cæsare interfecto, statim, cruentum alte extollens M. Brutus pugionem Ciceronem nominatim exclamavit, atque si recuperatam libertatem est gratulatus."—Philippics, ii. 12.

When Brutus rose,
Refulgent from the stroke of Cæsar's fate,
. . . [he] called aloud
On Tully's name, and shook his crimson steel,
And bade the "father of his country" hail.
Akenside: Pleasures of Imagination, i.

Bryce's Day (St.), November 13. On St. Bryce's Day, 1002, Ethelred caused all the Danes in the kingdom to be secretly murdered in one night.

In one night the throats of all the Danish cut.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xii (1613).

Bry'done (Elspeth) or Glendinning, widow of Simon Glendinning, of the Tower of Glendearg.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Bubas'tis, the Dian'a of Egyptian mythology. She was the daughter of Isis and sister of Horus.

Bubenburg (Sir Adrian de), a veteran knight of Berne.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Bucca, goblin of the wind in Celtic mythology, and supposed by the ancient inhabitants of Cornwall to foretell shipwrecks.

Bucen'taur, the Venetian State galley used by the doge when he went "to wed the Adriatic." In classic mythology the bucentaur was half man and half ox.

Buceph'alos ["bull-headed"], the name of Alexander's horse, which cost £3500. It knelt down when Alexander mounted, and was 30 years old at its death. Alexander built a city called Bucephala in its memory.

The Persian Bucephalos, Shibdiz, the famous charger of Chosroes Parviz.

Buck'et (Mr.), a shrewd detective officer, who cleverly discovers that Hortense, the French maidservant of lady Dedlock, was the murderer of Mr. Tulkinghorn, and not lady Dedlock who was charged with the deed by Hortense.—Dickens: Bleak House (1853).

BUCKINGHAM (George Villiers, first duke of), the profligate favourite of James I., who called him "Steenie" from his beauty, a pet corruption of Stephen, whose face at martyrdom was "as the face of an angel." This was the duke who was assassinated by Fenton (1592-1628). He is introduced by sir W. Scott in The Fortunes of Nigel. (See Dumas, The Three Musketeers.)

Buckingham (George Villiers, second duke of), son of the preceding, and favourite of Charles II. He made the "whole body of vice his study." His name furnishes the third letter of the famous anagram "CABAL." This was the duke who wrote The Rehearsal. He is introduced by sir W. Scott in Peveril of the Peak, and by Dryden in his Absalom and Achitophel, who called him Zimri (q.v.). He died in very reduced circumstances in the house of one of his tenants in Yorkshire (1627-1688). Pope says the house was a sordid inn.

In the worst inn's worst room, with mat half-hung,
The floor of plaister, and the walls of dung,
On once a flock bed, but repaired with straw,
With tape-tied curtains, never meant to draw . . .
Great Villiers lies—alas! how changed from him,—
That life of pleasure, and that soul of whim!
Pope: Moral Essays, iii.

Buckingham (Henry duke of) was Henry Stafford, son and heir of Humphrey Stafford duke of Buckingham. He was made hereditary lord high constable in 1483. Shakespeare says (in Richard III.) that Buckingham, alarmed at the execution of Hastings, fled to Brecknock, in Wales, where he had a castle. Here he collected together a levy, which was easily dispersed; and Buckingham, being taken prisoner, was brought to Salisbury, and beheaded in 1521 (Richard III. act v. sc. 1).

Sackville, in A Mirrour for Magistrayles (1587), gives a slightly different account—

Then first came Henry, duke of Buckingham,
His cloke of blacke al pilde and quite forworn.
Mirrour for Magistrayles.

The ghost of Buckingham tells Thomas Sackville that he and king Richard III. had so plotted together, and were so privy to each other's guilt, that each sought to kill the other. Richard having discovered the treasonable designs of Buckingham, he [the duke] fled to John Banastar, a man who had received great favours of the duke, and professed himself his fast friend; but, for the sake of £1000 blood-money, Banastar betrayed the duke to John Mitton, sheriff of Shropshire, and Mitton delivered up the duke to the king.

Buckingham (Mary duchess of), introduced by sir W. Scott in Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Bucklaw (The laird of), afterwards laird of Girnington. His name was Frank Hayston. Lucy Ashton plights her troth to Edgar master of Ravenswood, and they exchange love-tokens at the Mermaid's Fountain; but her father, sir William Ashton, for mercenary motives, promises her in marriage to the laird of Bucklaw, and as she signs the articles Edgar suddenly appears at the castle. They return to each other their love-tokens, and Lucy is married to the laird; but on the wedding night the bridegroom is found dangerously wounded in the bridal chamber, and the bride hidden in the chimney-corner, insane. Lucy dies in convulsions, but Bucklaw recovers and goes abroad.—Sir W. Scott: The Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Buckle (Put into), put into pawn at the rate of 40 per cent. interest.

To talk buckle, to talk about marriage.

I took a girl to dinner who talked buckle to me, and the girl on the other side talked balls.—Vera, 154.

Bucklers-bury (London), so called from one Buckle, a grocer (Old and New London). In the reign of Elizabeth and long afterwards Bucklersbury was chiefly inhabited by druggists, who sold green and dried herbs. Hence Falstaff says to Mrs. Ford, he could not assume the ways of those "lisping hawthorn buds [i.e. young fops], who smell like Bucklers-bury in simple-time." — Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, act iii. sc. 3 (1601).

Bude Light, a light devised by Mr. Gurney of Bude, in Cornwall. Intense light is obtained by supplying the burner with an abundant stream of oxygen. The principle of the Argand lamp is also a free supply of oxygen. Gurney's invention is too expensive to be of general service, but an intense light is obtained by reflectors and refractors called Bude lights, although they wholly differ in principle from Gurney's invention.

Buffoon (The Pulpit). Hugh Peters is so called by Dugdale (1599–1660).

Bug Bible (The), 1551. Matthew's Bible is so called, because Psa xci. 5 reads, "Thou shalt not be afraid of the bugges [bogies] by night."

Bug Jargal, a negro, passionately in love with a white woman, but tempering the wildest passion with the deepest respect.—Hugo: Bug Jargal (a novel).

Bulbul, a nightingale, any singer of ditties. When, in The Princess (by Tennyson), the prince, disguised as a woman, enters with his two friends (similarly disguised) into the college to which no man was admitted, he sings; and the princess, suspecting the fraud, says to him, "Not for thee, O bulbul, any rose of Gulistan shall burst her veil," i.e. "O singer, do not suppose that any woman will be taken in by such a flimsy deceit." The bulbul loved the rose, and Gulistan means the "garden of roses." The prince was the bulbul, the college was Gulistan, and the princess the rose sought.—Tennyson: The Princess, iv.

Bulbul-He'zar, the talking bird, which was joined in singing by all the song-birds in the neighbourhood. (See TALKING BIRD.)—Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters," the last story).

Bulis, mother of Egyp'ius of Thessaly. Egypius entertained a criminal love for Timandra, the mother of Neoph'ron, and Neophron was guilty of a similar passion for Bulis. Jupiter changed Egypius and Neophron into vultures, Bulis into a duck, and Timandra into a sparrow-hawk.—Classic Mythology.

Bull (A), a species of inadvertent wit, arising either from a blunder of facts or analogies, or from an irreconcilable connection of the close of a sentence with its commencement. The well-known quotation of sir Boyle Roche, M.P., will serve for an example: "Mr. Speaker, how could I have been in two places at the same time, unless I were a bird?" (See ROCHE.)

(Maria Edgeworth, in 1802, wrote an essay on Irish Bulls.)

Bull (John), the English nation personified, and hence any typical Englishman.

Bull in the main was an honest, plain-dealing fellow, choleric, bold, and of a very inconstant temper. He dreaded not old Lewis [Louis XIV.], either at back-sword, single falchion, or cudgel-play; but then he was very apt to quarrel with his best friends, especially if they pretended to govern him. If you flattered him, you might lead him as a child. John's temper depended very much upon the air; his spirits rose and fell with the weather-glass. He was quick, and understood business well; but no man alive was more careless in looking into his accompts, nor more cheated by partners, apprentices, and servants. . . . No man kept a better house, nor spent his money more generously.—Chap. 5.

(The subject of Dr. Arbuthnot's History of John Bull is the "Spanish Succession" in the reigns of Louis XIV. and queen Anne.)

Mrs. Bull, queen Anne, "very apt to be choleric." On hearing that Philip Baboon (Philippe duc d'Anjou) was to succeed to lord Strutt's estates (i.e. the Spanish throne), she said to John Bull—

"You sot, you loiter about ale-houses and taverns, spend your time at billiards, ninepins, or puppet-shows, never minding me nor my numerous family. Don't you hear how lord Strutt [the king of Spain] has bespoke his liveries at Lewis Baboon's shop [France]? . . . Fie upon it! Up, man! . . . I'll sell my shift before I'll be so used."—Chap. 4.

John Bull's Mother, the Church of England.

John had a mother, whom he loved and honoured extremely; a discreet, grave, sober, good-conditioned, cleanly old gentlewoman as ever lived. She was none of your cross-grained, termagant, scolding jades . . . always censuring your conduct . . . on the contrary, she was of a meek spirit . . . and put the best construction upon the words and actions of her neighbours. . . . She neither wore a ruff, forehead cloth, nor high-crowned hat. . . . She scorned to patch and paint, yet she loved cleanliness. . . . She was no less genteel in her behaviour . . . in the due mean between one of your affected curtsying pieces of formality, and your ill-mannered creatures which have no regard to the common rules of civility.—Part ii. 1.

John Bull's Sister Peg, the Scotch, in love with Jack (Calvin).

John had a sister, a poor girl that had been reared . . . on oatmeal and water . . . and lodged in a garret exposed to the north wind. . . . However, this usage . . . gave her a hardy constitution. . . . Peg had, indeed, some odd humours and comical antipathies, . . . she would faint at the sound of an organ, and yet dance and frisk at the noise of a bagpipe.—Dr. Arbuthnot History of John Bull, ii. 2 (1712).

 George Colman the younger produced a comedy called John Bull, in 1805.

Bull-dog, rough iron.

A man was putting some bull-dog into the rolls, when his spade caught between the rolls.—Times.

Bull-dogs, the two menservants of a university proctor, who follow him in his rounds to assist him in apprehending students who are violating the university statutes, such as appearing in the streets after dinner without cap and gown, etc.

Bullamy, porter of the "Anglo-Bengalee Disinterested Loan and Life Insurance Company." An imposing personage, whose dignity resided chiefly in the great expanse of his red waistcoat. Respectability and well-to-doedness were expressed in that garment.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Bullcalf (Peter), of the Green, who was pricked for a recruit in the army of sir John Falstaff. He promised Bardolph "four Harry ten-shillings in French crowns" if he would stand his friend, and when sir John was informed thereof, he said to Bullcalf, "I will none of you." Justice Shallow remonstrated, but Falstaff exclaimed, "Will you tell me, Master Shallow, how to choose a man? Care I for the limb, the thews, the stature? . . . Give me the spirit, Master Shallow."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. act iii. sc. 2 (1598).

Bullen (Anne), maid of honour to queen Katharine, and afterwards queen-consort.—Shakespeare: Henry VIII.

Bullet-head (The Great), George Cadoudal, leader of the Chouans (1769–1804).

Bull'seggs (Mr.), laird of Killancureit, a friend of the baron of Bradwardine.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Bulmer (Valentine), titular earl of Etherington, married to Clara Mowbray.

Mrs. Ann Bulmer, mother of Valentine, married to the earl of Etherington during the lifetime of his countess; hence his wife in bigamy.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Bum'ble, beadle of the workhouse where Oliver Twist was born and brought up. A stout, consequential, hard-hearted, fussy official, with mighty ideas of his own importance. This character has given to the language the word bumbledom, the officious arrogance and bumptious conceit of a parish authority or petty dignitary. After marriage with Mrs. Corney, the high and mighty beadle was sadly hen-pecked and reduced to a Jerry Sneak.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Bumbledom, parish-dom, the pride of parish dignity, the arrogance of parish authority, the mightiness of parish officers. From Bumble, the beadle, in Dickens's Oliver Twist (1837).

Bum'kinet, a shepherd. He proposes to Grub'binol that they should repair to a certain hut and sing "Gillian of Croydon," "Patient Grissel," "Cast away Care," "Over the Hills," and so on; but being told that Blouzelinda was dead, he sings a dirge, and Grubbinol joins him.

Thus wailed the louts in melancholy strain,
Till bonny Susan sped across the plain;
They seized the lass in apron clean arrayed,
And to the ale-house forced the willing maid;
In ale and kisses they forgot their cares,
And Susan Blouzelinda's loss repairs.
Gay: Pastoral, v. (1714).

(An imitation of Virgil's Bucolic, v., "Daphnis.")

Bumper (Sir Harry), a convivial friend of Charles Surface. He sings the popular song beginning—

Here's to the maiden of bashful fifteen,
Here's to the widow of fifty, etc.
Sheridan: School for Scandal (1777).

Bunce (Jack), alias Frederick Altamont, a ci-devant actor, one of the crew of the pirate vessel.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Bunch (Mother), an alewife, mentioned by Dekker in his drama called Satiromastix (1602). In 1604 was published Pasquil's Jests, mixed with Mother Bunch's Merriments.

There are a series of "Fairy Tales" called Mother Bunch's Fairy Tales.

Bunch (Mother), the supposed pos sessor of a "cabinet broken open" and revealing "rare secrets of Art and Nature," such as love-spells (1760).

Bun'cle, messenger to the earl of Douglas.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Bun'cle (John), "a prodigious hand at matrimony, divinity, a song, and a peck." He married seven wives, and lost all in the flower of their age. For two or three days after the death of a wife he was inconsolable, but soon became resigned to his loss, which he repaired by marrying again.—T. Amory: The Life, etc., of John Buncle, Esq.

Bundalinda, the beau-ideal of obscurity.

Transformed from a princess to a peasant, from beauty to ugliness, from polish to rusticity, from light to darkness, from an angel of light to an imp of hell, from fragrance to ill-savour, from elegance to rudeness, from Aurora in full brilliancy to Bundalinda in deep obscurity.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. ii. 23 (1615).

Bundle, the gardener, father of Wilelmi'na, and friend of Tom Tug the waterman. He is a plain, honest man, but greatly in awe of his wife, who nags at him from morning till night.

Mrs. Bundle, a vulgar Mrs. Malaprop, and a termagant. "Everything must be her way, or there's no getting any peace." She greatly frequented the minor theatres, and acquired notions of sentimental romance. She told Wilelmina, if she refused to marry Robin—

"I'll disinherit you from any share in the blood of my family, the Grograns, and you may creep through life with the dirty, pitiful, mean, paltry, low, ill-bred notions which you have gathered from [your father's] family, the Bundles."—Dibdin: The Waterman (1774).

Bungay, in Thackeray's Pendennis, bookseller and publisher of the Pall Mall Gazette, edited by captain Shannon (1849). The real Pall Mall Gazette was started in 1865.

"Why Pall Mall Gazette?" asks Wagg. "Because the editor was born in Dublin, the sub-editor in Cork, . . . the proprietor lives in Paternoster Row, and the paper is published in Catherine Street, Strand."

Bun'gay or Bongay (Frier), one of the friars in a comedy by Robert Green, entitled Frier Bacon and Frier Bongay. Both the friars are conjurers, and the piece concludes with one of their pupils being carried off to the infernal regions on the back of one of friar Bacon's demons (1591).

Bungen [Bung-'n], the street in Ham'elin down which the pied piper Bunting led the rats into the river Weser and the children into a cave in the mountain Koppenberg. No music of any kind is permitted to be played in this street.

Bungey (Friar), personification of the charlatan of science in the fifteenth century.

 In The Last of the Barons, by lord Lytton, friar Bungey is an historical character, and is said to have "raised mists and vapours," which befriended Edward IV. at the battle of Barnet.

Buns'by (Captain John or Jack), owner of the Cautious, Clara. Captain Cuttle considered him "a philosopher, and quite an oracle." Captain Bunsby had one "stationary and one revolving eye," a very red face, and was extremely taciturn. The captain was entrapped by Mrs. McStinger (the termagant landlady of his friend captain Cuttle) into marrying her.—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Bunting, the pied piper of Ham'elin. He was so called from his dress.

To blow the pipe his lips he wrinkled,
And green and blue his sharp eyes twinkled . . .
And ere three notes his pipe had uttered . . .
Out of the houses rats came tumbling—
Great rats, small rats, lean rats, brawny rats,
Brown rats, black rats, grey rats, tawny rats,
And step by step they followed him dancing,
Till they came to the river Weser.
R. Browning.

Buonaventu'ra (Father), a disguise assumed for the nonce by the chevalier Charles Edward, the pretender.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Bur (John), the servant of Job Thornberry, the brazier of Penzance. Brusque in his manners, but most devotedly attached to his master, by whom he was taken from the workhouse. John Bur kept his master's "books" for twenty-two years with the utmost fidelity.—Colman: John Bull (1805).

Bur'bon (i.e. Henri IV. of France). He is betrothed to Fordēlis (France), who has been enticed from him by Grantorto (rebellion). Being assailed on all sides by a rabble rout, Fordelis is carried off by "hellrake hounds." The rabble batter Burbon's shield (protestantism), and compel him to throw it away. Sir Ar'tegal (right or justice) rescues the "recreant knight" from the mob, but blames him for his unknightly folly in throwing away his shield (of faith). Talus (the executive) beats off the hell-hounds, gets possession of the lady, and though she flouts Burbon, he catches her up upon his steed and rides off with her. —Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 2 (1596).

Burchell (Mr.), alias sir William Thornhill, about 30 years of age. When Dr. Primrose, the vicar of Wakefield, loses £1400, Mr. Burchell presents himself as a broken-down gentleman, and the doctor offers him his purse. He turned his back on the two flash ladies who talked of their high-life doings, and cried "Fudge!" after all their boastings and remarks. Mr. Burchell twice rescued Sophia Primrose, and ultimately married her.—Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield (1765).

Burgundy (Charles the Bold, duke of), introduced by sir W. Scott in Quentin Durward and in Anne of Geierstein. The latter novel contains the duke's defeat at Nancy, and his death (time, Edward IV.).

Bu'ridan's Ass. A man of indecision is so called from the hypothetical ass of Buridan, the Greek sophist. Buridan maintained that "if an ass could be placed between two hay-stacks in such a way that its choice was evenly balanced, it would starve to death, for there would be no motive why he should choose the one in preference to the other."

Burleigh (William Cecil, lord), lord treasurer to queen Elizabeth (1520–1598), introduced by sir W. Scott in his historical novel called Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Burleigh (Lord), a parliamentary leader, in The Legend of Montrose, a novel by sir W. Scott (time, Charles I.).

A lord Burleigh shake of the head, a great deal meant by a look or movement, though little or nothing is said. Puff, in his tragedy of The Spanish Armada, introduces lord Burleigh, "who has the affairs of the whole nation in his head, and has no time to talk;" but his lordship comes on the stage and shakes his head, by which he means far more than words could utter. Puff says—

> Why, by that shake of the head he gave you to understand that even though they had more justice in their cause and wisdom in their measures, yet, if there was not a greater spirit shown on the part of the people, the country would at last fall a sacrifice to the hostile ambition of the Spanish monarchy.
> Sneer. Did he mean all that by shaking his head?
> Puff. Every word of it.—Sheridan: The Critic, ii. 1 (1779).

The original "lord Burleigh" was Irish Moody (1728–1813).—Cornhill Magazine (1867).

Burlesque Poetry (Father of), Hippo'nax of Ephesus (sixth century B.C.).

Burley (John), "poor, honest, ne'er-do-well, never sober, never solvent, but always genial and witty. On his death, like Falstaff, babbling of green fields."—Lord Lytton: My Novel (1853).

Bur'long, a giant, whose legs sir Try'amour cut off.—Romance of Sir Try-amour.

Burn Daylight (We), we waste time (in talk instead of action).—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, act ii. sc. 1 (1601).

Burnbill, Henry de Londres, archbishop of Dublin and lord justice of Ireland, in the reign of Henry III. It is said that he fraudulently burnt all the "bills" or instruments by which his tenants of the archbishopric held their estates.

Burnett Prize (The), once in forty years, for the best two essays on "the evidence of an all-powerful and all-wise God." The first was awarded in 1815.

Burning Crown. Regicides were at one time punished by having a crown of red-hot iron placed on their head. (See DAMIENS.)

> He was adjudged
> To have his head seared with a burning crown.
> Author unknown, Tragedy of Hoffman (1632).

Burns (Helen), in Charlotte Brontë's novel of Jane Eyre (1847).

Burns of France (The), Jasmin, a barber of Gascony. Louis Philippe presented to him a gold watch and chain, and the duke of Orleans an emerald ring.

Bur'ris, an honest lord, favourite of the great-duke of Moscovia.—John Fletcher: The Loyal Subject (1618).

Busby (A), a tall fur cap, with a bag hanging from the top over the right side. Worn by British hussars, artillerymen, and engineers. Probably "Busby" is a proper name.

Busby Wig (A), a punning synonym of a "buzzwig," the joke being a reference to Dr. Busby of Westminster School, who never wore a wig, but only a skull-cap.

Business To-morrow is what Archias, one of the Spartan polemarchs in Athens, said, when a letter was handed to him respecting the insurrection of Pelopidas. He was at a banquet at the time, and thrust the letter under his cushion; but Pelopidas, with his 400 insurgents, rushed into the room during the feast, and slew both Archias and the rest of the Spartan officers.

Bu'sirane (3 syl.), an enchanter who bound Am'oret by the waist to a brazen pillar, and, piercing her with a dart, wrote magic characters with the dropping blood, "all for to make her love him." When Brit'omart approached, the enchanter started up, and, running to Amoret, was about to plunge a knife into her heart; but Britomart intercepted the blow, overpowered the enchanter, compelled him to "reverse his charms," and then bound him fast with his own chain.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 11, 12 (1590).

Busi'ris, king of Egypt, was told by a foreigner that the long drought of nine years would cease when the gods of the country were mollified by human sacrifice. "So be it," said the king, and ordered the man himself to be offered as the victim.—Herod., ii. 59–61.

'Tis said that Egypt for nine years was dry;
Nor Nile did floods nor heaven did rain supply.
A foreigner at length informed the king
That slaughtered guests would kindly moisture bring.
The king replied, "On thee the lot shall fall;
Be thou, my guest, the sacrifice for all."
Ovid., Art of Love, i.

(Young wrote a tragedy on this king, called Busiris King of Egypt, 1719.)

Busi'ris, supposed by Milton to be the Pharaoh drowned in the Red Sea.

Hath vexed the Red Sea coast, whose waves o'erthrew
Busiris and his Memphian chivalry.
Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 306 (1665).

Bus'ne (2 syl.). So the gipsies call all who do not belong to their race.

The gold of the Busnê: give me her gold.
Longfellow: The Spanish Student.

Busqueue (Lord), plaintiff in the great Pantagruelian lawsuit known as "lord Busqueue v. lord Suckfist," in which the parties concerned pleaded for themselves. Lord Busqueue stated his grievance and spoke so learnedly and at such length that no one understood one word about the matter; then lord Suckfist replied, and the bench declared, "We have not understood one iota of the defence." Pantag'ruel, however, gave judgment, and as both plaintiff and defendant considered he had got the verdict, both were fully satisfied—"a thing without parallel in all the annals of the court."—Rabelais: Pantagruel, ii. (1533).

Busy Body (The), a comedy by Mrs. Centlivre (1709). Sir Francis Gripe (guardian of Miranda an heiress, and father of Charles), a man 65 years old, wishes to marry his ward for the sake of her money, but Miranda loves and is beloved by sir George Airy, a man of 24. She pretends to love "Gardy," and dupes him into yielding up her money and giving his consent to her marriage with "the man of her choice," believing himself to be the person. Charles is in love with Isabinda, daughter of sir Jealous Traffick, who has made up his mind that she shall marry a Spaniard named don Diego Babinetto, expected to arrive forthwith. Charles dresses in a Spanish costume, passes himself off as the expected don, and is married to the lady of his choice; so both the old men are duped, and all the young people wed according to their wishes.

But are Ye sure the News is True? This exquisite lyric is generally attributed to William Mickle, but Sarah Tyler, in Good Words, March, 1869, ascribes it to Jean Adam of Crawfurd's Dyke. She says, "Colin and Jean" are Colin and Jean Campbell of Crawfurd's Dyke—the Jean being the poetess and writer of the poem.

Butcher (The), Achmet pasha, who struck off the heads of seven of his wives at once. He defended Acre against Napoleon I.

John ninth lord Clifford, called "The Black Clifford" (died 1461).

Oliver de Clisson, constable of France (1320–1407).

Butcher (The Bloody). (See BLOODY BUTCHER, p. 129.)

Butcher of England, John Tiptoft, earl of Worcester, a man of great learning and a patron of learning (died 1470).

On one occasion in the reign of Edward IV. he ordered Clapham (a squire to lord Warwick) and nineteen others, all gentlemen, to be impaled.—Stow: Warkworth Chronicle ("Cont. Croyl.").

Yet so barbarous was the age, that this same learned man impaled forty Lancastrian prisoners at Southampton, put to death the infant children of the Irish chief Desmond, and acquired the name of "The Butcher of England."—Old and New London, ii. 21.

Butler (The Rev. Mr.), military chaplain at Madras.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Butler (Reuben), a presbyterian minister, married to Jeanie Deans.

Benjamin Butler, father of Reuben.

Stephen Butler, generally called "Bible Butler," grandfather of Reuben and father of Benjamin.

Widow Judith Butler, Reuben's grandmother and Stephen's wife.

Euphemia or Femie Butler, Reuben's daughter.

David and Reuben Butler, Reuben's sons.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Buttercup (John), a milkman.—W. Brough: A Phenomenon in a Smock Frock.

Buxo'ma, a shepherdess with whom Cuddy was in love.

> My brown Buxoma is the featest maid
> That e'er at wake delightsome gambol played . . .
> And neither lamb, nor kid, nor calf, nor Tray,
> Dance like Buxoma on the first of May.
> Gay: Pastoral, I. (1714)

Buz'fuz (Serjeant), the pleader retained by Dodson and Fogg for the plaintiff in the celebrated case of "Bardell v. Pickwick." Serjeant Buzfuz is a driving, chaffing, masculine bar orator, who proved that Mr. Pickwick's note about "chops and tomato sauce" was a declaration of love; and that his reminder "not to forget the warming-pan" was only a flimsy cover to express the ardour of his affection. Of course, the defendant was found guilty by the enlightened jury (His junior was Skimpin.)—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Buz'zard (The), in The Hind and the Panther, by Dryden (pt. iii.), is meant for Dr. Gilbert Burnet, whose figure was lusty (1643-1715).

Bycorn, a fat cow, so fat that its sides were nigh to bursting, but this is no wonder, for its food was "good and enduring husbands," of which there is good store. (See CHICHI-VACHE.)

BYRON (Lord). His life has been often written; for example, by T. Moore (the poet) in 1830; also by Dallas, Galt, Lake, Brydges, Armstrong, etc.

Byron (The French), Alfred de Musset (1810-1857).

> Paul de Musset has gone to rejoin his brother the French Byron.—Edm. About. To the Athenæum (July 3, 1880).

The Polish Byron, Adam Mickiewicz (1798-1855).

The Russian Byron, Alexander Sergeivitch Puschkin (1799-1837).

Byron (Miss Harriet), a beautiful and accomplished woman of high rank, devotedly attached to sir Charles Grandison, whom ultimately she marries.—Richardson: Sir Charles Grandison (1753).

Byron and Mary. The "Mary" of Byron's song is Miss Chaworth. Both Miss Chaworth and lord Byron were wards of Mr. White. Miss Chaworth married John Musters, and lord Byron married Miss Milbanke of Durham; both equally unhappy.

> I have a passion for the name of "Mary,"
> For once it was a magic name to me.
> Byron: Don Juan, v. 4 (1820).

Byron and Teresa Guiccioli. This lady was the wife of count Guiccioli, an old man, but very rich. Moore says that Bryon "never loved but once, till he loved Teresa."

Byron and the Edinburgh Review. It was Jeffrey and not Brougham who wrote the article which provoked the poet's reply.

C.

C. (See P for alliteratives poems in this letter, and in some others.)

C (in Notes and Queries), the right hon. John Wilson Croker.

Caa'ba (Al), the shrine of Mecca, said by the Arabs to be built by Abraham on the exact spot of the tabernacle let down from heaven at the prayer of repentant Adam. Adam had been a wanderer for 200 years, and here received pardon.

The black stone, according to one tradition, was once white, but was turned black by the kisses of sinners. It is "a petrified angel."

According to another tradition, this stone was given to Ishmael by the angel Gabriel; and Abraham assisted his son to insert it in the wall of the shrine.

Cabal, an anagram of a ministry formed by Charles II. in 1670, and consisting of C[lifford], A[shley], B[uckingham], A[rlington], L[auderdale].

Cacafo'go, a rich, drunken usurer, stumpy and fat, choleric, a coward, and a bully. He fancies money will buy everything and every one.—Fletcher: Rule a Wife and Have a Wife (1624).

Cacur'gus, the fool or domestic jester of Misog'onus. Cacurgus is a rustic simpleton and cunning mischief-maker.—T. Rychardes: Misogonus (the third English comedy, 1560).

Ca'cus, a giant who lived in a cave on mount Av'entine (3 syl.). When Hercules came to Italy with the oxen which he had taken from Ger'yon of Spain, Cacus stole part of the herd, but dragged the animals by their tails into his cave, that it might be supposed they had come out of it.

If he falls into slips, it is equally clear they were introduced by him on purpose to confuse, like Cacus, the traces of his retreat.—Encyc. Brit. (article "Romance").

Cad, a low-born, vulgar fellow. A cadie in Scotland was a carrier of a sedan-chair. A caddie is one who carries your clubs, etc., in golf.

All Edinburgh men and boys know that when sedan-chairs were discontinued, the old cadies sank into ruinous poverty, and became synonymous with roughs. The word was brought to London by James Hannay, who frequently used it.—M. Pringle.

(M. Pringle assures us that the word came from Turkey.)

Cade'nus (3 syl.), dean Swift. The word is simply de-cā-nus ("a dean") with the first two syllables transposed (ca-dē-nus). "Vanessa" is Miss Esther Vanhomrigh, a young lady who fell in love with Swift, and proposed marriage The dean's reply is given in the poem entitled Cadēnus and Vanessa [i.e. Van-Esther].

Cadu'ceus, the wand of Mercury. The "post of Mercury" means the office of a pimp, and to "bear the caduceus" means to exercise the functions of a pimp.

I did not think the post of Mercury-in-chief quite so honourable as it was called . . . and I resolved to abandon the Caduceus for ever.—Lesage: Gil Blas, xii. 3, 4 (1715).

Cadur'ci, the people of Aquita'nia.

Cad'wal. Arvir'agus, son of Cym'beline, was so called while he lived in the woods with Bela'rius, who called himself Morgan, and whom Cadwal supposed to be his father.—Shakespeare: Cymbeline (1605).

Cadwallader, called by Bede (1 syl.) Elidwalda, son of Cadwalla king of Wales. Being compelled by pestilence and famine to leave Britain, he went to Armorica. After the plague ceased he went to Rome, where, in 689, he was baptized, and received the name of Peter, but died very soon afterwards.

Cadwallader that drave [sailed] to the Armoric shore.
Drayton: Polyolbion, ix. (1622).

Cadwallader, the misanthrope in Smollett's Peregrine Pickle (1751).

Cadwallader (Mrs.), the rector's wife in the novel called Middlemarch, by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross), (1872).

Cadwall'on, son of the blinded Cyne'tha. Both father and son accompanied prince Madoc to North America in the twelfth century.—Southey: Madoc (1805).

Cadwallon, the favourite bard of prince Gwenwyn. He entered the service of sir Hugo de Lacy, disguised, under the assumed name of Renault Vidal.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Cæ'cias, the north-west wind. Argestēs is the north-east, and Bo'reas the full north.

Boreas and Cæcias and Argestes loud
. . . rend the woods, and seas upturn.
Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 699, etc. (1665).

Cælesti'na, the bride of sir Walter Terill. The king commanded sir Walter to bring his bride to court on the night of her marriage. Her father, to save her honour, gave her a mixture supposed to be poison, but in reality it was only a sleeping-draught. In due time the bride recovered, to the amusement of the king and the delight of her husband.—Dekker: Satiro-mastix (1602).

Cæ'neus [Se.nuce] was born of the female sex, and was originally called Cænis. Vain of her beauty, she rejected all lovers; but was one day surprised by Neptune, who offered her violence, changed her sex, converted her name to Ceneus, and gave her (or rather him) the gift of being invulnerable. In the wars of the Lap'ithæ, Ceneus offended Jupiter, and was overwhelmed under a pile of wood, but came forth converted into a yellow bird. Æneas found Ceneus in the infernal regions restored to the feminine sex. The order is inverted by sir John Davies—

And how was Cæneus made at first a man,
And then a woman, then a man again.
Orchestra, etc. (1654).

CÆSAR, said to be a Punic word meaning "an elephant," "Quòd avus ejus in Africa manu propria occîdit elephantem" (Plin. Hist. viii. 7). There are old coins stamped on the one side with DIVUS JULIUS, the reverse having S.P.Q.R. with an elephant, in allusion to the African original. (See below.)

In Targum Jonathanis Cæsim extat, notione aliena, pro scuto vel clypeo: et fortasse inde est quod, Punica lingua, elephas "Cæsar" dicebatur, quasi tutamen et præsidium legionum.—Casaubon: Ad Suetonium, in Tranquill, i.

Cæsar (Caius Julius).

Somewhere I've read, but where I forget, he could dictate Seven letters at once, at the same time writing his memoirs . . .
better be first, he said, in a little Iberian village
Than be second in Rome, and I think he was right when he said it.
Twice was he married before he was so, and many times after;
Battles 300 he fought, and a thousand cities he conquered;
But was finally stabbed by his friend the orator Brutus.
Longfellow: Courtship of Miles Standish, ii.

(Longfellow refers to Pliny, vii. 25, where he says that Cæsar "could employ, at one and the same time, his ears to listen, his eyes to read, his hands to write, and his tongue to dictate." He is said to have conquered 300 nations, to have taken 800 cities, to have slain in battle a million men, and to have defeated three millions. See below, Cæsar's Wars.)

Cæsar and his Fortune. Plutarch says that Cæsar told the captain of the vessel in which he sailed that no harm could come to his ship, for that he had "Cæsar and his fortune with him."

Now am I like that proud insulting ship,
Which Cæsar and his fortune bare at once.
Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act i. sc. 2 (1589).

Cæsar saves his Commentaries. Once, when Julius Cæsar was in danger of being upset into the sea by the overloading of a boat, he swam to the nearest ship, with his book of Commentaries in his hand.—Suetonius.

Cæsar's Death. Both Chaucer and Shakespeare say that Julius Cæsar was killed in the capitol. Thus Polonius says to Hamlet, "I did enact Julius Cæsar; I was killed i' the capitol" (Hamlet, act iii. sc. 2). And Chaucer says—

This Julius to the capitolé wente . . .
And in the capitole anon him hente
This falsé Brutus, and his other soon,
And sticked him with bodékins anon.
Canterbury Tales ("The Monk's Tale," 1388).

 Plutarch expressly tells us he was killed in Pompey's Porch or Piazza; and in Julius Cæsar Shakespeare says he fell "e'en at the base of Pompey's statue" (act iii. sc. 2).

Cæsar's Famous Despatch, "Veni, vidi, vici," written to the senate to announce his overthrow of Pharnăcēs king of Pontus. This "hop, skip, and a jump" was, however, the work of three days.

Cæsar's Likeness. That by Aure'lius is the most celebrated.

Cæsar's Wars. The carnage occasioned by the wars of Cæsar is usually estimated at a million fighting men. He won 320 triumphs, and fought 300 battles. (See above, Cæsar (Caius Julius).)

Cæsar, the Mephistoph'elês of Byron's unfinished drama called The Deformed Transformed. This Cæsar changes Arnold (the hunchback) into the form of Achilles, and assumes himself the deformity and ugliness which Arnold casts off. The drama being incomplete, all that can be said is that "Cæsar," in cynicism, effrontery, and snarling bitterness of spirit, is the exact counterpart of his prototype, Mephistophelês (1823).

Cæsar (Don), an old man of 63, the father of Olivia. In order to induce his daughter to marry, he makes love to Marcella, a girl of 16.—Mrs. Cowley: A Bold Stroke for a Husband (1782).

Cæ'sarism, the absolute rule of man over man, with the recognition of no law divine or human beyond that of the ruler's will. Cæsar must be summus pontifex as well as imperātor.—Dr. Manning: On Cæsarism (1873). (See CHAUVINISM.)

Cael, a Highlander of the western coast of Scotland. The Cael had colonized, in very remote times, the northern parts of Ireland, as the Fir-bolg or Belgæ of Britain had colonized the southern parts. The two colonies had each a separate king. When Crothar was king of the Fir-bolg (or "lord of Atha"), he carried off Conla'ma, daughter of the king of Ulster (i.e. "chief of the Cael"), and a general war ensued between the two races. The Cael, being reduced to the last extremity, sent to Trathal (Fingal's grandfather) for help, and Trathal sent over Con'ar, who was chosen "king of the Cael" immediately he landed in Ulster; and having reduced the Fir-bolg to submission, he assumed the title of "king of Ireland." The Fir-bolg, though conquered, often rose in rebellion, and made many efforts to expel the race of Conar, but never succeeded in so doing.—Ossian.

Caer Ery'ri, Snowdon. (Eryri means "an eyrie" or "eagle's nest.")

. . . once the wondering forester at dawn . .
On Caer Eryri's highest found the king.
Tennyson: Gareth and Lynette.

Caer Gwent, Venta, that is, Gwentceaster, Wintan-ceaster (or Winchester). The word Gwent is Celtic, and means "a fair open region."

Caer'leon or Caerle'on, on the Usk, in Wales, the chief royal residence of king Arthur. It was here that he kept at Pentecost "his Round Table," in great splendour. Occasionally these "courts" were held at Camelot—

Where as at Caer'leon oft, he kept the Table Round,
Most famous for the sports at Pentecost.
Drayton: Polyolbion, ill. (1612).

For Arthur on the Whitsuntide before
Held court at old Caerle'on-upon-Usk.
Tennyson: Enid.

Caerleon (The Battle of), one of the twelve great victories of prince Arthur over the Saxons. The battle was not fought, as Tennyson says, at Caerleon-upon-Usk, in the South of Wales, but at Caerleon, now called Carlisle.

Cages for Men. Alexander the Great had the philosopher Callisthĕnēs chained for seven months in an iron cage, for refusing to pay him divine honours.

Catherine II. of Russia kept her perruquier for more than three years in an iron cage in her bed-chamber, to prevent his telling people that she wore a wig.—Mons. De Masson: Mémoires Secrets sur la Russie.

Edward I. confined the countess of Buchan in an iron cage, for placing the crown of Scotland on the head of Bruce. This cage was erected on one of the towers of Berwick Castle, where the countess was exposed to the rigour of the elements and the gaze of passers-by. One of the sisters of Bruce was similarly dealt with.

Louis XI. confined cardinal Balue (grand-almoner of France) for ten years in an iron cage in the castle of Loches [Lŏsh].

Tamerlane enclosed the sultan Bajazet in an iron cage, and made him a public show. So says D'Herbelot. (See CALISTHENES, p. 170.)

An iron cage was made by Timour's command, composed on every side of iron gratings, through which the captive sultan [Bajazet] could be seen in any direction. He travelled in this den slung between two horses.—Lonnclavius.

Cagliostro (Count de), Giuseppe Balsamo, the prince of literary thieves and impostors (1743-1795). (See under FORGERS AND FORGERIES.)

Ça ira, one of the most popular revolutionary songs, composed for the Fête de la Féderation, in 1789, to the tune of Le Carillon National. Marie Antoinette was for ever strumming this air on her harpsicord. "Ça ira!" was the rallying cry borrowed by the Federalists from Dr. Franklin, who used to say, in reference to the American Revolution, Ah! ah! ça ira! ça ira! ("It will speed!").

Twigs all the same to him—God save the King!
Or Ca ira!
Byron: Don Juan, ill. 84 (1820).

Cain, "a Mystery," by lord Byron (1821). Cain's wife he calls Adah, and Abel's wife he calls Zillah. The poet assumes (with Cuvier) that the world had been destroyed several times before man was created. Certainly there were several races of animals extinct before the supposed creation of Adam, the most noted being the Saurian period. Cain, in many respects, is a replica of Manfred, published in 1817.

Coleridge wrote a prose poem called The Wanderings of Cain (1798).

Cain and Abel are called in the Kordn "Kâbil and Hâbil." The tradition is that Cain was commanded to marry Abel's sister, and Abel to marry Cain's; but Cain demurred because his own sister was the more beautiful, and so the matter was referred to God, who answered "No" by rejecting Cain's sacrifice.

N.B.—The Mohammedans say that Cain carried about with him the dead body of Abel, till he saw a raven scratch a hole in the ground to bury a dead bird. The hint was taken, and Abel was buried under ground.—Sale: Al Kordn, v., notes.

Cain-coloured Beard. Cain and Judas, in old tapestries and paintings, are always represented with yellow beards.

He hath a little wee face, with a little yellow beard; a Cain-coloured beard.—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, act i. sc. 4 (1601).

Cain's Hill. Maundrel tells us that "some four miles from Damascus is a high hill, reported to be that on which Cain slew his brother Abel."—Travels, 131.

In that place where Damascus was founded, Kayn slought Abel his brother.—Maundeville: Travels, 148.

Caina [Ka-i'-nah], the place to which murderers are doomed.

Caina waits
The soul who spills man's life.
Dante: Inferno, v. (1320).

Cairbar, son of Borbar-Duthul, "lord of Atha" (Connaught), the most potent of the race of the Fir-bolg. He rose in rebellion against Cormac, "king of Ireland," murdered him (Temora, i.), and usurped the throne; but Fingal (who was distantly related to Cormac) went to Ireland with an army, to restore the ancient dynasty. Cairbar invited Oscar (Fingal's grandson) to a feast, and Oscar accepted the invitation; but Cairbar having provoked a quarrel with his guest, the two fought, and both were slain.

"Thy heart is a rock. Thy thoughts are dark and bloody. Thou art the brother of Cairbar . . . but my soul is not like thine, thou double headed ill fated. The light of my bosom is stained by thy deeds."—Gesture: Temora, i.

Cair'bre (2 syl.), sometimes called "Cair'bar," third king of Ireland, of the Caledonian line. (There was also a Cairbar, "lord of Atha," a Fir-bolg, quite a different person.)

The Caledonian line ran thus: (1) Conar, first "king of Ireland;" (2) Cormac I., his son; (3) Cairbre, his son; (4) Artho, his son; (5) Cormac II., his son; (6) Ferad-Artho, his cousin.—Ossian.

Cai'us (2 syl.), the assumed name of the earl of Kent when he attended on king Lear, after Goneril and Re'gan refused to entertain their aged father with his suite.—Shakespeare: King Lear (1605).

Cai'us (Dr.), a French physician, whose servants are Rugby and Mrs. Quickly.—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor (1601).

The clipped English of Dr Caius.—Macaulay.

Cai'us College (Cambridge), originally Gonville Hall. In 1557 it was erected into a college by Dr. John Key, of Norwich, and called after him Caius or Key's College.

Cakes (Land of), Scotland, famous for its oatmeal-cakes.

Calais. When Calais was lost, queen Mary said they would find at her death the word CALAIS written on her heart.

¶ Montpensier said, if his body were opened, the name of FELIPE [II. of Spain] would be found imprinted on his heart (1552-1596).—Motley: Dutch Republic, part ii. 5.

Calandri'no, a character in the Decameron, whose "misfortunes have made all Europe merry for four centuries."—Boccaccio: Decameron, viii. 9 (1350).

Calan'tha, princess of Sparta, loved by Ith'oclês. Ithoclês induces his sister Penthe'a to break the matter to the princess. This she does; the princess is won to requite his love, and the king consents to the union. During a great court ceremony Calantha is informed of the sudden death of her father, another announces to her that Penthea had starved herself to death from hatred to Bass'anês, and a third follows to tell her that Ithoclês, her betrothed husband, has been murdered. Calantha bates no jot of the ceremony, but continues the dance even to the bitter end. The coronation ensues, but scarcely is the ceremony over than she can support the strain no longer, and, broken-hearted, she falls dead.—John Ford: The Broken Heart (1633).

Calantha and Ordella (q.v.) are the most perfect of women in all the range of fiction.

Calan'the (3 syl.), the betrothed wife of Pyth'ias the Syracusian.—Banim: Damon and Pythias (1825).

Cala'ya, the third paradise of the Hindûs.

Cal'culator (The). Alfragan the Arabian astronomer was so called (died A.D. 820). Jedediah Buxton, of Elmeton, in Derbyshire, was also called "The Calculator" (1705-1775). George Bidder (1806-1878), Zerah Colburn, and a girl named Heywood (whose father was a Mile End weaver), all exhibited their calculating powers in public. (See Percy: Anecdotes.)

N.B.—Pascal, in 1642, made a calculating machine, which was improved by Leibnitz. C. Babbage also invented a calculating machine (1790-1871).

Calcut'ta is Kali-cuttah ("temple of the goddess Kali").

Cal'deron (Don Pedro), a Spanish poet born at Madrid (1600-1681). At the age of 52 he became an ecclesiastic, and composed religious poetry only. Altogether he wrote about 1000 dramatic pieces.

Her memory was a mine. She knew by heart
All Cal'deron and greater part of Lopé.
Byron: Don Juan, . 11 (1819).

("Lope," that is, Lopé de Vega, the Spanish poet, 1562-1635.)

Ca'leb, the enchantress who carried off St. George in infancy.

Ca'leb, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for lord Grey of Wark, in Northumberland, an adherent of the duke of Monmouth.

And, therefore in the name of dulness be
The well-hung Balaam and cold Caleb free.
Part I. 573, 574.

∴ "Balaam" is the earl of Huntingdon.

Caleb Williams. (See WILLIAMS.)

Ca'led, commander-in-chief of the Arabs in the siege of Damascus. He is brave, fierce, and revengeful. War is his delight. When Pho'cyas, the Syrian, deserts Eu'menês, Caled asks him to point out the governor's tent; he refuses—they fight, and Caled falls.—J. Hughes: Siege of Damascus (1720).

Caledo'nia, Scotland. Also called Cal'edon.

O Caledonia, stern and wild,
Meet nurse for a poetic child!
Sir W. Scott.

Not thus in ancient days of Caledon
Was thy voice mute amid the festal crowd.
Sir W. Scott.

Caledo'nians, Gauls from France who colonized South Britain, whence they journeyed to Inverness and Ross. The word is compounded of two Celtic words, Cael ("Gaul" or "Celt"), and don or dun ("a hill"), so that Cael-don means "Celts of the highlands."

The Highlanders to this day call themselves "Cael," and their language "Caelic" or "Gaelic," and their country "Caeldoch," which the Romans softened into "Caledonia."—Dissertation on the Poems of Ossian.

Calendar (The French) was devised by Fabre d'Eglantine and Romme (1792).

Ca'lenders, a class of Mohammedans who abandoned father and mother, wife and children, relations and possessions, to wander through the world as religious devotees, living on the bounty of those whom they made their dupes.—D'Herbelot: Supplement, 204.

He diverted himself with the multitude of calenders, santons, and dervises, who had travelled from the heart of India, and halted on their way with the emir.—W. Beckford: Vathek (1786).

The Three Calenders, three royal princes, disguised as begging dervishes, each of whom had lost his right eye. Their adventures form three tales in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments.

Tale of the First Calender. No names are given. This calender was the son of a king, and nephew of another king. While on a visit to his uncle, his father died, and the vizier usurped the throne. When the prince returned, he was seized, and the usurper pulled out his right eye. The uncle died, and the usurping vizier made himself master of this kingdom also. So the hapless young prince assumed the garb of a calender, wandered to Bagdad, and being received into the house of "the three sisters," told his tale in the hearing of the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid.—The Arabian Nights.

Tale of the Second Calender. No names given. This calender, like the first, was the son of a king. On his way to India he was attacked by robbers, and though he contrived to escape, he lost all his effects. In his flight he came to a large city, where he encountered a tailor, who gave him food and lodging. In order to earn a living, he turned woodman for the nonce, and accidentally discovered an under-ground palace, in which lived a beautiful lady, confined there by an evil genius. With a view of liberating her, he kicked down the talisman; the genius killed the lady and turned the prince into an ape. As an ape he was taken on board ship, and transported to a large commercial city, where his penmanship recommended him to the sultan, who made him his vizier. The sultan's daughter undertook to disenchant him and restore him to his proper form; but to accomplish this she had to fight with the malignant genius. She succeeded in killing the genius, and restoring the enchanted prince; but received such severe injuries in the struggle that she died, and a spark of fire which flew into the right eye of the prince, perished it. The sultan was so heart-broken at the death of his only child, that he insisted on the prince quitting the kingdom without delay. So he assumed the garb of a calender, and being received into the hospitable house of "the three sisters," told his tale in the hearing of the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid.—The Arabian Nights.

Tale of the Third Calender. This tale is given under the word AGIB, p. 14.

"I am called Agib," he says, "and am the son of a king whose name was Cassib."—Arabian Nights.

Calepine (Sir), the knight attached to Sere'na (canto 3). Seeing a bear carrying off a child, he attacked it, and squeezed it to death, then committed the babe to the care of Matilde, wife of sir Bruin. As Matilde had no child of her own, she adopted it (canto 4).—Spenser: Faërie Queene, vi. (1596).

(Upton says, "the child" in this incident is meant for M'Mahon, of Ireland, and that "Mac Mahon" means the "son of a bear." He furthermore says that the M'Mahons were descended from the Fitz-Ursulas, a noble English family.)

Ca'les (a syl.). So gipsies call themselves.

Beltran Cruzado, count of the Cales.
Longfellow: The Spanish Student.

Calf-skin. Fools and jesters used to wear a calf-skin coat buttoned down the back, and hence Faulconbridge says insolently to the archduke of Austria, who had acted very basely towards Richard Lion-heart—

Thou wear a lion's hide! doff it for shame,
And hang a calf-skin on those recreant limbs.
Shakespeare: King John, act iii. sc. 1 (1594).

Cal'ianax, a humorous old lord, father of Aspatia the troth-plight wife of Amin'tor. It is the death of Aspatia which gives name to the drama.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Maid's Tragedy (1610).

Cal'iban, a savage, deformed slave of Prospero (the rightful duke of Milan and father of Miranda). Caliban is the "freckled whelp" of the witch Syc'orax. Mrs. Shelley's monster, in Frankenstein, is a sort of Caliban.—Shakespeare: The Tempest (1609).

"Caliban" . . . is all earth . . . he has the dawnings of understanding without reason or the moral sense . . . this advance to the intellectual faculties without the moral sense is marked by the appearance of vice.—Coleridge.

Cal'iburn, same as Excalibar, the famous sword of king Arthur.

Onward Arthur paced, with hand
On Caliburn's resistless brand.
Sir W. Scott: Bridal of Triermain (1813).

Arthur . . . drew out his Caliburn, and . . . rushed forward with great fury into the thickest of the enemy's ranks . . . nor did he give over the fury of his assault till he had, with his Caliburn, killed 470 men.—Geoffrey: British History, ix. 4 (1142).

Cal'idore (Sir), the type of courtesy, and the hero of the sixth book of Spenser's Faërie Queene. The model of this character was sir Philip Sydney. Sir Calidore (3 syl.) starts in quest of the Blatant Beast, which had escaped from sir Artegal (bk. v. 12). He first compels the lady Bria'na to discontinue her discourteous toll of "the locks of ladies and the beards of knights" (canto 1). Sir Calidore falls in love with Pastorella, a shepherdess, dresses like a shepherd, and assists his lady-love in keeping sheep. Pastorella being taken captive by brigands, sir Calidore rescues her, and leaves her at Belgard Castle to be taken care of, while he goes in quest of the Blatant Beast. He finds the monster after a time, by the havoc it had made with religious houses, and after an obstinate fight succeeds in muzzling it, and dragging it in chains after him; but it got loose again, as it did before (canto 12).—Spenser: Faërie Queene, vi. (1596).

Sir Gawain was the "Calidore" of the Round Table.—Southey.

 "Pastorella" is Frances Walsingham (daughter of sir Francis), whom sir Philip Sydney married. After the death of sir Philip she married the earl of Essex. The "Blatant Beast" is what we now call "Mrs. Grundy."

 "Calidore" is the name of a poetical fragment by Keats (1796–1821).

Calig'orant, an Egyptian giant and cannibal, who used to entrap travellers with an invisible net. It was the very same net that Vulcan made to catch Mars and Venus with. Mercury stole it for the purpose of entrapping Chloris, and left it in the temple of Anu'bis, whence it was stolen by Caligorant. One day Astolpho, by a blast of his magic horn, so frightened the giant that he got entangled in his own net, and being made captive was despoiled of it.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Cali'no, a famous French utterer of bulls.

Caliph means "vicar" or representative of Mahomet. Scaliger says, "Caliphs est vicarius" (Isagoge of Chronology, 3). The dignity of sultan is superior to that of caliph, although many sultans called themselves caliphs. That passage which in our version of the New Testament is rendered "Archelaus reigned in his stead" (i.e. in the place of Herod), is translated in the Syriac version Chealaph Herodes, that is, "Archelaus was Herod's caliph" or vicar. Similarly, the pope calls himself "St. Peter's vicar."—Selden: Titles of Honour, v. 68, 69 (1672).

Calip'olis, in The Battle of Alcazar, a drama by George Peele (1582). Pistol says to Mistress Quickly—

Then feed and be fat, my fair Calipolis.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 4 (1598).

Cal'is (The princess), sister of As'torax king of Paphos, in love with Polydore, brother of general Memnon, but loved greatly by Siphax.—John Fletcher: The Mad Lover (1617).

Calis'ta, the fierce and haughty daughter of Sciol'to (3 syl.), a proud Genoese nobleman. She yielded to the seduction of Lotha'rio, but engaged to marry Al'tamont, a young lord who loved her dearly. On the wedding day a letter was picked up which proved her guilt, and she was subsequently seen by Altamont conversing with Lothario. A duel ensued, in which Lothario fell. In a street-row Sciolto received his death-wound, and Calista stabbed herself. The character of "Calista" was one of the parts of Mrs. Siddons, and also of Miss Brunton.—Rowe: The Fair Penitent (1703).

Richardson has given a purity and a sanctity to the sorrows of his "Clarissa" which leave "Calista" immeasurably behind.—R. Chambers: English Literature, i. 590.

Twelve years after Norris's death, Mrs. Barry was acting the character of "Calista." In the last act, where "Calista" lays her hand upon a skull, she [Mrs. Barry] was suddenly seized with a shuddering, and fainted. Next day she asked whence the skull had been obtained, and was told it was "the skull of Mr. Norris, an actor." This Norris was her former husband, and so great was the shock that she died within six weeks.—Oxberry.

Calis'to and Ar'cas. Calisto, an Arcadian nymph, was changed into a she-bear. Her son Arcas, supposing the bear to be an ordinary beast, was about to shoot it, when Jupiter metamorphosed him into a he-bear. Both were taken to heaven by Jupiter, and became the constellations Ursa Minor and Ursa Major.

Call'aghan O'Brall'aghan (Sir), "a wild Irish soldier in the Prussian army. His military humour makes one fancy he was not only born in a siege, but that Bellona had been his nurse, Mars his schoolmaster, and the Furies his playfellows" (act i. sc. 1). He is the successful suitor of Charlotte Goodchild. —Macklin: Love à-la-mode (1779).

In the records of the stage, no actor ever approached Jack Johnstone in Irish characters: "sir Lucas O'Trigger," "Callaghan O'Brallaghan," "major O'Flaherty," "Teague," "Tully" (the Irish gardener), and "Dennis Brulgruddery" were portrayed by him in most exquisite colours.—New Monthly Magazine (1829).

("Lucius O'Trigger," in The Rivals (Sheridan); "major O'Flaherty," in The West Indian (Cumberland); "Teague," in The Committee (Howard); "Dennis Brulgruddery," in John Bull (Colman).)

Callet, a fille publique. Brantôme says a calle or calotte is "a cap;" hence the phrase, Plattes comme des calles. Ben Jonson, in his Magnetick Lady, speaks of "wearing the callet, the politic hood."

Des filles du peuple et de la campagne s'appellant calles, à cause de la "cale" qui leur servait de coiffure. —Francisque Michel.

En sa tête avoit un gros bonnet blanc, qui l'on appelle une calle, et nous autres appelons calotte, ou bonnette blanche de lagne, nouée ou bridée par dessoubs le menton.—Brantôme: Vies des Dames Illustres.

A beggar in his drink
Could not have laid such terms upon his callet.
Shakespeare: Othello, act iv. sc. 2 (1611).

Callim'achus (The Italian), Filippo Buonaccorsi (1437-1496).

Callir'rhoe (4 syl.), the lady-love of Chæ'reas, in a Greek romance entitled The Loves of Chæreas and Callirrhoë, by Char'iton (eighth century). (Chæ = ke.)

Callis'thenes (4 syl.), a philosopher who accompanied Alexander the Great on his Oriental expedition. He refused to pay Alexander divine honours, for which he was accused of treason; and, being mutilated, he was chained in a cage for seven months like a wild beast. Lysimachus put an end to his tortures by poison. (See CAGES FOR MEN, p. 166.)

Oh, let me roll in Macedonian rays,
Or, like Callisthenes, be caged for life,
Rather than shine in fashions of the East.
Lee: Alexander the Great, iv. 2 (1678).

Cal'mar, son of Matha, lord of Lara (in Connaught). He is represented as presumptuous, rash, and overbearing, but gallant and generous. The very opposite of the temperate Connal, who advises caution and forethought. Calmar hurries Cuthullin into action, which ends in defeat. Connal comforts the general in his distress.—Ossian: Fingal, i.

Cal'pe (2 syl.), Gibraltar. The two pillars of Hercules are Calpê and Ab'yla.

She her thundering navy leads To Calpe.
Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads.

Cal'thon, brother of Col'mar, sons of Rathmor chief of Clutha (the Clyde). The father was murdered in his halls by Dunthalmo lord of Teutha (the Tweed), and the two boys were brought up by the murderer in his own house, and accompanied him in his wars. As they grew in years, Dunthalmo fancied he perceived in their looks a something which excited his suspicions, so he shut them up in two separate dark caves on the banks of the Tweed. Colmal, daughter of Dunthalmo, dressed as a young warrior, liberated Calthon, and fled with him to Morven, to crave aid in behalf of the captive Colmar. Accordingly, Fingal sent his son Ossian with 300 men to effect his liberation. When Dunthalmo heard of the approach of this army, he put Colmar to death. Calthon, mourning for his brother, was captured, and bound to an oak; but at daybreak Ossian slew Dunthalmo, cut the thongs of Calthon, gave him to Colmal, and they lived happily in the halls of Teutha.—Ossian: Calthon and Colmal.

Calumet of Peace. The bowl of this pipe is made of a soft red stone easily hollowed out, the stem of cane or some light wood, painted with divers colours, and decorated with the heads, tails, and feathers of birds. When Indians enter into an alliance or solemn engagement, they smoke the calumet together. When war is the subject, the whole pipe and all its ornaments are deep red.—Major Rogers: Account of North America. (See RED PIPE.)

A-calumeting, a-courting. In the daytime any act of gallantry would be deemed indecorous by the American Indians; but after sunset, the young lover goes a-calumeting. He, in fact, lights his pipe, and, entering the cabin of his well-beloved, presents it to her. If the lady extinguishes it, she accepts his addresses; but if she suffers it to burn on, she rejects them, and the gentleman retires.—Ashe: Travels.

Cal'ydon (Prince of), Melea'ger, famed for killing the Calydonian boar.—Apollodorus, i. 8. (See MELEAGER.)

As did the fatal brand Althæa burn'd,
Unto the prince's heart of Calydon.
Shakespeare. 2 Henry VI. act i. sc. 1 (1591).

Cal'ydon, a town of Æto'lia, founded by Calydon. In Arthurian romance Calydon is a forest in the north of our island. Probably it is what Richard of Cirencester calls the "Caledonian Wood," westward of the Varar or Murray Frith.

Calydo'nian Hunt. Artĕmis, to punish Œneus [E'.nuce] king of Cal'ydon, in Æto'lia, for neglect, sent a monster boar to ravage his vineyards. His son Melea'ger collected together a large company to hunt it. The boar being killed, a dispute arose respecting the head, and this led to a war between the Curĕtês and Calydo'nians.

¶ A similar tale is told of Theseus (a syl.), who vanquished and killed the gigantic sow which ravaged the territory of Krommyon, near Corinth. (See KROMMYONIAN SOW.)

Calyp'so, in Télémaque, a prose epic by Fénelon, is meant for Mde. de Montespan. In mythology she was queen of the island Ogyg'ia, on which Ulyssês was wrecked, and where he was detained for seven years.

Calypso's Isle, Ogygia, a mythical island "in the navel of the sea." Some consider it to be Gozo, near Malta. Ogygia (not the island) is Bœo'tia, in Greece.

Cama'cho. (See BASILIUS, p. 94.)

Camalodu'num, Colchester.

Girt by half the tribes of Britain, near the colony Camulodine.
Tennyson: Boadicea.

Caman'ches (3 syl.) or COMAN'CHES, an Indian tribe of the Texas (United States).

It is a caravan, whitening the desert where dwell the Camanches.

Camaral'zaman. (See BADOURA, p. 81.)

Cam'ballo, the second son of Cambuscan' king of Tartary, brother of Al'garsife (3 syl.) and Can'acê (3 syl.). He fought with two knights who asked the lady Canacê to wife, the terms being that none should have her till he had succeeded in worsting Camballo in combat. Chaucer does not give us the sequel of this tale, but Spenser says that three brothers, named Priamond, Diamond, and Triamond were suitors, and that Triamond won her. The mother of these three (all born at one birth) was Ag'apê, who dwelt in Faëry-land (bk. iv. 2).

N.B.—Spenser makes Cambi'na (daughter of Agapê) the lady-love of Camballo. Camballo is also called Camballus and Cambel.

Camballo's Ring, given him by his sister Canacê, "had power to stanch all wounds that mortally did bleed."

Well mote ye wonder how that noble knight,
After he had so often wounded been,
Could stand on foot now to renew the fight . . .
All was thro' virtue of the ring he wore;
The which not only did not from him let
One drop of blood to fall, but did restore
His weakened powers and his dulled spirits whet.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 2 (1596).

Cam'balu, the royal residence of the cham of Cathay (a province of Tartary). Milton speaks of "Cambalu, seat of Cathayan Can."—Paradise Lost, xi. 388 (1665).

Cam'baluc, spoken of by Marco Polo, is Pekin.

Cambel. (See CANACE, p. 174.)

Cambi'na, daughter of the fairy Ag'apê (3 syl.). (See CANACE, p. 174.)

Cam'bria, Wales. According to legend, it is so called from Camber, the son of Brute. This legendary king divided his dominions at death between his three sons: Locrin had the southern part, hence called Loegria (England); Camber the west (Wales); and Albanact the north, called Albania (Scotland).

From Cambria's curse, from Cambria's tears.
Gray: The Bard (1757).

Cam'brian, Welsh, pertaining to Cambria or Wales.

Cambridge. Cam is a modern corrupt form of Granta, as the river Cam was anciently called. The transition is Granta, turned by the Normans into Caunter, whence Canter, Can' or Cam.

Cambuscan', king of Sarra, in the land of Tartary the model of all royal virtues. His wife was El'feta; his two sons Al'garsife (3 syl.) and Cam'ballo; and his daughter Can'acê (3 syl.). Chaucer accents the last syllable, but Milton erroneously throws the accent on the middle syllable. Thus Chaucer says—

And so befell that when this Cambuscan' . . .

And again—

This Cambuscan', of which I have you told . . .
Squire's Tale.

But Milton, in Il Penseroso, says—

Him who left half-told
The story of Cambus'can bold.

The accent might be preserved by a slight change, thus—

Him who left of old
The tale of Cambuscan' half-told.

Cambuscan had three presents sent him by the king of Araby and Ind: (1) a horse of brass, which would within a single day transport its rider to the most distant region of the world, (2) a trenchant sword, which would cut through the stoutest armour, and heal a sword-wound by simply striking it with the flat of the blade; (3) a mirror, which would reveal conspiracies, tell who were faithful and loyal, and in whom trust might be confided. He also sent Canacê (daughter of Cambuscan) a ring that she might know the virtues of all plants, and by aid of which she would be able to understand the language of birds, and even to converse with them.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Squire's Tale," 1388).

Camby'ses (3 syl.), a pompous, ranting character in Preston's tragedy of that name (1569).

I must speak in passion, and I will do it in king Cambyses' vein.—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 4 (1597).

Camby'ses and Smerdis. Cambysês king of Persia killed his brother Smerdis from the wild suspicion of a mad man, and it is only charity to think that he was really non compos mentis.

Behold Cambisês and his fatal daye . . .
While he his brother Mergus cast to slaye,
A dreadful thing, his wittes were him bereft.
Sackville: A Mirrour for Magistrayles ("The Complaynt," 1587).

Camden Society (The), established, in 1838, for the republication of British historical documents. So named in honour of William Camden, the historian (1551 1623).

Camel. The pelican is called the "river camel;" in French chameau d'eau; and in Arabic jimmel el bahar.

We saw abundance of camels [i.e. pelicans], but they did not come near enough for us to shoot them.—Norden: Voyage.

Cameliard (3 syl.), the realm of Leod'ogran or Leod'ogrance, father of Guinevere (Guin-ê'-ver) wife of Arthur.

Leodogran, the king of Cameliard
Had one fair daughter and none other child . . .
Guinevere, and in her his one delight.
Tennyson: Coming of Arthur.

Cam'elot (3 syl.). There are two places so called. The place referred to in King Lear is in Cornwall, but that of Arthurian renown was in Winchester. In regard to the first Kent says to Cornwall, "Goose, if I had you upon Sarum Plain, I'd drive ye cackling home to Camelot," i.e. to Tintag'il or Camelford, the "home" of the duke of Cornwall. But the Camelot of Arthur was in Winchester, where visitors are still shown certain large entrenchments once pertaining to "king Arthur's palace."

Sir Balin's sword was put into marble stone, standing it upright as a great millstone, and it swam down the stream to the city of Camelot, that is, in English, Winchester.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 44 (1470).

 In some places, even in Arthurian romance, Camelot seems the city on the Camel, in Cornwall. Thus, when sir Tristram left Tintagil to go to Ireland, a tempest "drove him back to Camelot" (pt. ii. 19).

Camil'la, the virgin queen of the Volscians, famous for her fleetness of foot. She aided Turnus against Æneas.

Not so when swift Camilla scours the plain,
Flies o'er th' unbending corn, or skims along the main.
Pope.

Camilla, wife of Anselmo of Florence. Anselmo, in order to rejoice in her incorruptible fidelity, induced his friend Lothario to try to corrupt her. This he did, and Camilla was not trial-proof, but fell. Anselmo for a time was kept in the dark, but at the end Camilla eloped with Lothario. Anselmo died of grief, Lothario was slain in battle, and Camilla died in a convent.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. 5, 6 ("Fatal Curiosity," 1605).

Camilla, a novel by Mde. D'Arblay, authoress of Evelina, etc., published 1796.

Camille' (2 syl.), in Corneille's tragedy of Les Horaces (1639). When her brother meets her, and bids her congratulate him for his victory over the three Curiatii, she gives utterance to her grief for the death of her lover. Horace says, "What! can you prefer a man to the interests of Rome?" Whereupon Camille denounces Rome, and concludes with these words: "Oh that it were my lot!" When Mdlle. Rachel first appeared in the character of "Camille," she took Paris by storm (1838).

Voir le dernier Romain à son dernier soupir,
Moi seule en être cause, et mourir de plaisir.

(Whitehead has dramatized the subject, and called it The Roman Father, 1741.)

Camillo, a lord in the Sicilian court, and a very good man. Being commanded by king Leontês to poison Polixenês, instead of doing so he gave him warning, and fled with him to Bohemia. When Polixenês ordered his son Florizel to abandon Perdita, Camillo persuaded the young lovers to seek refuge in Sicily, and induced Leontês, the king thereof, to protect them. As soon as Polixenês discovered that Perdita was Leontês' daughter, he readily consented to the union which before he had forbidden.—Shakespeare: The Winter's Tale (1604).

Cami'ola, "the maid of honour," a lady of great wealth, noble spirit, and great beauty. She loved Bertoldo (brother of Roberto king of the two Sicilies), and, when Bertoldo was taken prisoner at Sienna, paid his ransom. Bertoldo before his release was taken before Aurelia, the duchess of Sienna. Aurelia fell in love with him, and proposed marriage, an offer which Bertoldo accepted. The betrothed then went to Palermo to be introduced to the king, when Camiola exposed the conduct of the base young prince. Roberto was disgusted at his brother, Aurelia rejected him with scorn, and Camiola retired to a nunnery.—Massinger: The Maid of Honour (1637).

Camlan (in Cornwall), now the river Alan or Camel, a contraction of Cam-alan ("the crooked river"), so called from its continuous windings. Here Arthur received his death-wound from the hand of his nephew Mordred or Modred, A.D. 542.

Camel . . .
Frantic ever since her British Arthur's blood,
By Mordred's murtherous hand, was mingled with her flood,
For as that river best might boast that conqueror's breath [birth],
So sadly she bemoans his too untimely death.
Drayton: Polyolbion, i. (1612).

Cam'lotte (2 syl.), shoddy, fustian, rubbish, as C'est de la camlotte ce qui vous dites-la.

Camoens, one of the five great European epic poets: Homer, Virgil, Dante, Camoens, and Milton. (See LUSIAD.)

There are numerous poetical romances of an epic character, which do not rise to the dignity of the true epic.

Cam'omile (3 syl.), says Falstaff, "the more it is trodden on the faster it grows."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 4 (1597).

Though the camomile, the more it is troddden and pressed downe, the more it spreadeth; yet the violet, the oftener it is handled and touched, the sooner it withereth and decayeth.—Lily: Euphues.

Campaign (The), a poem by Addison, to celebrate the victories of the duke of Marlborough. Published in 1704. It contains the two noted lines—

Pleased the Almighty's orders to perform,
Rides on the whirlwind and directs the storm.

Campaigner (The old), Mrs. Mackenzie, mother of Rosa, in Thackeray's novel called The Newcomes (1855).

Campa'nia, the plain country about Cap'ua, the terra di Lavo'ro of Italy.

Campas'pe (3 syl.), mistress of Alexander. He gave her up to Apellês, who had fallen in love with her while painting her likeness.—Pliny: Hist. xxxv. 10.

John Lyly produced, in 1583, a drama entitled Cupid and Campaspe, in which is the well-known lyric—

Cupid and my Campaspê played
At cards for kisses; Cupid paid.

CAMPBELL (Captain), called "Green Colin Campbell," or Bar'caldine (3 syl.).—Sir W. Scott: The Highland Widow (time, George II.).

Campbell (General), called "Black Colin Campbell," in the king's service. He suffers the papist conspirators to depart unpunished.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Campbell (Sir Duncan), knight of Ardenvohr, in the marquis of Argyll's army. He was sent as ambassador to the earl of Montrose.

Lady Mary Campbell, sir Duncan's wife.

Sir Duncan Campbell of Auchenbreck, an officer in the army of the marquis of Argyll.

Murdoch Campbell, a name assumed by the marquis of Argyll. Disguised as a servant, he visited Dalgetty and M'Eagh in the dungeon; but the prisoners overmastered him, bound him fast, locked him in the dungeon, and escaped.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Campbell (The lady Mary), daughter of the duke of Argyll.

The lady Caroline Campbell, sister of lady Mary.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Campo-Basso (The count of), an officer in the duke of Burgundy's army, introduced by sir W. Scott in two novels, Quentin Durward and Anne of Geierstein, both laid in the time of Edward IV.

Campeador [Kam-pay'-dor], the Cid, who was called Mio Cid el Campeádor ("my lord the champion"). "Cid" is a corruption of saïd ("lord").

Can'a, a kind of grass plentiful in the heathy morasses of the north.

If on the heath she moved, her breast was whiter than the down of cana; if on the sea-beat shore, than the foam of the rolling ocean.—Ossian: Cath-Loda, ii.

Can'ace (3 syl.), daughter of Cambuscan', and the paragon of women. Chaucer left the tale half-told, but Spenser makes a crowd of suitors woo her. Her brother Cambel or Cam'ballo resolved that none should win his sister who did not first overthrow him in fight. At length Tri'amond sought her hand, and was so nearly matched in fight with Camballo, that both would have been killed, if Cambi'na, daughter of the fairy Ag'apê (3 syl.), had not interfered. Cambina gave the wounded combatants nepenthé, which had the power of converting enmity to love; so the combatants ceased from fight, Camballo took the fair Cambina to wife, and Triamond married Canacê.—Chaucer: Squire's Tale; Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 3 (1596).

Canacê's Mirror, a mirror which told the inspectors if the persons on whom they set their affections would prove true or false.

Canacê's Ring. (See CAMBUSCAN, p. 172.)

Candau'les (3 syl.), king of Lydia, who exposed the charms of his wife to Gy'gês. The queen was so indignant that she employed Gygês to murder her husband. She then married the assassin, who became king of Lydia, and reigned twenty-eight years (B.C. 716–688).

Great men are as jealous of their thoughts as the wife of king Candaules was of her charms.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot, xviii.

Canday'a (The kingdom of), situated between the great Trapoba'na and the South Sea, a couple of leagues beyond cape Com'orin.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iii. 4 (1615).

Candide' (2 syl.), the hero of Voltaire's novel of the same name. All conceivable misfortunes are piled on his head, but he bears them with cynical indifference.

Voltaire says "No." He tells you that Candide
Found life most tolerable after meals.
Byron: Don Juan, v. 31 (1820).

Candour (Mrs.), the beau-ideal of female backbiters.—Sheridan: The School for Scandal (1777).

The name of "Mrs. Candour" has become one of those formidable by-words which have more power in putting folly and ill-nature out of countenance than whole volumes of the wisest remonstrance and reasoning.—T. Moore.

Since the days of Miss Pope, it may be questioned whether "Mrs. Candour" has ever found a more admirable representative than Mrs. Stirling.—Dramatic Memoirs.

Can'idia, a Neapolitan, beloved by the poet Horace. When she deserted him, he held her up to contempt as an old sorceress who could by a rhomb unsphere the moon.—Horace: Epodes v. and xvii.

Such a charm were right
Canidian.
Mrs. Browning. Hector in the Garden, iv.

Canmore or GREAT-HEAD. Malcolm III. of Scotland (*, 1057–1093).—Sir W. Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, i. 4.

Canning (George), statesman (1770–1827). Charles Lamb calls him—

St Stephen's fool, the zany of debate.
Sonnet in "The Champion."

Cano'pos, Menelâos's pilot, killed in the return voyage from Troy by the bite of a serpent. The town Canôpos (Latin, Canopus) was built on the site where the pilot was buried.

Canossa. When, in November, 1887, the czar went to Berlin to visit the emperor of Germany, the Standard asked in a leader, "Has the czar gone to Canossa?" i.e. has he gone to eat humble-pie? Canossa, in the duchy of Modêna, is where (in the winter of 1076–7), the kaiser Henry IV. went to humble himself before pope Gregory VII. [Hildebrand].

Can'tab, a member of the University of Cambridge. The word is a contraction of the Latin Cantabrig'ia.

Canta'brian Surge (The), Bay of Biscay.

She her thundering navy leads
To Calpê [Gibraltar] . . . or the rough
Cantabrian surge.
Addison: Hymn to the Naiads.

Cantab'ric Ocean, the sea which washes the south of Ireland.—Richard of Cirencester: Ancient State of Britain, i. 8.

Can'tacuzene' (4 syl.), a noble Greek family, which has furnished Constantinople with two emperors, and Moldavia and Wallachia with several princes. The family still survives.

We mean to show that the Cantacuzenês are not the only princely family in the world.—D'Israeli: Lothair.

There are other members of the Cantacusené family besides myself.—Ditto.

Can'tacuzene' (Michael), the grand sewer (butler) of Alexius Comne'nus, emperor of Greece.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Canterbury, according to mythical story, was built by Rudhudibras.

By Rudhudibras Kent's famous town . . . arose.
Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1622).

Canterbury Tales. Twenty-three tales told by a company of pilgrims going to visit the shrine of "St. Thomas à Becket" at Canterbury. The party first assembled at the Tabard, an inn in Southwark, and there agreed to tell one tale each both going and returning, and the person who told the best tale was to be treated by the rest to a supper at the Tabard on the homeward journey. The party consisted of twenty-nine pilgrims, so that the whole budget of tales should have been fifty-eight, but only twenty-three of the number were told, not one being on the homeward route. (1388.)

The tales are as follows:—
Chunoun's yemen's tale, the Transmutation of Metals.
Clerk's tale, Patient Grisildes.
Cook's tale, Gamelyon ("As You Like It").
Doctor of Physic's tale, Virginius.
Franklin's tale, Dorigen and Arviragus.
Friar's tale, a Compact with the Devil.
Host's tale, Melibêus (or the forgiveness of injuries).
Knight's tale, Palémon and Arcite (or king Theseus).
Man of Law's tale, king Alla and Constance.
Mancipie's tale, the Tell-tale Crow turned Black.
Merchant's tale, January and May.
Miller's tale, Nicholas and Alison.
Monk's tale, Mutability of Fortune (examples).
Nun's tale (second), Valerian and Tiburce.
Nun's Priest's tale, Chanticleer and the Fox.
Pardoner's tale, the Devil and the Proctor.
Prioress's tale, similar to "Hugh of Lincoln."
Reeve's tale, Symon and the Miller.
Shipman's tale, the Merchant and the Monk.
Squire's tale, Cambuscan.
Sumpnor's tale, the Begging Friar.
Thopus' (Sir) tale (cut short by mine host), a Fight with a Three-headed Giant.
Wife of Bath's tale, What a Woman likes Best (to have her own sweet will).

Canton, the Swiss valet of lord Ogleby. He has to skim the morning papers and serve out the cream of them to his lordship at breakfast, "with good emphasis and good discretion." He laughs at all his master's jokes, flatters him to the top of his bent, and speaks of him as a mere chicken compared to himself, though his lordship is 70 and Canton about 50. Lord Ogleby calls him his "cephalic snuff, and no bad medicine against megrims, vertigoes, and profound thinkings."—Colman and Garrick: The Clandestine Marriage (1766).

Can'trips (Mrs.), a quondam friend of Nanty Ewart the smuggler-captain.

Jessie Cantrips, her daughter.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Cant'well (Dr.), the hypocrite, the English representative of Molière's "Tartuffe." He makes religious cant the instrument of gain, luxurious living, and sensual indulgence. His overreaching and dishonourable conduct towards lady Lambert and her daughter gets thoroughly exposed, and at last he is arrested as a swindler.—Bickerstaff: The Hypocrite (1768).

(This is Cibber's Nonjuror (1717) modernized.)

Dr. Cantwell . . . the meek and saintly hypocrite.
Hunt.

Canute' or Cnut and Edmund Ironside. William of Malmesbury says: When Cnût and Edmund were ready for their sixth battle in Gloucestershire, it was arranged between them to decide their respective claims by single combat. Cnut was a small man, and Edmund both tall and strong; so Cnut said to his adversary, "We both lay claim to the kingdom in right of our fathers; let us, therefore, divide it and make peace;" and they did so.

Canutus of the two that furthest was from hope . . .
Cries, "Noble Edmund, hold! Let us the land divide."
. . . and all aloud do cry.
"Courageous kings, divide! 'Twere pity such should die."
Drayton: Polyolbion, xii. (1613).

Canute's Bird, the knot, a corruption of "Knut," the Cinclus bellonii, of which king Canute was extremely fond.

The knot, that called was Canutus' bird of old,
Of that great king of Danes, his name that still doth hold,
His appetite to please . . . from Denmark hither brought.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxv. (1622).

N.B.—There are thirty "songs" in the Polyolbion, from 19 to 30 being of the date 1622.

Can'ynge (Sir William) is represented in the Rowley Romance as a rich, God-fearing merchant, devoting much money to the Church, and much to literature. He was, in fact, a Mæce'nas, of princely hospitality, living in the Red House. The priest Rowley was his "Horace."—Chatterton (1752–1770).

Ca'ora, inhabited by men "whose heads do grow beneath their shoulders." (See BLEMMYES, p. 127.)

On that branch which is called Caora are [sic] a nation of people whose heades appeare not above their shoulders. They are reported to have their eyes in their shoulders, and their mouthes in the middle of their breasts.—Hackluyt: Voyage (1598).

 Raleigh, in his Description of Guiana (1596), also gives an account of men whose "heads do grow beneath their shoulders."

Capability Brown, Launcelot Brown, the English landscape gardener (1715–1783).

Cap'aneus (3 syl.), a man of gigantic stature, enormous strength, and headlong valour. He was impious to the gods, but faithful to his friends. Capaneus was one of the seven heroes who marched against Thebes (1 syl.), and was struck dead by a thunderbolt for declaring that not Jupiter himself should prevent his scaling the city walls.

¶ The "Mezentius" of Virgil and Tasso's "Argantê" are similar characters; but the Greek Capăneus exceeds Mezentius in physical daring and Argantê in impiety.

Cape of Storms, now called the Cape of Good Hope. It was Bartholomew Diaz who called it Cabo Tormentoso (1486), and king Juan II. who changed the name. (See BLACK SEA, p. 124.)

Capitan, a boastful, swaggering coward, in several French farces and comedies prior to the time of Molière.

Caponsac'chi (Giuseppe), the young priest under whose protection Pompilia fled from her husband to Rome. The husband and his friends said the elopement was criminal; but Pompilia, Caponsacchi, and their friends maintained that the young canon simply acted the part of a chivalrous protector of a young woman who was married at 15, and who fled from a brutal husband who ill-treated her.—R. Browning: The Ring and the Book (1868).

Capstern (Captain), captain of an East Indiaman, at Madras.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Captain, Manuel Comne'nus of Trèb'izond (1120, 1143–1180).

Captain of Kent. So Jack Cade called himself (died 1450).

The Black Captain, lieutenant-colonel Dennis Davidoff, of the Russian army. In the French invasion he was called by the French Le Capitaine Noir.

The Great Captain (el Gran Capitano), Gonzalvo di Cor'dovo (1453–1515).

The People's Captain (el Capitano del Popolo), Giuseppe Garibaldi (1807–1882).

A Copper Captain, a poor captain, whose swans are all geese, his jewellery paste, his guineas counters, his achievements tongue-doughtiness, and his whole man Brummagem.

To this copper captain was confided the command of the troops.—W. Irving

Let all the world view here the captain's treasure . . .
Here's a goodly jewel . . .
See how it sparkles, like an old lady's eyes . . .
And here's a chain of whitings' eyes for pearls . . .
Your clothes are parallels to these, all counterfeits.
Put these and them on, you're a man of copper;
A kind of candlestick; a copper, copper captain.
Fletcher: Rule a Wife and Have a Wife (1640).

A Led Captain, a poor obsequious captain, who is led about as a cavalier servanté by those who find him hospitality and pay nunky for him. He is not the leader of others, as a captain ought to be, but is by others led.

When you quarrel with the family of Blandish, you only leave refined cookery to be fed upon scraps by a poor cousin or a led captain.—Burgoyne: The Heiress, v. 3 (1781).

Captain Loys [Lo-is]. Louise Labé was so called, because in early life she embraced the profession of arms, and gave repeated proofs of great valour. She was also called La Belle Cordière. Louise Labé was a poetess, and has left several sonnets full of passion, and some good elegies (1526–1566).

Captain Right, a fictitious commander, the ideal of the rights due to Ireland. In the last century the peasants of Ireland were sworn to captain Right, as chartists were sworn to their articles of demand called their charter.

Captain Rock, a fictitious name assumed by the leader of certain Irish insurgents in 1822, etc. All notices, summonses, and so on, were signed by this name.

Captain Swing, a fictitious character, in whose name threats were issued and attacks made by the barn-burners and machinery-destroyers early in the nineteenth century.

Captain is a Bold Man (The), a popular phrase at one time. Peachum applies the expression to captain Macheath.—Gay: The Beggar's Opera (1727).

Capu'cinade (4 syl.). "A capucinade" is twaddling composition, or wishy-washy literature. The term is derived from the sermons of the Capuchins, which were notoriously incorrect in doctrine and debased in style.

It was a vague discourse, the rhetoric of an old professor, a mere capucinade.—Lesage: Gil Blas, vii. 4 (1715).

Cap'ulet, head of a noble house of Verona, in feudal enmity with the house of Mon'tague (3 syl.). Lord Capulet is a jovial, testy old man, self-willed, prejudiced, and tyrannical.

Lady Capulet, wife of lord Capulet, and mother of Juliet.—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet (1598).

Then lady Capulet comes sweeping by with her train of velvet, her black hood, her fan, and her rosary, the very beau-ideal of a proud Italian matron of the fifteenth century, whose offer to poison Romeo in revenge for the death of Tybalt stamps her with one very characteristic trait of the age and country. Yet she loves her daughter, and there is a touch of remorseful tenderness in her lamentation over her.—Mrs. Jameson.

(Lord Capulet was about 60. He had "left off masking" for above thirty years (act i. sc. 5).

The tomb of all the Capulets. Burke, in a letter to Matthew Smith, says, "I would rather sleep in the corner of a little country churchyard than in the tomb of all the Capulets." It does not occur in Shakespeare.

Capys, a blind old seer, who prophesied to Romulus the military triumphs of Rome from its foundation to the destruction of Carthage.

In the hall-gate sat Capys,
Capys the sightless seer;
From head to foot he trembled
As Romulus drew near.
And up stood stiff his thin white hair,
And his blind eyes flashed fire.
Macaulay: Lays of Ancient Rome ("The Prophecy of Capys," xi.).

Car'abas (Le marquis de), an hypothetical title to express a fossilized old aristocrat, who supposed the whole world made for his behoof. The "king owes his throne to him;" he can "trace his pedigree to Pepin;" his youngest son is "sure of a mitre;" he is too noble "to pay taxes;" the very priests share their tithes with him; the country was made for his "hunting-ground;" and, therefore, as Béranger says—

Chapeau bas! chapeau bas!
Gloire au marquis de Carabas!

(The name occurs in Perrault's tale of Puss in Boots, and in Disraeli's novel of Vivian Grey (1820); but it is Béranger's song (1816) which has given the word its present meaning.)

Carac'ci of France, Jean Jouvenet, who was paralyzed on the right side, and painted with his left hand (1647–1707).

Carac'tacus or Caradoc, king of the Sil'urês (Monmouthshire, etc.). For nine years he withstood the Roman arms, but being defeated by Osto'rius Scap'ula, the Roman general, he escaped to Brigantia (Yorkshire, etc.) to crave the aid of Carthisman'dua (or Cartimandua), a Roman matron married to Venu'tius, chief of those parts. Carthismandua betrayed him to the Romans, A.D. 47.—Richard of Cirencester: Ancient State of Britain, i. 6, 23.

Caradoc was led captive to Rome, A.D. 51, and, struck with the grandeur of that city, exclaimed, "Is it possible that a people so wealthy and luxurious can envy me a humble cottage in Britain?" Claudius the emperor was so charmed with his manly spirit and bearing that he released him and craved his friendship.

Drayton says that Caradoc went to Rome with body naked, hair to the waist, girt with a chain of steel, and his "manly breast enchased with sundry shapes of beasts. Both his wife and children were captives, and walked with him."—Polyolbion, viii. (1612).

Caracul (i.e. Caracalla), son and successor of Sevērus the Roman emperor. In A.D. 210 he made an expedition against the Caledo'nians, but was defeated by Fingal. Aurēlius Antonīnus was called "Caracalla" because he adopted the Gaulish caracalla in preference to the Roman toga.—Ossian: Comala.

The Caracul of Fingal is no other than Caracalla, who (as the son of Severus) the emperor of Rome . . . was not without reason called "The Son of the King of the World." This was A.D. 210.—Dissertation on the Era of Ossian.

Caracul, called Caraculla in Ossian, is Antonīnus.

Caraculiam'bo, the hypothetical giant of the island of Malindra'ma, whom don Quixote imagines he may one day conquer and make to kneel at the foot of his imaginary lady-love.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. i. 1 (1605).

Car'adoc or Cradock, a knight of the Round Table. He was husband of the only lady in the queen's train who could wear "the mantle of matrimonial fidelity." This mantle fitted only chaste and virtuous wives; thus, when queen Guenever tried it on—

One while it was too long, another while too short,
And wrinkled on her shoulders in most unseemly sort.
Percy: Reliques ("Boy and the Mantle," III. iii. 18).

Sir Caradoc and the Boar's Head. The boy who brought the test mantle of fidelity to king Arthur's court, drew a wand three times across a boar's head, and said, "There's never a cuckold who can carve that head of brawn." Knight after knight made the attempt, but only sir Cradock could carve the brawn.

Sir Caradoc and the Drinking-horn. The boy furthermore brought forth a drinking-horn, and said, "No cuckold can drink from that horn without spilling the liquor." Only Cradock succeeded, and "he wan the golden can."—Percy: Reliques ("Boy and the Mantle," III. iii. 18).

Caradoc of Men'wygent, the younger bard of Gwenwyn prince of Powys-land. The elder bard of the prince was Cadwallon.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Car'atach or Carac'tacus, a British king brought captive before the emperor Claudius in A.D. 52. He had been betrayed by Cartimandua. Claudius set him at liberty.

And Beaumont's pilfered Caratach affords
A tragedy complete except in words.
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

(Byron alludes to the "spectacle" of Caractacus produced by Thomas Sheridan at Drury Lane Theatre. It was Beaumont's tragedy of Bonduca, minus the dialogue.)

Digges [1720–1786] was the very absolute "Caratach." The solid bulk of his frame, his action, his voice, all marked him with identity.—Boaden: Life of Siddons.

Car'athis, mother of the caliph Vathek. She was a Greek, and induced her son to study necromancy, held in abhorrence by all good Mussulmans. When her son threatened to put to death every one who attempted without success to read the inscriptions of certain sabres, Carathis wisely said, "Content yourself, my son, with commanding their beards to be burnt. Beards are less essential to a state than men." She was ultimately carried by an afrit to the abyss of Eblis, in punishment of her many crimes.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Carau'sius, the first British emperor (237–294). His full name was Marcus Aurelius Valerius Carausius, and as emperor of Britain he was accepted by Diocletian and Maximian; but after a vigorous reign of seven years, he was assassinated by Allectus, who succeeded him as "emperor of Britain." (See Gibbon: Decline and Fall, etc., ii. 13.)

Cards. It is said that there never was a good hand of cards containing four clubs. Such a hand is called "The Devil's Four-poster."

Cards of Compliment. When it was customary to fold down part of an address card, the strict rule was this: Right hand bottom corner turned down meant a Personal call. Right hand top corner turned down meant Condolence Left hand bottom corner turned down meant Congratulation.

Car'dan (Jerômo) of Pa'via (1501–1576), a great mathematician and astrologer. He professed to have a demon or familiar spirit, who revealed to him the secrets of nature.

What did your Cardan and your Ptolemy tell you? Your Messahalah and your Longomontanus [two astrologers], your harmony of chiromancy with astrology?—Congreve: Love for Love, iv. (1695).

Carde'nio of Andalusi'a, of opulent parents, fell in love with Lucinda, a lady of equal family and fortune, to whom he was formally engaged. Don Fernando, his friend, however, prevailed on Lucinda's father, by artifice, to break off the engagement and promise Lucinda to himself, "contrary to her wish, and in violation of every principle of honour." This drove Cardenio mad, and he haunted the Sierra Morena or Brown Mountain for about six months, as a maniac with lucid intervals. On the wedding day Lucinda swooned, and a letter informed the bridegroom that she was married to Cardenio. Next day she privately left her father's house, and took refuge in a convent; but being abducted by don Fernando, she was carried to an inn, where Fernando found Dorothea his wife, and Cardenio the husband of Lucinda. All parties were now reconciled, and the two gentlemen paired respectively with their proper wives.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. (1605).

Car'duel or Kar'tel, Carlisle, the place where Merlin prepared the Round Table.

Care, described as a blacksmith, who "worked all night and day." His bellows, says Spenser, are Pensiveness and Sighs.—Faërie Queene, iv. 5 (1596).

CARE'LESS, one of the boon companions of Charles Surface.—Sheridan: School for Scandal (1777).

Careless (Colonel), an officer of high spirits and mirthful temper, who seeks to win Ruth (the daughter of sir Basil Thoroughgood) for his wife.—T. Knight: The Honest Thieves.

(This farce is a mere réchauffé of The Committee, by the hon. sir R. Howard. The names "colonel Careless" and "Ruth" are the same, but "Ruth" says her proper Christian name is "Anne." The Committee recast by Knight is called The Honest Thieves.)

Careless, in The Committee, was the part for which Joseph Ashbury (1638–1720) was celebrated.—Chetwood: History of the Stage.

Careless (Ned) makes love to lady Pliant.—Congreve: The Double Dealer (1700).

Careless Husband (The), a comedy by Colley Cibber (1704). The "careless husband" is sir Charles Easy, who has amours with different persons, but is so careless that he leaves his love-letters about, and even forgets to lock the door when he has made a liaison, so that his wife knows all; yet so sweet is her temper, and under such entire control, that she never reproaches him, nor shows the slightest indication of jealousy. Her confidence so wins upon her husband that he confesses to her his faults, and reforms entirely the evil of his ways.

Carême (Jean de), chef de cuisine of Leo X. This was a name given him by the pope for an admirable soupe maigre which he invented for Lent. A descendant of Jean was chef to the prince regent, at a salary of £1000 per annum, but he left this situation because the prince had only a ménage bourgeois, and entered the service of baron Rothschild at Paris (1784–1833).

Carey (Patrick), the poet, brother of lord Falkland, introduced by sir W. Scott in Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Car'gill (The Rev. Josiah), minister of St. Ronan's Well, tutor of the hon. Augustus Bidmore (a syl.), and the suitor of Miss Augusta Bidmore, his pupil's sister.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Car'ibee Islands (London), now Chandos Street. It was called the Caribee Islands from its countless straits and intricate thieves' passages.

Cari'no, father of Zeno'cia the chaste troth-plight wife of Arnoldo (the lady dishonourably pursued by the governor count Clodio).—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Custom of the Country (printed 1647).

Car'ker (James), manager in the house of Mr. Dombey, merchant. Carker was a man of 40, of a florid complexion, with very glistening white teeth, which showed conspicuously when he spoke. His smile was like "the snarl of a cat." He was the Alas'tor of the house of Dombey, for he not only brought the firm to bankruptcy, but he seduced Alice Marwood (cousin of Edith, Dombey's second wife) and also induced Edith to elope with him. Edith left the wretch at Dijon, and Carker, returning to England, was run over by a railway train and killed.

John Carker, the elder brother, a junior clerk in the same firm. He twice robbed it and was forgiven.

Harriet Carker, a gentle, beautiful young woman, who married Mr. Morfin, one of the employés in the house of Mr. Dombey, merchant. When her elder brother John fell into disgrace by robbing his employer, Harriet left the house of her brother James (the manager) to live with and cheer her disgraced brother John.—C. Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Carle'gion (4 syl.) or Cair-Li'gion, Chester, or the "fortress upon Dee."

> Fair Chester, called of old Carlegion.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xi. (1613).

Carle'ton (Captain), an officer in the Guards.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Carlisle (Frederick Howard, earl of), uncle and guardian of lord Byron (1748–1826). His tragedies are The Father's Revenge and Bellamere.

> The paralytic puling of Carlisle . . .
> Lord, rhymester, petit-maître, pamphleteer.
> Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

CARLOS, elder son of don Antonio, and the favourite of his paternal uncle Lewis. Carlos is a great bookworm, but when he falls in love with Angelina, he throws off his diffidence and becomes bold, resolute, and manly. His younger brother is Clodio, a mere coxcomb.—Cibber: Love Makes a Man (1694).

Carlos (under the assumed name of the marquis D'Antas) married Ogari'ta, but as the marriage was effected under a false name, it was not binding, and Ogarita left Carlos to marry Horace de Brienne. Carlos was a great villain: He murdered a man to steal from him the plans of some Californian mines. Then embarking in the Urania, he induced the crew to rebel in order to obtain mastery of the ship. "Gold was the object of his desire, and gold he obtained." Ultimately, his villainies being discovered, he was given up to the hands of justice.—Stirling: The Orphan of the Frozen Sea (1856).

Carlos (Don), son of Philip I. He and Alexis son of Peter the Great were alike in many respects. Don Carlos was the son of Mary of Portugal, Philip's first wife; and Alexis the son of Eudoxia, the first wife of czar Peter. Don Carlos is represented as weak, vindictive, and spiritless; and Alexis was the same. Philip hated his son Carlos, mistrusted him, and finally murdered him; and czar Peter did the same with Alexis.

Carlos (Don), son of Philip II. of Spain; deformed in person, violent and vindictive in disposition. Don Carlos was to have married Elizabeth of France, but his father supplanted him. Subsequently he expected to marry the archduchess Anne, daughter of the emperor Maximilian, but her father opposed the match. In 1564 Philip II. settled the succession on Rodolph and Ernest, his nephews, declaring Carlos incapable. This drove Carlos into treason, and he joined the Netherlanders in a war against his father. He was apprehended and condemned to death, but was killed in prison.

(This has furnished the subject of several tragedies: i.e. Otway's Don Carlos (1672) in English; those of J. G. de Campistron (1683); J. C. F. Schiller (1787) in German; M. J. de Chénier (1789) in French; and Alfieri in Italian, about the same time.)

Carlos (Don), the friend of don Alonzo, and the betrothed husband of Leono'ra, whom he resigns to Alonzo out of friendship. After marriage, Zanga induces Alonzo to believe that Leonora and don Carlos entertain a criminal love for each other, whereupon Alonzo out of jealousy has Carlos put to death, and Leonora kills herself.—Young: The Revenge (1721).

Carlos (Don), husband of donna Victoria. He gave the deeds of his wife's estate to donna Laura, a courtezan; and Victoria, in order to recover them, assumed the disguise of a man, took the name of Florio, and made love to Laura. Having secured a footing, Florio introduced Gaspar as the wealthy uncle of Victoria, and Gaspar told Laura the deeds in her hand were utterly worthless. Laura, in a fit of temper, tore them to atoms, and thus Carlos recovered the estate, and was rescued from impending ruin.—Mrs. Cowley: A Bold Stroke for a Husband (1782).

Carmen Seculāre (4 syl.), for the year 1700; in which Prior celebrates William III.

Carmen Triumphāle (4 syl.), by Southey (1815). The year referred to was 1814.

Car'milhan, the "phantom ship." The captain of this ship swore he would double the Cape, whether God willed it or not. For this impious vow he was doomed to abide for ever and ever captain in the same vessel, which always appears near the Cape, but never doubles it. The kobold of the phantom ship (named Klabot'erman) helps sailors at their work, but beats those who are idle. When a vessel is doomed, the kobold appears smoking a short pipe, dressed in yellow, and wearing a night-cap.

Caro, the Flesh or "natural man" personified. Phineas Fletcher says "this dam of sin" is a hag of loathsome shape, arrayed in steel, polished externally, but rusty within. On her shield is the device of a mermaid, with the motto, "Hear, Gaze, and Die."—The Purple Island, vii. (1633).

Carocium, the banner of the Milanese, having for device "St. Ambrose," the patron saint of Milan. It was mounted on an iron tree with iron leaves, and the summit of the tree was surmounted by a large cross. The whole was raised on a red car, drawn by four red bulls with red harness. Mass was always said before the car started, and Guinefolle tells us, "tout la cérémonie était une imitation de l'arche d'alliance des Israélites."

Le carocium des Milanais était au milieu, entourré de 300 jeunes gens, qui s'étaient unis à la vie à la mort pour le défendre. Il y avait encore pour sa garde un bataillon de la mort, composé de 300 cavaliers.—La Bataille de Légnano, 29 Mai, 1176.

Caroline, queen-consort of George II., introduced by sir W. Scott in The Heart of Midlothian. Jeanie Deans has an interview with her in the gardens at Richmond, and her majesty promises to intercede with the king for Effie Deans's pardon.

Caroline of Brunswick, wife of George IV., was divorced for "infidelity." It was Bergami, her chamberlain, with whom her name was slanderously connected.

Caroline Gann, the heroine of Thackeray's Shabby Genteel Story (1857), continued in 1860 in The Adventures of Philip. Caroline Gann was meant to be a model "Job," deserted by a wicked husband, oppressed by wrongs, yet patient withal and virtuous.

Caros or Carausius, a Roman captain, native of Belgic Gaul. The emperor Maximian employed Caros to defend the coast of Gaul against the Franks and Saxons. He acquired great wealth and power, but fearing to excite the jealousy of Maximian, he sailed for Britain, where (in A.D. 287) he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor. Caros resisted all attempts of the Romans to dislodge him, so that they ultimately acknowledged his independence. He repaired Agricola's wall to obstruct the incursions of the Caledonians, and while he was employed on this work was attacked by a party commanded by Oscar, son of Ossian and grandson of Fingal. "The warriors of Caros fled, and Oscar remained like a rock left by the ebbing sea."—Ossian: The War of Caros.

The Caros mentioned . . . is the . . . noted usurper Carausius, who assumed the purple in the year 287, and seizing on Britain, defeated the emperor Maximinian Herculius in several naval engagements, which give propriety to his being called "The King of Ships."—Dissertation on the Era of Ossian.

Car'ove (3 syl.), "a story without an end."—Mrs. Austin: Translation.

I must get on, or my readers will anticipate that my story, like Carové's more celebrated one, will prove a "story without an end."—Thoms: Notes and Queries, March 24, 1877.

Carpath'ian Wizard (The), Proteus (2 syl.), who lived in the island of Car'pathos, in the Archipelago. He was a wizard, who could change his form at will. Being the sea-god's shepherd, he carried a crook.

[By] the Carpathian wizard's hook [crook].
Milton: Comus, 872 (1634).

Carpet (Prince Housain's), a magic carpet, to all appearances quite worthless, but it would transport any one who sat on it to any part of the world in a moment. This carpet is sometimes called "the magic carpet of Tangu," because it came from Tangu, in Persia.—Arabian Nights ("Prince Ahmed").

Solomon's Carpet. Solomon had a green silk carpet, on which his throne was set. This carpet was large enough for all his court to stand on; human beings stood on the right side of the throne, and spirits on the left. When Solomon wished to travel he told the wind where to set him down, and the carpet with all its contents rose into the air and alighted at the proper place. In hot weather the birds of the air, with outspread wings, formed a canopy over the whole party.—Sale: Al Korân, xxvii. notes.

Carpet Knight (A), a civil, not a military knight.

Carpet knights are men who are, by the prince's grace and favour, made knights at home, and in the time of peace, by the imposition or laying on of the king's sword, having, by some special service done to the commonwealth, deserved this title and dignity. They are called "Carpet Knights" because they receive their honour in the court, and upon carpets [and not in the battle-field].—Markham: Booke of Honour (1625).

Carpil'lona (Princess), the daughter of Subli'mus king of the Peaceable Islands. Sublimus, being dethroned by a usurper, was with his wife, child, and a foundling boy, thrown into a dungeon, and kept there for three years. The four captives then contrived to escape; but the rope that held the basket in which Carpillona was let down, snapped asunder, and she fell into the lake. Sublimus and the other two lived in retirement as a shepherd family, and Carpillona, being rescued by a fisherman, was brought up by him as his daughter. When the "Humpbacked" Prince dethroned the usurper of the Peaceable Islands, Carpillona was one of the captives, and the "Humpbacked" Prince wanted to make her his wife; but she fled in disguise, and came to the cottage home of Sublimus, where she fell in love with his foster-son, who proved to be half-brother of the "Humpbacked" Prince. Ultimately, Carpillona married the foundling, and each succeeded to a kingdom.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Princess Carpillona," 1682).

Car'pio (Bernardo del), natural son of don Sancho, and doña Ximena, surnamed "The Chaste." It was Bernardo del Carpio who slew Roland at Roncesvallês (4 syl.). In Spanish romance he is a very conspicuous figure.

Carras'co (Samson), son of Bartholomew Carrasco. He is a licentiate, of much natural humour, who flatters don Quixote, and persuades him to undertake a second tour.

He was about 24 years of age, of a pale complexion, and had good talents. His nose was remarkably flat, and his mouth remarkably wide.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. i. 3 (1615).

He may perhaps boast . . . as the bachelor Samson Carrasco, of fixing the weather-cock La Giralda of Seville, for weeks, months, or years, that is, for as long as the wind shall uniformly blow from one quarter.—Sir W. Scott.

(The allusion is to Don Quixote, II. i. 14.)

Carric-Thura, in the Orkney Islands, the palace of king Cathulla. It is the title of one of the Ossian poems, the subject being as follows:—Fingal, going on a visit to Cathulla king of the Orkneys, observes a signal of distress on the palace, for Frothal (king of Sora) had invested it. Whereupon Fingal puts to flight the besieging army, and overthrew Frothal in single combat; but just as his sword was raised to slay the fallen king, Utha, disguised in armour, interposed. Her shield and helmet "flying wide," revealed her sex, and Fingal not only spared Frothal, but invited him and Utha to the palace, where they passed the night in banquet and in song.—Ossian: Carric-Thura.

Carril, the grey-headed son of Kinfe'na bard of Cuthullin, general of the Irish tribes.—Ossian: Fingal.

Carrillo (Fray) was never to be found in his own cell, according to a famous Spanish epigram.

Like Fray Carillo,
The only place in which one cannot find him
Is his own cell.
Longfellow: The Spanish Student, i. 5.

Car'rol, deputy usher at Kenilworth Castle.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Carroll (Lewis), the pseudonym of the Rev. C. E. Dodgson (1833-), attached to Alice in Wonderland, Through the Looking-glass, Hunting the Snark, etc. (q.v.).

Car'stone (Richard), cousin of Ada Clare, both being wards in chancery, interested in the great suit of "Jarndyce v. Jarndyce." Richard Carstone is a "handsome youth, about 19, of ingenuous face, and with a most engaging laugh." He marries his cousin Ada, and lives in hope that the suit will soon terminate and make him rich. In the mean time, he tries to make two ends meet, first by the profession of medicine, then by that of law, then by the army; but the rolling stone gathers no moss, and the poor fellow dies with the sickness of hope deferred.—C. Dickens: Bleak House (1853).

Cartaph'ilus. (See WANDERING JEW.)

The story of Cartaphilus is taken from the Book of the Chronicles of the Abbey of St. Albans, which was copied and continued by Matthew Paris, and contains the earliest account of the Wandering Jew. A.D. 1228. In 1242 Philip Mouskes, afterwards bishop of Tournay, wrote the "rhymed chronicle."

Carter (Mrs. Deborah), housekeeper to Surplus the lawyer.—Morton: A Regular Fix.

Car'thage (2 syl.). When Dido came to Africa she bought of the natives "as much land as could be encompassed with a bull's hide." The agreement being made, Dido cut the hide into thongs, so as to enclose a space sufficiently large for a citadel, which she called Bursa, "the hide." (Greek, boursa, "a bull's hide.")

¶ The following is a similar story in Russian history:—The Yakutsks granted to the Russian explorers as much land as they could encompass with a cow's hide; but the Russians, cutting the hide into strips, obtained land enough for the town and fort which they called Yakutsk.

¶ A similar legend is connected with Doncaster, under the supposition that Don = "thong," and that Don-caster = "Thong-city." Of course it is the city on the river Don. It was the Dona Castre of the Anglo-Saxons, and the Danum of the Romans.

Carthage of the North. Lübeck was so called when it was the head of the Hanseatic League.

Car'thon, son of Cless'ammor and Moina, born while Clessammor was in flight; his mother died in childbirth. When he was three years old, Comhal (Fingal's father) took and burnt Balclutha (a town belonging to the Britons, on the Clyde), but Carthon was carried away safely by his nurse. When grown to man's estate, Carthon resolved to revenge this attack on Balclutha, and accordingly invaded Morven, the kingdom of Fingal. After overthrowing two of Fingal's heroes, Carthon was slain by his own father, who knew him not; but when Clessammor learnt that it was his own son whom he had slain, he mourned for him three days, and on the fourth he died.—Ossian: Carthon.

Car'ton (Sydney), a friend of Charles Darnay, whom he personally resembled. Sydney Carton loved Lucie Manette, but, knowing of her attachment to Darnay, never attempted to win her. Her friendship, however, called out his good qualities, and he nobly died instead of his friend.—C. Dickens: A Tale of Two Cities (1859).

Cartouche, an eighteenth-century highwayman. He is the French Dick Turpin.

Car'un, a small river of Scotland, now called Carron, in the neighbourhood of Agricola's wall. The word means "winding."

Ca'rus (Slow), in Garth's Dispensary, is Dr. Tyson (1649–1708).

Carvel (Hans), a tale in a verse by Prior (1664–1721).

Caryati'des (5 syl.) or Carya'tes (4 syl.), female figures in Greek costume, used in architecture to support entablatures. Ca'rya, in Arcadia, sided with the Persians when they invaded Greece; so after the battle of Thermop'ylæ, the victorious Greeks destroyed the city, slew the men, and made the women slaves. Praxit'elês, to perpetuate the disgrace, employed figures of Caryan women with Persian men, for architectural columns.

Casabianca. A boy set by his father on watch. The ship caught fire, and his father was burnt to death. As the flames spread, the boy called to his father, but the ship blew up, and the boy was killed. —Mrs. Hemans: A Poem (1794–1835).

Casaubon (Mr.), the scholar who marries the heroine in George Eliot's novel of Middlemarch (1872).

Casa Wappy, an elegy by D. M. Moir, on the death of his infant son, called by the pet name of "Casa Wappy."

Casca, a blunt, violent conspirator, in the faction of Brutus. When Cæsar was slain, Antony said, "See what a rent the envious Casca made!"—Shakespeare: Julius Cæsar (1607).

Casch'casch, a hideous genius, "hunchbacked, lame, and blind of one eye; with six horns on his head, and both his hands and feet hooked." The fairy Maimou'nê (3 syl.) summoned him to decide which was the more beautiful, "the prince Camaral'zaman or the princess Badou'ra," but he was unable to determine the knotty point.—Arabian Nights ("Camaralzaman and Badoura").

Case is Altered (The), a comedy by Ben Jonson (1597).

Casel'la, a musician and friend of the poet Dantê, introduced in his Purgatory, ii. On arriving at purgatory, the poet sees a vessel freighted with souls come to be purged of their sins and made fit for paradise; among them he recognizes his friend Casella, whom he "woos to sing;" whereupon Casella repeats with enchanting sweetness the words of [Dantê's] second canzone.

> Dantê shall give Fame leave to set thee higher
> Than his Casella, whom he wooed to sing,
> Met in the milder shades of purgatory.
> Milton: Sonnet, xiii. (To H. Lawes).

Caser Wine, forbidden fruit. The reference is to the ancient Jews after their conquest by the Romans.

> A Jew might be seen to drink Caser wine, and heard to ask a blessing in his cup.—Hepworth Dixon: The Two Queens, chap. iv.

Cashmere (2 syl.), a Polish emigrant in The Rovers, a parody by Canning on Schiller's Robbers.

Casket Homer, Alexander's edition with Aristotle's notes. So called because it was kept in a golden casket, studded with jewels, part of the spoil which fell into the hands of Alexander after the battle of Arbe'la.

Cas'par, master of the horse to the baron of Arnheim. Mentioned in Donnerhugel's narrative.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Cas'par, a man who sold himself to Za'miel the Black Huntsman. The night before the expiration of his life-lease, he bargained for a respite of three years, on condition of bringing Max into the power of the fiend. On the day appointed for the prize-shooting, Max aimed at a dove but killed Caspar, and Zamiel carried off his victim to "his own place."—Weber's opera, Der Freischütz (1822).

Cassan'dra, daughter of Priam, gifted with the power of prophecy; but Apollo, whom she had offended, cursed her with the ban "that no one should ever believe her predictions."—Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida (1602).

> Mrs. Barry in characters of greatness was graceful, noble, and dignified; no violence of passion was beyond the reach of her feeling, and in the most melting distress and tenderness she was exquisitely affecting. Thus she was equally admirable in "Cassandra," "Cleopatra," "Roxana," "Monimia," or "Belvidera."—Dibdin: History of the Stage.

("Cassandra" (Troilus and Cressida, Shakespeare); "Cleopatra" (Antony and Cleopatra, Shakespeare, or All for Love, Dryden); "Roxana" (Alexander the Great, Lee); "Monimia" (The Orphan, Otway); "Belvidera" (Venice Preserved, by Otway).)

Cassel (Count), an empty-headed, heartless, conceited puppy, who pays court to Amelia Wildenhaim, but is too insufferable to be endured. He tells her he "learnt delicacy in Italy, hauteur in Spain, enterprise in France, prudence in Russia, sincerity in England, and love in the wilds of America," for civilized nations have long since substituted intrigue for love.—Mrs. Inchbald: Lovers' Vows (1800), altered from Kotzebue.

Cassi, the inhabitants of Hertfordshire or Cassio.—Cæsar: Commentaries.

Cassib'ellaun or Cassib'elan (probably "Caswallon"), brother and successor of Lud. He was king of Britain when Julius Cæsar invaded the island. Geoffrey of Monmouth says, in his British History, that Cassibellaun routed Cæsar, and drove him back to Gaul (bk. iv. 3, 5). In Cæsar's second invasion the British again vanquished him (ch. 7), and "sacrificed to their gods as a thank-offering, 40,000 cows, 100,000 sheep, 30,000 wild beasts, and fowls without number" (ch. 8). Androg'eus (4 syl.) "duke of Trinovantum," with 5000 men, having joined the Roman forces, Cassibellaun was worsted, and agreed "to pay 3000 pounds of silver yearly in tribute to Rome." Seven years after this Cassibellaun died and was buried at York.

(In Shakespeare's Cymbeline the name is called "Cassibelan.")

N.B.—Polyænus of Macedon tells us that Cæsar had a huge elephant armed with scales of iron, with a tower on its back, filled with archers and slingers. When this beast entered the sea, Cassivelaunus and the Britons, who had never seen an elephant, were terrified, and their horses fled in affright, so that the Romans were able to land without molestation.—See Drayton's Polyolbion, viii.

> There the hive of Roman liars worship a gluttonous emperor-idiot.
> Such is Rome . . . hear it, spirit of Cassivelaun.
> Tennyson: Boadicea.

Cas'silane (3 syl.), general of Candy and father of Annophel.—Beaumont and Fletcher: Laws of Candy (printed 1647).

Cassim, brother of Ali Baba, a Persian. He married an heiress and soon became one of the richest merchants of the place. When he discovered that his brother had made himself rich by hoards from the robbers' cave, Cassim took ten mules charged with panniers to carry away part of the same booty. "Open, Sesamé!" he cried, and the door opened. He filled his sacks, but forgot the magic word. "Open Barley!" he cried, but the door remained closed. Presently the robber-band returned, and cut him down with their sabres. They then hacked the carcase into four parts, placed them near the door, and left the cave. Ali Baba carried off the body and had it decently interred.—Arabian Nights ("Ali Baba, or the Forty Thieves").

Cas'sio (Michael), a Florentine, lieutenant in the Venetian army under the command of Othello. Simple-minded but not strong-minded, and therefore easily led by others who possessed greater power of will. Being overcome with wine, he engaged in a street-brawl, for which he was suspended by Othello, but Desdemona pleaded for his restoration. Iago made capital of this intercession to rouse the jealousy of the Moor. Cassio's "almost" wife was Bianca, his mistress. —Shakespeare: Othello (1611).

> "Cassio" is brave, benevolent, and honest, ruined only by his want of stubbornness to resist an insidious invitation.—Dr. Johnson.

Cassiodo'rus (Marcus Aurèlius), a great statesman and learned writer of the sixth century, who died at the age of 100, in A.D. 562. He filled many high offices under Theod'oric, but ended his days in a convent.

> Listen awhile to a learned prelection
> On Marcus Aurelius Cassiodorus.
> Longfellow: The Golden Legend.

Cassiope'ia, wife of Ce'pheus (2 syl.) king of Ethiopia, and mother of Androm'eda. She boasted that her beauty surpassed that of the sea-nymphs; and Neptune, to punish her, sent a huge sea-serpent to ravage her husband's kingdom. At death she was made a constellation, consisting of thirteen stars, the largest of which form a "chair" or imperfect W.

> . . . that starred Ethiop queen, that strove
> To set her beauty's praise above
> The sea-nymphs, and their powers offended.
> Milton: Il Penseroso, 19 (1638).

Cassius, instigator of the conspiracy against Julius Cæsar, and friend of Brutus.—Shakespeare: Julius Cæsar (1607).

Brutus. The last of all the Romans, fare thee well!
It is impossible that ever Rome
Should breed thy fellow. Friends, I owe more tears
To this dead man than you shall see me pay.
I shall find time, Cassius, I shall find time.
Act v. sc. 3.

Charles Mayne Young trod the boards with freedom. His countenance was equally well adapted for the expression of pathos or of pride: thus in such parts as "Hamlet," "Beverley," "The Stranger," "Pierre," "Zanga," and "Cassius," he looked the man he represented.—Rev. J. Young: Life of C. M. Young.

("Hamlet" (Shakespeare); "Beverley" (The Gamester, Moore); "The Stranger" (B. Thompson); "Pierre" (Venice Preserved, Otway), "Zanga" Revenge, by Young).)

Castagnette (Captain), a hero whose stomach was replaced by a leather one made by Desgenettes [Da'-ge-net'], but his career was soon ended by a bomb-shell, which blew him into atoms.—Manuel: A French Extravaganza.

Casta'lio, son of lord Acasto, and Polydore's twin-brother. Both the brothers loved their father's ward, Monim'ia "the orphan." The love of Polydore was dishonourable love, but Castalio loved her truly and married her in private. On the bridal night Polydore by treachery took his brother's place, and next day, when Monimia discovered the deceit which had been practised on her, and Polydore heard that Monimia was really married to his brother, the bride poisoned herself, the adulterer ran upon his brother's sword, and the husband stabbed himself.—Otway: The Orphan (1680).

Mr. Wilks's excellence in comedy was never once disputed, but the best judges extol him for different parts in tragedy, as "Hamlet," "Castalio," "Edgar," "Moneses," "Jaffier."—Cherwood.

("Hamlet" (Shakespeare); "Edgar" (King Lear, Shakespeare); "Moneses" (Tamerlane, Rowe); "Jaffier" (Venice Preserved, by Otway).)

Cas'taly, a fountain of Parnassos, sacred to the Muses. Its waters had the virtue of inspiring those who drank thereof with the gift of poetry.

Casta'ra, the lady addressed by Wm. Habington in his poems. She was Lucy Herbert (daughter of Wm. Herbert, first lord Powis), and became his wife. (Latin, casta, "chaste.")

If thee, Castara, I in heaven nor move,
Nor earth, nor hell, where am I but in love?
W. Habington: To Castara (died 1654).

The poetry of Habington shows that he possessed . . . a real passion for a lady of birth and virtue, the "Castara," whom he afterwards married.—Hallam.

Castle Dangerous, a novel by sir W. Scott, after the wreck of his fortune and repeated strokes of paralysis (1831). Those who read it must remember they are the last notes of a dying swan, and forbear to scan its merits too strictly.

Castle Dangerous, or "The Perilous Castle of Douglas." So called because it was thrice taken from the English between 1306 and 1307.

1. On Palm Sunday, while the English soldiers were at church, Douglas fell on them and slew them; then, entering the castle, he put to the sword all he found there, and set fire to the castle (March 19).

2. The castle being restored was placed under the guard of Thirwall, but Douglas disguised his soldiers as drovers, and Thirwall resolved to "pillage the rogues." He set upon them to drive off the herds, but the "drovers," being too strong for the attacking party, overpowered them, and again Douglas made himself master of the castle.

3. Sir John de Walton next volunteered to hold the castle for a year and a day, but Douglas disguised his soldiers as market-men carrying corn and grass to Lanark. Sir John, in an attempt to plunder the men, set upon them, but was overmastered and slain. This is the subject of sir W. Scott's novel called Castle Dangerous, but instead of the market-men "with corn and grass," the novel substitutes lady Augusta, the prisoner of Black Douglas, whom he promises to release if the castle is surrendered to him. De Walton consents, gives up the castle, and marries the lady Augusta.

Castle Perilous, the habitation of lady Lionês (called by Tennyson Lyonors). Here she was held captive by sir Ironside the Red Knight of the Red Lands. Sir Gareth overcame the knight, and married the lady.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 120–153.

∴ Tennyson has poetised the tale in Gareth and Lynette, but has altered it. He has even departed from the old story by making sir Gareth marry Lynette, and leaving the lady Lyonors in the cold. In the old story Gareth marries Lionês (or Lyonors), and his brother Ga'heris marries Linet (or Lynette).

Tennyson has quite missed the scope of the Arthurian allegory, which is a Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. Lynette represents the people of this world or the inhabitants of the "City of Destruction." "Lionês" represents the "bride," which says to the Christian, "Come!" and is the bride in heaven of those who fight the fight of faith. "Castle Perilous" is the Celestial City, set on a hill. Lynette scoffs at Gareth after every conquest, for "the carnal mind is enmity against God;" but Gareth "fights the fight," and wins the bride. Tennyson makes the Christian leave the City of Destruction, conquer Apollyon and all the giants, stand in sight of the Celestial City, see the bride inviting him to heaven, and then marry Lynette or the personification of the "world, the flesh, and the devil."—See Notes and Queries (January 19, February 16, March 16, 1878).

Castle Rackrent, an Irish story by Maria Edgeworth, to illustrate the evils of absenteeism, etc. (1799).

Castle Spectre (The), a drama full of horrors, by M. G. Lewis (author of The Monk, 1797.)

Castle in the Air or Château d'Espagne, a splendid thing of fancy or hope, but wholly without any real existence, called a "castle of Spain," because Spain has no castles or châteaux. So Greek Kalends means "never," because there were no such things as "Greek Kalends."

Ne semez point vos désirs sur le jardin d'autruy; cultivez seulment bien le vostre; ne désirez point de n'estre pas ce que vous estes, mais désirez d'estre fort bien ce que vous estes. . . . De quoy sert-il de bastir des chasteaux en Espagne, quisqu'il nous faut habiter en France.—St. François de Sales (bishop of Geneva), Writing to a Lady on the subject of "Contentment," l. 285 (1567).

Castle of Andalusia, an opera by John O'Keefe. Don Cæsar, the son of don Scipio, being ill-treated by his father, turns robber-chief, but ultimately marries Lorenza, and becomes reconciled to his father.

(The plot is too complicated to be understood in a few lines. Don Cæsar, Spado, Lorenza, Victoria, Pedrillo, and Fernando, all assume characters different to their real ones.)

Castle of Athlin and Dunbayne (The), by Mrs. Radcliffe (1789).

Castle of In'dolence (3 syl.), in the land of Drowsiness, where every sense is enervated by sensual pleasures. The owner of the castle is an enchanter, who deprives those who enter it of their physical energy and freedom of will.—Thomson: Castle of Indolence (1748).

Castle of Maidens, Edinburgh.

[Ebrauucus] also built the . . . town of mount Agned [Edinburgh], called at this time "the Castle of Maidens or the Mountain of Sorrow."—Geoffrey: British History, ii. 7 (1149).

Castle of Otranto (The), a tale in prose by Walpole (1765).

Cas'tlewood (Beatrix), the heroine of Esmond, a novel by Thackeray, the "finest picture of splendid lustrous physical beauty ever given to the world." Lady Rachel Castlewood, mother of Beatrix. She is described as "very sweet and pure, without ceasing to be human and fallible." Lady Rachel marries Harry Esmond.

Cas'tor, of classic fable, is the son of Jupiter and Leda, and twin-brother of Pollux. The brothers were so attached to each other that Jupiter set them among the stars, where they form the constellation Gemini ("the twins"). Castor and Pollux are called the Dios'curi or "sons of Dios," i.e. Jove.

Cas'tor (Steph'anos), the wrestler.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Cas'triot (George), called by the Turks "Scanderbeg" (1404 - 1467). George Castriot was son of an Albanian prince, delivered as a hostage to Amurath II. He won such favour from the sultan that he was put in command of 5000 men, but abandoned the Turks in the battle of Mora'va (1443).

This is the first dark blot
On thy name, George Castriot.
Longfellow: The Wayside Inn (an interlude).

Castruc'cio Castraca'ni's Sword. When Victor Emmanuel II. went to Tuscany, the path from Lucca to Pistoia was strewed with roses. At Pistoia the orphan heirs of Pucci'ni met him, bearing a sword, and said, "This is the sword of Castruccio Castracani, the great Italian soldier, and head of the Ghibelines in the fourteenth century. It was committed to our ward and keeping till some patriot should arise to deliver Italy and make it free." Victor Emmanuel, seizing the hilt, exclaimed, "Questa è per me!" ("This is for me.")—Mrs. Browning: The Sword of Castruccio Castracani.

Cas'yapa (3 syl.), father of the immortals, who dwells in the mountain called Hemacû'ta or Himakoot, under the Tree of Life.—Southey: Curse of Kehama (canto vi. is called "Casyapa," 1809).

Cat (The) has been from time immemorial the familiar of witches; thus Galinthia was changed by the Fates into a cat (Antoninus Liberalis, Metam. 29). Hecate also, when Typhon compelled the gods and goddesses to hide themselves in animals, assumed the form of a cat (Pausanias, Baotics). Ovid says, "Pelo soror Phœbi latuit."

The cat i' the adage: that is, Catus amat pisces, sed non vult tingere plantas

("The cat loves fish, but does not like to wet her paws").

Letting I dare not wait upon I would,
Like the poor cat i' the adage.
Shakespeare: Macbeth, act I sc. 7 (1606).

Not room to swing a cat; reference is to the sport of swinging a cat to the branch of a tree as a mark to be shot at. Shakespeare refers to another variety of the sport; the cat being enclosed in a leather bottle, was suspended to a tree and shot at. "Hang me in a bottle, like a cat" (Much Ado about Nothing, act i. sc. 1); and Steevers tells us of a third variety in which the "cat was placed in a soot-bag, hung on a line, and the players had to beat out the bottom of the bag." He who succeeded in thus liberating the cat, had the "privilege" of hunting it afterwards.

Kilkenny Cats. A favourite amusement of the "good old times" with a certain regiment quartered at Kilkenny, was to tie two cats together by the tails, swing them over a line, and watch their ferocious attacks upon each other in their struggles to get free. It was determined to put down this cruel "sport;" and one day, just as two unfortunate cats were swung, the alarm was given that the colonel was riding up post haste. An officer present cut through their tails with his sword and liberated the cats, which scampered off before the colonel arrived.—From a correspondent, signed, R. G. Glenn (4, Rowden Buildings, Temple).

N.B.—Hogarth has a picture of the Kilkenny cats in his Four Stages of Cruelty.

The Kilkenny Cats. The story is that two cats fought in a saw-pit so ferociously that each swallowed the other, leaving only the tails behind to tell of the wonderful encounter. [See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, for several other references to cats, pp. 223, 224.]

Catai'an (3 syl.), a native of Catai'a or Cathay, the ancient name of China; a boaster, a liar. Page, speaking of Falstaff, says—

I will not believe such a Cataian, though the priest of the town commended him for a true man [i.e. truthful man].—Merry Wives of Windsor, act ii. sc. 1 (1602).

Catenola'ni, called Catieuchla'ni by Ptolemy, and Cassii by Richard of Cirencester. They occupied Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, and Hertfordshire. Drayton refers to them in his Polyolbion, xvi.

Catgut (Dr.), a caricature of Dr. Arne in The Commissary, by Sam. Foote (1765).

Catharick (Anne), "the Woman in White," in Wilkie Collins's novel (1860).

Cath'arine, queen-consort of Charles II.; introduced by sir W. Scott in Peveril of the Peak. (See CATHERINE, and also under the letter K.)

Catharine (St.) of Alexandria (fourth century), patron saint of girls and virgins generally. Her real name was Dorothea; but St. Jerome says she was called Catharine from the Syriac word Kethar or Kathar, "a crown," because she won the triple crown of martyrdom, virginity, and wisdom. She was fastened to a wheel, but was beheaded November 25, which is her fête day.

To braid St. Catharine's hair means "to live a virgin."

Thou art too fair to be left to braid St. Catharine's tresses.
Longfellow: Evangeline (1848).

Cathay', China or rather Tartary, a corruption of the Tartar word Khitai', "the country of the Khitai'ans or Khitans.' The capital was Albracca, according to Ariosto (Orlando Furioso).

. . . the ship
From Ceylon, Ind, or fair Cathay unloads.
Byron: Don Juan, xii. 9 (1821).

Cath'ba, son of Torman, beloved by Morna, daughter of Cormac king of Ireland. He was killed out of jealousy by Duchô'mar, and when Duchômar told Morna and asked her to marry him, she replied, "Thou art dark to me, Duchômar; cruel is thine arm to Morna. Give me that sword, my foe;" and when he gave it, she "pierced his manly breast," and he died.

Cathba, young son of Torman, thou art of the love of Morna. Thou art a sunbeam in the day of the gloomy storm.—Ossian: Fingal, i.

CATHERINE, wife of Mathis, in The Polish Jew, by J. R. Ware.

Catherine [HAYES], by Ikey Solomon (a pseudonym of Thackeray), 1839–1840. The object of the novel was to discountenance the popular fictions of highwaymen, freebooters, pirates, and burglars.

. Catherine Hayes was burnt to death at Tyburn, in 1720, for the murder of her husband.

Catherine (The countess), usually called "The Countess," falls in love with Huon, a serf, her secretary and tutor. Her pride revolts at the match, but her love is masterful. When the duke her father is told of it, he insists on Huon's marrying Catherine, a freed serf, on pain of death. Huon refuses to do so till the countess herself entreats him to comply. He then rushes to the wars, where he greatly distinguishes himself, is created prince, and learns that his bride is not Catherine the quondam serf, but Catherine the duke's daughter.—Knowles: Love (1840).

Cath'erine of Newport, the wife of Julian Avenel (2 syl.).—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth). (See CATHARINE, and under K.)

Cath'leen, one of the attendants on Flora M'Ivor.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Cath'lin of Clu'tha, daughter of Cathmol. Duth-Carmor of Cluba had slain Cathmol in battle, and carried off Cathlin by force, but she contrived to make her escape and craved aid of Fingal. Ossian and Oscar were selected to espouse her cause, and when they reached Rathcol (where Duth-Carmor lived), Ossian resigned the command of the battle to his son Oscar. Oscar and Duth-Carmor met in combat, and the latter fell. The victor carried the mail and helmet of Duth-Carmor to Cathlin, and Cathlin said, "Take the mail and place it high in Selma's hall, that you may remember the helpless in a distant land."—Ossian: Cathlin of Clutha.

Cath-Lo'da. The tale is this: Fingal in his youth, making a voyage to the Orkneys, was driven by stress of weather to Denmark. The king Starno invited him to a feast, but Fingal, in distrust, declined the invitation. Starno then proposed to his son Swaran to surprise Fingal in his sleep; but Swaran replied, "I shall not slay in shades. I move forth in light;" and Starno himself resolved to attack the sleeper. He came to the place where Fingal lay, but Fingal, hearing the step, started up and succeeded in binding Starno to an oak. At daybreak he discovered it to be the king, and loosing him from his bonds he said, "I have spared thy life for the sake of thy daughter, who once warned me of an ambuscade."—Ossian: Cath-Loda (in three duans).

Cath'mor, younger brother of Cair'bar ("lord of Atha"), but totally unlike him. Cairbar was treacherous and malignant; Cathmor high-minded and hospitable. Cairbar murdered Cormac king of Ireland, and having inveigled Oscar, (son of Ossian) to a feast, vamped up a quarrel, in which both fell. Cathmor scorned such treachery. Cathmor is the second hero of the poem called Tem'ora, and falls by the hand of Fingal (bk. viii.).

Cathmor, the friend of strangers, the brother of red-haired Caibar. Their souls were not the same. The light of heaven was in the bosom of Cathmor. His towers rose on the banks of Atha; seven paths led to his halls; seven chiefs stood on the paths and called strangers to the feast. But Cathmor dwelt in the wood, to shun the voice of praise.—Ossian: Temora, I.

Catholic (The).

Alfonso I. of Asturias, called by Gregory III. His Catholic Majesty (693, 739-757).

Ferdinand II. of Ar'agon, husband of Isabella. Also called Rusé, "the wily" (1452, 1474-1516).

Isabella wife of Ferdinand II. of Aragon, so called for her zeal in establishing the Inquisition (1450, 1474-1504).

Catholic Majesty [Catholica Magestad], the special title of the kings of Spain. It was first given to king Recared (590) in the third Council of Toledo, for his zeal in rooting out the "Arian heresy."

Cui a Deo æternum meritum nisi vero Catholico Recaredo regi? Cui a Deo æterna corona nisi vero orthodoxo Recaredo regi?—Gregory the Great: Magna Moralia, 127 and 128.

But it was not then settled as a fixed title to the kings of Spain. In 1500 Alexander VI. gave the title to Ferdinand V. king of Aragon and Castile, and from that time it became annexed to the Spanish crown.

Ab Alexandro pontifice Ferdinandus "Catholici" cognomentum accepit in posteros cum regno transfusum stabili possessione. Honorum titulos principibus dividere pontificibus Romanis datur.—Mariana: De Rebus Hesp., xxvi. 12; see also vii. 4.

Ca'thos, cousin of Madelon, brought up by her uncle Gor'gibus, a plain citizen in the middle rank of life. These two silly girls have had their heads turned by novels, and thinking their names commonplace, Cathos calls herself Aminta, and her cousin adopts the name of Polix'ena. Two gentlemen wish to marry them, but the girls consider their manners too unaffected and easy to be "good style," so the gentlemen send their valets to represent the "marquis of Mascarille" and the "viscount of Jodelet." The girls are delighted with these "distinguished noblemen;" but when the game has gone far enough, the masters enter, and lay bare the trick. The girls are taught a useful lesson, without being involved in any fatal ill consequences.—Molière: Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659).

Cathul'la, king of Inistore (the Orkneys) and brother of Coma'la (q.v.). Fingal, on coming in sight of the palace, observed a beacon-flame on its top as signal of distress, for Frothal king of Sora had besieged it. Fingal attacked Frothal, engaged him in single combat, defeated him, and made him prisoner.—Ossian: Carrick-Thura.

Cat'iline (3 syl.), a Roman patrician, who headed a conspiracy to overthrow the Government, and obtain for himself and his followers all places of power and trust. The conspiracy was discovered by Cicero. Catiline escaped and put himself at the head of his army, but fell in battle after fighting with desperate daring (B.C. 62). Voltaire, in his Rome Sauvée, has introduced the conspiracy and death of Catiline (1752).

 Cicero has four orations In Catilinam.

Catilines and Cethegi (The), a synonym for conspirators who hope to mend their fortunes by rebellion.

The intrigues of a few impoverished Catilines and Cethegi.—Motley: The Dutch Republic.

Catiline's Conspiracy, a long tedious tragedy by Ben Jonson (1611). Full of wearisome speeches.

 Gosson wrote a tragedy with the same title in the sixteenth century. Croly, in 1822, wrote a tragedy called Catiline.

Catius, in Pope's Moral Essays (Epistle 1), is meant for Charles Dartineuf, called by Warburton "a glutton." Hence the lines—

He prefers, no doubt,
A rogue with venison to a rogue without.
Pope.

Ca'to, the hero and title of a tragedy by J. Addison (1713). Disgusted with Cæsar, Cato retired to U'tica (in Africa), where he had a small republic and mimic senate; but Cæsar resolved to reduce Utica as he had done the rest of Africa; and Cato, finding resistance hopeless, fell on his own sword.

Tho' stern and awful to the foes of Rome,
He is all goodness, Lucia, always mild,
Compassionate, and gentle to his friends;
Filled with domestic tenderness.
Act v. 2.

When Barton Booth [1713] first appeared as "Cato," Bolingbroke called him into his box and gave him fifty guineas for defending the cause of liberty so well against a perpetual dictator.—Life of Addison.

 In his De Senectute, Cicero introduces Cato as the chief speaker.

He is a Cato, a man of simple habits, severe morals, strict justice, and blunt speech,—but of undoubted integrity and patriotism; like the Roman censor of that name, grandfather of the Cato of Utica, who resembled him in character and manners.

Cato and Hortens'ius. Cato of Utica's second wife was Martia daughter of Philip. He allowed her to live with his friend Hortensius, and after the death of Hortensius took her back again.

[Sultans] don't agree at all with the wise Roman,
Heroic, stoic Cato, the sententious,
Who lent his lady to his friend Hortensius.
Byron: Don Juan, vi. 7 (1821).

Catul'lus. Lord Byron calls Thomas Moore the "British Catullus," referring to a volume of amatory poems published in 1808, under the pseudonym of "Thomas Little."

'Tis little! Young Catullus of his day,
As sweet, but as immoral in his lay.
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

The Oriental Catullus, Saadi or Sadi, a Persian poet. He married a rich merchant's daughter, but the marriage was an unhappy one. His chief works are The Gulistan (or "garden of roses"), and The Bostan (or "garden of fruits"), (1176–1291).

Cau'dine Forks, a narrow pass in the mountains near Capua, now called "the Valley of Arpaia." Here a Roman army under the consuls T. Vetu'rius Calvi'nus and Sp. Postu'mius fell into the hands of the Sam'nites (2 syl.), and were made to "pass under the yoke."

Cau'dle (Mrs. Margaret), a curtain lecturer, who between eleven o'clock at night and seven the next morning, delivered for thirty years a curtain lecture to her husband Job Caudle, generally a most gentle listener; if he replied, she pronounced him insufferably rude, and if he did not, he was insufferably sulky.—Douglas Jerrold: Punch ("The Caudle Papers").

Cau'line (Sir), a knight who served the wine to the king of Ireland. He fell in love with Christabelle (3 syl.), the king's daughter, and she became his troth-plight wife, without her father's knowledge. When the king knew of it, he banished sir Cauline (2 syl.). After a time the soldain asked the lady in marriage, but sir Cauline challenged his rival and slew him. He himself, however, died of the wounds he had received, and the lady Christabelle, out of grief, "burst her gentle hearte in twayne."—Percy: Reliques, I. i. 4.

Cau'rus, the stormy west-north-west wind; called in Greek, Argestês.

The ground by piercing Caurus seared.
Thomson: Castle of Indolence, ii. (1748).

Caustic, of the Despatch newspaper, was the signature of Mr. Serle.

Christopher Caustic, the pseudonym of Thomas 'Green Fessenden, author of Terrible Tractoration, a Hudibrastic poem (1771–1837).

Caustic (Colonel), a fine gentleman of the last century, very severe on the degeneracy of the present race.—Henry Mackenzie, in The Lounger.

Ca'va, or Florida, daughter of St. Julian. It was the violation of Cava by Roderick that brought about the war between the Goths and the Moors, in which Roderick was slain (A.D. 711).

Cavalier (The), Eon de Beaumont, called by the French Le Chevalier d'Eon (1728–1810). Charles Breydel, the Flemish landscape painter (1677–1744). Francisco Cairo, the historian, called El Chevaliere del Cairo (1598–1674). Jean le Clerc, Le Chevalier (1587–1633). J. Bapt. Marini, the Italian poet, called Il Cavaliere (1569–1625). Andrew Michael Ramsay (1686–1743).

(James Francis Edward Stuart, the "Old Pretender," was styled Le Chevalier de St. George (1688–1765). Charles Edward, the "Young Pretender," was styled The Bonnie Chevalier or The Young Cavalier, 1720–1788.)

Cavalier (The History of a), a tale by Defoe (1723). So true to life that lord Chatham thought it was "a true biography."

Cavalier Serventè, called in Spanish corte'go and in Italian cicisbeo. A young gentleman who plays the gallant to a married woman, escorts her to places of public amusement, calls her coach, hands her to supper, buys her bouquets and opera tickets, etc.

> He may resume his amatory care
> As cavalier servente.
> Byron: Don Juan, iii. 84 (1820).

Cavall', "king Arthur's hound of deepest mouth."—Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("Enid").

Cave of Adul'lam, a cave in which David took refuge when he fled from king Saul; and thither resorted to him "every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented" (1 Sam. xxii. 1, 2). Mr. John Bright called the seceders of the reform party Adull'amites (4 syl.), and said that Lowe and Horsman, like David in the cave of Adullam, gathered together all the discontented, and all that were politically distressed.

Cave of Makkedah, in which the five kings who fought against Joshua hid themselves, but were slain by Joshua.—Josh. x.

Cave of Mammon, the abode of the god of wealth. The money-god first appears as a miser, then becomes a worker of metals, and ultimately the god of all the treasures of the world. All men bow down to his daughter Ambition.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 7 (1590).

Cave of Montesi'nos, about sixty feet in depth, in the heart of La Mancha. So called because Montesinos retired thither when he quitted the French court on account of some insult offered to him. Cervantês visited the cave, and it is now often resorted to by shepherds as a shelter from the cold or rain.

Cav'endish, author of Principles of Whist, and numerous guide-books on games, as Bèzique, Picquet, Écarté, Billiards, etc. Henry Jones, editor of "Pastimes" in The Field and The Queen newspapers (1831–).

Cavendish Square (London), so called from Henrietta Cavendish, wife of Edward second earl of Oxford and Mortimer (built 1718).

Cawther (Al), the lake of paradise, the waters of which are sweet as honey, cold as snow, and clear as crystal. He who once tastes thereof shall never thirst again.—Al Korân, cviii.

> The righteous, having surmounted the difficulties of life, and having passed the sharp bridge [al Sirât], will be refreshed by drinking at the pond of their prophet, the waters of which are supplied from al Cawther. . . . This is the first taste which the blessed will have of their future but near-approaching felicity.—Sale: Al Korân ("The Preliminary Discourse," iv.).

Cax'on (Old Jacob), hairdresser of Jonathan Oldbuck ("the antiquary") of Monkbarns.

Jenny Caxon, a milliner; daughter of Old Jacob.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Caxton (Pisistrătus), the hypothetical author of My Novel (1853); The Caxtons; and the essays called Caxtonia.

Caxton Society (The), (1845–1854), for the publication of the chronicles, etc., of the Middle Ages.

Caxtonia, a series of essays supposed to be written by Pisistratus Caxton, Edward lord Lytton (1863).

Caxtons (The), a domestic novel by Edward lord Lytton (1849). Supposed to be written by Pisistratus Caxton.

Ceca to Mecca (From), from pillar to post. To saunter or ramble from Ceca to Mecca is a Spanish proverb, meaning to roam about purposelessly or idly. Ceca and Mecca are two places visited by Mohammedan pilgrims.

"Let us return home," said Sancho, "nor longer ramble from Ceca to Mecca."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iii. 4 (1605).

Cecil, or The Adventures of a Coxcomb, the hero of a novel so called by Mrs. Gore (1841).

Cecil (Davenant), the pseudonym adopted by Coleridge in his contributions to the Quarterly Magazine.

Cecil's Fast, an Act of Parliament by W. Cecil, lord Burleigh, to enjoin the eating of fish on certain days. The object of this Act was to restore the fish trade, which had been almost ruined by the Reformation. Papists eat fish on fast-days, and at the Reformation, the eating of fish being looked on as a badge of bad faith, no one was willing to lie under the suspicion of being a papist, and no one would buy fish.

Cecilia (St.), the patroness of musicians and "inventor of the organ." The legend says that an angel fell in love with Cecilia for her musical skill, and nightly brought her roses from paradise. Her husband saw the angel-visitant, who gave to both a crown of martyrdom.

Thou seem'st to me like the angel
That brought the immortal roses
To St. Cecilia's bridal chamber.
Longfellow: The Golden Legend.

Ce'dric, a thane of Rotherwood, and surnamed "the Saxon."—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Cel'adon and Ame'lia. (See AMELIA, p. 35.)

(Celadon, like Chloe, Celia, Lesbia, Daphnê, etc., may be employed to signify a lady-love generally.)

Celandine (3 syl.), a shepherd of "various natural gifts," in love with Marina, a neighbouring shepherdess, of enchanting beauty. Finding his "suite was quickly got, as moved," he waxed cold and indifferent.—W. Browne: Britannia's Pastorals (1613).

Cele'no or Celæ'no, chief of the harpies.

There on a craggy stone
Celeno hung, and made his direful moan
(Giles Fletcher.) Christ's Triumph (on Earth) (1610).

Celes'tial City (The). Heaven is so called by John Bunyan, in his Pilgrim's Progress (1678). Pekin, in China, is so called also.

Celes'tial Empire, China, so called because the first emperors were all "celestial deities:" as Puon-Ku ("highest eternity"), Tiĕn-Hoâng ("emperor of heaven"), Ti-Hoâng ("emperor of earth"), Gine-Hoâng ("emperor of men"), etc., embracing a period of 300,000 years previous to To-hi, whose reign is placed B.C. 2953-2838.

CE'LIA, daughter of Frederick the usurping duke, and cousin of Ros'alind daughter of the banished duke. When Rosalind was driven from her uncle's court, Celia determined to go with her to the forest of Arden to seek out the banished duke, and for security sake, Rosalind dressed in boy's clothes and called herself "Gan'imed," while Celia dressed as a peasant-girl and called herself "Aliĕna." When they reached Arden they lodged for a time in a shepherd's hut, and Oliver de Boys was sent to tell them that his brother Orlando was hurt and could not come to the hut as usual. Oliver and Celia fell in love with each other, and their wedding day was fixed. Ganimed resumed the dress of Rosalind, and the two brothers married at the same time.—Shakespeare: As You Like It (1598).

Arden is an hypothetical place.

Ce'lia, a girl of 16, in Whitehead's comedy of The School for Lovers. It was written expressly for Mrs. Cibber, daughter of Dr. Arne.

Mrs. Cibber was at the time more than 50 years old, but the uncommon symmetry and exact proportion in her form, with her singular vivacity, enabled her to represent the character of "Celia" with all the juvenile appearance marked by the author.—Percy: Anecdotes.

Ce'lia, a poetical name for any lady-love: as "Would you know my Celia's charms . . . ?" Not unfrequently Streph'on is the wooer when Celia is the wooed. Thomas Carew calls his "sweet sweeting" Celia; her real name is not known.

Ce'lia (Dame), mother of Faith, Hope, and Charity. She lived in the hospice called Holiness. (Celia is from the Latin, cælum, "heaven.")—Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. 10 (1590).

Cel'idon, the scene of one of Arthur's twelve battles, also called "Celidon-the-Forest," and said to be Tweeddale,

Celyddon was a common term for a British forest. (See CELADON, p. 191.)

Célimène (3 syl.), a coquette courted by Alceste (2 syl.) the "misanthrope" (a really good man, both upright and manly, but blunt in behaviour, rude in speech, and unconventional). Alceste wants Célimène to forsake society and live with him in seclusion; this she refuses to do, and he replies, as you cannot find, "tout en moi, comme moi tout en vous, allez, je vous refuse." He then proposes to her cousin Eliante (3 syl.), but Eliante tells him she is already engaged to his friend Philinte (2 syl.), and so the plays ends.—Molière: Le Misanthrope (1666).

("Célimène" in Molière's Les Précieuses Ridicules is a mere dummy. She is brought on the stage occasionally towards the end of the play, but never utters one word, and seems a supernumerary of no importance at all.)

Celin'da, the victim of count Fathom's seduction.—Smollett: Count Fathom (1754).

The count placed an Eolian harp in her bedroom, and "the strings no sooner felt the impression of the wind than they began to pour forth a stream of melody more ravishingly delightful than the song of Philomel, the warbling brook, and all the concert of the wood."—Smollett: Count Fathom.

Cel'lide (2 syl.), beloved by Valentine and his son Francisco. The lady naturally prefers the younger man.—Fletcher: Mons. Thomas (1619). Beaumont died 1616.

Celt. Tennyson calls the irritability of the Irish and Welsh

The blind hysterics of the Celt.
In Memoriam, clx.

Celtic and Ibe'rian Fields (The), France and Spain.

Roving the Celtic and Iberian fields.
Milton: Comus, 60 (1634).

Celtic Homer (The), Ossian, said to be of the third century.

If Ossian lived at the introduction of Christianity, as by all appearances he did, his epoch will be the latter end of the third and beginning of the fourth century.

The "Caracul" of Fingal, who is no other than Caracalla) son of Seve'rus, emperor of Rome), and the battle fought against Caros or Carausius, . . . fix the epoch of Fingal to the third century, and Irish historians place his death in the year 283. Ossian was Fingal's son.—Era of Ossian.

Celtic Languages. (See KELTIC.)

Cenci. Francesco Cenci was a most profligate Roman noble, who had four sons and one daughter, all of whom he treated with abominable cruelty. It is said that he assassinated his two elder sons and debauched his daughter Beatrice. Beatrice and her two surviving brothers, with Lucretia (their mother), conspired against Francesco and accomplished his death; but all except the youngest brother perished on the scaffold, September 11, 1599. (See Quarterly Review, February, 1879.)

It has been doubted whether the famous portrait in the Barberini palace of Rome is that of Beatrice Cenci, and even whether Guido was the painter thereof.

Percy B. Shelley wrote a tragedy called The Cenci (1819).

Cenimag'ni, the inhabitants of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge.—Cæsar: Commentaries.

Cennini, the jeweller in Romola, a novel by "George Eliot" (Mrs. Lewis or J. W. Crosse), (1863).

Centaur (The Blue), a human form from the waist upwards, and a goat covered with blue shag from the waist downwards. Like the ogri, he fed on human flesh.

"Shepherds," said he, "I am the Blue Centaur. If you will give me every third year a young child, I promise to bring a hundred of my kinsmen and drive the Ogri away." . . . He [the Blue Centaur] used to appear on the top of a rock, with his club in one hand . . . and with a terrible voice cry out to the shepherds, "Leave me my prey, and be off with you!"—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Princess Carpillona," 1682).

Centaurs (The), of classic mythology, were half men and half horses. They fought with the Lapithæ at the marriage feast of Pirithous, were expelled from their country, and took refuge on Mount Pindus. Chiron was the most famous of the Centaurs.

Cen'tury White, John White, the nonconformist lawyer. So called from his chief work, entitled The First Century of Scandalous, Malignant Priests, etc. (1590-1645).

Ce'phal (Greek, Kephalê), the Head personified, the "acropolis" of The Purple Island, fully described in canto v. of that poem, by Phineas Fletcher (1633).

Ceph'alus (in Greek, Kephalos). One day, overcome with heat, Cephalus threw himself on the grass, and cried aloud, "Come, gentle Aura, and this heat allay!" The words were told to his young wife Procris, who, supposing Aura to be some rival, became furiously jealous. Resolved to discover her rival, she stole next day to a covert, and soon saw her husband come and throw himself on the bank, crying aloud, "Come, gentle Zephyr; come, Aura, come, this heat allay!" Her mistake was evident, and she was about to throw herself into the arms of her husband, when the young man, aroused by the rustling, shot an arrow into the covert, supposing some wild beast was about to spring on him. Procris was shot, told her tale, and died. —Ovid: Art of Love, iii.

Cephalus loves Procris, i.e. "the sun kisses the dew. Procris is killed by Cephalus, i.e. "the dew is destroyed by the rays of the sun."

Ceras'tes (3 syl.), the horned snake (Greek, keras, "a horn"). Milton uses the word in Paradise Lost, x. 525 (1665).

Cerberus, a dog with three heads, which keeps guard in hell. Dantê places it in the third circle.

Cerberus, cruel monster, fierce and strange,
Through his wide threefold throat barks as a dog . . .
His eyes glare crimson, black its unctuous beard,
His belly large, and clawed the hands with which He tears the spirits, flays them, and their limbs
Piecemeal disparts.
Dante: Hell, vi. (1300, Cary's translation).

Cer'don, the boldest of the rabble leaders in the encounter with Hu'dibras at the bear-baiting. The original of this character was Hewson, a one-eyed cobbler and preacher, who was also a colonel in the Rump army.—S. Butler: Hudibras, i. 2 (1663).

Ce'res (2 syl.), the Fruits of Harvest personified. In classic mythology Cerês means "Mother Earth," the protectress of agriculture and fruits.

Ceres, the planet, is so called because it was discovered from the observatory of Palermo, and Cerês is the tutelar goddess of Sicily.

Ceret'tick Shore (The), the Cardigan coast.

. . . the other floods from the Ceretticke shore
To the Virginian sea [q.v.], contributing their store.
Drayton: Polyolbion, vi. (1612).

Cer'imon, a physician of Ephesus, who restored to animation Thaisa, the wife of Per'iclês prince of Tyre, supposed to be dead.—Shakespeare: Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

Certa'men Catholicum cum Calvinistis, of Hamconius, is a poem in which every word begins with C.

N.B.—In the Materia more Magistrâlis every word begins with M; and in the Pugna Porcôrum per P. Porcum poëtam every word begins with P.

Chab'ot (Philippe de), admiral of France, governor of Bourgoyne and Normandy under François I. Montmorency and the cardinal de Lorraine, out of jealousy, accused him of malversation, his faithful servant Allegre was put to the rack to force evidence against the accused, and Chabot was sent to prison because he was unable to pay the fine levied upon him. His innocence, however, was established by the confession of his enemies, and he was released; but disgrace had made so deep an impression on his mind that he sickened and died. This is the subject of a tragedy entitled The Tragedy of Philip Chabot, etc., by Chapman and Shirley (1639).

Chad'band (The Rev. Mr.), type of a canting hypocrite "in the ministry." He calls himself "a vessel," is much admired by his dupes, and pretends to despise the "carnal world," but nevertheless loves dearly its "good things," and is most self-indulgent.—C. Dickens: Bleak House (1853).

Chaffington (Mr. Percy), M.P., a stock-broker.—Morton: If I had a Thousand a Year.

Chalbrook, a giant, the root of the race of giants, including Polypheme (3 syl.), Goliath, the Titans, Fierabras, Gargantua, and closing with Pantag'ruel. He was born in the year known for its "week of three Thursdays."—Rabelais: Pantagruel, ii. (1533).

Chal'ybes (3 syl.), a people on the south shore of the Black Sea, who occupied themselves in working iron.

On the left hand dwe
The iron-workers called the Chalybês,
Of whom beware.
Mrs. Browning: Prometheus Bound (1850).

Cham, the pseudonym of comte Amédée de Noé, a peer of France, a great wit, and the political caricaturist of Charivari (the French Punch). The count was one of the founders of the French Republic in 1875. As Cham or Ham was the second son and scapegrace of Noah, so Amédée was the second son and scapegrace of the comte de Noé [Noah].

Cham [Kam], the sovereign prince of Tartary, now written Khan.

The Great Cham of Literature. Dr. Johnson (1709-1784) was so called by Smollett.

Cham of Tartary, a corruption of Chan or Khan, i.e. "lord or prince," as Hoccota Chan. "Ulu Chan" means "great lord," "ulu" being equal to the Latin magnus, and "chan" to dominus or imperâtor. Sometimes the word is joined to the name, as Chan-balu, Carachan, etc. The Turks have also had their "Sultan Murad chan bin Sultan Sélim chan," i.e. Sultan Murad prince, son of Sultan Selim prince.—Selden: Titles of Honour, vi. 66 (1672).

Cham'berlain (Matthew), a tapster, the successor of Old Roger Raine (1 syl.). —Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Chambers's Journal, a weekly serial by William and Robert Chambers, begun in 1832.

Chamont, brother of Monimia "the orphan," and the troth-plight husband of Seri'na (daughter of lord Acasto). He is a soldier, so proud and susceptible that he is for ever taking offence, and setting himself up as censor or champion. He fancies his sister Monim'ia has lost her honour, and calls her to task, but finds he is mistaken. He fancies her guardian, old Acasto, has not been sufficiently watchful over her, and draws upon him in his anger, but sees his folly just in time to prevent mischief. He fancies Castalio, his sister's husband, has ill-treated her, and threatens to kill him, but his suspicions are again altogether erroneous. In fact, his presence in the house was like that of a madman with fire-brands in a stack-yard.—Otway: The Orphan (1680).

> There are characters in which he [C. M. Young] is unrivalled and almost perfect. His "Pierre" [Venice Preserved, Otway] is more soldierly than Kemble's; his "Chamont" is full of brotherly pride, noble impetuosity, and heroic scorn.—New Monthly Magazine (1822).

Champagne (Henry earl of), a crusader.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Cham'pernel', a lame old gentleman, the husband of Lami'ra, and son-in-law of judge Vertaigne (2 syl.).—(?) Beaumont and Fletcher: The Little French Lawyer (printed 1647).

Champion and Severall. A "champion" is a common, or land in allotments without enclosures. A "severall" is a private farm, or land enclosed for individual use. A "champion" also means one who holds an open allotment or "champion."

> More profit is quieter found
> (Where pastures in severall be)
> Of one seely acre of ground,
> Than champion maketh of three.
> Again what a joy it is known
> When men may be bold of their own!
> Tusser: Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, liii. 22.

Again—

> The champion differs from severall much
> For want of partition, closter, and such.
> Tusser (Introduction), (1557).

Champion of the Virgin. St. Cyril of Alexandria is so called from his defence of the "Incarnation" or doctrine of the "hypostatic union," in the long and stormy dispute with Nesto'rius bishop of Constantinople.

Champneys (Sir Geoffry), a fossilized old country gentleman, who believes in "blue blood" and the "British peerage." Father of Talbot, and neighbour of Perkyn Middlewick, a retired butterman. The sons of these two magnates are fast friends, but are turned adrift by their fathers for marrying in opposition to their wishes. When reduced to abject poverty, the old men go to visit their sons, relent, and all ends happily.

Talbot Champneys, a swell with few brains and no energy. His name, which was his passport into society, would not find him in salt in the battle of life. He marries Mary Melrose, a girl without a penny, but his father wanted him to marry Violet the heiress.

Miss Champneys, sir Geoffry's sister, proud and aristocratic, but quite willing to sacrifice both on the altar of Mr. Perkyn Middlewick, the butterman, if the wealthy plebeian would make her his wife, and allow her to spend his money. —H. J. Byron: Our Boys (1875).

Chandos House (Cavendish Square, London), so called from being the residence of James Brydges, duke of Chandos, generally called "The Princely Chandos."

Chandos Street. (See CARIBEE ISLANDS, p. 179.)

Chanounes Yemenes Tale (The), that is, a yemen's tale about a chanoun. (A "yemen" is a bailiff.) This is a tale in ridicule of alchemy. A chanoun humbugged a priest by pretending to convert rubbish into gold. With a film of wax he concealed in a stick a small lot of thin gold. The priest stirred the boiling water with the stick, and the thin pieces of gold, as the wax melted, dropped into the pot. The priest gave the chanoun £40 for the recipe; and the crafty alchemist was never seen by him afterwards.

Chan'ticleer (3 syl.), the cock, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498), and also in "The Nonne Prestes Tale," told in The Canterbury Tales, by Chaucer (1388).

Chaon'ian Bird (The), the dove; so called because doves delivered the oracles of Dodōna or Chaon'ia.

But the mild swallow none with toils infest,
And none the soft Chaonian bird molest.
Ovid: Art of Love, II.

Chaonian Food, acorns; so called from the oak trees of Dodōna, which gave out the oracles by means of bells hung among the branches. Beech mast is so called also, because beech trees abounded in the forest of Dodōna.

Chapelle Aventureuse, the place where Launcelot had his second vision of the "Beatific Cup." His first was during his fit of madness.

Slumbering, he saw the vision high,
He might not view with waking eye.
Sir W. Scott. Marmion (1808).

Characters of Vathek's Sabres. "Like the characters of Vathek's sabres, they never remained two days alike." These sabres would deal blows without being wielded by man, obedient to his wish only.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Charalois, son of the marshal of Burgundy. When he was 28 years old, his father died in prison at Dijon, for debts contracted by him for the service of the State in the wars. According to the law which then prevailed in France, the body of the marshal was seized by his creditors, and refused burial. The son of Charalois redeemed his father's body by his own, which was shut up in prison in lieu of the marshal.—Massinger: The Fatal Dowry (1632).

¶ It will be remembered that Milti'adês, the Athenian general, died in prison for debt, and the creditors claimed the body, which they would not suffer to be buried till his son Cimon gave up himself as a hostage.

Char'egite (3 syl.). The Charegite assassin, in the disguise of a Turkish marabout or enthusiast, comes and dances before the tent of Richard Cœur de Lion, and suddenly darting forward, is about to stab the king, when a Nubian seizes his arm, and the king kills the assassin on the spot.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Charge of the Light Brigade, or "The Death Charge of the 600 at Balaclava," Sept. 20, 1854. The brigade consisted of the 13th Light Dragoons, the 17th Lancers, the 11th Hussars commanded by lord Cardigan, the 8th Hussars, and the 4th Light Dragoons. The Russians were advancing in great strength to intercept the Turkish and British forces, when lord Raglan (commander-in-chief) sent an order to lord Lucan to advance, and lord Lucan (not understanding what was intended) applied to captain Nolan, who brought the message, for information. Nolan replied, "There, my lord, is your enemy." Lucan then gave orders to lord Cardigan to attack, and the 600 rode forward into the jaws of death. In 20 minutes, 12 officers were slain, and 4 others wounded; 147 men were slain, and 110 wounded. The blunder must be shared by lord Lucan, general Airey, and captain Nolan. However, never was victory more glorious to the devoted men than this useless and deadly charge. It "was magnificent, but it was not war," and when lord Cardigan rallied the scattered remains, he said, "My men, some one has blundered." They replied, "Never mind, my lord, we are ready to charge again if it is your lordship's command." Tennyson wrote a poem on the fatal charge.

N.B.—Coincidences. The names of the four persons concerned all end in -an; Raglan told Nolan, Nolan told Lucan, and Lucan told Cardigan. The initials of these names make R a C-L a N, very near the name R a G-L a N.

Charicle'ia, the fiancée of Theag'enês, in the Greek romance called The Loves of Theagenês and Charicleia, by Heliodo'ros bishop of Trikka (fourth century).

Chari'no, father of Angelina. Charino wishes Angelina to marry Clodio, a young coxcomb; but the lady prefers his elder brother Carlos, a young bookworm. Love changes the character of the diffident Carlos, and Charino at last accepts him for his son-in-law. Charino is a testy, obstinate old man, who wants to rule the whole world in his own way.—Cibber. Love Makes a Man (1694).

Chariva'ri. In the Middle Ages a "charivari" consisted of an assemblage of ragamuffins, who, armed with tin pots and pans, fire-shovels, and kettles, gathered in the dark outside the house of any obnoxious person, making the night hideous by striking the pots against the pans, and howling "Haro! haro!" or (in the south) "Hari! hari!" In 1563 the Council of Trent took the matter up, and solemnly interdicted "charivaries" under pain of excommunication; nevertheless, the practice long continued in some of the French villages, notably in La Ruscade.

¶ In East Lavant, near Chichester, between 1869 and 1872, I witnessed three such visitations made to different houses. In two cases the husband had bullied his wife; and in one the wife had injured her husband with a broomstick. The visitation in all cases was made for three successive nights; and the villagers assured me confidently that the "law had no power to suppress these demonstrations."

Charlemagne and his Paladins. This series of romances is of French origin; as the Arthurian is Welsh or British. It began with the legendary chronicle in verse, called Historia de Vita Caroli Magni et Rolandi, erroneously attributed to Turpin archbishop of Rheims (a contemporary of Charlemagne). Probably they were written 200 or 300 years later. The chief of the series are Huon of Bordeaux, Guerin de Monglave, Gaylen Rhetoré (in which Charlemagne and his paladins proceed in mufti to the Holy Land), Miles and Ames, Jairdain de Blaves, Doolin de Mayence, Ogier le Danois, and Maugis the Enchanter.

Charlemagne was buried at Aix-la-Chapelle in 814.

Charlemagne's Stature. We are told that Charlemagne was "eight feet high," and so strong that he could "straighten with his hands alone three horse-shoes at once." His diet and his dress were both as simple as possible.

Charlemagne's Nine Wives: (1) Hamiltrude, a poor Frenchwoman, who bore him several children. (2) Desiderata, who was divorced. (3) Hildegarde. (4) Fastrade, daughter of count Rodolph the Saxon. (5) Luitgarde the German. (The last three died before him.) (6) Maltegarde. (7) Gersuinde the Saxon. (8) Regina. (9) Adalinda.

Charlemagne's Sword, La Joyeuse.

Charlemagne and the Ring. Pasquier says that Charles le Grand fell in love with a peasant-girl [Agatha], in whose society he seemed bewitched, insomuch that all matters of State were neglected by him; but the girl died, to the great joy of all. What, however, was the astonishment of the court to find that the king seemed no less bewitched with the dead body than he had been with the living, and spent all day and night with it, even when its smell was quite offensive. Archbishop Turpin felt convinced there was sorcery in this strange infatuation; and on examining the body, found a ring under the tongue, which he removed. Charlemagne now lost all regard for the dead body; but followed Turpin, with whom he seemed infatuated. The archbishop now bethought him of the ring, which he threw into a pool at Aix, where Charlemagne built a palace and monastery; and no spot in the world had such attractions for him as Aix-la-Chapelle, where "the ring" was buried.—Recherches de la France, vi. 33.

Charlemagne not dead. According to legend, Charlemagne waits crowned and armed in Odenberg (Hesse) or Untersberg, near Saltzburg, till the time of antichrist, when he will wake up and deliver Christendom. (See BARBAROSSA, p. 88.)

Charlemagne and Years of Plenty. According to German legend, Charlemagne appears in seasons of plenty. He crosses the Rhine on a golden bridge, and blesses the corn-fields and vineyards.

> Thou standest, like imperial Charlemagne,
> Upon thy bridge of gold.
> Longfellow: Autumn.

CHARLES I. (See APPENDIX II.)

Charles II. of England, introduced by sir W. Scott in two novels, viz. Peveril of the Peak and Woodstock. In this latter he appears first as a gipsy-woman, and afterwards under the name of Louis Kerneguy (Albert Lee's page).

Charles XII. of Sweden. Determined to brave the seasons, as he had done his enemies, Charles XII. ventured to make long marches during the cold of the memorable winter of 1709. In one of these marches 2000 of his men died from the cold.

> Or learn the fate that Mesding thousands bore,
> Marched by their Charles to Dnieper's swampy shore;
> Faint in his wounds, and shivering in the blast,
> The Swedish soldier sank, and groaned his last.
> Campbell: The Pleasures of Hope, ii. (1799).

(Planché has an historical drama, in two acts, called Charles XII.; and the Life of Charles XII., by Voltaire, is considered to be one of the best-written historical works in the French language.)

Charles "the Bold," duke of Burgundy, introduced by sir W. Scott in two novels, Quentin Durward and Anne of Geierstein. The latter contains an account of the battle of Nancy (Nahn-see') where Charles was slain.

Charles, prince of Wales (called "Babie Charles"), son of James I., introduced by sir W. Scott in The Fortunes of Nigel.

Charles "the Good," earl of Flanders. In 1127 he passed a law that whoever married a serf should become a serf: thus if a prince married a serf, the prince would become a serf. This absurd law caused his death, and the death of the best blood in Bruges.—S. Knowles: The Provost of Bruges (1836).

Charles Edward [Stuart], called "The Chevalier Prince Charles Edward, the Young Pretender," introduced by sir W. Scott in Redgauntlet (time, George III.), first as "father Buonaventura," and afterwards as "Pretender to the British crown." He is again introduced in Waverley (time, George II.).

Charles Emmanuel, son of Victor Amade'us (4 syl.) king of Sardinia. In 1730 his father abdicated, but somewhat later wanted his son to restore the crown again. This the son refused to do; and when Victor plotted against him, D'Orme'a was sent to arrest the old man, and he died. Charles was brave, patient, single-minded, and truthful.—R. Browning: King Victor and King Charles, etc.

Charles's Wain, the constellation called The Great Bear. A corruption of the Old English ceorles wæn ("the churl's or farmer's waggon"); sometimes still further corrupted into "king Charles's wain."

Heugh ho! An 't be not four by the day, I'll be hanged. Charles' wain is over the new chimney.—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 1 (1597).

Could he not beg the loan of Charles's wain?
Byron Don Juan, iii. 99. (1820).

Charley (A), an imperial, or tuft of hair on the chin.

A tuft of hair on his chin, termed grandiloquently an "imperial," but familiarly a "Charley."—R. M. Jephson: The Girl He left behind Him, i. 5

Charley, plu. Charleys, an old watchman or "night guardian," before the introduction of the police force by sir Robert Peel, in 1829. So called from Charles I., who extended and improved the police system.

Charlot, a messenger from Liége (Lee-aje) to Louis XI.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

CHARLOTTE, the faithful sweetheart of young Wilmot, supposed to have perished at sea.—Lillo: Fatal Curiosity (1736).

Charlotte, the dumb girl, in love with Leander; but her father, sir Jasper, wants her to marry Mr. Dapper. In order to avoid this hateful alliance, Charlotte pretends to be dumb, and only answers, "Han, hi, han, hon." The "mock doctor" employs Leander as his apothecary, and the young lady is soon cured by "pills matrimonial." The jokes in act ii. 6 are verbally copied from the French.—Fielding: The Mock Doctor (1733).

In Molière's Le Médecin Malgré Lui, Charlotte is called "Lucinde" (2 syl.).

Charlotte, daughter of sir John Lambert, in The Hypocrite, by Bickerstaff (1768); in love with Darnley. She is a giddy girl, fond of tormenting Darnley; but being promised in marriage to Dr. Cantwell, who is 59, and whom she utterly detests, she becomes somewhat sobered down, and promises Darnley to become his loving wife. Her constant exclamation is "Lud!" In Molière's comedy of Tartuffe, Charlotte is called "Mariane," and Darnley is "Valère."

Charlotte, in Goethe's novel. (See LOTTE, p. 627.)

Charlotte, the pert maidservant of the countess Wintersen. Her father was "state coachman." Charlotte is jealous of Mrs. Haller, and behaves rudely to her (see act ii. 3).—B. Thomson: The Stranger (1797).

Charlotte, servant to Sowerberry. A dishonest, rough servant-girl, who ill treats Oliver Twist, and robs her master.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Charlotte, daughter of George IV. Her mother's name was Caroline; her husband was prince Coburg; she was married at Carlton House; her town residence was Camelford House; her country residence was Claremont, afterwards the property of lord Clive. Princess Charlotte died in childbirth, and the name of her accoucheur was Croft.

Charlotte, daughter of general Baynes. She marries Philip Firmin, the hero of Thackeray's novel The Adventures of Philip (1860).

Charlotte (Lady), the servant of a lady so called. She assumes the airs with the name and address of her mistress. The servants of her own and other households address her as "Your ladyship," or "lady Charlotte;" but though so mighty grand, she is "noted for a plaguy pair of thick legs."—Rev. James Townley: High Life Below Stairs (1759).

Charlotte Elizabeth, whose surname was Phelan, afterwards Tonna, author of numerous books for children, tales, etc. (1825–1862).

Charlotte Goodchild, a merchant's orphan daughter of large fortune. She is pestered by many lovers, and her guardian gives out that she has lost all her money by the bankruptcy of his house. On this all her suitors but one fall off, and that one is sir Callaghan O'Brallaghan. Sir Callaghan declares he loves her now as an equal, and one whom he can serve; but before he loved her "with fear and trembling, like a man that loves to be a soldier, yet is afraid of a gun."—Macklin: Love à-la-Mode (1779).

Char'mian, a kind-hearted, simple-minded attendant on Cleopat'ra. After the queen's death, she applied one of the asps to her own arm; and when the Roman soldiers entered the room, fell down dead.—Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra (1608); and Dryden: All for Love (1678).

Char'teris (Sir Patrick) of Kinfauns, provost of Perth.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Chartist Clergyman (The), Rev. Charles Kingsley (1809-1877).

Chartre (Le billet qu' a la), the promise of a candidate to those he canvasses. The promise of a minister or prince, which he makes from politeness, and forgets as soon. Ah, le bon billet qu' a la Chartre.—Ninon de Lenclos.

Charyllis, in Spenser's pastoral Colin Clout's Come Home Again, is lady Compton. Her name was Anne, and she was the fifth of the six daughters of sir John Spenser of Althorpe, ancestor of the noble houses of Spenser and Marlborough. Edmund Spenser dedicated to her his satirical fable called Mother Hubbard's Tale (1591). Charyllis was thrice married; her first husband was lord Monteagle, and her third was Robert lord Buckhurst (son of the poet Sackville), who succeeded his father in 1608 as earl of Dorset.

> No less praiseworthy are the sisters three,
> The honour of the noble family
> Of which I meanest boast myself to be, . . .
> Phyllis, Charyllis, and sweet Amaryllis:
> Phyllis the fair is eldest of the three,
> The next to her is bountiful Charyllis.
> Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1594).

Chase (The), a poem in four books, by Somerville (1735), in blank verse. The subject is thus indicated—

> The chase I sing, hounds and their various breed,
> And no less various use.

Chaste (The), Alfonso II. of Asturias and Leon (758, 791-835 abdicated, died 842).

Chastelard, a tragedy of Swinburne (1865). A gentleman of Dauphiny, who fell in love with Mary queen of Scots. He is discovered in the queen's bedroom.

Chastity (Tests of): Alasnam's mirror, Arthur's drinking-horn, the boy's mantle, cutting the brawn's head, Florimel's girdle, the horn of fidelity, la coupe enchantée, the mantle of fidelity, the grotto of Ephesus, etc. (See CARADOC, p. 177, and each article named.)

Château en Espagne. (See CASTLE IN THE AIR, p. 180.)

Chatookee, an Indian bird that never drinks at a stream, but catches the rain-drops in falling.—Period. Account of the Baptist Missionaries, ii. 309.

> Less pure than these is that strange Indian bird,
> Who never dips in earthly stream her bill,
> But, when the sound of coming showers is heard,
> Looks up, and from the clouds receives her fill.
> Southey: Curse of Kehama, xxi. 6 (1809).

Chat'tanach (M'Gillie), chief of the clan Chattan.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Chat'terley (Rev. Simon), "the man of religion" at the Spa, one of the managing committee.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Chaubert (Mons.), Master Chiffinch's cook.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Chaucer of France, Clément Marot (1484-1544).

Chau'nus. Arrogance personified in The Purple Island, by Phineas Fletcher (1633). "Fondly himself with praising he dispraised." Fully described in canto viii. (Greek, chaunos, "vain.")

Chau'vinism, a blind idolatry of Napoleon I. Now it is applied to a blind idolatry of France and Frenchmen. A chauvin is the person who idolizes. The word is taken from "Chauvin" in Scribe's Soldat Laboureur, a veteran soldier of the first empire, whose admiration of Napoleon was unbounded, and who honoured even "the shadow of his shoe-tie."

> Such is the theme on which French chauvinism is inexhaustible.—Times, 1871.

Cheap as the Sardin'ians (Latin). The reference is to the vast crowds of Sardinian prisoners and slaves brought to Rome by Tiberius Gracchus.

Cheap Jack means market Jack or

Jack the chapman. (Anglo-Saxon, chepe, "a market," hence Cheap-side.)

Cheat'ly (2 syl.), a lewd, imprudent debauchee of Alsatia (Whitefriars). He dares not leave the "refuge" by reason of debt; but in the precincts he fleeces young heirs of entail, helps them to money, and becomes bound for them.—Shadwell: Squire of Alsatia (1688).

Che'bar, the tutelar angel of Mary sister of Martha and Lazarus of Bethany. —Klopstock: The Messiah, xii. (1771).

Ched'eraza'de (5 syl.), mother of Hem'junah and wife of Zebenc'zer sultan of Cassimir'. Her daughter having run away to prevent a forced marriage with the prince of Georgia, whom she had never seen, the sultana pined away and died.—Sir C. Morell [J. Ridley]: Tales of the Genii ("Princess of Cassimir," tale vii., 1751).

Cheder'les (3 syl.), a Moslem hero, who, like St. George, saved a virgin exposed to the tender mercies of a huge dragon. He also drank of the waters of immortality, and still lives to render aid in war to any who invoke him.

> When Chederlês comes
> To aid the Moslem on his deathless horse,
> . . . as [he] had newly quaffed
> The hidden waters of eternal youth.
> Southey: Joan of Arc, vi. 302, etc. (1837).

Cheerly' (Mrs.), daughter of colonel Woodley. After being married three years, she was left a widow, young, handsome, rich, lively, and gay. She came to London, and was seen in the opera by Frank Heartall, an open-hearted, impulsive young merchant, who fell in love with her, and followed her to her lodging. Ferret, the villain of the story, misinterpreted all the kind actions of Frank, attributing his gifts to hush-money; but his character was amply vindicated, and "the soldier's daughter" became his blooming wife.—Cherry: The Soldier's Daughter (1804).

> Miss O'Neill, at the age of 19, made her début at the Theatre Royal, Crow Street, in 1811, as "The Widow Cheerly."—W. Donaldson.

Cheeryble Brothers (The), brother Ned and brother Charles, the incarnations of all that is warm-hearted, generous, benevolent, and kind. They were once homeless boys running about the streets barefooted; and, when they grew to be wealthy London merchants, were ever ready to stretch forth a helping hand to those struggling against the buffets of fortune.

Frank Cheeryble, nephew of the brothers Cheeryble. He married Kate Nickleby. —Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Cheese. The "ten topping guests." (See CISLEY, p. 211.)

Cheese (Dr.), an English translation of the Latin Dr. Caseus, that is, Dr. John Chase, a noted quack, who was born in the reign of Charles II., and died in that of queen Anne.

Cheese-Cakes. Sir W. Scott, alluding to the story of "Nour'eddin' Ali and Bed'reddin' Hassan," in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments, makes in four or five lines as many blunders. The quotation is from The Heart of Midlothian.

> She, i.e. Effie Deans, amused herself with visiting the dairy . . . and was near discovering herself to Mary Hetley by betraying her acquaintance with the celebrated receipt for Dunlop cheese, that she compared herself to Bedreddin Hassan, whom the vizier his father-in-law discovered by his superlative skill in composing cream-tarts with pepper in them.

(1) It was not "cream-tarts" but cheese-cakes. (2) The charge was that he made cheese-cakes without putting pepper in them, and not "cream-tarts with pepper." (3) It was not "the vizier his father-in-law," but the widow of Noureddin Ali and the mother of Bedreddin, who made the discovery. She declared that she herself had given the receipt to her son, and it was known to no one else.

Chemistry (The Father of), Arnaud de Villeneuve (1238-1314).

Che'mos (ch = k), god of the Moabites; also called Baal-Pe'ôr; the Pria'pus or idol of turpitude and obscenity. Solomon built a temple to this obscene idol "in the hill that is before Jerusalem" (1 Kings xi. 7). In the hierarchy of hell Milton gives Chemos the fourth rank: (1) Satan, (2) Beëlzebub, (3) Moloch, (4) Chemos.

> Next Chemos, the ob'scene dread of Moab's sons . . .
> Peôr his other name.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, 406, 412 (1665).

Cheq'uers, a public-house sign; the arms of Fitz-Warren, the head of which house, in the days of the Plantagenets, was invested with the power of licensing vintners and publicans.

The Chequers of Abingdon Street, Westminster, the bearings of the earls of Arundel, at one time empowered to grant licences to public-houses.

Cheron'an (The) or The Cheron'ean Sage (ch = k), Plutarch, who was born at Chærone'a, in Bœo'tia (A.D. 46–120).

This praise, O Cheronean sage, is thine!
Beattie: Minstrel (1773).

Cher'ry, the lively daughter of Boniface, landlord of the inn at Lichfield.—Farquhar: The Beaux' Stratagem (1707). (See below, CHERY.)

Cherry (Andrew), comic actor and dramatist (1762–1812), author of The Soldier's Daughter, All for Fame, Two Strings to your Bow, The Village, Spanish Dollars, etc. He was specially noted for his excellent wigs.

Shall sapient managers new scenes produce
From Cherry, Skeffington, and Mother Goose?
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

(Mother Goose is a pantomime by C. Dibdin.)

Cher'sett (Anglo-Saxon, chirch-sett, or "church-seed," ecclesiæ semen), a certain quota of wheat annually made to the Church on St. Martin's Day.

All that measure of wheat called chersett.—Deed of Gift to Boxgrove Priory (near Chichester).

Cher'ubim (Don), the "bachelor of Salamanca," who is placed in a vast number of different situations of life, and made to associate with all classes of society, that the authors may sprinkle his satire and wit in every direction.—Lesage: The Bachelor of Salamanca (1737).

Cher'y, the son of Brunetta (who was the wife of a king's brother), married his cousin Fairstar, daughter of the king. He obtained for his cousin the three wonderful things: The dancing water, which had the power of imparting beauty; the singing apple, which had the power of imparting wit; and the little green bird, which had the power of telling secrets.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The Princess Fairstar," 1682).

Chesse (The Game and Play of), the first book printed by William Caxton, at the Westminster Press (1474). The art of printing by movable type was known at Mayence, Strasburg, and Haarlem some 20 years before Caxton set up his press in England.

Ches'ter (Sir John), a plausible, foppish villain, the sworn enemy of Geoffrey Haredale, by whom he is killed in a duel. Sir John is the father of Hugh, the gigantic servant at the Maypole inn.

Edward Chester, son of sir John, and the lover of Emma Haredale.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Chester Mysteries, certain miracle plays performed at Chester in the fifteenth century, and printed in 1843 for the Shakespeare Society, under the care of Thomas Wright. (See TOWNLEY MYSTERIES.)

N.B.—There were 24 dramas, one for each city company. Nine were performed on Whit-Monday, nine on Whit-Tuesday, and the other six on Wednesday. The "Fraternity of the Passion" was licensed in France, in 1402.

∴ Several manuscript copies of the Chester Miracle Plays exist. That of the duke of Devonshire is dated 1581; those in the British Museum are dated 1600 and 1607.

Chesterfield (Charles), a young man of genius, the hero and title of a novel by Mrs. Trollope (1841). The object of this novel is to satirize the state of literature in England, and to hold up to censure authors, editors, and publishers, as profligate, selfish, and corrupt.

Chesterfield House (London), built by Isaac Ware for Philip fourth earl of Chesterfield, author of Chesterfield's Letters to his Son (1694–1773).

Chesterton (Paul), nephew to Mr. Percy Chaffington, stock-broker and M.P.—Morton: If I had a Thousand a Year (1764 1838).

Chevalier Malfet (Le). So sir Launcelot calls himself after he was cured of his madness. The meaning of the phrase is "The knight who has done ill, or "The knight who has trespassed."—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 20 (1470).

Cheveril (Hans), the ward of Mordent, just come of age. Impulsive, generous, hot-blooded. He resolves to be a rake, but scorns to be a villain. However, be accidentally meets with Joanna "the deserted daughter," and falls in love with her. He rescues her from the clutches of Mrs. Enfield the crimp, and marries her.—Holcroft: The Deserted Daughter (altered into The Steward), (1785).

The part that placed me [Walter Lacy] in the position of a light comedian was "Cheveril," in The Steward, altered from Holcroft's Deserted Daughter.—W. Lacy: Letter to C. W. Russell.

Chevy Chase is not the battle of Otterburn, although the two are mixed up together in the ballad so called. Chevy Chase is the chase of the earl of Douglas among "the Chyviat Hyls" after Percy of Northumberland, who had vowed "he could hunt there three days without asking the warden's consent."

> The Persé owt of Northombarlande,
> And a vowe to God mayd he
> That he wolde hunte in the mountayns
> Off Chyviat within dayes thre,
> In mauger of doughté Dogles
> And all that with him be.
> Percy: Reliques, I. i. 2.

Chibia'bos, the Harmony of Nature personified; a musician, the friend of Hiawatha, and ruler in the land of spirits. When he played on his pipe, the "brooks ceased to murmur, the wood-birds to sing, the squirrel to chatter, and the rabbit sat upright to look and listen." He was drowned in lake Superior by the breaking of the ice.

> Most beloved by Hiawatha
> Was the gentle Chibiabos;
> He the best of all musicians,
> He the sweetest of all singers.
> Longfellow. Hiawatha, vi. and xv.

Chicaneau [She'-ka-no'], a litigious tradesman, in Les Plaideurs, by Racine (1668).

Chich'i-Vache (3 syl.), a monster that fed only on good women. The word means the "sorry cow." It was all skin and bone, because its food was so extremely scarce. (See BYCORN, p. 163.)

> O noble wyvés, full of heigh prudence,
> Let noon humilitie your tongés nayle . . .
> Lest Chich-Vache you swolwe in her entralle.
> Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("Merchant's Tale," 1388).

Chick (Mr.), brother-in-law of Mr. Dombey; a stout gentleman, with a tendency to whistle and hum airs at inopportune moments. Mr. Chick is somewhat hen-pecked; but in the matrimonial squalls, though apparently beaten, he not unfrequently rises up the superior, and gets his own way.

Louisa Chick, Mr. Dombey's married sister. She is of a snappish temper, but dresses in the most juvenile style; and is persuaded that anything can be accomplished if persons will only "make an effort."—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Chicken (The), Michael Angelo Taylor, barrister. So called because in his maiden speech, 1785, he said, "I deliver this opinion with great deference, being but a chicken in the profession of the law."

Chicken (The Game), a low fellow, to be heard of at the bar of the Black Badger. Mr. Toots selects this man as his instructor in fencing, betting, and self-defence. The Chicken has short hair, a low forehead, a broken nose, and "a considerable tract of bare and sterile country behind each ear."—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Chickens and the Augurs. When the augurs told Publius Claudius Pulcher, the Roman consul, who was about to engage the Carthaginian fleet, that the sacred chickens would not eat, he replied, "Then toss them into the sea, that they may drink."

Chick'enstalker (Mrs.), a stout, bonny, kind-hearted woman, who keeps a general shop. Toby Veck, in his dream, imagines her married to Tugby, the porter of sir Joseph Bowley.—Dickens: The Chimes (1844).

Chick'weed (Conkey, i.e. Nosey), the man who robbed himself. He was a licensed victualler on the point of failing, and gave out that he had been robbed of 327 guineas "by a tall man with a black patch over his eye." He was much pitied, and numerous subscriptions were made on his behalf. A detective was sent to examine into the "robbery," and Chickweed would cry out, "There he is!" and run after the "hypothetical thief" for a considerable distance, and then lose sight of him. This occurred over and over again, and at last the detective said to him, "I've found out who done this here robbery." "Have you?" said Chickweed. "Yes,' says Spyers, "you done it yourself." And so he had.—Dickens: Oliver Twist, xxxi. (1837).

Chiffinch (Master Thomas), alias Will Smith, a friend of Richard Gaulesse (2 syl.). The private emissary of Charles II. He was employed by the duke of Buckingham to carry off Alice Bridgenorth to Whitehall, but the captive escaped and married Julian Peveril.

Kate Chiffinch, mistress of Thomas Chiffinch.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Chignon [Shin-yông], the French valet of Miss Alscrip "the heiress." A silly, affected, typical French valet-de-chambre.—Burgoyne: The Heiress (1718).

Chi'lax, a merry old soldier, lieutenant to general Memnon, in Paphos.—John Fletcher: The Mad Lover (1617).

Beaumont died 1616.

CHILD or Childe, a title given to a knight. It is given by Spenser to prince Arthur. We have Childe Rolande, Byron's Childe Harold, Childe Waters, Childe Tristram, Childe Childers, etc. The Spanish infante means a "prince."

Child. The notes of this bank bear a marigold, because this flower was the trade-mark of "Blanchard and Child." The original "marigold" is still to be seen in the front office, with the motto, Ainsi mon ame.—See First London Directory (1677).

Child (The), Bettina, daughter of Maximiliane Brentano. So called from the title of her book, Goethe's Correspondence with a Child.

Child of Elle (1 syl.), a ballad of considerable antiquity. The Child of Elle loved the fair Emmeline, but the two families being severed by a feud, the lady's father promised her to another. The Child of Elle told Emmeline's page that he would set her free that very night, but when he came up, the lady's damselle betrayed her to her father, who went in pursuit with his "merrie men all." The Child of Elle slew the first who came up, and Emmeline, kneeling at her father's feet, obtained her forgiveness and leave to marry her true love. He said to the knight—

> And as thou love her, and hold her deare,
> Heaven prosper thee and thine;
> And now my blessing wend wi' thee,
> My lovely Emmeline.

Child of Nature (The), a play by Mrs. Inchbald. Amantis is the "child of Nature." She was the daughter of Alberto, banished "by an unjust sentence," and during his exile he left his daughter under the charge of the marquis Almanza. Amantis was brought up in total ignorance of the world and the passion-principles which sway it, but felt grateful to her guardian, and soon discovered that what she called "gratitude" the world calls "love." Her father returned home rich, his sentence cancelled and his innocence allowed, just in time to give his daughter in marriage to his friend Almanza.

Child of the Cord. So the defendant was called by the judges of the Vehm-gericht, in Westphalia; because every one condemned by the tribunal was hanged to the branch of a tree.

Child-King. Shakespeare says, "Woe to that land that's governed by a child!" (Richard III. act ii. sc. 3).

> Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child!—Eccles. x. 16.

Childe Harold, a man sated with the world, who roams from place to place, to kill time and escape from himself. The "childe" is, in fact, lord Byron himself, who was only 21 when he began the poem, which was completed in seven years. In canto i. the "childe" visits Portugal and Spain (1809); in canto ii., Turkey in Europe (1810); in canto iii., Belgium and Switzerland (1816); and in canto iv., Venice, Rome, and Florence (1817).

Childe Waters. The fair Ellen was enceinte of Childe Waters, and, when he went on his travels, besought that she might be his foot-page. She followed him in this capacity barefoot through "mosse and myre." They came to a river, and the knight pushed her in, but "our Ladye bare upp her chinne," and she came safe ashore. Having treated her with other gross indignities, she was taken with the throes of childbirth while on the knight's steed. The child was born, and then Childe Waters relented, and married the much-wronged mother.—Percy: Reliques (Third Series, No. 9).

Chil'ders (E. W. B.), one of the riders in Sleary's circus, noted for his vaulting and reckless riding in the character of the "Wild Huntsman of the Prairies." This compound of groom and actor marries Josephine, Sleary's daughter.

Kidderminster Childers, son of the above, known in the profession as "Cupid." He is a diminutive boy, with an old face and facetious manner wholly beyond his years.—Dickens: Hard Times (1854).

Children (The Henneberg). It is said that the countess of Henneberg railed at a beggar for having twins; and the beggar, turning on the countess, who was 42 years old, said, "May you have as many children as there are days in a year!" Sure enough on Good Friday, 1276, the countess brought forth 365 at one birth; all the males were christened John, and all the females Elisabeth. They were buried at a village near La Hague, and the jug is still shown in which they were baptized.

¶ A similar story is told of lady Scarsdale, who reproved a gipsy-woman who applied for alms at Kedleston Hall, because she was about to become a mother. The beggar, turning on her moralizer, said, "When next you are in my condition, may you have as many children at a birth as there are days in the week!" It is said that ere long the lady actually was delivered of seven children at a birth, and that "the fact" is set forth in Latin in Kedleston Church.

Children in the Wood, the little son (three years old) and younger daughter (Jane), left by a Norfolk gentleman on his death-bed to the care of his deceased wife's brother. The boy was to have £300 a year on coming of age, and the girl £500 as a wedding portion; but if the children died in their minority the money was to go to the uncle. The uncle, in order to secure the property, hired two ruffians to murder the children, but one of them relented and killed his companion; then, instead of murdering the babes, left them in Wayland (Wailing) Wood, where they gathered blackberries, but died at night with cold and terror. All things went ill with the uncle, who perished in gaol, and the ruffian, after a lapse of seven years, confessed the whole villainy.—Percy: Reliques, III. ii. 18.

Children of the Mist, one of the branches of the MacGregors, a wild race of Scotch Highlanders, who had a skirmish with the soldiers in pursuit of Dalgetty and M'Eagh among the rocks (ch. 14).—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Chillip (Dr.), a physician who attended Mrs. Copperfield at the birth of David.

He was the meekest of his set, the mildest of little men.—Dickens: David Copperfield, I. (1849).

Chillon' (Prisoner of), François de Bonnivard, of Lunes, the Genevise patriot (1496–1570) who opposed the enterprises of Charles III. (the duke-bishop of Savoy) against the independence of Geneva, and was cast by him into the prison of Chillon, where he was confined for six years. Lord Byron makes him one of six brothers, all of whom were victims of the duke-bishop; one was burnt at the stake, and three were imprisoned at Chillon. Two of the prisoners died, but François was set at liberty by the people of Berne.—Byron: Prisoner of Chillon (1816).

Chil'minar', the city of "forty pillars," built by the genii for a lurking-place to hide themselves in. Balbec was also built by the genii.

Chimène (La Belle) or Xime'na, daughter of count Lozano de Gormaz, wife of the Cid. After the Cid's death she defended Valentia from the Moors with great bravery, but without success. Corneille and Guilhem de Cantro have introduced her in their tragedies, but the rôle they represent her to have taken is wholly imaginary.

Chimes (The), a Christmas story by Dickens (1844). It is about some bells which rang the old year out and the new year in. Trotty Veck is a little old London ticket-porter and messenger. He hears the Christmas chimes, and receives from them both comfort and encouragement.

China, a corruption of Tsina, the territory of Tsin. The dynasty of Tsin (B.C. 256–202) takes the same position in Chinese history as that of the Normans (founded by William the Conqueror) does in English history. The founder of the Tsin dynasty built the Great Wall, divided the empire into thirty-six provinces, and made roads or canals in every direction, so that virtually the empire begins with this dynasty.

Chinaman (John), a man of China.

Chindasuin'tho (4 syl.), king of Spain, father of Theod'ofred, and grandfather of Roderick last of the Gothic kings.—Southey: Roderick, etc. (1814).

Chinese Philosopher (A). Oliver Goldsmith, in the Citizen of the World, calls his book "Letters from a Chinese Philosopher residing in London to his friends in the East" (1759).

Chinese Tales, translated into French prose by Gueulette, in 1723. The French tales have been translated into English.

Chingachcook, the Indian chief, called in French Le Gros Serpent. Fenimore Cooper has introduced this chief in four of his novels, The Last of the Mohicans, The Pathfinder, The Deerslayer, and The Pioneer.

Chints (Mary), Miss Bloomfield's maid, the bespoke of Jem Miller.—C. Selby: The Unfinished Gentleman.

Chi'os (The Man of), Homer, who lived at Chios [Ki'-os]. At least Chios was one of the seven cities which laid claim to the bard, according to the Latin hexameter verse—

Smyrna, Rhodos, Colóphon, Salámis, Chios, Argos, Athènæ. Varro.

Our national feelings are in unison with the bard of Chios, and his heroes who live in his verse.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (introduction).

Chirn'side (Luckie), poulterer at Wolf's Hope village.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Chi'ron, a centaur, renowned for his skill in hunting, medicine, music, gymnastics, and prophecy. He numbered among his pupils, Achilles, Peleus, Diomede, and indeed all the most noted heroes of Grecian story. Jupiter took him to heaven, and made him the constellation Sagittarius.

> . . . as Chiron erst had done
> To that proud bane of Troy, her god-resembling son [Achilles]
> Drayton: Polyolbion, v. (1612).

Chitling (Tom), one of the associates of Fagin the Jew. Tom Chitling was always most deferential to the "Artful Dodger."—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Chivalry (The Flower of), William Douglas, lord of Liddesdale (fourteenth century).

Chlo'e [Klo'-i], the shepherdess beloved by Daphnis, in the pastoral romance called Daphnis and Chloë, by Longus. St. Pierre's tale of Paul and Virginia is based on this pastoral.

Chloe, in Pope's Moral Essay (epistle II), is meant for lady Suffolk, mistress of George II. "Placid, good-natured, and kind-hearted, but very deaf and of mean intelligence."

> Virtue she finds too painful an endeavour,
> Content to dwell on decencies for ever.

Chlo'e or rather Cloe. So Prior calls Mrs. Centlivre (1661-1723).

Chloe or Cloe is a stock name in pastoral poetry. The male name is generally Stephon.

Chlo'ris, the ancient Greek name of Flora.

> Around your haunts
> The laughing Chloris with profusest hand
> Throws wide her blooms and odours.
> Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads.

Choas'pes (3 syl.), a river of Susia'na, noted for the excellency of its water. The Persian kings used to carry a sufficient quantity of it with them when journeying, so that recourse to other water might not be required.

> There Susa, by Choaspes' amber stream,
> The drink of none but kings.
> Milton: Paradise Regained, iii. 288 (1661).

Cho'reas (ch=k), the lover of Callirrhoé, in the Greek romance called The Loves of Chæreas and Callirrhoë, by Char'iton (eighth century).

Choice (The), a poem in ten-syllabic rhymes, by John Pomfret (1699). His beau-ideal is a rural literary life.

Choke (General), a lank North American gentleman, "one of the most remarkable men in the century." He was editor of The Watertoast Gazette, and a member of "The Eden Land Corporation." It was general Choke who induced Martin Chuzzlewit to stake his all in the egregious Eden swindle.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Cholmondeley [Chum'-ly], of Vale Royal, a friend of sir Geoffrey Peveril.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Cholmondeley, in Ainsworth's Tower of London (1843), is the squire of lord Guildford Dudley.

Cholula (Pyramid of), the great Mexican pyramid, west of Puebla, erected in the reign of Montezuma emperor of Mexico (1466-1520). Its base is 1423 feet each side, or double that of the largest Egyptian pyramid, but its height does not exceed 164 feet.

Choppard (Pierre), one of the gang of thieves, called "The Ugly Mug." When asked a disagreeable question, he always answered, "I'll ask my wife, my memory's so slippery."—Stirling: The Courier of Lyons (1852).

Choruses. The following are druidical, and of course Keltic in origin:—"Down, down, derry down!" (for dun / dun / daragon, dun /), that is, "To the hill! to the hill! to the oak, to the hill!" "Fal, lal, la!" (for fallà là), that is, "The circle of day!" The day or sun has completed its circle. "Faí, lero, loo!" (for fallà lear lu [aidh]), that is, "The circle of the sun praise!" "Hey, nonnie, nonnie!" that is, "Hail to the noon!" "High trolollie, lollie lol" (for ai [or aibhe], trah là, "Hail, early day!" trah là, "early day," là lee [or là lô], "bright day!"). "Lilli burlëro" (for Li, li beur, Lear-a / buille na là), that is, "Light, light on the sea, beyond the promontory! 'Tis the stroke of day!"—All the Year Round, 316-320, August, 1873.

Chrestien de Troyes. The chevalier au Lion, chevalier de l'Epée, was the Lancelot du Lac of mediæval French romance (twelfth century).

Chriemhil'da. (See under K.)

Chrisom Child (A), a child that dies within a month of its birth. So called because it is buried in the white cloth anointed with chrism (oil and balm), worn at its baptism.

He's in Arthur's [Abraham's] bosom, if ever man went to Arthur's bosom. 'A made a finer end, and went away, an it had been any christom [chrisom] child. 'A parted just . . . at turning o' the tide. (Quickly's description of the death of Falstaff.)—Shakespeare: Henry V. act ii. sc. 3 (1599).

Why, Mike's a child to him . . . a chrism child.
Ingelow: Brothers and a Sermon.

Christ and His Apostles. Dupuis maintained that Christ and His apostles, like Hercules and his labours, should be considered a mere allegory of the sun and the twelve signs of the zodiac.

Christ's Victory and Triumphs. a poem in four parts, by Giles Fletcher (1610): Part i. "Christ's Victory in Heaven," when He reconciled Justice with Mercy, by taking on Himself a body of human flesh; part ii. "Christ's Triumph on Earth," when He was led up into the wilderness, and was tempted by Presumption, Avarice, and Ambition; part iii. "Christ's Triumph over Death," when He died on the cross; part iv. "Christ's Triumph after Death," in His resurrection and ascension. (See PARADISE REGAINED.)

Chris'tabel (ch = k), the heroine of a fragmentary poem of the same title by Coleridge (1816).

Christabel, the heroine of an ancient romance entitled Sir Eglamour of Artois.

Christabelle [Krist'-ta-bel], daughter of "a bonnie king of Ireland," beloved by sir Cauline (2 syl.). When the king knew of their loves, he banished sir Cauline from the kingdom. Then, as Christabelle drooped, the king held a tournament for her amusement, every prize of which was carried off by an unknown knight in black. On the last day came a giant with two "goggling eyes, and mouthe from ear to ear," called the Soldain, and defied all comers. No one would accept his challenge save the knight in black, who succeeded in killing his adversary, but died himself of the wounds he had received. When it was discovered that the knight was sir Cauline, the lady "fette a sighe, that burst her gentle hearte in twayne."—Percy: Reliques ("Sir Cauline," I. i. 4).

CHRISTIAN, a follower of Christ. So called first at Antioch.—Acts xi. 26.

Christian, the hero of Bunyan's allegory called The Pilgrim's Progress. He flees from the City of Destruction and journeys to the Celestial City. At starting he has a heavy pack upon his shoulders, which falls off immediately he reaches the foot of the cross. (The pack, of course, is the bundle of sin, which is removed by the blood of the cross. 1678.)

Christian, captain of the patrol in a small German town in which Mathis is burgomaster. He marries Annette, the burgomaster's daughter.—J. R. Ware: The Polish Jew.

Christian, synonym of "Peasant" in Russia. This has arisen from the abundant legislation under czar Alexis and czar Peter the Great to prevent Christian serfs from entering the service of Mohammedan masters. No Christian is allowed to belong to a Mohammedan master, and no Mohammedan master is allowed to employ a Christian on his estate.

Christian II. (or Christiern), king of Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. When the Dalecarlians rose in rebellion against him and chose Gustavus Vasa for their leader, a great battle was fought, in which the Swedes were victorious; but Gustavus allowed the Danes to return to their country. Christian then abdicated, and Sweden became an independent kingdom. —H. Brooke: Gustavus Vasa (1730).

Christian (Edward), a conspirator. He has two aliases, "Richard Gan'lesse" (2 syl.) and "Simon Can'ter."

Colonel William Christian, Edward's brother. Shot for insurrection.

Fenella, alias Zarah Christian, daughter of Edward Christian.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Christian (Fletcher), mate of the Bounty, under the command of captain Bligh, and leader of the mutineers. After setting the captain and some others adrift, Christian took command of the ship, and, according to lord Byron, the mutineers took refuge in the island of Toobouai (one of the Society Islands). Here Torquil, one of the mutineers, married Neuha, a native. After a time, a ship was sent to capture the mutineers. Torquil and Neuha escaped, and lay concealed in a cave; but Christian, Ben Bunting, and Skyscrape were shot. This is not according to fact, for Christian merely touched at Toobouai, and then, with eighteen of the natives and nine of the mutineers, sailed for Tahiti, where all soon died except Alexander Smith, who changed his name to John Adams, and became a model patriarch.—Byron: The Island.

Christian Doctor (Most), John Charlier de Gerson (1363–1429).

Christian Eloquence (The Founder of), Louis Bourdaloue (1632–1704).

Christian King (Most). So the kings of France were styled. Pepin le Bref was so styled by pope Stephen III. (714–768). Charles II. le Chauve was so styled by the Council of Savonnières (823, 840–877). Louis XI. was so styled by Paul II. (1423, 1461–1483)!!

Christian Sen'eca (The), J. Hall, bishop of Norwich, poet and satirist (1574–1656).

Christian Year (The), "Thoughts in verse for every Sunday and Holiday throughout the Year," by John Keble (1827).

Christian'a (ch = k), the wife of Christian, who started with her children and Mercy from the City of Destruction long after her husband's flight. She was under the guidance of Mr. Greatheart, and went, therefore, with silver slippers along the thorny road. This forms the second part of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress (1684).

Chris'tie (2 syl.) of the Clint Hill, one of the retainers of Julian Avenel (2 syl.).—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Christie (John), ship-chandler at Paul's Wharf.

Dame Nelly Christie, his pretty wife, carried off by lord Dalgarno.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Christi'na, daughter of Christian II. king of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. She is sought in marriage by prince Arvi'da and by Gustavus Vasa; but the prince abandons his claim in favour of his friend. After the great battle, in which Christian is defeated by Gustavus, Christina clings to her father, and pleads with Gustavus on his behalf. He is sent back to Denmark, with all his men, without ransom, but abdicates, and Sweden is erected into a separate kingdom.—H. Brooke: Gustavus Vasa (1730).

Chris'tine (2 syl.), a pretty, saucy young woman, in the service of the countess Marie, to whom she is devotedly attached. After the recapture of Ernest ("the prisoner of State"), she goes boldly to king Frederick II., from whom she obtains his pardon. Being set at liberty, Ernest marries the countess.—Stirling: The Prisoner of State (1847).

Christmas Carol (A), a Christmas story in prose by Dickens (1843). The subject is the conversion of Scrooge, "a grasping old sinner," to generous good temper, by a series of dreams. Scrooge's clerk is Bob Cratchit. The moral influence of this story was excellent. It is an admirable Christmas tale.

Christmas Day, called "the day of new clothes," from an old French custom of giving those who belonged to the court new cloaks on that day.

> On Christmas Eve, 1245, the king [Louis IX.] bade all his court be present at early morning mass. At the chapel door each man received his new cloak, put it on, and went in . . . As the day rose, each man saw on his neighbour's shoulder betokened "the crusading vow."—Kitchin: History of France, i. 328.

Chris'topher (St.), a saint of the Roman and Greek Churches, said to have lived in the third century. His pagan name was Offĕrus, his body was twelve ells in height, and he lived in the land of Canaan. Offerus made a vow to serve only the mightiest; so, thinking the emperor was "the mightiest," he entered his service. But one day the emperor crossed himself for fear of the devil, and the giant perceived that there was one mightier than his present master, so he quitted his service for that of the devil. After a while, Offerus discovered that the devil was afraid of the cross, whereupon he enlisted under Christ, employing himself in carrying pilgrims across a deep stream. One day, a very small child was carried across by him, but proved so heavy that Offerus, though a huge giant, was well-nigh borne down by the weight. This child was Jesus, who changed the giant's name to Christoferus, "bearer of Christ." He died three days afterwards, and was canonized.

> Like the great giant Christopher, it stands
> Upon the brink of the tempestuous waves.
> Longfellow: The Lighthouse.

Christopher, the head-waiter in Somebody's Luggage, a tale by Dickens (1864).

Chronicle (The), a relation, in eight-syllable verse, of the poet's various sweethearts.—Cowley (1618–1667).

Chronicle (The Saxon), an historical prose work in Anglo-Saxon, down to the reign of Henry II., A.D. 1154.

Chroniclers (Anglo-Norman), a series of writers on British history, in verse, of very early date. Geffroy Gaimar wrote his Anglo-Norman chronicle before 1146. It is a history, in verse, of the Anglo-Saxon kings. Robert Wace wrote the Brut d'Angleterre [i.e. Chronicle of England], in eight-syllable verse, and presented his work to Henry II. It was begun in 1160, and finished in 1170.

Latin Chroniclers, historical writers of the eleventh and twelfth centuries.

Rhyming Chroniclers, a series of writers on English history from the thirteenth century. The most noted are: Layamon (called "the English Ennius") bishop of Ernleye-upon-Severn (1216). Robert of Gloucester, who wrote a narrative of British history, from the landing of Brute to the close of the reign of Henry III. (* to 1272). No date is assigned to the coming of Brute, but he was the son of Silvius Æne'as (the third generation from Æneas who escaped from Troy, B.C. 1183), so that the date may be assumed to be B.C. 1028, thus giving a scope of 2300 years to the chronicle. (The verse of this chronicle is eight and six syllables displayed together, so as to form lines of fourteen syllables each.) Robert de Brunne, whose chronicle is in two parts. The first ends with the death of Cadwallader, and the second with the death of Edward I. The earlier parts are similar to the Anglo-Norman chronicle of Wace. (The verse is octo-syllabic.) John Harding wrote a chronicle, in rhyme, down to the reign of Edward IV. (1470); it was edited by sir Henry Ellis, in 1812.

Chronicles. Two books of the Old Testament bear this title. The first book contains the history of David from the death of Saul, and corresponds to the Second Book of Samuel. The second book devotes the first nine chapters to a biography of Solomon, and the rest to an epitome of kings of Judah to the time of the Captivity.

The first nine chapters correspond to 1 Kings iii.–xi.

Chronicles of Canongate, certain stories supposed to have been written by Mrs. Martha Bethune Baliol, a lady of quality and fortune, who lived, when in Edinburgh, at Baliol Lodging, in the Canongate. These tales were written at the request of her cousin, Mr. Croftangry, by whom, at her death, they were published. The first series contains The Highland Widow, The Two Drovers, and [The Surgeon's Daughter, afterwards removed from this series]. The second series contains The Fair Maid of Perth.—Sir W. Scott: "Chronicles of Canongate" (introduction of The Highland Widow).

Chronology (The Father of), J. J. Scaliger (1540–1609).

Chronon-Hoton-Thol'ogos (King). He strikes Bombardin'ean, general of his forces, for giving him hashed pork, and saying, "Kings as great as Chrononhotonthologos have made a hearty meal on worse." The king calls his general a traitor. "Traitor in thy teeth!" retorts the general. They fight, and the king dies.—Carey: Chrononhotonthologos (a burlesque, 1734).

Chrysale (2 syl.), a simple-minded, hen-pecked French tradesman, whose wife Philaminte (3 syl.) neglects her house for the learned languages, women's rights, and the aristocracy of mind. He is himself a plain practical man, who has no sympathy with the pas blue movement. Chrysale has two daughters, Armande (2 syl.) and Henriette, both of whom love Clitandre; but Armande, who is a "blue-stocking," loves him platonically; while Henriette, who is a "thorough woman," loves him with woman's love. Chrysale sides with his daughter Henriette, and when he falls into money difficulties through the "learned proclivities" of his wife, Clitandre comes forward like a man, and obtains the consent of both parents to his marriage with Henriette.—Molière: Les Femmes Savantes (1672).

Chrysa'or (ch = k), the sword of sir Ar'tegal, which "exceeded all other swords." It once belonged to Jove, and was used by him against the Titans, but it had been laid aside till Astræa gave it to the Knight of Justice.

> Of most perfect metal it was made,
> Tempered with adamant . . . no substance was so . . . hard
> But it would pierce or cleave whereso it came.
> Spenser: Fatrie Queene, v. (1596).

N.B.—The poet tells us it was broken to pieces by Radigund queen of the Amazons (bk. v. 7), yet it reappears whole and sound (canto 12), when it is used with good service against Grantorto (the spirit of rebellion). Spenser says it was called Chrysaor because "the blade was garnished all with gold."

Chrysa'or, son of Neptune and Medu'sa. He married Callir'rhoë (4 syl.), one of the sea-nymphs.

> Chrysaor rising out of the sea,
> Showed thus glorious and thus sumptuous,
> Leaving the arms of Callirrhoë.
> Longfellow: The Evening Star.

Chryseis [Kri-see'-iss], daughter of Chrysês priest of Apollo. She was famed for her beauty and her embroidery. During the Trojan war Chryseis was taken captive and allotted to Agamemnon king of Argos, but her father came to ransom her. The king would not accept the offered ransom, and Chrysês prayed that a plague might fall on the Grecian camp. His prayer was answered; and in order to avert the plague Agamemnon sent the lady back to her father, not only without ransom, but laden with costly gifts.—Homer: Iliad, i.

Chrysos, a rich Athenian, who called himself "a patron of art," but measured art as a draper measures tape.—Gilbert: Pygmalion and Galatea (1871). (See CRITIC, p.244.)

Chrysostom, a famous scholar, who died for love of Marcella, "rich William's daughter."

Unrivalled in learning and wit, he was sincere in disposition, generous and magnificent without ostentation, prudent and sedate without affectation, modest and complaisant without meanness. In a word, one of the foremost in goodness of heart, and second to none in misfortunes.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. ii. 5 (1605).

N.B.—The saint (317-407) was called Chrysostom, Golden-mouth, for his great eloquence. His name was John. (Greek, chrusos, "gold;" stŏma, "mouth.")

Chucks, the boatswain under captain Savage.—Marryat: Peter Simple (1833).

Chuffey, Anthony Chuzzlewit's old clerk, almost in his dotage, but master and man love each other with sincerest affection.

Chuffey fell back into a dark corner on one side of the fire-place, where he always spent his evenings, and was neither seen nor heard . . . save once, when a cup of tea was given him, in which he was seen to soak his bread mechanically. . . . He remained, as it were, frozen up, if any term expressive of such a vigorous process can be applied to him.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit, xl. (1843).

Chunée (Ă la), very huge and bulky. Chunée was the largest elephant ever brought to England. Henry Harris, manager of Covent Garden, bought it for £900 to appear in the pantomime of Harlequin Padmenaba, in 1810. It was subsequently sold to Cross, the proprietor of Exeter 'Change. Chunée at length became mad, and was shot by a detachment of the Guards, receiving 152 wounds. The skeleton is preserved in the museum of the College of Surgeons. It is 12 feet 4 inches high.

Church. I go to church to hear God praised, not the king. This was the wise but severe rebuke of George III. to Dr. Wilson, of St. Margaret's Church, London.

Church built by Voltaire. Voltaire the atheist built at Ferney a Christian church, and had this inscription affixed to it, "Deo erexit Voltaire." Campbell, in the life of Cowper (vol. vii. 358), says "he knows not to whom Cowper alludes in these lines"—

Nor his who for the bane of thousands born,
Built God a church, and laughed His Word to scorn.
Cowper: Retirement (1782).

Church-of-Englandism. This word was the coinage of Jeremy Bentham (1748-1832).

Churchill (Ethel), a novel by L. E. L. (Letitia E. Landon), 1837. Walpole and other contemporaries of George I. are introduced.

Chuz'zlewit (Anthony), cousin of Martin Chuzzlewit the grandfather. Anthony is an avaricious old hunks, proud of having brought up his son Jonas to be as mean and grasping as himself. His two redeeming points are his affection for his old servant Chuffey, and his forgiveness of Jonas after his attempt to poison him.

The old-established firm of Anthony Chuzzlewit and Son, Manchester warehousemen . . . had its place of business in a very narrow street somewhere behind the Post-Office. . . . A dim, dirty, smoky, tumble-down, rotten old house it was . . . but here the firm . . . transacted their business . . . and neither the young man nor the old one had any other residence.—Chap. xl.

Jonas Chuzzlewit, son of Anthony, of the "firm of Anthony Chuzzlewit and Son, Manchester warehousemen." A consummate villain of mean brutality and small tyranny. He attempts to poison his old father, and murders Montague Tigg, who knows his secret. Jonas marries Mercy Pecksniff, his cousin, and leads her a life of utter misery. His education had been conducted on money-grubbing principles; the first word he was taught to spell was gain, and the second money. He poisons himself to save his neck from the gallows.

This fine young man had all the inclination of a profligate of the first water, and only lacked the one good trait in the common catalogue of debauched vices—open-handedness—to be a notable vagabond. But there his griping and penurious habits stepped in.—Chap. xl.

Martin Chuzzlewit, sen., grandfather to the hero of the same name. A stern old man, whose kind heart has been turned to gall by the dire selfishness of his relations. Being resolved to expose Pecksniff, he goes to live in his house, and pretends to be weak in intellect, but keeps his eyes sharp open, and is able to expose the canting scoundrel in all his deformity.

Martin Chuzzlewit, jun., the hero of the tale called Martin Chuzzlewit, grandson to old Martin. His nature has been warped by bad training, and at first he is both selfish and exacting; but the troubles and hardships he undergoes in "Eden" completely transform him, and he becomes worthy of Mary Graham, whom he marries.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Chyndo'nax, a chief druid, whose tomb (with a Greek inscription) was discovered near Dijon, in 1598.

Ciacco' (2 syl.), a glutton, spoken to by Dante, in the third circle of hell, the place to which gluttons are consigned to endless woe. The word means "a pig," and is not a proper name, but only a symbolical one.—Dante: Hell, vi. (1300).

Ciacco, thy dire affliction grieves me much.
Hell, vi.

Cicero. When the great Roman orator was given up by Augustus to the revenge of Antony, it was a cobbler who conducted the sicarii to Formiæ, whither Cicero had fled in a litter, intending to put to sea. His bearers would have fought, but Cicero forbade them, and one Herennius has the unenviable notoriety of being his murderer.

It was a cobbler that set the murderers on Cicero.—Ovidii: Ariadné, i. 6.

(Some say that Publius Lænas gave the fatal blow.)

Cicero of the British Senate, George Canning (1770–1827).

Cicero of France, Jean Baptiste Massillon (1663–1742).

Cicero of Germany, John elector of Brandenberg (1455, 1486–1499).

Cicero's Mouth, Philippe Pot, prime minister of Louis XI. (1428–1494).

The British Cicero, William Pitt, earl of Chatham (1708–1778).

The Christian Cicero, Lucius Cœlius Lactantius (died 330).

The German Cicero, Johann Sturm, printer and scholar (1507–1589).

Cicle'nius. So Chaucer calls Mercury. He was named Cylle'nius from mount Cylle'nê, in Peloponnesus, where he was born.

Clclenius riding in his chirachea.
Chaucer: Compl. of Mars and Venus (1391).

Cid (The) = Seid or Signior, also called Campeador [Cam-pa'-dor] or "Camp hero." Rodrigue Diaz de Bivar was surnamed "the Cid." The great hero of Castille was born at Burgos 1030 and died 1099. He signalized himself by his exploits in the reigns of Ferdinand, Sancho II., and Alphonso VI. of Leon and Castille. In the wars between Sancho II. and his brother (Alphonso VI.), he sided with the former; and on the assassination of Sancho, was disgraced, and quitted the court. The Cid then assembled his vassals, and marched against the Moors, whom he conquered in several battles, so that Alphonso was necessitated to recall him.

The Spanish chronicle of the Cid belongs to the thirteenth century, and was first printed in 1544; another version was by Medina del Campo, in 1552.

The Spanish poem of the Cid dates from 1207; and 102 ballads of the Cid in Spanish were published in 1615.

Southey published an excellent English Chronicle of the Cid in 1808; Lockhart translated into English verse 8 of the ballads; George Dennis rendered into prose and verse a connected tale of the great Spanish hero in 1845.

Corneille and Guilhem de Cantro have admirable tragedies on the subject; Ross Neil has an English drama called The Cid; Sanchez, in 1775, wrote a long poem of 1128 verses called Poema del Cid Campeador. (And it was the tragedy of The Cid which gained for Corneille (in 1636) the title of Le grand Corneille.)

N B.—The Cid, in Spanish romance, occupies the same position as Arthur does in English story, Charlemagne in French, and Theodorick in German romance.

The Cid's Father, don Diego Lainez.

The Cid's Mother, doña Teresa Nuñez.

The Cid's Wife, Xime'na, daughter of count Lozano de Gormaz. The French call her La Belle Chimène, but the rôle ascribed to her by Corneille is wholly imaginary.

Never more to thine own castle
Wilt thou turn Babieca's rein [3 syl.];
Never will thy loved Ximena
See thee at her side again.
The Cid.

The Cid's Children. His two daughters were Elvi'ra and Sol; his son Diego Rodriquez died young.

The Cid's Horse was Babieca [either Bab-i-ĕ'-keh or Ba-bee'-keh]. It survived its master two years and a half, but no one was allowed to mount it. Babieca was buried before the monastery gates of Valencia, and two elms were planted to mark the spot.

Troth it goodly was and pleasant
To behold him at their head,
All in mail on Babieca [4 syl.],
And to list the words he said.
The Cid.

The Cid's Swords, Cola'da and Tiso'na ("terror of the world"). The latter was taken by him from king Buscar.

The Portuguese Cid, Nunez Alva'rez Perei'ra (1360–1431).

Cid Hamet Benengeli, the hypothetical author of Don Quixote. (See BENENGELI, p. 111.)

Spanish commentators have discovered this pseudonym to be only an Arabian version of Signior Cervantes. Cid, i.e. "signior;" Hamet, a Moorish prefix; and Ben-en-geli, meaning "son of a stag." So cervato ("a young stag") is the basis of the name Cervantes.

Cider, a poem by John Philips (1708), in imitation of the Georgics of Virgil.

Cid'li, the daughter of Jairus, restored to life by Jesus. She was beloved by Sem'ida, the young man of Nain, also raised by Jesus from the dead.—Klopstock: The Messiah, iv. (1771).

Cil'laros, the horse of Castor or Pollux, so named from Cylla, in Troas.

Cimmerian Darkness. Homer places the Cimmerians beyond Ocēănus, in a land of never-ending gloom; and immediately after Cimmeria he places the empire of Hādēs. Pliny (Historia Naturalis, vi. 14) places Cimmeria near the lake Avernus, in Italy, where "the sun never penetrates." Cimmeria is now called Kertch, but the Cossacks call it Prekla (Hell).

There under ebon shades and low-browed necks . . .
In dark Cimmerian deserts ever dwell.
Milton: L'Allegro (1638).

Ye spectre-doubts that roll
Cimmerian darkness on the parting soul.
Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, ii. (1799).

Cincinna'tus of the Americans, George Washington (1732–1799).

Cinderel'la, the heroine of a fairy tale. She was the drudge of the house, "put upon" by her two elder sisters. While the elder sisters were at a ball, a fairy came, and having arrayed the "little cinder-girl" in ball costume, sent her in a magnificent coach to the palace where the ball was given. The prince fell in love with her, but knew not who she was. This, however, he discovered by means of a "glass slipper" which she dropped, and which fitted no foot but her own.

¶ This tale is substantially the same as that of Rhodopis and Psammitichus in Ælian (Var. Hist., xiii. 32). A similar one is also told in Strabo (Georg. xvii.). It is known all over Italy.

(The glass slipper should be the fur slipper, pantoufle en vair, not en verre; our version being taken from the Contes de Fees of C. Perrault, 1697.)

Thou wilt find
My fortunes all as fair as hers who lay
Among the ashes, and wedded a king's son.
Tennyson: Gareth and Lynette, p. 76.

¶ The variant of this tale as told of Rhodope (3 syl.), about B.C. 670, is this: Rhodopê was bathing, when an eagle pounced on one of her slippers and carried it off, but dropped it at Memphis, where king Psammetĭcus was, at the time, holding a court of justice. Struck with the beauty and diminutive size of the shoe, he sent forth a proclamation for the owner. In due time Rhodopê was discovered, and, being brought before the king, he married her.—Strabo and Ælian.

Cinna, a tragedy by Pierre Corneille (1637). Mdlle. Rachel, in 1838, took the chief female character, and produced a great sensation in Paris.

Cinq-Mars (H. Coiffier de Ruze, marquis de), favourite of Louis XIII. and protégé of Richelieu (1620–1642). Irritated by the cardinal's opposition to his marriage with Marie de Gonzague, Cinq-Mars tried to overthrow or to assassinate him. Gaston, the king's brother, sided with the conspirator, but Richelieu discovered the plot; and Cinq-Mars, being arrested, was condemned to death. Alfred de Vigny published, in 1826, a novel (in imitation of Scott's historical novels) on the subject, under the title of Cinq-Mars.

Cinquecento (4 syl.), the five-hundred epoch of Italian notables. They were Ariosto (1474–1533), Tasso (1544–1595), and Giovanni Rucellai (1475–1526), poets; Raphael (1483–1520), Titian (1480–1576), and Michael Angelo (1474–1564), painters. These, with Machiavelli, Luigi Alamanni, Bernardo Baldi, etc., make up what is termed the "Cinquecentesti." The word means the worthies of the '500 epoch, and it will be observed that they all flourished between 1500 and the close of that century. (See SEICENTA.)

Ouidà writes in winter mornings at a Venetian writing-table of cinquecento work that would enrapture the souls of the virtuosi who haunt Christie's.—E. Yates: Celebrities, xix.

Cipan'go or Zipango, a marvellous island described in the Voyages of Marco Polo, the Venetian traveller. He described it as lying some 1500 miles from land. This island was an object of diligent search with Columbus and other early navigators; but it belongs to that wonderful chart which contains the El Dorado of sir Walter Raleigh, the Utopia of sir Thomas More, the Atlantis of lord Bacon, the Laputa of dean Swift, and other places better known in story than in geography.

Cipher. The Rev. R. Egerton Warburton, being asked for his cipher by a lady, in 1845, wrote back—

A 0 u 0 I 0 thee.
Oh I 0 no 0 but 0 me;
Yet thy 0 my 0 one 0 go,
Till u d 0 the 0 u 0 so.

A cipher you sigh-for, I sigh-for thee.
Oh I sigh-for no cipher, but sigh-for me;
Yet thy sigh-for my cipher one ci-for go [on-ce I for-go],
Till you de-cipher the cipher you sigh-for so.

(Erroneously ascribed to Dr. Whewell.)

Dr. Whewell's cipher is as follows:—

A headless man had a letter [0] to write;
He who read it [naught] had lost his sight;
The dumb repeated it [naught] word for word;
And deaf was the man who listened and heard [naught].

 Not equal to the above is the Epitaph on a Fifer—

Circe (2 syl.), a sorceress who metamorphosed the companions of Ulysses into swine. Ulysses resisted the enchantment by means of the herb môly, given him by Mercury.

Who knows not Circe,
The daughter of the sun, whose charmèd cup
Whoever tasted lost his upright shape,
And downward fell into a grovelling swine?
Milton: Comus (1634).

Circuit (Serjeant), in Foote's farce called The Lame Lover (1770).

Circumlocution Office, a term applied by Dickens, in Little Dorrit (1855), to our public offices, where the duty is so divided and subdivided that the simplest process has to pass through a whole series of officials. The following, from baron Stockmar, will illustrate the absurdity:—

In the English palace the lord steward finds the fuel and lays the fire, but the lord chamberlain lights it. The baron says he was once sent by the queen [Victoria] to sir Frederick Watson (master of the household), to complain that the drawing-room was always cold. Sir Frederick replied, "You see, it is not my fault, for the lord steward only lays the fire, it is the lord chamberlain who lights it."

Again he says—

The lord chamberlain provides the lamps, but the lord steward has to see that they are trimmed and lighted.

Here, therefore, the duty is reversed. Again—

If a pane of glass or the door of a cupboard in the kitchen needs mending, the process is as follows: (1) A requisition must be prepared and signed by the chief cook. (2) This must be countersigned by the clerk of the kitchen. (3) It is then taken to the master of the household. (4) It must next be authorized at the lord chamberlain's office. (5) Being thus authorized, it is laid before the clerk of the works under the office of Woods and Forests. So that it would take months before the pane of glass or cupboard could be mended. —Memoirs, ii. 121, 122.

(Some of this foolery has been recently abolished.)

Cirrha, one of the summits of Parnassus, sacred to Apollo. That of Nysa, another eminence in the same mountain, was dedicated to Bacchus.

My vows I send, my homage, to the seats
Of rocky Cirrha.
Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads (1767).

Cisley or Ciss, any dairy-maid. Tusser frequently speaks of the "dairy-maid Cisley," and in April Husbandry tells Ciss she must carefully keep these ten guests from her cheeses: Geha'zi, Lot's wife, Argus, Tom Piper, Crispin, Lazarus, Esau, Mary Maudlin, Gentiles, and bishops. (1) Gehazi, because a cheese should never be a dead white, like Gehazi the leper. (2) Lot's wife, because a cheese should not be too salt, like Lot's wife. (3) Argus, because a cheese should not be full of eyes, like Argus. (4) Tom Piper, because a cheese should not be "hoven and puffed," like the cheeks of a piper. (5) Crispin, because a cheese should not be leathery, as if for a cobbler's use. (6) Lazarus, because a cheese should not be poor, like the beggar Lazarus. (7) Esau, because a cheese should not be hairy, like Esau. (8) Mary Maudlin, because a cheese should not be full of whey, as Mary Maudlin was full of tears. (9) Gentiles, because a cheese should not be full of maggots or gentils. (10) Bishops, because a cheese should not be made of burnt milk, or milk "banned by a bishop."—Tusser: Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry ("April," 1557).

Citizen (The), a farce by Arthur Murphy. George Philpot is destined to be the husband of Maria Wilding. But as Maria Wilding is in love with Beaufort, she behaves so sillily to her betrothed that he refuses to marry her; whereupon she gives her hand to Beaufort (1757).

Citizen King (The), Louis Philippe, the first elective king of France (1773, 1830–1849, abdicated and died 1850).

CITY, plu. Cities.

City of Churches (The), Brooklyn, New York, which has an unusual number of churches.

City of David (The), Jerusalem.—2 Sam. v. 7, 9.

City of Destruction (The), this world, or rather the worldly state of the unconverted. Bunyan makes "Christian" flee from the City of Destruction and journey to the Celestial City. By which he allegorizes the "walk of a Christian" from conversion to death (1678).

City of Enchantments, a magical city described in the story of "Beder Prince of Persia."—Arabian Nights' Entertainments.

City of God (The), the Church, or whole body of believers. The phrase is used by St. Augustine.

City of Lanterns (The), an imaginary cloud-city somewhere beyond the zodiac. —Lucian: Veræ Historiæ.

City of Legions, Caerleon-on-Usk. Newport is the port of this ancient city (Monmouthshire and Glamorganshire). It was in the City of Legions that Arthur held his court. It contained two cathedrals, viz. St. Julius and St. Aaron, built in honour of two martyrs who suffered death here in the reign of Diocletian.

City of Masts (The), London.

City of Monuments (The), Baltimore, in Maryland. One of its streets is called Monument Street.

City of Palaces (The). Three cities are so called: (1) Rome from the reign of Augustus. Agrippa converted "a city of brick huts into a city of marble palaces." (2) Calcutta. (3) St. Petersburg is so called, from its numerous Imperial and Government edifices.

City of Refuge (The), Medi'na, in Arabia, where Mahomet took refuge when driven by conspirators from Mecca. He entered the city, not as a fugitive, but in triumph (A.D. 622).

Cities of Refuge, Bezer, Ramoth, and Golan (east of Jordan); Hebron, Shechem, and Kedesh (west of that river). —Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 1–8.

City of the Great King (The), Jerusalem.—Psalm xlviii. 2; Matt. v. 35.

Cities of the Plain (The), Sodom and Gomorrah.—Gen. xiii. 12.

City of the Prophet, Medi'na, in Arabia, where Mahomet was protected when he fled from Mecca (July 16, A.D. 622).

City of the Sun (The), Balbec, called in Greek, Heliop'olis ("sun-city").

(In Campanella's romance the "City of the Sun" is an ideal republic, constructed on the model of Plato's republic. It is an hypothetical perfect society or theocratic communism. Sir T. More in his Utopia, and lord Bacon in his Atlantis, devised similar cities.)

City of the Tribes, Galway, in Ireland, "the residence of thirteen tribes," which settled there in 1235.

City of the West, Glasgow, in Scotland, situate on the Clyde, the principal river on the west coast.

The Cleanest City in the World (The), Broek, in Holland, which is "painfully neat and clean."

The Seven Cities, Thebes (in Egypt), Jerusalem, Babylon, Athens, Rome, Constantinople, and London (for commerce) or Paris (for beauty).

(In the Seven Wonders of the World, the last of the wonders is doubtful, some giving the Pharos of Egypt, and others the Palace of Cyrus; so again in the Seven Sages of Greece, the seventh is either Periander, Myson, or Epimen'idês.)

City Madam (The), a comedy by Philip Massinger (1633). The City madam was the daughter of farmer Goodman Humble, and married sir John Frugal, a merchant, who became immensely wealthy, and retired from business. By a deed of gift he transferred his wealth to his brother Luke, whereby madam and her daughter were both made dependent on him. During her days of wealth the extravagance of lady Frugal was unbounded, and her dress costly beyond conception; but Luke reduced her state to that of a farmer's daughter. Luke says to her—

> You were served in plate;
> Stirred not a foot without a coach, and going
> To church, not for devotion, but to show
> Your pomp.

The City Madam is an extraordinarily spirited picture of actual life, idealized into a semi-comic strain of poetry. —Professor Spalding.

City Mouse and Country Mouse (The), a fable by Prior (1689), in ridicule of Dryden's Hind and Panther. A city mouse invited a country mouse to supper, and set before his guest all sorts of delicacies; but, in the midst of the feast, a cat rushed in and broke up the banquet. Whereupon the country mouse exclaimed that she preferred a more frugal fare with liberty.

Civil Wars of England.

> There Dutton Dutton kills; a Done doth kill a Done;
> A Booth a Booth, and Leigh by Leigh is overthrown;
> A Venables against a Venables doth stand;
> A Troutbeck fighteth with a Troutbeck hand to hand;
> There Molineux doth make a Molineux to die,
> And Egerton the strength of Egerton doth try.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xxii. (1622).

(S. Daniel, in 1609, published a rhyming chronicle of these wars, in eight books.)

Civi'lis, the great Batavian hero, swore to leave his beard and hair uncut till he had driven out the Romans (A.C. 69).

¶ Lumeq (count de la Marck), a descendant of "The Wild Boar of Ardennes."

swore to do the same till he had liberated his country from the Spaniards.—Motley: Dutch Republic, part iii. 4. (See ISABELLA.)

Clack-Dish, a dish or platter with a lid, used at one time by beggars, who clacked the lid when persons drew near, to arrest attention and thus solicit alms.

Your beggar of fifty; and his use was to put a ducat in her clack-dish.—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure, act iii. sc. 2 (1603).

Cladpole (Tim), Richard Lower, of Chiddingly, author of Tom Cladpole's Journey to Lunnun (1831); Jan Cladpole's Trip to 'Merricur (1844), etc.

Claimant (The). William Knollys, in The Great Banbury Case, claimed the baronetcy, but was non-suited. This suit lasted 150 years (1660–1811).

¶ Douglas v. Hamilton, in The Great Douglas Case, was settled in favour of the claimant, who was at once raised to the peerage under the name and title of baron Douglas of Douglas Castle; but was not restored to the title of duke (1767–1769).

¶ Tom Provis, a schoolmaster of ill repute, who had married a servant of sir Hugh Smithes of Ashton Hall, near Bristol, claimed the baronetcy and estates. He was non-suited and condemned to imprisonment for twenty-one years (1853).

¶ Arthur Orton, who claimed to be sir Roger Tichborne (drowned at sea). He was non-suited and sentenced to fourteen years' imprisonment for perjury (1871–1872).

Clamades (3 syl.), son of king Crampart, who mounted his father's wooden horse, and was conveyed through the air at the rate of 100 miles an hour.—Alkman: Reynard the Fox (1498).

Clandestine Marriage (The). Fanny Sterling, the younger daughter of Mr. Sterling, a rich city merchant, is clandestinely married to Mr. Lovewell, an apprentice in the house, of good family; and sir John Melvil is engaged to Miss Sterling, the elder sister. Lord Ogleby is a guest in the merchant's house. Sir John prefers Fanny to her elder sister, and not knowing of her marriage, proposes to her, but is rejected. Fanny appeals to lord Ogleby, who, being a vain old fop, fancies she is in love with him, and tells Sterling he means to make her a countess. Matters being thus involved, Lovewell goes to consult with Fanny about declaring their marriage, and the sister, convinced that sir John is shut up in her sister's room, rouses the house with a cry of "Thieves!" Fanny and Lovewell now make their appearance. All parties are scandalized. But Fanny declares they have been married four months, and lord Ogleby takes their part. So all ends well.—Colman and Garrick (1766).

(This comedy is a réchauffé of The False Concord, by Rev. James Townley, many of the characters and much of the dialogue being preserved.)

Clang of Shields. To strike the shield with the blunt end of a spear was in Ossianic times an indication of war to the death. A bard, when the shield was thus struck, raised the mort-song.

Cairbar rises in his arms. Darkness gathers on his brow. The hundred harps cease at once. The clang of shields is heard. Far distant on the heath Olla raised the song of woe.—Ossian: Temora, i.

Clapham Academy (Ode on the Distant Prospect of), by T. Hood (1847), a parody on Gray's Distant Prospect of Eton College (1742).

CLARA, in Otway's comedy called The Cheats of Scapin, an English version of Les Fourberies de Scapin, by Molière, represents the French character called "Hyacinthe." Her father is called by Otway "Gripe," and by Molière "Géronte" (2 syl.); her brother is "Leander," in French "Leandre;" and her sweetheart "Octavian" son of "Thrifty," in French "Octave" son of "Argante." The sum of money wrung from Gripe is £200, but that squeezed out of Géronte is 1500 livres.

Clara [d'Almanza], daughter of don Guzman of Seville; beloved by don Ferdinand, but destined by her mother for a cloister. She loves Ferdinand; but repulses him from shyness and modesty, quits home, and takes refuge in St. Catherine's Convent. Ferdinand discovers her retreat; and, after a few necessary blunders, they are married.—Sheridan: The Duenna (1773).

Clara (Donna), the troth-plight wife of Octavio. Her affianced husband, having killed don Felix in a duel, was obliged to lie perdu for a time, and Clara, assuming her brother's clothes and name, went in search of him. Both came to Salamanca, both set up at the Eagle, both hired the same servant Lazarillo, and ere long they met, recognized each other, and became man and wife.—Jephson: Two Strings to your Bow (1792).

Clara [DOUGLAS], a lovely girl of artless mind, feeling heart, great modesty, and well accomplished. She loved Alfred Evelyn, but refused to marry him because they were both too poor to support a house. Evelyn was left an immense fortune, and proposed to Georgina Vesey, but Georgina gave her hand to sir Frederick Blount. Being thus disentangled, Evelyn again proposed to Clara, and was joyfully accepted.—Lord Lytton: Money (1840).

Clarchen [Klar'-kn], a female character in Goethe's Egmont, noted for her constancy and devotion.

Clare (Ada), cousin of Richard Carstone, both of whom are orphans and wards in Chancery. They marry each other, but Richard dies young, blighted by the law's delay in the great Chancery suit of "Jarndyce v. Jarndyce."—C. Dickens: Bleak House (1853).

Clarence (George duke of), introduced by sir W. Scott in Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Clarence and the Malmsey-Butt. According to tradition, George duke of Clarence, having joined Warwick to replace Henry VI. on the throne, was put to death; and the choice of the mode of death being offered him, he was drowned in a butt of malmsey wine (1473).

> 'Twere better sure to die so, than be shut
> With maudlin Clarence in his malmsey-butt.
> Byron: Don Juan, i. 166 (1819).

Clarendon (The earl of), lord chancellor to Charles II. Introduced by sir W. Scott in Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Claribel (Sir), surnamed "The Lewd." One of the six knights who contended for the false Florimel.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 9 (1596).

Claribel, the pseudonym of Mrs. Barnard, author of numerous popular songs (from 1865 to).

Clarice (3 syl.), wife of Rinaldo, and sister of Huon of Bordeaux. Introduced in the romances of Bojardo, Ariosto, Tasso, etc.

Clarin or Clarin'da, the confidential maid of Radigund queen of the Am'azons. When the queen had got sir Ar'tegal into her power, and made him change his armour for an apron, and his sword for a distaff, she fell in love with the captive, and sent Clarin to win him over by fair promises and indulgences. Clarin performed the appointed mission, but fell in love herself with the knight, and told the queen that sir Artegal was obstinate, and rejected her advances with scorn.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 5 (1596).

Clarinda, the heroine of Mrs. Centlivre's drama The Beau's Duel (1703).

> Nothing could be more captivating than Mrs. Pritchard [1711–1768] in "lady Macbeth," "The Queen" in Hamlet, "Clarinda," "Estifania;" in short, every species of strong nature received from her a polish and perfection than which nothing could be more truly captivating.—Dibdin: History of the Stage.

("Estifania," in Rule a Wife and have a Wife, by Fletcher (1624).)

Clarinda, a merry, good-humoured, high-spirited lady, in love with Charles Frankly. The madcap Ranger is her cousin.—Dr. Hoadly: The Suspicious Husband (1747).

Clarinda of Robert Burns was Mrs. Maclehose, who was alive in 1833.

Clar'ion, the son and heir of Muscarol. He was the fairest and most prosperous of all the race of flies. Aragnol, the son of Arachnê (the spider), entertained a deep and secret hatred of the young prince, and set himself to destroy him; so, weaving a most curious net, Clarion was soon caught, and Aragnol gave him his death-wound by piercing him under the left wing.—Spenser: Muiopotmos, or The Butterfly's Fate (1590).

Claris'sa, wife of Gripe the scrivener. A lazy, lackadaisical, fine city lady, who thinks "a woman must be of mechanic mould who is either troubled or pleased with anything her husband can do" (act i. 3). She has "wit and beauty, with a fool to her husband," but though "fool," a hard, grasping, mean old hunks.

> "I have more subjects for spleen than one. Is it not a most horrible thing that I should be a scrivener's wife! . . . Don't you think nature designed me for something plus elevé? Why, I dare abuse nobody. I'm afraid to affront people, . . . or to ruin their reputations. . . . I dare not raise the lie of a man, though he neglects to make love to me; nor report a woman to be a fool, though she is handsomer than I. In short, I dare not so much as bid my footman kick people out of doors, though they come to dun me for what I owe them."—Sir J. Vanbrugh: The Confederacy, i. 3 (1695).

Clarissa, sister of Beverley, plighted to George Bellmont.—Murphy: All in the Wrong (1761).

Clarissa Harlowe. (See HARLOWE.)

Clarke (The Rev. T.), the pseudonym of John Gall, the novelist (1779–1839).

Clarke (The Rev. C. C.), one of the many pseudonyms of sir Richard Phillips, author of The Hundred Wonders of the World (1818), Readings in Natural Philosophy, etc.

Cla'tho, the last wife of Fingal and mother of Fillan, Fingal's youngest son.

Claude (The English), Richard Wilson (1714-1782).

Clau'dine (2 syl.), wife of the porter of the hotel Harancour, and old nurse of Julio "the deaf and dumb" count. She recognises the lad, who had been rescued by De l'Epée from the streets of Paris, and brought up by him under the name of Theodore. Ultimately, the guardian Darlemont confesses that he had sent him adrift under the hope of getting rid of him; but being proved to be the count, he is restored to his rank and property. —Holcroft: The Deaf and Dumb (1785).

Claudio (Lord) of Florence, a friend of don Pedro prince of Aragon, and engaged to Hero (daughter of Leonato governor of Messina).—Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing (1600).

Claudio, brother of Isabella and the suitor of Juliet. He is imprisoned by lord Angelo for the seduction of Juliet, and his sister Isabella pleads for his release. —Shakespeare: Measure for Measure (1603).

Clau'dius, king of Denmark, who poisoned his brother, married the widow, and usurped the throne. Claudius induced Laertês to challenge Hamlet to play with foils, but persuaded him to poison his weapon. In the combat the foils got changed, and Hamlet wounded Laertês with the poisoned weapon. In order still further to secure the death of Hamlet, Claudius had a cup of poisoned wine prepared, which he intended to give Hamlet when he grew thirsty with playing. The queen, drinking of this cup, died of poison; and Hamlet, rushing on Claudius, stabbed him and cried alond, "Here, thou incestuous, murderous Dane, . . . Follow my mother!"—Shakespeare: Hamlet (1596).

(In the History of Hamblet, Claudius is called "Fengon," a far better name for a Dane.)

Claudius, the instrument of Appius the decemvir for entrapping Virginia. He pretended that Virginia was his slave, who had been stolen from him and sold to Virginius.—Knowles: Virginius (1820).

Claudius (Mathias), a German poet born at Rheinfeld, and author of the famous song called Rheinweinlied ("Rhenish wine-song"), sung at all convivial feasts of the Germans.

Claudius, though he sang of flagons,
And huge tankards filled with Rhenish,
From the fiery blood of dragons
Never would his own replenish.
Longfellow: Drinking Song.

Claus (Peter). (See under K.)

Claus or Klaus (Santa), a familiar name for St. Nicholas, the patron saint of children. On Christmas Eve German children have presents stowed away in their socks and shoes while they are asleep, and the little credulous ones suppose that Santa Claus or Klaus placed them there.

St. Nicholas is said to have supplied three destitute maidens with marriage portions by secretly leaving money with their widowed mother; and as his day occurs just before Christmas, he was selected for the gift-giver on Christmas Eve.—Yonge.

Claverhouse (3 syl.), John Graham of Claverhouse (viscount Dundee), a relentless Jacobite, so rapacious and profane, so violent in temper and obdurate of heart, that every Scotchman hates the name. He hunted the covenanters with real vindictiveness, and is almost a byword for barbarity and cruelty (1650-1689).

Claverhouse, or the marquis of Argyll, a kinsman of Ravenswood, introduced by sir W. Scott in The Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Clavijo (Don), a cavalier who "could touch the guitar to admiration, write poetry, dance divinely, and had a fine genius for making bird-cages." He married the princess Antonomasia of Candaya, and was metamorphosed by Malambru'no into a crocodile of some unknown metal. Don Quixote disenchanted him "by simply attempting the adventure."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iii. 4, 5 (1615).

Clavile'no, the wooden horse on which don Quixote got astride in order to disenchant the infanta Antonoma'sia, her husband, and the countess Trifaldi (called the "Dolori'da dueña"). It was "the very horse on which Peter of Provence carried off the fair Magalona, and was constructed by Merlin." This horse was called Clavileno or Wooden Peg, because it was governed by a wooden pin in the forehead.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iii. 4, 5 (1615).

There is one peculiar advantage attending this horse; he neither eats, drinks, sleeps, nor wants shoeing. His name is not Pegasus, nor Bucephalus; nor is it Bellladoro, the name of the steed of Orlando Furioso; neither is it Bayarte, which belonged to Reynaldo de Montalbon; nor Bootes, nor Perifos, the horses of the sun; but his name is Clavileno the Winged.—Chap. 4.

Claypole (Noah), alias "Morris Bolter," an ill-conditioned charity-boy, who takes down the shutters of Sowerberry's shop and receives broken meats from Charlotte (Sowerberry's servant), whom he afterwards marries.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Cleante (2 syl.), brother-in-law of Orgon. He is distinguished for his genuine piety, and is both high-minded and compassionate.—Molière: La Tartuffe (1664).

Cleante (2 syl.), son of Har'pagon the miser, in love with Mariane (3 syl.). Harpagon, though 60 years old, wished to marry the same young lady, but Cléante solved the difficulty thus: He dug up a casket of gold from the garden, hidden under a tree by the miser, and while Harpagon was raving about the loss of his gold, Cléante told him he might take his choice between Mariane and the gold. The miser preferred the casket, which was restored to him, and Cléante married Mariane. — Molière: L'Avare (1667).

Cleante (2 syl.), the lover of Angelique daughter of Argan the malade imaginaire. As Argan had promised Angelique in marriage to Thomas Diafoirus a young surgeon, Cléante carries on his love as a music-master, and though Argan is present, the lovers sing to each other their plans under the guise of an interlude called "Tircis and Philis." Ultimately, Argan assents to the marriage of his daughter with Cléante.—Molière: Le Malade Imaginaire (1673).

Clean'the (2 syl.), sister of Siphax of Paphos.—Beaumont (?) and Fletcher: The Mad Lover (1617).

Beaumont died 1616.

Cleanthe (3 syl.), the lady beloved by Ion.—Talfourd: Ion (1835).

Clean'thes (3 syl.), son of Leon'idês and husband of Hippolita, noted for his filial piety. The duke of Epire made a law that all men who had attained the age of 80 should be put to death as useless incumbrances of the commonwealth. Simonidês, a young libertine, admired the law, but Cleanthês looked on it with horror, and determined to save his father from its operation. Accordingly, he gave out that his father was dead, and an ostentatious funeral took place; but Cleanthês retired to a wood, where he concealed Leon'idês, while he and his wife waited on him and administered to his wants. —The Old Law (a comedy of Philip Massinger, T. Middleton, and W. Rowley, 1620).

Clegg (Holdfast), a puritan millwright. —Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Cleish'botham (Jededi'ah), schoolmaster and parish clerk of Gandercleuch, who employed his assistant teacher to arrange and edit the tales told by the landlord of the Wallace inn of the same parish. These tales the editor disposed in three series, called by the general title of The Tales of My Landlord (q.v.). (See introduction of The Black Dwarf.) Of course the real author is sir Walter Scott (1771–1832).

Mrs. Dorothea Cleishbotham, wife of the schoolmaster, a perfect Xantippê, and "sworn sister of the Eumen'idês."

Cle'lia or Clœ'lia, a Roman maiden, one of the hostages given to Por'sina. She made her escape from the Etruscan camp by swimming across the Tiber. Being sent back by the Romans, Porsina not only set her at liberty for her gallant deed, but allowed her to take with her a part of the hostages. Mdlle. Scudéri has a novel on the subject, entitled Clélie, Histoire Romaine.

> Our statues—not of those that men desire—
> Sleek odalisques [Turkish slaves] . . . but
> The Carian Artemisia . . . [See p. 63.]
> Clelia, Cornelia . . . and the Roman brows
> Of Agrippina.
> Tennyson: The Princess, ii.

Clelia, a vain, frivolous female butterfly, with a smattering of everything. In youth she was a coquette; and when youth was passed, tried sundry means to earn a living, but without success.—Crabbe: The Borough (1810).

Clélie (2 syl.), the heroine of a novel so called by Mdlle. Scudéri. (See CLELIA.)

Clemanthe, the heroine of Talfourd's tragedy of Ion (1835).

Clement, one of the attendants of sir Reginal Front de Bœuf (a follower of prince John).—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Clem'ent (Justice), a man quite able to discern between fun and crime. Although he had the weakness "of justices' justice," he had not the weakness of ignorant vulgarity.

> Knowell. They say he will commit a man for taking the wall of his horse.
> Wellbred. Ay, or for wearing his cloak on one shoulder, or serving God. Everything, indeed, if it comes in the way of his humour.—Ben Jonson: Every Man in His Humour, iii. 2 (1598).

Clementi'na (The lady), an amiable, delicate, beautiful, accomplished, but unfortunate woman, deeply in love with sir Charles Grandison. Sir Charles married Harriet Biron.—Richardson: The History of Sir Charles Grandison (1753).

Those scenes relating to the history of Clementina contain passages of deep pathos.—Encyclopædia Britannica (article "Fielding").

Shakespeare himself has scarcely drawn a more affecting or harrowing picture of high-souled suffering and blighting calamity than the madness of Clementina.—Chambers; English Literature, ii. 161.

Cle'ofas (Don), the hero of a novel by Lesage, entitled Le Diable Boiteux (The Devil on Two Sticks). A fiery young Spaniard, proud, high-spirited, and revengeful; noted for gallantry, but not without generous sentiments. Asmode'us (4 syl.) shows him what is going on in private families by unroofing the houses (1707).

Cleom'brotus or Ambracio'ta of Ambrac'ia (in Epirus). Having read Plato's book on the soul's immortality and happiness in another life, he was so ravished with the description that he leaped into the sea that he might die and enjoy Plato's elysium.

He who to enjoy
Plato's elysium leaped into the sea,
Cleombrotus.
Milton; Paradise Lost, iii. 471, etc. (1665).

Cleom'enes (4 syl.), the hero and title of a drama by Dryden (1692).

As Dryden came out of the theatre a young fop of fashion said to him, "If I had been left alone with a young beauty, I would not have spent my time like your Spartan hero." "Perhaps not," said the poet, "but you are not my hero."—W. C. Russell; Representative Actors.

Cleom'enes (4 syl.). "The Venus of Cleomenês" is now called "The Venus di Medici."

Such a mere moist lump was once . . . the Venus of Cleomenês.—Ouida: Ariadné, i. 8.

Cle'on, governor of Tarsus, burnt to death with his wife Dionys'ia by the enraged citizens, to revenge the supposed murder of Mari'na, daughter of Per'iclês prince of Tyre.—Shakespeare: Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

Cleon, the personification of glory.—Spenser: Faërie Queene.

Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, wife of Ptolemy Dionysius her brother. She was driven from her throne, but re-established by Julius Cæsar, B.C. 47. Antony, captivated by her, repudiated his wife, Octavia, to live with the fascinating Egyptian. After the loss of the battle of Actium, Cleopatra killed herself by an asp.

N.B.—Shakespeare calls the word Cleopa'tra or Cleopat'ra. Witness the following quotations from his play of Antony and Cleopatra:—

Had gone to gaze on Cleopatra, too. ii. 2.
Next Cleopatra does confess thy greatness. iii. 12.
Bear me, good friends, where Cleopatra bides. iv. 14.

The Greek word is Κλεοπατρα. Yet many persons call the word Cleop'atra.

¶ The tales of Cleopatra and Sophonisba are very much alike in many points. Both were young and fascinating; both were married; both held their conqueror in the bonds of love; both killed themselves to prevent being made Roman captives; and both are subjects of more tragedies than any other woman.

(E. Jodelle wrote in French a tragedy called Cléopâtre Captive (1550); Jean Mairet one called Cléopâtre (1630); Isaac de Benserade (1670), J. F. Marmontel (1750), Alfieri (1773), and Mde. de Girardin (1847) wrote tragedies in French on the same subject. S. Daniel (1599) wrote a tragedy in English called Cleopatra, in imitation of the Greek tragedies, with a chorus between each act; Shakespeare one called Antony and Cleopatra (1608); and Dryden one on the same subject called All for Love or The World Well Lost (1682).)

(Mrs. Oldfield (1683-1730) and Peg [Margaret] Woffington (1718-1760) were unrivalled in Cleopatra.)

Cleopatra and the Pearl. The tale is that Cleopatra made a sumptuous banquet, which excited the surprise of Antony; whereupon the queen took a pearl ear-drop, dissolved it in a strong acid, and drank the liquor to the health of the triumvir, saying, "My draught to Antony shall exceed in value the whole banquet."

¶ When queen Elizabeth visited the Exchange, sir Thomas Gresham pledged her health in a cup of wine containing a precious stone crushed to atoms, and worth £15,000.

Here £15,000 at one clap goes
Instead of sugar; Gresham drinks the pearl
Unto his queen and mistress. Pledge it, lords.
Heywood: If You Know not Me, You Know Nobody.

¶ A similar tale is referred to by Horace (2 Satires, iii. 239-241). Clodius, son of Æsop the tragedian, melted a pearl of great value in a strong acid, and drank the draught off in compliment to Cæcilia Metella. Horace adds it would have been wiser if he had tossed it into the sewer.

This is referred to by Valerius Maximus, ix. 1; by Macrobius, iii. 14; and by Pliny, ix. 35.

Cleopatra in Hades. Cleopatra, says

Rabelais, is "a crier of onions" in the shades below. The Latin for a pearl and onion is unio, and the pun refers to Cleopatra giving her pearl (or onion) to Antony in a draught of wine, or, as some say, drinking it herself in toasting her lover. —Rabelais: Pantagruel, ii. 30 (1533).

Cleopatra, queen of Syria, daughter of Ptolemy Philome'ter king of Egypt. She first married Alexander Bala, the usurper (B.C. 149); next Deme'trius Nica'nor. Demetrius, being taken prisoner by the Parthians, married Rodogune (3 syl.), daughter of Phraa'tes (3 syl.) the Parthian king, and Cleopatra married Antiochus Side'tês, brother of Demetrius. She slew her son Seleucus (by Demetrius) for treason, and, as this produced a revolt, abdicated in favour of her second son, Anti'ochus VIII., who compelled her to drink poison which she had prepared for himself. P. Corneille has made this the subject of his tragedy called Rodogune (1646).

N.B.—This is not the Cleopatra of Shakespeare's and Dryden's tragedies.

Clere'mont (2 syl.), a merry gentleman, the friend of Dinant'.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Little French Lawyer (posthumous, 1647).

Cleriker, head of the agency firm in which Herbert Pocket was a partner. Herbert introduced Pip, when he lost his property, as a clerk; and after eleven years' service he also became a partner.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1861).

Cler'imond, niece of the Green Knight, sister of Fer'ragus the giant, and bride of Valentine the brave.—Valentine and Orson.

Clerk's Tale (The), in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. (See GRISSILDA.)

Clerks (St. Nicholas's), thieves, also called "St. Nicholas's Clergymen," in allusion to the tradition of "St. Nicholas and the thieves." Probably a play on the words Nich-olas and Old Nick may be designed.—See Shakespeare, 1 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 1 (1597).

Clessammor, son of Thaddu and brother of Morna (Fingal's mother). He married Moina, daughter of Reuthamir (the principal man of Balclutha, on the Clyde). It so happened that Moina was beloved by a Briton named Reuda, who came with an army to carry her off. Reuda was slain by Clessammor; but Clessammor, being closely pressed by the Britons, fled, and never again saw his bride. In due time a son was born, called Carthon; but the mother died. While Carthon was still an infant, Fingal's father attacked Balclutha, and slew Reuthama (Carthon's grandfather). When the boy grew to manhood, he determined on vengeance; accordingly he invaded Morven, the kingdom of Fingal, where Clessammor, not knowing who he was, engaged him in single combat, and slew him. When he discovered that it was his son, three days he mourned for him, and on the fourth he died.—Ossian: Carthon.

Cleve'land (Barbara Villiers, duchess of), one of the mistresses of Charles II., introduced by sir W. Scott in Peveril of the Peak.

Cleve'land (Captain Clement), alias VAUGHAN [Vawn], "the pirate," son of Norna of the Fitful Head. He is in love with Minna Troil (daughter of Magnus Troil, the udaller of Zetland).—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Clever, the man-servant of Hero Sutton "the city maiden." When Hero assumed the guise of a quaker, Clever called himself Obadiah, and pretended to be a rigid quaker also. His constant exclamation was "Umph!"—Knowles: Woman's Wit, etc. (1838).

CLIFFORD (Mr.), the heir of sir William Charlton in right of his mother, and in love with lady Emily Gayville. The scrivener Alscrip had fraudulently got possession of the deeds of the Charlton estates, which he had given to his daughter called "the heiress," and which amounted to £2000 a year; but Rightly, the lawyer, discovered the fraud, and "the heiress" was compelled to relinquish this part of her fortune. Clifford then proposed to lady Emily, and was accepted.—General Burgoyne: The Heiress (1781).

Clifford (Henry lord), a general in the English army.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Clifford (Paul), a highwayman, reformed by the power of love.—Lord Lytton: Paul Clifford, a novel (1830).

∴ This novel is on similar lines to Jonathan Wild, by Fielding (1754). Ainsworth's Jack Sheppard (1839) is another novel of similar character.

Clifford (Rosamond), usually called "The Fair Rosamond," the favourite mistress of Henry II.; daughter of Walter lord Clifford. She is introduced by sir W. Scott in two novels, The Talisman and Woodstock. Dryden says—

Jane Clifford was her name, as books aver,
"Fair Rosamond" was but her nom de guerre.
Epilogue to Henry II.

Clifford (Sir Thomas), betrothed to Julia (daughter of Master Walter "the hunchback"). He is wise, honest, truthful, and well-favoured, kind, valiant, and prudent.—Knowles: The Hunchback (1831).

Clifford Street (London), so named from Elizabeth Clifford, daughter of the last earl of Cumberland, who married Richard Boyle, earl of Burlington. (See SAVILE ROW.)

Clifton (Harry), lieutenant of H.M. ship Tiger. A daring, dashing, care-for-nobody young English sailor, delighting in adventure, and loving a good scrape. He and his companion Mat Mizen take the side of El Hyder, and help to re-establish the Chereddin, prince of Delhi, who had been dethroned by Hamet Abdulerim.—Barrymore: El Hyder, Chief of the Ghaut Mountains.

Clim of the Clough. (See CLYM.)

Clincher (Beau). (See BEAU, p. 99.)

Clink (Jem), the turnkey at Newgate.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Clinker (Humphry), a poor workhouse lad, put out by the parish as apprentice to a blacksmith, and afterwards employed as an ostler's assistant and extra postilion. Being dismissed from the stables, he enters the service of Mr. Bramble, a fretful, grumpy, but kind-hearted and generous old gentleman, greatly troubled with gout. Here he falls in love with Winifred Jenkins, Miss Tabitha Bramble's maid, and turns out to be a natural son of Mr. Bramble.—Smollett: The Expedition of Humphry Clinker (1771).

(Probably this novel suggested to Dickens his Adventures of Oliver Twist.)

Clio, an anagram of C[helsea], L[ondon], I[slington], O[ffice], the places from which Addison despatched his papers for the Spectator. The papers signed by any of these letters are by Addison; hence called "Clio."

When panting virtue her last efforts made,
You brought your Clio to the virgin's aid.
Somerville.

Clip'purse (Lawyer), the lawyer employed by sir Everard Waverley to make his will.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Cliquot [Klee'ko], a nickname given by Punch to Frederick William IV. of Prussia, from his love of champagne of the "Cliquot brand" (1795, 1840-1861).

Clitandre, a wealthy bourgeois, in love with Henriette, "the thorough woman," by whom he is beloved with fervent affection. Her elder sister Armande (2 syl.) also loves him, but her love is of the Platonic hue, and Clitandre prefers in a wife the warmth of woman's love to the marble of philosophic ideality.—Molière: Les Femmes Savantes (1672).

Cloaci'na, the presiding personification of city sewers. (Latin, cloăca, "a sewer.")

. . . Cloacina, goddess of the tide
Whose sable streams beneath the city glide.
Gay: Trivia, ii. (1712).

Clod'dipole (3 syl.), "the wisest lout of all the neighbouring plain." Appointed to decide the contention between Cuddy and Lobbin Clout.

From Cloddipole we learn to read the skies,
To know when hail will fall, or winds arise.
He taught us erst the heifer's tail to view,
When struck aloft that showers would straight ensue.
He first that useful secret did explain,
That pricking corns foretell the gathering rain;
When swallows fleet soar high and sport in air,
He told us that the welkin would be clear.
Gay: Pastoral, I. (1714).

(Cloddipole is the "Palæmon" of Virgil's Bucolic iii.)

Clo'dio (Count), a dishonourable pursuer of Zeno'cia, the chaste troth-plight wife of Arnoldo.—Fletcher: The Custom of the Country (1647).

Clodio, the younger son of don Antonio, a coxcomb and braggart. Always boasting of his great acquaintances, his conquests, and his duels. His snuff-box he thinks more of than his lady-love, he interlards his speech with French, and exclaims "Split me!" by way of oath. Clodio was to have married Angelina, but the lady preferred his elder brother Carlos, a bookworm, and Clodio engaged himself to Elvira of Lisbon.—Cibber: Love Makes a Man (1694).

Clodpole. Ploughshare and Clodpole are two adventurers whose absurdities, in their "Journey to London," are described in Bumkin's Disaster by J. Strutt (1808).

Clo'e, in love with the shepherd Thenot, but Thenot rejects her suit out of admiration of the constancy of Clorinda for her dead lover. Cloe is wanton, coarse, and immodest, the very reverse of Clorinda, who is a virtuous, chaste, and faithful shepherdess. ("Thenot," the final t is sounded.)—John Fletcher: The Faithful Shepherdess (1610). (See CHLOE).

Clo'ra, sister to Fabrit'io the merry soldier, and the sprightly companion of Frances (sister to Frederick).—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Captain (1613).

Clorida'no, a humble Moorish youth, who joined Medo'ro in seeking the body of king Dardinello to bury it. Medoro being wounded, Cloridano rushed madly into the ranks of the enemy and was slain.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Clorin'da, daughter of Sena'pus of Ethiopia (a Christian). Being born white, her mother changed her for a black child. The eunuch Arse'tes (3 syl.) was entrusted with the infant Clorinda, and as he was going through a forest, saw a tiger, dropped the child, and sought safety in a tree. The tiger took the babe and suckled it, after which the eunuch carried the child to Egypt. In the siege of Jerusalem by the crusaders, Clorinda was a leader of the pagan forces. Tancred fell in love with her, but slew her unknowingly in a night attack. Before she expired she received Christian baptism at the hands of Tancred, who greatly mourned her death.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, xii. (1675).

(The story of Clorinda is borrowed from the Theag'anês and Charicle'a of Heliodōrus bishop of Trikka.)

Clorinda, "the faithful shepherdess," called "The Virgin of the Grove," faithful to her buried love. From this beautiful character, Milton has drawn his "lady" in Comus. Compare the words of the "First Brother" about chastity, in Milton's Comus, with these lines of Clorinda—

> Yet I have heard (my mother told it me),
> And now I do believe it, if I keep
> My virgin flower uncropt, pure, chaste, and fair,
> No goblin, wood-god, fairy, elf, or fiend,
> Satyr, or other power that haunts the groves
> Shall hurt my body, or by vain illusion
> Draw me to wander after idle fires,
> Or voices calling me in dead of night
> To make me follow, and so tole me on > Through mire and standing pools, to find my ruin.
> . . . Sure there's a power
> In that great name of Virgin that binds fast
> All rude, uncivil bloods. . . . Then strong Chastity,
> Be thou my strongest guard.
> J. Fletcher: The Faithful Shepherdess (1610).

Cloris, the damsel beloved by prince Prettyman.—Duke of Buckingham: The Rehearsal (1671).

Clotaire (2 syl.). The king of France exclaimed on his death-bed, "Oh how great must be the King of Heaven, if He can kill so mighty a monarch as I am!"—Gregory of Tours, iv. 21.

Cloten or Cloton, king of Cornwall, one of the five kings of Britain after the extinction of the line of Brute (1 syl.).—Geoffrey: British History, ii. 17 (1142).

Cloten, a vindictive lout, son of the second wife of Cymbeline by a former husband. He is noted for "his unmeaning frown, his shuffling gait, his burst of voice, his bustling insignificance, his fever-and-ague fits of valour, his froward tetchiness, his unprincipled malice, and occasional gleams of good sense." Cloten is the rejected lover of Imogen (the daughter of his father-in-law by his first wife), and is slain in a duel by Guiderius.—Shakespeare: Cymbeline (1605).

Clotha'rius or CLOTHAIRE, leader of the Franks after the death of Hugo. He is shot with an arrow by Clorinda.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, xi. (1675).

Cloud. A dark spot on the forehead of a horse between the eyes. It gives the creature a sour look indicative of ill temper, and is therefore regarded as a blemish.

> Agrippa. He [Antony] has a cloud in his face.
> Enobarbus. He were the worse for that were he a horse.
> Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, act III. sc. 2 (1608).

Cloud (St.), patron saint of nail-smiths. A play on the French word clou ("a nail").

Cloudes'ley (William of), a famous North-country archer, the companion of Adam Bell and Clym of the Clough, whose feats of robbery were chiefly carried on in Englewood Forest, near Carlisle. William Cloudesley was taken prisoner at Carlisle, and was about to be hanged, but was rescued by his two companions. The three then went to London to ask pardon of the king, which at the queen's intercession was granted. The king begged to see specimens of their skill in archery, and was so delighted therewith, that he made William a "gentleman of fe," and the other two "yemen of his chambre." The feat of William Cloudesley was very similar to that of William Tell (q.v.).—Percy: Reliques, I. ii. 1.

Clout (Colin), a shepherd loved by Marian "the parson's maid," but for whom Colin (who loved Cicely) felt no affection. (See COLIN CLOUT.)

> Young Colin Clout, a lad of peerless meed,
> Full well could dance, and deftly tune the reed;
> In every wood his carols sweet were known,
> At every wake his nimble feats were shown.
> Gay: Pastorals, 4 [eyed].

Clout (Lobbin), a shepherd, in love with Blouzelinda. He challenged Cuddy to a contest of song in praise of their respective sweethearts, and Cloddipole was appointed umpire. Cloddipole was unable to award the prize, for each merited "an oaken staff for his pains." "Have done, however, for the herds are weary of the songs, and so am I."—Gay: Pastoral, i. (1714).

(An imitation of Virgil's Bucolic iii.)

N.B.—"Colin Clout" is the name under which Spenser describes himself in The Shepherd's Calendar. (See COLIN CLOUT.)

Club-Bearer (The), Periphe'tês, the robber of Ar'golis, who murdered his victims with an iron club.—Greek Fable.

Clumsy (Sir Tunbelly), father of Miss Hoyden. A mean, ill-mannered squire and justice of the peace, living near Scarborough. Most cringing to the aristocracy, whom he toadies and courts. Sir Tunbelly promised to give his daughter in marriage to lord Foppington, but Tom Fashion, his lordship's younger brother, pretends to be lord Foppington, gains admission to the family, and marries her. When the real lord Foppington arrived, he was treated as an impostor, but Tom confessed the ruse. His lordship treated the knight with such ineffable contempt, that sir Tunbelly's temper was aroused, and Tom received into high favour.—Sheridan: A Trip to Scarborough (1777).

(This character appears in Vanbrugh's Relapse, of which comedy the Trip to Scarborough is an abridgment and adaptation.)

Clumsy, Belgrade's dog. (See DOG.)

Cluppins (Mrs.), in The Pickwick Papers by Dickens. She is the leading witness for the plaintiff (Mrs. Bardell) in the suit of "Bardell v. Pickwick."

Clu'ricaune (3 syl.), an Irish elf of evil disposition, especially noted for his knowledge of hid treasure. He generally assumes the appearance of a wrinkled old man.

Clu'tha, the Clyde.

> I came in my bounding ship to Balclutha's walls of towers. The winds had roared behind my sails, and Clutha's stream received my dark-bosomed ship.—Ossian: Carthon.

Clutterbuck (Captain), the hypothetical editor of some of sir Walter Scott's novels, as The Monastery and The Fortunes of Nigel. Captain Clutterbuck is a retired officer, who employs himself in antiquarian researches and literary idleness. The Abbot is dedicated by the "author of Waverley" to "captain Clutterbuck," late of his majesty's —— infantry regiment.

Clym of the Clough ("Clement of the Cliff"), a noted outlaw, associated with Adam Bell and William of Cloudesley, in Englewood Forest, near Carlisle. When William was taken prisoner at Carlisle, and was about to be hanged, Adam and Clym shot the magistrates, and rescued their companion. The mayor with his posse went out against them, but they shot the mayor, as they had done the sheriff, and fought their way out of the town. They then hastened to London to beg pardon of the king, which was granted them at the queen's intercession. The king, wishing to see a specimen of their shooting, was so delighted at their skill that he made William a "gentleman of fe," and the other two "yemen of his chambre."—Percy: Reliques ("Adam Bell," etc.), I. ii. 1.

Cly'tie, a water-nymph, in love with Apollo. Meeting with no return, she was changed into a sunflower, or rather a tournesol, which still turns to the sun, following him through his daily course.

N.B.—The sunflower does not turn to the sun. On the same stem may be seen flowers in every direction, and not one of them shifts the direction in which it has first opened. T. Moore (1814) says—

> The sunflower turns on her god when he sets
> The same look which she turned when he rose.

(This may do in poetry, but it is not correct. The sunflower is so called simply because the flower resembles a picture sun.)

N.B.—Lord Thurlow (1821) adopted Tom Moore's error, and enlarged it—

> Behold, my dear, this lofty flower
> That now the golden sun receives;
> No other deity has power,
> But only Phœbus, on her leaves;
> As he in radiant glory burns,
> From east to west her visage turns.
> The Sunflower.

Clytus, an old officer in the army of Philip of Macedon, and subsequently in that of Alexander. At a banquet, when both were heated with wine, Clytus said to Alexander, "Philip fought men, but Alexander women," and after some other insults, Alexander in his rage stabbed the old soldier; but instantly repented and said—

> What has my vengeance done?
> Who is it thou hast slain? Clytus? What was he!
> The faithfullest subject, worthiest counsellor,
> The bravest soldier. He who saved my life.

Fighting bare-headed at the river Granic.
For a rash word, spoke in the heat of wine,
The poor, the honest Clytus thou hast slain,— Clytus, thy friend, thy guardian, thy preserver!
Lee: Alexander the Great, iv. 2 (1678).

Cne'us, the Roman officer in command of the guard set to watch the tomb of Jesus, lest the disciples should steal the body, and then declare that it had risen from the dead.—Klopstock: The Messiah, xiii. (1771).

Coaches, says Stow, in his Chronicle, were introduced by Fitz-Allen, earl of Arundel, in 1580.

Before the costly coach and silken stock came in.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xvi. (1613).

Coal Hole (The), subsequently called "The Cyder Cellars," Fountain Court, Strand (London), was founded by John Rhodes, a burly fellow with a bass voice, for the coal-heavers and coal-whippers of the adjacent Thames wharves. Rhodes died in 1847, and the last manager, before the house was demolished, was Charles Wilmot. The entertainment was some trial which was licentiously perverted.

Coals. To carry coals, to put up with affronts. The boy says in Henry V. (act iii. sc. 2), "I knew . . . the men would carry coals." So in Romeo and Juliet (act i. sc. 1), "Gregory, o' my word, we'll not carry coals." Ben Jonson, in Every Man out of His Humour, says, "Here comes one that will carry coals, ergo, will hold my dog."

The time hath been when I would 'a scorned to carry coals.—Troubles of Queene Elizabeth (1639).

(To carry corn is to bear wealth, to be rich. He does not carry corn well, "He does not deport himself well in his prosperity.")

Co'an (The), Hippocrates, the "Father of Medicine" (B.C. 460–357).

. . . the great Coan, him whom Nature made
To serve the costliest creature of her tribe [man].
Dante: Purgatory, xxix. (1308).

Co'anocot'zin (5 syl.), king of the Az'tecas. Slain in battle by Madoc.—Southey: Madoc (1805).

Co'atel, daughter of Acul'hua, a priest of the Az'tecas, and wife of Lincoya. Lincoya, being doomed for sacrifice, fled for refuge to Madoc, the Welsh prince, who had recently landed on the North American coast, and was kindly treated by him. This gave Coatel a sympathetic interest in the White strangers, and she was not backward in showing it. Thus, when young Hoel was kidnapped, and confined in a cavern to starve to death, Coatel visited him and took him food. Again, when prince Madoc was entrapped, she contrived to release him, and assisted the prince to carry off young Hoel. After the defeat of the Az'tecas by the White strangers, the chief priest declared that some one had proved a traitor, and resolved to discover who it was by handing round a cup, which he said would be harmless to the innocent, but death to the guilty. When it was handed to Coatel, she was so frightened that she dropped down dead. Her father stabbed himself, and "fell upon his child," and when Lincoya heard thereof, he flung himself down from a steep precipice on to the rocks below.—Southey: Madoc (1805).

Cob (Oliver), a great admirer of Bobadil (q.v.) in Ben Jonson's Every Man in His Humour (1596).

Cobb (Ephraim), in Cromwell's troop.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Cobb, the "Boots" in the story of The Holly-tree Inn, by Dickens (1855). He tells the story of a boy, eight years old, eloping to Gretna Green with a girl of seven.

Cobb (Tom), one of "The Quadrilateral," in the novel of Barnaby Rudge, by Dickens (1841). The other three were Willet (senior), Phil. Parkes, and Solomon Daisy.

Cobbler-Poet (The), Hans Sachs of Nuremberg. (See TWELVE WISE MASTERS.)

Cobham (Eleanor), wife of Humphrey duke of Gloucester, and aunt of king Henry VI., compelled to do penance bare-foot in a sheet in London, and after that to live in the Isle of Man in banishment, for "sorcery." In 2 Henry VI. Shakespeare makes queen Margaret "box her ears;" but this could not be, as Eleanor was banished three years before Margaret came to England.

Stand forth, dame Eleanor Cobham, Gloster's wife . . .
You, madam . . . despoiled of your honour . . .
Shall, after three days' open penance done,
Live in your country here in banishment,
With sir John Stanley, in the Isle of Man.
Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI. act ii. sc. 3 (1591).

Cocagne (The Land of), a poem full of life and animation, by Hans Sachs, the cobbler, called "The prince of meistersingers" (1494–1574). (See COCKAIGNE.)

Cock and Pie. Douce explains thus—

In the days of chivalry it was the practice to make solemn vows for the performance of any considerable enterprise. This was usually done at some festival, when a roasted peacock, being served up in a dish of gold or silver, was presented to the knight, who then made his vow with great solemnity.

Cock of Westminster (The). Castell, a shoemaker, was so called from his very early hours. He was one of the benefactors of Christ's Hospital (London).

Cockade.

The Black Cockade. Badge of the house of Hanover, worn at first only by the servants of the royal household, the diplomatic corps, the army, and navy; but now worn by the servants of justices, deputy-lieutenants, and officers both of the militia and volunteers.

The White Cockade. (1) Badge of the Stuarts, and hence of the Jacobites. (2) Badge of the Bourbons, and hence of the royalists of France.

The White and Green Cockade. Badge worn by the French in the "Seven Years War" (1756).

The Blue and Red Cockade. Badge of the city of Paris from 1789.

The Tricolour was the union of the white Bourbon and blue and red of the city of Paris. It was adopted by Louis XVI. at the Hôtel de Ville, July 17, 1789, and has ever since been recognized as the national symbol, except during the brief "restoration," when the Bourbon white was for the time restored.

Royal Cockades are large and circular, half the disc projects above the top of the hat.

Naval Cockades have no fan-shaped appendage, and do not project above the top of the hat.

(All other cockades worn for livery are fan-shaped.)

Cockaigne (The Land of), an imaginary land of pleasure, wealth, luxury, and idleness. London is so called. Boileau applies the word to Paris. The Land of Cokayne is the subject of a burlesque, which, Warton says, "was evidently written soon after the Conquest, at least before the reign of Henry II."—History of English Poetry, i. 12.

> The houses were made of barley-sugar and cakes, the streets were paved with pastry, and the shops supplied goods without requiring money in payment. —The Land of Cockaigne (an old French poem, thirteenth century). (See COCAGNE.)

(This satirical poem is printed at length by Ellis, in his Specimens of Early English Poets, i. 83–95.)

Cocker (Edward) published a useful treatise on arithmetic in the reign of Charles II., which had a prodigious success, and has given rise to the proverb, "According to Cocker" (1632–1675).

Cockle (Sir John), the miller of Mansfield, and keeper of Sherwood Forest. Hearing a gun fired one night, he went into the forest, expecting to find poachers, and seized the king (Henry VIII.), who had been hunting and had got separated from his courtiers. When the miller discovered that his captive was not a poacher, he offered him a night's lodging. Next day the courtiers were brought to Cockle's house by under-keepers, to be examined as poachers, and it was then discovered that the miller's guest was the king. The "merry monarch" knighted the miller, and settled on him 1000 marks a year.—Dodsley: The King and the Miller of Mansfield (1737).

Cockle of Rebellion (The), that is the weed called the cockle, not the crustacean.

> We nourish 'gainst our senate
> The cockle of rebellion.
> Shakespeare: Coriolanus, act iii. sc. 1 (1609).

Cockney (Nicholas), a rich City grocer, brother of Barnacle. Priscilla Tomboy, of the West Indies, is placed under his charge for her education.

Walter Cockney, son of the grocer, in the shop. A conceited young prig, not yet out of the quarrelsome age. He makes boy-love to Priscilla Tomboy and Miss La Blond; but says he will "tell papa" if they cross him.

Penelope Cockney, sister of Walter.—The Romp (altered from Bickerstaff's Love in the City).

Cockney School (The), a name given to a coteric of London authors, such as Shelley, Keats, Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, and some others.

Cockpit of Europe. Belgium is so called because it has been the site of more European battles than any other: e.g. Oudenarde, Ramillies, Fontenoy, Fleurus, Jemmapes, Ligny, Quatre Bras, Waterloo, etc.

Cocles [Coc-lees] defended the Sublician Bridge, with two comrades, against the whole Etruscan army led on by Por'sena, till the Romans had broken down the bridge. He then sent away his two comrades, and when the bridge had fallen in, he plunged into the river and swam safely to the opposite bank.

¶ In the battle of Cerignola, the chevalier Bayard (with one other knight) guarded the bridge of Tormaino against 200 Spaniards. He sent his companion to bring up reinforcements, and he himself guarded the bridge alone till 200 men-at-arms arrived and came to his assistance.

Cocqcigrues (The Coming of the), that golden period when all mysteries will be cleared up.

"That is one of the seven things" said the fairy . . . "I am forbidden to tell till the coming of the Cocqcigrues."—C. Kingsley: The Water-Babies, chap. vi.

Cocy'tus [ko-ky'-tus], one of the five rivers of hell. The word means the "river of weeping" (Greek, kōkuo, "I lament"), because "into this river fall the tears of the wicked." The other four rivers are Styx, Ach'eron, Phleg'ethon, and Le'thē. (See STYX.)

Cocytus, named of lamentation loud,
Heard on the rueful stream.
Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 579 (1665).

Cœlebs' Wife, a bachelor's ideal of a model wife. Cœlebs is the hero of a novel by Mrs. Hannah More, entitled Cœlebs in Search of a Wife (1809).

In short she was a walking calculation,
Miss Edgeworth's novels stepping from their covers,
Or Mrs. Trimmer's books on education,
Or "Cœlebs' wife" set out in quest of lovers.
Byron: Don Juan, i. 16 (1819).

Coffin (Long Tom), the best sailor character ever drawn. He is introduced in The Pilot, a novel by J. Fenimore Cooper, of New York. Cooper's novel has been dramatized by E. Fitzball, under the same name, and Long Tom Coffin preserves in the burletta his reckless daring, his unswerving fidelity, his simple-minded affection, and his love for the sea (1823).

Cogia Houssain, the captain of forty thieves, outwitted by Morgiana, the slave. When, in the guise of a merchant, he was entertained by Ali Baba, and refused to eat any salt, the suspicions of Morgiana were aroused, and she soon detected him to be the captain of the forty thieves. After supper she amused her master and his guest with dancing; then playing with Cogia's dagger for a time, she plunged it suddenly into his heart and killed him.—Arabian Nights ("Ali Baba, or the Forty Thieves").

Coi'la (2 syl.), Kyle, in Ayrshire. So called from Coilus, a Pictish monarch. Sometimes all Scotland is so called, as—

Farewell, old Coila's hills and dales,
Her heathy moors and winding vales.
Burns.

Coincidences. The fall of Robespierre was in 1794. The sum of this date =21, which added to the date makes 1815 (the fall of Napoleon). Again, the sum of 1815 = 15, which added to the date comes to 1830, the fall of Charles IX.

∴ The next would be 1902. There are some remarkable coincidences in the history of Napoleon. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 877, col. 2.)

Cola'da, the sword taken by the Cid from Ramon Ber'enger, count of Barcelo'na. This sword had two hilts of solid gold.

Col'ax, Flattery personified in The Purple Island (1633), by Phineas Fletcher. Colax "all his words with sugar spices . . . lets his tongue to sin, and takes rent of shame . . . His art [was] to hide and not to heal a sore." Fully described in canto viii. (Greek, kólax, "a flatterer or fawner.")

Colbrand or Colebrond (2 syl.), the Danish giant, slain in the presence of king Athelstan, by sir Guy of Warwick, just returned from a pilgrimage, still "in homely russet clad," and in his hand "a hermit's staff." The combat is described at length by Drayton, in his Polyolbion, xii.

One could scarcely bear his axe . . .
Whose squares were laid with plates, and riveted with steel
And armed down along with pikes, whose hardened points
. . . had power to tear the joints
Of cuirass or of mail.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xii. (1613).

Colchos, part of Asiatic Scythia, now called Mingrelia. The region to which the Argonauts directed their course.

Cold Harbour House, the original Heralds' College, founded by Richard II., in Poultney Lane. Henry VII. turned the heralds out, and gave the house to bishop Tunstal.

Coldstream (Sir Charles), the chief character in Charles Mathew's play called Used Up. He is wholly ennuyé, sees nothing to admire in anything; but is a living personification of mental inanity and physical imbecility (1845).

Cole (1 syl.), a legendary British king, described as "a merry old soul," fond of his pipe, fond of his glass, and fond of his "fiddlers three." There were two kings so called—Cole (or Coil I.) was the predecessor of Porrex; but Coil II. was succeeded by Lucius, "the first British king who embraced the Christian religion." Which of these two mythical kings the song refers to is not evident.

Cole (Mrs.). This character is designed for Mother Douglas, who kept a "gentlemen's magazine of frail beauties" in a superbly furnished house at the north-east corner of Covent Garden. She died 1761.—Foote: The Minor (1760).

Colein (2 syl.), the great dragon slain by sir Bevis of Southampton.—Drayton: Polyolbion, ii. (1612).

Colemi'ra (3 syl.), a poetical name for a cook. The word is compounded of coal and mire.

"Could I," he cried, "express how bright a grace
Adorns thy morning hands and well-washed face,
Thou wouldst, Colemira, grant what I implore,
And yield me love, or wash thy face no more."
Shenstone: Colemira (an eclogue).

Cole'pepper (Captain) or CAPTAIN PEPPERCULL, the Alsatian bully.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Colin, or in Scotch Cailen, Green Colin, the laird of Dunstaffnage, so called from the green colour which prevailed in his tartan.

Colin and Lucy, a ballad by Tickell (1720). Gray calls it "the prettiest ballad in the world." Lucy, being deserted by her sweetheart for another, died of a broken heart, and was buried on the very day her quondam sweetheart married his new love.

She died. Her corpse was borne
The bridegroom blithe to meet,—
He in his wedding trim so gay,
She in her winding-sheet.

Colin and Rosalinde, in The Shepheardes Calendar (1579), by Spenser. Rosalinde is the maiden vainly beloved by Colin Clout, as her choice was already fixed on the shepherd Menalcas. Rosalinde is an anagram of "Rose Danil," a lady beloved by Spenser (Colin Clout), but Rose Danil had already fixed her affections on John Florio the Resolute, whom she subsequently married.

And I to thee will be as kind
As Colin was to Rosalinde,
Of courtesie the flower.
Drayton: Dowsabel (1599).

Colin Clout, the pastoral name assumed by the poet Spenser, in The Shepheardes Calendar, The Ruins of Time, Daphnaiaa, and in the pastoral poem called Colin Clout's Come Home Again (from his visit to sir Walter Raleigh). Eclogues i. and xii. are soliloquies of Colin, being lamentations that Rosalinde will not return his love. Eclogue vi. is a dialogue between Hobbinol and Colin, in which the former tries to comfort the disappointed lover. Eclogue xi. is a dialogue between Thenot and Colin. Thenot begs Colin to sing some joyous lay; but Colin pleads grief for the death of the shepherdess Dido, and then sings a monody on the great shepherdess deceased. In Eclogue vi. we are told that Rosalinde has betrothed herself to the shepherd Menalcas (1579).

N.B.—In the last book of the Faërie Queene, we have a reference to "Colin and his lassie" (Spenser and his wife), supposed to be Elizabeth, and elsewhere called "Mirabella." (See CLOUT, etc.)

Witness our Colin, whom tho' all the Graces
And all the Muses nursed . . .
Yet all his hopes were crossed, all suits denied;
Discouraged, scorned, his writings vilified,
Poorly, poor man, he lived; poorly, poor man, he died.
Phineas Fletcher: The Purple Island, i. 2 (1633).

Colin Clout and his Lassie (1596). (See above.)

Colin Clout's Come Home Again. "Colin Clout" is Spenser, who had been to London on a visit to "the Shepherd of the Ocean" (sir Walter Raleigh), in 1589. On his return to Kilcolman, in Ireland, he wrote this poem. "Hobbinol" his friend (Gabriel Harvey, LL.D.) tells him how all the shepherds have missed him, and begs him to relate to him and them his adventures while abroad. The pastoral contains a eulogy of British contemporary poets, and of the court beauties of queen Elizabeth (1591). (See COLYN.)

Colin Tampon, the nickname of a Swiss, as John Bull is of an Englishman, etc. (See CRAPAUD, p. 242.)

Colkitto (Young), or "Vich Alister More," or "Alister M'Donnell," a Highland chief in the army of Montrose.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Collean (May), the heroine of a Scotch ballad, which relates how "fause sir John" carried her to a rock for the purpose of throwing her down into the sea; but May outwitted him, and subjected him to the same fate as he had designed for her.

Colleen', i.e. "girl;" Colleen bawn ("the blond girl"); Colleen rhue ("the red-haired girl"), etc.

(Dion Boucicault has a drama entitled The Colleen Bawn, 1860.)

Collier (Jew), a smuggler.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Collingbourne's Rhyme. The rhyme for which Collingbourne was executed was—

A cat, a rat, and Lovel the dog,
Rule all England under the hog.

For where I meant the king [Richard III.] by name of hog,
I only alluded to the badge he bore [a boar];
To Lovel's name I added more—our dog—
Because most dogs have borne that name of yore.
These metaphors I used with other more,
As cat and rat, the half-names [Catesbye, Ratcliffe] of the rest,
To hide the sense that they so wrongly wrest.
Sackville: A Mirrour for Magistraytes
("Complaynt of Collingbourne").

Collingwood and the Acorns. Collingwood never saw a vacant place in his estate, but he took an acorn out of his pocket and popped it in.—Thackeray: Vanity Fair (1848).

Colmal, daughter of Dunthalmo. (See CALTHON, p. 170.)

Colmar, brother of Calthon. (See CALTHON.)

Colmes-kill, now called Icolmkill, the famous Iona, one of the Western islands. It is I-colm-kill; "I" = island, "colm" = Columb (St.), and "kill" = burying-place ("the burying-ground in St. Columb's Isle").

Rosse. Where is Duncan's body?
Macduff. Carried to Colmes-kill;
The sacred storehouse of his predecessors,
And guardian of their bones.
Shakespeare: Macbeth, act ii. sc. 4 (1606).

Colna-Dona ["love of heroes"], daughter of king Car'ul. Fingal sent Ossian and Toscar to raise a memorial on the banks of the Crona, to perpetuate the memory of a victory he had obtained there. Carul invited the two young men to his hall, and Toscar fell in love with Colna-Dona. The passion being mutual, the father consented to their espousals.—Ossian: Colna-Dona.

Cologne (The three kings of), the three Magi, called Gaspar, Melchior, and Baltha'zar. Gasper means "the white one;" Melchior, "king of light;" Balthazar, "lord of treasures." Klopstock, in The Messiah, says there were six Magi, whom he calls Hadad, Sel'ima, Zimri, Mirja, Beled, and Sunith.

 The "three" Magi are variously named; thus one tradition gives them as Apellius, Amerus, and Damascus; another calls them Magalath, Galgalath, and Sarasin; a third says they were Ator, Sator, and Perat'oras. They are furthermore said to be descendants of Balaam the Mesopotamian prophet.

Colon, one of the rabble leaders in Hudibras, is meant for Noel Perryan or Ned Perry, an ostler. He was a rigid puritan "of low morals," and very fond of bear-baiting (seventeenth century).

Colonna (The marquis of), a high-minded, incorruptible noble of Naples. He tells the young king bluntly that his oily courtiers are vipers who would suck his life's blood, and that Ludov'ico, his chief minister and favourite, is a traitor. Of course he is not believed, and Ludovico marks him out for vengeance. His scheme is to get Colonna, of his own free will, to murder his sister's lover and the king. With this view he artfully persuades Vicentio, the lover, that Evadne (the sister of Colonna) is the king's wanton. Vicentio indignantly discards Evadne, is challenged to fight by Colonna, and is supposed to be killed. Colonna, to revenge his wrongs on the king, invites him to a banquet with intent to murder him, when the whole scheme of villainy is exposed. Ludovico is slain, and Vicentio marries Evadne.—Shiel: Evadne, or the Statue (1820).

Colonna, the most southern cape of Attica. Falconer makes it the site of his "shipwreck" (canto iii.); and Byron says the isles of Greece—

. . . seen from far Colonna's height,
Make glad the heart that hails the sight,
And lend to loneliness delight.
Byron: The Giaour (1813).

Col'ophon, the end clause of a book, containing the names of the printer and publisher, and the place where the book was printed; in former times the date and the edition were added also. Colophon was a city of Iona, the inhabitants of which were such excellent horsemen that they could turn the scale of battle; hence the Greek proverb to add a colophon meant to "put a finishing stroke to an affair."

Colossians (The Epistle to the), written by "Paul the apostle" to the people of Colossæ, in Asia Minor, during his imprisonment at Rome. The first two chapters are doctrinal, and the latter two practical.

It resembles the Epistle to the Ephesians.

Colossos (Latin, Colossus), a gigantic brazen statue 126 feet high, executed by Charès for the Rhodians. Blaise de Vigenère says it was a striding figure; but comte de Caylus proves that it was not so, and did not even stand at the mouth of the Rhodian port. Philo tells us that it stood on a block of white marble; and Lucius Ampellius asserts that it stood in a car. Tickell makes out the statue to be so enormous in size that—

While at one foot the thronging gallys ride,
A whole hour's sail scarce reached the further side;
Between the brawny thighs, in loose array,
Ten thousand streamers on the billows play.
Tickell: On the Prospect of Peace.

Columbus. His three ships were the Santa Maria, the Pinta, and the Nina.—W. Irving: History of the Life, etc., of Columbus, 183.

The Voyage of Columbus. In twelve short cantos of rhyming ten-syllable verse by Rogers (1812). Columbus obtains three ships and starts on his voyage of discoveries. As he approaches "Columbia," he is stopped by a mass of vegetation, but continues his voyage. In the mean time the deities of the "New World" meet in council, and resolve to impede his approach. The chief spirit, in the form of a condor, stirs up a mutiny; but Columbus quells it, and lands on the New World, where the crew is hospitably received. After a time, an angel tells Columbus to return, and tells him that the cross of Christ planted by him will make America glorious.

Colyn Clout (The Boke of), a rhyming six-syllable tirade against the clergy, by John Skelton, poet-laureate (1460-1529).

Comal and Galbi'na. Comal was the son of Albion, "chief of a hundred hills." He loved Galbi'na (daughter of Conlech), who was beloved by Grumal also. One day, tired out by the chase, Comal and Galbina rested in the cave of Ronan; but ere long a deer appeared, and Comal went forth to shoot it. During his absence, Galbina dressed herself in armour "to try his love," and "strode from the cave." Comal thought it was Grumal, let fly an arrow, and she fell. The chief too late discovered his mistake, rushed to battle, and was slain.—Ossian: Fingal, ii.

Com'ala, daughter of Sarno king of Inistore (the Orkneys). She fell in love with Fingal at a feast to which Sarno had invited him after his return from Denmark or Lochlin (Fingal, iii.). Disguised as a youth, Comala followed him, and begged to be employed in his wars; but was detected by Hidallan, son of Lamor, whose love she had slighted. Fingal was about to marry her, when he was called to oppose Caracul, who had invaded Caledonia. Comala witnessed the battle from a hill, thought she saw Fingal slain, and, though he returned victorious, the shock on her nerves was so great that she died.—Ossian: Comala.

Comb (Reynard's Wonderful), said to be made of Pan'thera's bone, the perfume of which was so fragrant that no one could resist following it; and the wearer of the comb was always of a merry heart. This comb existed only in the brain of Master Fox.—Reynard the Fox, xii. (1498).

Co'me (St.), a physician, and patron-saint of medical practitioners.

> "By St. Come!" said the surgeon, "here's a pretty adventure."—Lesage: Gil Blas, vii. 1 (1735).

Come and Take Them. The reply of Leon'idas, king of Sparta, to the messengers of Xerxês, when commanded by the invader to deliver up his arms.

Com'edy (The Father of), Aristoph'anês the Athenian (B.C. 444-380).

The Prince of Ancient Comedy, Aristoph'anês (B.C. 444-380).

The Prince of New Comedy, Menander (B.C. 342-291).

Comedy of Errors, by Shakespeare (1593). Æmilia wife of Ægeon had two sons at a birth, and named both of them Antipholus. When grown to manhood, each of these sons had a slave named Dromio, also twin-brothers. The brothers Antipholus had been shipwrecked in infancy, and, being picked up by different vessels, were carried one to Syracuse and the other to Ephesus. The play supposes that Antipholus of Syracuse goes in search of his brother, and coming to Ephesus with his slave Dromio, a series of mistakes arises from the extraordinary likeness of the two brothers and their two slaves. Andriana, the wife of the Ephesian, mistakes the Syracusian for her husband; but he behaves so strangely that her jealousy is aroused, and when her true husband arrives he is arrested as a mad man. Soon after, the Syracusian brother being seen, the wife, supposing it to be her mad husband broken loose, sends to capture him; but he flees into a convent. Andriana now lays her complaint before the duke, and the lady abbess comes into court. So both brothers face each other, the mistakes are explained, and the abbess turns out to be Æmilia the mother of the twin-brothers. Now, it so happened that Ægeon, searching for his son, also came to Ephesus, and was condemned to pay a fine or suffer death, because he, a Syracusian, had set foot in Ephesus. The duke, however, hearing the story, pardoned him. Thus Ægeon found his wife in the abbess, the parents their twin-sons, and each son his long-lost brother.

 The plot of this comedy is copied from the Menæchmi of Plautus.

Comhal or Combal, son of Trathal, and father of Fingal. His queen was Morna, daughter of Thaddu. Comhal was slain in battle, fighting against the tribe of Morni, the very day that Fingal was born.—Ossian.

Fingal said to Aldo, "I was born in the midst of battle."—Ossian: The Battle of Lora.

Comic Annual (The), from 1830 to 1842, Hood.

Comic Blackstone, by Gilbert à Beckett (1846). In 1847–8 he published a Comic History of England; and in 1849–50 a Comic History of Rome.

Comines [Cûm'-in]. Philip des Comines, the favourite minister of Charles "the Bold," duke of Burgundy, is introduced by sir W. Scott in Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Coming Race (The), a work of fiction by lord Lytton (1871). It is the supposed manners and customs of a race several ages hence, and is a sort of Utopia, where the present evils will be redressed.

Com'leach (2 syl.), a mountain in Ulster. The Lubar flows between Comleach and Cromal.—Ossian.

Commander of the Faithful [Emir al Mumenin], a title assumed by Omar I., and retained by his successors in the caliphate (581, 634–644).

Commandment (The Eleventh), Thou shalt not be found out.

After all, that Eleventh Commandment is the only one that it is vitally important to keep in these days.—B. H. Buxton: Jennie of the Prince's, iii., 314.

Committee (The), a comedy by the hon. sir R. Howard. Mr. Day, a Cromwellite, is the head of a Committee of Sequestration, and is a dishonest, canting rascal, under the thumb of his wife. He gets into his hands the deeds of two heiresses, Anne and Arbella. The former he calls Ruth, and passes her off as his own daughter; the latter he wants to marry to his booby son Abel. Ruth falls in love with colonel Careless, and Arbella with colonel Blunt. Ruth contrives to get into her hands the deeds, which she delivers over to the two colonels, and when Mr. Day arrives, quiets him by reminding him that she knows of certain deeds which would prove his ruin if divulged (1670).

T. Knight reproduced this comedy as a farce under the title of The Honest Thieves.

Common (Dol), an ally of Subtle the alchemist.—Ben Jonson: The Alchemist (1610).

Commoner (The Great), sir John Barnard, who in 1737 proposed to reduce the interest of the national debt from 4 per cent. to 3 per cent., any creditor being at liberty to receive his principal in full if he preferred it. William Pitt, the statesman, is so called also (1759–1806). Mr. Goschen in 1888 reduced the interest to 2¾ per cent.

Comne'nus (Alexius), emperor of Greece, introduced by sir W. Scott in Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Anna Comne'na, his daughter.

Compeyson, a would-be gentleman and a forger. He duped Abel Magwitch and ruined him, keeping him completely under his influence. He also jilted Miss Havisham. He was drowned near Greenwich in attempting to arrest Magwitch (q.v.).—Dickens: Great Expectations (1861).

Complaint (The), or Night Thoughts. Nine poems, called "Nights," in blank verse, by Edward Young (1742–1745).

Compleat Angler (The), by Izaac Walton (1653).

Com'rade (2 syl.), the horse given by a fairy to Fortunio.

He has many rare qualities . . . first he eats but once in eight days; and then he knows what's past, present, and to come (and speaks with the voice of a man).—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Fortunio," 1682).

Comus, the god of revelry. In Milton's "masque" so called. The "lady" a lady Alice Egerton, the younger brother is Mr. Thomas Egerton, and the elder brother is lord viscount Brackley (eldest son of John earl of Bridgewater, president of Wales). The lady, weary with long walking, is left in a wood by her two brothers, while they go to gather "cooling fruit" for her. She sings to let them know her whereabouts, and Comus, coming up, promises to conduct her to a cottage till her brothers could be found. The brothers, hearing a noise of revelry, become alarmed about their sister, when her guardian spirit informs them that she has fallen into the hands of Comus. They run to her rescue, and arrive just as the god is offering his captive a potion; the brothers seize the cup and dash it on the ground, while the spirit invokes Sabri'na, who breaks the spell and releases the lady (1634).

Co'na or Coe, a river in Scotland, falling into Lochleven. It is distinguished for the sublimity of its scenery. Glen-coe is the glen held by the M'Donalds (the chief of the clan being called MacIan). In "Ossian," the bard Ossian (son of Fingal) is called "The voice of Cona."—Ossian: Songs of Selma.

They praised the voice of Cona, first among a thousand bards.—Ossian: Songs of Selma.

Comach'ar, the Highland apprentice of Simon Glover, the old glover of Perth. Conachar is in love with his master's daughter, Catharine, called "the fair maid of Perth;" but Catharine loves and ultimately marries Henry Smith, the armourer. Conachar is at a later period Ian Eachin [Hector] M'Ian, chief of the clan Quhele.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Conar, son of Trenmor, and first "king of Ireland." When the Fir-bolg (or Belgæ from Britain settled in the south of Ireland) had reduced the Cael (or colony of Caledonians settled in the north of Ireland) to the last extremity by war, the Cael sent to Scotland for aid. Trathel (grandfather of Fingal) accordingly sent over Conar with an army to their aid; and Conar, having reduced the Fir-bolg to submission, assumed the title of "king of Ireland." Conar was succeeded by his son Cormac I.; Cormac I. by his son Cairbre; Cairbre by his son Artho; Artho by his son Cormac II. (a minor); and Cormac (after a slight interregnum) by Ferad-Artho (restored by Fingal).—Ossian.

Confessio Amantis, by Gower (1393), above 30,000 verses, in eight books. It is a dialogue between a lover and his confessor, a priest of Venus named Genius. As every vice is unamiable, a lover must be free from vice in order to be amiable, i.e. beloved; consequently, Genius examines the lover on every vice before he will grant him absolution. Tale after tale is introduced by the confessor, to show the evil effects of particular vices, and the lover is taught science, and "the Aristotelian philosophy," the better to equip him to win the love of his choice. The end is very strange: The lover does not complain that the lady is obdurate or faithless, but that he himself has grown old.

(Gower is indebted a good deal to Eusebius's Greek romance of Ismênê and Ismenias, translated by Viterbo. Shakespeare drew his Pericles Prince of Tyre from the same romance.)

Confession. The emperor Wenceslas ordered John of Nep'omuc to be cast from the Moldau bridge, for refusing to reveal the confession of the empress. The martyr was canonized as St. John Nepomu'cen, and his day is May 14 (1330-1383).

Confessions of an English Opium-Eater, by Thomas De Quincey (1821). It describes the mental and physical effects of opium-eating.

Congreve (The Modern), R. B. Sheridan (1751-1816).

The School for Scandal crowned the reputation of the modern Congreve in 1777.—Craik: Literature and Learning in England, v. 7.

Coningsby, or The New Generation, a novel by Disraeli (lord Beaconsfield), (1844). Coningsby is Young England personified, in whom is delineated the beginning and growth of perfect statesmen.

The characters are supposed to be as follows:—Croker is Rigby; Monmouth is lord Howard; Eskdale, Lowther; Ormsby, Irving; Lucretia is Mde. Zichy; the countess Colonna is lady Strachan; Sidonia is baron A. de Rothschild; Henry Sidney is lord John Manners; Belvoir, the duke of Rutland.—Notes and Queries, March 6, 1875.

Conkey Chickweed, the man who robbed himself of 327 guineas, in order to make his fortune by exciting the sympathy of his neighbours and others. The tale is told by detective Blathers.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Con'lath, youngest son of Morni, and brother of the famous Gaul (a man's name). Conlath was betrothed to Cutho'na, daughter of Rumn, but before the espousals Toscar came from Ireland to Mora, and was hospitably received by Morni. Seeing Cuthona out hunting, Toscar carried her off in his skiff by force, and being overtaken by Conlath, they both fell in fight. Three days afterwards Cuthona died of grief.—Ossian: Conlath and Cuthona.

Connal, son of Colgar petty king of Togorma, and intimate friend of Cuthullin general of the Irish tribes. He is a kind of Ulysses, who counsels and comforts Cuthullin in his distress; and is the very opposite of the rash, presumptuous, though generous Calmar. — Ossian: Fingal.

Con'nell (Father), an aged catholic priest, full of gentle affectionate feelings. He is the patron of a poor vagrant boy called Neddy Fennel, whose adventures furnish the incidents of Banim's novel called Father Connell (1842).

Father Connell is not unworthy of association with the protestant Vicar of Wakefield.—R. Chambers: English Literature, ii. 612.

Conqueror (The).

Alexander the Great, The Conqueror of the World (B.C. 356, 336-323).
Alfonso of Portugal (1094, 1137-1185).
Aurungzebe the Great, called Alemgir (1618, 1659-1707).
James of Aragon (1206, 1213-1276).
Othman or Osman I., founder of the Turkish empire (1259, 1299-1326).
Francisco Pizarro, called Conquistador, because he conquered Peru (1475-1541).
William duke of Normandy, who obtained England by conquest (1027, 1066-1087).

Conquest of Grana'da (The), a tragedy by Dryden (1672).

Con'rad (Lord), the corsair, afterwards called Lara. A proud, ascetic, but successful pirate. Hearing that the sultan Seyd [Seed] was about to attack the pirates, he entered the palace in the disguise of a dervise, but being found out was seized and imprisoned. He was released by Gulnare (2 syl.), the sultan's favourite concubine, and fled with her to the Pirates' Isle; but finding his Medo'ra dead, he left the island with Gulnare, returned to his native land, headed a rebellion, and was shot.—Byron: The Corsair, continued in Lara (1814).

Conrad, a monk of Murpurg, and the pope's commissioner for the suppression of heresy.—Kingsley: The Saint's Tragedy (a dramatic poem, 1846).

Con'rade (2 syl.), a follower of don John (bastard brother of don Pedro prince of Aragon).—Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing (1600).

Conrade (2 syl.), marquis of Montserrat, who with the Grand-Master of the Templars conspired against Richard Cœur de Lion. He was unhorsed in combat, and murdered in his tent by the Templar.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Consenting Stars, stars forming certain configurations for good or evil. Thus we read in the book of Judges v. 20, "The stars in their courses fought against Sisera," i.e. formed configurations which were unlucky or malignant.

> . . . scourge the bad revolving stars,
> That have consented unto Henry's death!
> King Henry the Fifth, too famous to live long!
> Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act i. sc. 1 (1589).

Constance, mother of prince Arthur and widow of Geoffrey Plantagenet.—Shakespeare: King John (1598).

Mrs. Bartley's "lady Macbeth," "Constance," and "queen Katherine" [Henry VIII.], were powerful embodiments, and I question if they have ever since been so finely portrayed (1785-1850).—J. Adolphus: Recollections.

Constance, daughter of sir William Fondlove, and courted by Wildrake, a country squire, fond of field sports. "Her beauty rich, richer her grace, her mind yet richer still, though richest all." She was "the mould express of woman, stature, feature, body, limb;" she danced well, sang well, harped well. Wildrake was her childhood's playmate, and became her husband.—Knowles: The Love Chase (1837).

Constance, daughter of Bertulphe provost of Bruges, and bride of Bouchard, a knight of Flanders. She had "beauty to shame young love's most fervent dream, virtue to form a saint, with just enough of earth to keep her woman." By an absurd law of Charles "the Good," earl of Flanders, made in 1127, this young lady, brought up in the lap of luxury, was reduced to serfdom, because her grandfather was a serf; her aristocratic husband was also a serf because he married her (a serf). She went mad at the reverse of fortune, and died.—Knowles: The Provost of Bruges (1836).

Constance of Beverley, in sir W. Scott's Marmion, is a Benedictine nun, who fell in love with Marmion, and, escaping from the convent, lived with him as a page. But Marmion proved faithless; and Constance, falling into the hands of the Benedictines, was tried for violating her vows. At the same time a monk (who had undertaken to remove her rival Clara) was tried also. Both were condemned, and both were immured in niches in the convent wall, which were then filled up with "hewn stones and cement."—Canto ii.

Constans, a mythical king of Britain. He was the eldest of the three sons of Constantine, his two brothers being Aurelius Ambrosius and Uther Pendragon. Constans was a monk, but at the death of his father he laid aside the cowl for the crown. Vortigern caused him to be assassinated, and usurped the crown. Aurelius Ambrosius succeeded Vortigern, and was himself succeeded by his younger brother, Uther Pendragon, father of king Arthur. Hence it will appear that Constans was Arthur's uncle.

Constant (Ned), the former lover of lady Brute, with whom he intrigued after her marriage with the surly knight.—Vanbrugh: The Provoked Wife (1697).

Constant (Sir Bashful), a younger brother of middle life, who tumbles into an estate and title by the death of his elder brother. He marries a woman of quality. But, finding it comme il faut not to let his love be known, treats her with indifference and politeness; and, though he dotes on her, tries to make her believe he loves her not. He is very soft, carried away by the opinions of others, and is an example of the truth of what Dr. Young said, "What is mere good nature but a fool?"

Lady Constant, wife of sir Bashful, a woman of spirit, taste, sense, wit, and beauty. She loves her husband, and repels with scorn an attempt to shake her fidelity because he treats her with cold indifference.—Murphy: The Way to Keep Him (1760).

Constant Couple (The), a comedy by Farquhar (1700).

Constan'tia, sister of Petruccio governor of Bologna, and mistress of the duke of Ferrara.—Fletcher: The Chances (1620).

Constantia, a protégée of lady McSycophant. An amiable girl, in love with Egerton McSycophant, by whom her love is amply returned.—Macklin: The Man of the World (1764).

Con'stantine (3 syl.), a king of Scotland, who (in 937) joined Anlaf (a Danish king) against Athelstan. The allied kings were defeated at Brunanburh, in Northumberland; and Constantine was made prisoner.

> Our English Athelstan . . .
> Made all the isle his own . . .
> And Constantine, the king, a prisoner hither brought.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xii. 3 (1634).

Constantinople (Little). Kertch was so called by the Genoese from its extent and its prosperity. Demosthenês calls it "the granary of Athens."

Consuelo (4 syl.), the impersonation of moral purity in the midst of temptations. Consuelo is the heroine of a novel so called by George Sand (i.e. Mde. Dudevant).

Consul Bib'ulus (A), a cipher in office, one joined with others in office but without the slightest influence. Bibulus was joint consul with Julius Cæsar, but so insignificant that the wits of Rome called it the consulship of Julius and Cæsar, not of Bibulus and Cæsar (B.C. 59).

Contemporaneous Discoverers. Göethe and Vicq d'Azyrs discovered at the same time the intermaxillary bone. Göethe and Von Baer discovered at the same time Morphology. Göethe and Oken discovered at the same time the vertebral system. The Penny Cyclopædia and Chambers's Journal were started nearly at the same time. The invention of printing is claimed by several contemporaries. The process called Talbotype and Daguerreotype were nearly simultaneous discoveries. Leverrier and Adams discovered at the same time the plane Neptune.

(This list may be extended to a very great length.)

Contemporary Review (The), a monthly review started in 1866.

Contes de Fées, by Claude Perrault (1697). Fairy tales in French prose. They have been translated into English.

Contest (Sir Adam). Having lost his first wife by shipwreck, he married again after the lapse of some twelve or fourteen years. His second wife was a girl of 18, to whom he held up his first wife as a pattern and the very paragon of women. On the wedding day this first wife made her appearance. She had been saved from the wreck; but sir Adam wished her in heaven most sincerely.

Lady Contest, the bride of sir Adam, "young, extremely lively, and prodigiously beautiful." She had been brought up in the country, and treated as a child, so her naïveté was quite captivating. When she quitted the bridegroom's house, she said, "Good-bye, sir Adam, good-bye. I did love you a little, upon my word, and should be really unhappy if I did not know that your happiness will be infinitely greater with your first wife."

Mr. Contest, the grown-up son of sir Adam by his first wife.—Mrs. Inchbald: The Wedding Day (1790).

Continence.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT having gained the battle of Issus (B.C. 333), the family of king Darius fell into his hands; but he treated the ladies as queens, and observed the greatest decorum towards them. A eunuch, having escaped, told Darius that his wife remained unspotted, for Alexander had shown himself the most continent and generous of men.—Arrian: Anabasis of Alexander, iv. 20.

¶ SCIPIO AFRICANUS, after the conquest of Spain, refused to touch a beautiful princess who had fallen into his hands, "lest he should be tempted to forget his principles." It is, moreover, said that he sent her back to her parents with presents, that she might marry the man to whom she was betrothed. A silver shield, on which this incident was depicted, was found in the river Rhone by some fishermen in the seventeenth century.

> E'en Scipio, or a victor yet more cold,
> Might have forgot his virtue at her sight.
> Rowe: Tamerlane, iii. 3 (1702).

¶ ANSON, when he took the Senhora Theresa de Jesus, refused even to see the three Spanish ladies who formed part of the prize, because he was resolved to prevent private scandal. The three ladies consisted of a mother and her two daughters, the younger of whom was "of surpassing beauty."

Contractions. The following is probably the most remarkable:—"Utacamund" is by the English called Ooty (India). "Cholmondeley," contracted into Chumly, is another remarkable example.

Conven'tual Friars are those who live in convents, contrary to the rule of St. Francis, who enjoined absolute poverty, without land, books, chapel, or house. Those who conform to the rule of the founder are called "Observant Friars."

Conversation Sharp, Richard Sharp, the critic (1759–1835).

Cook who Killed Himself (The). Vatel killed himself in 1671, because the lobster for his turbot sauce did not arrive in time to be served up at the banquet at Chantilly, given by the prince de Condé to the king.

Cook's Oracle (The), by Dr. Kitchener (1821).

Cook's Tale (The), in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. (See GAMELYN.)

Cooks (Wages received by). In Rome as much as £800 a year was given to a chef de cuisine; but Carême received £1000 a year.

Cooks of Modern Times. Carême, called "The Regenerator of Cookery" (1784–1833); Vatel, cook to the great Condé; Ude, the most learned of all cooks, at Crockford's during the regency; Weltje, cook to the prince regent; Charles Elmé Francatelli, who succeeded Ude at Crockford's, then in the Royal Household, and lastly at the Reform Club (1805–1876); Gouffé; and Alexis Soyer, who died in 1858, and whose epitaph is Soyer tranquille. (See TRIMALCHI.)

Ude, the most learned of cooks, was author of the Science de Gueule. It was he who said, "Cooks must be born cooks, not made." Another of his sayings is, "Music, dancing, fencing, painting, and mechanics possess professors under 20 years of age; but preeminence in cookery is never to be obtained under 30." He was chef to Louis XVI., then to lord Sefton, then to the duke of York, then to Crockford's Club. He left lord Sefton's service because on one occasion a guest added more pepper to his soup. Francatelli succeeded Ude at Crockford's.

Cooper (Anthony Ashly), earl of Shaftesbury, introduced by sir W. Scott in Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Cooper (Do you want a)? that is, "Do you want to taste the wines?" This question is addressed to those who have an order to visit the London docks. The "cooper" bores the casks, and gives the visitor the wine to taste.

Cooper's Hill, a descriptive poem by sir John Denham (1642). He says of the Thames—

> Though deep, yet clear; though gentle, yet not dull;
> Strong without rage; without o'erflowing full.

Copheˈtua or Copetˈhua, a mythical king of Africa, of great wealth, who fell in love with a beggar-girl, and married her. Her name was Penelˈophon, but Shakespeare writes it Zenelˈophon in Love's Labour's Lost, act iv. sc. 1. Tennyson has versified the tale in The Beggar-Maid.—Percy: Reliques, I. ii. 6.

Copˈley (Sir Thomas), in attendance on the earl of Leicester at Woodstock.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Copper Captain (A), Michael Perez, a captain without money, but with a plentiful stock of pretence, who seeks to make a market of his person and commission by marrying an heiress. He is caught in his own trap, for he marries Estifania, a woman of intrigue, fancying her to be the heiress Margaritta. The captain gives the lady "pearls," but they are only whitings' eyes. His wife says to him—

> Here's a goodly jewel . . .
> Did you not win this at Goletta, captain? . . .
> See how it sparkles, like an old lady's eyes . . .
> And here's a chain of whitings' eyes for pearls . . .
> Your clothes are parallels to these, all counterfeits.
> Put these and them on, you're a man of copper,
> A copper . . . copper captain.
> Fletcher: Rule a Wife and Have a Wife (1624).

(W. Lewis (1748–1811) was famous in this character; but Robert Wilks (1670–1732) was wholly unrivalled.)

> The old stage critics delighted in the "Copper Captain;" it was the test for every comedian. It could be worked on like a picture, and new readings given. Here it must be admitted that Wilks had no rival.—Fitzgerald.

Copperfield (David), the hero of a novel so called, by C. Dickens. David is Dickens himself, and Micawber is Dickens's father. According to the tale, David's mother was nursery governess in a family where Mr. Copperfield visited. At the death of Mr. Copperfield, the widow married Edward Murdstone, a hard, tyrannical man, who made the home of David a dread and terror to the boy. When his mother died, Murdstone sent David to lodge with the Micawbers, and bound him apprentice to Messrs. Murdstone and Grinby, by whom he was put into the warehouse, and set to paste labels upon wine and spirit bottles. David soon became tired of this dreary work, and ran away to Dover, where he was kindly received by his [great]-aunt Betsey Trotwood, who clothed him, and sent him as day-boy to Dr. Strong; but placed him to board with Mr. Wickfield, a lawyer, father of Agnes, between whom and David a mutual attachment sprang up. David's first wife was Dora Spenlow; but at the death of this pretty little "child-wife," he married Agnes Wickfield.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Copperheads, members of a faction in the north, during the civil war in the United States. The copperhead is a poisonous serpent, that gives no warning of its approach, and hence is a type of a concealed or secret foe (the Trigonocephalus contortrix).

Coppernose (3 syl.). Henry VIII. was so called, because he mixed so much copper with the silver coin that it showed after a little wear in the parts most pronounced, as the nose. Hence the sobriquets "Coppernosed Harry," "Old Coppernose," etc.

Copple, the hen killed by Reynard, in the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox (1498).

Cora, the gentle, loving wife of Alonzo, and the kind friend of Rolla general of the Peruvian army.—Sheridan: Pizarro (altered from Kotzebue, 1799).

Co'rah, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel (1681), is meant for Dr. Titus Oates. As Corah was the political calumniator of Moses and Aaron, so Titus Oates was the political calumniator of the pope and English papists. As Corah was punished by "going down alive into the pit," so Oates was "condemned to imprisonment for life," after being publicly whipped and exposed in the pillory. North describes Titus Oates as a very short man, and says, "If his mouth were taken for the centre of a circle, his chin, forehead, and cheekbones would fall in the circumference."

> Sunk were his eyes, his voice was harsh and loud,
> Sure signs he neither choleric was, nor proud;
> His long chin proved his wit; his saint-like grace,
> A Church vermilion, and a Moses' face;
> His memory miraculously great
> Could plots, exceeding man's belief, repeat . . .
> Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, part i. 647–652.

Corbac'cio (Signior), the dupe of Mosca the knavish confederate of Vol'pone (2 syl.). He is an old man, with "seeing and hearing faint, and understanding dulled to childishness," yet he wishes to live on, and

> Feels not his gout nor palsy; feigns himself
> Younger by scores of years; flatters his age
> With confident belying it; hopes he may
> With charms, like Æson, have his youth restored.
> Ben Jonson: Volpone, or the Fox (1605).

> Benjamin Johnson [1665–1742] . . . seemed to be proud to wear the poet's double name, and was particularly great in all that author's plays that were usually performed, viz. "Wasp," in Bartholomew Fair; "Corbaccio;" "Morose," in The Silent Woman; and "Ananias," in The Alchemist.—Chetwood.

C. Dibdin says none who ever saw W. Parsons (1736–1795) in "Corbaccio" could forget his effective mode of exclaiming, "Has he made his will? What has he given me?" but Parsons himself says, "Ah! to see 'Corbaccio' acted to perfection, you should have seen Shuter. The public are pleased to think that I act that part well, but his acting was as far superior to mine as mount Vesuvius is to a rushlight."

Cor'bant, the rook, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498). (French, corbeau, "a rook.")

Corbrech'tan or Corybrechtan, a whirlpool on the west coast of Scotland, near the isle of Jura. Its name signifies "Whirlpool of the prince of Denmark," from the tradition that a Danish prince once wagered to cast anchor in it, but perished in his foolhardiness. In calm weather the sound of the vortex is like that of innumerable chariots driven with speed.

The distant isles that hear the loud Corbrechtan roar.
Campbell: Gertrude of Wyoming, i. 5 (1809).

Corce'ca (3 syl.), mother of Abessa. The word means "blindness of heart," or Romanism. Una sought shelter under her hut, but Corceca shut the door against her; whereupon the lion which accompanied Una broke down the door. The "lion" means England, "Corceca" popery, "Una" protestantism, and "breaking down the door" the Reformation.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. 3 (1590).

Corde'lia, youngest daughter of king Lear. She was disinherited by her royal father, because her protestations of love were less violent than those of her sisters. Cordelia married the king of France, and when her two elder sisters refused to entertain the old king with his suite, she brought an army over to dethrone them. She was, however, taken captive, thrown into prison, and died there.

Her voice was ever soft,
Gentle, and low; an excellent thing in woman.
Shakespeare: King Lear, act v. sc. 3 (1605).

Corflam'bo, the personification of sensuality, a giant killed by Arthur. Corflambo had a daughter named Pæa'na, who married Placidas, and proved a good wife to him. —Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 8 (1596).

Coriat (Thomas), CORIATE, CORYAT, CORYATE. (See CORYAT'S CRUDITIES.)

Besides, 'tis known he could speak Greek,
As naturally as pigs do squeak.
Cranfield: Panegyric Verses on T. Coriat.

But if the meaning were as far to seek
As Coriat's horse was of his master's Greek,
When in that tongue he made a speech at length,
To show the beast the greatness of his strength.
Wither: Abuses Stript and Whipt (1613).

Corin, "the faithful shepherdess," who, having lost her true love by death, retired from the busy world, remained a virgin for the rest of her life, and was called "The Virgin of the Grove." The shepherd Thenot (final t pronounced) fell in love with her for her "fidelity," and to cure him of his attachment she pretended to love him in return. This broke the charm, and Thenot no longer felt that reverence of love he before entertained. Corin was skilled "in the dark, hidden virtuous use of herbs," and says—

Of all green wounds I know the remedies
In men and cattle, be they stung by snakes,
Or charmed with powerful words of wicked art,
Or be they love-sick.
J. Fletcher: The Faithful Shepherdess, i. 1 (1610).

Corin, "strongest of mortal men," and one of the suite of Brute (the first mythical king of Britain). (See CORINEUS.)

From Corin came it first? [i.e. the Cornish hug in wrestling.]
Drayton: Polyolbion, i. (1612).

Corineus. Southey calls the word Cor'-i-nuse; Spenser sometimes Co-rin'-nuse, and sometimes Co-rin'-e-us (4 syl.); Drayton calls the word Cor'-i-ne'-us. Corineus was one of the suite of Brute. He overthrew the giant Goëm'-agot, for which achievement he was rewarded with the whole western horn of England, hence called Corin'ea, and the inhabitants Corin'eans. (See CORIN.)

Corineus challenged the giant to wrestle with him. At the beginning of the encounter, Corineus and the giant standing front to front held each other strongly in their arms, and panted aloud for breath; but Goëmagot presently grasping Corineus with all his might broke three of his ribs, two on his right side and one on his left. At which Corineus, highly enraged, roused up his whole strength, and snatching up the giant, ran with him on his shoulders to the neighbouring shore, and getting on to the top of a high rock, hurled the monster into the sea. . . . The place where he fell is called Lam Goëmagot or Goëmagot's Leap to this day.—Geoffrey: British History, i. 16 (1142).

When father Brute and Cor'ineus set foot
On the White Island first.
Southey: Madoc, vi. (1805).

Corin'eus had that province utmost west
To him assigned.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 10 (1590).

N.B.—Drayton makes the name a word of four syllables, and throws the accent on the last but one.

Which to their general then great Corine'us had.
Drayton: Polyolbion, i. (1612).

Corinna, a Greek poetess of Bœotia, who gained a victory over Pindar at the public games (fl. B.C. 490).

. . . they raised
A tent of satin, elaborately wrought
With fair Corinna's triumph.
Tennyson: The Princess, iii.

Corinna, daughter of Gripe the scrivener. She marries Dick Amlet.—Vanbrugh: The Confederacy (1695).

See lively Pope advance in jig and trip
"Corinna," "Cherry," "Honeycomb," and "Snip";
Not without art, but yet to nature true,
She charms the town with humour just yet new.
Churchill: Rosciad (1761).

Corinne' (2 syl.), the heroine and title of a novel by Mde. de Staël. Her lover proved false, and the maiden gradually pined away.

Corinth. 'Tis not every one who can afford to go to Corinth, "'Tis not every one who can afford to indulge in very expensive licentiousness." Aristophanês speaks of the unheard-of sums (amounting to £200 or more) demanded by the harlots of Corinth.—Plutarch: Parallel Lives, i. 2.

Non cuivis hominum contingit adire Corinthum.
Horace: I. Epistles, xvii. 36.

Corinthian (A), a rake, a "fast man." Prince Henry says (1 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 4), "[They] tell me I am no proud Jack, like Falstaff, but a Corinthian, a lad of mettle."

Corinthianism, harlotry.

To Corinthianise, to live an idle, dissipated life.

To act the Corinthian, to become a fille publique. Corinth was called the nursery of harlots, in consequence of the temple of Venus, which was a vast and magnificent brothel. Strabo says (Georgics, vii.), "There were no fewer than a thousand harlots in Corinth."

Corinthians (Epistles to the). Two epistles written by Paul (the apostle) to the Corinthians. The first may be divided into three parts: chaps. i.–xiv., in which the writer reproves the Corinthians for their ill practices; chap. xv. treats of the resurrection; and the rest of the epistle contains practical instructions.

The second epistle was written from Macedonia, and, like the first, may be divided into three parts: chaps. i.–vii., in which the writer justifies the charges made in the former epistle; chaps. viii. ix., in which he exhorts the Corinthians to make a liberal collection for the poor of Jerusalem; the rest being mainly a narrative of what he has suffered for Christ's sake.

Corin'thian Brass, a mixture of gold, silver, and brass, which forms the best of all mixed metals. When Mummius set fire to Corinth, the heat of the conflagration was so great that it melted the metal, which ran down the streets in streams. The three mentioned above ran together, and obtained the name of Corinthian brass."

I think it may be of "Corinthian brass,"
Which was a mixture of all metals, but
The brazen uppermost.
Byron: Don Juan, vi. 56 (1821).

Corinthian Tom, "a fast man," the sporting rake in Pierce Egan's Life in London. The companion of Tom was Jerry [Hawthorne] (1824).

Coriola'nus (Caius Marcius), called Coriolanus from his victory at Cori'oli. His mother was Vetu'ria (not Volumnia), and his wife Volumnia (not Virgilia). Shakespeare has a drama so called. La Harpe has also a drama entitled Coriolan, produced in 1781.—Livy, Annals, ii. 40.

(Malone places Shakespeare's play of Coriolanus under the year 1610. The first folio was printed in 1623.)

I remember her [Mrs. Siddons] coming down the stage in the triumphal entry of her son Coriolanus, when her dumb-show drew plaudits that shook the house. She came alone, marching and beating time to the music, rolling . . . from side to side, swelling with the triumph of her son. Such was the intoxication of joy which flashed from her eye and lit up her whole face, that the effect was irresistible.—C. M. Young.

Corisande (Lady), who by her charms wins over a young nobleman from popery to become a member of the Church of England.—Disraeli (lord Beaconsfield) (1871).

Corita'ni, the people of Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Leicestershire, Rutlandshire, and Northamptonshire. Drayton refers to them in his Polyolbion, xvi. (1613).

Cork Street (London). So called from the Boyles, earls of Burlington and Cork. (See CLIFFORD STREET, p. 219.)

Cormac I., son of Conar. (See CONAR, p. 229.)

Cormac II. (a minor), king of Ireland. On his succeeding his father Artho on the throne, Swaran king of Lochlin [Scandinavia] invaded Ireland, and defeated the army under the command of Cuthullin. Fingal's arrival turned the tide of events, for next day Swaran was routed and returned to Lochlin. In the third year of his reign Torlath rebelled, but was utterly discomfited at lake Lego by Cuthullin, who, however, was himself mortally wounded by a random arrow during the pursuit. Not long after this Cairbar rose in insurrection, murdered the young king, and usurped the government. His success, however, was only of short duration, for having invited Oscar to a feast, he treacherously slew him, and was himself slain at the same time. His brother Cathmor succeeded for a few days, when he also was slain in battle by Fingal, and the Conar dynasty restored. Conar (first king of Ireland, a Caledonian) was succeeded by his son Cormac I.; Cormac I. was succeeded by his son Cairbre; Cairbre by his son Artho; Artho by his son Cormac II.; and Cormac II. (after a short interregnum) by his cousin Ferad-Artho.—Ossian: Fingal, Dar-Thula, and Temora.

Cor'mack (Donald), a Highland robber-chief.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Cor'malo, a "chief of ten thousand spears," who lived near the waters of Lano (a Scandinavian lake). He went to Inis-Thona (an island of Scandinavia), to the court of king Annir, and "sought the honour of the spear" (i.e. a tournament). Argon, the elder son of Annir, tilted with him and overthrew him. This vexed Cormalo greatly, and during a hunting expedition he drew his bow in secret and shot both Argon and his brother Ruro. Their father wondered they did not return, when their dog Runa came bounding into the hall, howling so as to attract attention. Annir followed the hound, and found his sons both dead. In the mean time his daughter was carried off by Cormalo. When Oscar, son of Ossian, heard thereof, he vowed vengeance, went with an army to Lano, encountered Cormalo, and slew him. Then rescuing the daughter, he took her back to Inis-Thona, and delivered her to her father.—Ossian: The War of Inis-Thona.

Cor'moran' (The Giant), a Cornish giant slain by Jack the Giant-killer. This was his first exploit, accomplished when he was a mere boy. Jack dug a deep pit, and so artfully filmed it over atop, that the giant fell into it, whereupon Jack knocked him on the head and killed him.

> The Persian trick of "Ameen and the Ghool" recurs in the Scandinavian visit of Thor to Loki, which has come down to Germany in The Brave Little Tailor, and to us in Jack the Giant-killer.—Yonge.
> This is the valiant Cornish man
> Who killed the giant Cormoran.
> Jack the Giant-killer (nursery tale).

Cornavii, the inhabitants of Cheshire, Shropshire, Staffordshire, Warwickshire, and Worcestershire. Drayton refers to them in his Polyolbion, xvi. (1613).

Corneille du Boulevard, Guilbert de Pixérécourt (1773-1844).

Corne'lia, wife of Titus Sempronius Gracchus, and mother of the two tribunes Tiberius and Caius. She was almost idolised by the Romans, who erected a statue in her honour, with this inscription: CORNELIA, MOTHER OF THE GRACCHI.

> Clelia, Cornelia, . . . and the Roman brows
> Of Agrippina.
> Tennyson: The Princess, ii.

Corner (The). So Tattersall's used to be called.

> I saw advertised a splendid park hack, and . . . immediately proceeded to the Corner.—Lord W. Lennox: Celebrities, etc., ii. 15.

Cornet, a waiting-woman on lady Fanciful. She caused great offence because she did not flatter her ladyship. She actually said to her, "Your ladyship looks very ill this morning," which the French waiting-woman contradicted by saying, "My opinion be, matam, dat your latyship never look so well in all your life." Lady Fanciful said to Cornet, "Get out of the room; I can't endure you;" and then turning to Mdlle. she added, "This wench is insufferably ugly. . . . Oh, by-the-by, Mdlle., you can take these two pair of gloves. The French are certainly well-mannered, and never flatter."—Vanbrugh: The Provoked Wife (1697).

¶ This is of a piece with the archbishop of Grana'da and his secretary Gil Blas. (See ARCHBISHOP OF GRANADA, p. 55.)

Corney (Mrs.), matron of the workhouse where Oliver Twist was born. She is a well-to-do widow, who marries Bumble, and reduces the pompous beadle to a hen-pecked husband.—Dickens: Oliver Twist, xxxvii. (1837).

Cornflower (Henry), a farmer, who "beneath a rough outside possessed a heart which would have done honour to a prince."

Mrs. Cornflower (by birth Emma Belton), the farmer's wife, abducted by sir Charles Courtly.—Dibdin: The Farmer's Wife (1780).

Cornhill Magazine (The), started in 1860, Thackeray being its editor.

Cornhill to Grand Cairo (From), by Thackeray (1845). The "journey was from Lisbon to Athens, Constantinople, and Jerusalem, in the "Peninsular and Oriental Company."

Cornio'le (4 syl.), the cognomen given to Giovanni Bernardi, the great cornelian engraver, in the time of Lorenzo di Medici. He was called "Giovanni delle Corniole" (1495-1555).

Corn-Law Rhymer (The), Ebenezer Elliot (1781-1849).

Cornu'bia, Cornwall. The rivers of Cornwall are more or less tinged with the metals which abound in those parts.

Then from the largest stream unto the lesser brook . . .
They curl their ivory fronts, . . . and breed such courage . . .
As drew down many a nymph [river] from the Cornubian shore,
That paint their goodly breasts [water] with sundry sorts of oar.
Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

Cornu'bian Shore (The), Cornwall, famous for its tin-mines. Merchants of ancient Tyre and Sidon used to export from Cornwall its tin in large quantities.

. . . from the bleak Cornubian shore,
Dispense the mineral treasure, which of old
Sidonian pilots sought.
Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads.

Cornwall (Barry), an imperfect anagram of Bryan Waller Proctor, author of English Songs (1788–1874).

Corombona (Vittoria), the White Devil, the chief character in a drama by John Webster, entitled The White Devil, or Vittoria Corombona (1612).

Coro'nis, daughter of Phorōneus (3 syl.) king of Pho'cis, metamorphosed by Minerva into a crow.

Corporal (The Little). General Bonaparte was so called after the battle of Lodi (1796).

Corrector (Alexander the). (See ALEXANDER, p. 22.)

Corriv'reckin, an intermittent whirlpool in the Southern Hebridēs, so called from a Danish prince of that name, who perished there.

Corronge' (2 syl.), the sword of sir Otuel, a presumptuous Saracen, nephew of Farracute (3 syl.). Otuel was in the end converted to Christianity.

Corsair (The), a poem in three cantos (heroic couplets) by lord Byron (1814). The corsair was lord Conrad, afterwards called Lara. Hearing that the sultan Seyd [Seed] was about to attack the pirates, he assumed the disguise of a dervise and entered the palace, while his crew set fire to the sultan's fleet. Conrad was apprehended and cast into a dungeon, and being released by Gulnare (queen of the harem), he fled with her to the Pirates' Isle. Here he found that Medo'ra (his heart's darling) had died during his absence, so he left the island with Gulnare, returned to his native land, headed a rebellion, and was shot.

(This tale is based on the adventures of Lafitte, the notorious buccaneer. Lafitte was pardoned by general Jackson for services rendered to the States in 1815, during the attack of the British on New Orleans.)

Cor'sand, a magistrate at the examination of Dirk Hatteraick at Kipplestringan.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Corsican Brothers (The), a drama by Boucicault (1848), an adaptation of Dumas's novel. The name of the brothers is Dei Franchi.

Corsican General (The), Napoleon I., who was born in Corsica (1769–1821).

Cor'sina, wife of the corsair who found Fairstar and Chery in the boat as it drifted on the sea. Being made very rich by her foster-children, Corsina brought them up as princes.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The Princess Fairstar," 1682).

Corte'jo, a cavalier servente, who as Byron says in Beppo—

Coach, servants, gondola, must go to call,
And carries fan and tippet, gloves and shawl.
Was it for this that no cortejo ere
I yet have chosen from the youth of Sev'ille?
Byron: Don Juan, i. 148 (1823).

Corti'na [a cauldron]. It stood on three feet. The tripod of the Pythoness was so called, because she sat in a kind of basin standing on three feet. When not in use, it was covered with a lid, and the basin then looked like a large metal ball.

Cor'via or Cor'vina, a valuable stone, which will cause the possessor to be both rich and honoured. It is obtained thus: Take the eggs from a crow's nest, and boil them hard, then replace them in the nest, and the mother will go in search of the stone, in order to revivify her eggs. —Mirror of Stones.

Corvi'no (Signior), a Venetian merchant, duped by Mosca into believing that he is Vol'pone's heir.—Ben Jonson: Volpone, or the Fox (1605).

Coryat's Crudities, a book of travels by Thomas Coryat, who called himself the "Odcombian Legstretcher." He was the son of the rector of Odcombe (1577–1617). (See CORIAT, p. 234.)

Coryc'ian Cave (The), on mount Parnassus, so called from the nymph Coryc'ia. Sometimes the Muses are called Coryc'ides (4 syl.).

The immortal Muse
To your calm habitations, to the cave
Corycian, or the Delphic mount will guide
His footsteps.
Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads

Corycian Nymphs (The), the Muses, so called from the cave of Corycĭa on Lycorēa, one of the two chief summits of mount Parnassus, in Greece.

Cor'ydon, a common name for a shepherd. It occurs in the Idylls of Theocritos; the Eclogues of Virgil; The Cantata, v., of Hughes, etc.

Cor'ydon, the shepherd who languished for the fair Pastorella (canto 9). Sir Calidore, the successful rival, treated him most courteously, and when he married the fair shepherdess, gave Corydon both flocks and herds to mitigate his disappointment (canto 11).—Spenser: Faërie Queene, vi. (1596).

Cor'ydon, the shoemaker, a citizen.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Coryphæus of German Literature (The), Göethe.

The Polish poet called upon . . . the great Coryphæus of German literature.—W. R. Morfill: Notes and Queries, April 27, 1878.

Coryphe'us (4 syl.), a model man or leader, from the Koruphaios or leader of the chorus in the Greek drama. Aristarchos is called The Corypheus of Grammarians.

I was in love with honour, and reflected with pleasure that I should pass for the Corypheus of all domestics.—Lesage: Gil Blas, iv. 7 (1724).

Cosme (St.), patron of surgeons, born in Arabia. He practised medicine in Cilicia with his brother St. Damien, and both suffered martyrdom under Dioletian in 303 or 310. Their fête day is December 27. In the twelfth century there was a medical society called Saint Cosme.

Cos'miel (3 syl.), the genius of the world. He gave to Theodidactus a boat of asbestos, in which he sailed to the sun and planets.—Kircher: Ecstatic Journey to Heaven.

Cosmos, the personification of "the world" as the enemy of man. Phineas Fletcher calls him "the first son to the Dragon red" (the devil). "Mistake," he says, "points all his darts;" or, as the Preacher says, "Vanity, vanity, all is vanity." Fully described in The Purple Island, viii. (1633). (Greek, kosmos, "the world.")

Cos'tard, a clown who apes the court wits of queen Elizabeth's time. He uses the word "honorificabilitudinitatibus," and some of his blunders are very ridiculous, as "ad dunghill, at the fingers' ends, as they say" (act v. 1).—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost (1594).

Costigan (Captain), the father of Miss Fotheringay, in Thackeray's Pendennis (1850).

Costin (Lord), disguised as a beggar, in The Beggar's Bush, a drama by Fletcher (1622). Folio ed. 1647.

Cote Male-tailé (Sir), meaning the "knight with the villainous coat." The nickname given by sir Kay (the seneschal of king Arthur) to sir Brewnor le Noyre, a young knight who wore his father's coat with all its sword-cuts, to keep him in remembrance of the vengeance due to his father. His first achievement was to kill a lion that "had broken loose from a tower, and came hurling after the queen." He married a damsel called Maledisaunt (3 syl.), who loved him, but always chided him. After her marriage she was called Beauvinant.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 42–50 (1740).

Cotta, in Pope's Moral Essays (epistle ii.), is said to be intended for the duke of Newcastle, who died 1711.

Cotter's Saturday Night (The), a poem by Burns, Spenserian metre (1787).

Cotyt'to, goddess of the Edŏni of Thrace. Her orgies resembled those of the Thracian Cybelê (3 syl.).

Hail, goddess of nocturnal sport,
Dark-veiled Cotytto, to whom the secret flame
Of midnight torches burns!
Milton: Comus, 139, etc. (1634).

Cougar, the American tiger.

Nor foeman then, nor cougar's crouch I feared,
For I was strong as mountain cataract.
Campbell: Gertrude of Wyoming, iii. 14 (1809).

Coulin, a British giant pursued by Debon till he came to a chasm 132 feet across, which he leaped; but slipping on the opposite side, he fell backwards into the pit and was killed.

And eke that ample pit yet far renowned
For the great leap which Debon did compell
Coulin to make, being eight lugs of grownd,
Into the which retourning back he fell.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 10 (1590).

Councils (Œcumenical). Only six are recognized by the Church of England, viz.: (1) Nice, 325; (2) Constantinople, 381; (3) Ephesus, 431; (4) Chalce'don, 451; (5) Constantinople, 553; (6) ditto, 680.

Count not your Chickens before they are Hatched. Generally ascribed to Lafontaine, from his fable of the milk-maid Perrette. But the substance of this fable is very old. For example—

¶ In A.D. 550 Barzûyeh translated for the king of Persia a collection of Indian fables called the Panka Tantra ("five books"), and one of the stories is that of a Brahmin who collected rice by begging; but it occurred to him there might be a famine, in which case he could sell his rice for 100 rupees, and buy two goats. The goats would multiply, and he would then buy cows; the cows would calve, and he would buy a farm; with the savings of his farm he would buy a mansion; then marry some one with a rich dowry; there would be a son in due time, who should be named Somo Sala, whom he would dandle on his knees. If the child ran into danger he would cry to the mother, "Take up the baby! take up the baby!" In his excitement the castle-dreamer kicked over his packet of rice, and all his swans took wing. From this fable the Persians say of a castle-dreamer, "He is like the father of Somo Sala."

¶ Another version of the story is given in "The History of the Barber's Fifth Brother," whose name was Alnaschar (q.v.).—Arabian Nights' Entertainments.

¶ Rabelais has introduced a similar story, called "The Shoemaker and a Ha'poth of Milk," told by Echephron, in Pantag'ruel. (See ECHEPHRON.)

Count of Narbonne, a tragedy by Robert Jephson (1782). His father, count Raymond, having poisoned Alphonso, forged a will barring Godfrey's right, and naming Raymond as successor. Theodore fell in love with Adelaide, the count's daughter, but was reduced to this dilemma: if he married Adelaide, he could not challenge the count and obtain the possessions he had a right to as grandson of Alphonso; if, on the other hand, he obtained his rights and killed the count in combat, he could not expect that Adelaide would marry him. At the end the count killed Adelaide, and then himself. This drama is copied from Walpole: Castle of Otranto.

Count Robert of Paris, a novel by sir W. Scott, after the wreck of his fortune and repeated strokes of paralysis (1831). The critic can afford to be indulgent, and those who read this story must remember that the sun of the great wizard was hastening to its set. The time of the novel is the reign of Rufus.

Counties. "The clownish blazon of each county" (from Drayton's Polyolbion, xxiii., towards the close).

BEDFORDSHIRE: Malthorses.
BERKSHIRE: Let's toy, and toss the ball.
BERWICK (to the Ouse): Snaffle, spur, and spear.
BUCKINGHAMSHIRE:
Bread and beef,
Where if you beat the bush, 'tis odds you start a thief.
CAMBRIDGESHIRE: Hold nets, and let us win.
CHESHIRE: Chief of men.
CORNWALL: } We'll wrestle for a fall.
DEVONSHIRE: }
DERBYSHIRE: Wool and lead.
DORSETSHIRE: Dorsers.
ESSEX: Calves and stiles.
GLOUCESTERSHIRE: Weigh thy wood.
HANTS: Hampshire hogs.
HEREFORDSHIRE: Give me woof and warp.
HERTS:
The club and clouted shoon,
I'll rise betimes, and sleep again at noon.
HUNTINGDONSHIRE: With stilts we'll stalk through thick and thin.
KENT: Long tails and liberty.
LANCASHIRE: Witches or Fair maids.
LEICESTERSHIRE: Bean-bellies.
LINCOLNSHIRE: Bags and bagpipes.
MIDDLESEX:
Up to London let us go,
And when our market's done, let's have a pot or two.
NORFOLK: Many wiles.
NORTHANTS: Love below the girdle, but little else above.
NOTTINGHAMSHIRE: Ale and bread.
OXFORDSHIRE:
The scholars have been here,
And little though they paid, yet have they had good cheer.
RUTLANDSHIRE: Raddlemen.
SHROPSHIRE:

SUSSEX: }
WARWICKSHIRE: I'll bind the sturdy bear.
WILTSHIRE: Get home and pay for all.
WORCESTERSHIRE: And I will squirt the peas.
YORKSHIRE: I'se Yorkshire and Stingo.

Country (Father of his). Cicero was so called by the Roman senate (B.C. 106–43). Julius Cæsar was so called after quelling the insurrection in Spain (B.C. 100–43). Augustus Cæsar was called Pater atque Princeps (B.C. 63, 31–14). Cosmo de Med'ici (1389–1464), G. Washington, defender and paternal counsellor of the American States (1732–1799). Andrea Dorĕa is so called on the base of his statue in Gen'oa (1468–1560). Andronicus Palæol'ogus II. assumed the title (1260–1332). (See 1 Chron. iv. 14.)

Country Girl (The), a comedy by Garrick, altered from Wycherly. The "country girl" is Peggy Thrift, the orphan daughter of sir Thomas Thrift, and ward of Moody, who brings her up in the country in perfect seclusion. When Moody is 50 and Peggy is 19, he wants to marry her, but she outwits him and marries Belville, a young man of suitable age and position.

Country Parson (A), the name under which Dr. Boyd (minister of St. Andrew's, Scotland) wrote several books.

Country Pastor (A). So archbishop Whately signed his Lectures on Scripture Revelations (1825).

Country Wife (The), a comedy by William Wycherly (1675).

Pope was proud to receive notice from the author of The Country Wife.—R. Chambers: English Literature, i. 393.

Coupee, the dancing-master, who says "if it were not for dancing-masters, men might as well walk on their heads as heels." He courts Lucy by promising to teach her dancing.—Fielding: The Virgin Unmasked.

Courland Weather, wintry weather with pitiless snow-storms. So called from the Russian province of that name.

Course of Time (The), an epic poem in blank verse (six books) by Pollok (1827).

Course of True Love never did run Smooth (The), a tale by C. Reade (1857).

(T. B. Aldrich wrote a story in verse with the same title in 1858. It recounts the ups and downs of two lovers, whom the caliph tried to keep apart.)

Court Holy Water, flummery; the meaningless compliments of politesse, called in French Eau benite de cour.

To flatter, to claw, to give one court holie-water.—Florio: Italian Dictionary, art. "Mantellizare."

Cour'tain, one of the swords of Ogier the Dane, made by Munifican. His other sword was Sauvagine.

But Ogier gazed upon it [the sea] doubtfully
One moment, and then, sheathing Courtain, said,
"What tales are these!"
Morris: The Earthly Paradise ("August").

Courtall, a fop and consummate libertine, for ever boasting of his love-conquests over ladies of the haut monde. He tries to corrupt lady Frances Touchwood, but is foiled by Saville.—Mrs. Cowley: The Belle's Stratagem (1780).

Courtenay (Peregrine), the pseudonym of Praed (1802-1839).

Courtly (Sir Charles), a young libertine, who abducted the beautiful wife of farmer Cornflower.—Dibdin: The Farmer's Wife (1780).

Courtship of Miles Standish (The), a poem in English hexameters by Longfellow (1858).

Cousin Michel or MICHAEL, the nickname of a German, as John Bull is of an Englishman, Brother Jonathan of an American, Colin Tampon a Swiss, John Chinaman a Chinese, etc.

Cousins (The), a novel by Mrs. Trollope (1847).

Couvade' (2 syl.), a man who takes the place of his wife when she is in child-bed. In these cases the man lies a-bed, and the woman does the household duties. The people called "Gold Tooth," in the confines of Burmah, are couvades. M. Francisque Michel tells us the custom still exists in Biscay; and colonel Yule assures us that it is common in Yunnan and among the Miris in Upper Assam. Mr. Tylor has observed the same custom among the Caribs of the West Indies, the Abipones of Central South America, the aborigines of California, in Guiana, in West Africa, and in the Indian Archipelago. Diodōrus speaks of it as existing at one time in Corsica; Strabo says the custom prevailed in the north of Spain; and Apollonius Rhodius that the Tabarenes on the Euxine Sea observed the same—

In the Tabarenian land,
When some good woman bears her lord a babe,
'Tis he is swathed, and groaning put to bed;
While she arising tends his bath and serves
Nice possets for her husband in the straw.
Apollonius Rhodius: Argonautic Exp.

Coventry, a corruption of Cune-tre ("the town on the Cune").

Cune, whence Coventry her name doth take.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Coventry Mysteries, certain miracle-plays acted at Coventry till 1591. They were published in 1841 for the Shakespeare Society, under the care of J. O. Halliwell. (See CHESTER MYSTERIES, p. 200.)

Cov'erley (Sir Roger de), a member of an hypothetical club, noted for his modesty, generosity, hospitality, and eccentric whims; most courteous to his neighbours, most affectionate to his family, most amiable to his domestics. Sir Roger, who figures in thirty papers of the Spectator, is the very beau-ideal of an amiable country gentleman of queen Anne's time.

What would Sir Roger de Coverley be without his follies and his charming little brain-cracks? If the good knight did not call out to the people sleeping in church and say "Amen" with such delightful pomposity; if he did not mistake Mde. Doll Tearsheet for a lady of quality in Temple Garden; if he were wiser than he is, . . . of what worth were he to us? We love him for his vanities as much as for his virtues.—Thackeray.

Covert-baron, a wife, so called because she is under the covert or protection of her baron or lord.

Cow and Calf, Lewesdon Hill and Pillesdon Pen, in Dorsetshire.

Cowards and BULLIES. In Shakespeare we have Parollês and Pistol; in Ben Jonson, Bob'adil; in Beaumont and Fletcher, Bessus and Mons. Lapet, the very prince of cowards; in the French drama, Le Capitan, Metamore, and Scaramouch. (See also BASILISCO, CAPTAIN NOLL BLUFF, BOROUGHCLIFF, CAPTAIN BRAZEN, SIR PETRONEL FLASH, SACRIPANT, VINCENT DE LA ROSE, etc.)

Cowper, called "Author of The Task," from his principal poem (1731–1800).

Cowper's Grave, a poem by R. Browning (1812–1889).

Cowper-Temple Clause, the clause (xiv.) in the Elementary Education Act of 1870, which runs thus: "No religious catechism or religious formulary which is distinctive of any particular denomination shall be taught in [board schools]."

Cox's Diary, a comic story by Thackeray.

Coxcomb, an empty-headed, conceited fop, like an ancient jester, who wore on the top of his cap a piece of red cloth resembling a cock's comb.

The Prince of Coxcombs, Charles Joseph prince de Ligne (1535–1614).

Richard II. of England (1366, 1377–1400).

Henri III. of France, Le Mignon (1551, 1574–1589).

Coxe (Captain), one of the masques at Kenilworth.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Crabshaw (Timothy), the servant of sir Launcelot Greaves's squire.—Smollett: Adventures of Sir Launcelot Greaves (1760).

Crab'tree, in Smollett's novel called The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle (1751).

Crab'tree, uncle of sir Benjamin Backbite, in Sheridan's comedy, The School for Scandal (1777).

Crab'tree, a gardener at Fairport.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Craca, one of the Shetland Isles.—Ossian: Fingal.

Crack'enthorp (Father), a publican. Dolly Crackenthorp, daughter of the publican.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Crackit (Flash Toby), one of the villains in the attempted burglary in which Bill Sikes and his associates were concerned.—C. Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Cra'dlemont, king of Wales, subdued by Arthur, fighting for Leod'ogran king of Cam'eliard (3 syl.).—Tennyson. Coming of Arthur.

Cradock (Sir), the only knight who could carve the boar's head which no cuckold could cut; or drink from a bowl which no cuckold could quaff without spilling the liquor. His lady was the only one in king Arthur's court who could wear the mantle of chastity brought thither by a boy during Christmas-tide.—Percy: Reliques, etc., III. iii. 18.

Craigdal'lie (Adam), the senior baillie of Perth.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Craig'engelt (Captain), an adventurer and companion of Bucklaw.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Cramp (Corporal), under captain Thornton.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Crampart (King), the king who made a wooden horse which would go 100 miles an hour.—Alkmaar: Reynard the Fox (1498).

Cran'bourne (Sir Jasper), a friend of sir Geoffrey Peveril.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Crane (Dame Alison), mistress of the Crane inn, at Marlborough.

Gaffer Crane, the dame's husband.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Crane (Ichabod), a credulous Yankee schoolmaster. He is described as "tall, exceedingly lank, and narrow-shouldered; his arms, legs, and neck unusually long; his hands dangle a mile out of his sleeves; his feet might serve for shovels; and his whole frame is very loosely hung together."—W. Irving: Sketch-Book.

The head of Ichabod Crane was small and flat at top, with huge ears, large green glassy eyes, and a long snipe nose, so that it looked like a weather-cock perched upon his spindle neck to tell which way the wind blew.—Irving: Sketch-Book ("Legend of Sleepy Hollow").

Cranes (1 syl.). Milton, referring to the wars of the pygmies and the cranes, calls the former

> That small infantry
> Warred on by cranes.
> Paradise Lost, i. 575 (1665).

Cranion, queen Mab's charioteer.

> Four nimble gnats the horses were,
> Their harnesses of gossamere,
> Fly Cranion, her charioteer.
> Drayton: Nymphidia (1563–1631).

Crank (Dame), the papist laundress at Marlborough.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Cranmer, Latimer, and Ridley. The following bill for their burning is in the British Museum:—

For 3 loads wood faggots, 12*s.*; item, one load furze faggots, 3*s.* 4*d.*; item, for carriage, 2*s.* 6*d.*; item, a post, 2*s.* 4*d.*; item, 2 chains, 3*s.* 4*d.*; item, 2 tables, 6*d.*; item, labourers, 2*s.* 8*d.*; total, £1 6*s.* 8*d.*

Cra'paud (Johnnie), a Frenchman, as John Bull is an Englishman, Cousin Michael a German, Colin Tampon a Swiss, Brother Jonathan a North American, etc. Called Crapaud from the device of the ancient kings of France, "three toads erect, saltant." Nostradāmus, in the sixteenth century, called the French crapauds in the well-known line—

Les anciens crapauds prendront Sara.

("Sara" is Aras backwards, a city taken from the Spaniards under Louis XIV.).

Cratchit (Bob or Robert), clerk of Ebenezer Scrooge, stock-broker. Though Bob Cratchit has to maintain nine persons on 15*s.* a week, he has a happier home and spends a merrier Christmas than his master, with all his wealth and selfishness.

Tiny Tim Cratchit, the little lame son of Bob Cratchit, the Benjamin of the family, the most helpless and most beloved of all. Tim does not die, but Ebenezer Scrooge, after his change of character, makes him his special care.—C. Dickens: A Christmas Carol (in five staves, 1843).

Craw'ford (Lindsay earl of), the young earl-marshal of Scotland.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Craw'ford (Lord), captain of the Scottish guard at Plessis lès Tours, in the pay of Louis XI.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Crawley (Sir Pitt), of Great Gaunt Street, and of Queen's Crawley, Hants. A sharp, miserly, litigious, vulgar, ignorant baronet, very rich, desperately mean, "a philosopher with a taste for low life," and intoxicated every night. Becky Sharp was engaged by him to teach his two daughters. On the death of his second wife, sir Pitt asked her to become lady Crawley, but Becky had already married his son, captain Rawdon Crawley. This "aristocrat" spoke of "brass fardens," and was unable to spell the simplest words, as the following specimen will show:—"Sir Pitt Crawley begs Miss Sharp and baggidge may be hear on Tuseday, as I leaf . . . to-morrow erly." "The whole baronetage, peerage, and commonage of England did not contain a more cunning, mean, foolish, disreputable old rogue than sir Pitt Crawley." He died at the age of fourscore, "lamented and beloved, regretted and honoured," if we can believe his monumental tablet.

Lady Crawley. Sir Pitt's first wife was "a confounded, quarrelsome, high-bred jade." So he chose for his second wife the daughter of Mr. Dawson, ironmonger, of Mudbury, who gave up her sweetheart, Peter Butt, for the gilded vanity of Crawleyism. This ironmonger's daughter had "pink cheeks and a white skin, but no distinctive character, no opinions, no occupation, no amusements, no vigour of mind, no temper; she was a mere female machine." Being a "blonde, she wore draggled sea-green or slatternly sky-blue dresses," went about slip-shod and in curl-papers all day till dinner-time. She died and left sir Pitt for the second time a widower, "to-morrow to fresh woods and pastures new."

Mr. Pitt Crawley, eldest son of sir Pitt, and at the death of his father inheritor of the title and estates. Mr. Pitt was a most proper gentleman. He would rather starve than dine without a dress-coat and white neckcloth. The whole house bowed down to him; even sir Pitt himself threw off his muddy gaiters in his son's presence. Mr. Pitt always addressed his mother-in-law with "most powerful respect," and strongly impressed her with his high aristocratic breeding. At Eton he was called "Miss Crawley." His religious opinions were offensively aggressive and of the "evangelical type." He even built a meeting-house close by his uncle's church. Mr. Pitt Crawley came into the large fortune of his aunt, Miss Crawley, married lady Jane Sheepshanks, daughter of the countess of Southdown, became an M.P., grew money-loving and mean, but less and less "evangelical" as he grew great and wealthy.

Captain Rawdon Crawley, younger brother of Mr. Pitt Crawley. He was in the Dragoon Guards, a "blood about town," and an adept in boxing, rat-hunting, the fives-court, and four-in-hand driving. He was a young dandy, six feet high, with a great voice, but few brains. He could swear a great deal, but could not spell. He ordered about the servants, who nevertheless adored him; was generous, but did not pay his tradesmen; a Lothario, free and easy. His style of talk was, "Aw, aw; Jave-aw; Gad-aw; it's a confounded fine segaw-aw—confounded as I ever smoked. Gad-aw." This military exquisite was the adopted heir of Miss Crawley; but as he chose to marry Becky Sharp, was set aside for his brother Pitt. For a time Becky enabled him to live in splendour "upon nothing a year." But a great scandal got wind of gross improprieties between lord Steyne and Becky; so that Rawdon separated from his wife, and was given the governorship of Coventry Isle by lord Steyne. "His excellency colonel Rawdon Crawley died in his island of yellow fever, most deeply beloved and deplored," and his son Rawdon inherited his uncle's title and the family estates.

The Rev. Bute Crawley, brother of sir Pitt. He was a "tall, stately, jolly, shovel-hatted rector." "He pulled stroke-oar in the Christ Church boat, and had thrashed the best bruisers of the town. The Rev. Bute loved boxing-matches, races, hunting, coursing, balls, elections, regattas, and good dinners; had a fine singing voice, and was very popular." His wife wrote his sermons for him.

Mrs. Bute Crawley, the rector's wife, was a smart little lady, domestic, politic, but apt to overdo her "policy." She gave her husband full liberty to do as he liked, was prudent and thrifty.—Thackeray: Vanity Fair (1848).

Cray'on (Le Sieur de), one of the officers of Charles "the Bold," duke of Burgundy.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Cray'on (Geoffrey), Esq., a pseudonym of Washington Irving, author of The Sketch-Book (1820).

Crea'kle, a hard, vulgar schoolmaster, to whose charge David Copperfield was entrusted, and where he first made the acquaintance of Steerforth.

> The circumstance about him which impressed me most was that he had no voice, but spoke in a whisper.
> —Dickens: David Copperfield, vi. (1849).

Creation, a poem by Richard Blackmore, M.D. (1711). Dr. Johnson thought well of it. An oratorio by Haydn (1798); La Première Semaine, by Du Bartas (about 1570); a French epic, translated into English verse by Joshua Sylvester, in 1605. Milton, in his Paradise Lost, was under obligation to Du Bartas.

Credat Judæus Apella, non ego (Horace, 1 Satires, v. 100). Of "Apella" nothing whatever is known. In general the name is omitted, and the word "Judæus" stands for any Jew. "A disbelieving Jew would give credit to the statement sooner than I should."

Creed (An Exposition of the) by Pearson (1659). When I was at College, "Pearson on the Creed" and Paley's "Evidences" were standard books.

Cre'kenpit, a fictitious river near Husterloe, according to the hypothetical geography of Master Reynard, who calls on the hare to attest the fact.—Reynard the Fox (1498).

Crescent City, New Orleans [Or-leens], in Louisiana, U.S.

Cres'sida, in Chaucer Cresseide (2 syl.), a beautiful, sparkling, and accomplished woman, who has become a by-word for infidelity. She was the daughter of Calchas, a Trojan priest, who took part with the Greeks. Cressida is not a character of classic story, but a mediæval creation. Pope says her story was the invention of Lollius the Lombard, historiographer of Urbino, in Italy. Cressida betroths herself to Troïlus, a son of Priam, and vows eternal fidelity. Troïlus gives the maiden a sleeve, and she gives her Adonis a glove, as love-knots. Soon after this betrothal an exchange of prisoners is made, when Cressida falls to the lot of Diomed, to whom she very soon yields her love, and even gives him the very sleeve which Troïlus had given her as a love-token.

 In Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida, she is a mere giddy jilt, who might be wooed and won by any one.

> As false
> As air, as water, wind, or sandy earth . . .
> Yea, let [men] say to stick the heart of falsehood,
> "As false as Cressid."
> Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, act iii. sc. 2 (1602).

Cresswell (Madame), a woman of infamous character, who bequeathed £10 for a funeral sermon, in which nothing ill should be said of her. The duke of Buckingham wrote the sermon, which was as follows:—"All I shall say of her is this: she was born well, she married well, lived well, and died well; for she was born at Shad-well, married Cresswell, lived at Clerken-well, and died in Bride-well."—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap. xliv.

Crete (Hound of), a blood-hound.—See Midsummer Night's Dream, act iii. sc. 2.

> Coupe le gorge, that's the word; I thee defy again,
> O hound of Crete!
> Shakespeare: Henry V. act ii. sc. 1 (1599).

The Infamy of Crete, the Minotaur.

> [There] lay stretched
> The infamy of Crete, detested brood
> Of the feigned heifer.
> Dante: Hell, xii. (1300, Cary's translation).

Crèvecour (2 syl.). The count Philip de Crèvecour is the envoy sent by Charles "the Bold," duke of Burgundy, with a defiance to Louis XI. king of France.

The countess of Crèvecour, wife of the count.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Crib (Tom), Thomas Moore, author of Tom Crib's Memorial to Congress, in verse (1819).

Crichton (The Admirable), James Crichton, a Scotchman (1560–1583). He was killed at Mantua in a duel with his pupil, Vincenzo di Gonzao, at the age of twenty-three.

The Irish Crichton, John Henderson (1757–1788).

Cricket on the Hearth (The), a Christmas fairy tale, by Dickens (1845). (See PEERYBINGLE.)

Crillon. The following story is told of this brave but simple-minded officer. Henri IV., after the battle of Arques, wrote to him thus—

> Prends-toi, brave Crillon, nous avons vaincu à Arques, et tu n'y étais pas.

The first and last part of this letter have become proverbial in France.

When Crillon heard the story of the Crucifixion read at church, he grew so excited that he cried out in an audible voice, Où étais tu, Crillon? ("What were you about, Crillon, to permit of such atrocity?")

¶ When Clovis was told of the Crucifixion, he exclaimed, "Had I and my Franks been by, we would have avenged the wrong, I warrant."

Crime—Blunder. Talleyrand said of the execution of the duc d'Enghien by Napoleon I., that it was "not merely a crime, it was a blunder." The words have been attributed to Fouché also.

Crimo'ra and Connal. Crimora, daughter of Rinval, was in love with Connal of the race of Fingal, who was defied by Dargo. He begs his "sweeting" to lend him her father's shield; but she says it is ill-fated, for her father fell by the spear of Gormar. Connal went against his foe, and Crimora, disguised in armour, went also, but unknown to him. She saw her lover in fight with Dargo, and discharged an arrow at the foe, but it missed its aim and shot Connal. She ran in agony to his succour. It was too late. He died, Crimora died also, and both were buried in one grave. — Ossian: Carric-Thura.

Crim-Tartary, now called the Crime'a.

Cringle's Log (Tom), a sea story by Michael Scott (1789–1835).

Crispin (St.). Crispinos and Crispiănus were two brothers, born at Rome, from which place they travelled to Soissons, in France (about A.D. 303), to propagate the gospel. They worked as shoemakers, that they might not be chargeable to any one. The governor of the town ordered them to be beheaded the very year of their arrival; and they were made the tutelary saints of the "gentle craft." St. Crispin's Day is October 25.

> This day is called the feast of Crispian . . .
> And Crispin Crispian shall ne'er go by,
> From this day to the ending of the world,
> But we in it shall be remembered.
> Shakespeare: Henry V. act iv. sc. 3 (1599).

Crispi'nus, in Ben Jonson's play of The Poetaster, is meant for Maston, the dramatist (1661).

Critic (A Bossu), one who criticises the "getting up" of a book more than its literary worth; a captious, carping critic. Réne le Bossu was a French critic (1631–1680).

> The epic poem your lordship bade me look at, upon taking the length, breadth, height, and depth of it, and trying them at home upon an exact scale of Bossu's, 'tis out, my lord, in every one of its dimensions. A admirable connoisseur!—Satyrs.

(The scale referred to was that of Bossut the mathematician.) (v. CRITICS, p. 208.)

Critic (The), by R. B. Sheridan, suggested by The Rehearsal (1779).

(The Rehearsal is by the duke of Buckingham, 1671.)

Criticism (An Essay on), by Pope (1709). It contains 724 lines in heroic couplets. It is full of household lines and phrases.

∴ Lord Kames published, in 1762, a book called The Elements of Criticism.

Critics (The Prince of), Aristarchos of Byzantium, who compiled, in the second century B.C., the rhapsodies of Homer.

N.B.—Ritson was both an insolent and a malignant critic. (See RITSONISM.)

Croaker, guardian to Miss Richland. Never so happy as when he imagines himself a martyr. He loves a funeral better than a festival, and delights to think that the world is going to rack and ruin. His favourite phrase is "May be not."

A poor, fretful soul, that has a new distress for every hour of the four and twenty.—Act I. 2.

Mrs. Croaker, the very reverse of her grumbling, atrabilious husband. She is mirthful, light-hearted, and cheerful as a lark.

The very reverse of each other. She all laugh and no joke, he always complaining and never sorrowful.—Act I. 2.

Leontine Croaker, son of Mr. Croaker. Being sent to Paris to fetch his sister, he falls in love with Olivia Woodville, whom he brings home instead, introduces her to Croaker as his daughter, and ultimately marries her. — Goldsmith: The Good-natured Man (1768).

Crocodile (King). The people of Isna, in Upper Egypt, affirm that there is a king crocodile as there is a queen bee. The king crocodile has ears but no tail, and has no power of doing harm. Southey says that though the king crocodile has no tail, he has teeth to devour his people with.—Browne: Travels.

Crocodile (Lady Kitty), meant for the duchess of Kingston.—Foote: A Trip to Calais (1777).

Crocodile's Tears, deceitful show of grief; hypocritical sorrow.

It is written that the crocodile will weep over a man's head when he hath devoured the body, and then he will eat up the head too. Wherefore in Latin there is a proverb: Crocodili lachrymæ ("crocodile's tears"), to signify such tears as are fained and spent only with intent to deceive or doe harm.—Bullokar: English Expositor (1616).

Cæsar will weep, the crocodile will weep.
Dryden: All for Love (1682).

Cro'cus, a young man enamoured of the nymph Smilax, who did not return his love. The gods changed him into the crocus flower, to signify unrequited love.

Crœsus, king of Lydia, deceived by an oracle, was conquered by Cyrus king of Persia. Cyrus commanded a huge funeral pile to be erected, upon which Crœsus and fourteen Lydian youths were to be chained and burnt alive. When on the pyre, the discrowned king called on the name of Solon, and Cyrus asked why he did so. "Because he told me to call no one happy till death." Cyrus, struck with the remark, ordered the fire of the pile to be put out, but this could not be done. Crœsus then called on Apollo, who sent a shower which extinguished the flames, and he and his Lydians came from the pile unharmed.

¶ The resemblance of this legend to the Bible account of the Jewish youths condemned by Nebuchadnezzar to be cast into the fiery furnace, from which they came forth uninjured, will recur to the reader.—Daniel iii.

Crœsus's Dream. Crœsus dreamt that his son Atys would be slain by an iron instrument, and used every precaution to prevent it, but to no purpose; for one day Atys went to chase the wild boar, and Adrastus, his friend, threw a dart at the boar to rescue Atys from danger; the dart, however, struck the prince and killed him. The tale is told by William Morris, in his Earthly Paradise ("July").

Croftangry (Mr. Chrystal), a gentleman fallen to decay, cousin of Mrs. Martha Bethune Baliol, to whom, at death, he left the MS. of two novels, one The Highland Widow, and the other The Fair Maid of Perth, called the First and Second Series of the "Chronicles of Canongate" (q.v.). The history of Mr. Chrystal Croftangry is given in the introductory chapters of The Highland Widow, and continued in the introduction of The Fair Maid of Perth.

(Lockhart tells us that Mr. Croftangry is meant for sir Walter Scott's father, and that "the fretful patient at the death-bed" is a living picture.)

Crofts (Master), the person killed in a duel by sir Geoffrey Hudson, the famous dwarf.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Croker's Mare. In the proverb As coy as Croker's mare. This means "as chary as a mare that carries crockery."

She was to them as coy as a croker's mare.
Heywood: Dialogue, II. 1 (1546).

Crokers. Potatoes are so called, because they were first planted in C'oker's field, at Youghal, in Ireland.—Planché: Recollections, etc., ii. 119.

Croma, Ulster, in Ireland.—Ossian.

Cromla, a hill in the neighbourhood of the castle Tura, in Ulster.—Ossian: Fingal.

Crommal, a mountain in Ulster; the Lubar flows between Crommal and Cromleach.—Ossian.

Crom'well (Oliver), introduced by sir W. Scott in Woodstock.

Cromwell's daughter Elizabeth, who married John Claypole. Seeing her father greatly agitated by a portrait of Charles I., she gently and lovingly led him away out of the room.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Cromwell is called by the preacher Burroughs "the archangel who did battle with the devil."

Cromwell's Likeness. That by Lely is the most celebrated.

Cromwell's Lucky Day. The 3rd September was considered by Oliver Cromwell to be his red-letter day. On 3rd September, 1650, he won the battle of Dunbar; on 3rd September, 1651, he won the battle of Worcester; and on 3rd September, 1658, he died. It was not, however, true that he was born on 3rd September, as many affirm, for his birthday was 25th April, 1599.

Cromwell's Dead Body Insulted. Cromwell's dead body was, by the sanction if not by the express order of Charles II., taken from its grave, exposed on a gibbet, and finally buried under the gallows.

¶ Similarly, the tomb of Am'asis king of Egypt was broken open by Camby'ses; the body was then scourged and insulted in various ways, and finally burnt, which was abhorrent to the Egyptians, who used every possible method to preserve dead bodies in their integrity.

¶ The dead body of admiral Coligny [Co.leen.ye] was similarly insulted by Charles IX., Catherine de Medicis, and all the court of France, who spattered blood and dirt on the half-burnt blackened mass. The king had the bad taste to say over it—

> Fragrance sweeter than a rose
> Rises from our slaughtered foes.

It will be remembered that Coligny was the guest of Charles, his only crime being that he was a huguenot.

Crona ["murmuring"], a small stream running into the Carron.—Ossian.

Cro'nian Sea (The), the Arctic Ocean. Pliny (in his Nat. Hist. iv. 16) says, "A Thulê unius diei navigatione mare concretum a nonnullis cronium appellatur."

> As when two polar winds blowing adverse
> Upon the Cronian sea.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 290 (1665).

Crook-fingered Jack, one of Macheath's gang of thieves. In eighteen months' service he brought to the general stock four fine gold watches and seven silver ones, sixteen snuff-boxes (five of which were gold), six dozen handkerchiefs, four silver-hilted swords, six shirts, three periwigs, and a "piece" of broadcloth. Pea'chum calls him "a mighty clean-handed fellow," and adds—

> "Considering these are only the fruits of his leisure hours, I don't know a prettier fellow, for no man alive hath a more engaging presence of mind upon the road."
> —Gay: The Beggar's Opera, i. 1 (1727).

Crop (George), an honest, hearty farmer, who has married a second wife, named Dorothy, between whom there are endless quarrels. Two especially are noteworthy. Crop tells his wife he hopes that better times are coming, and when the law-suit is over "we will have roast pork for dinner every Sunday." The wife replies, "It shall be lamb." "But I say it shall be pork." "I hate pork, I'll have lamb." "Pork, I tell you." "I say lamb." "It shan't be lamb, I will have pork." The other quarrel arises from Crop's having left the door open, which he civilly asks his wife to shut. She refuses, he commands; she turns obstinate, he turns angry; at length they agree that the person who first speaks shall shut the door. Dorothy speaks first, and Crop gains the victory.—P. Hoare: No Song no Supper (1790).

Cropland (Sir Charles), an extravagant, heartless libertine and man of fashion, who hates the country except for hunting, and looks on his estates and tenants only as the means of supplying money for his personal indulgence. Knowing that Emily Worthington was the daughter of a "poor gentleman," he offers her "a house in town, the run of his estate in the country, a chariot, two footmen, and £600 a year;" but the lieutenant's daughter rejects with scorn such "splendid infamy." At the end sir Charles is made to see his own baseness, and offers the most ample apologies to all whom he has offended.—G. Colman: The Poor Gentleman (1802).

Croquemitaine [Croak.mit.tain], the bogie raised by fear. Somewhere near Saragossa was a terrible castle called Fear Fortress, which appeared quite impregnable; but as the bold approached it, the difficulties of access gradually gave way, and even the fortress itself vanished into thin air.

Croquemitaine is a romance in three parts: the first part is a tournament between the knights of Marsillus, a Moorish king, and the paladins of Charlemagne; the second part is the siege of Saragossa by Charlemagne; and the third part is the allegory of Fear Fortress. Mitaine is the godchild of Charlemagne, who goes in search of Fear Fortress.

Croquis (Alfred), Daniel Maclise, R.A. This pseudonym was attached to a series of character-portraits in Frazer's Magazine between the years 1830 and 1838. Maclise was born 1811, and died 1870.

Crosbie (William), provost of Dumfries, a friend of Mr. Fairford the lawyer.

Mrs. Crosbie, wife of the provost, and a cousin of Redgauntlet.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Crosbite (2 syl.), a barrister.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Cross. (1) A favourite legend used to be that the Cross was made of three different trees, and that these trees sprang from three seeds taken from the "Tree of Life" and planted in Adam's mouth at death. They were given to Adam's son Seth by the angel who guarded paradise, and the angel told Seth that when these seeds became trees, Adam would be free from the power of death.

(This is rather an allegory than a legend. For other Christian traditions, see Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 250.)

(2) Another tradition is that the Cross was made of four different woods, because Jesus was crucified for all the four quarters of the world.

Ligna crucis palma, cedrus, cupressus, oliva.

(This also is more allegorical than historic.)

(3) It is said by some that it was made of aspen wood, which has never since ceased trembling.

Ah! tremble, tremble, aspen tree,
We need not ask thee why thou shakest,
For if, as holy legend saith,
On thee the Saviour bled to death,
No wonder, aspen, that thou quakest!
And, till in judgment all assemble,
Thy leaves accursed shall shake and tremble.
E. C. B.

(4) Another tradition is that the Cross was made of mistletoe wood, which before then grew an independent tree, and was then accursed into a parasite. On the top of its berry are five specks to perpetuate the memorial of the five wounds of Jesus.

(See ELDER TREE for other legends.)

Cross-legged Host (Dining with our), going without dinner. Lawyers at one time gave interviews to their clients in the Round Church, famous for its effigies of knights lying cross-legged.

Or walk the Round [Church] with knights o' the posts,
About the cross-legged knights, their hosts.
S. Butler: Hudibras, iii. 3 (1678).

Cross Purposes, a farce by O'Brien. (See BEVIL, p. 118.)

Cross Questions and Crooked Answers. An Irish recruit about to be inspected by Frederick the Great, was told he would be asked these questions: (1) How old are you? (2) How long have you been in the service? (3) Are you content with your pay and rations? So he prepared his answers accordingly. But it so happened that the king began with the second question: "How long have you been in the service?" Paddy glibly replied, "Twenty years." "Why," said the king, "how old are you?" "Six months." "Six months!" rejoined the king; "surely either you or I must be mad!" "Yes, both, your majesty."

¶ Some Highlanders, coming to England for employ, conceived they would be asked (1) Who are you? (2) Why do you come here? and that the questioner might then say, "No, I don't want your service." Scarcely had they crossed the border than they came to the body of a man who had been murdered. They stopped to look at it, when a constable came up and said, "Who did this?" "We three Highlanders," was the prepared answer. "Why did you do it?" said the constable. "For the money and the silver," was the answer they had prepared. "You scoundrels!" said the constable, "I shall hang you for this." "If you don't, another will," said the men, and were preparing to go away, when they were marched off to jail.

¶ Another story of the same kind is told of three Sclavonians who went to Hungary, and "were taught the language in three days." Their répertoire was, however, limited to "We, three," "Cheese," and "That's the truth." Coming to a dead body lying on the road, the forest-keeper asked them, "Who has murdered the man?" "We three," was the ready answer. "What for?" was the next question, and "Cheese" was the reply. "Then," said the keeper, "you will all be hanged;" "That's the truth," responded the strangers, and were about to be handcuffed when the supposed dead man jumped up with a "Ho, ho, ho!" overjoyed at his practical joke.

Cross'myloof, a lawyer.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Crothar, "lord of Atha," in Connaught (then called Alnec'ma). He was the first and most powerful chief of the Fir-bolg ("bowmen") or Belgæ from Britain who colonized the southern parts of Ireland. Crothar carried off Conla'ma, daughter of Cathmin a chief of the Cael or Caledonians who had colonized the northern parts of Ireland and held their court in Ulster. As Conlama was betrothed to Turloch a Cael, he made an irruption into Connaught, slew Cormul, but was himself slain by Crothar, Cormul's brother. The feud now became general, "Blood poured on blood, and Erin's clouds were hung with ghosts." The Cael being reduced to the last extremity, Trathel (the grandfather of Fingal) sent Conar (son of Trenmor) to their relief. Conar, on his arrival in Ulster, was chosen king, and the Fir-bolg being subdued, he called himself "the king of Ireland."—Ossian: Temora, ii.

Crothar, vassal king of Croma (in Ireland), held under Artho over-lord of all Ireland. Crothar, being blind with age, was attacked by Rothmar chief of Tromlo, who resolved to annex Croma to his own dominion. Crothar sent to Fingal for aid, and Fingal sent his son Ossian with an army; but before he could arrive Fovar-Gormo, a son of Crothar, attacked the invader, but was defeated and slain. When Ossian reached Ulster, he attacked the victorious Rothmar, and both routed the army and slew the chief. —Ossian: Croma.

Croto'na's Sage, Pythagoras, so called because his first and chief school of philosophy was established at Crotōna (fl. B.C. 540).

Crouch'mas, from the invention of the Cross to St. Helen's Day, i.e. from May 3 to August 18. Halliwell, in his Archaic Dictionary, says it means "Christmas," but this is wholly impossible, as Tusser, in his "May Remembrances," says, "From bull cow fast, til Crouchminas be past, i.e. St. Helen's Day." The word means "Cross-mas."

Crow. As the crow flies, that is, straight from the point of starting to the point to be reached, without being turned from the path by houses, rivers, hills, or other obstacles, which do not divert the crow from its flight. The Americans call it "The Bee-line."

Crowde'ro, one of the rabble leaders encountered by Hudibras at a bear-baiting. The academy figure of this character was Jackson or Jephson, a milliner in the New Exchange, Strand, London. He lost a leg in the service of the roundheads, and was reduced to the necessity of earning a living by playing on the crowd or crouth from ale-house to ale-house.—S. Butler: Hudibras, i. 2 (1664).

(The crouth was a long box-shaped instrument, with six or more strings, supported by a bridge. It was played with a bow. The last noted performer on this instrument was John Morgan, a Welshman, who died 1720.)

Crowe (Captain), the attendant of sir Launcelot Greaves (1 syl.), in his peregrinations to reform society. Sir Launcelot is a modern don Quixote, and captain Crowe is his Sancho Panza.

> Captain Crowe had commanded a merchant-ship in the Mediterranean trade for many years, and saved some money by dint of frugality and traffic. He was an excellent seaman, brave, active, friendly in his way, and scrupulously honest, but as little acquainted with the world as a sucking child; whimsical, impatient, and so impetuous that he could not help breaking in upon the conversation, whatever it might be, with repeated interruptions. . . . When he himself attempted to speak, he never finished his period.—Smollett: The Adventures of Sir Launcelot Greaves (1760).

Crowfield (Christopher), a pseudonym of Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe (1814-1896).

Crown. Godfrey, when made the over-lord of Jerusalem, or "Baron of the Holy Sepulchre," refused to wear a crown of gold where his Saviour had only worn a crown of thorns.

¶ Canute, after the rebuke he gave to his flatterers, refused to wear thenceforth any symbol of royalty at all.

> Canute (truth worthy to be known)
> From that time forth did for his brows disown
> The ostentatious symbol of a crown,
> Esteeming earthly royalty
> Presumptuous and vain.

Crown of the East, Antioch, also called "Antioch the Beautiful."

Crown of Ionia, Smyrna, the largest city of Asia Minor.

Crowns. Byron, in Don Juan, says the sultan is "master of thirty kingdoms" (canto vi. 90). The czar of Russia is proclaimed as sovereign of seventeen crowns.

(Of course the sultan is no longer master of thirty kingdoms, 1897.)

Crowned after Death. Inez de Castro was exhumed six years after her assassination, and crowned queen of Portugal by her husband, don Pedro. (See INEZ DE CASTRO.)

Crowquill (Alfred), Alfred Henry Forrester, author of Leaves from my Memorandum-Book (1859), one of the artists of Punch (1805-1872.)

Croye (Isabelle countess of), a ward of Charles "the Bold," duke of Burgundy. She first appears at the turret window in Plessis lés Tours, disguised as Jacqueline; and her marriage with Quentin Durward concludes the novel.

The countess Hameline of Croye, aunt to countess Isabelle. First disguised as Dame Perotte (2 syl.) at Plessis lés Tours; afterwards married to William de la Marck.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Croye (Monseigneur de la), an officer of Charles "the Bold," duke of Burgundy. —Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Croyse'do (The Great), general lord Fairfax (1611-1671).—S. Butler: Hudibras.

Crucifixion (The). When Clovis was told the story of the Crucifixion, he exclaimed, "Had I and my Franks been there, we would soon have avenged the wrong."

¶ When Crillon "the Brave" heard the tale, he grew so excited that he could not contain himself, and starting up in the church, he cried aloud, Où étais tu, Crillon? ("What were you about, Crillon, to allow of such deeds as these?")

Crudor (Sir). (See BRIANA, p. 147.)

Cruel (The), Pedro king of Castile (1334, 1350-1369).

Cruik'shanks (Ebenezer), landlord of the Golden Candlestick inn.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Cruise of the Midge (The), a naval story by Michael Scott.

Crum'mles (Mr. Vincent), the eccentric but kind-hearted manager of the Portsmouth Theatre.

It was necessary that the writer should, like Mr. Crummles, dramatist, construct his piece in the interest of "the pump and washing-tubs."—R. Fitzgerald.

Mrs. Crummles, wife of Mr. Vincent Crummles, a stout, ponderous, tragedy-queen sort of a lady. She walks or rather stalks like lady Macbeth, and always speaks theatrically. Like her husband, she is full of kindness, and always willing to help the needy.

Miss Ninetta Crummles, daughter of the manager, and called in the play-bills "the infant phenomenon."—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Cruncher (Jerry), an odd-job man in Tellson's bank. His wife was continually saying her prayers, which Jerry termed "flopping." He was a "resurrection man."—Dickens: A Tale of Two Cities (1859).

Crupp (Mrs.), a typical humbug, who let chambers in Buckingham Street for young gentlemen. David Copperfield lodged with her.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Crushed by Ornaments. Tarpeia, daughter of the governor of the Roman citadel on the Saturnian Hill, was tempted by the gold on the Sabine bracelets and collars to open a gate of the fortress to the besiegers, on condition that they would give her the ornaments which they wore on their arms. Tarpeia opened the gate, and the Sabines as they passed threw on her their shields, saying, "These are the ornaments worn by the Sabines on their arms," and the maid was crushed to death. G. Gilfillan, alluding to Longfellow, has this erroneous allusion—

His ornaments, unlike those of the Sabine [sic] maid, have not crushed him.—Introductory Essay to Longfellow.

Crusoe (Robinson), the hero and title of a novel by Daniel Defoe. Robinson Crusoe is a shipwrecked sailor, who leads a solitary life for many years on a desert island, and relieves the tedium of life by ingenious contrivances (1719).

[The story is based on the adventures of Alexander Selkirk, a Scotch sailor, who in 1704 was left by captain Stradding on the uninhabited island of Juan Fernandez. Here he remained for four years and four months, when he was rescued by captain Woods Rogers and brought to England.)

Was there ever anything written by mere man that the reader wished longer except Robinson Crusoe, Don Quixote, and The Pilgrim's Progress?—Dr. Johnson.

Cruth-Loda, the war-god of the ancient Gaels.

On thy top, U-thorno, dwells the misty Loda: the house of the spirits of men. In the end of his cloudy hall bends forward Cruth-Loda of swords. His form is dimly seen amid the wavy mists, his right hand is on his shield.—Ossian: Cath-Loda.

Crystal'line (The). According to the theory of Ptolemy, the crystalline sphere comes after and beyond the firmament or sphere of the fixed stars. It has a shimmering motion, which somewhat interferes with that of the stars.

They pass the planets seven, and pass the "fixed," And that crystalline sphere whose balance weighs The trepidation talked of.
Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. (1665).

Cuckold King (The), sir Mark of Cornwall, whose wife Ysolde [E.sold] intrigued with sir Tristram (his nephew), one of the knights of the Round Table.

Cuckoo. Pliny (Nat. Hist. x. 9) says, "Cuckoos lay always in other birds' nests."

But, since the cuckoo builds not for himself, Remain in't as thou mayst.
Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, act ii. sc. 6 (1608).

N.B.—The Bohemians say the festivals of the Virgin used to be held sacred even by dumb animals; and that on these sacred days all the birds of the air ceased building their nests except the cuckoo, which was therefore doomed to wander without having a nest of its own.

Cud'die or CUTHBERT HEADRIGG, a ploughman, in the service of lady Bellenden of the Tower of Tillietudlem. —Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Cuddy, a herdsman, in Spenser's Shepheardе's Calendar, in three eclogues of which Cuddy is introduced—

Ecl. ii. is a dialogue between Thenot and Cuddy, in which Cuddy is a lad who complains of the cold, and Thenot laments the degeneracy of pastoral life. At one time shepherds and herdsmen were hardy, frugal, and contented; but nowadays, he says, "they are effeminate, luxurious, and ambitious." He then tells Cuddy the fable of "The Oak and the Bramble." (See THENOT.)

Ecl. viii. Cuddy is a full-grown man, appointed umpire to decide a contention in song between the two shepherds, Willy and Perigot. He pronounced each to be worthy of the prize, and then sings to them the "Lament of Colin for Rosalind."

Ecl. x. is between Piers and Cuddy, the subject being "divine poetry." Cuddy declares no poet would be equal to Colin if his mind were not unhappily unhinged by disappointed love.—Spenser: The Shepheardе's Calendar (1579).

Cuddy, a shepherd, who boasts that the charms of his Buxo'ma far exceed those of Blouzelinda. Lobbin, who is Blouzelinda's swain, repels the boast, and the two shepherds agree to sing the praises of their respective shepherdesses, and to make Clod'dipole arbiter of their contention. Cloddipole listens to their alternate verses, pronounces that "both merit an oaken staff;" but, says he, "the herds are weary of the songs, and so am I."—Gay: Pastoral, i. (1714).

(These eclogues are in imitation of Virgil's Bucolic iii.)

Cui Bono? "Of what practical use is it?" (See Cicero: Pro Milone, xii. 32.)

Cato, that great and grave philosopher, did commonly demand, when any new project was propounded unto him, "Cui bono?" What good would ensue in case the same were effected?—Fuller: Worthies ("The Design, etc.," i.).

Culdees [i.e. sequestered persons], the primitive clergy of presbyterian character, established in Io'na or Icolmkill [I-columb-kill] by St. Columb and twelve of his followers in 563. They also founded similar church establishments at Abernethy, Dunkeld, Kirkcaldy [Kirk-Culdee], etc., and at Lindesfarne, in England. Some say as many as 300 churches were founded by them, Augustine, a bishop of Waterford, began against them, in 1176, a war of extermination; when those who could escape sought refuge in Iona, the original cradle of the sect, and were not driven thence till 1203.

Peace to their shades! the pure Culdees
Were Albyn's [Scotland's] earliest priests of God,
Ere yet an island of her seas
By foot of Saxon monk was trod.
Campbell: Reullura.

Culloch (Sawney), a pedlar.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Cumberland (John of). "The devil and John of Cumberland" is a blunder for "The devil and John-a-Cumber." John-a-Cumber was a famous Scotch magician.

He post to Scotland for brave John-a-Cumber,
The only man extended for magick skill:
Oft have I heard he once beguiled the devil.
Munday: John-a-Kent and John-a-Cumber 1594.

Cumberland (William Augustus duke of), commander-in-chief of the army of George II., whose son he was. The duke was especially celebrated for his victory of Cullod'en (1746); but he was called "The Butcher" from the great severity with which he stamped out the clan system of the Scottish Highlanders. He was wounded in the leg at the battle of Dettingen (1743). Sir W. Scott has introduced him in Waverley (time, George II.).

Proud Cumberland prances, insulting the slain,
And their hoof-beaten bosoms are trod to the plain.
Campbell: Locheil's Warning.

Cumberland Poet (The), William Wordsworth, born at Cockermouth (1770–1850).

Cum'bria. It included Cumberland, Dumbarton, Renfrew, Ayr, Lanark, Peebles, Selkirk, Roxburgh, and Dumfries.

Cumnor Hall, a ballad by Mickle, the lament of Amy Robsart, who had been won and thrown away by the earl of Leicester. She says if roses and lilies grow in courts, why did he pluck the primrose of the field, which some country swain might have won and valued? Thus sore and sad the lady grieved in Cumnor Hall, and ere dawn the death-bell rang, and never more was that countess seen.

(Sir W. Scott took this for the groundwork of his Kenilworth, which he called Cumnor Hall, but Constable, his publisher, requested him to change the name.)

Cunègonde [Ku'.na.gond], the mistress of Candide (2 syl.), in Voltaire's novel called Candide. Sterne spells it "Cunëgund."

Cun'ningham (Archie), one of the archers of the Scotch Guards at Plessis lés Tours, in the pay of Louis XI.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Cu'no, the ranger, father of Agatha. —Weber: Der Freischütz (1822).

Cunob'eline, a king of the Sil'urês, son of Tasciov'anus and father of Caractacus. Coins still exist bearing the name of "Cunobeline," and the word "Camalodunum" [Colchester], the capital of his kingdom. The Roman general between A.D. 43 and 47 was Aulus Plautius, but in 47 Ostorius Scaptila took Caractacus prisoner.

Some think Cunobeline is Shakespeare's "Cymbeline," who reigned from B.C. 8 to A.D. 27; but Cymbeline's father was Tenantius or Tenuantius, his sons Guide'rius and Arvir'agus, and the Roman general was Caius Lucius.

. . . the courageous sons of our Cunobelin
Sank under Plautius' sword.
Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1612).

Cunstance or Constance. (See CUSTANCE, p. 252.)

Cupar Justice, hang first, and try afterwards. (Same as "Jedbury Justice.")

Cupid and Campaspe (3 syl.). A song of Lyly in his play of Alexander and Campaspe (1586).

When Cupid and Campaspe played
At cards for kisses, Cupid paid.
Lily.

Cupid and Psyche [Sī'ky], an episode in The Golden Ass of Apuleius (books iv., v., vi.). The allegory represents Cupid in love with Psychê. He visited her every evening, and left at sunrise, but strictly enjoined her not to attempt to discover who he was. One night curiosity overcame her prudence, and going to look upon her lover a drop of hot oil fell on his shoulder, awoke him, and he fled. Psychê now wandered in search of the lost one, but was persecuted by Venus with relentless cruelty. Having suffered almost to the death, Cupid at length married her, and she became immortal.

 Woman's ideal of love must not be subjected to too strong a light, or it will flee away, and the woman will suffer long years of torment. At length truth will correct her exaggerated notions, and love will reside with her for the rest of her life.

(This exquisite allegory has been translated into English verse by Lockman, in 1744; by Taylor, in 1795; by H. Gurney, in 1799. Mrs. Tighe has a poem on the subject; Wm. Morris has poetized the same in his Earthly Paradise ("May"); Lafontaine has a poem called Psyché, in imitation of the episode of Apuleius; and Molière has dramatized the subject.)

Cupid's Jack-o'-Lantern, the object of an affair of gallantry. Bob Acres says—

"Sir, I have followed Cupid's Jack-o'-lantern, and find myself in a quagmire at last."—Sheridan: The Rivals, iii. 4 (1775).

Cu'pidon (Jeune). Count d'Orsay was so called by lord Byron (1798–1852).

The count's father was styled Le Beau d'Orsay.

Cur'an, a courtier in Shakespeare's tragedy of King Lear (1605).

Curé de Meudon, Rabelais, who was first a monk, then a leech, then prebendary of St. Maur, and last curé of Meudon (1483–1553).

Cure for the Heart-ache, a comedy by Thomas Morton (1811). Noted for the line, "Approbation from sir Hubert Stanley is praise indeed."—Act v. 2.

Cu'rio, a gentleman attending on the duke of Illyria.—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night (1614).

Curio. So Akenside calls Mr. Pulteney, and styles him "the betrayer of his country," alluding to the great statesman's change of politics. Curio was a young Roman senator, at one time the avowed enemy of Cæsar; but subsequently of Cæsar's party, and one of the victims of the civil war.

> Is this the man in freedom's cause approved,
> The man so great, so honoured, so beloved . . .
> This Curio, hated now and scorned by all,
> Who fell himself to work his country's fall?
> Akenside: Epistle to Curio.

Curious Impertinent (The), a tale introduced by Cervantês in his Don Quixote. The "impertinent" is an Italian gentleman who is silly enough to make trial of his wife's fidelity by persuading a friend to storm it if he could. Of course his friend "takes the fort," and the fool is left to bewail his own folly.—Pt. I. iv. 5 (1605).

Currer Bell, the pen-name of Charlotte Brontê, author of Jane Eyre [Air] (1816–1855).

Curtain Lectures. (See CAUDLE, p. 189.)

Curtain Painted. Parrhasius painted a curtain so wonderfully well that even Zeuxis, the rival artist, thought it was real, and bade him draw his drapery aside and show his picture. The painting of Zeuxis was a bunch of grapes so true to nature that the birds came to peck at the fruit. The "curtain," however, gained the prize; for though the grapes deceived the birds, the curtain deceived Zeuxis.

> A curious mistake occurred in my own house. I had new scarlet curtains hung in the drawing-room, and a lady calling said to me, "Why, doctor, do you have painted curtains, and not real ones?"

Curta'na, the sword of Edward the Confessor, which had no point, and was therefore the emblem of mercy. Till the reign of Henry III. the royal sword of England was so called.

> But when Curtana will not do the deed,
> You lay the pointless clergy-weapon by,
> And to the laws, your sword of justice, fly.
> Dryden: The Hind and the Panther, ii. (1687).

Curta'na or Courtain, the sword of Ogier the Dane.

> He [Ogier] drew Courtain his sword out of its sheath.
> W. Morris: Earthly Paradise, 634.

Curt-Hose (a syl.), Robert II. duc de Normandie (1087–1134).

Curt-Mantle, Henry II. of England (1133, 1154–1189). So called because he wore the Anjou mantle, which was shorter than the robe worn by his predecessors.

Curtis, one of Petruchio's servants. —Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew (1594).

Curtise, the hound in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox, by Heinrich von Alkmaar (1498).

Cur'zon Street (London). So named after the ground-landlord, George Augustus Curzon, third viscount Howe.

Cushla Machree (Irish), "My heart's delight."

Custance, daughter of the emperor of Rome, affianced to the sultan of Syria, who abjured his faith and consented to be baptized in order to marry her. His mother hated this apostasy, and at the wedding breakfast slew all the apostates except the bride. Her she embarked in a ship, which was set adrift, and in due time reached the British shores. Here Custance was rescued by the lord-constable of Northumberland, who took her home, and placed her under the care of his wife Hermegild. Custance converted both the constable and his wife. A young knight wished to marry her, but she declined his suit; whereupon he murdered Hermegild, and then laid the bloody knife beside Custance, to make her suspected of the crime. King Alla examined the case, and soon discovered the real facts; whereupon the knight was executed, and the king married Custance. The queen-mother highly disapproved of the match; and, during the absence of her son in Scotland, embarked Custance and her infant boy in a ship, which was turned adrift. After floating about for five years, it was taken in tow by a Roman fleet on its return from Syria, and Custance with her son Maurice became the guests of a Roman senator. It so happeued that Alla at this same time was at Rome on a pilgrimage, and encountered his wife, who returned with him to Northumberland, and lived in peace and happiness the rest of her life.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Man of Law's Tale," 1388).

Custance, a gay rich widow, whom Ralph Roister Doister wishes to marry but he is wholly baffled in his scheme.—N. Udall: Ralph Roister Doister (first English comedy, 1534).

Cute (Alderman), a "practical philosopher," resolved to put down everything. In his opinion "everything must be put down." Starvation must be put down, and so must suicide, sick mothers, babies, and poverty. — Dickens: The Chimes (1844).

∴ Said to be meant for sir Peter Laurie.

Cuthal, same as Uthal, one of the Orkneys.

Cuthbert (St.), a Scotch monk of the sixth century.

St. Cuthbert's Beads, joints of the articulated stems of encrinites, used for rosaries. So called from the legend that St. Cuthbert sits at night on the rock in Holy Island, forging these "beads." The opposite rock serves him for anvil.

> On a rock of Lindisfarn
> St. Cuthbert sits, and toils to frame
> The sea-born beads that bear his name.
> Sir W. Scott: Marmion (1808).

St. Cuthbert's Stane, a granite rock in Cumberland.

St. Cuthbert's Well, a spring of water close by St. Cuthbert's Stane.

Cuthbert Bede, the Rev. Edw. Bradley, author of Verdant Green (1857). (Born 1827, died 1889.)

Cutho'na, daughter of Rumar, was betrothed to Conlath, youngest son of Morni, of Mora. Not long before the espousals were to be celebrated, Toscar came from Ireland, and was hospitably entertained by Morni. On the fourth day, he saw Cuthona out hunting, and carried her off by force. Being pursued by Conlath, a fight ensued, in which both the young men fell; and Cuthona, after languishing for three days, died also.—Ossian: Conlath and Cuthona.

Cuthullin, son of Semo, commander of the Irish army, and regent during the minority of Cormac. His wife was Brag'ela, daughter of Sorglan. In the poem called Fingal, Cuthullin was defeated by Swaran king of Lochlin [Scandinavia], and being ashamed to meet Fingal, retired from the field gloomy and sad. Fingal, having utterly defeated Swaran, invited Cuthullin to the banquet, and partially restored his depressed spirits. In the third year of Cormac's reign, Torlath, son of Can'tela, rebelled. Cuthullin gained a complete victory over him at the lake Lego, but was mortally wounded in the pursuit by a random arrow. Cuthullin was succeeded by Nathos; but the young king was soon dethroned by the rebel Cairbar, and murdered.—Ossian: Fingal and The Death of Cuthullin.

Cutler (Sir John), a royalist, who died 1699, reduced to the utmost poverty.

> Cutler saw tenants break, and houses fall,
> For very want he could not build a wall.
> His only daughter in a stranger's power,
> For very want he could not pay a dower.
> A few grey hairs his reverend temples crowned,
> 'Twas very want that sold them for two pound. . . .
> Cutler and Brutus, dying, both exclaim,
> "Virtue and Wealth, what are ye but a name!"
> Pope: Moral Essays, iii. (1709).

Cutpurse (Moll), Mary Frith, the heroine of Middleton's comedy called The Roaring Girl (1611), She was a woman of masculine vigour, who not unfrequently assumed man's attire. This notorious cut-purse once attacked general Fairfax on Hounslow Heath, but was arrested and sent to Newgate. She escaped, however, by bribing the turnkey, and died of dropsy at the age of 75. Nathaniel Field introduces her in his drama called Amends for Ladies (1618).

Cuttle (Captain Edward), a great friend of Solomon Gills, ship's instrument maker. Captain Cuttle had been a skipper, had a hook instead of a right hand, and always wore a very hard glazed hat. He was in the habit of quoting, and desiring those to whom he spoke "to overhaul the catechism till they found it;" but, he added, "when found, make a note of." The kind-hearted seaman was very fond of Florence Dombey, and of Walter Gay, whom he called "Wal'r." When Florence left her father's roof, captain Cuttle sheltered her at the Wooden Midshipman. One of his favourite sentiments was "May we never want a friend, or a bottle to give him!"—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Cyan'ean Rocks, the Symple'gădês (which see), so called from their deep greenish-blue colour.

Here are those hard rocks of trap of a greenish-blue coloured with copper, and hence called the Cyanean. —Olivier.

Cyc'lades (3 syl.), some twenty islands, so called from the classic legend that they circled round Dêlos when that island was rendered stationary by the birth of Diana and Apollo.

Cyc'lic Poets, a series of epic poets, who wrote continuations or additions to Homer's Iliad and Odyssey; they were called "Cylic" because they confined themselves to the cycle of the Trojan war.

AG'IAS wrote an epic on "the return of the Greeks from Troy" (B.C. 740).

ARCTI'NOS wrote a continuation of the Iliad, describing the taking of Troy by the "Wooden Horse," and its conflagration. Virgil has copied from this poet (B.C. 776).

EU'GAMON wrote a continuation of the Odyssey. It contains the adventures of Teleg'onos in search of his father Ulysses. When he reached Ith'aca, Ulysses and Telemachos went against him, and Telegonos killed Ulysses with a spear which his mother Circê had given him (B.C. 568).

LES'CHÊS, author of Little Iliad, in four books, containing the fate of Ajax, the exploits of Philoctêtês, Neoptol'emos, and Ulysses, and the final capture of Troy (B.C. 708).

STASI'NOS, "son-in-law" of Homer. He wrote an introduction to the Iliad.

Cyclops. Their names are Brontês, Steröpês, and Argês. (See SINBAD, voy. 3.)

Cyclops (The Holy). So Dryden, in the Masque of Albion and Albanius, calls Richard Rumbold, an Englishman, the chief conspirator in the "Ryehouse Plot." He had lost one eye, and was executed.

Cydip'pe (3 syl.), a lady courted by Acontius of Cea. Being unable to obtain her, Acontius wrote on an apple, "I swear by Diana that Acontius shall be my husband." This apple was presented to the maiden, and being persuaded that she had written the words, though inadvertently, she consented to marry Acontius for "the oath's sake."

Cydippe by a letter was betrayed,
Writ on an apple to th' unwary maid.
Ovid: Art of Love, i.

Cyl'laros, the horse of Pollux according to Virgil (Georgic iii. 90); but of Castor according to Ovid (Metamorphoses xii. 408). It was coal-black, with white legs and tail.

Cylle'nius, Mercury; so called from mount Cyllênê, in Arcadia, where he was born.

Cym'beline (3 syl.), mythical king of Britain for thirty-five years. He began to reign in the nineteenth year of Augustus Cæsar. His father was Tenantius, who refused to pay the tribute to the Romans exacted of Cassibelan after his defeat by Julius Cæsar. Cymbeline married twice. By his first wife he had a daughter named Imogen, who married Posthumus Leonātus. His second wife had a son named Cloten by a former husband.—Shakespeare: Cymbeline (1609).

Cymochles [Si-mŏk'-lees], brother of Pyroch'lês, son of Acrātês, and husband of Acras'ia the enchantress. He sets out against sir Guyon, but being ferried over Idle Lake, abandons himself to self-indulgence, and is slain by king Arthur (canto 8).—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 5, etc. (1590).

Cymod'oce (4 syl.). The mother of Mar'inel is so called in bk. iv. 12 of the Faërie Queene, but in bk. iii. 4 she is spoken of as Cymo'ent "daughter of Nereus" (2 syl.) by an earth-born father, "the famous Dumarin."

The Garden of Cymodoce, Sark. Swinburne, in 1881, published a poem bearing this title.

Cymoent. (See CYMODOCE.)

Cym'ry, the Welsh.

The Welsh always called themselves "Cymry," the literal meaning of which is "aborigines." . . . It is the same word as "Cimbri." . . . They call their language "Cymraeg," i.e. "the primitive tongue."—E. Williams.

Cynægi'ros, brother of the poet Æschylos. When the Persians, after the battle of Marathon, were pushing off from shore, Cynægiros seized one of their ships with his right hand; which being lopped off, he grasped it with his left hand; this being cut off, he seized it with his teeth, and lost his life.

¶ ADMIRAL BENBOW, in an engagement with the French, near St. Martha, in 1701, had his legs and thighs shivered into splinters by chain-shot; but (supported on a wooden frame) he remained on deck till Du Casse sheered off.

¶ ALMEYDA, the Portuguese governor of India, had his legs and thighs shattered in a similar way, and caused himself to be bound to the ship's mast, that he might wave his sword to cheer on the combatants.

¶ JAAFER, at the battle of Muta, carried the sacred banner of the prophet. One hand being lopped off, he held it with the other; this also being cut off, he held it with his two stumps, and when at last his head was cut off, he contrived to fall dead on the banner, which was thus detained till Abdallah had time to rescue it and hand it to Khaled.

Cyne'tha (3 syl.), eldest son of Cadwallon (king of North Wales). He was an orphan, brought up by his uncle Owen. During his minority, Owen and Cynĕtha loved each other dearly; but when the orphan came of age and claimed his inheritance, his uncle burnt his eyes out by exposing them to plates of hot brass. Cynetha and his son Cadwallon accompanied Madoc to North America, where the blind old man died, while Madoc was in Wales preparing for his second voyage. —Southey: Madoc, i. 3 (1805).

Cadwallonis erat primævus jure Cynĕtha:
Proh pudor! hunc oculis patruus privavit Oenus.
The Pantarchia.

Cynic Tub (The), Diog'enês, who lived in a tub, and was a cynic philosopher.

[They] fetch their doctrines from the Cynic tub.
Milton: Comus, 708 (1634).

Cynisca, wife of Pygmalion, very beautiful, and his model in statuary.—Gilbert: Pygmalion and Galatea (1871).

Cy'nosure (3 syl.), the pole-star. The word means "the dog's tail," and is used to signify a guiding genius, or the observed of all observers. Cynosu'ra was an Idæan nymph, one of the nurses of Zeus (1 syl.).

Some gentle taper,
Tho' a rush candle, from the wicker hole
Of some clay habitation, visit us
With thy long levelled rule of streaming light,
And thou shalt be our star of Arcady,
Or Tyrian cynosure.
Milton: Comus (1634).

Where perhaps some beauty lies,
The cynosure of neighbouring eyes.
Milton: L'Allegro.

Cyn'thia, the moon or Diana, who was born on mount Cynthus, in Dêlos. Apollo is called "Cynthius."

. . . watching, in the night,
Beneath pale Cynthia's melancholy light.
Falconer: The Shipwreck, iii. 2 (1756).

Cyn'thia. So Spenser, in Colin Clout's Come Home Again, calls queen Elizabeth, "whose angel's eye" was his life's sole bliss, his heart's eternal treasure. Ph. Fletcher, in The Purple Island, iii., also calls queen Elizabeth "Cynthia."

Her words were like a stream of honey fleeting . . .
Her deeds were like great clusters of ripe grapes . . .
Her looks were like beams of the morning sun
Forth looking thro' the windows of the east . . .
Her thoughts were like the fumes of frankincense
Which from a golden censer forth doth rise.
Spenser: Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1591).

Cynthia, daughter of sir Paul Pliant, the daughter-in-law of lady Pliant. She is in love with Melle'font (2 syl.). Sir Paul calls her "Thy."—Congreve: The Double Dealer (1694).

Cyp'rian (A), a woman of loose morals; so called from the island Cyprus, a chief seat of the worship of Venus or Cyp'ria.

Cyp'rian (Brother), a Dominican monk at the monastery of Holyrood.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Cyrena'ic Shell (The), the lyre or strain of Callim'achos, a Greek poet of Alexandria, in Egypt. Six of his hymns in hexameter verse are still extant.

For you the Cyrenaic shell
Behold I touch revering.
Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads.

Cyr'ic (St.), the saint to whom sailors address themselves. The St. Elmo of the Welsh.

The weary mariners
Called on St. Cyric's aid.
Southey: Madoc, i. 4 (1805).

Cyrus and Tom'yris. Cyrus, after subduing the eastern parts of Asia, was defeated by Tomyris queen of the Massage'tæ, in Scythia. Tomyris cut off his head, and threw it into a vessel filled with human blood, saying, as she did so, "There, drink thy fill." Dante refers to this incident in his Purgatory, xii.

Consyder Cyrus . . .
He whose huge power no man might overthrowe.
Tomy'ris queen with great despite hath slowe,
His head dismembered from his mangled corps,
Herself she cast into a vessel fraught
With clotted blood of them that felt her force,
And with these words a just reward she taught—
"Drynke now thy fyll of thy desired draught."
Sackville: A Mirrour for Magistraytes ("The Complaynt," 1587).

Cythere'a, Venus; so called from Cythē'ra (now Cerigo), a mountainous island of Laco'nia, noted for the worship of Aphrodite (or Venus). The tale is that Venus and Mars, having formed an illicit affection for each other, were caught in a delicate net made by Vulcan, and exposed to the ridicule of the court of Olympus.

Ha the fate [way sing]
Of naked Mars with Cytherea chained.
Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads.

Cythna. (See REVOLT OF ISLAM.)

Cyze'nis, the infamous daughter of Diomed, who killed every one that fell into her clutches; and compelled fathers to eat their own children.

Czar (Cæsar), a title first assumed in Russia by Ivan III., who, in 1472, married a princess of the imperial Byzantine line. He also introduced the double-headed black eagle of Byzantium as the national symbol. The official style of the Russian autocrat is Samoderjets.

D.

Dactyle (Will). "That smallest of pedants."—Steele: The Tatler.

D'Acunha (Teresa), waiting-woman to the countess of Glenallan.—Sir W. Scott: Antiquary (time, George III.).

Daffodil. When Perseph'onê, the daughter of Deme'ter (3 syl.), was a little maiden, she wandered about the meadows of Enna, in Sicily, to gather white daffodils to wreathe into her hair; and being tired, she fell asleep. Pluto, the god of the infernal regions, carried her off to become his wife, and his touch turned the white flowers to a golden yellow. Some remained in her tresses till she reached the meadows of Achĕron; and falling off there grew into the asphodel, with which the meadows thenceforth abounded.

> She stepped upon Sicilian grass,
> Demeter's daughter, fresh and fair,
> A child of light, a radiant lass,
> And gamesome as the morning air.
> The daffodils were fair to see,
> They nodded lightly on the lea;
> Persephonê! Persephonê!
> Jean Ingelow: Persephona.

Dagon, sixth in order of the hierarchy of hell: (1) Satan, (2) Beëlzebub, (3) Moloch, (4) Chemos, (5) Thammuz, (6) Dagon. Dagon was half man and half fish. He was worshipped in Ashdod, Gath, Ascalon, Ekron, and Gaza (the five chief cities of the Philistines). When the "ark" was placed in his temple, Dagon fell, and the palms of his hands were broken off. (See DERCETO.)

> Next came . . .
> Dagon . . . sea-monster, upward man
> And downward fish.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 457, etc. (1665).

Dag'onet (Sir), king Arthur's fool. One day sir Dagonet, with two squires, came to Cornwall, and as they drew near a well sir Tristram soused them all three in; and dripping wet made them mount their horses and ride off, amid the jeers of the spectators (pt. ii. 60). Introduced by Tennyson in his Idylls ("The Last Tournament").

> King Arthur loved sir Dagonet passing well, and made him knight with his own hands; and at every tournament he made king Arthur laugh.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 97 (1470).

(Justice Shallow brags that he once personated sir Dagonet, while he was a student at Clement's Inn.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 2, 1598.)

 Tennyson deviates in this, as he does in so many other instances, from the old romance. The History says that king Arthur made Dagonet knight "with his own hands," because he "loved him passing well;" but Tennyson says that sir Gawain made him "a mock-knight of the Round Table."—The Last Tournament, 1.

Dagonet is also a pen-name of Mr. G. R. Sims.

Daily News (The), a London newspaper; first appeared on January 21, 1846.

Daily Telegraph (The), a London newspaper; first appeared on June 29, 1855.

Dairy (Solomon), one of the "quadrilateral" in Dickens's novel of Barnaby Rudge. The other three are Tom Cobb, Phil Parkes, and Matt, senior.

Dal'dah, Mahomet's favourite white mule.

Dale (Parson), a clergyman in My Novel, by Lord Lytton. Not unlike Goldsmith's parson in the Deserted Village, or George Herbert.

Dalga, a Lombard harlot, who tries to seduce young Goltho, but Goltho is saved by his friend Ulfinore.—Davenant: Gondibert (died 1668).

Dalgarno (Lord Malcolm of), a profligate young nobleman, son of the earl of Huntinglen (an old Scotch noble family). Nigel strikes Dalgarno with his sword, and is obliged to seek refuge in "Alsatia." Lord Dalgarno's villainy to the lady Hermionê excites the displeasure of king James, and he would have been banished if he had not married her. After this, lord Dalgarno carries off the wife of John Christie, the ship-owner, and is shot by captain Colepepper, the Alsatian bully.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Dalgetty (Dugald), of Drumthwacket, the union of the soldado with the pedantic student of Mareschal College. As a soldier of fortune, he is retained in the service of the earl of Monteith. The marquis of Argyll (leader of the parliamentary army) tried to tamper with him in prison, but Dugald seized him, threw him down, and then made his escape; locking the marquis in the dungeon. After the battle, captain Dalgetty was knighted. This "Rittmaster" is a pedant, very conceited, full of vulgar assurance, with a good stock of worldly knowledge, a student of divinity, and a soldier who lets his sword out to the highest bidder. The character is original and well drawn.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

It was an old fortalice, but is now reduced to the dimensions of a "sconce" that would have delighted the strategic soul of Dugald Dalgetty, of Drumthwacket.—Yates: Celebrities, etc., 45.

 The original of this character was Munro, who wrote an account of the campaigns of that band of Scotch and English auxiliaries in the island of Swinemünde, in 1630. Munro was himself one of the band. Dugald Dalgetty is one of the best of Scott's characters.

Dalton (Mrs.), housekeeper to the Rev. Mr. Staunton, of Willingham Rectory.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Dalton (Reginald), the hero of a novel so called, by J. G. Lockhart (1832). The heroine is Helen Hesketh.

Dalzell (General Thomas), in the royal army of Charles II.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (1816).

Damascus of the North. Bosna-Serai, capital of Bosnia, is so called from its garden-like aspect, trees being everywhere mingled with the houses.

Dame du Lac, Vivienne le Fay. The lake was "en la marche de la petite Bretaigne;" "en ce lieu . . . avoit la dame moult de belles maisons et moult riches."

Dame du Lac, Sebille (2 syl.). Her castle was surrounded by a river on which rested so thick a fog that no eye could see across it. Alexander the Great abode a fortnight with this fay, to be cured of his wounds, and king Arthur was the result of their amour. (This is not in accordance with the general legends of this noted hero. See ARTHUR, p. 64.)—Percefforest, i. 42.

Dam'ian, a squire attending on the Grand-Master of the Knights Templars.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Damiens (Robert François) in 1757 attempted to assassinate Louis XV., and was torn to pieces by wild horses. He was first fastened to a scaffold with iron gyves, while his flesh was torn off by pincers (for one hour and a half). He was also tortured by molten lead. Two of the closing lines of Goldsmith's Traveller are—

The uplifted axe, the agonizing wheel,
Luke's iron crown, and Damiens' bed of steel.
(1765.)

(Damiens was born in 1715, in a village in Artois. His sobriquet was Robert le Diable. See IRON CROWN.)

Being conducted to the conciergerie, an iron bed (which likewise served for a chair) was prepared for him, and to this he was fastened with chains. The torture was again applied, and a physician was ordered to attend to see what degree of pain he could support.—Smollett: History of England, vol. v. chap. xii. p. 39 (1811).

Damiot'ti (Dr. Baptisti), a Paduan quack, who exhibits "the enchanted mirror" to lady Forester and lady Bothwell. They see therein the clandestine marriage and infidelity of sir Philip Forester.—Sir W. Scott: Aunt Margaret's Mirror (time, William III.).

Damis [Dăh-me], son of Orgon and Elmire (2 syl.), impetuous and self-willed.—Molière: Tartuffe (1664).

Damno'nii, the people of Damno'nium, that is, Cornwall, Devon, Dorsetshire, and part of Somersetshire. This region, says Richard of Cirencester (Hist. vi. 18), was much frequented by the Phœnician, Greek, and Gallic merchants, for the metals with which it abounded, and particularly for its tin.

Wherein our Devonshire now and farthest Cornwal are,
The old Danmonii [sic] dwelt.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xii. (1613).

Dam'ocles (3 syl.), a sycophant, in the court of Dionys'ius the Elder, of Syracuse. After extolling the felicity of princes, Dionysius told him he would give him experimental proof thereof. Accordingly he had the courtier arrayed in royal robes and seated at a sumptuous banquet; but overhead was a sword suspended by a single horsehair, and Damocles was afraid to stir, lest the hair should break and the sword fall on him. Dionysius thus intimated that the lives of kings are threatened every hour of the day.—Cicero.

Let us who have not our names in the Red Book console ourselves by thinking comfortably how miserable our betters may be; and that Damocles, who ate on satin cushions, and is served on gold plate, has an awful sword hanging over his head, in the shape of a bailiff, or hereditary disease, or family secret.—Thackeray: Vanity Fair, xlvii. (1848).

Damœ'tas, a herdsman. Theocritos and Virgil use the name in their pastorals.

> And old Damœtas loved to hear our song.
> Milton: Lycidas (1638).

Da'mon, a goat-herd in Virgil's third Bucolic. Walsh introduces the same name in his Eclogues also. Any rustic, swain, or herdsman.

Damon and De'lia. Damon asks Delia why she looks so coldly on him. She replies because of his attentions to Belvidēra. He says he paid these attentions at her own request, "to hide the secret of their mutual love." Delia confesses that his prudence is commendable, but his acting is too earnest. To this he rejoins that she alone holds his heart; and Delia replies—

> Tho' well I might your truth mistrust,
> My foolish heart believes you just;
> Reason this faith may disapprove,
> But I believe, because I love.
> Lord Lyttleton.

Damon and Musido'ra, two lovers who misunderstood each other. Musidora was coy, and Damon thought her shyness indicated indifference; but one day he saw her bathing, and his delicacy on the occasion so charmed the maiden that she at once accepted his proffered love.—Thomson: The Seasons ("Summer," 1727).

Da'mon and Pyth'ias. Damon, a senator of Syracuse, was by nature hot-mettled, but was schooled by Pythagore'an philosophy into a Stoic coldness and slowness of speech. He was a fast friend of the republic; and when Dionysius was made "king" by a vote of the senate, Damon upbraided the betrayers of his country, and pronounced Dionysius a "tyrant." For this he was seized, and as he tried to stab Dionysius, he was condemned to instant death. Damon now craved respite for four hours to bid farewell to his wife and child, but the request was denied him. On his way to execution, his friend Pythias encountered him, and obtained permission of Dionysius to become his surety, and to die in his stead, if within four hours Damon did not return. Dionysius not only accepted the bail, but extended the leave to six hours. When Damon reached his country villa, Lucullus killed his horse to prevent his return; but Damon, seizing the horse of a chance traveller, reached Syracuse just as the executioner was preparing to put Pythias to death. Dionysius so admired this proof of fidelity that he forgave Damon, and requested to be taken into his friendship.

(This subject was dramatized (in rhyme) in 1571 by Richard Edwards, and again in 1825 by John Banim.)

The classic name of Pythias is "Phintias." (See Gesta Romanorum, Tale cviii.)

Damsel or Damoiseau (in Italian, donzel, in Latin, domisellus), one of the gallant youths domiciled in the maison du roi. These youths were always sons of the greater vassals. Louis VII. (le Jeune) was called "The Royal Damsel;" and at one time the royal body-guard was called "The King's Damsels."

Damsel of Brittany, Eleanor, daughter of Geoffrey (second son of Henry II. of England). After the death of Arthur, his sister Eleanor was next in succession to the crown, but John, who had caused Arthur's death, confined Eleanor in Bristol Castle, where she remained till her death, in 1241.

D'Amville (2 syl.), "the atheist," with the assistance of Borachio, murdered Montferrers, his brother, for his estates.—C. Tourneur: The Atheist's Tragedy (seventeenth century).

Dam'yan (3 syl.), the lover of May (the youthful bride of January a Lombard knight, 60 years of age).—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Merchant's Tale," 1388).

Dan of the Howlet Hirst, the dragon of the revels at Kennaquhair Abbey.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot and The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Dan'ae (3 syl.), an Argive princess, visited by Zeus [Jupiter] in the form of a shower of gold, while she was confined in an inaccessible tower.

Danaid (syl.). Dan'aus had fifty daughters, called the Danaïds or Dana'ides. These fifty women married the fifty sons of Ægyptus, and (with one exception) murdered their husbands on the night of their espousals. For this crime they were doomed in hadēs to pour water everlastingly into sieves.

> Let not your prudence, dearest, drowse, or prove
> The Danaïd of a leaky vase.
> Tennyson: The Princess, ii.

The one who spared her husband was Hypermnestra, whose husband's name was Lynceus [Lin'.suse].

Dan'aw, the German word for the Dan'ube, used by Milton in his Paradise Lost, i. 353 (1665).

Dancing Chancellor (The), sir Christopher Hatton, who attracted the attention of queen Elizabeth by his graceful dancing at a masque. She took him into favour, and made him both chancellor and knight of the Garter (died 1591).

¶ Mons. de Lauzun, the favourite of Louis XIV., owed his fortune to his grace in dancing in the king's quadrille.

Many more than one nobleman owed the favour he enjoyed at court to the way he pointed his toe or moved his leg.—Dumas: Taking the Bastille.

Dancing Water (The), from the Burning Forest. This water had the power of imparting youthful beauty to those who used it. Prince Chery, aided by a dove, obtained it for Fairstar.

The dancing water is the eighth wonder of the world. It beautifies ladies, makes them young again, and even enriches them.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Princess Fairstar," 1682).

Dandie Dinmont. (See DINMONT.)

Dandies (The Prince of), Beau Brummel (1778-1840).

Dandin (George), a rich French tradesman, who marries Ang'elique, the daughter of Mons. le baron de Sotenville; and has the "privilege" of paying off the family debts, maintaining his wife's noble parents, and being snubbed on all occasions to his heart's content. He constantly said to himself, in self-rebuke, Vous l'avez voulu, vous l'avez voulu, George Dandin! ("You have no one to blame but yourself! you brought it on yourself, George Dandin!")

Vous l'avez voulu, vous l'avez voulu, George Dandin! vous l'avez voulu! . . . vous avez justement ce que vous méritez.—Molière: George Dandin, i. 9 (1668).

"Well, tu l'as voulu, George Dandin," she said, with a smile, "you were determined on it, and must bear the consequences."—P. Fitzgerald: The Parvenu Family, ii. 262.

N.B.—There is no such phrase in the comedy as Tu l'as voulu, it is always Vous l'avez voulu.

Dan'dolo (Signor), a friend to Fasio in prosperity, but who turns from him when in disgrace. He says—

> Signor, I am paramount
> In all affairs of boot and spur and hose;
> In matters of the robe and cap supreme;
> In ruff disputes, my lord, there's no appeal
> From my irrefragibility.
> Dean Milman: Fasio, ii. 1 (1815).

Dane'lagh (2 syl.), the fifteen counties in which the Danes settled in England, viz. Essex, Middlesex, Suffolk, Norfolk, Herts, Cambs., Hants, Lincoln, Notts., Derbys, Northampton, Leicestershire Bucks., Beds., and the vast territory called Northumbria.—Bromton Chronicle (printed 1652).

Dangeau (Jouer à la), to play as good a hand at cards as Philippe de Courcillon, marquis de Dangeau (1638-1720).

Dan'gerfield (Captain), a hired witness in the "Popish Plot."—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Dangle, a gentleman bitten with the theatrical mania, who annoys a manager with impertinent flattery and advice. It is said that Thomas Vaughan, a playwright of small reputation, was the original of this character.—Sheridan: The Critic (see act i. 1), (1779).

The latter portion of the sentence is intelligible . . . but the rest reminds us of Mr Dangle's remark, that the interpreter appears the harder to be understood of the two.—Encyclopædia Britannica (article "Romance").

Dan'hasch, one of the genii who did not "acknowledge the great Solomon." When the princess Badoura in her sleep was carried to the bed of prince Camaral'zaman that she might see him, Danhasch changed himself into a flea, and bit her lip, at which Badoura awoke, saw the prince sleeping by her side, and afterwards became his wife.—Arabian Nights ("Camaralzaman and Badoura").

Daniel (The Book of), in the Old Testament, may be divided into two parts, the first of which (ch. i.-iv.) is historical, and the rest a series of visions.

Daniel, son of Widow Lackitt; a wealthy Indian planter. A noodle, whom Lucy Weldon marries for his money.—Southern: Oroonoko (1696).

Dan'nischemend, the Persian sorcerer, mentioned in Donnerhugel's narrative.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Dante (See DIVINA COMMEDIA.)

Dante (The Prophecy of), a poem by lord Byron, in the Italian measure. Written in 1821.

Dante and Beatrice. Some say that Beatrice, in Dante's Divina Commedia, merely personifies faith; others think it a real character, and say she was the daughter of an illustrious family of Portinari, for whom the poet entertained a purely platonic affection. She meets the poet after he has been dragged through the river Lethê (Purgatory, xxxi.), and conducts him through paradise. Beatrice Portina'ri married Simon de Bardi, and died at the age of 24; Dantê was a few months older.

> Some persons say that Dante meant Theology
> By Beatrice, and not a mistress; I . . .
> Deem this a commentator's phantasy.
> Byron: Don Juan, iii. 11 (1820).

N.B.—The poet married Gemma, of the powerful house of Donati. (See LOVES.)

Dantê's Beard. All the pictures of Dantê which I have seen represent him without any beard or hair on his face at all; but in Purgatory, xxxi., Beatrice says to him, "Raise thou thy beard, and lo! what sight shall do?" i.e. lift up your face and look about you; and he adds, "No sooner lifted I mine aspect up . . . than mine eyes [encountered] Beatrice."

Danton of the Cevennes, Pierre Seguier, prophet and preacher of Magistavols, in France. He was a leader amongst the Camisards.

Danvers (Charles), an embryo barrister of the Middle Temple.—C. Selby: The Unfinished Gentleman (1841).

Daphnaida, an elegy by Spenser, on the daughter of lord Howard, an heiress (1591).

Daph'ne (2 syl.), daughter of Silēno and Mysis, and sister of Nysa. The favourite of Apollo while sojourning on earth in the character of a shepherd-lad named "Pol."—Kane O'Hara: Midas (a burletta, 1764).

(In classic mythology Daphnê fled from the amorous god, and escaped by being changed into a laurel.)

Daphne, the vulgar proud wife of Chrysos the art patron.—Gilbert: Pygmalion and Galatea (1871).

Daph'nis, a beautiful Sicilian shepherd, the inventor of bucolic poetry. He was a son of Mercury, and friend both of Pan and of Apollo.

Daph'nis, the modest shepherd.

> This is that modest shepherd, he
> That only dare salute, but ne'er could be > Brought to kiss any, hold discourse or sing,
> Whisper, or boldly ask.
> J. Fletcher: The Faithful Shepherdess, i. 3 (1610).

Daph'nis and Chlo'e, a prose-pastoral love story in Greek, by Longos (a Byzantine), not unlike the tale of The Gentle Shepherd, by Allan Ramsay. Gessner has also imitated the Greek romance in his idyll called Daphnis. In this love story Longos says he was hunting in Lesbos, and saw in a grove consecrated to the nymphs a beautiful picture of children exposed, lovers plighting their faith, and the incursions of pirates, which he now expresses and dedicates to Pan, Cupid, and the nymphs. Daphnis, of course, is the lover of Chloê.

(Probably this Greek pastoral story suggested to St. Pierre his story of Paul and Virginia. Gay has a poem entitled Daphnis and Chloe.)

Daphnis and Lycidas, a pastoral, by W. Browne (1727).

Daphnis and Lityerses. Daphnis was a Sicilian shepherd, who went in search of his lady-love, Piplea, who had been carried off by Lityerses king of Phrygia. When he reached the place, Lityerses made him contend with him in a corn-reaping match. Hercules came to the shepherd's aid and slew the king.

> Thou [his deceased friend] hear'st the immortal song of old!
> Putting his sickle to the perilous grain
> In the hot corn-field of the Phrygian king,
> For thee the Lityerses-song again
> Young Daphnis with his silver voice doth sing!
> Matthew Arnold: Thyrsis.

Dapper, a lawyer's clerk, who went to Subtle "the alchemist," to be supplied with "a familiar" to make him win in horse-racing, cards, and all games of chance. Dapper is told to prepare himself for an interview with the fairy queen by taking "three drops of vinegar in at the nose, two at the mouth, and one at either ear," "to cry hum thrice and buzz as often."—Ben Jonson: The Alchemist (1610).

Dapple, the donkey ridden by Sancho Panza, in Cervantês' romance of Don Quixote (1605–1615).

Darby and Joan. This ballad, called The Happy Old Couple, is printed in the Gentleman's Magazine, v. 153 (March, 1735). It is also in Plumptre's Collection of Songs, 152 (Camb. 1805), with the music.

Darby and Joan are an old-fashioned, loving couple, wholly averse to change of any sort. It is generally said that Henry Woodfall was the author of the ballad, and that the originals were John Darby (printer, of Bartholomew Close, who died 1730) and his wife Joan. Woodfall served his apprenticeship with John Darby.

> "You may be a Darby [Mr. Hardcastle], but I'll be no Joan, I promise you."—Goldsmith: She Stoops to Conquer, i. 1 (1773).

Dardu-Le'na, the daughter of Foldath general of the Fir-bolg or Belgæ settled in the south of Ireland. When Foldath fell in battle—

His soul rushed to the vale of Mona, to Dardu-Lena's dream, by Dalrutho's stream, where she slept, returning from the chase of hinds. Her bow is near the maid, unstrung. . . . Clothed in the beauty of youth, the love of heroes lay. Dark-bending from . . . the wood her wounded father seemed to come. He appeared at times, then hid himself in mist. Bursting into tears, she arose. She knew that the chief was low. . . . Thou wert the last of his race, O blue-eyed Dardu-Lena!—Ossian: Temora, v.

Dare. Humani nihil a me alienum esse puto.—Terence.

I dare do all that may become a man,
Who dares do more is none.
Shakespeare: Macbeth, act i. sc. 7 (1606).

Dargo, the spear of Ossian son of Fingal.—Ossian: Calthon and Colmal.

Dar'gonet "the Tall," son of Astolpho, and brother of Paradine. In the fight provoked by Oswald against duke Gondibert, which was decided by four combatants against four, Dargonet was slain by Hugo the Little. Dargonet and his brother were rivals for the love of Laura.—Davenant: Gondibert, i. (died 1668).

Dari'us and his Horse. The seven candidates for the throne of Persia agreed that he should be king whose horse neighed first. As the horse of Darius was the first to neigh, Darius was proclaimed king.

That brave Scythian,
Who found more sweetness in his horse's neighing
Than all the Phrygian, Dorian, Lydian playing.
Lord Brooke.

(All the south of Russia and west of Asia was called Scythia.)

Darkness (Prince of). Satan is so called by Shakespeare, Milton, and Scott; but Spenser applies the name to Gorgon.

Great Gorgon, prince of darkness and dead night.
Faëris Queene, bk. i.

Darlemont, guardian and maternal uncle of Julio of Harancour; formerly a merchant. He took possession of the inheritance of his ward by foul means; but was proud as Lucifer, suspicious, exacting, and tyrannical. Every one feared him; no one loved him.—Holcroft: Deaf and Dumb (1785).

Darling (Grace), daughter of William Darling, lighthouse-keeper on Longstone, one of the Farne Islands. On the morning of September 7, 1838, Grace and her father saved nine of the crew of the Forfarshire steamer, wrecked among the Farne Islands opposite Bamborough Castle (1815-1842).

Darling of Mankind (The), an English translation of deliciæ generis humani, applied to Titus by Suetonius (tit. i.). Both Vespasian and Titus are called orbis deliciæ in one of the Monumenta Romana.

Darnay (Charles), the lover and afterwards the husband of Lucie Manette. He bore a strong likeness to Sydney Carton, and was a noble character worthy of Lucie. His real name was Evre'monde.—Dickens: A Tale of Two Cities (1859).

Darnel (Aurelia), a character in Smollett's novel: The Adventures of Sir Launcelot Greaves (1760).

Darnley, the amant of Charlotte [Lambert], in The Hypocrite, by Isaac Bickerstaff. In Molière's comedy of Tartuffe, Charlotte is called "Mariane," and Darnley is "Valère."

Dar'-Thula, daughter of Colla, and "fairest of Erin's maideps." She fell in love with Nathos, one of the three sons of Usnoth lord of Etha (in Argyllshire). Cairbar, the rebel, was also in love with her, but his suit was rejected. Nathos was made commander of king Cormac's army at the death of Cuthullin, and for a time upheld the tottering throne. But the rebel grew stronger and stronger, and at length found means to murder the young king; whereupon, the army under Nathos deserted. Nathos was now obliged to quit Ireland, and Dar-Thula fled with him. A storm drove the vessel back to Ulster, where Cairbar was encamped, and Nathos, with his two brothers, being overpowered by numbers, fell. Dar-Thula was arrayed as a young warrior; but when her lover was slain "her shield fell from her arm; her breast of snow appeared, but it was stained with blood. An arrow was fixed in her side," and her dying blood was mingled with that of the three brothers.—Ossian: Dar-Thula (founded on the story of "Deirdi," i. Trans. of the Gaelic Society).

Dar'tle (Rosa), companion of Mrs. Steerforth. She loved Mrs. Steerforth's son, but her love was not reciprocated. Miss Dartle is a vindictive woman, noted for a scar on her lip, which told tales when her temper was aroused. This scar was from a wound given by young Steerforth, who struck her on the lip when a boy.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Darwin's Missing Link, the link between the monkey and man. According to Darwin, the present host of animal life began from a few elemental forms, which developed, and by natural selection propagated certain types of animals; while others less suited to the battle of life died out. Thus, beginning with the larvæ of ascidians (a marine mollusc), we get by development to fish lowly organized (as the lancelet), then to ganoids and other fish, then to amphibians; from amphibians we get to birds and reptiles, and thence to mammals, among which comes the monkey, between which and man is a MISSING LINK.

Dashall (The Hon. Tom), cousin of Tally-ho. The rambles and adventures of these two blades are related by Pierce Egan, in his Life in London (1822).

Dashwood, a sneerwell in Murphy's comedy of Know your own Mind (1777).

D'Asumar (Count), an old Nestor, who fancied nothing was so good as when he was a young man.

"Alas! I see no men nowadays comparable to those I knew heretofore; and the tournaments are not performed with half the magnificence as when I was a young man. . . ." Seeing some fine peaches served up, he observed, "In my time, the peaches were much larger than they are at present; nature degenerates every day." "At that rate," said his companion, smiling, "the peaches of Adam's time must have been wonderfully large."—Lesage: Gil Blas, iv. 7 (1724).

Daughter (The), a drama by S. Knowles (1836). Marian, "daughter" of Robert, once a wrecker, was betrothed to Edward, a sailor, who went on his last voyage, and intended then to marry her. During his absence a storm at sea arose, a body was washed ashore, and Robert went down to plunder it. Marian went to look for her father and prevent his robbing those washed ashore by the waves, when she saw in the dusk some one stab a wrecked body. It was Black Norris, but she thought it was her father. Robert being taken up, Marian gave witness against him, and he was condemned to death. Norris said he would save her father if she would marry him, and to this she consented; but on the wedding day Edward returned. Norris was taken up for murder, and Marian was saved.

Daughter with her Murdered Father's Head. Margaret Roper, daughter of sir Thomas More, obtained privately the head of her father, which had been exposed on London Bridge, enclosed it in a casket, and at death was buried with the casket in her arms. Tennyson says—

Morn broadened on the borders of the dark
Ere I saw her who clasped in her last trance
Her murdered father's head.

¶ The head of the young earl of Derwentwater was exposed on Temple Bar in 1716. His wife drove in a cart under the arch, and a man, hired for the purpose, threw the young earl's head into the cart, that it might be decently buried. —Sir Bernard Burke.

¶ Mdlle. de Sombreuil, daughter of the comte de Sombreuil, insisted on sharing her father's prison during the "Reign of Terror," and in accompanying him to the guillotine.

Dauphin (Le Grand), Louis duc de Bourgogne, eldest son of Louis XIV., for whom was published the Delphin Classics (1661–1711).

Dauphin (Le Petit), son of the "Grand Dauphin" (1682–1712).

Daura, daughter of Armin. She was betrothed to Armar, son of Armart, Erath a rival lover having been rejected by her. One day, disguised as an old grey-beard, Erath told Daura that he was sent to conduct her to Armar, who was waiting for her. Without the slightest suspicion, she followed her guide, who took her to a rock in the midst of the sea, and there left her. Her brother Arindal, returning from the chase, saw Erath on the shore, and bound him to an oak; then pushing off the boat, went to fetch back his sister. At this crisis Armar came up, and discharged his arrow at Erath; but the arrow struck Arindal, and killed him. "The boat broke in twain," and when Armar plunged into the sea to rescue his betrothed, a "sudden blast from the hills struck him, and he sank to rise no more." Daura was rescued by her father, but she haunted the shore all night in a drenching rain. Next day "her voice grew very feeble; it died away; and, spent with grief, she expired."—Ossian: Songs of Selma.

Davenant (Lord), a bigamist. One wife was Marianne Dormer, whom he forsook in three months. It was given out that he was dead, and Marianne in time married lord Davenant's son. His other wife was Louisa Travers, who was engaged to captain Dormer, but was told that the captain was faithless and had married another. When the villainy of his lordship could be no longer concealed, he destroyed himself.

Lady Davenant, one of the two wives of lord Davenant. She was a "faultless wife," with beauty to attract affection, and every womanly grace.

Charles Davenant, a son of lord Davenant, who married Marianne Dormer, his father's wife.—Cumberland: The Mysterious Husband (1783).

Davenant (Will), a supposed descendant from Shakespeare, and Wildrake's friend.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, the Commonwealth).

DAVID, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Charles II. As David's beloved son Absalom rebelled against him, so the duke of Monmouth rebelled against his father Charles II. As Achitophel was a traitorous counsellor to David, so was the earl of Shaftesbury to Charles II. As Hushai outwitted Achitophel, so Hyde (duke of Rochester) outwitted the earl of Shaftesbury, etc.

> Auspicious prince,
> Thy longing country's darling and desire,
> Their cloudy pillar, and their guardian fire . . .
> The people's prayer, the glad diviner's theme,
> The young men's vision, and the old men's dream.
> Dryden. Absalom and Achitophel, i. 231–240 (1681).

David, king of North Wales, eldest son of Owen, by his second wife. Owen died in 1169. David married Emma Plantagenet, a Saxon princess. He slew his brother Hoel and his half-brother Yorwerth (son of Owen by his first wife), who had been set aside from the succession in consequence of a blemish in the face. He also imprisoned his brother Rodri, and drove others into exile. Madoc, one of his brothers, went to America, and established there a Welsh colony.—Southey: Madoc (1805).

David (St.), son of Xantus prince of Cereticu (Cardiganshire) and the nun Melearla. He was the uncle of king Arthur. St. David first embraced the ascetic life in the Isle of Wight, but subsequently removed to Menevia, in Pembrokeshire, where he founded twelve convents. In 577 the archbishop of Caërleon resigned his see to him, and St. David removed the seat of it to Menevia, which was subsequently called St. David's, and became the metropolis of Wales. He died at the age of 146, in the year 642. The waters of Bath "owe their warmth and salutary qualities to the benediction of this saint." Drayton says he lived in the valley of Ewias (2 syl.), between the hills of Hatterill, in Monmouthshire.

> Here, in an aged cell with moss and ivy grown,
> In which not to this day the sun hath ever shone,
> That reverend British saint in zealous ages past,
> To contemplation lived.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (13th).

St. David's Day, March 1. The leek worn by Welshmen on this day is in memory of a complete victory obtained by them over the Saxons (March 1, 640). This victory is ascribed "to the prayers of St. David," and his judicious adoption of a leek in the cap, that the Britons might readily recognize each other. The Saxons, having no badge, not unfrequently turned their swords against their own supporters.

David and Goliath (1 Sam. xvii.). Goliath, who defied the Hebrews and was slain by the stripling David, was descended from Arapha. Drayton published, in 1630, a poem so called.

¶ A parallel tale is told in Russian history. In the reign of Vladimir the Great, during one of his wars with the Petcheneguans, was a man of colossal stature, athletic and muscular Proud of his great height and strength, he paced along the bank of the river Troubeje (which separated the opposing forces), loading the Russians with insult, provoking them with threats, and ridiculing their timidity. This imposing air was successful. The soldiers of Vladimir, awed by the gigantic figure of their adversary, submitted to his bravados; and, when the day of combat arrived, they were constrained to supplicate for a postponement. At length an old man approached Vladimir, and said, "My prince, I have five sons, four of whom are in the army. Valiant as they are, none of them is equal to the youngest, who possesses prodigious strength." The young man was sent for, and being set before the grand-duke, asked permission to make trial of his strength. A vigorous bull was irritated with red-hot irons, but the young man stopped it in its full career, threw it on the ground, and tore off its skin. This proof of strength inspired the greatest confidence. The hour of battle arrived. The two champions advanced between the camps, and the Petcheneguan could not restrain a contemptuous smile when he observed the diminutive stature of his adversary, who indeed was yet without a beard. Being, however, attacked with great impetuosity, the giant gave ground, was seized by the young Russian, and crushed to death. The Petcheneguans took to flight, were pursued, and utterly routed. The conqueror, who was only a carrier, was laden with honours, raised with his father to the rank of the high nobility, and the place of combat was made the site of the city Pereislave, which soon rose to eminence in the government of Vladimir. N.B.—The young conqueror's name was Ivan Usmovitched, but was changed by Vladimir into Pereislave.—Duncan: Russia, vol. ii. pp. 201, 202 (Pereislave means "one who wins the victory"). (See FIERABRAS.)

David and Jonathan, inseparable friends. The allusion is to David the psalmist and Jonathan the son of Saul. David's lamentation at the death of Jonathan was never surpassed in pathos and beauty.—2 Sam. i. 19–27.

David Copperfield. (See COPPERFIELD, p. 233.)

Davideis, the chief poem of Cowley (1635). It is in four books. The quotation following is well known, and the last line is very felicitous:—

Begin, be bold, and venture to be wise;
He who defies this work from day to day
Does on a river's bank expectant stay,
Till the old stream that stopped him shall be gone,
Which runs, and as it runs, for ever shall run on.

Davie Debet, debt.

So ofte thy neighbours banquet in thy hall,
Till Davie Debet in thy parler stand,
And bids the[e] welcome to thine own decay.
Gascoigne: Magnum Vectigal, etc. (died 1775).

Davie of Stenhouse, a friend of Hobbie Elliott.—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Davies (John), an old fisherman employed by Joshua Geddes the quaker. —Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Da'vus, a plain, uncouth servitor. A common name for a slave in Greek and Roman plays, as in the Andria of Terence.

His face made of brass, like a vice in a game,
His gesture like Davus, whom Terence doth name.
Tusser: Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, lix. (1557).

Davus sum, non Œdipus. I am a homely man, and do not understand hints, innuendoes, and riddles, like Œdipus. Œdipus was the Theban who expounded the riddle of the Sphinx, that puzzled all his countrymen. Davus was the stock name of a servant or slave in Latin comedies. The proverb is used by Terence, Andria, 1, 2, 23.

Davy, the varlet of justice Shallow, who so identifies himself with his master that he considers himself half host, half varlet. Thus when he seats Bardolph and Page at table, he tells them they must take "his" good will for their assurance of welcome.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. (1598).

Daw (Sir David), a rich, dunder-headed baronet of Monmouthshire, without wit, words, or worth; but believing himself somebody, and fancying himself a sharp fellow, because his servants laugh at his good sayings, and his mother calls him a wag. Sir David pays his suit to Miss [Emily] Tempest; but as the affections of the young lady are fixed on Henry Woodville, the baron goes to the wall.—Cumberland: The Wheel of Fortune (1779).

Dawfyd, "the one-eyed" freebooter chief.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Dawkins (Jack), known by the sobriquet of the "Artful Dodger." He is one of Fagin's tools. Jack Dawkins is a young scamp of unmitigated villainy, and full of artifices; but of a cheery, buoyant temper.—C. Dickens: Oliver Twist, viii. (1837).

Dawson (Bully), a London sharper, bully, and debauchee of the seventeenth century. (See Spectator, No. 2.)

Bully Dawson kicked by half the town, and half the town kicked by Bully Dawson.—C. Lamb.

Dawson (Jemmy). Captain James Dawson was one of the eight officers belonging to the Manchester volunteers in the service of Charles Edward, the young pretender. He was a very amiable young man, engaged to a young lady of family and fortune, who went in her carriage to witness his execution for treason. When the body was drawn, i.e. embowelled, and the heart thrown into the fire, she exclaimed, "James Dawson!" and expired. Shenstone has made this the subject of a tragic ballad.

Young Dawson was a gallant youth,
A brighter never trod the plain;
And well he loved one charming maid,
And dearly was he loved again.
Shenstone: Jemmy Dawson (1745).

Dawson (Phœbe), "the pride of Lammas Fair," courted by all the smartest young men of the village, but caught "by the sparkling eyes" and ardent words of a tailor. Phœbe had by him a child before marriage, and after marriage he turned a "captious tyrant and a noisy sot." Poor Phœbe drooped, "pinched were her looks, as one who pined for bread," and in want and sickness she sank into an early tomb.

(This sketch is one of the best in Crabbe's Parish Register, 1807.)

Day (Justice), a pitiable hen-pecked husband, who always addresses his wife as "duck" or "duckie."

Mrs. Day, wife of the "justice," full of vulgar dignity, overbearing, and loud. She was formerly the kitchen-maid of her husband's father; but being raised from the kitchen to the parlour, became my lady paramount.

(In the comedy from which this farce is taken, "Mrs. Day" was the kitchen-maid in the family of colonel Careless, and went by the name of Gillian. In her exalted state she insisted on being addressed as "Your honour" or "Your ladyship.")

Margaret Woffington [1718-1760], in "Mrs. Day," made no scruple to disguise her beautiful face by drawing on it the lines of deformity, and to put on the tawdry habiliments and vulgar manners of an old hypocritical city vixen.—Thomas Davies.

Day (Abel), a puritanical prig, who can do nothing without Obadiah. This "downright ass" (act i. 1) aspires to the hand of the heiress Arabella.—Knight: The Honest Thieves.

(This farce is a mere réchauffé of The Committee, a comedy by the Hon. sir R. Howard (1670). The names of "Day," "Obadiah," and "Arabella" are the same.)

Day (Ferquhard), the absentee from the clan Chattan ranks at the conflict.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Day of the Barricades, May 12, 1588, when Henri de Guise returned to Paris in defiance of the king's order. The king sent for his Swiss guards; but the Parisians tore up the pavements, threw chains across the streets, and piled up barrels filled with earth and stones, behind which they shot down the Swiss as they paraded the streets. The king begged the duke to put an end to the conflict, and fled.

Another Journée des Barricades was August 27, 1688, the commencement of the Fronde war.

Another was June 27, 1830, the first day of the grand semain which drove Charles X. from the throne.

Another was February 24, 1848, when Affre, archbishop of Paris, was shot in his attempt to quell the insurrection.

Another was December 2, 1851, the day of the coup d'état, when Louis Napoleon made his appeal to the people for re-election to the presidency for ten years.

Day of the Cornsacks [Journée des Farines], January 3, 1591, when some of the partisans of Henri IV., disguised as millers, attempted to get possession of the barrier de St. Honoré (Paris), with the view of making themselves masters of the city. In this they failed.

Day of the Dupes, November 11, 1630. The dupes were Marie de Medicis, Anne of Austria, and Gaston duc d'Orléans, who were outwitted by cardinal Richelieu. The plotters had induced Louis XIII. to dismiss his obnoxious minister, whereupon the cardinal went at once to resign the seals of office; the king repented, re-established the cardinal, and he became more powerful than ever.

Days Recurrent in the Lives of Great Men.

BECKET. Tuesday was Becket's day. He was born on a Tuesday, and on a Tuesday was assassinated. He was baptized on a Tuesday, took his flight from Northampton on a Tuesday, withdrew to France on a Tuesday, had his vision of martyrdom on a Tuesday, returned to England on a Tuesday, his body was removed from the crypt to the shrine on a Tuesday, and on Tuesday (April 13, 1875) cardinal Manning consecrated the new church dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket.

CROMWELL'S day was September 3. On September 3, 1650, he won the battle of Dunbar; on September 3, 1651, he won the battle of Worcester; on September 3, 1658, he died.

DICKENS. His fatal day was June 9. He was in the terrible railway accident of June 9, 1861 (at Staplehurst), from which he never recovered; and he died June 9, 1870.

HAROLD'S day was October 14. It was his birthday, and also the day of his death. William the Conqueror was born on the same day, and, on October 14, 1066, won England by conquest.

HENRY VII. always regarded Saturday as his lucky day.

NAPOLEON'S day was August 15, his birthday; but his "lucky" day, like that of his nephew, Napoleon III., was the 2nd of the month. He was made consul for life on August 2, 1802; was crowned December 2, 1804; won his greatest battle, that of Austerlitz, for which he obtained the title of "Great," December 2, 1805; married the archduchess of Austria April 2, 1810; etc.

NAPOLEON III. The coup d'état was

December 2, 1851. Louis Napoleon was made emperor December 2, 1852; he opened, at Saarbrück, the Franco-German war August 2, 1870; and surrendered his sword to William of Prussia, September 2, 1870.

Dazzle, in London Assurance, by D. Boucicault (1841).

"Dazzle" and "lady Gay Spanker" "act themselves," and will never be dropped out of the list of acting plays.—Percy Fitzgerald.

De Bourgo (William), brother of the earl of Ulster and commander of the English forces that defeated Felim O'Connor (1315) at Athunree, in Connaught.

Why tho' fallen her brothers kerne [Irish infantry]
Beneath De Bourgo's battle stern.
Campbell: O'Connor's Child.

De Courcy, in a romance called Women, by the Rev. C. R. Maturin. An Irishman, made up of contradictions and improbabilities. He is in love with Zaira, a brilliant Italian, and also with her unknown daughter, called Eva Wentworth, a model of purity. Both women are blighted by his inconstancy. Eva dies, but Zaira lives to see De Courcy perish of remorse (1822).

De Gard, a noble, staid gentleman, newly lighted from his travels; brother of Oria'na, who "chases" Mi'rabel "the wild goose," and catches him.—Fletcher: The Wild-Goose Chase (1619).

De l'Epée (Abbé). Seeing a deaf-and-dumb lad abandoned in the streets of Paris, he rescued him, and brought him up under the name of Theodore. The foundling turned out to be Julio count of Harancour.

"In your opinion who is the greatest genius that France has ever produced?" "Science would decide for D'Alembert, and Nature [would] say Buffon; Wit and Taste [would] present Voltaire; and Sentiment plead for Rousseau; but Genius and Humanity cry out for De l'Epée, and him I call the best and greatest of human creatures."—Holcroft: The Deaf and Dumb, iii. 2 (1785).

De Profundis ("out of the depths . . ."), the first two words of Psalm cxxx. in the Roman Catholic Liturgy; sung when the dead are committed to the grave.

At eve, instead of bridal verse,
The De Profundis filled the air.
Longfellow: The Blind Girl.

De Valmont (Count), father of Florian and uncle of Geraldine. During his absence in the wars, he left his kinsman, the baron Longueville, guardian of his castle; but under the hope of coming into the property, the baron set fire to the castle, intending thereby to kill the wife and her infant boy. When De Valmont returned and knew his losses, he became a wayward recluse, querulous, despondent, frantic at times, and at times most melancholy. He adopted an infant "found in a forest," who turned out to be his son. His wife was ultimately found, and the villainy of Longueville was brought to light.—W. Dimond: The Foundling of the Forest.

Many "De Valmonts" I have witnessed in fifty-four years, but have never seen the equal of Joseph George Holman [1764–1817].—Donaldson.

Dead Pan, a poem by Mrs. Browning (1844), founded on the tradition that at the Crucifixion, when Jesus cried, "It is finished!" the oracles ceased, and a murmur was heard by mariners, "Great Pan is dead!"

Deaf and Dumb (The), a comedy by Thomas Holcroft. "The deaf and dumb" boy is Julio count of Harancour, a ward of M. Darlemont, who, in order to get possession of his ward's property, abandoned him when very young in the streets of Paris. Here he was rescued by the abbé De l'Epée, who brought him up under the name of Theodore. The boy being recognized by his old nurse and others, Darlemont confessed his crime, and Julio was restored to his rank and inheritance.—Holcroft: The Deaf and Dumb (1785).

Dean of St. Patrick (The), Jonathan Swift, who was appointed to the deanery in 1713, and retained it till his death (1667–1745).

Deans (Douce Davie), the cowherd at Edinburgh, noted for his religious peculiarities, his magnanimity in affection, and his eccentricities.

Mistress Rebecca Deans, Douce Davie's second wife.

Jeanie Deans, daughter of Douce Davie Deans, by his first wife. She marries Reuben Butler, the presbyterian minister. Jeanie Deans is a model of good sense, strong affection, resolution, disinterestedness. Her journey from Edinburgh to London is as interesting as that of Elizabeth from Siberia to Moscow.

Effie [Euphemia] Deans, daughter of Douce Davie Deans, by his second wife. She is betrayed by George [afterwards sir George] Staunton (called Geordie Robertson), and imprisoned for child-murder. Jeanie goes to the queen and sues for pardon, which is vouchsafed to her, and Staunton does what he can to repair the mischief he had done by marrying Effie, who thus becomes lady Staunton. Soon after this sir George is shot by a gipsy-boy, who proves to be his own son, and Effie retires to a convent on the Continent. — Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

(J. E. Millais has a picture of Effie Deans keeping tryst with George Staunton.)

 The prototype of Jeanie Deans was Helen Walker, to whose memory sir W. Scott erected a tombstone in Irongray Churchyard (Kirkcudbright).

DEATH or Mors. So Tennyson calls sir Ironside the Red Knight of the Red Lands, who kept Lyonors (or Lionês) captive in Castle Perilous. The name "Mors," which is Latin, is very inconsistent with a purely British tale, and of course does not appear in the original story.—Tennyson: Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette"); Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 134-137 (1470).

Death (The Ferry of). The ferry of the Irtish, leading to Siberia, is so called because it leads the Russian exile to political and almost certain physical death. To be "laid on the shelf" is to cross the ferry of the Irtish.

Death and Dr. Hornbook. A satirical poem by Burns. Death tells Burns that Dr. Hornbook, the apothecary, kills so many with his physic, that he has quite ruined his trade. He recites several instances, and then says—

> "That's just a swatch o' Hornbook's way;
> Thus goes he on from day to day;
> Thus does he poison, kill, an' slay,
> An's weel paid for 't.

 Hornbook was John Wilson, who was obliged to leave the county, migrated to Glasgow, and died in 1839.

Death and Music. Leopold I. of Germany (1650-1705), on his death-bed requested that the court musicians might be sent for, that he might die to the sounds of sweet music.

¶ Mirabeau's last words were, "Let me fall asleep to the sounds of delicious music."

N.B.—Sometimes the dying seem to hear sweet music. This, of course, is simply physical.

> Hark! they whisper, angels say,
> "Sister spirit, come away."

Death from Strange Causes.

ÆSCHYLUS was killed by the fall of a tortoise on his head from the claws of an eagle in the air.—Pliny: Hist. vii. 7.

AGATH'OCLES (4 syl.), tyrant of Sicily, was killed by a tooth-pick, at the age of 95.

ANACREON was choked by a grape-stone.—Pliny: Hist. vii. 7.

BASSUS (Q. Lecanius) died from the prick of a fine needle in his left thumb.

CHALCHAS, the soothsayer, died of laughter at the thought of his having outlived the time predicted for his death.

CHARLES VIII., conducting his queen into a tennis-court, struck his head against the lintel, and it caused his death.

FABIUS, the Roman prætor, was choked by a single goat-hair in the milk which he was drinking.—Pliny: Hist. vii. 7.

FREDERICK LEWIS, prince of Wales, died from the blow of a cricket-ball.

ITADACH died of thirst in the harvest-field, because (in observance of the rule of St. Patrick) he refused to drink a drop of anything.

LOUIS VI. met with his death from a pig running under his horse, and causing it to stumble.

MARGUTTE died of laughter on seeing a monkey trying to pull on a pair of his boots.

OTWAY, the poet, in a starving condition had a guinea given him; bought a loaf of bread, and died swallowing the first mouthful.

PHILOM'ENES (4 syl.) died of laughter at seeing an ass eating the figs provided for his own dessert.—Valerius Maximus.

PLACUT (Phillipot) dropped down dead while in the act of paying a bill.—Bacaberry the Elder.

QUENELAULT, a Norman physician of Montpellier, died from a slight wound made in his hand in the extraction of a splinter.

SAUFEIUS (Spurius) was choked supping up the albumen of a soft-boiled egg.

ZEUXIS, the painter, died of laughter at sight of a hag which he had just depicted.

Death Proof of Guilt. When combats and ordeals were appealed to, in the belief that "God would defend the right," the death of either party was considered a sure proof of guilt.

> Take hence that traitor from our sight,
> For, by his death, we do perceive his guilt.
> Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI. act iii. sc. 3 (1591).

Death Ride (The), the charge of the Light Brigade at Balaclava. (See under CHARGE, p. 195.)

Debatable Land (The), a tract of land between the Esk and the Sark. It seems properly to belong to Scotland, but having been claimed by both crowns, was styled The Debatable Land. Sir Richard Graham bought of James I. of England a lease of this tract, and got it united to the county of Cumberland. As James ruled over both kingdoms, he was supremely indifferent to which the plot was annexed.

Deb'on, one of the companions of Brute. According to British fable, Devonshire is a corruption of "Debon's-share," or the share of country assigned to Debon.

Deborah Debbitch, governante at lady Peveril's.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Dec'adi, plu. dec'adis, the holiday every tenth day, in substitution of the Sunday or sabbath, in the first French Revolution.

All décadi he labours in the corner of the Augustin cloister, and he calls that his holiday.—The Atelier du Lys, ii.

Dec'adists. Those who conformed to the dec'ade system of time introduced by Fabre d'Eglantine in 1793. So called because the year was divided into ten months, the week into ten days, and the month into thrice-ten days. Dec'ade is from the Greek word deka, ten.

There were 360 days in Mons. D'Eglantine's year, but there are 365 days in a solar year; so Mons. D'Eglantine called the five odd days sans-culottides, or holidays—a most clumsy contrivance. In fact, the decimal system may be useful perhaps in many calculations, but will not work in the laws of Nature.

Decameron (The), by Boccaccio (1350), a collection of tales (in Italian prose) supposed to be told by ten persons, seven gentlemen and three ladies who had retired to a pleasant retreat during a plague. Several of these tales have been a hunting-ground of poets and novelists; Chaucer, Shakespeare, Keats, Tennyson, and many others are indebted to them. G. Standfast and many others have published English versions, and one forms a volume of Bohn's Library.

Decem Scriptores, a collection of ten ancient chronicles on English history, edited by Twysden and John Selden. The names of the chroniclers are Simeon of Durham, John of Hexham, Richard of Hexham, Ailred of Rieval, Ralph de Diceto, John Brompton of Jorval, Gervase of Canterbury, Thomas Stubbs, William Thorn of Canterbury and Henry Knighton of Leicester.

Nearly 300 columns are occupied by the Abbreviationes Chronicorum of Ralph de Diceto, whose chronicles extend from 589 to 1148; and another chronicle brings the narrative down to 1199.

De'cius, friend of Antin'ous (4 syl.).—Beaumont and Fletcher: Laws of Candy (printed 1647).

Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (The), by Gibbon (1776).

Decree of Fontainebleau, an edict of Napoleon I., ordering the destruction by fire of all English goods (dated October 18, 1810, from Fontainebleau).

Dec'uman Gate, one of the four gates in a Roman camp. It was the gate opposite the prætorian, and furthest from the enemy. Called decuman because the tenth legion was always posted near it. The other two gates (the porta principālis dextra and the porta principālis sinistra) were on the other sides of the square. If the prætorian gate was at the top of this page, the decuman gate would be at the bottom, the porta dextra on the right hand, and the porta sinistra on the left.

Dedlock (Sir Leicester), bart., who has a general opinion that the world might get on without hills, but would be "totally done up" without Dedlocks. He loves lady Dedlock, and believes in her implicitly. Sir Leicester is honourable and truthful, but intensely prejudiced, immovably obstinate, and proud as "county" can make a man; but his pride has a most dreadful fall when the guilt of lady Dedlock becomes known.

Lady Dedlock, wife of sir Leicester, beautiful, cold, and apparently heartless; but she is weighed down with this terrible secret, that before marriage she had had a daughter by captain Hawdon. This daughter's name is Esther [Summerson], the heroine of the novel.

Volumnia Dedlock, cousin of sir Leicester. A "young" lady of 60, given to rouge, pearl-powder, and cosmetics. She has a habit of prying into the concerns of others.—C. Dickens: Bleak House (1853).

Dee's Spec'ulum, a mirror, which Dr. John Dee asserted was brought to him by the angels Raphael and Gabriel. At the death of the doctor it passed into the possession of the earl of Peterborough, at Drayton; then to lady Betty Germaine, by whom it was given to John last duke of Argyll. The duke's grandson (lord Frederick Campbell) gave it to Horace Walpole; and in 1842 it was sold, at the dispersion of the curiosities of Strawberry Hill, and bought by Mr. Smythe Pigott. At the sale of Mr.

Pigott's library, in 1853, it passed into the possession of the late lord Londesborough. A writer in Notes and Queries (p. 376, November 7, 1874) says, it "has now been for many years in the British Museum," where he saw it "some eighteen years ago."

(This magic speculum is a flat polished mineral, like cannel coal, of a circular form, fitted with a handle.)

Deerslayer (The), the title of a novel by J. F. Cooper, and the nickname of its hero (Natty Bumppo), a model uncivilized man, honourable, truthful, and brave, pure of heart and without reproach. He is introduced in five of Cooper's novels: The Deerslayer, The Pathfinder, The Last of the Mohicans, The Pioneers, and The Prairie. He is called "Hawk-eye" in The Last of the Mohicans; "Leather-stocking" in The Pioneers; and "The Trapper" in The Prairie, in which he dies.

The Delawares call me "Deerslayer;" but it is not so much because I am pretty fatal with the venison, as because that, while I kill so many bucks and does, I have never yet taken the life of a fellow-creature (chap. ii.).

N.B.—Deerslayer was first called "Straight-tongue," for his truthfulness; then "Pigeon," for his kindness of heart; then "Lap-ear," for his hound-like sagacity; then "Deerslayer," for his skill in tracking and slaying deer (chap. iv.). "Hawk-eye," so called by a dying red man or Mingo (chap. vii.).

Defarge (Mons.), keeper of a wine-shop in the Faubourge St. Antoine, in Paris. He is a bull-necked, good-humoured, but implacable-looking man.

Mde. Defarge, his wife. A dangerous woman, with great force of character; everlastingly knitting.

Mde. Defarge had a watchful eye, that seldom seemed to look at anything.—C. Dickens: A Tale of Two Cities, i. 5 (1859).

Defender of the Faith, the title first given to Henry VIII. by pope Leo X., for a volume against Luther, in defence of pardons, the papacy, and the seven sacraments. The original volume is in the Vatican, and contains this inscription in the king's handwriting: Anglorum rex Henricus, Leoni X. mittit hoc opus et fidei testem et amicitiæ; whereupon the pope (in the twelfth year of his reign) conferred upon Henry, by bull, the title "Fidei Defensor," and commanded all Christians so to address him. The original bull was preserved by sir Robert Cotton, and is signed by the pope, four bishop-cardinals, fifteen priest-cardinals, and eight deacon-cardinals. A complete copy of the bull, with its seals and signatures, may be seen in Selden's Titles of Honour, v. 53–57 (1672)

Defensatas, Devonshire.

Defoe writes The History of the Plague of London as if he had been a personal spectator, but he was only three years old at the time (1663–1731).

Deformed Transformed (The), a drama in two parts by lord Byron (1824).

Deggial, antichrist. The Mohammedan writers say he has but one eye and one eyebrow, and on his forehead is written CAFER ("infidel").

Chilled with terror, we concluded that the Deggial, with his exterminating angels, had sent forth their plagues on the earth.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Dehenbarth, South Wales.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 2 (1590).

Dei Franchi, the brothers in Boucicault's drama, The Corsican Brothers (1848). One brother is a peaceful, amorous resident in a city; and the other is a stern, warlike huntsman of the mountains.

Deird'ri, an ancient Irish story similar to the Dar-Thula of Ossian. Conor king of Ulster puts to death by treachery the three sons of Usnach. This leads to a desolating war against Ulster, which terminates in the total destruction of Eman. This is one of the three tragic stories of the Irish, which are: (1) The death of the children of Touran (regarding Tuatha de Danans); (2) the death of the children of Lear or Lir, turned into swans by Aoife; (3) the death of the children of Usnach (a "Milesian" story).

Dei'ri (3 syl.), separated from Bernicia by Soemil, the sixth in descent from Woden. Deiri and Bernicia together constituted Northumbria.

Diera [sic] beareth thro' the spacious Yorkish hounds,
From Durham down along to the Lancastrian sounds...
And did the greater part of Cumberland contain.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xvi. (1613).

Dek'abrist, a Decembrist, from Dekaber, the Russian for December. It denotes those persons who suffered death or captivity for the part they took in the military conspiracy which broke out in St. Petersburg in December, 1825, on the accession of czar Nicholas to the throne.

Dela'da, the tooth of Buddha, preserved in the Malegawa temple at Kandy. The natives guard it with the greatest jealousy, from a belief that whoever possesses it acquires the right to govern Ceylon. When the English (in 1815) obtained possession of this palladium, the natives submitted without resistance.

Delaserre (Captain Philip), a friend of Harry Bertram.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Delec'table Mountains. A range of hills from the summits of which the Celestial City could be seen. These mountains were beautiful with woods, vineyards, fruits of all sorts, flowers, springs and fountains, etc.

> Now there were on the tops of these mountains shepherds feeding their flocks. The pilgrims, therefore, went to them, and leaning on their staffs . . . they asked, "Whose delectable mountains are these, and whose be the sheep that feed upon them?" The shepherds answered, "These mountains are Emmanuel's land . . . and the sheep are His, and He laid down His life for them."—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, i. (1678).

DE'LIA, Diana; so called from the island Delos, where she was born. Similarly, Apollo was called Delius. Milton says that Eve e'en

> Delia's self
> In gait surpassed and goddess-like deport,
> Though not as she with bow and quiver armed.
> Paradise Lost, ix. 338, etc. (1665).

De'lia, any female sweetheart. One of Virgil's shepherdesses. The lady-love of Tibullus. The Delia of Pope's Satires (i. 81) is the second lady Doloraine of Ledwell Park.

> Slander or poison dread from Delia's rage;
> Hard words or hanging, if your judge be Page.

 That is, judge Page of Middle Ashton.

De'lia, the lady-love of James Hammond's elegies, was Miss Dashwood, who died in 1779. She rejected his suit, and died unmarried. In one of the elegies the poet imagines himself married to her, and that they were living happily together till death, when pitying maids would tell of their wondrous loves.

Delia is the unknown somebody to whom Shenstone addressed his love-odes and Pastoral Ballad.

Delian King (The). Apollo or the sun is so called in the Orphic hymn.

> Oft as the Delian king with Sirius holds
> The central heavens.
> Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads (1767).

Delight of Mankind (The), Titus the Roman emperor (A. D. 40, 79–81).

> Titus indeed gave one short evening gleam,
> More cordial felt, as in the midst it spread
> Of storm and horror: "The Delight of Men.
> Thomson: Liberty, iii. (1735).

Della Crusca School, originally applied in 1582 to a society in Florence, established to purify the national language and sift from it all its impurities; but applied in England to a brotherhood of poets (in the last quarter of the eighteenth century) under the leadership of Mrs. Piozzi. This school was conspicuous for affectation and high-flown panegyrics on each other. It was stamped out by Giffard, in The Baviad, in 1794, and The Mæviad, in 1796. Robert Merry, who signed himself Della Crusca, James Cobb a farce-writer, James Boswell (biographer of Dr. Johnson), O'Keefe, Morton, Reynolds, Holcroft, Sheridan, Colman the younger, Mrs. H. Cowley, and Mrs. Robinson were its best exponents.

Delphin Classics (The), a set of Latin classics edited in France for the use of the grand dauphin (son of Louis XIV.). Huet was chief editor, assisted by Montausier and Bossuet. They had thirty-nine scholars working under them. The indexes of these classics are very valuable.

Del'phine (2 syl.), the heroine and title of a novel by Mde. de Staël. Delphine is a charming character, who has a faithless lover, and dies of a broken heart. This novel, like Corinne, was written during her banishment from France by Napoleon I., when she travelled in Switzerland and Italy. It is generally thought that "Delphine" was meant for the authoress herself (1802).

Delta [Δ] of Blackwood is D. M. Moir (1798–1815). B. Disraeli (lord Beaconsfield) also assumed this signature in 1837 and 1839.

Del'ville (2 syl.), one of the guardians of Cecilia. He is a man of wealth and great ostentation, with a haughty humility and condescending pride, especially in his intercourse with his social inferiors. —Miss Burney: Cecilia (1782).

Demands. In full of all demands, as his lordship says. His "lordship" is the marquis of Blandford; and the allusion is to Mr. Benson, the jeweller, who sent in a claim to the marquis for interest to a bill which had run more than twelve months. His lordship sent a cheque for the bill itself, and wrote on it, "In full of all demands." Mr. Benson accepted the bill, and sued for the interest, but was non-suited (1871).

Deme'tia, South Wales; the inhabitants are called Demetians.

> Denevoir, the seat of the Demetian king.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, v. (1612).

DEME'TRIUS, a young Athenian, to whom Egeus (3 syl.) promised his daughter Hermia in marriage. As Hermia loved Lysander, she refused to marry Demetrius, and fled from Athens with Lysander. Demetrius went in quest of her, and was followed by Hel'ena, who doted on him. All four fell asleep, and "dreamed a dream" about the fairies. On waking, Demetrius became more reasonable. When Egēus found out how the case stood, he consented to the union of his daughter with Lysander.—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

Deme'trius, in The Poetaster, by Ben Jonson, is meant for John Marston, who died 1633.

Deme'trius (4 syl.), son of king Antig'onus, in love with Celia, alias Enan'thē.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Humorous Lieutenant (printed 1647).

Deme'trius, a citizen of Greece during the reign of Alexius Comnēnus.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Demiurgus, that mysterious agent which, according to Plato, made the world and all that it contains. The Logos of St. John's Gospel (ch. i. 1).

Democ'ritos (in Latin Democritus), the laughing or scoffing philosopher; the friar Bacon of his age. To "dine with Democritos" is to go without dinner.

People think that we [authors] often dine with Democritos, but there they are mistaken. There is not one of the fraternity who is not welcome to some good table.—Lesage: Gil Blas, xii. 7 (1735).

Democritus Junior, Robert Burton, author of The Anatomy of Melancholy (1621).

Demod'ocos (in Latin Demodocus), bard of Alcin'ous (4 syl.) king of the Phæa'cians.

> Such as the wise Demodicos once told
> In solemn songs at king Alcinous' feast,
> While sad Ulysses' soul and all the rest
> Are held, with his melodious harmony,
> In willing chains and sweet captivity.
> Milton: Vacation Exercise (1627).

Dem'ogor'gon, tyrant of the elves and fays, whose very name inspired terror; hence Milton speaks of "the dreaded name of Demogorgon" (Paradise Lost, ii. 965). Spenser says he "dwells in the deep abyss where the three fatal sisters dwell" (Faërie Queene, iv. 2); but Ariosto says he inhabited a splendid palace on the Himalaya Mountains. Mentioned by Statius in the Thebaid, iv. 516. Shelley so calls eternity in Prometheus Unbound.

He's the first-begotten of Beëlzebub, with a face as terrible as Demogorgon.—Dryden: The Spanish Friar, v. 2 (1680).

Demonology and Witchcraft (Letters on), by sir Walter Scott (1830).

Demoph'oon (4 syl.) was brought up by Demēter, who anointed him with ambrosia and plunged him every night into the fire. One day, his mother, out of curiosity, watched the proceeding, and was horror-struck; whereupon Demēter told her that her foolish curiosity had robbed her son of immortal youth.

¶ This story is also told of Isis.—Plutarch: De Isid. et Osirid., xvi. 357.

¶ A similar story is told of Achillēs. His mother Thet'is was taking similar precautions to render him immortal, when his father Pe'leus (2 syl.) interfered.—Apollonius Rhodius: Argonautic Exp., iv. 866.

Demosthenes (Son of). (See RULERS OF THE WORLD.)

The High-born Demosthenes, William the Silent, prince of Orange (born 1533, assassinated 1584).

The high-born Demosthenes electrified large assemblies by his indignant invectives against the Spanish Philip (1560).—Motley: The Dutch Republic, part iii. 2.

Demosthenes of the Pulpit. Dr. T. Rennell, dean of Westminster, was so called by William Pitt (1753-1840).

Dendin (Peter), an old man, who had settled more disputes than all the magistrates of Poitiers, though he was no judge. His plan was to wait till the litigants were thoroughly sick of their contention, and longed to end their disputes; then would he interpose, and his judgment could not fail to be acceptable.

Tenot Dendin, son of the above, but, unlike his father, he always tried to crush quarrels in the bud; consequently, he never succeeded in settling a single dispute submitted to his judgment.—Rabelais: Pantagruel, iii. 41 (1545).

(Racine has introduced the same name in his comedy called Les Plaideurs (1669), and Lafontaine in his Fables, 1668.)

Dennet (Father), an old peasant at the Lists of St. George.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Dennis the hangman, one of the ringleaders of the "No Popery riots;" the other two were Hugh servant of the Maypole inn, and the half-witted Barnaby Rudge. Dennis was cheerful enough when he "turned off" others; but when he himself ascended the gibbet he showed a most grovelling and craven spirit.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Dennis (John), "the best abused man in English literature." Swift lampooned him; Pope assailed him in the Essay on Criticism; and finally, he was "damned to everlasting fame" in the Dunciad. He is called "Zo'ilus" (1657–1735).

Dennison (Jenny), attendant on Miss Edith Bellenden. She marries Cuddie Headrigg.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Dent de Lait (Une), a prejudice. After M. Béralde has been running down Dr. Purgon as a humbug, Argan replies, "C'est que vous avez, mon frère, une dent de lait contre lui."—Molière: Le Malade Imaginaire, iii. 3 (1673).

D'Éon de Beaumont (Le chevalier), a person notorious for the ambiguity of his sex; said to be the son of an advocate. His face was pretty, without beard, moustache, or whiskers. Louis XV. sent him as a woman to Russia on a secret mission, and he presented himself to the czarina as a woman (1756). In the Seven Years' War he was appointed captain of dragoons. In 1777 he assumed the dress of a woman again, which he maintained till death (1728–1810).

Derbend (The Iron Gates of), called the "Albanicæ Portæ," or the "Caspian's Gate." Iron gates, which closed the defile of Derbend. There is still débris of a great wall, which once ran from the Black Sea to the Caspian. It is said that Alexander founded Derbend on the west coast of the Caspian, and that Khosru the Great fortified it. Haroun-al-Raschid often resided there. Its ancient name was Albāna, and hence the province Schirvan was called Albania.

N.B.—The gates called Albaniæ Pylæ were not the "Caspian's Gate," but "Trajan's Gate" or "Kopula Derbend."

Derby (Earl of), third son of the earl of Lancaster, and near kinsman of Edward III. His name was Henry Plantagenet, and he died 1362. Henry Plantagenet, earl of Derby, was sent to protect Guienne, and was noted for his humanity no less than for his bravery. He defeated the comte de l'Isle at Bergerac, reduced Perigord, took the castle of Auberoche, in Gascony, overthrew 10,000 French with only 1000, taking prisoners nine earls and nearly all the barons, knights, and squires (1345). Next year he took the fortresses of Monsegur, Monsepat, Villefranche, Miremont, Tennins, Damassen, Aiguilon, and Reole.

> That most deserving earl of Derby, we prefer
> Henry's third valiant son, the earl of Lancaster,
> That only Mars of men.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xviii. (1613).

Derby (Countess of), Charlotte de la Tremouille, countess of Derby and queen of Man.

Philip earl of Derby, king of Man, son of the countess.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Derce'to, Derce'tis, or Derce (2 syl.), a deity adored at Ascălon. She was a beautiful woman, who had a natural daughter, and was so ashamed that she threw herself into a lake and was metamorphosed in the lower parts into a fish; hence the Syrians of Ascalon abstained from fish as a food. Her infant became the famous Semirămis, who registered her mother among the deities. She is sometimes confounded with the god Dagon.—Diodōrus Siculus: Bibliothēkē; Lucian: Dialogues, etc., 2; Pliny, ix. 13.

Dermat O'Dyna [OF THE BRIGHT FACE], one of the bravest of Fingal's heroes. He figures in most of the chief events of that mythical period. The princess Grania, daughter of king Cormac Mac Art, to whom Fingal was to be betrothed, fell in love with him and persuaded him to elope with her. Fingal's "pursuit" of the runaways, and the series of adventures which befell the parties, form one of the best and weirdest of old Celtic romances. Numerous dolmens and other remains still exist in Ireland bearing the names of these two lovers. (See DIARMID.)—Old Celtic Romances, translated by P. W. Joyce (1879).

Deronda (Daniel), a novel by "George Eliot" (Mrs. J. W. Cross, née Marian Evans), (1876).

Der'rick, hangman in the first half of the seventeenth century. The crane for hoisting goods is called a derrick, from this hangman.

Derrick (Tom), quarter-master of the pirate's vessel.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Derry-Down Triangle (The), lord Castlereagh; afterwards marquis of Londonderry; so called by William Hone. The first word is a pun on the title, the second refers to his lordship's oratory, a triangle being the most feeble, monotonous, and unmusical of all musical instruments. Tom Moore compares the oratory of lord Castlereagh to "water spouting from a pump."

Q. Why is a pump like viscount Castlereagh?
A. Because it is a slender thing of wood,
That up and down its awkward arm doth sway,
And coolly spout, and spout, and spout away,
In one weak, washy, everlasting flood.
Thomas Moore.

Dervise ["a poor man"], a sort of religious friar or mendicant among the Mohammedans.

Desborough (Colonel), one of the parliamentary commissioners.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Desdemo'na, daughter of Brabantio a Venetian senator, in love with Othello the Moor (general of the Venetian army). The Moor loves her intensely, and marries her; but Iago, by artful villainy, induces him to believe that she loves Cassio too well. After a violent conflict between love and jealousy, Othello smothers her with a bolster, and then stabs himself.—Shakespeare: Othello (1611).

The soft simplicity of Desdemona, confident of merit and conscious of innocence, her artless perseverance in her suit, and her slowness to suspect that she can be suspected, are proofs of Shakespeare's skill in human nature.—Dr. Johnson.

Desert Fairy (The). This fairy was guarded by two lions, which could be pacified only by a cake made of millet, sugar-candy, and crocodiles' eggs. The Desert Fairy said to Allfair, "I swear by my coif you shall marry the Yellow Dwarf, or I will burn my crutch."—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The Yellow Dwarf," 1682).

Deserted Daughter (The), a comedy by Holcroft. Joanna was the daughter of Mordent; but her mother died, and Mordent married lady Anne. In order to do so he ignored his daughter and had her brought up by strangers, intending to apprentice her to some trade. Item, a money-lender, acting on the advice of Mordent, lodges the girl with Mrs. Enfield, a crimp, where Lennox is introduced to her, and obtains Mordent's consent to run away with her. In the interim Cheveril sees her, falls in love with her, and determines to marry her. Mordent repents, takes the girl home, acknowledges her to be his daughter, and she becomes the wife of the gallant young Cheveril (1784).

(This comedy has been recast, and called The Steward.)

Deserted Village (The), a descriptive poem in heroic verse, with rhymes, by Goldsmith (1770). The poet has his eye chiefly on Lissoy, in Kilkenny West (Ireland), its landscapes and characters. Here his father was pastor. He calls the village Auburn, but tells us it was the seat of his youth, every spot of which was dear and familiar to him. He describes the pastor, the schoolmaster, the ale-house; then tells us that luxury has killed all the simple pleasures of village life, but asks the friends of truth to judge how wide the limits "between a splendid and a happy land." Now the man of wealth and pride

Takes up a space that many poor supplied:
Space for his lake, his parks' extended bounds,
Space for his horses, equipage, and hounds.
Goldsmith (1770).

Some think Springfield, in Essex, is the place referred to.

A traveller, whom Washington Irving accepts as an authority, identified Lissoy's ale-house, with the sign of the Three Pigeons swinging over the door-way, as "that house where nutbrown draughts inspired," and "where once the signpost caught the passing eye."—Redway, in Notes and Queries, October 12, 1878.

Dr. Goldsmith composed his Deserted Village whilst residing at a farm-house nearly opposite the church here [i.e. Springfield]. Joseph Strutt, the engraver and antiquary, was born here in 1749, and died 1802.—Lewis: Topographical Dictionary of England (article "Springfield," 1831).

Deserter (The), a musical drama by Dibdin (1770). Henry, a soldier, is engaged to Louisa, but during his absence some rumours of gallantry to his disadvantage reach the village; and, to test his love, Louisa in pretence goes with Simkin as if to be married. Henry sees the procession, is told it is Louisa's wedding-day, and in a fit of desperation gives himself up as a deserter, and is condemned to death. Louisa goes to the king, explains the whole affair, and returns with his pardon as the muffled drums begin to beat.

Desmas or Dismas. The repentant thief is called Desmas in The Story of Joseph of Arimathea; but Dismas in the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus. Longfellow, in The Golden Legend, calls him Dumachus. The impenitent thief is called Gesmas, but Longfellow calls him Titus.

Imparibus meritis pendent tria corpora ramis:
Dismas et Gesmas, media est Divina Potestas;
Alta petit Dismas, infelix infima Gesmas:
Nos et res nostras conservet Summa Potestas.

Of differing merits from three trees incline
Dismas and Gesmas and the Power Divine;
Dismas repents, Gesmas no pardon craves,
The Power Divine by death the sinner saves.

Desmonds of Kilmallock (Limerick). The legend is that the last powerful head of this family, who perished in the reign of queen Elizabeth, still keeps his state under the waters of lough Gur; that every seventh year he reappears fully armed, rides round the lake early in the morning, and will ultimately return in the flesh to claim his own again. (See BARBAROSSA, p. 88.)—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel.

Despair (Giant) lived in Doubting Castle. He took Christian and Hopeful captives for sleeping on his grounds, and locked them in a dark dungeon from Wednesday to Saturday, without "one bit of bread, or drop of drink, or ray of light." By the advice of his wife, Diffidence, the giant beat them soundly "with a crab-tree cudgel." On Saturday night Christian remembered he had a key in his bosom, called "Promise," which would open any lock in Doubting Castle. So he opened the dungeon door, and they both made their escape with speed.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, i. (1678).

Despairing Shepherd (The), a ballad by Rowe, in ridicule of the courtship of Addison with the countess dowager of Warwick. Addison married the lady, but it was a grand mistake.

Deucal'idon, the sea which washes the north coast of Scotland.

Till thro' the sleepy main to Thuly I have gone,
And seen the frozen isles, the cold Deucalidon.
Drayton: Polyolbion, i. (1612).

Deucalidon'ian Ocean, the sea which washes the northern side of Ireland.—Richard of Cirencester: Hist., i. 8 (1762).

Deuce is in Him (The), a farce by George Colman, senior. The person referred to is colonel Tamper, under which name the plot of the farce is given (1762).

Deuga'la, says Ossian, "was covered with the light of beauty, but her heart was the house of pride."

Deuteronomy, the Greek name of the fifth book of the Old Testament. The word means, "the Law repeated." And the book is so called because "Moses" therein summarizes the principal laws which he had already given.

The Jews call it The Book of the Words, or These be the Words (see ch. i. 1).

Devereux, a novel by lord Lytton (1820).

DEVIL (The), Olivier Ledain, the tool of Louis XI., and once the king's barber. He was called Le Diable because he was as much feared as the prince of evil, was as fond of making mischief, and was far more disliked. Olivier was executed in 1484.

Devil (The). The noted public-house so called was No. 2, Fleet Street. In 1788 it was purchased by the bank firm and formed part of "Child's Place." The original "Apollo" (of the Apollo Club, held here under the presidency of Ben Jonson) is still preserved in Child's bank.

N.B.—When the lawyers in the neighbourhood went to dinner, they hung a notice on their doors, "Gone to the Devil," that those who wanted them might know where to find them.

Dined to-day with Dr. Garth and Mr. Addison at the Devil tavern, near Temple Bar, and Garth treated.—Swift. Letter to Stella.

The Chief of the Devils in Dr. Faust, part i., are these nine: Lucifer, Beelzebub, Astaroth, Zathanas, Anubis, Dithgranus, Drachus, Belial, and Ketele.

According to Dante, they are Scarmiglione (or hair-tugger), Alichino (the deceiver), Calcobrina (grace-scoffer), Cagnazzo (the evil one), Barbarccia (choleric), Libicocco (unbridled desire), Dragnignazzo (dragon's venom), Ciriato Sannuto (boar-armed), Grafficane (scratch-dog), Farfarello (prater), and Rubicante (furious).

Milton calls them Satan, Moloch, Belial, Mammon, Peor or Chemos, Baalim, Astoreth or Astarte (3 syl.), Thammuz, Dagon, Rimmon, Osiris, Iris, and Orus.—Paradise Lost, bk. i. 376-490.

The French Devil, Jean Bart, an intrepid French sailor, born at Dunkirk (1650-1702).

The White Devil. George Castriot, surnamed "Scanderbeg," was called by the Turks "The White Devil of Wallachia" (1404-1467).

Devil (The Printer's). Aldus Manutius, a printer in Venice to the holy Church and the doge, employed a negro boy to help him in his office. This little black boy was believed to be an imp of Satan, and went by the name of the "printer's devil." In order to protect him from persecution, and confute a foolish superstition, Manutius made a public exhibition of the boy; and announced that "any one who doubted him to be flesh and blood might come forward and pinch him."

Devil (Robert the), of Normandy; so called because his father was said to have been an incubus or fiend in the disguise of a knight (1028-1035).

¶ Robert François Damiens is also called Robert le Diable, for his attempt to assassinate Louis XV. (1714–1757).

Devil (Son of the), Ezzeli'no, chief of the Gibelins, governor of Vicenza. He was so called for his infamous cruelties (1215-12-9).

Devil Dick, Richard Porson, the critic (1759-1808).

Devil Outwitted (The). (See PATRICK AND THE SERPENT.)

Devil upon Two Sticks (The), by W. Coombe (1790). An English version of Le Diable Boiteux, by Lesage (1707). The plot of this humorous satirical tale is borrowed from the Spanish El Diabolo Cojuelo by Gueva'ra (1635). Asmode'us (le diable boiteux) perches don Cle'ofas on the steeple of St. Salvador', and stretching out his hand, the roofs of all the houses open, and expose to him what is being done privately in every dwelling.

Devil on Two Sticks (The), a farce by S. Foote; a satire on the medical profession.

Devil to Pay (The), a farce by C. Coffey. Sir John Loverule has a termagant wife—and Zackel Jobson a patient Grissel. Two spirits named Nadir and Ab'ishog transform these two wives for a time, so that the termagant is given to Jobson, and the patient wife to sir John. When my lady tries her tricks on Jobson, he takes his strap to her and soon reduces her to obedience. After she is well reformed, the two are restored to their original husbands, and the shrew becomes an obedient, modest wife (died 1745).

The Devil to Pay was long a favourite, chiefly for the character of "Nell" [the cobbler's wife], which made the fortunes of several actresses.—Chambers: English Literature, ii. 151.

Devil's Age (The). A wealthy man once promised to give a poor gentleman and his wife a large sum of money if at a given time they could tell him the devil's age. When the time came, the gentleman, at his wife's suggestion, plunged first into a barrel of honey and then into a barrel of feathers, and walked on all-fours. Presently, up came his Satanic majesty, and said, "X and x years have I lived," naming the exact number, "yet never saw I an animal like this." The gentleman had heard enough, and was able to answer the question without difficulty. — Rev. W. Webster: Basque Legends, 58 (1877).

Devil's Arrows, three remarkable "druidical" stones, near Boroughbridge, in Yorkshire. Probably these stones simply mark the boundary of some property or jurisdiction.

Devil's Bridge (The), mentioned by Longfellow, in the Golden Legend, is the bridge over the falls of the Reuss, in the canton of the Uri, in Switzerland.

Devil's Chalice (The). A wealthy man gave a poor farmer a large sum of money on this condition: at the end of a twelvemonth he was either to say "of what the devil made his chalice," or else give his head to the devil. The poor farmer, as the time came round, hid himself in the cross-roads, and presently the witches assembled from all sides. Said one witch to another, "You know that Farmer So-and-so has sold his head to the devil, for he will never know of what the devil makes his chalice. In fact, I don't know myself." "Don't you?" said the other; "why, of the parings of finger-nails trimmed on Sundays." The farmer was overjoyed, and when the time came round was quite ready with his answer.—Rev. W. Webster: Basque Legends, 71 (1877).

Devil's Current (The). Part of the current of the Bosphŏrus is so called from its great rapidity.

Devil's Den, a cromlech in Preschute, near Marlborough.

Devil's Dyke (The). The most celebrated is the enormous rampart thrown up by Probus on the bank of the Rhine, with a vain hope of warding off the Alamanni. The dyke a little later was utilized by the Alamanni as a wall of defence.

Dyke is used to signify a rampart and also an excavation. (See DEVIL'S DYKE, BRIGHTON.)

Devil's Dyke (The), otherwise called Grim's Dyke. This Dyke ran from Newmarket into Lincolnshire, and was designed to separate Mercia from the East Angles. Part of the southern boundary of Mercia (from Hampshire to the mouth of the Severn) was called "Woden's Dyke," the present Wan's Dyke.

Because my depth and breadth so strangely doth exceed Men's low and wretched thoughts, they constantly decreed
That by the devil's help I needs must raisèd be,
Wherefore the "Devil's Ditch" they basely named me.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxii. (1622).

Devil's Dyke, Brighton (The). One day, as St. Cuthman was walking over the South Downs, and thinking to himself how completely he had rescued the whole country from paganism, he was accosted by his sable majesty in person. "Ha, ha!" said the prince of darkness; "so you think by these churches and convents to put me and mine to your ban; do you? Poor fool! why, this very night will I swamp the whole land with the sea." "Forewarned is forearmed," thought St. Cuthman, and hied him to sister Cecilia, superior of a convent which then stood on the spot of the present Dyke House. "Sister," said the saint, "I love you well. This night, for the grace of God, keep lights burning at the convent windows from midnight to day-break, and let masses be said by the holy sisterhood." At sundown came the devil with pickaxe and spade, mattock and shovel, and set to work in right good earnest to dig a dyke which should let the waters of the sea into the downs. "Fire and brimstone!" he exclaimed, as a sound of voices rose and fell in sacred song—"Fire and brimstone! What's the matter with me?" Shoulders, feet, wrists, loins, all seemed paralyzed. Down went mattock and spade, pickaxe and shovel, and just at that moment the lights at the convent windows burst forth, and the cock, mistaking the blaze for daybreak, began to crow most lustily. Off flew the devil, and never again returned to complete his work. The small digging he effected still remains in witness of the truth of this legend of the "Devil's Dyke."

Devil's Frying-Pan (The), a Cornish mine worked by the ancient Romans. According to a very primitive notion, precious stones are produced from condensed dew hardened by the sun. This mine was the frying-pan where the dew was thus converted and hardened.

Devil's Kettle (The), one of the Icelandic geysers, about fifty paces from the great geyser. It is provoked by throwing into the opening clods of grass, when it belches forth a magnificent column of boiling water, very dangerous to bystanders.

Devil's Parliament (The), the parliament assembled by Henry VI. at Coventry, in 1459. So called because it passed attainders on the duke of York and his chief supporters.

Devil's Throat (The). Cromer Bay is so called, because it is so dangerous to navigation.

Devil's Wall (The), the wall separating England from Scotland. So called from its great durability.

Devon.

On Granby's Cheek might bid new glories rise,
And point a purer beam from Devon's eyes.
Sheridan's "Portrait"—addressed to Mrs. Crewe.

Mary Isabella marchioness of Granby, and Georgina duchess of Devonshire, two reigning beauties of their time. Of the latter the anecdote is told of a dustman, who cried out, "Lord love you, my lady! let me light my pipe at your eyes." Sheridan refers to the brilliancy of her eyes.

Devonshire, according to historic fable, is a corruption of "Debon's-share." This Debon was one of the companions of Bute, a descendant of Æne'as. He chased the giant Coulin till he came to a pit eight leagues across. Trying to leap this chasm, the giant fell backwards and lost his life.

. . . that ample pit, yet far renowned
For the great leap which Debon did compel
Coulin to make, being eight lugs of ground,
Into the which retourning back he fell . . .
And Debon's share was that is Devonshire.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 10 (1590).

De'vorgoil (Lady Jane), a friend of the Hazelwood family.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Dewlap (Dick), an anecdote-teller, whose success depended more upon his physiognomy than his wit. His chin and his paunch were his most telling points.

I found that the merit of his wit was founded upon the shaking of a fat paunch, and the tossing up of a pair of rosy jowls.—R. Steele.

Dhu (Evan), of Lochiel, a Highland chief, in the army of Montrose.

Mhich-Connel Dhu, or M'Ilduy, a Highland chief, in the army of Montrose. —Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Dhu'ldul, the famous horse of Ali, son-in-law of Mahomet.

Dhu'l Karnein [the knotty point], the forty-seventh proposition of the first book of Euclid, ascribed by some to Pythagoras.

∴ We are also told that Dhu'l Karnein was a mysterious some-one of whom the Jews required information respecting Mahomet. (See "Cow," Sale's Korân, note.)

Dhu'l Karnein ("the two-horned"), a true believer according to the Mohammedan legend, who built the wall to prevent the incursions of Gog and Magog.—Al Korân, xviii.

Commentators say the wall was built in this manner: The workmen dug till they found water; and having laid the foundation of stone and melted brass, they built the superstructure of large pieces of iron, between which they packed wood and coal, till the whole equalled the height of the mountains [of Armenia]. Then, setting fire to the combustibles, and by the use of bellows, they made the iron red hot, and poured molten brass over to fill up the interstices.—Sale: Al Kordn.

Dhu'lnun, the surname of Jonah; so called because he was swallowed by a fish.

Remember Dhu'lnun, when he departed in wrath, and thought that we could not exercise our power over him.—Al Kordn, xxi.

Diable Boiteux (Le), by Lesage, a tale in French prose (1707). W. Coombe published, in 1790, an English version called The Devil upon Two Sticks (q.v.).

Diafoirus (Thomas), son of Dr. Diafoirus. He is a young medical milksop, to whom Argan has promised his daughter Angelique in marriage. Diafoirus pays his compliments in cut-and-dried speeches, and on one occasion, being interrupted in his remarks, says, "Madame, vous m'avez interrompu dans le milieu de ma période, et cela m'a troublé la mémoire." His father says, "Thomas, réservez cela pour une autre fois." Angelique loves Cléante (2 syl.), and Thomas Diafoirus goes to the wall.

Il n'a jamais eu l'imagination bien vive, ni ce feu d'esprit qu'on remarque dans quelques uns, . . . Lorsqu'il était petit, il n'a jamais été ce qu'on appelle mièvre et éveillé; on le voyait toujours doux, paisible, et taciturne, ne disant jamais mot, et ne jouant jamais à tous ces petits jeux que l'on nomme enfantins.—Molière: Malade Imaginaire, fi. 6 (1673).

Dialogues of the Dead, by George lord Lyttelton (1760-1765).

Diamond, one of three brothers, sons of the fairy Agapê. Though very strong, he was slain in single fight by Cam'balo. His brothers were Pri'amond and Tri'amond.—Spenser: Faërie Queené, iv. (1596).

Diamond and Newton. (See NEWTON AND HIS DOG.)

Diamond Jousts, nine jousts instituted by Arthur, and so called because a diamond was the prize. These nine diamonds were all won by sir Launcelot, who presented them to the queen; but Guinevere, in a tiff, flung them into the river which ran by the palace.—Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("Elaine").

Diamond Sword, a magic sword given by the god Syren to the king of the Gold Mines.

She gave him a sword made of one entire diamond, that shone as great lustre as the sun.—Comtesse de ("The Yellow Dwarf," 1682).

Diamonds. The largest in the world—

 For particulars, see each under its name. (See also STEWART DIAMOND.)

DIANA, heroine and title of a pastoral by Montemayor, imitated from the Daphnis and Chloe of Longos (fourth century).

Dian'a, daughter of the widow of Florence with whom Hel'ena lodged on her way to the shrine of St. Jacques le Grand. Count Bertram wantonly loved her; but the modest girl made this attachment the means of bringing about a reconciliation between Bertram and his wife Helena.—Shakespeare: All's Well that Ends Well (1598).

Diana Vernon, beloved by Francis Osbaldistone.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (1818).

Dian'a de Lascours, daughter of Ralph and Louise de Lascours, and sister of Martha, alias Ogaril'a. Diana was betrothed to Horace de Brienne, whom she resigns to Martha.—Stirling: The Orphan of the Frozen Sea (1856).

Dian'a the Inexorable. (1) She slew Ori'on with one of her arrows, for daring to make love to her. (2) She changed Actæon into a stag and set her own dogs on him to worry him to death; because he chanced to look upon her while bathing. (3) She shot with her arrows the six sons and six daughters of Niobê; because the fond mother said she was happier than Latôna, who had only two children.

Dianæ non movenda numina.
Horace: Epode, xvii.

Diana the Second of Salmantin, a pastoral romance by Gil Polo.

"We will preserve that book," said the curé, "as carefully as if Apollo himself had been its author."—Cervantes: Don Quichotte, I. i. 6 (1605).

Diana of the Stage, Mrs. Anne Bracegirdle (1663-1748).

Dian'a's Foresters, "minions of the moon," "Diana's knights," etc., highwaymen.

Marry, then, sweet wag, when thou art king, let not us that are "squires of the night's body," be called thieves . . . let us be "Diana's foresters," "Gentlemen of the shade," "minions of the moon."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. act i. sc. 2 (1597).

Diana's Livery (To wear), to be a virgin.

One twelve-moons more she'll wear Diana's livery;
This . . . hath she vowed.
Shakespeare: Pericles Prince of Tyre, act ii. sc. 5 (1608).

Diana's Power and Functions.

Terrat, lustrat, agit, Proserpina, Luna, Diana,
Ima, Suprema, feras, sceptro, fulgore, sagitta.

Diano'ra, wife of Gilberto of Friu'li, but amorously loved by Ansaldo. In order to rid herself of his importunities, she vowed never to yield to his suit till he could "make her garden at midwinter as gay with flowers as it was in summer" (meaning never). Ansaldo, by the aid of a magician, accomplished the appointed task; but when the lady told him her husband insisted on her keeping her promise, Ansaldo, not to be outdone in generosity, declined to take advantage of his claim, and from that day forth was the firm and honourable friend of Gilberto.—Boccaccio: Decameron, x. 5.

¶ The Franklin's Tale of Chaucer is substantially the same story. (See DORIGEN, p. 294.)

Diarmaid, noted for his "beauty spot," which he covered up with his cap; for if any woman chanced to see it, she would instantly fall in love with him.—Campbell: Tales of the West Highlands ("Diarmaid and Grainne").

Diaries. A diary is a register of daily occurrences. Of printed diaries the following are celebrated: The Diary and Letters of Mde. D'Arblay, which contains some good sketches of the manners and customs of her own time, with notices of George III., Dr. Johnson, Burke, Reynolds, and others, published posthumously.

The Diary and Correspondence of John Evelyn, published posthumously in 1818. It contains an excellent account of the Great Fire of London, in 1666, and much most interesting gossip about the manners, customs, dress, and court of Charles II.

Sam. Pepys's Diary, written in shorthand, and being deciphered by the Rev. John Smith, was published in 1825. Pepys lived 1632–1703; and his diary is quaint, domestic, and most interesting.

The Diary and Correspondence of Henry Crabb Robinson, who lived 1775–1867. Published posthumously 1869.

Diav'olo (Fra), Michele Pozza, insurgent of Calabria (1760–1806).—Auber: Fra Diavolo (libretto by Scribe, 1836).

Dibble (Davie), gardener at Monkbarns.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Dibu'tades (4 syl.), a potter of Sicyon, whose daughter traced on the wall her lover's shadow, cast there by the light of a lamp. This, it is said, is the origin of portrait-painting. The father applied the same process to his pottery, and this, it is said, is the origin of sculpture in relief.

Will the arts ever have a lovelier origin than that fair daughter of Dibutades tracing the beloved shadow on the wall?—Ouida: Ariadne, i. 6.

Dicæ'a, daughter of Jove, the "accusing angel" of classic mythology.

Forth stepped the Just Dicæa, full of rage.
Phineas Fletcher: The Purple Island, vi. (1633).

Diccon the Bedlamite, a half-mad mendicant, both knave and thief. A specimen of the metre and spelling will be seen by part of Diccon's speech—

Many a myle have I walked, divers and sundry wales,
And many a good man's house have I bin at in my dais:
Many a gossip's cup in my tyme have I tasted,
And many a broche and spyt have I both turned and basted . . .
When I saw it booted nit, out at doores I hyed mee,
And caught a slyp of bacon when I saw none spyed mee,
Which I intend not far hence, unless my purpose fayle,
Shall serve for a shoing horne to draw on two pots of ale.
Diccon the Bedlamite (1552).

Dicil'la, one of Logistilla's handmaids, noted for her chastity.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Dick, ostler at the Seven Stars inn, York.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Dick, called "The Devil's Dick of Hellgarth;" a falconer and follower of the earl of Douglas.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Dick (Mr.), an amiable, half-witted man, devoted to David's "aunt," Miss Betsey Trotwood, who thinks him a prodigious genius. Mr. Dick is especially mad on the subject of Charles I.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Dick Amlet, the son of Mrs. Amlet, a rich, vulgar tradeswoman. Dick assumes the airs of a fine gentleman, and calls himself colonel Shapely, in which character he gets introduced to Corinna, the daughter of Gripe, a rich scrivener. Just as he is about to elope, his mother makes her appearance, and the deceit is laid bare; but Mrs. Amlet promises to give her son £10,000, and so the wedding is adjusted. Dick is a regular scamp, and wholly without principle; but being a dashing young blade, with a handsome person, he is admired by the ladies.—Vanbrugh: The Confederacy (1695).

John Palmer was the "Dick Amlet," and John Bannister the roguish servant, "Brass."—James Smith (1790).

Dick Shakebag, a highwayman in the gang of captain Colepepper (the Alsatian bully).—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Dickens. Shakespeare, in The Merry Wives of Windsor, says, "I cannot tell what the dickens his name is" (act iii. sc. 2).

A man accidentally caught hold of a hot horse-shoe, and in exclamation named three celebrated British authors: "Dickens, Howit[t] Burns!"

Dickson (Thomas), farmer at Douglasdale.

Charles Dickson, son of the above, killed in the church.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Dictator of Letters, François Marie Arouet de Voltaire, called the "Great Pan" (1694-1778).

Dictionary (A Living). Wilhelm Leibnitz (1646-1716) was so called by George I.

¶ Longinus was called "The Living Cyclopædia" (213-273).

¶ Daniel Huet, chief editor of the Delphine Classics, was called a Porcus Literarum for his unlimited knowledge (1630-1721).

Diddler (Jeremy), an artful swindler; a clever, seedy vagabond, who borrows money or obtains credit by his songs, witticisms, or other expedients.—Kenney: Raising the Wind.

Diderick, the German form of Theodorick, king of the Goths. As Arthur is the centre of British romance and Charlemagne of French romance, so Diderick is the central figure of the German minnesingers.

Didier (Henri), the lover of Julie Lesurques (2 syl.); a gentleman in feeling and conduct, who remains loyal to his fiancée through all her troubles.—Stirling: The Courier of Lyons (1852).

Dido, queen of Carthage, fell in love with Æneas, who (fleeing from Troy) was stranded on the Carthaginian coast. After a time Minerva insisted that the fugitive should leave Carthage, and found a city in Latium. Dido, vexed and slighted, kills herself with a sword given her by Æneas. According to Virgil, she destroyed herself on a funeral pile. (See ÆNEAS.)

 Ovid, in his Heroïdes (4 syl.), has a letter supposed to be written by Dido to Æneas, reminding him of all she had done for him, and imploring him to remain. As this is in Latin verse, of course it was not the composition of Dido.

(There are English tragedies on queen Dido, as Dido Queen of Carthage, by Nash and Marlowe (1594); Dido and Æneas, by D'Urfey (1721); the opera of Dido and Æneas, by Purcell (1657). There are also Dido, an opera, by Marmontel (1703); Didon Abbandonata, by Metastasio (1724).)

 For Porson's pun on Dido, see Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 392.

Die Young (Whom the Gods love).—Byron: Don Juan, iv. 12 (1824).

ὃν οἱ θεοὶ φιλοῦσιν ἀποθνήσκει νέος.
Menander: Fragments, 48 ("Meineka").

And what excelleth but what dieth young?
Drummond (1585-1649).

The ripest fruit first falls.
Shakespeare: Richard II. act ii. sc. 1.

Die'go, the sexton to Lopez the "Spanish curate."—Fletcher: The Spanish Curate (1622).

Die'go (Don), a man of 60, who saw a country maiden named Leonora, whom he liked, and intended to marry if her temper was as amiable as her face was pretty. He obtained leave of her parents to bring her home and place her under a duenna for three months, and then either return her to them spotless, or to make her his wife. At the expiration of the time, he went to settle the marriage contract; and, to make all things sure, locked up the house, giving the keys to Ursula; but to the outer door he attached a huge padlock, and put the key in his pocket. Leander, being in love with Leonora, laughed at locksmiths and duennas, and Diego (2 syl.) found them about to elope. Being a wise man, he not only consented to their union, but gave Leonora a handsome marriage portion.—Bickerstaff: The Padlock (1768).

Diet of Performers.

BRAHAM sang on bottled porter
CATLEY (Miss) took linseed tea and madeira.
COOKE (G. F.) drank everything.
HENDERSON, gum arabic and sherry.
INCLEDON sang on madeira.

JORDAN (Mrs.) drank calves'-foot jelly and sherry.

KEAN (C.) took beef-tea for breakfast, and preferred a rump-steak for dinner.

KEAN (Edm.), EMERY, and REEVE drank cold brandy-and-water.

KEMBLE (John) took opium.

LEWIS, mulled wine and oysters.

MACREADY used to eat the lean of mutton-chops when he acted, and subsequently lived almost wholly on a vegetable diet.

OXBERRY drank tea.

RUSSELL (Henry) took a boiled egg.

SMITH (W.) drank coffee.

WOOD (Mrs.) sang on draught porter.

WRENCH and HARLEY took no refreshment during a performance.—W. C. Russell: Representative Actors, 272.

Gladstone, an egg beaten up in sherry

Die'trich (2 syl.). So Theod'oric the Great is called by the German minnesingers. In the terrible broil stirred up by queen Kriemhild in the banquet-hall of Etzel, Dietrich interfered, and succeeded in capturing Hagan and the Burgundian king Gunther. These he handed over to the queen, who cut off both their heads with her own hands.—The Nibelungen Lied (thirteenth century).

Dietrich (John), a labourer's son of Pomerania. He spent twelve years under ground, where he met Elizabeth Krabbin, daughter of the minister of his own village, Rambin. One day, walking together, they heard a cock crow, and an irresistible desire came over both of them to visit the upper earth. John so frightened the elves by a toad, that they yielded to his wish, and gave him hoards of wealth, with part of which he bought half the island of Rügen. He married Elizabeth, and became the founder of a very powerful family.—Keightley: Fairy Mythology. (See TANNHÄUSER.)

Dieu et Mon Droit, the parole of Richard I. at the battle of Gisors (1198).

Diggery, one of the house-servants at Strawberry Hall. Being stage-struck, he inoculates his fellow-servants (Cymon and Wat) with the same taste. In the same house is an heiress named Kitty Sprightly (a ward of sir Gilbert Pumpkin), also stage-struck. Diggery's favourite character was "Alexander the Great," the son of "Almon." One day, playing Romeo and Juliet, he turned the oven into the balcony, but, being rung for, the girl acting "Juliet" was nearly roasted alive. (See DIGGORY.)—Jackman: All the World's a Stage (1777).

Digges (Miss Maria), a friend of lady Penfeather; a visitor at the Spa.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.). "Digges" (1 syl.).

Diggon [Davie], a shepherd in the Shepheardes Calendar, by Spenser. He tells Hobbinol that he drove his sheep into foreign lands, hoping to find better pasture; but he was amazed at the luxury and profligacy of the shepherds whom he saw there, and the wretched condition of the flocks. He refers to the Roman Catholic clergy, and their abandoned mode of life. Diggon also tells Hobbinol a long story about Roffin (the bishop of Rochester) and his watchful dog Lauder catching a wolf in sheep's clothing in the fold.—Ecl. ix. (September, 1578 or 1578).

Diggory, a barn labourer, employed on state occasions for butler and footman by Mr. and Mrs. Hardcastle. He is both awkward and familiar, laughs at his master's jokes and talks to his master's guests while serving. (See DIGGERY.)—Goldsmith: She Stoops to Conquer (1773).

Diggory (Father), one of the monks of St. Botolph's Priory.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Dimanche (Mons.), a dun. Mons. Dimanche (2 syl.), a tradesman, applies to don Juan for money. Don Juan treats him with all imaginable courtesy; but every time he attempts to revert to business interrupts him with some such question as, Comment se porte madame Dimanche? or Et votre petite fille Claudine, comment se porte-t-elle? or Le petit Colin, fait-il toujours bien du bruit avec son tambour? or Et votre petit chien Brusquet, gronde-t-il toujours aussi fort . . .? and, after a time, he says he is very sorry, but he must say good-bye for the present; and he leaves Mons. without his once stating the object of his call. (See SHUFFLETON.)—Molière: Don Juan, etc. (1665).

Din (The), the practical part of Islam, containing the ritual and moral laws.

DINAH [Friendly], daughter of sir Thomas Friendly. She loves Edward Blushington, "the bashful man," and becomes engaged to him.—Moncrieff: The Bashful Man.

Dinah, daughter of Sandle Lawson, landlord of the Spa hotel.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Dinah (Aunt) leaves her nephew, Walter Shandy, £1000. This sum of money, in Walter's eye, will suffice to carry out all the wild schemes and extravagant fancies that enter into his head. —Sterne: Tristram Shandy (1759).

Dinah, in Uncle Tom's Cabin, by Mrs. Beecher Stowe (1850). She is the cook in St. Clair's household.

Dinant', a gentleman who once loved and still pretends to love Lamîra, the wife of Champernel.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Little French Lawyer (printed 1647).

Dinarza'de (4 syl.), sister of Scheherazadê sultana of Persia. Dinarzadê was instructed by her sister to wake her every morning an hour before daybreak, and say, "Sister, relate to me one of those delightful stories you know," or "Finish before daybreak the story you began yesterday." The sultan got interested in these tales, and revoked the cruel determination he had made of strangling at daybreak the wife he had married the preceding night.

Dinas Emrys or "Fort of Ambrose" (i.e. Merlin), on the Brith, a part of Snowdon. When Vortigern built this fort, whatever was constructed during the day was swallowed up in the earth during the night. Merlin (then called Ambrose or Embres-Guletic) discovered the cause to be "two serpents at the bottom of a pool below the foundation of the works." These serpents were incessantly struggling with each other; one was white, and the other red. The white serpent at first prevailed, but ultimately the red one chased the other out of the pool. The red serpent, he said, meant the Britons, and the white one the Saxons. At first the Saxons (or white serpent) prevailed, but in the end "our people" (the red serpent) "shall chase the Saxon race beyond the sea."—Nennius: History of the Britons (842).

And from the top of Brith, so high and wondrous steep,
Where Dinas Emris stood, showed where the serpents fought
The white that tore the red, for whence the prophet taught
The Britons' sad decay.
Drayton: Polyolbion, 2. (1622).

Dine with Democritos (To), to be choused out of your dinner.

¶ A "Barmecide feast" is no feast at all. The allusion is to Barmecide, who invited Schacăbac to dine with him, and set before him only empty plates and dishes, pretending that the "viands" were most excellent. (See p. 90.)

Dine with duke Humphrey (To), to have no dinner to go to. The duke referred to was the son of Henry IV., murdered at St. Edmundsbury, and buried at St. Alban's. It was generally thought that he was buried in the nave of St. Paul's Cathedral; but the monument supposed to be erected to the duke was in reality that of John Beauchamp. Loungers, who were asked if they were not going home to dinner, and those who tarried in St. Paul's after the general crowd had left, were supposed to be so busy looking for the duke's monument that they disregarded the dinner hour.

Dine with Mahomet (To), to die. Similar to the classic phrase, "To sup with Pluto."

Dine (or Sup) with sir Thomas Gresham, to have no dinner or supper to go to. At one time the Royal Exchange was the common lounging-place of idlers and vagabonds.

Tho' little coin thy purseless pockets line,
Yet with great company thou'rt taken up;
For often with duke Humphrey thou dost dine,
And often with sir Thomas Gresham sup.
Hayman: Epigram on a Loafer (1628).

Dine with the Cross-Legged Knights (To), to have no dinner to go to. Lawyers at one time made appointments with their clients at the Round Church, and here a host of dinnerless vagabonds loitered about all day, in the hope of picking up a few pence for little services.

Diner-Out of the First Water, the Rev. Sidney Smith; so called by the Quarterly Review (1769–1845).

Din'evawr (3 syl.) or DINAS VAWR ["great palace"], the residence of the king of South Wales, built by Rhodri Mawr.

I was the guest of Rhy's at Dinevawr,
And there the tidings found me, that our sire
Was gathered to his fathers.
Southey: Madoc, l. 3 (1805).

Dingle (Old Dick of the), friend of Hobbie Elliott of the Heugh-foot Farm.—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Dingley Dell, the home of old Wardle, etc., and the scene of Tupman's love-advances with the "fair Miss Rachel."—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Dingwall (Davie), the attorney at Wolf's Hope village.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Dinias and Dercyllis (The Wanderings, Adventures, and Loves of), an old Greek novel, the basis of the romance of Antonius Diog'enês, in twenty-four books and entitled Incredible Things beyond Thule [Ta Huper Thoulen Apista], a store-house from which subsequent writers have borrowed largely. The work is not extant, but Photius gives an outline of its contents.

Dinmont (Dandie, i.e. Andrew), an eccentric and humorous store farmer at Charlie's Hope. He is called "The Fighting Dinmont of Liddesdale."

Ailie Dinmont, wife of Dandie Dinmont.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

(This novel has been dramatized by Daniel Terry.)

Dinner Bell (The). Burke was so called from his custom of speaking so long as to interfere with the dinner of the members (1729–1797).

Dinnerless (The) are said to sit at a "Barmecide feast;" to "dine with duke Humphrey;" "to dine with sir Thomas Gresham;" to "dine with Democritos." Their hosts are said to be cross-legged knights. (See each article.)

Diocle'tian, the king and father of Erastus, who was placed under the charge of the "seven wise masters" (Italian version).

In the French version, the father is called "Dolop'athos."

Diog'enes (4 syl.), the negro slave of the cynic philosopher Michael Agelastês (4 syl.).—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Diogenes' Lanthorne, a satire in verse on London life by S. Rowlands, in 1607.

> I'll search the city, where, if I can see
> An honest man, he shall gae with me.

Di'omede (3 syl.) fed his horses on human flesh, and he was himself eaten by his horse, being thrown to it by Hercules.

Dion (Lord), father of Euphra'sia. Euphrasia is in love with Philaster, heir to the crown of Messi'na. Disguised as a page, Euphrasia assumes the name of Bellario and enters the service of Philaster. —Fletcher: Philaster, or Love Lies a-bleeding (1620).

¶ There is considerable resemblance between "Euphrasia" and "Viola," in Shakespeare's Twelfth Night (1614).

Dionæ'an Cæsar, Julius Cæsar, who claimed descent from Venus, called Diône from her mother. Æne'as was son of Venus and Anchisês.

> Ecce, Dionæi processit Cæsaris astrum.
> Virgil: Eclogues, lx. 47.

Dio'ne (3 syl.), mother of Aphroditê (Venus), Zeus or Jove being the father. Venus herself is sometimes called Diône.

> Oh bear . . . thy treasures to the green recess,
> Where young Dionê strays; with sweetest airs
> Entice her forth to lend her angel form
> For Beauty's honoured image.
> Akenside: Pleasures of Imagination, i. (1744).

Dionys'ia, wife of Cleon governor of Tarsus. Periclês prince of Tyre commits to her charge his infant daughter Mari'na, supposed to be motherless. When 14 years old, Dionysia, out of jealousy, employs a man to murder her foster-child, and the people of Tarsus, hearing thereof, set fire to her house, and both Dionysia and Cleon are burnt to death in the flames.—Shakespeare: Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

Dionys'ius, tyrant of Syracuse, dethroned Evander, and imprisoned him in a dungeon deep in a huge rock, intending to starve him to death. But Euphrasia, having gained access to him, fed him from her own breast. Timoleon invaded Syracuse, and Dionysius, seeking safety in a tomb, saw there Evander the deposed king, and was about to kill him, when Euphrasia rushed forward, struck the tyrant to the heart, and he fell dead at her feet.—Murphy: The Grecian Daughter (1772).

N.B.—In this tragedy there are several gross historical errors. In act i. the author tells us it was Dionysius the Elder who was dethroned, and went in exile to Corinth; but the elder Dionysius died in Syracuse, at the age of 63, and it was the younger Dionysius who was dethroned by Timoleon, and went to Corinth. In act v. he makes Euphrasia kill the tyrant in Syracuse, whereas he was allowed to leave Sicily, and retired to Corinth, where he spent his time in riotous living, etc.

Dionys'ius [THE ELDER] was appointed sole general of the Syracusian army, and then king by the voice of the senate. Damon "the Pythagore'an" opposed the appointment, and even tried to stab "the tyrant," but was arrested and condemned to death. The incidents whereby he was saved are to be found under the article DA'MON, p. 258.

(Damon and Pythias, a drama by R. Edwards (1571), and another by John Banim, in 1825.)

Dionys'ius [THE YOUNGER], being banished from Syracuse, went to Corinth and turned schoolmaster.

> Corinth's pedagogue hath now
> Transferred his by-word (tyrant) to thy brow.
> Byron: Ode t Napoleon.

Dionysius the Areop'agite (5 syl.) was one of the judges of the Areopagite when St. Paul appeared before this tribunal. Certain writings, fabricated by the neo-platonicians in the fifth century, were falsely ascribed to him. The Isodo'rian Decretals is a somewhat similar forgery by Mentz, who lived in the ninth century, or three hundred years after Isidore.

> The error of those doctrines so vicious

Dionysius's Ear, a cave in a rock, 72 feet high, 27 feet broad, and 219 feet deep, the entrance of which "resembled the shape of an ear." It was used as a guard-room or prison; and the sentinel could hear the slightest whisper of the prisoners within.

Dioscu'ri [sons of Zeus], Castor and Pollux. Generally, but incorrectly, accented on the second syllable.

Dioti'ma, the priestess of Mantineia in Plato's Symposium, the teacher of Soc'ratês. Her opinions on life, its nature, origin, end, and aim, form the nucleus of the dialogue. Socratês died of hemlock.

> Beneath an emerald plane
> Sits Diotima, teaching him that died
> Of hemlock.
> Tennyson: The Princess, iii.

Diplomatists (Prince of), Charles Maurice Talleyrand de Périgord (1754-1838).

Dipsas, a serpent, so called because those bitten by it suffered from intolerable thirst. (Greek, dipsa, "thirst.") Milton refers to it in Paradise Lost, x. 526 (1665).

Dipsodes (3 syl.), the people of Dipsody, ruled over by king Anarchus, and subjugated by prince Pantag'ruel (bk. ii. 28). Pantagruel afterwards colonized their country with nine thousand million men from Utopia (or to speak more exactly, 9,876,543,210 men), besides women, children, workmen, professors, and peasant labourers (bk. iii. 1).—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel (1545).

Dip'sody, the country of the Dipsodes (2 syl.), q.v.

Dircæ'an Swan, Pindar; so called from Dircê, a fountain in the neighbourhood of Thebes, the poet's birthplace (B.C. 518-442).

Dirge in Cymbeline, a beautiful ode by Collins. It begins thus—

> To fair Fidele's grassy tombs.

Dirk Hatteraick. (See HATTERAICK.)

Dirlos or D'Yrlos (Count), a paladin, the embodiment of valour, generosity, and truth. He was sent by Charlemagne to the East, where he conquered Aliar'dê, a Moorish prince. On his return, he found his young wife betrothed to Celi'nos (another of Charlemagne's peers). The matter was put right by the king, who gave a grand feast on the occasion.

Dirt. "If dirt were trumps, what a capital hand you would hold!" said by Sydney Smith to an untidy card-player. Sometimes, but erroneously, ascribed to C. Lamb.

¶ We are told that it was said to J. Wolff, the missionary, and that he made answer, "Dirt, dirt! call you this dirt? What would you say if you saw my feet?"

Dirt is sometimes defined as "matter in the wrong place;" but this is absurd. A jewel may be dropped in a field or street, and is "matter in the wrong place," but certainly not dirt.

Dirty Lane, now called Abingdon Street, Westminster.

Dirty Linen. Napoleon I. said, "Il faut laver sa linge en famille."

Disastrous Peace (The), the peace signed at Cateau-Cambrésis, by which Henri II. renounced all claim to Gen'oa, Naples, Mil'an, and Corsica (1559).

Dis'mas, the penitent thief; Gesmas, the impenitent one. (See DESMAS, p. 273.)

> Impariibus meritis pendent tria corpora ramis:
> Dismas et Gesmas, media est Divina Potestas;
> Alta petit Dismas, infelix infima Gesmas;
> Nos et res nostras conservet Summa Potestas.
> Hos versus dicas, ne tu furto tua perdas.
> A Latin Charm.

Disney Professor, a chair in the University of Cambridge, founded by John Disney, Esq., of The Hyde, Ingatestone, for Archæology (1851).

Disowned (The), a novel by lord Lytton (1828).

Dispensary (The), a poem in six cantos by sir S. Garth (1690). In defence of an edict passed by the College of Physicians in 1687, requiring medical men to give their services gratuitously to the poor.

Distaffi'na, the troth-plight wife of General Bombastês; but Artaxaminous, king of Utopia, promised her "half a crown" if she would forsake the general for himself—a temptation too great to be resisted. When the general found himself jilted, he retired from the world, hung up his boots on the branch of a tree, and dared any one to remove them. The king cut the boots down, and the general cut the king down. Fusbos, coming up at this crisis, laid the general prostrate. At the close of the burlesque all the dead men jump up and join the dance, promising "to die again to-morrow," if the audience desires it.—Rhodes: Bombastes Furioso (1790).

Falling on one knee, he put both hands on his heart and rolled up his eyes, much after the manner of Bombastes Furioso making love to Distaffina.—Sargent.

Distaff's Day (St.), January 7; so called because the Christmas festivities terminate on "Twelfth Day," and on the day following the women used to return to their distaffs or daily occupations.

 Also called Rock Day, "rock" being another name for a distaff.

Distressed Mother (The), a tragedy by Ambrose Philips (1712). The "distressed mother" is Androm'achê, Hector's wife. (See ANDROMACHE, p. 43.)

Ditchley (Gaffer), one of the miners employed by sir Geoffrey Peveril.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Dithyrambic Poetry (Father of), Arion of Lesbos (fl. B.C. 625).

Ditton (Thomas), footman of the Rev. Mr. Staunton, of Willingham Rectory.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Divan (The), the supreme council and court of justice of the caliphs. The abbassides (3 syl.) always sat in person in this court to aid in the redress of wrongs. It was called a "divan" from the benches covered with cushions on which the members sat.—D'Herbelot: Bibliothèque Orientale, 298.

Dive [deev], a demon in Persian mythology. In the mogul's palace at Lahore, there used to be several pictures of these dives (1 syl.), with long horns, staring eyes, shaggy hair, great fangs, ugly paws, long tails, and other horrible deformities. I remember seeing them exhibited at King's College in one of the soirées given there after the Indian Mutiny.

Diver (Colonel), editor of the New York Rowdy Journal, in America. His air was that of a man oppressed by a sense of his own greatness, and his physiognomy was a map of cunning and conceit.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Diversions of Purley (The), ἐπεα πτεροεντα (pronounced epe-ap'tero-en'ta) by J. Horne Tooke (1786, 1805). Called Purley from William Tooke, who lived at Purley (Reading), a great benefactor of the author. The idea developed in this treatise is that all words were originally objective. Thus to harrow (to torment) is from the farmer's harrow, which is the Greek word ἀρόω and Latin aro. Many are on'omat'o-poet'ic, i.e. words expressive of natural sounds, as roar, hiss, etc.

Di'ves (2 syl.), the name popularly given to the "rich man" in our Lord's parable of the rich man and Lazarus; in Latin, Divês et Lazarus.—Luke xvi.

Divide and Govern, a maxim of Machiavelli of Florence (1469–1527).

Divi'na Comme'dia, the first poem of note ever written in the Italian language. It is an epic by Danté Alighie'ri, and is divided into three parts: Inferno (1300), Purgatory (1308), and Paradise (1311). Danté called it a comedy, because the ending is happy; and his countrymen added the word divine from admiration of the poem. The poet depicts a vision, in which he is conducted, first by Virgil (human reason) through hell and purgatory; and then by Beatrice (revelation) and finally by St. Bernard through the several heavens, where he beholds the Triune God.

"Hell" is represented as a funnel-shaped hollow, formed of gradually contracting circles, the lowest and smallest of which is the earth's centre. (See INFERNO.)

"Purgatory" is a mountain rising solitarily from the ocean on that side of the earth which is opposite to us. It is divided into terraces, and its top is the terrestrial paradise. (See PURGATORY.)

From this "top" the poet ascends through the seven planetary heavens, the fixed stars, and the "primum mobilé," to the empyre'an or seat of God. (See PARADISE.)

English translations, in verse, of Dante's famous epics: Boyd, 1785; Caley (in tertiary rhymes, like the original), 1851-53; Carey (blank verse, good), 1814; Dayman, 1865; Ford, 1851; Longfellow, 1870; George Musgrave, The Inferno (in Spenserian verse, good), 1893; Mrs. Oliphant, 1877; Pollock (blank verse), 1854; Rossetti (The Inferno), 1865; Wright (triple rhyme, good), 1833, etc. Dr. John Carlyle translated into prose the "Inferno," with excellent notes.

Divine. Raphael, the painter, was called Il Divino (1483-1520).

Luis Moralês, a Spanish painter, was called El Divino (1509-1586).

Ferdinand de Herre'ra, a Spanish poet (1516-1595).

Divine (John the), supposed to be John the evangelist.

One great objection is this: In the Fourth Gospel the author does not name himself; in the Revelation he does so several times.

Another objection is that the vocabulary and swing of sentences in the Greek of the two books are very different This would be felt especially if a person were to read them both in one and the same day.

Divine Doctor (The), Jean de Ruysbroek, the mystic (1294-1381).

Divine Emblems, the chief work of Francis Quarles, once immensely popular. He wrote several sacred poems.

Divine Legation (The), by bishop Warburton (1738). To prove that the Pentateuch must have been inspired and revealed, "because (unlike other religious systems) it is silent on the subject of a future state."

Divine Right of Kings. The dogma that Kings can do no wrong is based on a dictim of Hincmar archbishop of Rheims, viz. that "kings are subject to no man so long as they rule by God's law."—Hincmar's Works, i. 693.

Divine Speaker (The). Tyr'tamos, usually known as Theophrastos ("divine speaker"), was so called by Aristotle (B.C. 370-287).

Divining Rod, a forked branch of hazel, suspended between the balls of the thumbs. The inclination of this rod indicates the presence of water-springs and precious metals.

Now to rivulets from the mountains
Point the rods of fortune-tellers.
Longfellow: Drinking Song.

 Jacques Aymar of Crôle was the most famous of all diviners. He lived in the latter half of the seventeenth century and the beginning of the eighteenth. His marvellous faculty attracted the attention of Europe. M. Chauvin, M.D., and M. Garnier, M.D., published carefully written accounts of his wonderful powers, and both were eye-witnesses thereof. (See S. Baring-Gould's Myths of the Middle Ages.)

Divinity. There are four professors of divinity at Cambridge, and three at Oxford. Those at Cambridge are the Hul'sean, the Margaret, the Norrisian, and the Regius. Those at Oxford are the Margaret, the Regius, and one for Ecclesiastical History.

Divi'no Lodov'ico, Ariosto, author of Orlando Furioso (1474-1533).

Dix'ie's Land, the land of milk and honey to American niggers. Dixie was a slave-holder of Manhattan Island, who removed his slaves to the Southern States, where they had to work harder and fare worse; so that they were always sighing for their old home, which they called "Dixie's Land." Imagination and distance soon advanced this island into a sort of Delectable Country or Land of Beulah.

Dixon, servant to Mr. Richard Vere (1 syl.).—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Dizzy, a nickname of Benjamin Disraeli, earl of Beaconsfield (1805-1881).

Dja'bal, son of Youssof, a sheikh, saved by Maä'ni in the great massacre of the sheikhs by the Knights Hospitallers in the Spo'radês. (See DRUSES, p. 302.)

Djin'nestan', the realm of the djinn or genii of Oriental mythology.

Dobbin (Captain afterwards Colonel), son of sir William Dobbin, a London tradesman. Uncouth, awkward, and tall, with huge feet; but faithful and loving, with a large heart and most delicate appreciation. He is a prince of a fellow, is proud, fond of captain George Osborne from boyhood to death, and adores Amelia, George's wife. When she has been a widow for some ten years, he marries her.—Thackeray: Vanity Fair (1848).

Dobbins (Humphrey), the confidential servant of sir Robert Bramble of Blackberry Hall, in the county of Kent. A blunt old retainer, most devoted to his master. Under a rough exterior he concealed a heart brimful of kindness, and so tender that a word would melt it.—Colman, Jun.: The Poor Gentleman (1802).

Dobu'ni, called Bodu'ni by Dio; the people of Gloucestershire and Oxfordshire. Drayton refers to them in his Polyolbion, xvi. (1613).

Doctor (The), a romance by Southey. The doctor's name is Dove, and his horse "Nobbs."

Doctor (The Admirable), Roger Bacon (1214–1292).

The Angelic Doctor, Thomas Aqui'nas (1224–1274), "fifth doctor of the Church."

The Authentic Doctor, Gregory of Rimini (*–1357).

The Divine Doctor, Jean Ruysbroek (1294–1381).

The Dulciſluous Doctor, Antonio Andreas (*–1320).

The Ecstatic Doctor, Jean Ruysbroek (1294–1381).

The Eloquent Doctor, Peter Aureolus, archbishop of Aix (fourteenth century).

The Evangelical Doctor, J. Wycliffe (1324–1384).

The Illuminated Doctor, Raymond Lully (1235–1315), or Most Enlightened Doctor.

The Invincible Doctor, William Occam (1276–1347).

The Irrefragable Doctor, Alexander Hales (*–1245).

The Melliſluous Doctor, St. Bernard (1091–1153).

The Most Christian Doctor, Jean de Gerson (1363–1429).

The Most Methodical Doctor, John Bassol (*–1347).

The Most Profound Doctor, Ægidius de Colonna (1247–1316).

The Most Resolute Doctor, Durand de St. Pourçain (1267–1332).

The Perspicuous Doctor, Walter Burley (fourteenth century).

The Profound Doctor, Thomas Bradwardine (*–1349).

The Scholastic Doctor, Anselm of Laon (1050–1117).

The Seraphic Doctor, St. Bonaventura (1221–1274).

The Singular Doctor, William Occam (1276–1347).

The Solemn Doctor, Henry Goethals (1227–1293).

The Solid Doctor, Richard Middleton (*–1304).

The Subtle Doctor, Duns Scotus (1265–1308), or Most Subtle Doctor.

The Thorough Doctor, William Varro (thirteenth century).

The Universal Doctor, Alain de Lille (1114–1203); and Thomas Aquinas (1224–1274).

The Venerable Doctor, William de Champeaux (*–1126).

The Well-founded Doctor, Ægidius Romanus (1247–1316).

The Wise Doctor, John Herman Wessel (1409–1489).

The Wonderful Doctor, Roger Bacon (1214–1292).

Dr. Slop. (See SLOP.)

Dr. Squintum. (See SQUINTUM.)

Doctor's Tale (The), in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, is the Roman story of Virginius given by Livy. This story is told in French in the Roman de la Rose, ii. 74, and by Gower in his Confessio Amantis, vii. It has furnished the subject of a host of tragedies: for example, in French, Mairét (1628); Leclerc (1645); Campestron (1683); Chabanon (1769); Laharpe (1786); Leblanc de Guillet (1786); Guiraud (1827); Latour St. Ybars (1845). In Italian, Alfieri (1784); in German, Lessing (1775); and in English, Knowles (1829).

Doctor's Wife (The), a novel by Miss Braddon, adapted from Madame Bovary, a French novel.

Doctors of the Church. The Greek Church recognizes four doctors, viz. St. Athanāsius, St. Basil, St. Gregory of Nyssa, and St. John Chrysostom. The Latin Church recognizes St. Augustin, St. Jerome, St. Ambrose, and St. Gregory the Great.

(For all other doctors, see under the proper name or nickname.)

Dodger (The Artful), the sobriquet of Jack Dawkins, an artful, thievish young scamp, in the boy crew of Fagin the Jew villain.—Dickens: Oliver Twist, viii. (1837).

Dodgson, a voluble and crafty lawyer, who tries to bring up a second candidate in the interest of the "Blue Lambs," the rival faction of the "Green Lions."—Tom Taylor: The Contested Election (1866).

Dodington, whom Thomson invokes in his Summer, is George Bubb Dodington, lord Melcomb-Regis, a British statesman. Churchill and Pope ridiculed him, while Hogarth introduced him in his picture called the "Orders of Periwigs."

Dod'ipoll (Dr.), any man of weak intellect, a dotard. Hence the proverb, Wise as Dr. Dodipoll, meaning "not wise at all."

Dodman or Doddiman. A snail is so called in Norfolk and Suffolk.

"I'm a regular dodman, I am," said Mr. Peggotty—by which he meant "snail."—Dickens: David Copperfield, vii. (1849).

Doddiman, doddiman, put out your horns,
For here comes a thief to steal your corns.
Common Popular Rhyme in Norfolk.

Dodon or rather Dodoens (Rembert), a Dutch botanist (1517-1585), physician to the emperors Maximilian II. and Randolph II. His works are Frumentorum et Leguminum Historia; Florum Historia; Purgantium Radicum et Herbarum Historia; Stirpium Historia; all included under the general title of "The History of Plants."

Of these most helpful herbs yet tell we but a few,
To those unnumbered sorts, of simples here that grew,
Which justly to set down e'en Dodon short doth fall.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Dodo'na (in Epiros), famous for the most ancient oracle in Greece. The responses were made by an old woman called a pigeon, because the Greek word peliæ means either "old women" or "pigeons." According to fable, Zeus gave his daughter Thēbē two black pigeons endowed with the gift of human speech: one flew into Libya, and gave the responses in the temple of Amnon; the other into Epiros, where it gave the responses in Dodo'na.

N.B.—We are told that the priestess of Dodona derived her answers from the cooing of the sacred doves, the rustling of the sacred trees, the bubbling of the sacred fountain, and the tinkling of bells or pieces of metal suspended among the branches of the trees.

And Dodona's oak swang lonely
Henceforth to the tempest only.
Mrs. Browning: Dead Pan, 17.

Dods (Meg), landlady of the Clachan, or Mowbery Arms inn at St. Ronan's Old Town. The inn was once the manse, and Meg Dods reigned there despotically, but her wines were good and her cuisine excellent. This is one of the best low comic characters in the whole range of fiction.

She had hair of a brindled colour, betwixt black and grey, which was apt to escape in elf-locks from under her mutch when she was thrown into violent agitation; long skinny hands terminated by stout talons, grey eyes, thin lips, a robust person, a broad though fat chest, capital wind, and a voice that could match a choir of fishwomen.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well, i. (time, George III.).

N.B.—So good a housewife was this eccentric landlady, that a cookery-book has been published bearing her name; the authoress is Mrs. Johnstone, a Scotchwoman.

Dodson, a young farmer, called upon by Death on his wedding-day. Death told him he must quit his Susan, and go with him. "With you!" the hapless husband cried; "young as I am, and unprepared?" Death then told him he would not disturb him yet, but would call again after giving him three warnings. When he was 80 years of age, Death called again. "So soon returned?" old Dodson cried. "You know you promised me three warnings." Death then told him that as he was "lame and deaf and blind," he had received his three warnings.—Mrs. Thrale [Piozzi]: The Three Warnings.

Dodson and Fogg (Messrs.), two unprincipled lawyers, who undertake on speculation to bring an action against Mr. Pickwick for "breach of promise," and file accordingly the famous suit of "Bardell v. Pickwick."—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Doe (John) and Richard Roe, substitutional names for plaintiff and defendant in an action of ejectment. Abolished in 1852.

Doeg, Saul's herdsman, who told him that the priest Abim'elech had supplied David with food; whereupon the king sent him to kill Abimelech, and Doeg slew priests to the number of four score and five (1 Samuel xxii. 18). In pt. ii. of the satire called Absalom and Achitophel (1682), Elkanch Settle is called Doeg, because he "fell upon" Dryden with his pen, but was only a "herdsman or driver of asses."

Doeg, tho' without knowing how or why,
Made still a blundering kind of melody . . .
Let him rail on . . .
[But] if he fumbles to one line of sense,
Indict him of a capital offence.
Tate: Absalom and Achitophel, ii. 411-449.

Dog (Agrippa's). Cornelius Agrippa had a dog which was generally suspected of being a spirit incarnate.

Arthur's Dog, "Cavall."

Dog of Belgrade, the camp-suttler, was named "Clumsey."

Of Bloomfield's Farmer's Boy, "Trowneer."

Lord Byron's Dog, "Boatswain." It was buried in the garden of Newstead Abbey.

Dog of Catherine de Medicis, "Phœbê," a lap-dog.

Of Chaucer's Nun's Priest's Tale, "Colle," "Gerland," and "Talbot."

Cuthullin's Dog was named "Luath," a swift-footed hound.

In Don Quixote, "Barcino," "Buton," and "Towzer."

Dora's Dog, "Jip."—Dickens: David Copperfield.

Of Elisabeth queen of Bohemia, "Apollon."

Erigonê's Dog was "Mœra." Erigonê is the constellation Virgo, and Mœra the star called Canis.

Eurytion's Dog (herdsman of Geryon), "Orthros." It had two heads.

Fingal's Dog was named "Bran."

Geryon's Dogs. One was "Gargittos" and the other "Orthros." The latter was brother of Cerbĕros, but it had only two heads. Herculês killed both of them.

Hogarth's Pug, "Trump."

Landseer's Dog, "Brutus." Introduced by the great animal-painter in his picture called "The Invader of the Larder."

Llewellyn's Dog was named "Gelert;" it was a greyhound. (See GELERT.)

Lord Lurgan's Dog was named "Master M'Grath," from an orphan boy who reared it. This dog won three Waterloo cups, and was presented at court by the express desire of queen Victoria, the very year it died. It was a sporting greyhound (1866–1871, died Christmas Day).

Maria's Dog, "Silvio."—Sterne: Sentimental Journey.

Marlow's, "Bungey."

Newton's (Sir Isaac), "Diamond." (See NEWTON AND HIS DOG.)

Dog of Montargis. This was a dog named "Dragon," belonging to Aubri de Montdidier, a captain in the French army. Aubri was murdered in the forest of Bondy by his friend, lieutenant Macaire, in the same regiment. After its master's death, the dog showed such a strange aversion to Macaire, that suspicion was aroused against him. Some say he was pitted against the dog, and confessed the crime. Others say a sash was found on him, and the sword-knot was recognized by Ursula as her own work and gift to Aubri. This Macaire then confessed the crime, and his accomplice, lieutenant Landry, trying to escape, was seized by the dog and bitten to death. This story was dramatized in French by Pixérécourt (1814), and rendered into English.

¶ Hesiod, the Greek poet, was murdered by the sons of Ganictor, and the body thrown into the sea. When washed ashore, the poet's dog discovered the murderers, and they were put to death.

Orion's Dogs; one was named "Arctoph'onos" and the other "Pto-ophagos."

Pope's Dog was called "Bounce."

Punch's Dog, "Toby."

Richard II.'s greyhound, "Mathe,' forsook Richard, and attached itself to Bolingbroke.—Shakespeare: Henry IV.

Roderick the Goth's Dog was called "Theron."

Prince Rupert's Dog was called "Boy." He was killed in the battle of Marston Moor.

Sir W. Scott's Dogs. His deer-hound was "Maida." His jet-black greyhound was "Hamlet." He had also two Dandy Dinmont terriers.

Dog of the Seven Sleepers, "Katmîr." It spoke with a human voice,

In Sleary's circus, the performing dog is called "Merryleys."—Dickens: Hard Times.

Tristan's Dog was called "Leon."

(For Actæon's fifty dogs, see Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 364.)

Dog. The famous mount St. Bernard dog which saved forty human beings, was named "Barry." The stuffed skin of this noble creature is preserved in the museum at Berne.

Dog (The), Diogĕnês the cynic (B.C. 412–323). When Alexander encountered him, the young Macedonian king introduced himself with the words, "I am Alexander, surnamed 'the Great.'" To which the philosopher replied, "And I am Diogĕnês, surnamed 'the Dog.'" The Athenians raised to his memory a pillar of Parian marble, surmounted with a dog, and bearing the following inscription:—

"Say, dog, what guard you in that tomb?"
A dog. "His name?" Diogenês. "From far?"
Sinôpê. "He who made a tub his home?"
The same; now dead, among the stars a star. E.C.B.

The Thracian Dog, Zo'îlus the grammarian; so called for his snarling, captious criticisms on Homer, Plato, and Iso'cratês. Contemporary with Philip of Macedon.

Dog at Kew. Pope gave a dog to Frederick prince of Wales, and had two lines engraved on the collar—

I am his Highness' dog at Kew;
Pray tell me, sir, whose dog are you?

Dog enclosed in a Nutshell (The) was named "Tonton."

Dog's Nose, gin and beer.

"He is not certain whether he did not twice a week, for 20 years, taste dog's nose, which your committee find, upon inquiry, to be compounded of warm porter, moist sugar, gin, and nutmeg."—Dickens: Pickwick, ch. xxxiii.

Cold as a dog's nose.

There sprung a leak in Noah's ark,
Which made the dog begin to bark;
Noah took his nose to stop the hole,
And hence his nose is always cold.
Notes and Queries, February 4, 1871.

Dogs were supposed by the ancient Gaels to be sensible of their masters' death, however far they might be separated.

The mother of Culmin remains in the hall . . . his dogs are howling in their place. . . . "Art thou fallen, my fair-headed son, in Erin's dismal war?"—Ossian: Temora, v.

Dogs. The two sisters of Zobeïdê (3 syl.) were turned into little black dogs for casting Zobeidê and "the prince" into the sea. (See ZOBEIDE.)

Dogs mentioned by Authors.

In Auton's Ballads, "Hector" (young Bekie).

In the Odyssey of Homer mention is made of the dog "Argus."

Shakespeare names several dogs: Thus we have, in the Induction of Taming of the Shrew, mention made of "Belman," "Clowder," "Echo," and "Merryman." In The Tempest, of "Fury," "Mountain," "Silver," and "Tyrant." In the Two Gentlemen of Verona, of the dog "Crab."

The dog Tray, i.e. Trag = runner (British).

Non sibi, sed domino venătur ver-tragus acer
Illæsum leporem qui tibi dente feret.
Martial.

("Ver-tragus," i.e. ver-tray, "very swift." And many others.)

Dogs of War, Famine, Sword, and Fire.

Then should the warlike Harry, like himself,
Assume the port of Mars; and at his heels,
Leashed in like hounds, should Famine, Sword, and Fire
Crouch for employment.
Shakespeare: King Henry V. 1 chorus (1599).

Dog-headed Tribes (of India), mentioned in the Italian romance of Gueri'no Meschi'no.

Dog-rose (Greek, kuno-rodon). So called because it was supposed to cure the bite of mad dogs.

A morsu vero [i.e. of a mad dog] unicum remedium osculo quodam nuper repertum, radix sylvestris rosæ quæ[nunc]cynorrhodos appellatur.—Pliny: Hist. Nat., viii. 83; see also xxv. 6.

Dogberry and Verges, two ignorant conceited constables, who greatly confound their words. Dogberry calls "assembly" dissembly; "treason" he calls perjury; "calumny" he calls burglary; "condemnation," redemption; "respect," suspect. When Conrade says, "Away! you are an ass;" Dogberry tells the town clerk to write him down "an ass." "Masters," he says to the officials, "remember I am an ass." "Oh that I had been writ down an ass!" (act iv. sc. 2). —Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing (1600).

Dogget, wardour at the castle of Garde Doloureuse.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Dogget's Coat and Badge, the great prize in the Thames rowing-match, given on the 1st of August every year. So called from Thomas Dogget, an actor of Drury Lane, who signalized the accession of George I. to the throne by giving annually a waterman's coat and badge to the winner of the race. The Fishmongers' Company add a guinea to the prize.

Doiley (Abraham), a citizen and retired slop-seller. He was a charity boy, wholly without education, but made £80,000 in trade, and was determined to have "a larned skollard for his son-in-law." He speaks of jomtry [geometry], joklate, jogrify, Al Mater, pinny-forty, and antikary doctors; talks of Scratchi [Gracchi], Horsi [Horatii], a study of horses, and so on. Being resolved to judge between the rival scholarship of an Oxford pedant and a captain in the army, he gets both to speak Greek before him. Gradus, the scholar, quotes two lines of Greek, in which the word panta occurs four times. "Pantry!" cries the old slop-seller; "you can't impose upon me. I know pantry is not Greek." The captain tries English fustian, and when Gradus maintains that the words are English, "Out upon you for a jackanapes!" cries the old man; "as if I di'n't know my own mother-tongue!" and gives his verdict in favour of the captain.

Elizabeth Doiley, daughter of the old slop-seller, in love with captain Granger. She and her cousin Charlotte induce the Oxford scholar to dress like a beau to please the ladies. By so doing he disgusts the old man, who exclaims, "Oh that I should ever have been such a dolt as to take thee for a man of larnen'!" So the captain wins the race at a canter.—Mrs. Cowley: Who's the Dupe?

Dolabella, a friend of Mark Antony, in love with Cleopatra. Handsome, valiant, young, and "looked as he were laid for nature's bait to catch weak woman's eyes."—Dryden: All for Love, iv. 1 (1670).

Doll Common, a young woman in league with Subtle the alchemist, and with Face his ally.—Ben Jonson: The Alchemist (1610).

Mrs. Pritchard [1711-1768] could pass from "lady Macbeth" to "Doll Common."—Leigh Hunt.

Doll Tearsheet, a "bona-roba." This virago is cast into prison with Dame Quickly (hostess of a tavern in East-cheap), for the death of a man that they and Pistol had beaten.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. (1598).

Dollallolla (Queen), wife of king Arthur, very fond of stiff punch, but scorning "vulgar sips of brandy, gin, and rum." She is the enemy of Tom Thumb, and opposes his marriage with her daughter Huncamunca; but when Noodle announces that the red cow has devoured the pigmy giant-queller, she kills the messenger for his ill tidings, and is herself killed by Frizaletta. Queen Dollallolla is jealous of the giantess Glundalca, at whom his majesty casts "sheep's eyes."—Tom Thumb, by Fielding the novelist (1730), altered by O'Hara, author of Midas (1778).

Dolla Murrey, a character in Crabbe's Borough. She died playing cards.

"A vole! a vole!" she cried; "'tis fairly won."
This said, she gently with a single sigh
Died.
Crabbe: Borough (1810).

Dolly of the Chop-house (Queen's Head Passage, Paternoster Row and Newgate Street, London). Her celebrity arose from the excellency of her provisions, attendance, accommodation, and service. The name is that of the old cook of the establishment.

The broth reviving, and the bread was fair,
The small beer grateful and as pepper strong,
The beef-steaks tender, and the pot-herbs young.

Dolly Trull. Captain Macheath says she was "so taken up with stealing hearts, she left herself no time to steal anything else."—Gay: The Beggar's Opera, ii. 1 (1727).

Dolly Varden, daughter of Gabriel Varden, locksmith. She was loved to distraction by Joe Willet, Hugh of the Maypole inn, and Simon Tappertit. Dolly dressed in the Watteau style, and was lively, pretty, and bewitching.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Dolman, a light-blue loose-fitting jacket, braided across the front with black silk frogs, and embroidered from the cuffs almost to the shoulders with gold lace of three rows interwoven. It is used as the summer jacket of the Algerian native troops. The winter jacket is called a "pelisse."

Dol'on, "a man of subtle wit and wicked mind," father of Guizor (groom of Pollentê the Saracen, lord of "Parlous Bridge"). Sir Ar'tegal, with scant ceremony, knocks the life out of Guizor, for demanding of him "passage-penny" for crossing the bridge. Soon afterwards, Brit'omart and Talus rest in Dolon's castle for the night, and Dolon, mistaking Britomart for sir Artegal, sets upon her in the middle of the night, but is overmastered. He now runs with his two surviving sons to the bridge, to prevent the passage of Britomart and Talus; but Britomart runs one of them through with her spear, and knocks the other into the river.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 6 (1596).

Dol'on and Ulysses. Dolon undertook to enter the Greek camp and bring back to Hector an exact account of everything. Accordingly he put on a wolf's skin and prowled about the camp on all-fours. Ulysses saw through the disguise, and said to Diomed, "Yonder man is from the host . . . we'll let him pass a few paces, and then pounce on him unexpectedly." They soon caught the fellow, and having "pumped" out of him all about the Trojan plans, and the arrival of Rhesus, Diomed smote him with his falchion on the mid-neck and slew him. This is the subject of bk. x. of the Iliad, and therefore this book is called "Dolonia" ("the deeds of Dolon") or "Dŏlophon'ia" ("Dolon's murder").

Full of cunning, like Ulysses' whisle
When he allured poor Dolon.
Byron: Don Juan, xiii. 105 (1824).

Dolopa'tos, the Sicilian king, who placed his son Lucien under the charge of "seven wise masters." When grown to man's estate, Lucien's stepmother made improper advances to him, which he repulsed; and she accused him to the king of insulting her. By astrology the prince discovered that if he could tide over seven days his life would be saved; so the wise masters amused the king with seven tales, and the king relented. The prince himself then told a tale which embodied his own history; the eyes of the king were opened, and the queen was condemned to death.—Sandabar's Parables (French version).

Dombey (Mr.), a purse-proud, self-contained London merchant, living in Portland Place, Bryanstone Square, with offices in the City. His god was wealth; and his one ambition was to have a son, that the firm might be known as "Dombey and Son." When Paul was born, his ambition was attained, his whole heart was in the boy, and the loss of the mother was but a small matter. The boy's death turned his heart to stone, and he treated his daughter Florence not only with utter indifference, but as an actual interloper. Mr. Dombey married a second time; but his wife eloped with his manager, James Carker, and the proud spirit of the merchant was brought low.

Paul Dombey, son of Mr. Dombey; a delicate, sensitive little boy, quite unequal to the great things expected of him. He was sent to Dr. Blimber's school, but soon gave way under the strain of school discipline. In his short life he won the love of all who knew him, and his sister Florence was especially attached to him. His death is beautifully told. During his last days he was haunted by the sea, and was always wondering what the wild waves were saying.

Florence Dombey, Mr. Dombey's daughter; a pretty, amiable, motherless child, who incurred her father's hatred because she lived and thrived while her younger brother, Paul, dwindled and died. Florence hungered to be loved, but her father had no love to bestow on her. She married Walter Gay, and when Mr. Dombey was broken in spirit by the elopement of his second wife, his grandchildren were the solace of his old age.—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Dom-Daniel originally meant a public school for magic, established at Tunis; but what is generally understood by the word is that immense establishment, near Tunis, under the "roots of the ocean," established by Haf-il-Mau'graby, and completed by his son. There were four entrances to it, each of which had a staircase of 4000 steps; and magicians, gnomes, and sorcerers of every sort were expected to do homage there at least once a year to Zatanai [Satan]. Dom-Daniel was utterly destroyed by prince Habed-il-Rouman, son of the caliph of Syria. — Continuation of the Arabian Nights ("History of Maugraby").

Southey has made the destruction of Dom-Daniel the subject of his Thalaba—in fact, Thalaba takes the office of Habed-il-Rouman; but the general incidents of the two tales have no other resemblance to each other.

Domestic Poet (The), William Cowper (1731-1800).

Domestic Poultry, in Dryden's Hind and Panther, mean the Roman Catholic clergy; so called from an establishment of priests in the private chapel of Whitehall. The nuns are termed "sister partlet with the hooded head" (1687).

Dom'ine Stekan (corruption of Dominus tecum, "the Lord be with thee"). A witch, being asked how she contrived to kill all the children of a certain family in infancy, replied, "Easily enough. When the infant sneezes, nobody says, 'Domine stekan,' and then I become mistress of the child."—Rev. W. Webster: Basque Legends, 73 (1877).

Dominick, the "Spanish fryar," a kind of ecclesiastical Falstaff. A most immoral, licentious Dominican, who for money would prostitute even the Church and Holy Scriptures. Dominick helped Lorenzo in his amour with Elvi'ra the wife of Gomez.

> He is a huge, fat, religious gentleman . . . big enough to be a pope. His gills are as rosy as a turkey-cock's. His big belly walks in state before him, like a harbinger; and his gouty legs come limping after it. Never was such a tun of devotion seen.—Dryden: The Spanish Fryar, ii. 3 (1680).

Dominie Sampson; his Christian name is Abel. He is the tutor at Ellangowan House, very poor, very modest, and crammed with Latin quotations. His constant exclamation is "Prodigious!"

> Dominie Sampson is a poor, modest, humble scholar, who had won his way through the classics, but fallen to the leeward in the voyage of life.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Dom'inique (3 syl.), the gossiping old footman of the Franvals, who fancies himself quite fit to keep a secret. He is, however, a really faithful retainer of the family.—Holcroft: The Deaf and Dumb (1785).

Domitian a Marksman. The emperor Domitian was so cunning a marksman, that if a boy at a good distance off held up his hand and spread out his fingers, he could shoot through the spaces without touching the boy's hand or any one of his fingers. (See TELL, for many similar marksmen.) —Peacham: Complete Gentleman (1627).

Domizia, a noble lady of Florence, greatly embittered against the republic for its base ingratitude to her two brothers, Porzio and Berto, whose death she hoped to revenge.

I am a daughter of the Traversari,
Sister of Porzio and Berto both . . .
I knew that Florence, that could doubt their faith,
Must needs mistrust a stranger's; holding back
Reward from them, must hold back his reward.
R. Browning: Luria, iii.

Don Alphonso, son of a rich banker. In love with Victoria, the daughter of don Scipio; but Victoria marries don Fernando. Lorenzo, who went by the name of Victoria for a time, and is the person don Alphonso meant to marry, espouses don Cæsar.—O'Keefe: Castle of Andalusia (1798).

Don Juan. (See JUAN.)

Don Quixote, a satirical romance, in ridicule of the tales of chivalry, by Cervantes (3 syl.), a Spaniard. Part i. in 1605; part ii. in 1615.

English translations: Duffield, 1881; Jarvis (good), 1742; Motteux, 1719; Skelton (the first, good), 1612–1620; Smollett, 1755; Wilmot, 1774; etc.
Dramatized, in 1696, by Durfey, and in 1716 by Fielding. Converted into an opera by Macfarren in 1846.

Don Sebastian. (See SEBASTIAN.)

For other "dons," see the proper name.

Donacha dhu na Dunaigh, the Highland robber near Roseneath.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Donald, the Scotch steward of Mr. Mordent. Honest, plain-spoken, faithful, and unflinching in his duty.—Holcroft: The Deserted Daughter (1785, altered into The Steward).

Donald, an old domestic of MacAulay, the Highland chief.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Donald of the Hammer, son of the laird of Invernahyle of the West Highlands of Scotland. When Green Colin assassinated the laird and his household, the infant Donald was saved by his foster-nurse, and afterwards brought up by her husband, a blacksmith. He became so strong that he could work for hours with two fore-hammers, one in each hand, and was therefore called Donuil nan Ord. When he was 21 he marched with a few adherents against Green Colin, and slew him; by which means he recovered his paternal inheritance.

Donald of the smithy, the "son of the hammer,"
Filled the banks of Lochawe with mourning and clamour.
Quoted by sir Walter Scott, in Tales of a Grandfather, i. 39.

Donar, same as Thor (q.v.), the god of thunder among the ancient Teutons.

Donation of Pepin. When Pepin conquered Ataulf (Adolphus), the exarchate of Ravenna fell into his hands. Pepin gave the pope both the ex-archate and the republic of Rome; and this munificent gift is the world-famous "Donation of Pepin," on which rested the whole fabric of the temporal power of the popes (A.D. 755). Victor Emmanuel, king of Italy, dispossessed the pope of his temporal sovereignty, and added the papal states to the united kingdom of Italy, over which he reigned (1870).

Dondasch', an Oriental giant, contemporary with Seth, to whose service he was attached. He needed no weapons, because he could destroy anything by his muscular force.

Don'egild (3 syl.), the wicked mother of Alla king of Northumberland. Hating Custance because she was a Christian, Donegild set her adrift with her infant son. When Alla returned from Scotland, and discovered this act of cruelty, he put his mother to death; then going to Rome on a pilgrimage, met his wife and child, who had been brought there a little time previously.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Man of Law's Tale," 1388).

Don'et, the first grammar put into the hands of scholars. It was that of Dona'tus the grammarian, who taught in Rome in the fourth century, and was the preceptor of St. Jerome. When "Graunde Amour" was sent to study under lady Gramer, she taught him, as he says—

First my donet, and then my accedence.
Hawes: The Pastime of Pleasure, v. (time, Henry VII.).

Doni'ca, only child of the lord of Ar'kinlow (an elderly man). Young Eb'erhard loved her, and the Finnish maiden was betrothed to him. Walking one evening by the lake, Donica heard the sound of the death-spectre, and fell lifeless in the arms of her lover. Presently the dead maiden received a supernatural vitality, but her cheeks were wan, her lips livid, her eyes lustreless, and her lap-dog howled when it saw her. Eberhard still resolved to marry her, and to church they went. But when he took Donica's hand into his own it was cold and clammy; the demon fled from her, and the body dropped a corpse at the feet of the bridegroom.—Southey: Donica (a Finnish ballad).

Donnerhu'gel (Rudolph), one of the Swiss deputies to Charles "the Bold," duke of Burgundy. He was cousin of the sons of Arnold Biederman the landamman of Unterwalden (alias count Arnold of Geierstein).

Theodore Donnerhugel, uncle of Rudolph. He was page to the former baron of Arnheim [Arn hime].—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Donnithorne (Arthur), in love with Hetty Sorrel. In George Eliot's novel of Adam Bede (1859).

Donovan, lord Rosebery's celebrated horse, was named from "Donovan," the hero of Edna Lyall's novel so called.

Do'ny, Florimel's dwarf.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 5 and iv. 2 (1590, 1596).

Donzel del Fe'bo (El), the Knight of the Sun, a Spanish romance in The Mirror of Knighthood. He was "most excellently fair," and a "great wanderer;" hence he is alluded to as "that wandering knight so fair."

Doo'lin of Mayence (2 syl.), the hero and title of an old French romance of chivalry. He was ancestor of Ogier the Dane. His sword was called Merveilleuse ("wonderful").

Doomsday Sedgwick, William Sedgwick, a fanatical "prophet" during the Commonwealth. He pretended that the time of doomsday had been revealed to him in a vision. And, going into the garden of sir Francis Russell, he denounced a party of gentlemen playing at bowls; and bade them prepare for the day of doom, which was at hand.

Doorm, an earl who tried to make Enid his handmaid; and "smote her on the cheek" because she would not welcome him. Whereupon her husband, count Geraint, started up and slew the "russet-bearded earl."—Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("Enid").

Door-Opener (The), Cratês, the Theban; so called because he used to go round Athens early of a morning, and rebuke the people for their late rising.

Dora [Spenlow], a pretty, warm-hearted little doll of a woman, with no practical views of the duties of life or the value of money. She was the "child-wife" of David Copperfield; and loved to sit by him and hold his pens while he wrote. She died, and David then married Agnes Wickfield. Dora's great pet was a dog called "Jip," which died at the same time as its mistress.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

(One of the Idylls of lord Tennyson, published in 1842, is called "Dora.")

Dora'do (El), a land of exhaustless wealth; a golden illusion. Orella'na, lieutenant of Pizarro, asserted that he had discovered a "gold country" between the Orino'co and the Am'azon, in South America. Sir Walter Raleigh twice visited Guia'na as the spot indicated, and published highly coloured accounts of its enormous wealth. (See EL DORADO, p. 318.)

Dorali'ce (4 syl.), a lady beloved by Rodomont, but who married Mandricardo—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Dor'alis, the lady-love of Rodomont king of Sarza and Algiers. She eloped with Mandricardo king of Tartary.—Bojardo: Orlando Innamorato (1495); and Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Dorante (2 syl.), a name introduced into three of Molière's comedies. In Les Fâcheux he is a courtier devoted to the chase (1661). In La Critique l'école des Femmes he is a chevalier (1662). In Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme he is a count in love with the marchioness Dorimène (3 syl.) (1670).

Doras'tus and Faunia, the hero and heroine of a popular romance by Robert Greene, published in 1588, under the title of Pandosto and the Triumph of Time. On this "history" Shakespeare founded his Winter's Tale.

Why, sir William, it is a romance, a novel, a pleasanter history by half than the loves of Dorastus and Faunia.—Bickerstaff: Love in a Village, iii. 1.

Dorax, the assumed name of don Alonzo of Alcazar, when he deserted Sebastian king of Portugal, turned renegade, and joined the emperor of Barbary. The cause of his desertion was because Sebastian gave to Henri'quez the lady Violante (4 syl.), betrothed to himself. The quarrel between Sebastian and Dorax is a masterly imitation of the quarrel and reconciliation of Brutus and Cassius in Shakespeare's Julius Cæsar.—Dryden: Don Sebastian (1690).

Like "Dorax" in the play, I submitted, "tho' with swelling heart."—Sir W. Scott.

N.B.—This quotation is not exact. It occurs in the "quarrel." Sebastian says to Dorax, "Confess, proud spirit, that better he [Henriques] deserved my love than thou." To this Dorax replies—

I must grant,
Yes, I must grant, but with a swelling soul,
Henriques had your love with more desert;
For you he fought and died; I fought against you.
Drayton: Don Sebastian (1690).

Dorcas, servant to squire Ingoldsby.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Dorcas, an old domestic at Cumnore Place.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Dorcas Society, a society for supplying the poor with clothing; so called from Dorcas, who "made clothes for the poor," mentioned in Acts ix. 39.

Doric Land, Greece, of which Doris was a part.

Thro' all the bounds
Of Doric land.
Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 519 (1665).

Doric Reed, pastoral poetry, simple and unornamented poetry; so called because everything Doric was remarkable for its chaste simplicity.

Doricourt, the fiancé of Letitia Hardy. A man of the world and the rage of the London season; he is, however, both a gentleman and a man of honour. He had made the "grand tour," and considered English beauties insipid.—Mrs. Cowley: The Belle's Stratagem (1780).

Montague Talbot [1778–1851].
He reigns o'er comedy supreme . . .
None show for light and airy sport,
So exquisite as Doricourt.
Croftón Croker.

 Doricourt is one of the dramatis personæ of The Way of the World, by Congreve (1700).

Do'ridon, a lovely swain, nature's "chiefest work," more beautiful than Narcissus, Ganimede, or Adonis.—Browne.: Britannia's Pastorals (1613).

Do'rigen, a lady of high family, who married Arvir'agus out of pity. (See ARVIRAGUS, p. 66.)

Dor'imant, a genteel, witty libertine. The original of this character was the earl of Rochester.—Etherege: The Man of Mode or Sir Fopling Flutter (1676).

The Dorimants and the lady Touchwoods, in their own sphere, do not offend my moral sense; in fact, they do not appeal to it at all.—C. Lamb.

(The "lady Touchwood" in Congreve's Double Dealer, not the "lady Frances Touchwood" in Mrs. Cowley's Belle's Stratagem, which is quite another character.)

Dor'imène (3 syl.), daughter of Alcantor, beloved by Sganarelle (3 syl.) and Lycaste (2 syl.). She loved "le jeu, les visites, les assemblés, les cadeaux, et les promenades, en un mot toutes le choses de plaisir," and wished to marry to get free from the trammels of her home. She says to Sganarelle (a man of 63), whom she promises to marry, "Nous n'aurons jamais aucun démêlé ensemble; et je ne vous contraindrai point dans vos actions, comme j'espère que vous ne me contraindrez point dans les mienne."—Molière: Le Mariage Forcé (1664).

(She had been introduced previously as the wife of Sganarelle, in the comedy of Le Cocu Imaginaire, 1660.)

Dorimène, the marchioness, in the Bourgeois Gentilhomme, by Molière (1670).

Dorin'da, the charming daughter of lady Bountiful; in love with Aimwell. She is sprightly and light-hearted, but good and virtuous also.—Farquhar. The Beaux' Stratagem (1707).

Dorine' (2 syl.), attendant of Mariane (daughter of Orgon). She ridicules the folly of the family, but serves it faithfully.—Molière: Le Tartuffe (1664).

D'Orme'o, prime minister of Victor Amade'us (4 syl.), and also of his son and successor Charles Emmanuel king of Sardinia. He took his colour from the king he served; hence under the tortuous, deceitful Victor, his policy was marked with crude rascality and duplicity; but under the truthful, single-minded Charles Emmanuel, he became straightforward and honest.—R. Browning: King Victor and King Charles, etc.

Dormer (Captain), benevolent, truthful, and courageous, candid and warm-hearted. He was engaged to Louisa Travers; but the lady was told that he was false and had married another, so she gave her hand to lord Davenant.

Marianne Dormer, sister of the captain. She married lord Davenant, who called himself Mr. Brooke; but he forsook her in three months, giving out that he was dead. Marianne, supposing herself to be a widow, married his lordship's ton.—Cumberland: The Mysterious Husband (1783).

Dormer (Caroline), the orphan daughter of a London merchant, who was once very wealthy; but he became bankrupt and died, leaving his daughter £200 a year. This annuity, however, she loses through the knavery of her man of business. When reduced to penury, her old lover, Henry Morland (supposed to have perished at sea), makes his appearance and marries her, by which she becomes the lady Duberly.—Colman: The Heir-at-Law (1797).

Dornton (Mr.), a great banker, who adores his son Harry. He tries to be stern with him when he sees him going the road to ruin, but is melted by a kind word.

Joseph Munden [1758-1832] was the original representative of "Old Dornton" and a host of other characters.—Memoir (1832).

Harry Dornton, son of the above. A noble-hearted fellow, spoilt by over-indulgence. He becomes a regular rake, loses money at Newmarket, and goes post-speed on the road to ruin, led astray by Jack Milford. So great is his extravagance, that his father becomes a bankrupt; but Sulky (his partner in the bank) comes to the rescue. Harry marries Sophia Freelove, and both father and son are saved from ruin.—Holcroft: The Road to Ruin (1792).

Dorober'nia, Canterbury.

DOROTHE'A, of Andalusi'a, daughter of Cleonardo (an opulent vassal of the duke Ricardo). She was married to don Fernando, the duke's younger son, who deserted her for Lucinda (the daughter of an opulent gentleman), engaged to Cardenio, her equal in rank and fortune. When the wedding day arrived, Lucinda fell into a swoon, a letter informed the bridegroom that she was already married to Cardenio, and next day she took refuge in a convent. Dorothea also left her home, dressed in boy's clothes, and concealed herself in the Sierra Morena or Brown Mountain. Now, it so happened that Dorothea, Cardenio, and don Quixote's party happened to be staying at the Crescent inn, and don Fernando, who had abducted Lucinda from the convent, halted at the same place. Here he found his wife Dorothea, and Lucinda her husband Cardenio. All these misfortunes thus came to an end, and the parties mated with their respective spouses.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. (1605).

Dorothe'a, sister of Mons. Thomas.—Fletcher: Mons. Thomas (1619).

Dorothe'a, the "virgin martyr," attended by Angelo, an angel in the semblance of a page, first presented to Dorothea as a beggar-boy, to whom she gave alms.—Massinger: The Virgin Martyr (1622).

Dorothe'a, the heroine of Goethe's poem entitled Hermann and Dorothea (1797).

Dorothea Brooke, the heroine of Middlemarch, a novel by "George Eliot" (Mrs. J. W. Cross, 1872).

Dor'otheus (3 syl.), the man who spent all his life in endeavouring to elucidate the meaning of one single word in Homer.

Dor'othy (Old), the housekeeper of Simon Glover and his daughter "the fair maid of Perth."—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Dor'othy, charwoman of Old Trapbois the miser and his daughter Martha.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Dorriforth, a young handsome catholic priest (afterwards lord Elmwood). He was the gardener of Miss Milner, the heroine of the novel, who falls in love with Dorriforth. Miss Milner has a quick tongue and warm heart, but is for ever on the verge of wrong-doing; Dorriforth is grave and inexorable.—Mrs. Inchbald: A Simple Story (1791).

Dorrillon (Sir William), a rich Indian merchant and a widower. He had one daughter, placed under the care of Mr. and Miss Norberry. When this daughter (Maria) was grown to womanhood, sir William returned to England, and, wishing to learn the character of Maria, presented himself under the assumed name of Mr. Mandred. He found his daughter a fashionable young lady, fond of pleasure, dress, and play, but affectionate and good-hearted. He was enabled to extricate her from some money difficulties, won her heart, revealed himself as her father, and reclaimed her.

Miss [Maria] Dorrillon, daughter of sir William; gay, fashionable, light-hearted, highly accomplished, and very beautiful. "Brought up without a mother's care or father's caution," she had some excuse for her waywardness and frivolity. Sir George Evelyn was her admirer, whom for a time she teased to the very top of her bent; then she married, loved, and reformed.—Mrs. Inchbald: Wives as they Were and Maids as they Are (1797).

D'Osborn (Count), governor of the Giant's Mount Fortress. The countess Marie consented to marry him, because he promised to obtain the acquittal of Ernest de Fridberg ("the State prisoner"); but he never kept his promise. It was by this man's treachery that Ernest was a prisoner, for he kept back the evidence of general Bavois, declaring him innocent. He next employed persons to strangle him, but this attempt was thwarted. His villainy being brought to light, he was ordered by the king to execution.—Stirling: The State Prisoner (1847).

Do'son, a promise-maker and promise-breaker. Antig'onos (grandson of Demetrios the besieger) was so called.

Dot. (See PEERYBINGLE.)

Do-the-boys Hall, a Yorkshire school, where boys were taken-in and done-for by Mr. Squeers, an arrogant, conceited, puffing, overbearing, and ignorant schoolmaster, who fleeced, beat, and starved the boys, but taught them nothing.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

The original of Dotheboys Hall is still in existence at Bowes, some five miles from Barnard Castle. The King's Head inn at Barnard Castle is spoken of in Nicholas Nickleby by Newman Noggs.—Notes and Queries, April 2, 1875.

Doto, Nysê, and Neri'nê, the three nereids who guarded the fleet of Vasco da Gama. When the treacherous pilot had run the ship in which Vasco was sailing on a sunken rock, these sea-nymphs lifted up the prow and turned it round.—Camoens: Lusiad, ii. (1569).

Douban, the physician, cured a Greek king of leprosy by some drug concealed in a racket-handle. The king gave Douban such great rewards that the envy of his nobles was excited, and his vizier suggested that a man like Douban was very dangerous to be near the throne. The fears of the weak king being aroused, he ordered Douban to be put to death. When the physician saw there was no remedy, he gave the king a book, saying, "On the sixth leaf the king will find something affecting his life." The king, finding the leaves stick, moistened his finger with his mouth, and by so doing poisoned himself. "Tyrant!" exclaimed Douban, "those who abuse their power merit death."—Arabian Nights ("The Greek King and the Physician").

Douban, physician of the emperor Alexius.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Double Dealer (The). "The double dealer" is Maskwell, who pretends love to lady Touchwood and professes friendship to Mellefont (2 syl.), in order to betray them both. The other characters of the comedy also deal doubly: Thus lady Froth pretends to love her husband, but coquets with Mr. Brisk; and lady Pliant pretends to be chaste as Diana, but has a liaison with Careless. On the other hand, Brisk pretends to entertain friendship for lord Froth, but makes love to his wife; and Ned Careless pretends to respect and honour lord Pliant, but bamboozles him in a similar way.—Congreve (1700).

Double-headed Mount (The), Parnassus, in Greece; so called from its two chief summits, Tithŏrĕo and Lycorĕa.

Double Lines (in Lloyd's books), a technical word for losses and accidents.

One morning the subscribers were reading the "double lines," and among the losses was the total wreck of this identical ship.—Old and New London, i. 513.

Doublefee (Old Jacob), a money-lender, who accommodates the duke of Buckingham with loans.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Doubting Castle, the castle of giant Despair, into which Christian and Hopeful were thrust; but from which they escaped by means of the key called "Promise."—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, i. (1678).

Dougal, turn-key at Glasgow Tolbooth. He is an adherent of Rob Roy.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

DOUGLAS, divided into The Black Douglases and The Red Douglases.

I. THE BLACK DOUGLASES (or senior branch). Each of these is called "The Black Douglas."

The Hardy, William de Douglas, defender of Berwick (died 1302).

The Good sir James, eldest son of "The Hardy." Friend of Bruce. Killed by the Moors in Spain, 1330.

England's Scourge and Scotland's Bulwark, William Douglas, knight of Liddesdale. Taken at Neville's Cross, and killed by William first earl of Douglas, in 1353.

The Flower of Chivalry, William de Douglas, natural son of "The Good sir James" (died 1384).

James second earl of Douglas overthrew Hotspur. Died at Otterburn, 1388. This is the Douglas of the old ballad of Chevy Chase.

Archibald the Grim, Archibald Douglas, natural son of "The Good sir James" (died *).

The Black Douglas, William lord of Nithsdale (murdered by the earl of Clifford, 1390).

Tineman (the loser), Archibald fourth earl, who lost the battles of Homildon, Shrewsbury, and Verneuil, in the last of which he was killed (1424).

William Douglas, eighth earl, stabbed by James II., and then despatched with a battle-axe by sir Patrick Gray, at Stirling February 13, 1452. Sir Walter Scott alludes to this in The Lady of the Lake.

James Douglas, ninth and last earl (died 1488). With him the senior branch closes.

II. THE RED DOUGLASES, a collateral branch.

Bell-the-Cat, the great earl of Angus. He is introduced by Scott in Marmion. His two sons fell in the battle of Flodden Field. He died in a monastery, 1514.

Archibald Douglas, sixth earl of Angus, and grandson of "Bell-the-Cat." James Bothwell, one of the family, forms the most interesting part of Scott's Lady of the Lake. He was the grandfather of Darnley, husband of Mary queen of Scots. He died 1560.

James Douglas, earl of Morton, younger brother of the seventh earl of Angus. He took part in the murder of Rizzio, and was executed by the instrument called "the maiden" (1530–1581).

The "Black Douglas," introduced by sir W. Scott in Castle Dangerous, is "The Gud schyr James." This was also the Douglas which was such a terror to the English that the women used to frighten their unruly children by saying they would "make the Black Douglas take them." He first appears in Castle Dangerous as "Knight of the Tomb." The following nursery rhyme refers to him:—

> Hush ye, hush ye, little pet ye;
> Hush ye, hush ye, do not fret ye;
> The Black Douglas shall not get thee.
> Sir W. Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, i. 6.

Douglas, a tragedy by J. Home (1757). Young Norval, having saved the life of lord Randolph, is given a commission in the army. Lady Randolph hears of the exploit, and discovers that the youth is her own son by her first husband, lord Douglas. Glenalvon, who hates the new favourite, persuades lord Randolph that his wife is too intimate with the young upstart, and the two surprise them in familiar intercourse in a wood. The youth, being attacked, slays Glenalvon; but is in turn slain by lord Randolph, who then learns that the young man was lady Randolph's son. Lady Randolph, in distraction, rushes up a precipice and throws herself down headlong, and lord Randolph goes to the war then raging between Scotland and Denmark.

Home was a Scotch minister, but the publication of a drama so offended the Presbytery, that he found it expedient to leave the ministry.

Douglas (Archibald earl of), father-in-law of prince Robert, eldest son of Robert III. of Scotland.

Margery of Douglas, the earl's daughter, and wife of prince Robert duke of Rothsay. The duke was betrothed to Elizabeth daughter of the earl of March, but the engagement was broken off by intrigue.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Douglas (Clara), the heroine of lord Lytton's comedy called Money (1840).

Douglas (George), nephew of the regent Murray of Scotland, and grandson of the lady of Lochleven. George Douglas was devoted to Mary queen of Scots. —Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Douglas and the Bloody Heart. The heart of Bruce was entrusted to Douglas to carry to Jerusalem. Landing in Spain, he stopped to aid the Castilians against the Moors, and in the heat of battle cast the "heart," enshrined in a golden coffer, into the very thickest of the foe, saying, "The heart or death!" On he dashed, fearless of danger, to regain the coffer, but perished in the attempt. The family thenceforth adopted the "bloody heart" as their armorial device.

Douglas Larder (The). When the "Good sir James" Douglas, in 1306, took his castle by a coup de main from the English, he caused all the barrels containing flour, meal, wheat, and malt, to be knocked in pieces and their contents to be thrown on the floor; he then staved in all the hogsheads of wine and ale upon this mass. To this he flung the dead bodies slain and some dead horses. The English called this disgusting mess "The Douglas Larder." He then set fire to the castle and took refuge in the hills, for he said "he loved far better to hear the lark sing than the mouse cheep."

¶ Wallace's Larder is a similar phrase. In the dungeon of Ardrossan, Ayrshire (surprised by him in the reign of Edward I.), he had the dead bodies of the garrison thrown together in a heap.

Douglas Tragedy (The), a ballad printed in Scott's Border Minstrelsy. Lord William elopes with Margaret Douglas; but being pursued by her father and brothers, they fight, and the two are left dead on the road. William, wounded, just reaches home to die, and during the night Margaret does also.

Douloureuse Garde (La), a castle in Berwick-upon-Tweed, won by sir Launcelot du Lac, in one of the most terrific adventures related in romance. In memory of this event, the name of the castle was changed into La Joyeuse Garde or La Garde Joyeuse.

Dousterswivel (Herman), a German schemer, who obtains money under the promise of finding hidden wealth by a divining-rod.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

The incident of looking for treasure in the church is copied from one which Lilly mentions, who went with David Ramsay to search for hid treasure in Westminster Abbey.—See Old and New London, i. 129.

Dove (Dr.), the hero of Southey's novel called The Doctor (1834).

Dove (Sir Benjamin), of Cropley Castle, Cornwall. A little, peaking, puling creature, desperately hen-pecked by a second wife; but madam overshot the mark, and the knight was roused to assert and maintain the mastery.

That very clever actor Cherry [1769–1812] appeared in "sir Benjamin Dove," and showed himself a master of his profession.—Boaden.

Lady Dove, twice married, first to Mr. Searcher, king's messenger, and next to sir Benjamin Dove. She had a tendresse for Mr. Paterson. Lady Dove was a terrible termagant, and, when scolding failed, used to lament for "poor dear dead Searcher, who——," etc., etc. She pulled her bow somewhat too tight, and sir Benjamin asserted his independence.

Sophia Dove, daughter of sir Benjamin. She loved Robert Belfield, but was engaged to marry the elder brother Andrew. When, however, the wedding day arrived, Andrew was found to be a married man, and the younger brother became the bridegroom.—Cumberland: The Brothers (1769).

Dowlas (Daniel), a chandler of Gosport, who trades in "coals, cloth, herrings, linen, candles, eggs, sugar, treacle, tea, and brickdust." This vulgar and illiterate petty shopkeeper is raised to the peerage under the title of "The right hon. Daniel Dowlas, baron Duberly." But scarcely has he entered on his honours, when the "heir-at-law," supposed to have been lost at sea, makes his appearance in the person of Henry Morland. The "heir" settles on Daniel Dowlas an annuity.

Deborah Dowlas, wife of Daniel, and for a short time lady Duberly. She assumes quite the airs and ton of gentility, and tells her husband "as he is a pear, he ought to behave as sich."

Dick Dowlas, the son, apprenticed to an attorney at Castleton. A wild young scamp, who can "shoot wild ducks, fling a bar, play at cricket, make punch, catch gudgeons, and dance." His mother says, "he is the sweetest-tempered youth when he has everything his own way." He comes into a fortune of £15,000 a year, and gives Dr. Pangloss £300 a year to tutorize him. Dick Dowlas falls in love with Cicely Homespun, and marries her.—Colman: Heir-at-Law (1797).

Miss Pope asked me about the dress. I answered, "It should be black bombazeen . . ." I proved to her that not only "Deborah Dowlas," but all the rest of the dramatis personæ ought to be in mourning. . . . The three "Dowlases" as relatives of the deceased lord Duberly; "Henry Morland" as the heir-at-law; "Dr. Pangloss" as a clergyman; "Caroline Dormer" for the loss of her father; and "Kenrick" as a servant of the Dormer family.—James Smith.

Dowlas (Old Dame), housekeeper to the duke of Buckingham.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Dowling (Captain), a great drunkard, who dies in his cups.—Crabbe: Borough, xvi. (1810).

Downer (Billy), an occasional porter and shoeblack, a diffuser of knowledge, a philosopher, a citizen of the world, and an "unfinished gentleman."—Selby: The Unfinished Gentleman (1841).

Downing Professor, in the University of Cambridge. So called from sir George Downing, bart., who founded the law professorship in 1800.

Dowsabel, daughter of Cassamen

(3 syl.), a knight of Arden; a ballad by M. Drayton (1593).

> Old Chaucer doth of Topaz tell,
> Mad Rabelais of Pantagruel,
> A later third of Dowsabel.
> Drayton: Nymphidia.

Drac, a sort of fairy in human form, whose abode is the caverns of rivers. Sometimes these dracs will float like golden cups along a stream to entice bathers; but when the bather attempts to catch at them, the drac draws him under water.—South of France Mythology.

Dra'chenfels ("dragon rocks"), so called from the dragon killed there by Siegfried, the hero of the Nibelungen Lied.

Dragon (A), the device on the royal banner of the old British kings. The leader was called the pendragon. Geoffrey of Monmouth says, "When Aure'lius was king, there appeared a star at Winchester of wonderful magnitude and brightness, darting forth a ray, at the end of which was a flame in form of a dragon." Uther ordered two golden dragons to be made, one of which he presented to Winchester, and the other he carried with him as a royal standard. Tennyson says that Arthur's helmet had for crest a golden dragon.

> . . . they saw
> The dragon of the great pendragonship,
> That crowned the state pavilion of the king.
> Tennyson: Guinevere.

Dragon (The), one of the masques at Kennaquhair Abbey.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Dragon (The Red), the personification of "the devil," as the enemy of man.—P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, ix. (1633).

Dragon of Wantley (i.e. Warncliff, in Yorkshire), a skit on the old metrical romances, especially on the old rhyming legend of sir Bevis. The ballad describes the dragon, its outrages, the flight of the inhabitants, the knight choosing his armour, the damsel, the fight, and the victory. The hero is called "More, of More Hall" (q.v.).—Percy: Reliques, III. iii. 13.

(H. Carey has a burlesque called The Dragon of Wantley. and calls the hero "Moore, of Moore Hall," 1697–1743.)

Dragon's Hill (Berkshire). The legend says it is here that St. George killed the dragon; but the place assigned for this achievement in the ballad given in Percy's Reliques is "Sylênê, in Libya." Another legend gives Berytus (Beyrut) as the place of this encounter.

(In regard to Dragon Hill, according to Saxon annals, it was here that Cedric (founder of the West Saxons) slew Naud the pendragon, with 5000 men.)

Dragon's Teeth. The tale of Jason and Æêtês is a repetition of that of Cadmus.

In the tale of CADMUS, we are told the fountain of Arei'a (3 syl.) was guarded by a fierce dragon. Cadmus killed the dragon, and sowed its teeth in the earth. From these teeth sprang up armed men called "Sparti," among whom he flung stones; and the armed men fell foul of each other, till all were slain excepting five.

∴ In the tale of JASON, we are told that, having slain the dragon which kept watch over the golden fleece, he sowed its teeth in the ground, and armed men sprang up. Jason cast a stone into the midst of them; whereupon, the men attacked each other, and were all slain.

Dragons.

AHRIMAN, the dragon slain by Mithra.—Persian Mythology.

COLEIN. (See p. 225.)

DAHAK, the three-headed dragon slain by Thraetana-Vaçna.—Persian.

FAFNIS, the dragon slain by Sigurd.

GRENDEL, the dragon slain by Beowulf, the Anglo-Saxon hero.

LA GARGOUILLE, the dragon which ravaged the Seine, slain by St. Romain of Rouen.

PYTHON, the dragon slain by Apollo.—Greek Mythology.

TARASQUE (2 syl.), the dragon slain at Aix-la-Chapelle by St. Martha.

ZOHAK, the dragon slain by Feridun.

N.B.—Numerous dragons have no special name. Many are denoted Red, White, Black, Great, etc.

Drama. The earliest European drama since the fall of the Western empire appeared in the middle of the fifteenth century. It is called La Celestina, and is divided into twenty-one acts. The first act, which runs through fifty pages, was composed by Rodrigo Cota; the other twenty are ascribed to Fernando de Rojas. The whole was published in 1510.

The earliest English drama is entitled Ralph Roister Doister, a comedy by Nicholas Udal (before 1551, because mentioned by T. Wilson, in his Rule of Reason, which appeared in 1551).

The second English drama was Gammer

Gurton's Needle, by Mr. S., Master of Arts. Warton, in his History of English Poetry (iv. 32), gives 1551 as the date of this comedy; and Wright, in his Historia Histrionica, says it appeared in the reign of Edward VI., who died 1553. It is generally ascribed to bishop Still, but he was only eight years old in 1551.

Father of the French Drama, Etienne Jodelle (1532–1573).

Father of the Modern German Drama, Andrēos Greif (1616–1664).

Father of the Greek Drama, Thespis (sixth century B.C.).

Father of the Spanish Drama, Lopê de Vega (1562–1635).

Drama of Exiles (The), a poem by Mrs. Browning (1844). The "exiles" are Adam and Eve from Paradise, and the poem depicts the anguish of Eve when driven into the wilderness, "And must I leave thee, Paradise?"

Drap, one of queen Mab's maids of honour.—Drayton: Nymphidia.

Dra'pier's Letters, a series of letters written by dean Swift, and signed "M. D. Drapier," advising the Irish not to take the copper money coined by William Wood, to whom George I. had given a patent. These letters (1724) stamped out this infamous job, and caused the patent to be cancelled. The patent was obtained by the duchess of Kendal (mistress of the king), who was to share the profits.

> Can we the Drapier then forget?
> Is not our nation in his debt?
> 'Twas he that writ the "Drapier's Letters."
> Dean Swift: Verses on his own death.

Drawcan'sir, a bragging, blustering bully, who took part in a battle, and killed every one on both sides, "sparing neither friend nor foe."—Villiers duke of Buckingham: The Rehearsal (1671).

> Juan, who was a little superficial,
> And not in literature a great Drawcansir.
> Byron: Don Juan, xi. 51 (1824).

At length my enemy appeared, and I went forward some yards like a Drawcansir, but found myself seized with a panic as Paris was when he presented himself to fight with Menelaus.—Lesage: Gil Blas, vii. 1 (1735).

Dream Authorship. It is said that Coleridge wrote his Kubla Khan from his recollection of a dream.

Dreams. Amongst the ancient Gaels the leader of the army was often determined by dreams or visions in the night. The different candidates retired "each to his hill of ghosts," to pass the night, and he to whom a vision appeared was appointed the leader.

Selma's king [Fingal] looked around. In his presence we rose in arms. But who should lift the shield—for all had claimed the war? The night came down. We strode in silence, each to his hill of ghosts, that spirits might descend in our dreams to mark us for the field. We struck the shield of the dead. We raised the hum of songs. We called thrice the ghosts of our fathers. We laid us down for dreams.—Ossian: Cathlin of Clutha.

Dreams. The Indians believe all dreams to be revelations, sometimes made by the familiar genius, and sometimes by the "inner or divine soul." An Indian, having dreamt that his finger was cut off, had it really cut off the next day—Charlevoix: Journal of a Voyage to North America.

Dream'er (The Immortal), John Bunyan, whose Pilgrim's Progress is said by him to be a dream (1628–1688).

¶ The pretence of a dream was one of the most common devices of mediæval romance, as, for example, the Romance of the Rose and Piers Plowman, both in the fourteenth century.

Dreary (Wat), alias BROWN WILL, one of Macheath's gang of thieves. He is described by Peachum as "an irregular dog, with an underhand way of disposing of his goods" (act i. sc. 1).—Gay: The Beggar's Opera (1727).

Drink used by actors, orators, etc.—
BRAHAM, bottled porter.
CATLEY (Miss), linseed tea and madeira.
COOKE (G. F.), everything drinkable.
EMERY, brandy-and-water (cold).
GLADSTONE (W. E.), an egg beaten up in sherry.
HENDERSON, gum arabic and sherry.
INCLEDON, madeira.
JORDAN (Mrs.), calves'-foot jelly dissolved in warm sherry.
KEAN (Edmund), beef-tea for breakfast, cold brandy.
LEWIS, mulled wine (with oysters).
OXBERRY, tea.
SMITH (William), coffee.
WOOD (Mrs.), draught porter.
∴ J. Kemble took opium.

Drink. "I drink the air," says Ariel, meaning "I will fly with great speed."

In Henry IV. we have "devour the way," meaning the same thing.

"Drink to me only with thine eyes," one of Ben Jonson's fifteen lyrics (1616). (See FOREST, The.) Dri'ver, clerk to Mr. Pleydell, advocate, Edinburgh.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Driver of Europe. The duc de Choiseul, minister of Louis XV., was so called by the empress of Russia, because he had spies all over Europe, and ruled by them all the political cabals.

Dro'gio, probably Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. A Venetian voyager named Antonio Zeno (fourteenth century) so called a country which he discovered. It was said to lie south-west of Estotiland (Labrador), but neither Estotiland nor Drogio are recognized by modern geographers, and both are supposed to be wholly, or in a great measure, hypothetical.

Dro'mio (The Brothers), two brothers, twins, so much alike that even their nearest friends and masters knew not one from the other. They were the servants of two masters, also twins and the exact facsimiles of each other. The masters were Antiph'olus of Ephesus and Antipholus of Syracuse.—Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors (1593).

(The Comedy of Errors is borrowed from the Menæchmi of Plautus.)

Dronsdaughter (Tronda), the old serving-woman of the Yellowleys.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Drood (Edwin), the hero of a novel called The Mystery of Edwin Drood, by Dickens. Only eight numbers appeared, which were published in 1870, the year of the author's death.

Drop Serene (Gutta Serêna). It was once thought that this sort of blindness was an incurable extinction of vision by a transparent watery humour distilling on the optic nerve. It caused total blindness, but made no visible change in the eye. It is now known that this sort of blindness arises from obstruction in the capillary nerve-vessels, and in some cases at least is curable. Milton, speaking of his own blindness, expresses a doubt whether it arose from the Gutta Serena or the suffusion of a cataract.

So thick a "drop serene" hath quenched their orbs,
Or dim "suffusion" veiled.
Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 25 (1665).

Dropping Well, near the Nyde, Yorkshire.

. . . men "Dropping Well" it call,
Because out of a rock it still in drops doth fall;
Near to the foot whereof it makes a little pon [depository],
Which is as little space converteth wood to stone.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxviii. (1622).

Drudgeit (Peter), clerk to lord Bladderskate.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Drugger (Abel), a seller of tobacco; artless and gullible in the extreme. He was building a new house, and came to Subtle "the alchemist," to know on which side to set the shop-door, how to dispose the shelves so as to ensure most luck, on what days he might trust his customers, and when it would be unlucky for him so to do.—Ben Jonson: The Alchemist (1610).

Thomas Weston was "Abel Drugger" himself [1727-1776], but David Garrick was fond of the part also [1716-1779].—Dibdin: History of the Stage.

(The Alchemist was cut down into a two-act farce, called The Tobacconist, by Francis Gentleman, in 1780.)

Drugget, a rich London haberdasher, who has married one of his daughters to sir Charles Racket. Drugget is "very fond of his garden," but his taste goes no further than a suburban tea-garden, with leaden images, cockney fountains, trees cut into the shapes of animals, and other similar abominations. He is very headstrong, very passionate, and very fond of flattery.

Mrs. Drugget, wife of the above. She knows her husband's foibles, and, like a wise woman, never rubs the hair the wrong way.—Murphy: Three Weeks after Marriage (1776).

Druid (The), the pseudonym of Henry Dixon, sportsman and sporting writer. One of his books, called Steeplechasing, appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine. His last work was called The Saddle and Surloin.

 Collins calls James Thomson (author of The Seasons) a druid, meaning a pastoral British poet or "Nature's High Priest."

In yonder grave a Druid lies.
Collins (1746).

Druid (Dr.), a man of North Wales, 65 years of age, the travelling tutor of lord Abberville, who was only 23. The ductor is a pedant and antiquary, choleric in temper, and immensely bigoted, wholly without any knowledge of the human heart, or indeed any practical knowledge at all.

"Money and trade, I scorn 'em both; . . . I have traced the Oxus and the Po, traversed the Riphæan Mountains, and pierced into the inmost tesarts of Kilmuc Tartary. . . . I have followed the savages of Kouli Chan with rapturous delight. There is a land of wonders; finely depopulated; gloriously laid waste; fields without a hoof to tread 'em; fruits without a hand to gather 'em: with such a catalogue of pats, pestles, serpents, scorpions, caterpillars, toads, and putterfiles! Oh, 'tis a recreating contremplation indeed to a philosophic mind!"—Cumberland: The Fashionable Lover (1780).

Druid Money, a promise to pay on the Greek Kalends. Patricius says, "Druidæ pecuniam mutuo accipiebant in posteriore vita reddituri."

Like money by the Druids borrowed,
In th' other world to be restored.
S. Butler: Hudibras, iii. 1 (1678).

¶ Purchas tells us of certain priests of Pekin, "who barter with the people upon bills of exchange, to be paid in heaven a hundredfold."—Pilgrims, iii. 2.

Drum (Jack). Jack Drum's entertainment is giving a guest the cold shoulder. Shakespeare calls it "John Drum's entertainment" (All's Well, etc., act iii. sc. 6); and Holinshed speaks of "Tom Drum his entertaynement, which is to hale a man in by the heade, and thrust him out by both the shoulders."

In faith, good gentlemen, I think we shall be forced to give you right John Drum's entertainment.—Introduction to Jack Drum's Entertainment (1601).

Drummle (Bentley) and Startop, two young men who read with Mr. Pocket. Drummle was a surly, ill-conditioned fellow, who married Estella, Miss Havisham's adopted daughter, wasted all her money, and left her a penniless widow.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

Drunk. The seven phases of drunkenness are: (1) Ape-drunk, when men make fools of themselves in their cups; (2) Lion-drunk, when men want to fight with every one; (3) Swine-drunk, when men puke, etc.; (4) Sleep-drunk, when men get heavy and sleepy in their cups; (5) Martin-drunk, when men become boastful in their cups; (6) Goat-drunk, when men become amorous; (7) Fox-drunk, when men become crafty in their cups.

Drunken Parliament, a Scotch parliament assembled at Edinburgh, January 1, 1661.

It was a mad, warring time, full of extravagance; and no wonder it was so, when the men of affairs were almost perpetually drunk.—Burnet: His Own Time (1723-34).

Druon "the Stern," one of the four knights who attacked Britomart and sir Scudamore (3 syl.).

The warlike dame [Britomart] was on her part assaid
By Claribel and Blandamour at one;
While Paridel and Druon fiercely laid
On Scudamore, both his professed fone [foes].
Spenser: Faerie Queene, iv. 9 (1596).

Dru'ry Lane (London), takes its name from the Drury family. Drury House stood on the site of the present Olympic Theatre.

Druses (Return of the). The Druses, a semi-Mohammedan sect of Syria, being attacked by Osman, take refuge in one of the Spor'adês, and place themselves under the protection of the knights of Rhodes. These knights slay their sheiks and oppress the fugitives. In the sheik massacre, Dja'bal is saved by Maä'ni, and entertains the idea of revenging his people and leading them back to Syria. To this end he gives out that he is Hakeem, the incarnate god, returned to earth, and soon becomes the leader of the exiled Druses. A plot is formed to murder the prefect of the isle, and to betray the island to Venice, if Venice will supply a convoy for their return. An'eal (2 syl.), a young woman, stabs the prefect, and dies of bitter disappointment when she discovers that Djabal is a mere impostor. Djabal stabs himself when his imposition is made public, but Loys (2 syl.), a Breton count, leads the exiles back to Lebanon.—R. Browning: The Return of the Druses.

N.B.—Historically, the Druses, to the number of 160,000 or 200,000, settled in Syria, between Djebail and Saïde, but their original seat was Egypt. They quitted Egypt from persecution, led by Dâra'zi or Durzi, from whom the name Druse (1 syl.) is derived. The founder of the sect was the hakêm B'amr-ellah (eleventh century), believed to be incarnate deity, and the last prophet who communicated between God and man. From this founder the head of the sect was called the hakêm, his residence being Deir-el-Kamar. During the thirteenth or fourteenth century the Druses were banished from Syria, and lived in exile in some of the Sporidês, but were led back to Syria early in the fifteenth century by count Loys de Deux, a new convert. Since 1588 they have been tributaries of the sultan.

What say you does this wizard style himself—
Hakeem Biamrallah, the Third Fatimite?
What is this jargon? He the insane prophet,
Dead near three hundred years?
R. Browning: The Return of the Druses.

Dryas or DRYAD, a wood-nymph, whose life was bound up with that of her tree. (Greek, δρυάς, δρυάδος.)

"The quickening power of the soul, like Martha, "is busy about many things," or like a Dryas living in a tree."—Sir J. Davies: Immortality of the Soul, xii.

Dry-as-Dust (The Rev. Doctor), an hypothetical person whom sir W. Scott makes use of to introduce some of his novels by means of prefatory letters. The word is a synonym for a dull, prosy, plodding historian, with great show of learning, but very little attractive grace.

Dryden of Germany (The), Martin Opitz, sometimes called "The Father of German Poetry" (1597-1639).

Dryeesdale (Jasper), the old steward at Lochleven Castle.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Dry'ope (3 syl.), daughter of king Dryops, beloved by Apollo. Apollo, having changed himself into a tortoise, was taken by Dryopê into her lap, and became the father of Amphis'sos. Ovid says that Dryopê was changed into a lotus (Met., x. 331).

Duar'te (3 syl.), the vainglorious son of Guiomar.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Custom of the Country (printed 1647).

Dubosc, the great thief, who robs the night-mail from Lyons, and murders the courier. He bears such a strong likeness to Joseph Lesurques (act i. sc. 1) that their identity is mistaken.—Stirling: The Courier of Lyons (1852).

Dubourg (Mons.), a merchant at Bordeaux, and agent there of Osbaldistone of London.

Clement Dubourg, son of the Bordeaux merchant, one of the clerks of Osbaldistone, merchant.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Dubric (St.) or St. Dubricius, archbishop of the City of Legions (Caerleon-upon-Usk; Newport is the only part left). He set the crown on the head of Arthur, when only 15 years of age. Geoffrey says (British History, ix. 12), "This prelate, who was primate of Britain, was so eminent for his piety, that he could cure any sick person by his prayers." St. Dubric abdicated and lived a hermit, leaving David his successor. Tennyson introduces him in his Coming of Arthur, Enid, etc.

St. Dubric, whose report old Carleon yet doth carry.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1622).

To whom arrived, by Dubric the high saint,
Chief of the Church in Britain, and before
The stateliest of her altar-shrines; the king
That morn was married.
Tennyson: The Coming of Arthur.

Duchess May (The Rhyme of the), a poem by Mrs. Browning (1841). "Full of passion and incident."

Duchess Street (Portman Square). So called from Margaret duchess of Portland. (See DUKE STREET.)

Duchesse de la Valière, a tragedy by lord Lyton (1830).

Ducho'mar was in love with Morna, daughter of Cormac king of Ireland. Out of jealousy, he slew Cathba, his more successful rival, went to announce his death to Morna, and then asked her to marry him. She replied she had no love for him, and asked him for his sword. "He gave the sword to her tears," and she stabbed him to the heart. Duchômar begged the maiden to pluck the sword from his breast that he might die; and when she approached him for the purpose, "he seized the sword from her, and slew her."

"Duchômar, most gloomy of men; dark are thy brows and terrible; red are thy rolling eyes . . . I love thee not," said Morna; "hard is thy heart of rock, and dark is thy terrible brow."—Ossian: Fingal, i.

Duchran (The laird of), a friend of baron Bradwardine.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Ducking-Pond Row (London), now called "Grafton Street."

Duck Lane (London), a row near Smithfield, once famous for second-hand books. It has given way to city improvements.

Scotists and Thomists now in peace remain,
Amidst their kindred cobwebs in Duck Lane.
Pope: Essay on Criticism (1711).

Du Croisy and his friend La Grange are desirous to marry two young ladies whose heads are turned by novels. The silly girls fancy the manners of these gentlemen too unaffected and easy to be aristocratic; so the gentlemen send to them their valets, as "the viscount de Jodelet," and "the marquis of Mascarille." The girls are delighted with their titled visitors; but when the game has gone far enough, the masters enter and unmask the trick. By this means the girls are taught a useful lesson, without being subjected to any fatal consequences.—Molière: Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659).

Dudley, a young artist; a disguise assumed by Harry Bertram.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Dudley (Captain), a poor English officer, of strict honour, good family, and many accomplishments. He has served his country for thirty years, but can scarcely provide bread for his family.

Charles Dudley, son of captain Dudley.

High-minded, virtuous, generous, poor, and proud. He falls in love with his cousin Charlotte Rusport, but forbears proposing to her, because he is poor and she is rich. His grandfather's will is in time brought to light, by which he becomes the heir of a noble fortune, and he then marries his cousin.

Louisa Dudley, daughter of captain Dudley. Young, fair, tall, fresh, and lovely. She is courted by Belcour the rich West Indian, to whom ultimately she is married.—Cumberland: The West Indian (1771).

Dudley Diamond (The). In 1868 a black shepherd named Swartzboy brought to his master, Nie Kirk, this diamond, and received for it £400, with which he drank himself to death. Nie Kirk sold it for £12,000; and the earl of Dudley gave Messrs. Hunt and Roskell £30,000 for it. It weighed in the rough 88½ carats, but cut into a heart shape it weighs 44½ carats. It is triangular in shape, and of great brilliancy.

 This magnificent diamond, that called the "Stewart" (q.v.), and the "Twin," have all been discovered in Africa since 1868.

Dudu, one of the three beauties of the harem, into which Juan, by the sultana's order, had been admitted in female attire. Next day, the sultana, out of jealousy, ordered that both Dudù and Juan should be stitched in a sack and cast into the sea; but, by the connivance of Baba, the chief eunuch, they effected their escape.—Byron: Don Juan.

> A kind of sleeping Venus seemed Dudù . . .
> But she was pensive more than melancholy . . .
> The strangest thing was, beauteous, she was holy,
> Unconscious, albeit turned of quick seventeen.
> Don Juan: canto vi. 42-44 (1824).

Duenna (The), a comic opera by Sheridan (1773). Margaret, the duenna, is placed in charge of Louisa, the daughter of don Jerome. Louisa is in love with don Antonio, a poor nobleman of Seville; but her father resolves to give her in marriage to Isaac Mendoza, a rich Portuguese Jew. As Louisa will not consent to her father's arrangement, he locks her up in her chamber and turns the duenna out of doors; but in his impetuous rage he in reality turns his daughter out, and locks up the duenna. Isaac arrives, is introduced to the lady, elopes with her, and is duly married. Louisa flees to the convent of St. Catharine, and writes to her father for his consent to her marriage to the man of her choice; and don Jerome, supposing she means the Jew, gives it freely, and she marries Antonio. When they meet at breakfast at the old man's house, he finds that Isaac has married the duenna, Louisa has married Antonio, and his son has married Clara; but the old man is reconciled, and says, "I am an obstinate old fellow, when I'm in the wrong, but you shall all find me steady in the right."

Duessa [false faith] is the personification of the papacy. She meets the Red Cross Knight in the society of Sansfoy [infidelity], and when the knight slays Sansfoy, she turns to flight. Being overtaken, she says her name is Fidessa (true faith), deceives the knight, and conducts him to the palace of Lucif'era, where he encounters Sansjoy (canto 2). Duessa dresses the wounds of the Red Cross Knight, but places Sansjoy under the care of Escula'pius in the infernal regions (canto 4). The Red Cross Knight leaves the palace of Lucifera, and Duessa induces him to drink of the "Enervating Fountain;" Orgoglio then attacks him, and would have slain him if Duessa had not promised to be his bride. Having cast the Red Cross Knight into a dungeon, Orgoglio dresses his bride in most gorgeous array, puts on her head "a triple crown" (the tiara of the pope), and sets her on a monster beast with "seven heads" (the seven hills of Rome). Una (truth) sends Arthur (England) to rescue the captive knight, and Arthur slays Orgoglio, wounds the beast, releases the knight, and strips Duessa of her finery (the Reformation); whereupon she flies into the wilderness to conceal her shame (canto 7). —Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. (1590).

Duessa, in bk. v., allegorizes Mary queen of Scots. She is arraigned by Zeal before queen Mercilla (Elizabeth), and charged with high treason. Zeal says he shall pass by for the present "her counsels false conspired" with Blandamour (earl of Northumberland), and Paridel (earl of Westmoreland, leaders of the insurrection of 1569), as that wicked plot came to naught, and the false Duessa was now "an untitled queen." When Zeal had finished, an old sage named the Kingdom's Care (lord Burghley) spoke, and opinions were divided. Authority, Law of Nations, and Religion thought Duessa guilty; but Pity, Danger, Nobility of Birth, and Grief pleaded in her behalf.

Zeal then charges the prisoner with murder, sedition, adultery, and lewd impiety; whereupon the sentence of the court was given against her. Queen Mercilla, being called on to pass sentence, was so overwhelmed with grief that she rose and left the court.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 9 (1596).

Dufarge (Jacques) and Madame Dufarge (2 syl.), in A Tale of Two Cities, by Dickens (1859). They are the presiding spirits of the Faubourg St. Antoine, and instigators of many of the crimes of the Red Republicans.

Duff (Jamie), the idiot boy attending Mrs. Bertram's funeral.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Duglas, the scene of four Arthurian battles. The Duglas is said to fall into the estuary of the Ribble. The Paris MS. and Henry of Huntingdon says, "Duglas qui est in regione Inniis." But where is "Inniis"? There is a township called "Ince," a mile south-west of Wigan, and Mr. Whitaker says, "six cwt. of horse-shoes were taken up from a space of ground near that spot during the formation of a canal;" so that this "Ince" is supposed to be the place referred to.

Duke (My lord), a duke's servant, who assumes the airs and title of his master, and is addressed as "Your grace," or "My lord duke." He was first a country cowboy, then a wig-maker's apprentice, and then a duke's servant. He could neither write nor read, but was a great coxcomb, and set up for a tip-top fine gentleman.—Rev. J. Townley: High Life Below Stairs (1763).

Duke (The Iron), the duke of Wellington, also called "The Great Duke" (1769–1852).

Duke and Duchess, in pt. II. of Don Quixote, who play so many sportive tricks on "the Knight of the Woeful Countenance," were don Carlos de Borja count of Ficallo and donna Maria of Aragon duchess of Villaher'mora his wife, in whose right the count held extensive estates on the banks of the Ebro, among others a country seat called Buena'via, the place referred to by Cervantes (1615).

Duke of Mil'an, a tragedy by Massinger (1622). A play evidently in imitation of Shakespeare's Othello, "Sforza" is Othello; "Francesco," Iago; "Marcelia," Desdemona; and "Eugenia," Emilia. Sforza "the More" [sic] doted on Marcelia his young bride, who amply returned his love. Francesco, Sforza's favourite, being left lord protector of Milan during a temporary absence of the duke, tried to corrupt Marcelia; but failing in this, accused her of wantonness. The duke, believing his favourite, slew his beautiful young bride. The cause of Francesco's villainy was that the duke had seduced his sister Eugenia.

 Shakespeare's play was produced in 1611, about eleven years before Massinger's tragedy. In act v. 1 we have, "Men's injuries we write in brass," which brings to mind Shakespeare's line, "Men's evil manners live in brass, their virtues we write in water."

(Cumberland reproduced this drama, with some alterations, in 1780.)

Duke Coombe, William Coombe, author of Dr. Syntax, and translator of The Devil on Two Sticks, from Le Diable Boiteux of Lesage. He was called duke from the splendour of his dress, the profusion of his table, and the magnificence of his deportment. The last fifteen years of his life were spent in the King's Bench (1741–1823).

Duke Street (Portman Square, London). So called from William Bentinck, second duke of Portland. (See DUCHESS STREET, p. 303.)

Duke Street (Strand, London). So named from George Villiers, duke of Buckingham.

(For other dukes, see the surname or titular name.)

Duke's, a fashionable theatre in the reign of Charles II. It was in Portugal Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields. So named in compliment to James duke of York (James II.), its great patron.

Dulcama'ra (Dr.), an itinerant physician, noted for his pomposity; very boastful, and a thorough charlatan.—Donizetti: L'Elisire d'Amore (1832).

Dulcarnon, at my wit's end, completely puzzled. The word is used by Chaucer in his Troylus and Cryseyde, bk. iii. 126, 127. (See DHU'L KARNEIN, p. 276.)

Dulcifluous Doctor, Anthony Andreas, a Spanish minorite of the Duns Scotus school (*–1320).

Dulcin'ea del Tobo'so, the lady of don Quixote's devotion. She was a fresh-coloured country wench, of an adjacent village, with whom the don was once in love. Her real name was Aldonza Lorenzo. Her father was Lorenzo Corchuelo, and her mother Aldonza Nogalês. Sancho Panza describes her in pt. I. iii. 11.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. i. 1 (1605).

"Her flowing hair," says the knight, "is of gold, her forehead the Elysian fields, her eyebrows two celestial arches, her eyes a pair of glorious suns, her cheeks two beds of roses, her lips two coral portals that guard her teeth of Oriental pearl, her neck is alabaster, her hands are polished ivory, and her bosom whiter than the new-fallen snow.

"She is not a descendant of the ancient Cali, Curtil, and Scipios of Rome; nor of the modern Colonas and Orsini; nor of the Moncadas and Requesenes of Catalonia; nor of the Rebillas and Villanovas of Valencia; neither is she a descendant of the Palafoxes, Newcas, Rocabertis, Corellas, Lunas, Alagenes, Ureas, Foyes, and Gurreas of Aragon; neither does the lady Dulcinea descend from the Cerdas, Manriquez, Mendozas, and Guzmans of Castille; nor from the Alencastros, Pallas, and Menezes of Portugal; but she derives her origin from the family of Toboso de la Mancha, most illustrious of all."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. ii. 5 (1605).

> Ask you for whom my tears do flow so?
> 'Tis for Dulcinea del Toboso.
> Don Quixote, I. iii. 11 (1605).

Dull, a constable. — Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost (1594).

Du'machus. The impenitent thief is so called in Longfellow's Golden Legend, and the penitent thief is called Titus.

In the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, the impenitent thief is called Gestas, and the penitent one Dysmas.

In the story of Joseph of Arimathea, the impenitent thief is called Gesmas, and the penitent one Dismas.

> Alta petit Dismas, infelix infima Gesmas.
> A Monkish Charm to Scare away Thieves.
> Dismas in paradise would dwell,
> But Gesmas chose his lot in hell.
> B.C.B.

Dumain, a French lord in attendance on Ferdinand king of Navarre. He agreed to spend three years with the king in study, during which time no woman was to approach the court. Of course, the compact was broken as soon as made, and Dumain fell in love with Katharine. When, however, he proposed marriage, Katharine deferred her answer for twelve months and a day, hoping by that time "his face would be more bearded," for she said, "I'll mark no words that smooth-faced wooers say."

> The young Dumain, a well-accomplished youth,
> Of all that virtue love for virtue loved;
> Most power to do most harm, least knowing ill;
> For he hath wit to make an ill shape good,
> And shape to win grace, tho' he had no wit.
> Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, act ii. sc. 1 (1594).

Du'marin, the husband of Cym'oent, and father of Marinel.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 4 (1590).

Dumas (Alexandre D.), in 1845, published sixty volumes.

> The most skilful copyist, writing 12 hours a day, can with difficulty do 3900 letters in an hour, which gives him 46,800 per diem, or 60 pages of a romance. Thus he could copy 5 volumes octavo per month and 60 in a year, supposing that he did not lose one second of time, but worked without ceasing 12 hours every day throughout the entire year.—De Mirecourt: Dumas Père (1867).

Dumb Ox (The). St. Thomas Aqui'nas was so called by his fellow-students at Cologne, from his taciturnity and dreaminess. Sometimes called "The Great Dumb Ox of Sicily." He was large-bodied, fat, with a brown complexion, and a large head partly bald.

> Of a truth, it almost makes me laugh
> To see men leaving the golden grain,
> To gather in piles the pitiful chaff
> That old Peter Lombard threshed with his brain,
> To have it caught up and tossed again
> On the horns of the Dumb Ox of Cologne.
> Longfellow: The Golden Legend.

(Thomas Aquinas was subsequently called "The Angelic Doctor," and the "Angel of the Schools," 1224-1274.)

Dumbiedikes (The old laird of), an exacting landlord, taciturn and obstinate.

> The laird of Dumbiedikes had hitherto been moderate in his exactions . . . but when a stout, active young fellow appeared . . . he began to think so broad a pair of shoulders might bear an additional burden. He regulated, indeed, his management of his dependents as carters do their horses, never failing to clap an additional brace of hundred-weights on a new and willing horse.—Heart of Midlothian, chap. 8 (1818).

The young laird of Dumbiedikes (3 syl.), a bashful young laird, in love with Jeanie Deans, but Jeanie marries the presbyterian minister, Reuben Butler.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Dum'merar (The Rev. Dr.), a friend of sir Geoffrey Peveril.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Dummy or SUPERNUMERARY. "Celiméne," in the Précieuses Ridicules, does not utter a single word, although she enters with other characters on the stage.

Dumtous'tie (Mr. Daniel), a young barrister, and nephew of lord Bladderskate.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Dun (Squire), the hangman who came between Richard Brandon and Jack Ketch.

> And presently a halter got,
> Made of the best strong hempen tow,
> And ere a cat could lick his ear,
> Had tied him up with as much art
> As Dun himself could do for's heart.
> Cotton: Virgil Travestied, iv. (1677).

Dun Cow (The), slain by sir Guy of Warwick on Dunsmore Heath, was the cow kept by a giant in Mitchel Fold [middle-fold], Shropshire. Its milk was inexhaustible. One day an old woman, who had filled her pail, wanted to fill her sieve also with its milk; but this so enraged the cow that it broke away, and wandered to Dunsmore, where it was killed.

N.B.—A huge tusk, probably an elephant's, is still shown at Warwick Castle as one of the horns of this wonderful cow.

Dunbar and March (George earl of), who deserted to Henry IV. of England, because the betrothal of his daughter Elizabeth to the king's eldest son was broken off by court intrigue.

Elizabeth Dunbar, daughter of the earl of Dunbar and March, betrothed to prince Robert duke of Rothsay, eldest son of Robert III. of Scotland. The earl of Douglas contrived to set aside this betrothal in favour of his own daughter Elizabeth, who married the prince, and became duchess of Rothsay.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Duncan "the Meek," king of Scotland, was son of Crynin, and grandson of Malcolm II., whom he succeeded on the throne. Macbeth was the son of the younger sister of Duncan's mother, and hence Macbeth and Duncan were first cousins. Sueno king of Norway having invaded Scotland, the command of the army was entrusted to Macbeth and Banquo, and so great was their success that only ten men of the invading army were left alive. After the battle, king Duncan paid a visit to Macbeth in his castle of Inverness, and was there murdered by his host. The successor to the throne was Duncan's son Malcolm, but Macbeth usurped the crown.—Shakespeare: Macbeth (1606).

Duncan (Captain), of Knockdunder, agent at Roseneath to the duke of Buckingham.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Duncan (Duroch), a follower of Donald Bean Lean.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Dunce, wittily or wilfully derived from Duns, surnamed "Scotus."

In the Gaelic, donas [means] "bad luck," or in contempt, "a poor ignorant creature." The Lowland Scotch has donsie, "unfortunate, stupid."—Notes and Queries, 2nd S. September 21, 1878.

Dun'ciad ["the dunce-epic"], a satire in heroic verse, by Alexander Pope, in which he gibbets his critics and foes. The plot is this: Eusden the poet-laureate being dead, the goddess of Dulness elects Colley Cibber as his successor. The installation is celebrated by games, the most important being the "reading of two voluminous works, one in verse and the other in prose, without nodding." King Cibber is then taken to the temple of Dulness, and lulled to sleep on the lap of the goddess. In his dream he sees the triumphs of the empire. Finally, the goddess having established the kingdom on a firm basis, Night and Chaos are restored, and the poem ends (1728-42).

Dundas (Starvation), Henry Dundas, first lord Melville. So called because he introduced into the language the word starvation, in a speech on American affairs (1775).

Dunder (Sir David), of Dunder Hall, near Dover. A hospitable, conceited, whimsical old gentleman, who for ever interrupts a speaker with "Yes, yes, I know it," or "Be quiet, I know it." He rarely finishes a sentence, but runs on in this style: "Dover is an odd sort of a—eh?" "It is a dingy kind of a—humph!" "The ladies will be happy to—eh?" He is the father of two daughters, Harriet and Kitty, whom he accidentally detects in the act of eloping with two guests. To prevent a scandal, he sanctions the marriages, and discovers that the two lovers, both in family and fortune, are suitable sons-in-law.

Lady Dunder, fat, fair, and forty if not more. A country lady, more fond of making jams and pastry than doing the fine lady. She prefers cooking to croquet, and making the kettle sing to singing herself. (See HARRIET and KITTY.) —Colman: Ways and Means (1788).

William Dowton [1764-1851] played "sir Anthony Absolute," "sir Peter Teazle," "sir David Dunder," and "sir John Falstaff," and looked the very characters he represented.—Donaldson: Recollections.

("Sir Anthony Absolute," in The Rivals (Sheridan); "sir Peter Teazle," in The School for Scandal by Sheridan.)

Dundrear'y (Lord), a good-natured, indolent, blundering, empty-headed swell; the chief character in Tom Taylor's dramatic piece entitled Our American Cousin. He is greatly characterized by his admiration of "Brother Sam," for his incapacity to follow out the sequence of any train of thought, and for supposing all are insane who differ from him.

(Mr. Sothern of the Haymarket created this character by his power of conception and the genius of his acting. 1858.)

Duned'in (3 syl.), Edinburgh.

On her firm-set rock
Dunedin's castle felt a secret shock.
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Dunlathmon, the family seat of Nuäth, father of Oith'ona (q.v.).—Ossian: Oithona.

Dunmow Flitch (The), given to any married couple who, at the close of the first year of their marriage, can take their oath they have never once wished themselves unmarried again. Dr. Short sent a gammon to the princess Charlotte and her consort, prince Leopold, while they were at Claremont House.

¶ A similar custom is observed at the manor of Wichenor, in Staffordshire, where corn as well as bacon is given to the "happy pair."

(For a list of those who have received the flitch from its establishment, see Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 391.)

Dunois (The count de), in sir W. Scott's novel of Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Dunois the Brave, hero of the famous French song, set to music by queen Hortense, mother of Napoleon III., and called Partant pour la Syrie. His prayer to the Virgin, when he left for Syria, was—

Que j'aime la plus belle,
Et sois le plus vaillant.

He behaved with great valour, and the count whom he followed gave him his daughter to wife. The guests, on the bridal day, all cried aloud—

Amour à la plus belle!
Honneur au plus vaillant!
Words by M. de Laborde (1809).

Dun'over, a poor gentleman introduced by sir W. Scott in the introduction of The Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Dunrommath, lord of Uthal, one of the Orkneys. He carried off Oith'ona, daughter of Nuäth (who was engaged to be married to Gaul, son of Morni), and was slain by Gaul in fight.

Gaul advanced in his arms; Dunrommath shrunk behind his people. But the spear of Gaul pierced the gloomy chief: his sword lopped off his head, as it bended in death.—Ossian: Oithona.

Duns Scotus, called "The Subtle Doctor," said to have been born at Dunse, in Berwickshire, or Dunstance, in Northumberland (1265-1308).

N.B.—John Scotus, called Erigena ("Erin-born"), is quite another person (*-886). Erigena is sometimes called "Scotus the Wise," and lived four centuries before "The Subtle Doctor."

Dun-Shunner (Augustus), a pen-name of professor William Edmonstoune Aytoun, in Blackwood's Magazine (1813-1865).

Dunsmore Cross or High Cross, the centre of England.

Hence, Muse, divert thy course to Dunsmore, by that cross
Where those two mighty ways, the Watling and the Foss,
Our centre seem to cut.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Dunstable (Downright), plain speaking; blunt honesty of speech; calling a spade a spade, without euphemism. Other similar phrases are Plain Dunstable; Dunstable way, etc., in allusion to the proverb, "As plain as Dunstable highway."—Howell: Epist. Howel., 2; Florio, Dict., 17, 85.

That's flat, sir, as you may say, "downright Dunstable."—Mrs. Oliphant: Phœbe, Jun., ii. 3.

Duns'tan (St.), patron saint of goldsmiths and jewellers. He was a smith, and worked up all sorts of metals in his cell near Glastonbury Church. It was in this cell that, according to legend, Satan had a gossip with the saint, and Dunstan caught his sable majesty by the nose with a pair of red-hot forceps.

Dunthal'mo, lord of Teutha (the Tweed). He went "in his pride against Rathmor" chief of Clutha (the Clyde), but being overcome, "his rage arose," and he went "by night with his warriors" and slew Rathmor in his banquet-hall.—Ossian: Calthon and Colmal.

 For the rest of the tale, see CALTHON, p. 170.

Dupely (Sir Charles), a man who prided himself on his discernment of character, and defied any woman to entangle him in matrimony; but he mistook lady Bab Lardoon, a votary of fashion, for an unsophisticated country maiden, and proposed marriage to her.

"I should like to see the woman," he says, "that could entangle me. . . . Shew me a woman . . . and at the first glance I will discover the whole extent of her artifice."—Burgeyne: The Maid of the Oaks, i. 2.

Dupré [Du-pray'], a servant of M. Darlemont, who assists his master in abandoning Julio count of Harancour (his ward) in the streets of Paris, for the sake of becoming possessor of his ward's property. Dupré repents and confesses the crime.—Holcroft: The Deaf and Dumb (1785).

Duran'dal, the sword of Orlando, the workmanship of fairies. So admirable was its temper that it would "cleave the Pyrenees at a blow."—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Durandar'te (4 syl.), a knight who fell at Roncesvallês (4 syl.). Durandartê loved Belerma, whom he served for seven years, and was then slain; but in dying he requested his cousin Montesi'nos to take his heart to Belerma.

> Sweet in manners, fair in favour,
> Mild in temper, fierce in fight.
> Lewis.

Dur'den (Dame), a notable country gentlewoman, who kept five men-servants "to use the spade and flail," and five women-servants "to carry the milken-pail." The five men loved the five maids. Their names were—

> Moll and Bet, and Doll and Kate, and Dorothy Draggle-tail;
> John and Dick, and Joe and Jack, and Humphrey with his flail.
> A Well-known Glee.

(In Bleak House, by C. Dickens, Esther Summerson is playfully called "Dame Durden.")

Duretete (Captain), a rather heavy gentleman, who takes lessons of gallantry from his friend, young Mirabel. Very bashful with ladies, and for ever sparring with Bisarre, who teases him unmercifully [Dure-tait, Be-zar'].—Farquhar: The Inconstant (1702).

Durinda'na, Orlando's sword, given him by his cousin Malagi'gi. This sword and the horn Olifant were buried at the feet of the hero.

¶ Charlemagne's sword "Joyeuse" was also buried with him, and "Tiz'ona" was buried with the Cid.

Durotri'ges. Below the Hedui (those of Somersetshire) came the Durotigês, sometimes called Mŏr'ĭni. Their capital was Du'rĭnum (Dorchester), and their territory extended to Vindel'ia (Portland Isle).—Richard of Cirencester: Ancient State of Britain, vi. 15.

> The Durotiges on the Dorsetian sand.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xvi. (1613).

Durward (Quentin), hero and title of a novel by sir W Scott. Quentin Durward is a nephew of Ludovic Lesly (surnamed Le Balafre). He enrolls himself in the Scottish guard, a company of archers in the pay of Louis XI. at Plessis lés Tours, and saves the king in a boar-hunt. When Liège is assaulted by insurgents, Quentin Durward and the countess Isabelle de Croye escape on horseback. The countess publicly refuses to marry the duc d'Orleans, and ultimately marries the young Scotchman.

Dusronnal, one of the two steeds of Cuthullin general of the Irish tribes. The other was "Sulin-Sifadda" (q.v.).

> Before the left side of the car is seen the snorting horse! The thin-maned, high-headed, strong-hoofed, fleet bounding son of the hill: His name is Dusronnal, among the stormy sons of the sword! . . . the [two] steeds like wreaths of mist fly over the streamy vales! The wildness of deer is in their course, the strength of eagles descending on the prey.—Ossian: Fingal, i.

Dutch School of painting, noted for its exactness of detail and truthfulness.

For portraits: Rembrandt, Bol, Flinck, Hals, and Vanderhelst.

For conversation pieces: Gerhard Douw, Terburg, Metzu, Mieris, and Netscher.

PAAP (Simon), the Dutch dwarf. Height 28 inches, weight 27 lbs. Exhibited in England in 1815.

PHILE'TAS, a poet so thin that "he wore leaden shoes to prevent being blown away by the wind" (died B.C. 280).

PHILIPS (Calvin) weighed less than 2 lbs. His thighs were not thicker than a man's thumb. He was born at Bridgewater, Massachusetts, in 1791.

RITCHIE (David), 3 feet 6 inches. Native of Tweeddale.

STOCKER (Nannette). Height 33 inches. Exhibited in London in 1815.

SOUVRAY (Therese), described by Virey.

STÖBERIN (C. H.) of Nuremberg was less than 3 feet at the age of 20. His father, mother, brothers, and sisters were all under the medium height.

STRASSE DAVIT FAMILY (The). Man 20 inches high, woman 18 inches, child (at 17 years of age) only 6 inches. Embalmed in the chemical library of Rastadt.

TERESIA (Mdle.), a Corsican. Height 34 inches, weight 27 lbs. Exhibited in London in 1773.

THUMB (General Tom). His real name was Charles S. Stratton; 25 inches, weight 25 lbs. at the age of 25. Born at Bridgeport, Connecticut, United States, in 1838. Exhibited in London in 1844. He died in Massachusetts in 1883, aged 45. He married little Betty Bump, who was exhibited under the name of Lavinia Warren. She was left a widow in 1883, and in 1885 married count Primo Magri, who was 32 inches in height.

THUMB (Tom), 2 feet 4 inches. A Dutch dwarf, master of four languages.

WANMER (Lucy). Height 30 inches, weight 45 lbs. at the age of 53. Exhibited in 1801.

WORMBERG (John). Height 31 inches at the age of 36. In the Hanoverian period.

XIT, the royal dwarf of Edward VI.

N.B.—Nicephorus Callistus tells us of an Egyptian dwarf "not bigger than a partridge."

Dwarf (The) of lady Clerimond was named Pac'olet. He had a winged horse, which carried off Valentine, Orson, and Clerimond from the dungeon of Ferrăgus to the palace of king Pepin; and subsequently carried Valentine to the palace of Alexander, his father, emperor of Constantinople. — Valentine and Orson (fifteenth century).

Dwarf (The Black), a fairy of malignant propensities, and considered the author of all the mischief of the neighbourhood. In sir Walter Scott's novel so called, this imp is introduced under various aliases, as sir Edward Manley, Elshander the Recluse, Cannie Elshie, and the Wise Wight of Micklestane Moor.

Dwarf Alberich, the guardian of the Nibelungen hoard. He is twice vanquished by Siegfried, who gets possession of his cloak of invisibility, and makes himself master of the hoard. — The Nibelungen Lied (twelfth century).

Dwarf Peter, an allegorical romance by Ludwig Tieck. The dwarf is a castle spectre, who advises and aids the family; but all his advice turns out evil, and all his aid is productive of trouble. The dwarf is meant for "the law in our members, which wars against the law of our minds, and brings us into captivity to the law of sin."

Dwining (Henbane), a pottingar or apothecary.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

"Dying Christian to his Soul (The)," an ode by Pope (1712). In some measure suggested by Hadrian's famous Latin verses—

> Animula, vagula, blandula,
> Hospes comesque corpŏris,
> Quæ nunc abibis in loca,
> Pallida, rigida, nudula.
> Brief-living, blithe-little, fluttering spright,
> Comrade and guest in this body of clay,
> Whither, ah! whither departing in flight,
> Rigid, half-naked, pale minion away?
> E.C.B.

Dying Sayings (real or traditional). (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, pp. 395–398.)

Dyot Street (Bloomsbury Square, London), now called George Street, St. Giles. The famous song, "My Lodging is in Heather Lane," is in Bombastes Furioso, by T. B. Rhodes (1790).

> My lodging is in Heather Lane,
> In a parlour that's next to the sky, etc.

Dys'colus, Moroseness personified in The Purple Island, by Phineas Fletcher (1633). "He nothing liked or praised." Fully described in canto viii. (Greek, duskolos, "fretful.")

Dysmas, Dismas, or Demas, the penitent thief crucified with our Lord.

The impenitent thief is called Gesmas or Gestas.

Alta petit Dismas, infelix infima Gesmas.
Part of a Charm.

To paradise thief Dismas went,
But Gesmas died impenitent.

E.

Eadburgh, daughter of Edward the Elder, king of England, and Eadgifu his wife. When three years old, her father placed on the child some rings and bracelets, and showed her a chalice and a book of the Gospels, asking which she would have. The child chose the chalice and book, and Edward was pleased that "the child would be a daughter of God." She became a nun, and lived and died in Winchester.

Eagle (The), ensign of the Roman legion. Before the Cimbrian war, the wolf, the horse, and the boar were also borne as ensigns; but Marius abolished these, and retained the eagle only, hence called emphatically "The Roman Bird."

Eagle (The Theban), Pindar, a native of Thebes (B.C. 518-442).

Eagle of Brittany, Bertrand Dugueselin, constable of France (1320-1380).

Eagle of Divines, Thomas Aquinas (1224-1274).

Eagle of Meaux [Mo], Jacques Bénigne Bossuet, bishop of Meaux (1627-1704).

Eagle of the Doctors of France, Pierre d'Ailly, a great astrologer, who maintained that the stars foretold the great flood (1350-1425).

Earnscliff (Patrick), the young laird of Earnscliff.—Sir W. Scott The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Earthly Paradise (The), a poem by William Morris (1868). In imitation of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. Certain Norwegians, having heard of the earthly paradise, set sail to discover it, and beguile the time by telling mythological tales. The tales are in various metres. There are also short odes on the months.

East Lynne, a novel by Mrs. Henry Wood (1861).

East Saxons or Essex, capital Colchester, founded by Erchinwin. Sebert began to reign in Essex in 604. According to tradition, where Westminster Abbey now stands was a heathen temple to Apollo, which Sebert either converted into a church called St. Peter's, or pulled down and erected a church so called on the same site.

. . . from the loins of Erchinwin (who raised
Th' East Saxons' kingdom first) brave Sebert may be praised,
[Who] began the goodly church of Westminster to rear.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xi. (1613).

Eastbury House (Barking), said to be the place where the conspirators concerned in the Gunpowder Plot held their meetings; and where they hoped, from a high tower, to see the result of their plot. It is also said that lord Monteagle resided there when he received the letter advising him not to attend the parliament which God and man would hold accursed.

Eastward Hoe, a comedy by Chapman, Marston, and Ben Jonson. For this drama the three authors were imprisoned "for disrespect to their sovereign lord king James I." (1605). (See WESTWARD HOE.)

Easy (Sir Charles), a man who hated trouble; "so lazy, even in his pleasures, that he would rather lose the woman of his pursuit, than go through any trouble in securing or keeping her." He says he is resolved in future to "follow no pleasure that rises above the degree of amusement." "When once a woman comes to reproach me with vows, and usage, and such stuff, I would as soon hear her talk of bills, bonds, and ejectments; her passion becomes as troublesome as a law-suit, and I would as soon converse with my solicitor" (act iii.).

Lady Easy, wife of sir Charles, who dearly loves him, and knows all his "naughty ways," but never shows the slightest indication of ill temper or jealousy. At last she wholly reclaims him.—Cibber: The Careless Husband (1704).

Eatanswill Gazette, the persistent opponent of the Eatanswill Independent.—Dickens: Pickwick Papers (1836).

Eberson (Earl), the young son of William de la Marck "The Wild Boar of Ardennes."—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Eblis, monarch of the spirits of evil. Once an angel of light, but, refusing to worship Adam, he lost his high estate

Before his fall he was called Aza'zel. The Korân says, "When We [God] said unto the angels, 'Worship Adam,' they all worshipped except Eblis, who refused . . . and became of the number of unbelievers" (ch. ii.).

His person was that of a young man, whose noble and regular features seemed to have been tarnished by malignant vapours. In his large eyes appeared both pride and despair. His flowing hair retained some resemblance to that of an angel of light. In his hand (which thunder had blasted) he swayed the iron sceptre that causes the afrits and all the powers of the abyss to tremble.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Ebon Spear (Knight of the), Britomart, daughter of king Ryence of Wales. —Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. (1590).

Ebony, a punning appellation given by James Hogg to William Blackwood, publisher of Blackwood's Magazine.

And I looked, and behold a man clothed in plain apparel stood in the door of his house; and I saw his name . . . and his name as it had been the colour of ebony.—J. Hogg: The Chaldee MS. (1817).

Ebrauc, son of Mempric (son of Guendôlen and Madden) mythical king of England. He built Kaer-brauc [York], about the time that David reigned in Judæa.—Geoffrey: British History, ii. 7 (1142).

By Ebrauk's powerful hand
York lifts her towers aloft.
Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1612).

Ebu'dæ, the Hebrides.

Ecce Homo, a theological work attributed to professor Seeley, the object being to show the humanity of Jesus (1865).

Ecclesiastes (The Book of), one of the poetical books of the Old Testament, the object of which is to show that only holiness and submission to the will of God will secure happiness.

Wisdom and pleasure will not ensure happiness (chs. i., ii.); nor will industry and the performance of one's duties (chs. iii., iv.); nor yet riches and prosperity (chs. v., vi.).

Ecclesiastical History (The Father of), Eusebius of Cæsarea (264-340).

∴ His Historia Ecclesiastica, in ten books, begins with the birth of Christ and concludes with the defeat of Licinius by Constantine, A.D. 324.

Ecclesiastical Politie (The Laws of), by Richard Hooper, in four books (1594). Four other books were subsequently added.

Ecclesiasticus, one of the books of the "Apocrypha."

Echeph'ron, an old soldier, who rebuked the advisers of king Picrochole (3 syl.), by relating to them the fable of The Man and his Ha'p'orth of Milk. The fable is as follows:—

A shoemaker bought a ha'p'orth of milk; with this he was going to make butter; the butter was to buy a cow; the cow was to have a calf; the calf was to be changed for a colt; and the man was to become a nabob; only he cracked his jug, spilt his milk, and went supperless to bed.—Rabelais: Pantagruel, i. 33 (1533).

¶ This fable is told in the Arabian Nights ("The Barber's Fifth Brother, Alnaschar"). Lafontaine has put it into verse, Perrette et le Pot au Lait. Dodsley has the same, The Milk-maid and her Pail of Milk.

Echo, in classic poetry, is a female, and in English also; but in Ossian echo is called "the son of the rock."—Songs of Selma.

Echo Verses on Juan of Austria. Juan was brought up by Louis Quixada of the imperial household, and till the age of 14 was supposed to be his son; but Philip II. said to the lad, "You have the same father that I have, the emperor Charles (V.)." Barbara Blomberg, a washer-woman of Ratisbon, was said to have been his mother; but Barbara told him it was a great mistake to suppose that Charles (V.) was his father.

Sed ad Austriacum nostrum redeāmus:

● "Nothum" of Barbara Blomberg.
† "Patre," Charles V.
‡ "Itali" [and] a mechanic of Ratisbon.

To the mere English reader the following will give an idea of what Echo said:—

But let us to our hero now return:
Echo return:
Some have maintained he was of Cæsar's race born,
Echo base born,
And if not Cæsar's self, yet of his family.
Echo a lie.
Etc. etc. etc.

Eck'hart (The Faithful), a good servant, who perishes to save his master's children from the mountain fiends.—Louis Tieck.

(Carlyle has translated this tale into English.)

Eclecta, the "Elect" personified in The Purple Island, by Phineas Fletcher. She is the daughter of Intellect and Violetta (free-will); and ultimately becomes the bride of Jesus Christ, "the bridegroom" (canto xii., 1633).

> But let the Kentish lad [Phineas Fletcher] . . . that sung and crowned > Eclecta's hymen with ten thousand flowers
> Of choicest praise . . . be the sweet pipe.
> G. Fletcher: Christ's Triumph, etc. (1610).

Eclipses Utilized. Thales (2 syl.) brought about peace between the Medes and Lydians by his knowledge of eclipses.

¶ Columbus procured provisions from the people of Jamaica by his foreknowledge of an eclipse.

Ecne'phia, a hurricane, similar to the typhoon.

> The circling Typhon, whirled from point to point . . .
> And dire Ecnephia reign.
> Thomson: The Seasons ("Summer," 1727).

École des Femmes, a comedy of Molière, the plot of which is borrowed from the novelletti of Ser Giovanni (1378).

Ector (Sir), "lord of many parts of England and Wales, and foster-father of prince Arthur." His son, sir Key or Kay, was seneschal or steward of Arthur when he became king.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 3 (1470).

N.B.—Sir Ector and sir Ector de Maris are two distinct persons.

Ector de Maris (Sir), brother "of sir Launcelot" of Benwick, i.e. Brittany.

> Then sir Ector threw his shield, his sword, and his helm from him, and . . . he fell down in a swoon; and when he awaked, it were hard for any tongue to tell the doleful complaints [lamentations] that he made for his brother. "Ah, sir Launcelot," said he, "head of all Christian knights!" . . . etc.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 176 (1470).

Eden (The Garden of). There is a region of Bavaria so called, because, like Eden, it is watered by four streams, viz. the White Maine, the Eger, the Saale, and the Naab.

∴ In the Korân the word Eden means "everlasting abode." Thus in ch. ix. we read, "God promiseth to true believers gardens of perpetual abode," literally, "gardens of Eden."

Eden, in America. A dismal swamp, the climate of which generally proved fatal to the poor dupes who were induced to settle there through the swindling transactions of general Scadder and general Choke. So dismal and dangerous was the place, that even Mark Tapley was satisfied to have found at last a place where he could "come out jolly with credit."—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Eden of Germany (Das Eden Deutschlands). Baden is so called on account of its mountain scenery, its extensive woods, its numerous streams, its mild climate, and its fertile soil. The valley of Treisam, in the grandduchy, is locally called "Hell Valley" (Höllenthall). Between this and the lake Constance lies what is called "The Kingdom of Heaven."

Edenhall (The Luck of), an old painted goblet, left by the fairies on St. Cuthbert's Well in the garden of Edenhall. The superstition is that if ever this goblet is lost or broken, there will be no more luck in the family. The goblet came into the possession of sir Christopher Musgrave, bart., Edenhall, Cumberland.

(Longfellow has a poem on The Luck of Edenhall, translated from Uhland.)

EDGAR (959–975), "king of all the English," was not crowned till he had reigned thirteen years (A.D. 973). Then the ceremony was performed at Bath. After this he sailed to Chester, and eight of his vassal kings came with their fleets to pay him homage, and swear fealty to him by land and sea. The eight are Kenneth (king of Scots), Malcolm (of Cumberland), Maccus (of the Isles), and five Welsh princes, whose names were Dufnal, Siferth, Huwal, Jacob, and Juchil. The eight kings rowed Edgar in a boat (while he acted as steersman) from Chester to St. John's, where they offered prayer, and then returned.

> At Chester, while he [Edgar] lived, at more than kingly charge,
> Eight tributary kings there rowed him in his barge.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xii. (1613).

Edgar, son of Gloucester, and his lawful heir. He was disinherited by Edmund, natural son of the earl.—Shakespeare: King Lear (1605).

∴ This was one of the characters of Robert Wilks (1670–1732), and also of Charles Kemble (1774–1854).

Edgar, master of Ravenswood, son of Allan of Ravenswood (a decayed Scotch nobleman). Lucy Ashton, being attacked by a wild bull, was saved by Edgar, who shot it; and the two, falling in love with each other, plighted their mutual troth, and exchanged love-tokens at the "Mermaid's Fountain." While Edgar was absent in France on State affairs, sir William Ashton, being deprived of his office as lord keeper, was induced to promise his daughter Lucy in marriage to Frank Hayston, laird of Bucklaw, and they were married; but next morning, Bucklaw was found wounded, and the bride hidden in the chimney-corner, insane. Lucy died in convulsions, but Bucklaw recovered and went abroad. Edgar was lost in the quicksands at Kelpies Flow, in accordance with an ancient prophecy.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

 In the opera, Edgar is made to stab himself.

Edgar, an attendant on prince Robert of Scotland.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Edgardo, master of Ravenswood, in love with Lucia di Lammermoor [Lucy Ashton]. While absent in France on State affairs, the lady is led to believe him faithless, and consents to marry the laird of Bucklaw; but she stabs him on the bridal night, goes mad, and dies. Edgardo also stabs himself.—Donizetti: Lucia di Lammermoor (1835).

N.B.—In the novel called The Bride of Lammermoor, by sir W. Scott, Edgar is lost in the quicksands at Kelpies Flow, in accordance with an ancient prophecy.

Edgeworth (L'Abbé), who attended Louis XVI. to the scaffold, was called "Mons. de Firmount," a corruption of Fairymount, in Longford (Ireland), where the Edgeworths had extensive domains.

Edging (Mistress), a prying, mischief-making waiting-woman, in The Careless Husband, by Colley Cibber (1704).

Edi'na, a poetical form of the word Edinburgh. It was first employed by Buchanan (1506–1582).

> And pale Edina shuddered at the sound.
> Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Edinburgh, a corruption of Edwinsburg, the fort built by Edwin king of Northumbria (616–633).

 Dun-Edin or Dunedin is a mere translation of Edinburgh. Dun = berg = hill. Edwinstowe, or Edwin's seat.

Edinburgh Review (The), started in 1802 by Francis Jeffrey (afterwards lord Jeffrey) and others.

EDITH, daughter of Baldwin the tutor of Rollo and Otto dukes of Normandy.—Beaumont: The Bloody Brother (published 1639).

Edith, the "maid of Lorn" (Argyllshire), was on the point of being married to lord Ronald, when Robert, Edward, and Isabel Bruce sought shelter at the castle. Edith's brother recognized Robert Bruce, and, being in the English interest, a quarrel ensued. The abbot refused to marry the bridal pair amidst such discord. Edith fled, and in the character of a page had many adventures; but at the restoration of peace after the battle of Bannockburn, she was duly married to lord Ronald.—Sir W. Scott: Lord of the Isles (1815).

Edith (The lady), mother of Athelstane "the Unready" (thane of Coningsburgh).—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Edith GRANGER, daughter of the hon. Mrs. Skewton, married at the age of 18 to colonel Granger of "Ours," who died within two years, when Edith and her mother lived as adventuresses. Edith became Mr. Dombey's second wife; but the marriage was altogether an unhappy one, and she eloped with Mr. Carker to Dijon, where she left him, having taken this foolish step merely to annoy her husband for the slights to which he had subjected her. On leaving Carker, Edith went to live with her cousin Feenix, in the south of England.—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Edith Plantagenet (The lady), called "The Fair Maid of Anjou," a kinswoman of Richard I., and attendant on queen Berenga'ria. She married David earl of Huntingdon (prince royal of Scotland), and is introduced by sir W. Scott in The Talisman (1825).

Edmund, natural son of the earl of Gloucester. Both Goneril and Regan (daughters of king Lear) were in love with him. Regan, on the death of her husband, designed to marry Edmund, but Goneril, out of jealousy, poisoned her sister Regan.—Shakespeare: King Lear (1605).

Edo'nian Band (The), the priestesses and other ministers of Bacchus; so called from Edo'nus, a mountain of Thrace, where the rites of the wine-god were celebrated.

> Accept the rites your bounty well may claim,
> Nor heed the scoffings of th' Edonian band.
> Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads (1767).

Edrio, a domestic at Hereward's barracks.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

EDWARD, brother of Hereward (3 syl.) the Varangian guard. He was slain in battle.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Edward (Sir). He commits a murder, and keeps a narrative of the transaction in an iron chest. Wilford, a young man who acts as his secretary, was one day caught prying into this chest, and sir Edward's first impulse was to kill him; but on second thoughts he swore the young man to secrecy, and told him the story of the murder. Wilford, unable to live under the suspicious eye of his master, ran away; but was hunted down by sir Edward, and accused of robbery. The whole transaction now became public, and Wilford was acquitted.—Colman: The Iron Chest (1796).

(This drama is based on Goodwin's novel of Caleb Williams. "Williams" is called Wilford in the drama, and "Falkland" sir Edward Mortimer.)

Sowerby, whose mind was always in a ferment, was wont to commit the most ridiculous mistakes. Thus when "sir Edward" says to "Wilford," "You may have noticed in my library a chest," he transposed the words thus: "You may have noticed in my chest a library," and the house was convulsed with laughter.—Russell: Representative Actors (appendix).

Edward II., a tragedy by C. Marlowe (1592), imitated by Shakespeare in his Richard II. (1597). Probably most readers would prefer Marlowe's noble tragedy to Shakespeare's.

Edward IV. of England, introduced by sir W. Scott in his novel entitled Anne of Geierstein (1829).

Edward the Black Prince, a tragedy by W. Shirley (1640). The subject of this drama is the victory of Poitiers.

Yes, Philip lost the battle [Cressy], with the odds
Of three to one. In this [Poitiers] . . .
They have our numbers more than twelve times told,
If we can trust report.
Act III. sc. 2.

Edward Street (Cavendish Square, London) is so called from Edward second earl of Oxford and Mortimer. (See HENRIETTA STREET.)

Ed'widge, wife of William Tell.—Rossini: Guglielmo Tell (1829).

Edwin "the minstrel," a youth living in romantic seclusion, with a great thirst for knowledge. He lived in Gothic days in the north countrie, and fed his flocks on Scotia's mountains.

And yet poor Edwin was no vulgar boy,
Deep thought oft seemed to fix his infant eye.
Dainties he heeded not, nor gaude, nor toy,
Save one short pipe of rudest minstrelsy;
Silent when glad, affectionate, yet shy; . . .
And now he laughed aloud, yet none knew why.
The neighbours stared and sighed, yet blessed the lad;
Some deemed him wondrous wise, and some believed him mad.
Beattie: The Minstrel, I. (1737).

Edwin and Angeli'na. Angelina was the daughter of a wealthy lord "beside the Tyne." Her hand was sought in marriage by many suitors, amongst whom was Edwin, "who had neither wealth nor power, but he had both wisdom and worth." Angelina loved him, but "trifled with him," and Edwin, in despair, left her, and retired from the world. One day, Angelina, in boy's clothes, asked hospitality at a hermit's cell; she was kindly entertained, told her tale, and the hermit proved to be Edwin. From that hour they never parted more.—Goldsmith: The Hermit.

A correspondent accuses me of having taken this ballad from The Friar of Orders Gray . . . but if there is any resemblance between the two, Mr. Percy's ballad is taken from mine. I read my ballad to Mr. Percy, and he told me afterwards that he had taken my plan to form the fragments of Shakespeare into a ballad of his own.—Signed, O. Goldsmith (1767).

Two familiar lines are from this ballad—

Man wants but little here below,
Nor wants that little long.

Edwin and Emma. Emma was a rustic beauty of Stanemore, who loved Edwin "the pride of swains;" but Edwin's sister, out of envy, induced his father, "a sordid man," to forbid any intercourse between Edwin and the cottage. Edwin pined away, and being on the point of death, requested he might be allowed to see Emma. She came and said to him, "My Edwin, live for me;" but on her way home she heard the death-bell toll. She just contrived to reach her cottage door, cried to her mother, "He's gone!" and fell down dead at her feet.—Mallet: Edwin and Emma (a ballad).

Ed'yrn, son of Nudd. He ousted the earl of Yn'iol from his earldom, and tried to win E'nid the earl's daughter; but failing in this, he became the evil genius of the gentle earl. Ultimately, being sent to the court of king Arthur, he became quite a changed man—from a malicious "sparrow-hawk" he was converted into a courteous gentleman. — Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("Enid").

Eel. The best in the world are those of Ancum, a river in that division of Lincolnshire called Lindsey (the highest part). The best pike are from the Witham, in the division of Lincolnshire called Kesteven (in the west).

As Kesteven doth boast her Wytham, so have I
My Ancum . . . whose fame as far doth fly
For fat and dainty eels, as her's doth for her pike.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxv. (1622).

Ef'eso (St.), a saint honoured in Pisa. He was a Roman officer [Ephesus] in the service of Diocletian, whose reign was marked by a great persecution of the Christians. This Efeso or Ephesus was appointed to see the decree of the emperor against the obnoxious sect carried out in the island of Sardinia; but being warned in a dream not to persecute the servants of the Lord, both he and his friend Potito embraced Christianity, and received a standard from Michael the archangel himself. On one occasion, being taken captive, St. Efeso was cast into a furnace of fire, but received no injury; whereas those who cast him in were consumed by the flames. Ultimately, both Efeso and Potito suffered martyrdom, and were buried in the island of Sardinia. When, however, that island was conquered by Pisa in the eleventh century, the relics of the two martyrs were carried off and interred in the duomo of Pisa, and the banner of St. Efeso was thenceforth adopted as the national ensign of Pisa.

Egalité (Philippe), the duc d'Orléans, father of Louis Philippe king of the French. He himself assumed this "title" when he joined the revolutionary party, whose motto was "Liberty, Fraternity, and Egalité" (born 1747, guillotined 1793).

Egerton (Audley), a statesman, the rival of Henry l'Estrange for the love of Nora Avenel.—Lord Lytton: My Novel (1853).

Ege'us (3 syl.), father of Her'mia. He summoned her before The'seus (2 syl.) duke of Athens, because she refused to marry Demetrius, to whom he had promised her in marriage; and he requested that she might either be compelled to marry him or else be dealt with "according to the law," i.e. "either to die the death," or else to "endure the livery of a nun, and live a barren sister all her life." Hermia refused to submit to an "unwished yoke," and fled from Athens with Lysander. Demetrius, seeing that Hermia disliked him but that Hel'ena doted on him, consented to abandon the one and wed the other. When Egeus was informed thereof, he withdrew his summons, and gave his consent to the union of his daughter with Lysander.—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

 S. Knowles, in The Wife, makes the plot turn on a similar "law of marriage" (1833).

E'gil, brother of Weland; a great archer. One day, king Nidung commanded him to shoot at an apple placed on the head of his own son. Egil selected two arrows, and being asked why he wanted two, replied, "One to shoot thee with, O tyrant, if I fail."

(This is one of the many stories similar to that of William Tell, q.v.)

Egilo'na, the wife of Roderick last of the Gothic kings of Spain. She was very beautiful, but cold-hearted, vain, and fond of pomp. After the fall of Roderick Egilona married Abdal-Aziz, the Moorish governor of Spain; and when Abdal-Aziz was killed by the Moorish rebels, Egilona fell also.

> The popular rage
> Fell on them both; and they to whom her name
> Had been a mark for mockery and reproach,
> Shuddered with human horror at her fate.
> Southey: Roderick, etc., xxii. (1814).

Eg'la, a female Moor, servant to Amaranta (wife of Bar'tolus, the covetous lawyer).—Fletcher: The Spanish Curate (1622). Beaumont died 1616.

Eg'lamour (Sir) or SIR EGLAMORE of Artoys, a knight of Arthurian romance. Sir Eglamour and sir Pleindamour have no French original, although the names themselves are French.

Eg'lamour, the person who aids Silvia, daughter of the duke of Milan, in her escape.—Shakespeare: The Two Gentlemen of Verona (1594).

Eg'lantine (3 syl.), daughter of king Pepin, and bride of her cousin Valentine (brother of Orson). She soon died.—Valentine and Orson (fifteenth century).

Eglantine (Madame), the prioress; good-natured, wholly ignorant of the world, vain of her delicacy of manner at table, and fond of lap-dogs. Her dainty oath was "By Seint Eloy!" She "entuned the service swetely in her nose," and spoke French "after the scole of Stratford-atte-Bowe."—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (1388).

Egypt. The head-gear of the king of Upper Egypt was a high conical white cap, terminating in a knob at the top. That of the king of Lower Egypt was red. If a king ruled over both countries, he wore both caps, but that of Lower Egypt was placed outside. This composite head-dress was called the pschent.

Egypt, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, means France.

> Proud Egypt would dissembling friendship bring,
> Foment the war but not support the king.
> Part I. lines 285, 286 (1682).

Egyptian Disposition (An), a thievish propensity, "gipsy" being a contracted form of Egyptian.

"I no sooner saw it was money . . . than my Egyptian disposition prevailed, and I was seized with a desire of stealing it.—Lesage: Gil Blas, x. 10 (1735).

Egyptian Thief (The), Thyămis, a native of Memphis. Knowing he must die, he slew Chariclea, the woman he loved.

Why should I not, had I the heart to do it,
Like to th' Egyptian thief at point of death,
Kill what I love?
Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, act v. sc. 1 (1614).

Eighth Wonder (The). When Gil Blas reached Pennaflor, a parasite entered his room in the inn, hugged him with great energy, and called him "the eighth wonder." When Gil Blas replied that he did not know his name had spread so far, the parasite exclaimed, "How! we keep a register of all the celebrated names within twenty leagues, and have no doubt Spain will one day be as proud of you as Greece was of the seven sages." After this, Gil Blas could do no less than ask the man to sup with him. Omelet after omelet was despatched, trout was called for, bottle followed bottle, and when the parasite was gorged to satiety, he rose and said, "Signor Gil Blas, don't believe yourself to be the eighth wonder of the world because a hungry man would feast by flattering your vanity." So saying, he stalked away with a laugh.—Lesage: Gil Blas, i. 2 (1715).

(This incident is copied from Aleman's romance of Guzman d'Alfarache, q.v.)

Eikon Basil'ike (4 syl.), the portraiture of a king (i.e. Charles I.), once attributed to king Charles himself; but now admitted to be the production of Dr. John Gauden, who (after the restoration) was first created bishop of Exeter, and then of Worcester (1605-1662).

In the Eikon Basilikê a strain of majestic melancholy is kept up, but the personated sovereign is rather too theatrical for real nature, the language is too rhetorical and amplified, the periods too artificially elaborated.—Hallam: Literature of Europe, iii. 66a.

(Milton wrote his Eikonoclastês in answer to Dr. Gauden's Eikon Basilikê.)

Einer'iar, the hall of Odin, and asylum of warriors slain in battle. It had 540 gates, each sufficiently wide to admit eight men abreast to pass through.—Scandinavian Mythology.

Einion (Father), chaplain to Gwenwyn prince of Powys-land.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Eivir, a Danish maid, who assumes boy's clothing, and waits on Harold "the Dauntless," as his page. Subsequently, her sex is discovered, and Harold marries her.—Sir W. Scott: Harold the Dauntless (1817).

Elain, sister of king Arthur by the same mother. She married sir Nentres of Carlot, and was by king Arthur the mother of Mordred. (See ELEIN, p. 318.)—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. (1470).

N.B.—In some of the romances there is great confusion between Elain (the sister) and Morgause (the half-sister) of Arthur. Both are called the mother of Mordred, and both are also called the wife of Lot. This, however, is a mistake. Elain was the wife of sir Nentres, and Morgause of Lot; and if Gawain, Agrawain, Gareth, and Gahĕris were [half-]brothers of Mordred, as we are told over and over again, then Morgause and not Elain was his mother. Tennyson makes Bellicent the wife of Lot, but this is not in accordance with any of the legends collected by sir T. Malory.

Elaine (Dame), daughter of king Pelles (2 syl.) "of the foragn country," and the unwedded mother of sir Galahad by sir Launcelot du Lac.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 2 (1470).

Elaine, daughter of king Brandeg'oris, by whom sir Bors de Ganis had a child.

For all women was sir Bors a virgin, save for one, the daughter of king Brandegoris, on whom he had a child, hight Elaine; save for her, sir Bors was a clean maid.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 4 (1470).

 It is by no means clear from the history whether Elaine was the daughter of king Brandegoris, or the daughter of sir Bors and granddaughter of king Brandegoris.

Elaine' (2 syl.), the strong contrast of Guinevere. Guinevere's love for Launcelot was gross and sensual, Elaine's was platonic and pure as that of a child; but both were masterful in their strength. Elaine is called "the lily maid of As'tolat" (Guildford), and knowing that Launcelot was pledged to celibacy, she pined and died. According to her dying request, her dead body was placed on a bed in a barge, and was thus conveyed by a dumb servitor to the palace of king Arthur. A letter was handed to the king, telling the tale of Elaine's love, and he ordered her story to be blazoned on her tomb.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 123 (1470).

(One of Tennyson's Idylls is "Elaine.")

El'amites (3 syl.), Persians. So called from Elam, son of Shem.—Acts ii. 9.

El'berich, the most famous dwarf of German romance.—The Heldenbuch.

El'bow, a well-meaning but loutish constable.—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure (1603).

Elden Hole, in Derbyshire Peak, said to be fathomless.

Elder Brother (The), a comedy by John Fletcher (1637). Charles is supposed to be wholly absorbed in books, but, at the first sight of Angelina, falls over head and ears in love.

Elder Tree (The). There are several legends connected with this tree: (1) It is said that the cross was made of elder wood; (2) it is also said that Judas hanged himself on this tree. The two legends are closely linked together. If Judas hanged himself on an elder tree, no doubt the cross was the remote cause of his death. So, again, if the cross was of elder wood, it certainly brought about the death of Judas. Thus the accursed tree of Jesus was in reality the accursed tree of the traitor also.

 Shakespeare, in Love's Labour's Lost, says, "Judas was hanged on an elder."

Probably both are poetic symbols. Elder may be called the heartless wood. It was a heartless deed to crucify Jesus. And Judas was a heartless man to betray so good a Master.

El Dora'do, the "golden city." So the Spaniards called Man'hoa of Guia'na. (See DORADO, EL, p. 293.)

> Guiana, whose great city Geryon's sons
> Call "El Dorado."
> Milton: Paradise Lost, xi. 411 (1665).

El'eanor, queen-consort of Henry II., alluded to by the presbyterian minister in Woodstock, x. (1826).

"Believe me, young man, thy servant was more likely to see visions than to dream idle dreams in that apartment; for I have always heard that next to Rosamond's Bower, in which . . . she played the wanton, and was afterwards poisoned by queen Eleanor, Victor Lee's chamber was the place . . . peculiarly the haunt of evil spirits."—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Eleanor Crosses, twelve or fourteen crosses erected by Edward I. in the various towns where the body of his queen rested, when it was conveyed from Herdelie, near Lincoln, to Westminster. The three that still remain are Geddington, Northampton, and Waltham.

(In front of the South-Eastern Railway station, Strand, London, is a model of the Charing Cross, of the original dimensions.)

 There is a tradition that Eleanor sucked the poison of a poisoned arrow from a wound of Edward I.

Eleazar the Moor, insolent, bloodthirsty, lustful, and vindictive.—Marlowe: Lust's Dominion, or The Lascivious Queen (1588).

Eleazar, a famous mathematician, who cast out devils by tying to the nose of the possessed a mystical ring, which the demon no sooner smelled than he abandoned the victim. He performed before the emperor Vespasian; and to prove that something came out of the possessed, he commanded the demon in making off to upset a pitcher of water, which it did.

I imagine if Eleazar's ring had been put under their noses, we should have seen devils issue with their breath, so loud were these disputants.—Lesage: Gil Blas, v. 12 (1724).

Elector (The Great), Frederick William of Brandenburg (1620-1688).

Elegy to an Unfortunate Lady, by Pope. The lady was Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Joseph Gage, and wife of John Weston of Sutton. They were separated; and Pope's interest in the lady gave birth to considerable scandal.

Elegy written in a Country Church Yard, by Gray (1750). The "Church yard" was that of Stoke Pogis, near Eton.

(Many English poets have written elegies: as Michael Bruce (1770); Drayton (1593); John Scot (1782); Shenstone (1743-1746); and others.)

Elein, wife of king Ban of Benwick (Brittany), and mother of sir Launcelot and sir Lionell. (See ELAIN, p. 317.)—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 60 (1470).

Elephant in the Moon (The), by S. Butler (1654), a satire in verse on the Royal Society. It supposes that an insect crawling over the object-glass of a telescope was mistaken by the telescopist for an elephant in the moon.

Eleven Thousand Virgins (The), the virgins who followed St. Ursula in her flight towards Rome. They were all massacred at Cologne by a party of Huns, and even to the present hour "their bones" are exhibited to visitors through windows in the wall.

A calendar in the Freisingen codex notices them as "SS. M. XI. VIRGINUM," that is, eleven virgin martyrs; but "M" (martyrs) being taken for 1000, we get 11,000. It is furthermore remarkable that the number of names known of these virgins is eleven: (1) Ursula, (2) Sencia, (3) Gregoria, (4) Pinnosa, (5) Martha, (6) Saula, (7) Brittola, (8) Saturnina, (9) Rabacia or Sabatia, (10) Saturia or Saturnia, and (11) Palladia.

Elfenreigen [el.f'n-ri'gn] (4 syl.) or Alpleich, that weird music with which Bunting, the pied piper of Hamelin, led forth the rats into the river Weser, and the children into a cave in the mountain Koppenberg. The song of the sirens is so called. (Reigen, a dance and the music thereof.)

El'feta, wife of Cambuscan' king of Tartary.

El'flida or ÆTHELFLÆDA, daughter of king Alfred, and wife of Æthelred chief of that part of Mercia not claimed by the Danes. She was a woman of enormous energy and masculine mind. At the death of her husband, Elflida ruled over Mercia, and proceeded to fortify Bridgenorth, Tamworth, Warwick, Hertford, Witham, and other cities. Then, attacking the Danes, she drove them from place to place, and kept them from molesting her.

When Elflida up-grew . . .
The puissant Danish powers victoriously pursued,
And resolutely here thro' their thick squadrons hewed
Her way into the north.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xii. (1613).

Elf'thryth or Ælf'thryth, daughter of Ordgar, noted for her great beauty. King Edgar sent Æthelwald, his friend, to ascertain if she were really as beautiful as report made her out to be. When Æthelwald saw her he fell in love with her, and then, returning to the king, said she was not handsome enough for the king, but was rich enough to make a very eligible wife for himself. The king assented to the match, and became godfather to the first child, who was called Edgar. One day the king told his friend he intended to pay him a visit, and Æthelwald revealed to his wife the story of his deceit, imploring her at the same time to conceal her beauty. But Elfthryth, extremely indignant, did all she could to set forth her charms. The king fell in love with her, slew Æthelwald, and married the widow.

¶ A similar story is told by Herodotus —Prêxaspês being the lady's name, and Kambysês the king's.

Elgin Marbles, certain statues and bas-reliefs collected by lord Elgin, and purchased of him by the British Government for £35,000, to be placed in the British Museum. Chiefly fragments of the Parthĕnon of Athens.

El'githa, a female attendant at Rotherwood on the lady Rowe'na.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

E'lia, the assumed name of Charles Lamb, author of the Essays of Elia, contributed to the London Magazine between 1820 and 1825.

Eli'ab, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is Henry Bennet, earl of Arlington. As Eliab befriended David (1 Chron. xii. 9), so the earl befriended Charles II.

Hard the task to do Eliab right:
Long with the royal wanderer he roved,
And firm in all the turns of fortune proved.
Absalom and Achitophel, ii. 986–988 (1682).

Eliakim, in Pordage's satire of Azariah and Hushai, was intended for James duke of York (James II.).

Elian God (The), Bacchus. An error for 'Eleuan, i.e. "the god Elĕleus" (3 syl.). Bacchus was called El'eleus from the Bacchic cry, Elĕleu!

As when with crownèd cups unto the Elian god
Those priests high orgies held.
Drayton: Polyolbion, vi. (1612).

El'idure (3 syl.), surnamed "the Pious," brother of Gorbonian, and one of the five sons of Morvi'dus (q.v.). He resigned the crown to his brother Arthgallo, who had been deposed. Ten years afterwards, Arthgallo died, and Elidure was again advanced to the throne, but was deposed and imprisoned by his two younger brothers. At the death of these two brothers, Elidure was taken from prison, and mounted the British throne for the third time.—Geoffrey: British History, iii. 17, 18 (1470).

Then Elidure again, crowned with applaudive praise,
As he a brother raised, by brothers was deposed
And put into the Tower . . . but, the usurpers dead,
Thrice was the British crown set on his reverend head.
Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1612).

(Wordsworth has a poem on this subject.)

Elijah fed by Ravens. While Elijah was at the brook Cherith, in concealment, ravens brought him food every morning and evening.—1 Kings xvii. 6.

¶ A strange parallel is recorded of Wyatt, in the reign of queen Mary. The queen cast him into prison, and when he was nearly starved to death, a cat appeared at the window-grating, and dropped into his hand a pigeon, which the warder cooked for him. This was repeated daily.

In the Dictionary of Miracles are numerous parallels.

E'lim, the guardian angel of Lebbæus (3 syl.) the apostle. Lebbeus, the softest and most tender of the twelve, at the death of Jesus "sank under the burden of his grief."—Klopstock: The Messiah, iii. (1748).

El'ion, consort of Beruth, and father of Ghe.—Sanchoniathon.

Eliot (George), a name assumed by Marian Evans, afterwards Mrs. J. W. Cross, author of Adam Bede (1858), The Mill on the Floss (1860), Silas Marner (1861), Romola (1863), Middlemarch (1872), etc.

Elisa, often written Eliza in English, Dido queen of Carthage.

> . . . nec me meminisse pigebit Elisæ,
> Dum memor ipse mei, dum spiritus hos reget artus.
> Virgil: Æneid, iv. 335, 336.

> So to Eliza dawned that cruel day
> Which tore Æneas from her sight away,
> That saw him parting, never to return,
> Herself in funeral flames decreed to burn.
> Falconer: The Shipwreck, iii. 4 (1756).

Elis'abat, a famous surgeon, who attended queen Madasi'ma in all her solitary wanderings, and was her sole companion.—Amadis of Gaul (fifteenth century).

Élisabeth ou Les Exiles de Sibérie, a tale by S. R. dame Cottin (1773-1807). The family being exiled for some political offence, Elizabeth walked all the way from Siberia to Russia, to crave pardon of the czar. She obtained her prayer and the family returned. (See DEANS, Effie, p. 266.)

Elise (2 syl.), the motherless child of Harpagon the miser. She was affianced to Valère, by whom she had been "rescued from the waves." Valère turns out to be the son of don Thomas d'Alburci, a wealthy nobleman of Naples.—Molière: L'Avare (1667).

Elis'sa, step-sister of Medi'na and Perissa. They could never agree upon any subject.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 2 (1590).

"Medina" (the golden mean), "Elissa" and "Perissa" (the two extremes).

Elixir Vitæ, a drug which it was once thought would ensure perpetual life and health.

> He that has once the "Flower of the Sun"
> The perfect Ruby which we call elixir,
> . . . by its virtue
> Can confer honour, love, respect, long life,
> Give safety, valour, yea and victory,
> To whom he will. In eight and twenty days
> He'll make an old man of fourscore a child.
> Ben Jonson: The Alchemist, ii. (1610).

Eliza (Letters to), ten letters addressed to Mrs. Draper, wife of a counsellor of Bombay, and published 1775.

Elizabeth (The queen), haughty, imperious, but devoted to her people. She loved the earl of Essex, and, when she heard that he was married to the countess of Rutland, exclaimed that she never "knew sorrow before." The queen gave Essex a ring after his rebellion, saying, "Here, from my finger take this ring, a pledge of mercy; and whensoe'er you send it back, I swear that I will grant whatever boon you ask." After his condemnation, Essex sent the ring to the queen by the countess of Nottingham, craving that her most gracious majesty would spare the life of lord Southampton; but the countess, from jealousy, did not give it to the queen. However, the queen sent a reprieve for Essex, but Burleigh took care that it came too late, and the earl was beheaded as a traitor.—H. Jones: The Earl of Essex (1745).

Elizabeth (Queen), introduced by sir W. Scott in his novel called Kenilworth.

Elizabeth of Hungary (St.), patron saint of queens, being herself a queen. Her day is July 9 (1207-1231).

(C. Kingsley wrote a dramatic poem on Elizabeth of Hungary, called The Saint's Tragedy (1846).)

Ella, in Chaucer's Man of Law's Tale, was a king of Northumberland, who married Cunstance or Custance (q.v., p. 252).—Canterbury Tales (1383).

Ellen (Burd), a ballad which tells how Burd Ellen followed her lord as his page, and gave birth to a son in a stable.—Percy: Reliques ("Childe Waters," series iii.).

(The ballad is called Lady Margaret by Kinloch, and Burd Ellen by Jamieson.)

Ellesmere (Mistress), the head domestic of lady Peveril.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Elliot (Hobbie, i.e. Halbert), farmer at the Heugh-foot. His bride-elect is Grace Armstrong.

Mrs. Elliot, Hobbie's grandmother.

John and Harry, Hobbie's brothers.

Lilias, Jean, and Arnot, Hobbie's sisters.—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Elmo (St.). The fire of St. Elmo (Feu de Saint Elme), a corposant. If only one appears on a ship-mast, foul weather is at hand; but if two or more, they indicate that stormy weather is about to cease. By the Italians those corposants are called the "fires of St. Peter and St. Nicholas." In Latin the single fire is called "Helen," but the two "Castor and Pollux." Horace says (1 Odes, xii. 27)—

> Quorum simul alba nautis stella refulsit,
> Defluit saxis agitatus humor,
> Concidunt venti, fugiuntque nubes, etc.

But Longfellow makes the stella indicative of foul weather—

> Last night I saw St. Elmo's stars,
> With their gliminering lanterns all at play . . .
> And I knew we should have foul weather to-day.
> Longfellow: The Golden Legend.

N.B.—St. Adelelm, also called St. Elesmo or Elmo, bishop of Burgos (1100, etc.), started one dark and stormy night on a visit to Ranes bishop of Auvergne. In order to see his way, he lighted a candle, which he gave to a companion to carry, and bade him go first. The candle was not enclosed in a lantern, nor was it in any wise protected from the storm, but it burnt brightly and steadily. From this "miracle" corposants were called "St. Elmo lights."—Bollandistes: Vita Sanctorum (January 30).

Elo'a, the first of seraphs. His name with God is "The Chosen One," but the angels call him Eloa. Eloa and Gabriel were angel-friends.

> Eloa, fairest spirit of heaven. His thoughts are past understanding to the mind of man. His looks more lovely than the day-spring, more beaming than the stars of heaven when they first flew into being at the voice of the Creator.—Klopstock: The Messiah, I. (1748).

Eloi (St.), that is, St. Louis. The kings of France were called Loys up to the time of Louis XIII. Probably the "delicate oath" of Chaucer's prioress, who was a French scholar "after the scole of Stratford-atte-Bowe," was St. Loy, i.e. St. Louis, and not St. Eloi the patron saint of smiths and artists. St. Eloi was bishop of Noyon in the reign of Dagobert, and a noted craftsman in gold and silver.

> Ther was also a nonne, a prioresse,
> That of hire smiling was full simp' and coy,
> Hire greatest othe n'as but by Seint Eloy!
> Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (1388).

 "Seint Eloy," query "Seinte Loy"?

Eloi'sa (4 syl.) to Abelard (Epistle from), by Pope (1717). Eloisa was a pupil of Abelard, and bore him a child; but she refused to marry him, lest it should injure his prospects in the Church.

El'ops. There was a fish so called, but Milton uses the word (Paradise Lost, x. 525) for the dumb serpent or serpent which gives no warning of its approach by hissing or otherwise. (Greek, ellops, "mute or dumb.")

Eloquence (The Four Monarchs of): (1) Demosthĕnēs, the Greek orator (B.C. 385–322); (2) Cicero, the Roman orator (B.C. 106–43); (3) Sadi, the Persian (1184–1263); (4) Zoroaster (B.C. 589–513).

Eloquent (That Old Man), Isoc'ratēs, the Greek orator. When he heard that the battle of Chærone'a was lost, and that Greece was no longer free, he died of grief.

> That dishonest victory
> At Chæronea, fatal to liberty,
> Killed with report that Old Man Eloquent.
> Milton: Sonnet, ix.

(This victory was gained by Philip of Macĕdon. Called "dishonest" because bribery and corruption were employed.)

Eloquent Doctor (The), Peter Aureŏlus, archbishop of Aix (fourteenth century).

Elpi'nus, Hope personified. He was "clad in sky-like blue," and the motto of his shield was "I hold by being held." He went attended by Pollic'ita (promise). Fully described in canto ix. (Greek, elpis, "hope.")—Phineas Fletcher: The Purple Island (1633).

Elshender the Recluse, called "The Canny Elshie" or "The Wise Wight of Mucklestane Moor." This is "the black dwarf," or sir Edward Mauley, the hero of the novel.—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (1816; time, Anne).

Elsie, the daughter of Gottlieb, a cottage farmer of Bavaria. Prince Henry of Hoheneck, being struck with leprosy, was told he would never be cured till a maiden chaste and spotless offered to give her life in sacrifice for him. Elsie volunteered to die for the prince, and he accompanied her to Salerno; but either the exercise, the excitement, or some charm, no matter what, had quite cured the prince, and when he entered the cathedral with Elsie, it was to make her lady Alicia, his bride.—Hartmann von der Aue: Poor Henry (twelfth century); Longfellow: Golden Legend.

¶ Alcestis, daughter of Pelias and wife of Admētos, died instead of her husband, but was brought back by Herculēs from the shades below, and restored to Admetos.

Elspeth (Auld), the old servant of Dandie Dinmont the store-farmer at Charlie's Hope.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Elspeth (Old) of the Craigburnfoot, the mother of Saunders Mucklebacket (the old fisherman at Musselcrag), and formerly servant to the countess of Glenallan.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Elvi'no, a wealthy farmer, in love with Ami'na the somnambulist. (For the tale, see SONNAMBULA.)—Bellini: La Sonnambula (an opera, 1831).

ELVI'RA, sister of don Duart, and niece of the governor of Lisbon. She marries Clodio, the coxcomb son of don Antonio.—Cibber: Love Makes a Man.

Elvi'ra, the young wife of Gomez, a rich old banker. She carries on a liaison with colonel Lorenzo, by the aid of her father-confessor Dominick, but is always checkmated; and it turns out that Lorenzo is her brother. — Dryden: The Spanish Fryar (1680).

Elvi'ra, a noble lady, who gives up everything to become the mistress of Pizarro. She tries to soften his rude and cruel nature, and to lead him into more generous ways. Her love being changed to hate, she engages Rolla to slay Pizarro in his tent; but the noble Peruvian spares his enemy, and makes him a friend. Ultimately, Pizarro is slain in a fight with Alonzo, and Elvira retires to a convent.—Sheridan: Pizarro (altered from Kotzebue, 1799).

Elvi'ra (Donna), a lady deceived by don Giovanni, who basely deluded her into an amour with his valet Leporello.—Mozart's opera, Don Giovanni (1787).

Elvi'ra "the puritan," daughter of lord Walton, betrothed to Arturo (lord Arthur Talbot), a cavalier. On the day of espousals the young man aids Enrichetta (Henrietta, widow of Charles I.) to escape, and Elvira, thinking he has eloped with a rival, temporarily loses her reason. Cromwell's soldiers arrest Arturo for treason, but he is subsequently pardoned, and marries Elvira.—Bellini: I Puritani (an opera, 1834).

Elvi'ra, a lady in love with Erna'ni the robber-captain and head of a league against don Carlos (afterwards Charles V. of Spain). Ernani was just on the point of marrying Elvira, when he was summoned to death by Gomez de Silva, and stabbed himself.—Verdi: Ernani (an opera, 1841).

Elvi'ra, betrothed to Alfonso (son of the duke d'Arcos). No sooner is the marriage completed than she learns that Alfonso has seduced Fenella, a dumb girl, sister of Masaniello the fisherman. Masaniello, to revenge his wrongs, heads an insurrection, and Alfonso with Elvira run for safety to the fisherman's hut, where they find Fenella, who promises to protect them. Masaniello, being made chief magistrate of Por'tico, is killed by the mob; Fenella throws herself into the crater of Vesuvius; and Alfonso is left to live in peace with Elvira.—Auber: Masaniello (an opera, 1831).

Elvire (2 syl.), the wife of don Juan, whom he abandons. She enters a convent, and tries to reclaim her profligate husband, but without success.—Molière: Don Juan (1665).

Ely (Bishop of), introduced by sir W. Scott in the Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Elysium [the Elysian fields], the land of the blest, to which the favoured of the gods passed without dying. The Elysian Fields lie in one of the "Fortunate Islands." (Canaries).

> Fancy dreams
> Of sacred fountains, and Elysian groves,
> And vales of bliss.
> Akenside: Pleasures of Imagination, I. (1744).

Emath'ian Conqueror (The Great), Alexander the Great. Emathia is Macedonia and Thessaly. Emathion, a son of Titan and Aurora, reigned in Macedonia. Pliny tells us that Alexander, when he besieged Thebes, spared the house in which Pindar the poet was born, out of reverence to his great abilities.

> Lift not thy spear against the Muses' bower.
> The great Emathian conqueror bid spare
> The house of Pindarus, when temple and tower
> Went to the ground.
> Milton: Sonnet, viii.

Embla, the woman Eve of Scandinavian mythology. Eve or Embla was made of elm; but Ask or Adam was made of ash.

Em'elie or EMELYE, sister-in-law of duke Theseus (2 syl.), beloved by both Pal'amon and Ar'cyte (2 syl.); but the former had her to wife.

> Emelie that fairer was to scene
> Than is the lilie on hire stalkes grene,
> And fresscher than the May with flowres newe.
> Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Knight's Tale," 1385).

Em'erald Isle (The), Ireland; so called first by Dr. W. Drennan, in his poem entitled Erin (1754–1820).

Emeral'der, an Irishman, a native of the Emerald Isle.

Emer'ita (St.), sister of king Lucius. When her brother abdicated the British crown, she accompanied him to Switzerland, and shared with him there a martyr's death.

Emerita the next, king Lucius' sister dear,
Who in Helvetia with her martyr brother died.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1622).

Emile (2 syl.), the chief character of a philosophical romance on education by Jean Jacques Rousseau (1762). Emile is the author's ideal of a young man perfectly educated, every bias but that of nature having been carefully withheld.

N.B.—Emile is the French form of Emilius.

His body is inured to fatigue, as Rousseau advises in his Emilius.—Continuation of the Arabian Nights, iv. 69.

Emil'ia, beloved by both Palamon and Arcite. (For the tale, see PALAMON, etc.)—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Knight's Tale," 1383).

Emil'ia, wife of Iago, the ancient of Othello in the Venetian army. She is induced by Iago to purloin a certain handkerchief given by Othello to Desdemona. Iago then prevails on Othello to ask his wife to show him the handkerchief; but she cannot find it, and Iago tells the Moor she has given it to Cassio as a love-token. At the death of Desdemona, Emilia (who till then never suspected the real state of the case) reveals the truth of the matter, and Iago rushes on her and kills her.—Shakespeare: Othello (1611).

The virtue of Emilia is such as we often find, worn loosely, but not cast off; easy to commit small crimes, but quickened and alarmed at atrocious villainies.—Dr. Johnson.

Emil'ia. Shakespeare, The Winter's Tale. Also the lady-love of Peregrine Pickle, in The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle, by Smollett (1751).

Emilie (The Divine), to whom Voltaire wrote verses, was Mde. Châtelet, with whom he lived at Cirey for ten years. Her palfrey was called "Rossignol."

Emily, the fiancée of colonel Tamper. Duty called away the colonel to Havannah. On his return he pretended to have lost one eye and one leg in the war, in order to see if Emily would love him still. Emily was greatly shocked, and Mr. Prattle the medical practitioner was sent for. Amongst other gossip, Mr. Prattle told his patient he had seen the colonel, who looked remarkably well, and most certainly was maimed neither in his legs nor in his eyes. Emily now saw through the trick, and resolved to turn the tables on the colonel. To this end she induced Mdlle. Florival to appear en militaire, under the assumed name of captain Johnson, and to make desperate love to her. When the colonel had been thoroughly roasted, and was about to quit the house for ever, his friend major Belford entered and recognized Mdlle. as his fiancée; the trick was discovered, and all ended happily.—Colman, sen.: The Deuce is in Him (1762).

Emir or Ameer, a title given to lieutenants of provinces and other officers of the sultan; and occasionally assumed by the sultan himself. The sultan is not unfrequently called "The Great Ameer," and the Ottoman empire is sometimes spoken of as "the country of the Great Ameer." What Matthew Paris and other monks call "ammirals" is the same word. Milton speaks of the "mast of some tall ammiral" (Paradise Lost, i. 294).

N.B.—The difference between xariff or sariff and amir is this: the former is given to the blood successors of Mahomet, and the latter to those who maintain his religious faith.—Selden: Titles of Honour, vi. 73-4 (1672).

Em'ly (Little), daughter of Tom, the brother-in-law of Dan'el Peggotty, a Yarmouth fisherman, by whom the orphan child was brought up. While engaged to Ham Peggotty (Dan'el's nephew), Little Em'ly runs away with Steerforth, a handsome but unprincipled gentleman. Being subsequently reclaimed, she emigrates to Australia with Dan'el Peggotty and old Mrs. Gummidge.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Emma "the Saxon" or Emma Plantagenet, the beautiful, gentle, and loving wife of David king of North Wales (twelfth century).—Southey: Madoc (1805).

Emped'ocles, one of Pythagoras's scholars, who threw himself secretly into the crater of Etna, that people might suppose the gods had carried him to heaven; but alas! one of his iron pattens was cast out with the larva, and recognized.

He who to be deemed
A god, leaped fondly into Etna flames,
Empedocles.
Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 469, etc. (1669).

'.' Matthew Arnold published a dramatic poem called Empedocles on Etna (1853).

Emperor for my People. Hadrian used to say, "I am emperor not for myself but for my people" (76, 117–138).

Emperor of Believers (The), Omar I., father-in-law of Mahomet (581–644).

Emperor of the Mountains (The), Peter the Calabrian, a famous robber-chief (1812).

Empson (Master), flageolet-player to Charles II.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (1823).

Enan'the (3 syl.), daughter of Seleucus, and mistress of prince Deme'trius (son of king Antig'onus). She appears under the name of Celia.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Humorous Lieutenant (published 1647).

Encel'ados (Longfellow, Enceldus), the most powerful of all the giants who conspired against Jupiter. He was struck with a thunderbolt, and covered with the heap of earth now called mount Etna. The smoke of the volcano is the breath of the buried giant; and when he shifts his side it is an earthquake.

Fama est, Enceladi semiustum fulmine corpus
Urgueri mole hac, ingentemque insuper Ætnam
Impositam, ruptis flammam exspirare canalis;
Et, fessum quoties mutet latus, intremere omnem
Murmure Trinacriam, et cœlum subtexere fumo.
Virgil: Æneid, iii. 578–582.

Where the burning cinders, blown
From the lips of the o'erthrown
Enceladus, fill the air.
Longfellow: Enceladus.

Enchiridion, a collection of maxims, by Francis Quarles (author of Emblems) (1652).

En'crates (3 syl.), Temperance personified, the husband of Agnei'a (wifely chastity). When his wife's sister Parthen'ia (maidenly chastity) was wounded in the battle of Mansoul, by False Delight, he and his wife ran to her assistance, and soon routed the foes who were hounding her. Continence (her lover) went also, and poured a balm into her wounds, which healed them. (Greek, egkrátês, "continent, temperate.")

So have I often seen a purple flower,
Fainting thro' heat, hang down her drooping head;
But, soon refreshèd with a welcome shower,
Begins again her lively beauties spread,
And with new pride her silken leaves display.
P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, xi. (1633).

Endell (Martha), a poor fallen girl, to whom Em'ly goes when Steerforth deserts her. She emigrates with Dan'el Peggot'ty, and marries a young farmer in Australia.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Endermay, i.e. Andermatt or Urseren, a town and valley in the Uri of Switzerland.

Soft as the happy swain's enchanting lay,
That pipes among the shades of Endermay.
Falconer: The Shipwreck, iii. 3 (1756).

Endiga, in Charles XII., by J. R. Planché (1826).

Endless, the rascally lawyer in No Song No Supper, by P. Hoare (1790).

Endym'ion, a noted astronomer who, from mount Latmus, in Caria, discovered the course of the moon. Hence it is fabled that the moon sleeps with Endymion. Strictly speaking, Endymion is the setting sun.

So Latmus by the wise Endymion is renowned;
That hill on whose high top he was the first that found
Pale Phœbé's wandering course; so skilful in her sphere,
As some stick not to say that he enjoyed her there.
Drayton: Polyolbion, vi. (1612).

On such a tranquil night as this,
She woke Endymion with a kiss.
Longfellow: Endymion.

To sleep like Endymion, to sleep long and soundly. Endymion requested of Jove permission to sleep as long as he felt inclined. Hence the proverb, Endymionis somnum dormire. Jean Ogier de Gombaud wrote in French a romance or prose poem called Endymion (1624), and one of the best paintings of A. L. Girodet is "Endymion." Cowley, referring to Gombaud's romance, says—

While there is a people or a sun,
Endymion's story with the moon shall run.

(John Keats, in 1818, published his Endymion (a poetic romance), and the criticism of the Quarterly Review is said to have caused his death. Lord Beaconsfield published a novel called Endymion (1880); and Longfellow has a poem so called.)

Endymion. So Wm. Browne calls sir Walter Raleigh, who was for a time in disgrace with queen Elizabeth, whom he calls "Cyn'thia."

The first note that I heard I soon was wonne
To think the sighes of faire Endymion,
The subject of whose mournfull heavy lay,
Was his declining with faire Cynthia.
Browne: Britannia's Pastorals, iv. (1613).

Endymion; or, The Man in the Moon, a drama by J. Lyly (1592).

Enfants de Dieu, the Camisards.

The royal troops outnumbered the Enfants de Dieu, and a not inglorious fight took place.—E. Gilliat: Asylum Christi, iii.

Enfield (Mrs.), the keeper of a house of intrigue, or "gentlemen's magazine" of frail beauties.—Holcroft: The Deserted Daughter (1784).

Engaddi (Theodorick, hermit of), an enthusiast. He was Aberick of Mortemar, an exiled noble.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Engaddi, one of the towns of Judah, forty miles from Jerusalem, famous for its palm trees.

Anchorites beneath Engaddi's palms,
Pacing the Dead Sea beach.
Longfellow: Sand of the Desert.

Engel'brecht, one of the Varangian guards.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

En'gelred, squire of sir Reginald Front de Bœuf (follower of prince John of Anjou, the brother of Richard I.).—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

England and the English (Sketches of), by lord Lytton (1833).

English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, a satire by lord Byron (1809), occasioned by an attack in the Edinburgh Review on a volume of poetry called Hours of Idleness. The English bards referred to are Amos Cottle, Fitzgerald, Gifford, Jeffrey, Moore, Scott, Southey, Henry K. White, Wordsworth, and some others less known. He says—

Fools are my theme, let satire be my song.

En'guerraud, brother of the marquis of Montserrat, a crusader.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

E'nid, the personification of spotless purity. She was the daughter of Yn'iol, and wife of Geraint. The tale of Geraint and Enid allegorizes the contagion of distrust and jealousy, commencing with Guinever's infidelity, and spreading downwards among the Arthurian knights. In order to save Enid from this taint, sir Geraint removed from the court to Devon; but overhearing part of a sentence uttered by Enid, he fancied that she was unfaithful, and treated her for a time with great harshness. In an illness, Enid nursed him with such wifely devotion that he felt convinced of his error. A perfect reconciliation took place, and they "crowned a happy life with a fair death."—Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("Geraint and Enid").

Enna, a city of Sicily, remarkable for its beautiful plains, fruitful soil, and numerous springs. Proserpine was carried off by Pluto while gathering flowers in the adjacent meadow.

She moved
Like Proserpine in Enna, gathering flowers.
Tennyson: Edwin Morris.

Ennius (The English), Lay'amon, who wrote a translation in Saxon of The Brut of Wace (thirteenth century).

The French Ennius, Jehan de Meung, who wrote a continuation of the Roman de la Rose (1260–1320).

∴ Guillaume di Lorris, author of the Romance of the Rose, is more justly so called (1235–1265).

The Spanish Ennius, Juan de Mena of Cordŏva (1412–1456).

Enrique' (2 syl.), brother-in-law of Chrysalde (2 syl.). He married secretly Chrysalde's sister, Angelique, by whom he had a daughter, Agnes, who was left in charge of a peasant while Enrique was absent in America. Having made his fortune in the New World, Enrique returned and found Agnes in love with Horace, the son of his friend Oronte (2 syl.). Their union, after the usual quota of misunderstanding and cross purposes, was consummated to the delight of all parties.—Molière: L'École des Femmes (1662).

Entel'echy, the kingdom of queen Quintessence. Pantag'ruel' and his companions went to this kingdom in search of the "holy bottle."—Rabelais: Pantagruel, v. 19 (1545).

(This kingdom of "speculative science" gave the hint to Swift for his island of Lapu'ta.)

Envelope (The Mulready Envelope, 1840) was designed for the Penny Envelopes. It was an allegorical picture of the British Empire and its colonies, wholly unsuitable for the purpose intended, and very soon withdrawn from circulation. I well remember using and "abusing" them.

¶ The design of the lord mayor of London's card of invitation to his dinner on November 9, 1896, was a somewhat similar allegorical picture. Both these were in bad taste.

Eothen, by A. W. Kinglake (1844). Sketches, etc., of the East, through which the author travelled.

Ephe'sian, a toper, a dissolute sot, a jovial companion. When Page (2 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 2) tells prince Henry that a company of men were about to sup with Falstaff, in Eastcheap, and calls them "Ephesians," he probably meant soldiers called félthas ("foot-soldiers"), and hence topers. Malone suggests that the word is a pun on pheese ("to chastise or pay one tit for tat"), and means "quarrelsome fellows."

Ephe'sian Poet (The), Hippo'nax, born at Ephesus (sixth century B.C.).

Ephesus (Letters of), bribes. "Ephesiæ literæ" were magical notes or writings, which ensured those who employed them success in any undertaking they chose to adventure on.

Silver keys were used in old Rome, where every petty officer who knew no other spelling could decipher a "letter of Ephesus." Oh for the purity of honest John Bull! No "letters of Ephesus" will tempt the integrity of our British bumbledom.—Cassell's Magazine, February, 1877.

Epic (The Great Puritan), Paradise Lost, by Milton (1665).

Epic of Hades (2 syl.), by sir Lewis Morris (1876, 1877).

Epic Poetry (The Father of), Homer (about 950 B.C.).

Epic Poets. The most famous are—

Greece: Homer, who wrote the Iliad and Odyssey.

Latin: Virgil, who wrote the Æneid.

Portuguese: Camoëns, who wrote The Lusiad.

English: Milton, who wrote Paradise Lost.

There are a host of Historical Poems of an epic character, like the Henriade of Voltaire, the Pharsalia of Lucan, etc., and a number of poetic romances like Orlando Furioso, Southey's Thalaba, and so on; but these are not epic poems. Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered stands well.

Ep'icene (3 syl.) or The Silent Woman, one of the three great comedies of Ben Jonson (1609).

The other two are Volpone (2 syl.) (1605), and The Alchemist (1610).

Epicure'an (The), a prose romance by Thomas Moore. The hero is Alciphron (1827).

Epicurus. The aimée de cœur of this philosopher was Leontium. (See LOVERS.)

Epicurus of China, Tao-tse, who commenced the search for "the elixir of perpetual youth and health" (B.C. 540).

(Lucretius the Roman poet, in his De Rerum Natura, is an exponent of the Epicurean doctrines.)

Epidaurus (That God in), Æscula'pius, son of Apollo, who was worshipped in Epidaurus, a city of Peloponne'sus. Being sent for to Rome during a plague, he assumed the form of a serpent.—Livy. Nat. Hist., xi.; Ovid: Metaph., xv.

> Never since of serpent kind
> Lovelier, not those that in Illyria changed
> Hermionè and Cadmus, or the god
> In Epidaurus.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, ix. 507 (1665).

(Cadmus and his wife Harmonia [Hermione] left Thebes and migrated into Illyria, where they were changed into serpents because they happened to kill a serpent belonging to Mars.)

Ephial'tes (4 syl.), one of the giants who made war upon the gods. He was deprived of his left eye by Apollo, and of his right eye by Hercules.

Epig'oni, seven youthful warriors, sons of the seven chiefs who laid siege to Thebes. All the seven chiefs (except Adrastos) perished in the siege; but the seven sons, ten years later, took the city and razed it to the ground. The chiefs and sons were: (1) Adrastos, whose son was Ægi'aleus (4 syl.); (2) Polynikês, whose son was Thersan'der; (3) Amphiar'aos (5 syl.), whose son was Alkmæon (the chief); (4) Ty'deus (2 syl.), whose son was Diomē'dês; (5) Kapaneus (3 syl.), whose son was Sthen'ĕlos; (6) Parthenopæ'os, whose son was Promachos; (7) Mekis'theus (3 syl.), whose son was Eury'alos.

(Æschylos has a tragedy on The Seven Chiefs against Thebes. There are also two epics, one The Thebaïd of Statius, and The Epigoni, probably by one of the Cyclic poets of Greece.)

Epigon'iad (The), called "the Scotch Iliad," by William Wilkie (1757). This is the tale of the Epig'oni or seven sons of the seven chieftains who laid siege to Thebes. The tale is this: When Œ'dipus abdicated, his two sons agreed to reign alternate years; but at the expiration of the first year, the elder son (Etĕ'oclês) refused to give up the throne. Whereupon the younger brother (Polynikês) interested six Grecian chiefs to espouse his cause, and the allied armies laid siege to Thebes, without success. Subsequently, the seven sons of the old chiefs went against the city to avenge the deaths of their fathers, who had fallen in the former siege. They succeeded in taking the city, and in placing Thersander on the throne. (For the names of the sons, see above, EPIGONI.) The hero of the Epigoniad is Diomed, the heroine Cassandra, and the tale runs through nine books.

Epimen'ides (5 syl.) of Crete, sometimes reckoned one of the "seven wise men of Greece" in the place of Periander. He slept for fifty-seven years in a cave, and, on waking, found everything so changed that he could recognize nothing. Epimenidês lived 289 years, and was adored by the Cretans as one of their "Curētês" or priests of Jove. He was contemporary with Solon.

(Goethe has a poem called Des Epimenides Erwachen. See Heinrich's Epimenides.)

Epimenides's Drug. A nymph who loved Epimenides gave him a draught in a bull's horn, one single drop of which would not only cure any ailment, but would also serve for a hearty meal.

Le Nouveau Épimenède is a man who lives in a dream in a kind of "Castle of Spain," where he deems himself a king, and does not wish to be disillusioned. The song is by Jacinthe Leclère, one of the members of the "Societé de Momus" of Paris.

Epinogris (Sir), son of the king of Northumberland. He loved an earl's daughter, but slew the earl in a knightly combat. Next day, a knight challenged him to fight, and the lady was to be the prize of the victor. Sir Epinogris, being overthrown, lost the lady; but when sir Palomidês heard the tale, he promised to recover her. Accordingly, he challenged the victorious knight, who turned out to be his brother. The point of dispute was then amicably arranged by giving up the lady to sir Epinogris.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 169 (1470).

Eppie, one of the servants of the Rev. Josiah Cargill. In the same novel is Eppie Anderson, one of the servants at the Mowbray Arms, Old St. Ronan's, held by Meg Dods.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Eppie, the adopted child of Silas Marner. She is the daughter of Godfrey Cass and Molly. Eppie ultimately marries Aaron.—George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross): Silas Marner (1861).

Epps, cook of Saunders Fairford a lawyer.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Equity (Father of), Heneage Finch, earl of Nottingham (1621–1682). In Absalom and Achitophel (by Dryden and Tate) he is called "Amri."

> Sincere was Amri, and not only knew,
> But Israel's sanctions into practice drew:
> Our laws, that did a boundless ocean seem,
> Were coasted all, and fathomed all by him . . .
> To him the double blessing doth belong,
> With Moses' inspiration, Aaron's tongue.
> Absalom and Achitophel, ii. 1017–1025 (1682a).

Equivokes, from ambiguous words, puns, and stops.

1. From ambiguous words—

(1) AHAB, king of Israel, asked Micaiah if he went to battle with the king of Syria, whether he would become master of Ramoth-Gilead or not? The prophet made answer, "Go, for the Lord will deliver the city into the hands of the king;" but to which king he did not say; and the result was, Ahab was slain, and Ramoth-Gilead was delivered into the hands of the king of Syria.—1 Kings xxii. 15, 35.

(2) CRŒSUS: When Crœsus demanded what would be the issue of the battle against the Persians, headed by Cyrus, the answer was, he "should behold a mighty empire overthrown;" but whether that empire was his own or that of Cyrus, only the issue of the fight could determine.

(3) MAXENTIUS AND THE SIBYLLINE BOOKS: When Maxentius was about to encounter Constantine, he consulted the guardians of the Sibylline Books respecting the fate of the battle, and they told him, "Illo die hostem Romanorum esse peritūrum" ("On that day the enemy of the Romans will perish"); but whether Maxentius or Constantine was "the enemy" was left undetermined.

(4) PHILIP OF MACEDON: Similarly, when Philip of Macedon sent to Delphi to inquire if his Persian expedition would prove successful, he received for reply, "The ready victim crowned for sacrifice stands before the altar." Philip took it for granted that the "ready victim" was the king of Persia, but it was he himself.

(5) PYRRHUS AND THE ROMANS: When Pyrrhus consulted the Delphic oracle respecting his war with the Romans, he received for answer: "Credo te, Æacide, Romanos vincĕre posse" (i.e. "The Romans, I believe, you will conquer"); which may mean either "you will conquer them" or "they will conquer you."

(6) SALAMIS (The battle of): When the allied Greeks demanded of the Delphic oracle what would be the issue of the battle of Salamis, they received for answer—

> Seed-time and harvest, weeping sires shall tell
> How thousands fought at Salamis and fell;

but whether the oracle referred to the Greeks or Persians who were to fall by "thousands," was not stated.

2. From puns on proper names—

(1) CAMBYSES AND ECBAT'ANA: Cambyses, son of Cyrus, was told that he should die in Ecbatana, which he supposed meant the capital of Media. Being wounded accidentally in Syria, he asked the name of the place; and being told it was Ecbatana, he replied, "Here, then, I am destined to end my life."

(2) EDWARD IV. AND THE LETTER G.: A wizard told Edward IV. that "after him G. would reign." The king thought the person meant was his brother George, but the duke of Gloucester was the person pointed at.—Holinshed: Chronicles; Shakespeare: Richard III. act i. sc. 1.

(3) HENRY IV. AND JERUSALEM: Henry IV. was told that "he should die in Jerusalem," which he supposed meant the Holy Land; but he died in the Jerusalem Chamber, London, which is the chapter-house of Westminster Abbey.

Pope Sylvester and Jerusalem: Similarly, Pope Sylvester was told that he should die at Jerusalem, and he died while saying mass in a church so called at Rome.

(4) SOMERSET AND THE CASTLE: Jourdain, the wizard, told the duke of Somerset, if he wished to live, to "avoid where castles mounted stand." The duke died in an ale-house called the Castle, in St. Albans.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI. act v. sc. 2.

(5) WOLSEY AND KINGSTON: In early life, Wolsey was cautioned to "Beware of Kingston." In consequence of this warning he would never enter the town of Kingston-on-Thames. When, in old age, he was incarcerated by Henry VIII., a blare of trumpets announced the approach of armed officials, and sir Edward Kingston entered. The warning of his youth flashed across his mind; he knew his hour was come, and he uttered those memorable words: "If I had served my God as faithfully as I have served my king, He would not have forsaken me in my grey hairs."

3. From puns on words—

(1) APER AND A BOAR: Diocletian was told he would become emperor if he slew a boar. On the death of Carinus by his brother Numerian, Arrius Aper (præfect of the prætorian guard) slew Numerian, but Diocletian slew Aper [Latin for a boar], and was elected emperor by the legions.

(2) CONSTANTINE AND CYGNO, OR SIGNO: It is said that Constantine, marching against Maxentius, saw in the skies a cross, and the Christians in his army cried aloud, "In hoc signo vinces." But the constellation Cygnus was visible at the time, the upper star being in the zenith, and the lower one towards the horizon. To the ear the words would be "In hoc signo" or "In hoc cygno," and the priests would make capital of the pun—"There is the Cross, in Cygnus," an omen of victory.

(3) DOG AND THE DOG BRUTUS: Tarquin sent to Delphi to learn the fate of his struggle with the Romans for the recovery of his throne, and was told: "Tarquin will never fall till a dog speaks with the voice of a man." The "dog" was Junius Brutus, who was called a dog by way of contempt.

(4) GOAT AND FIG TREE: A Messenian seer, being sent to consult the Delphic oracle respecting the issue of the Messenian war, then raging, received for reply—

> When a goat stoops to drink of the Neda, O seer,
> From Messenia flee, for its ruin is near.

In order to avert this calamity, all goats were diligently chased from the banks of the Neda. One day, Theoclos observed a fig tree growing on the river-side, and its branches dipped into the stream. The interpretation of the oracle flashed across his mind, for he remembered that goat and fig tree, in the Messenian dialect, were the same word.

∴ The pun would be clearer to an English reader if "a stork" were substituted for the goat: "When a stork stoops to drink of the Neda;" and the "stalk" of the fig tree dipping into the stream.

(5) MOTHER AND MOTHER EARTH: When the oracle was asked by a deputation of Romans who would succeed Tarquin, it replied, "He who shall first kiss his mother." Whereupon Junius Brutus fell to the earth, and exclaimed, "Thus, then, I kiss thee, O mother earth!"

(6) RELEASED: When, in 1560, the countess Egmont presented herself to the duke of Alva, and implored him to release her husband, the duke calmly assured her "that her husband would be released on the morrow." The countess retired with delight, but on the morrow her husband was "released" by death. —Motley: The Dutch Republic, pt. iii. 2 (1856).

4. From puns on stops—

(1) IBIS REDIBIS: An excellent equivoke from the want of a stop is the following: "Ibis redibis nunquam per bella peribis" ("You will go you will return never by war will you perish"). If the stop is after redibis, the reading would be, "You will go and return, never in war will you perish;" but if the stop is after nunquam, the reading would be, "You will go and return never, in the war you will perish." Which may be rendered into English thus—

> Go! You will return again
> Never by the foeman slain.

If the stop is after "again," he will survive. If it is after "never," he will be slain.

(2) ORLETON AND THE DEATH OF EDWARD II.: Adam Orleton, bishop of Hereford, sent to the keeper of Berkeley Castle this ambiguous message: "Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum est" (that is, "To kill Edward fear not a good deed it would be"); which, by shifting the point, may be, "To kill Edward fear,—a good deed it would not be," or "To kill Edward fear not,—a good deed it would be."

Eraclius (The emperor) condemned a knight to death on the supposition of murder; but, the man supposed to be murdered making his appearance, the condemned man was taken back, under the expectation that he would be instantly acquitted. But no, Eraclius ordered all three to be put to death: the knight, because the emperor had ordered it; the man who brought him back, because he had not obeyed the emperor's command; and the man supposed to be murdered, because he was virtually the cause of death to the other two.

(This tale is told in the Gesta Romanorum, and Chaucer has put it into the mouth of his sumpnor. It is also told by Seneca, in his De Ira; but he ascribes it to Cornelius Piso, and not to Eraclius.)

Éraste (2 syl.), hero of Les Fâcheux, by Molière. He is in love with Orphise (2 syl.), whose tutor is Damis (1661).

Er'celdoun (Thomas of), also called "Thomas the Rhymer," introduced by sir W. Scott in his novel called Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

It is said that Thomas of Erceldoun is not dead, but that he is sleeping beneath the Eildon Hills, in Scotland. One day, he met with a lady of elfin race beneath the Eildon tree, and she led him to an under-ground region, where he remained for seven years. He then revisited the earth, but bound himself to return when summoned. One day, when he was making merry with his friends, he was told that a hart and hind were parading the street; and he knew it was his summons, so he immediately went to the Eildon tree, and has never since been heard of.—Sir W. Scott: Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border.

(This tale is substantially the same as the German one of Tanhäuser, q.v.)

Erco'co or ERQUICO, on the Red Sea, marks the north-east boundary of the negus of Abyssinia.

> The empire of Negus to his utmost port, > Ercoco.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, xi. 397 (1665).

Ereck, a knight of the Round Table. He marries the beautiful Enite (2 syl.), daughter of a poor knight, and falls into a state of idleness and effeminacy, till Enite rouses him to action. He then goes forth on an expedition of adventures; and after combating with brigands, giants, and dwarfs, returns to the court of king Arthur, where he remains till the death of his father. He then enters on his inheritance, and lives peaceably the rest of his life.—Hartmann von der Aue: Ereck (thirteenth century).

Ereen'ia (3 syl.), a glendoveer or good spirit, the beloved son of Cas'yapa (3 syl.) father of the immortals. Ereenia took pity on Kail'yal (2 syl.), daughter of Ladur'lad, and carried her to his Bower of Bliss in paradise (canto vii.). Here Kailyal could not stay, because she was still a living daughter of earth. On her return to earth, she was chosen for the bride of Jagan-naut, and Ar'valan came to dishonour her; but she set fire to the pagoda, and Ereenia came to her rescue. Ereenia was set upon by the witch Lor'rimite (3 syl.), and carried to the submerged city of Baly, whence he was delivered by Ladurlad. The glendoveer now craved Seeva for vengeance, but the god sent him to Yamen (i.e. Pluto), and Yamen said the measure of iniquity was now full. So Arvalan and his father Kehama were both made inmates of the city of everlasting woe; while Ereenia carried Kailyal, who had quaffed the waters of immortality, to his Bower of Bliss, to dwell with him in everlasting joy.—Southey: Curse of Kehama (1809).

Eret'rian Bull (The). Menede'mos of Eretria, in Eubœ'a, was called "Bull" from the bull-like breadth and gravity of his face. He founded the Eretrian school (fourth century B.C.). (See DUMB OX, p. 306.)

Eric, "Windy-cap," king of Sweden. He could make the wind blow from any quarter merely by turning his cap. Hence the phrase, "a capful of wind."

Eric. Amongst the ancient inhabitants of Erin the eric was a fine which might be accepted as compensation for murder or homicide.

Erichtho [E.rik'.tho], the famous Thessalian consulted by Pompey.—Lucan: Pharsalia, vi.

Erickson (Sweyn), a fisherman at Jarlshof.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Eric'tho, the witch in John Marston's tragedy called The Wonder of Women, or Sophonisba (1605).

Er'idan, the river Po, in Italy; so called from Eridan or (Phaëton), who fell into the stream when he overthrew the sun-car.

So down the silver streams of Eridan,
On either side bankt with a lily wall
Whiter than both, rides the triumphant swan,
And sings his dirge, and prophesies his fall.
G. Fletcher: Christ's Triumph [over Death] (1610).

Erig'ena (John Scotus), called "Scotus the Wise." He must not be confounded with Duns Scotus, "the Subtle Doctor," who lived some four centuries later. Erigĕna died in 875, and Duns Scotus in 1308.

Erig'one (4 syl.), the constellation Virgo. She was the daughter of Icarios, an Athenian, who was murdered by some drunken peasants. Erigonê discovered the dead body by the aid of her father's dog Mœra, who became the star called Canis.

. . . that virgin, frail Erigonê,
Who by compassion got prehemineence [sic].
Lord Brooke: Of Nobility.

Erill'yab (3 syl.), the widowed and deposed queen of the Hoamen (2 syl.), an Indian tribe settled on a south branch of the Missouri. Her husband was king Tepol'loni, and her son Amal'ahta. Madoc, when he reached America, espoused her cause, and succeeded in restoring her to her throne.—Southey: Madoc (1805).

Erin, from ear or iar ("west") and in ("island"), the Western Island, Ireland.

Eriphy'le (4 syl.), the wife of Amphiarā'os. Being bribed by a golden necklace, she betrayed to Polyni'cēs where her husband had concealed himself that he might not go to the siege of Thebes, where he knew that he should be killed. Congreve calls the word Eriph'yle.

When Eriphylê broke her plighted faith,
And for a bribe procured her husband's death.
Ovid: Art of Love, iii.

Er'iri or Er'eri, Snowdon, in Caernarvonshire. The word means "Eagle rocks."

In this region [Ordovicia] is the stupendous mountain Eriri.—Richard of Cirencester: On the Ancient State of Britain, i. 6, 25 (fourteenth century).

Erisich'thon (should be Erysichthon), a Thessalian, whose appetite was insatiable. Having spent all his estate in the purchase of food, nothing was left but his daughter Metra, and her he sold to buy food for his voracious appetite; but Metra had the power of transforming herself into any shape she chose; so as often as her father sold her, she changed her form and returned to him. After a time, Erisichthon was reduced to feed upon himself.—Ovid: Metaph., viii. 2 (740 to end). An allegory of Death.

N.B.—Drayton says when the Wyre saw her goodly oak trees sold for firewood, she bethought her of Erisichthon's end, who, "when nor sea, nor land, sufficient were," ate his own flesh.—Polyolbion, vii.

So Erisicthon, once fired (as men say)
With hungry rage, fed never, ever feeding;
Ten thousand dishes served every day,
Yet in ten thousand thousand dishes needing.
In vain his daughter hundred shapes assumed;
A whole camp's meat he in his gorge inhumed;
And all consumed, his hunger yet was unconsumed.
Phineas Fletcher: The Purple Island (1633).

Erland, father of Norna "of the Fitful Head."—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Erl-King, a spirit of mischief, which haunts the Black Forest of Thuringia.

Goethe has a ballad called the Erl-könig, and Herder has translated the Danish ballad of Sir Olaf and the Erl-king's Daughter.

Ermangarde of Baldringham (The Lady), aunt of the Lady Eveline Berenger "the betrothed."—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Er'meline (Dame), the wife of Reynard, in the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox (1498).

Ermetick's Treasure (King), an incalculable mass of wealth, purely imaginative.—Reynard the Fox, chap. xi. (1498).

Ermin'ia, the heroine of Jerusalem Delivered. She fell in love with Tancred, and when the Christian army besieged Jerusalem, arrayed herself in Clorinda's armour to go to him. After certain adventures, she found him wounded, and nursed him tenderly; but the poet has not told us what was the ultimate lot of this fair Syrian.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Erna'ni, the robber-captain, duke of Segor'bia and Cardo'na, lord of Aragon, and count of Ernani. He is in love with Elvi'ra, the betrothed of don Ruy Gomez de Silva, an old Spanish grandee, whom she detests. Charles V. falls in love with her, and Ruy Gomez joins Ernani in a league against their common rival. During this league Ernani gives Ruy Gomez a horn, saying, "Sound but this horn, and at that moment Ernani will cease to live." Just as he is about to espouse Elvira, the horn is sounded, and Ernani stabs himself.—Verdi: Ernani (an opera, 1841).

Ernest (Duke), son-in-law of kaiser Konrad II. He murders his feudal lord, and goes on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, to expiate his crime. The poem so called is a mixture of Homeric legends, Oriental myths, and pilgrims' tales. We have pygmies and cyclopses, genii and enchanters, fairies and dwarfs, monks and devotees. After a world of hair-breadth escapes, the duke reaches the Holy Sepulchre, pays his vows, returns to Germany, and is pardoned.—Heinrich von Veldig (minnesinger): Duke Ernest (twelfth century).

Ernest de Fridberg, "the prisoner of State." He was imprisoned in the dungeon of the Giant's Mount fortress for fifteen years on a false charge of treason. Ulrica (his natural daughter by the countess Marie), dressed in the clothes of Herman, the deaf and dumb jailer-boy, gets access to the dungeon and contrives his escape; but he is retaken, and led back to the dungeon. Being subsequently set at liberty, he marries the countess Marie (the mother of Ulrica).—Stirling: The Prisoner of State (1847).

Eros, the manumitted slave of Antony the triumvir. Antony made Eros swear that he would kill him if commanded by him so to do. When in Egypt, Antony (after the battle of Actium), fearing lest he should fall into the hands of Octavius Cæsar, ordered Eros to keep his promise, Eros drew his sword, but thrust it into his own side, and fell dead at the feet of Antony. "O noble Eros," cried Antony, "I thank thee for teaching me how to die!"—Plutarch.

 Eros is introduced in Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra, and in Dryden's All for Love, or the World Well Lost.

(Eros is the Greek name of Cupid, and hence amorous poetry is called Erotic.)

Eros'tratos (in Latin EROSTRATUS), the incendiary who set fire to the temple of Diana of Ephesus, that his name might be perpetuated. An edict was published, prohibiting any mention of the name, but the edict was wholly ineffective.

¶ Charles V., wishing to be shown over the Pantheon [All Saints] of Rome, was taken to the top by a Roman knight. At parting, the knight told the emperor that he felt an almost irresistible desire to push his majesty down from the top of the building, "in order to immortalize his name." Unlike Erostratos, the name of this knight has not transpired.

Ero'ta, a very beautiful but most imperious princess, passionately beloved by Philander prince of Cyprus.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Laws of Candy (published 1647).

Erra-Pater, an almanac, an almanac-maker, an astrologer. Samuel Butler calls Lilly, the almanac-maker, an Erra-Pater, which we are told was the name of a famous Jewish astrologer.

> His only Bible was an Erra-Pater.
> F. Fletcher: The Purple Island, vii. (1633).
> What's here? Erra-Pater or a bearded sibyl [the person was Foresight].
> Congreve: Love for Love, iv. 1695.

Erragon, king of Lora (in Scandinavia). Aldo, a Caledonian chief, offered him his services, and obtained several important victories; but Lorma, the king's wife, falling in love with him, the guilty pair escaped to Morven. Erragon invaded the country, and slew Aldo in single combat, but was himself slain in battle by Gaul, son of Morni. As for Lorma, she died of grief.—Ossian: The Battle of Lora.

Errant Damsel (The), Una.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 1 (1590).

Errol (Gilbert earl of), lord high constable of Scotland.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Error, a monster who lived in a den in "Wandering Wood," and with whom the Red Cross Knight had his first adventure. She had a brood of 1000 young ones of sundry shapes, and these cubs crept into their mother's mouth when alarmed, as young kangaroos creep into their mother's pouch. The knight was nearly killed by the stench which issued from the foul fiend, but he succeeded in "rafting" her head off. Whereupon the brood lapped up the blood, and burst with satiety.

> Half like a serpent horribly displayed,
> But th' other half did woman's shape retain . . .
> And as she lay upon the dirty ground,
> Her huge long tail her den all overspread,
> Yet was in knots and many boughts [folds] upwound,
> Pointed with mortal sting.
> Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. 1 (1590).

Errors of Artists. (See ANACHRONISMS, p. 40.)

(1) ANGELO (Michel), in his great picture of the "Last Judgment," has introduced Charon's bark.

(2) BRENGHELI, the Dutch painter, in a picture of the "Wise Men of the East" making their offerings to the infant Jesus, has represented one of them dressed in a large white surplice, booted and spurred, offering the model of a Dutch seventy-four to the infant.

(3) ETTY has placed by the bedside of Holofernes a helmet of the period of the seventeenth century.

(4) MAZZOCHI (Paulo), in his "Symbolical Painting of the Four Elements," represents the sea by fishes, the earth by moles, fire by a salamander, and air by a camel! Evidently he mistook the cameleon (which traditionally lives on air) for a camel.

(5) REYNOLDS (Sir Joshua) has given one of his men two hats. In the early life of this great artist it was customary to paint the man with one hand in the waistcoat and a chapeau bras under one of the arms. A gentleman requested that Reynolds would paint him with his hat on his head. When the picture was sent home, lo! there were two hats; one sure enough was on the head, according to request, but there was another under the man's arm.

(6) TINTORET, in a picture which represents the "Israelites Gathering Manna in the Wilderness," has armed the men with guns.

(7) VANDYKE. In Vandyke's celebrated picture of Charles I. in armour, both the gauntlets are for the right hand.

(8) VERONESE (Paul), in his "Marriage Feast of Cana of Galilee," has introduced among the guests several Benedictines.

(9) WEST, president of the Royal Academy, has represented Paris the Phrygian in Roman costume.

(10) WESTMINSTER HALL is full of absurdities. Witness the following as specimens:—

Sir Cloudesley Shovel is dressed in a Roman cuirass and sandals, but on his head is a full-bottomed wig of the eighteenth century.

The duke of Buckingham is arrayed in the costume of a Roman emperor, and his duchess in the court dress of George I. period.

(11) WILKIE has painted a horse, without a bit, foaming at the mouth.

Errors of Authors. (See ANACHRONISMS, p. 39.)

(1) ASH. "Esoteric, an incorrect spelling for exoteric." "Gawain, sister of Arthur."—Dictionary.

(2) ALLISON (Sir Archibald) says, "Sir Peregrine Pickle was one of the pall-bearers of the duke of Wellington."—Life of Lord Castlereagh.

(He meant Sir Peregrine Maitland.)

¶ In his History of Europe, the phrase droit de timbre ("stamp duty") he translates "timber duties."

¶ Of a piece with this translation is Archdall's rendering of "cloche." Among the relics destroyed by the Danes in Ireland in the tenth century was a pastoral staff of the patron saint of Slane, and (says Archdall) "the best clock [cloche] in Ireland." Of course cloche means a bell.—Monasticon Hibernicon.

(3) ARNOLD (Matthew), in his Philomela, makes Procnê the "dumb sister;" but it was the tongue of Philomela that Tereus (2 syl.) cut out, to prevent her telling his wife Procnê of his licentious violence.

Dost thou again peruse
With hot cheeks and scared eyes
The too clear web and thy dear sister's shame?

These words might be addressed to his wife Procnê, but could not possibly be addressed to Philomel.

(4) ARTICLES OF WAR FOR THE ARMY. It is ordered "that every recruit shall have the 40th and 46th of the articles read to him" (art. iii.). The 46th relates to chaplains; the 41st is meant, which is about mutiny.

51 Edward III. assumes there are 40,000 parishes in England, instead of 8600.

(5) BARNES, in his History of Edward III., tells us that the earl of Leicester, "who was almost blind with age," flung up his cap for joy when he heard of the arrest of Mortimer, in 1330. "Old Leicester," however, was only 43 at the time.

(6) BROWNE (William). Apellês' Curtain. W. Browne says—

If . . . I set my pencil to Apellês tabl [painting],
Or dare to draw his curtain.
Britannia's Pastorals, ii. 2.

This curtain was not drawn by Apelles, but by Parrhasios, who lived a full century before Apelles. The contest was between Zeuxis and Parrhasios. The former exhibited a bunch of grapes which deceived the birds, and the latter a curtain which deceived Zeuxis.

(7) BRUYSSEL (E. von) says, "According to Homer, Achillês had a vulnerable heel." It is a vulgar error to attribute this myth to Homer. The blind old bard nowhere says a word about it. The story of dipping Achillês in the river Styx is altogether post-Homeric.

(8) BUFFON says the flowers of America are beautiful, but without perfume; and the birds gay in plumage, but without song. Captain Mayne Reid, in his War-trail, xlv., says of Buffon, "You could never have approached within 200 yards of a Stanhopia, of the Epidendrum odorâtum, of the Dictura grandiflora, with its mantle of snow-white blossoms. You could never have passed near the pothos plant, the serbereæ and tabernamontaneæ, the cullas, eugenias, ocotas, and nitiginas. You could never have ridden through a chapparal of acacias and mimosas, or among orchids, whose presence fills whole forests with fragrance."

¶ Then, in regard to singing birds, Captain Mayne Reid speaks of "the incomparable melody of the mock-bird, the full, charming notes of the blue song-thrush, the sweet warbling voice of the silvias, finches, tanagas, which not only adorn the American woods with their gorgeous colours, but make them vocal with never-ending song."

(9) BYRON. Xerxes' Ships. Byron says that Xerxes looked on his "ships by thousands" off the coast of Sal'amis. The entire number of sails was 1200; of these 400 were wrecked before the battle off the coast of Sêpias, so that even supposing the whole of the rest were engaged, the number could not exceed 800. —Isles of Greece.

¶ The Isle Teos. In the same poem he refers to "Teos" as one of the isles of Greece, but Teos is a maritime town on the coast of Ionia, in Asia Minor.

(10) CAMPBELL speaks of the aloes and palm trees of Wyoming, neither of which trees grows there.

He also calls the people a "gentle people," but the mutual hatred between the farmers rendered the place a hell rather than a paradise. Families were so divided that the fire of contention burnt ragingly; but Campbell speaks of it as a "seat of social happiness."—Howitt: History of England (George III., p. 218).

(11) CERVANTES. Dorothea's Father. Dorothea represents herself as queen of Micomicon, because both her father and mother were dead, but don Quixote speaks of her father to her as alive.—Pt. I. iv. 8.

¶ Mambrino's Helmet. In pt. I. iii. 8 we are told that the galley-slaves set free by don Quixote assaulted him with stones, and "snatching the basin from his head, broke it to pieces." In bk. iv. 15 we find this basin quite whole and sound, the subject of a judicial inquiry, the question being whether it was a helmet or a barber's basin. Sancho (ch. 11) says he "picked it up, bruised and battered, intending to get it mended;" but he says, "I broke it to pieces," or, according to one translator, "broke it into a thousand pieces." In bk. iv. 8 we are told that don Quixote "came from his chamber armed cap-à-pie, with the barber's basin on his head."

¶ Sancho's Ass. We are told (pt. I. iii. 9) that Gines de Passamonte "stole Sancho's ass." Sancho laments the loss with true pathos, and the knight condoles with him. But soon afterwards Cervantes says, "He [Sancho] jogged on leisurely upon his ass after his master."

Crescent Moon tavern, where he was tossed in a blanket, and put the provisions left by the priests in his great-coat (ch. 5). The galley-slaves robbed him of "his great-coat, leaving only his doublet" (ch. 8), but in the next chapter (9) we find "the victuals had not been touched," though the rascals "searched diligently for booty." Now, if the food was in the great-coat, and the great-coat was stolen, how is it that the victuals remained in Sancho's possession untouched?

¶ Sancho's Wallet. We are told that Sancho left his wallet by mistake at the tavern where he was blanket-tossed (ch. 5), but in ch. 9, when he found the portmanteau, "he crammed the gold and linen into his wallet."—Pt. I. iii.

To make these oversights more striking, the author says, when Sancho found the portmanteau, "he entirely forgot the loss of his wallet, his great-coat, and of his faithful companion and servant Dapple" (the ass).

¶ Supper. Cervantes makes the party at the Crescent tavern eat two suppers in one evening. In ch. 5 the curate orders in supper, and "after supper" they read the story of "Fatal Curiosity." In ch. 12 we are told "the cloth was laid [again] for supper," and the company sat down to it, quite forgetting that they had already supped.—Pt. I. iv.

(12) CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA states that "the fame of Beaumarchais rests on his two operas, Le Barbier de Seville (1755) and Le Mariage de Figaro." Every one knows that Mozart composed the opera of Figaro (1786), and that Casti wrote the libretto. The opera of Le Barbier de Seville, or rather Il Barbiere di Siviglia, was composed by Rossini, in 1816. What Beaumarchais wrote was two comedies, one in four acts and the other in five.—Art. "Beaumarchais."

(13) CHAMBERS'S JOURNAL. We are told, in a paper entitled "Coincidences," that "Thursday has proved a fatal day with the Tudors, for on that day died Henry VIII., Edward VI., queen Mary, and queen Elizabeth." This is not correct in regard to Henry VIII., who died January 28, 1546–7, according to the best authority, Rymer's Fœdera, vol. xv., and that day was a Friday (Old Style), and not a Thursday.

¶ In the same paper we are told that Saturday has been fatal to the present dynasty, "for William IV. and every one of the Georges died on a Saturday." This is not correct in regard to George I., who died Sunday, June 11, 1727, and William IV., who died Tuesday, June 20, 1837. The other three Georges died on a Saturday, viz. George II., October 25, 1760; George III., January 29, 1820; and George IV., June 26, 1830.

(14) CHAUCER says, "The throstle-cock sings so sweet a tune that Tubal himself, the first musician, could not equal it."—The Court of Love. Of course he means Jubal.

¶ In his House of Fame, he mistakes the giant Orion for Arion the musician.

(15) CIBBER (Colley), in his Love Makes a Man, i., makes Carlos the student say, "For the cure of herds [Virgil's] bucolicks are a master-piece; but when his art describes the commonwealth of bees . . . I'm ravished." He means the Georgics, the Bucolics are eclogues, and never touch upon either of these subjects. The diseases and cures of cattle are in Georgic iii., and the habits, etc., of bees, Georgic iv.

(16) CID (The). When Alfonso succeeded his brother Sancho and banished the Cid, Rodrigo is made to say—

> Prithee say where were these gallants
> (Bold enough when far from blows)
> Where were they when I, unaided,
> Rescued thee from thirteen foes?

The historic fact is, not that Rodrigo rescued Alfonso from thirteen foes, but that the Cid rescued Sancho from thirteen of Alfonso's foes. Eleven he slew, and two he put to flight.—The Cid, xvi. 78.

(17) COLMAN. Job Thornberry says to Peregrine, who offers to assist him in his difficulties, "Desist, young man, in time." But Peregrine was at least 45 years old when so addressed. He was 15 when Job first knew him, and had been absent thirty years in Calcutta. Job Thornberry himself was not above five or six years older.

(18) COWPER calls the rose "the glory of April and May," but June is the great rose month. In the south of England they begin to bloom in the latter half of May, and go on to the middle of July. April roses would be horticultural curiosities.

¶ In his Invitation to Newton he speaks of the hibernation of swallows—

> The swallows, in their torpid state,
> Compose their useless wing;
> And bees in hives as idly wait
> The call of early spring.

(N.B.—Swallows do not hibernate; and bees in a hive are not idle in winter-time.)

¶ In his Yearly Distress he mistakes hoggets (young sheep) for pigs or hogs.

> The pigs [hoggets] that he had lost
> By maggots in their tail.

Young lambs are very subject to these parasites, but "pigs" are not. Strange that a man living in the country, and not without observation, should blunder so often on natural history.

(19) CRITICS at fault. The licentiate tells don Quixote that some critics found fault with him for defective memory, and instanced it in this: "We are told that Sancho's ass is stolen, but the author has forgotten to mention who the thief was." This is not the case, as we are distinctly informed that it was stolen by Gines de Passamonte, one of the galley-slaves.—Don Quixote, II. i. 3.

(20) CUNNINGHAM (Allan) wrote the well-known line, "a wet sheet and a flowing sail." Now, sheet in nautical language means a rope, and a "wet rope" cannot have been his meaning. In a sailing-boat there are four ropes, called the painter, the halyard, the sheet, and the tack. The painter is to tie the boat to the moorings; the halyard is to haul up the sail; the sheet is put near the end of the boom; and the tack is to fasten the sail to the bottom of the mast.

Nuttall, in his dictionary, erroneously gives "sheet," a sail, which it never means.

(21) DICKENS, in Edwin Drood, puts "rooks and rooks' nests" (instead of daws) "in the towers of Cloisterham."

¶ In his Child's History of England Dickens refers to Edmund earl of Kent as "the poor old lord," but he was only 28 years of age at the time referred to.

¶ In Little Dorrit (ch. xxxiii.) Tattycoram is supposed to enter "with an iron box two feet square under her arm." She must have been a pretty strong girl, with very long arms.

¶ In Nicholas Nickleby he represents Mr. Squeers as setting his boys "to hoe turnips" in midwinter.

¶ In The Tale of Two Cities (iii. 4) he says, "The name of the strong man of Old Scripture descended to the chief functionary who worked the guillotine." But the name of this functionary was Sanson, not Samson.

(22) FROISSART tells us that the elder Despenser was 90 years old at death. As he was born in March, 1261, and died in October, 1326, he was 65, not 90.

(23) GALEN says that man has seven bones in the sternum (instead of three); and Sylvius, in reply to Vesalius, contends that "in days of yore the robust chests of heroes had more bones than men now have."

(24) GOLDSMITH, in The Traveller (last line but two), speaks of "Luke's iron crown, and Damien's bed of steel." This line contains three blunders: (1) It was not Luke but George Dosa, the Hungarian, who, in 1514, was put to death by a red-hot crown on his head. (2) The name of the regicide who attempted the life of Louis XV. was not Damien but Damiens, although it is true he is called 'Damien' in the Gentleman's Magazine, 1757 (vol. xxvii. pp. 87, 157). (3) Damiens was not tortured to death on a "bed of steel," but was first flayed alive by pincers, and huge morsels of flesh were plucked from his bones, after which he was torn limb from limb by six wild horses. (See Foster's Life, bk. iii. 10.)

(25) GREENE (Robert) speaks of Delphos as an island; but Delphos, or rather Delphi, was a city of Phocis, and no island. "Six noblemen were sent to the isle of Delphos."—Donastus and Faunia. Probably he confounded the city of Delphi with the isle of Delos.

(26) HALLIWELL, in his Archaic Dictionary, says, "Crouchmas means Christmas," and adds that Tusser is his authority. But this is altogether a mistake. Tusser, in his "May Remembrances," says: "From bull cow fast, till Crouchmas be past," i.e. St. Helen's Day. Tusser evidently means from May 3 (the invention of the Cross) to August 18 (St. Helen's Day or the Cross-mas), not Christmas.

(27) HATTON (Joseph), in his Three Recruits, etc. (1880), speaks of Jacob as the patriarch who offered up his son in sacrifice to God. Of course he meant Abraham.

(28) HIGGONS (Bevil) says—

> The Cyprian queen, drawn by Apellês' hand,
> Of perfect beauty did the pattern stand!
> But then bright nymphs from every part of Greece
> Did all contribute to adorn the piece.
> To Sir Godfrey Kneller (1780).

Tradition says that Apellês' model was either Phrynê, or Campaspê afterwards his wife. Campbell has borrowed these lines, but ascribes the painting to Protog'enês the Rhodian—

> When first the Rhodian's mimic art arrayed
> The Queen of Beauty in her Cyprian shade,
> The happy master mingled in the piece
> Each look that charmed him in the fair of Greece.
> Pleasures of Hope, ii.

(29) HOGG the Ettrick shepherd, speaks of "Evening Mass," and sir Walter Scott says, "On Christmas Eve the Mass was sung."

> The supper-bell at court had rung,
> The Mass was said, the Vespers sung.
> The Queen's Wake.

(30) HOWITT, in his History of England

(George III., p. 241), describing the attack of the Gordon rioters on the Bank of England, says, "They [the rioters] found a mine of wealth guarded by 'Arimaspians' in the shape of infantry, who had orders to fire, and did it without scruple." Now, the Arimaspians were the rioters, and the infantry were the "Griffins" who guarded the gold.

> The tale is this: The Griffins guarded the gold of the north, but the Arimaspians, a one-eyed race, mounted on horseback, attempted to steal the gold, and hence arose the hostility between the griffin and the horse.

(31) HUME (Fergus). In The Mystery of a Hansom Cab (ch. ix. p. 56) we are told that the clock was too slow. At p. 131 (ch. xix.) Albert Pendy, the clock-and watchmaker, on being sworn, deposed that "it was ten minutes too fast," and he adds, "I put it right." Careton, addressing the jury (p. 135), says it was too slow.

(32) JOHNSON (Dr.) makes Addison speak of Steele as "Little Dicky," whereas the person so called by Addison was a dwarfish actor who played "Gomez" in Dryden's Spanish Fryar. He defines "Pastern, the knee of a horse" in his Dictionary.

(33) KINGSLEY (Charles). In Westward Ho! (ch. xx.) John Brumblecombe reads before the sea-fight the prayer for "all conditions of men;" but in the time of queen Elizabeth there was no such prayer in the Prayer-book.

(34) LAMB (Charles) speaks of pheasants being served up at table on the second of September. Partridges might, but pheasants are not eaten before October. He says, in his Essays of Elia, "Shrove Tuesday was helping the second of September to . . . the delicate thigh of a hen pheasant."—Rejoicings upon the New Year's Coming of Age.

(35) LONDON NEWSPAPER (A), one of the leading journals of the day, has spoken three times within two years of "passing under the Caudine Forks," evidently supposing them to be a "yoke," instead of a valley or mountain pass.

(36) LONGFELLOW calls Erig'ena a Scotchman, whereas the very word means an Irishman.

> Done into Latin by that Scottish beast, > Erigena Johannes.
> Golden Legend.

Without doubt, the poet mistook John Duns [Scottus], who died in 1308, for John Scottus [Erigena], who died in 875. Erigena translated into Latin St. Dionysius. He was latitudinarian in his views, and anything but "a Scottish beast" or Calvinist.

¶ The Two Angels. Longfellow crowns the death-angel with amaranth, with which Milton says, "the spirits elect bind their resplendent locks;" and his angel of life he crowns with asphodels, the flowers of Pluto or the grave.

(37) MILTON. Colkitto and Macdonnel. In Sonnet x. Milton speaks of Colkitto and M'Donnel as two distinct families, but they are really one and the same. The M'Donnels of Antrim were called Colkittok because they were descended from the lame Colin.

¶ In Comus (ver. 880) he makes the siren Ligea "sleek her hair with a golden comb," as if she were a Scandinavian mermaid.

(38) MOORE (Thom.) says—

> The sunflower turns on her god, when he sets,
> The same look which she turned when he rose.
> Irish Melodies, ii. ("Believe Me if all those Endearing Young Charms").

The sunflower does not turn to either the rising or setting sun. It receives its name solely because it resembles a picture sun. It is not a turn-sun or heliotrope at all.

(39) MORRIS says—

> She the saffron gown will never wear,
> And in no flower-strewn couch shall she be laid;

i.e. she will never be a bride. Milton also, in L'Allegro, says—

> There let Hymen oft appear
> In saffron robe.

Brides wore a white robe, but were wholly enveloped in crocus-coloured veils or flammeum. "Lutea demiosos velarunt flammea vultus."—Lucan, ii. 361. (See also Pliny, Natural History, xxi. 22.)

(40) MURPHY, in the Grecian Daughter, says (act i. 1)—

> Have you forgot the elder Dionysius,
> Surnamed the Tyrant? . . . Evander came from Greece,
> And sent the tyrant to his humble rank,
> Once more reduced to roam for vile subsistence,
> A wandering sophist thro' the realms of Greece.

It was not Dionysius the Elder, but Dionysius the Younger, who was the "wandering sophist;" and it was not Evander, but Timoleon, who dethroned him. The elder Dionysius was not dethroned at all, nor ever reduced "to humble rank." He reigned thirty-eight years without interruption, and died a king, in the plenitude of his glory, at the age of 63.

¶ In the same play (act iv. 1) Euphrasia says to Dionysius the Younger—

> Think of thy father's fate at Corinth, Dionysius.

It was not the father, but the son (Dionysius the Younger), who lived in exile at Corinth.

¶ In the same play he makes Timoleon victorious over the Syracusians (that is historically correct); and he makes Euphrasia stab Dionysius the Younger, whereas he retreated to Corinth, and spent his time in debauchery, but supported himself by keeping a school. Of his death nothing is known, but certainly he was not stabbed to death by Euphrasia. (See Plutarch.)

(41) PHILLIPS informs us that "a quaver is a measure of time in music, being the half of a crotchet, as a crotchet is half a quaver." (He means half a minim.)

(42) POPE, in his fable The Mouse and the Weasel, makes the weasel eat corn.

(43) RICHARDSON'S DICTIONARY, under the word "taper," a wax candle, gives as an illustration of the meaning—

> And in the night she listeth best tapere (i.e. to appear).

(44) PRINTER'S ERROR (A curious). The Annual Register, 1879, p. 373, speaks of the monument of Byron, and a statue done by Thomas Walden, meaning Thorwaldsen.

(45) RYMER, in his Fœdera, ascribes to Henry I. (who died in 1135) a preaching expedition for the restoration of Rochester Church, injured by fire in 1177 (vol. I. i. 9).

¶ In the previous page Rymer ascribes to Henry I. a deed of gift from "Henry king of England and lord of Ireland;" but every one knows that Ireland was conquered by Henry II., and the deed referred to was the act of Henry III.

¶ On p. 71 of the same vol. Odo is made, in 1298, to swear "in no wise to confederate with Richard I.;" whereas Richard I. died in 1199.

(46) SABINE MAID (The). G. Gilfillan, in his introductory essay to Longfellow, says, "His ornaments, unlike those of the Sabine maid, have not crushed him." Tarpeia, who opened the gates of Rome to the Sabines, and was crushed to death by their shields, was not a Sabine maid but a Roman.

(47) SCOTT (Sir Walter). In the Heart of Midlothian we read—

> She [Effie Deans] amused herself with visiting the dairy . . . and was near discovering herself to Mary Hetley by betraying her acquaintance with the celebrated receipt for Dunlop cheese, that she compared herself to Bedreddin Hassan, whom the vizier his father-in-law discovered by his superlative skill in composing cream-tarts with pepper in them.

In these few lines are several gross errors: (1) "cream-tarts" should be cheese-cakes; (2) the charge was "that he made cheese-cakes without putting pepper in them," and not that he made "cream-tarts with pepper;" (3) it was not the vizier his father-in-law and uncle, but his mother, the widow of Noureddin, who made the discovery, and why? for the best of all reasons—because she herself had taught her son the receipt. The party were at Damascus at the time.—Arabian Nights ("Noureddin Ali," etc.). (See p. 338, "Thackeray.")

> "What!" said Bedreddin, "was everything in my house to be broken and destroyed . . . only because I did not put pepper in a cheese-cake?"—Arabian Nights ("Noureddin Ali," etc.).

¶ In The Fortunes of Nigel (chap. xxxii.) lord Dalgarno speaks of that happy period "which begins with 'Dearly beloved,' and ends with 'amazement;'" but in the time of James I. the Marriage Service did not end with the word "amazement."

¶ In his Antiquary (chap. x.) he speaks of "the philosopher who appealed from Philip inflamed with wine to Philip in his hours of sobriety." This "philosopher" was a poor old woman.

¶ In The Betrothed (time, Henry II.) he speaks of the "bishop of Gloucester;" but there was no such bishop till 1541, which was in the reign of Henry VIII.

¶ In Ivanhoe (chap. xxvii.) he makes Wamba the jester say, "I am a poor brother of St. Francis;" but that Order was founded in 1206, and Wamba lived in the reign of Richard I. (1189–1199).

§ Again, in Ivanhoe, the "monk of Croydon" should be the "monk of Croyland."

§ In chap. vii. the Christian name of Malvoisin is Richard, elsewhere it is Philip.

(48) SHAKESPEARE. Althæa and the Fire-brand. Shakespeare says (2 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 2) that Althæa dreamt she was delivered of a fire-brand." It was not Althæa but Hecŭba who dreamed, a little before Paris was born, that her offspring was a brand that consumed the kingdom. The tale of Althæa is that the Fates laid a log of wood on a fire, and told her that her son would live till that log was consumed; whereupon she snatched up the log and kept it from the fire, till one day her son Melea'ger offended her, when she flung the log on the fire, and her son died, as the Fates predicted.

¶ Bohemia's Coast. In the Winter's Tale the vessel bearing the infant Perdĭta is "driven by storm on the coast of Bohemia;" but Bohemia has no seaboard at all.

¶ In Coriolanus Shakespeare makes

Volumnia the mother, and Virgilia the wife, of Coriolanus; but his wife was Volumnia, and his mother Veturia.

§ Delphi an Island. In the same drama (act iii. sc. 1) Delphi is spoken of as an island; but Delphi is a city of Phocis, containing a temple to Apollo. It is no island at all.

¶ Elsinore. Shakespeare speaks of the "beetling cliff of Elsinore," whereas Elsinore has no cliffs at all.

> What if it [the ghost] tempts you to the flood . . .
> Or to the dreadful summit of the cliff
> That beetles o'er its base into the sea?
> Hamlet, act i. sc. 4.

§ The Ghost, in Hamlet, is evidently a Roman Catholic: he talks of purgatory, absolution, and other catholic dogmas; but the Danes at the time were pagans.

¶ St. Louis. Shakespeare, in Henry V. act i. sc. 2, calls Louis X. "St. Louis," but "St. Louis" was Louis IX. It was Louis IX. whose "grandmother was Isabel," issue of Charles de Lorraine, the last of the Carlovingians. Louis X. was the son of Philippe IV. (le Bel), and grandson of Philippe III. and "Isabel of Aragon," not Isabel "heir of Capet, of the line of Charles the duke of Lorain."

¶ Macbeth was no tyrant, as Shakespeare makes him out to be, but a firm and equitable prince, whose title to the throne was better than that of Duncan.

§ Duncan's Murder. Macbeth did not murder Duncan in the castle of Inverness, as stated in the play, but at "the smith's house," near Elgin (1039).

§ Again, Macbeth was not slain by Macduff at Dunsin'ane, but made his escape from the battle, and was slain, in 1056, at Lumphanan.—Lardner: Cabinet Cyc., 17–19.

¶ In The Winter's Tale, act v. sc. 2, one of the gentlemen refers to Julio Romano, the Italian artist and architect (1492–1546), certainly some 800 years or more before Romano was born.

¶ In Twelfth Night, the Illyrian clown speaks of St. Bennet's Church, London. "The triplex, sir, is a good tripping measure, or the bells of St. Bennet's sure may put you in mind: one, two, three" (act v. sc. 1); as if the duke was a Londoner!

(49) SPENSER. Bacchus or Saturn? In the Faërie Queene, iii. 11, Britomart saw in the castle of Bu'sirane (3 syl.) a picture descriptive of the love of Saturn, who had changed himself into a centaur out of love for Erig'onê. It was not Saturn but Bacchus who loved Erigonê, and he was not transformed to a centaur, but to a horse.

¶ Benonê or Œnonê? In bk. vi. 9 (Faërie Queene) the lady-love of Paris is called Benônê, which ought to be Œnônê. The poet says that Paris was "by Plexippus' brook" when the golden apple was brought to him; but no such brook is mentioned by any classic author.

¶ Critias and Socrates. In bk. ii. 7 (Faërie Queene) Spenser says, "The wise Socrátês . . . poured out his life . . . to the dear Critias; his dearest bel-amie." It was not Socratês but Theram'enês, one of the thirty tyrants, who, in quaffing the poison-cup, said smiling, "This I drink to the health of fair Critias."—Cicero: Tusculan Questions.

¶ Critias or Crito? In the Faërie Queene, iv. (introduction) Spenser says that Socratês often discoursed of love to his friend Critias; but it was Crito, or rather Criton, that the poet means.

¶ Cyprus and Paphos. Spenser makes sir Scudamore speak of a temple of Venus, far more beautiful than "that in Paphos or that in Cyprus;" but Paphos was merely a town in the island of Cyprus, and the "two" are but one and the same temple.—Faërie Queene, iv. 10.

¶ Hippomanês. Spenser calls him "the Eubœan young man" (ii. 7), but he was a Bœotian. In cant. II. ix. 29, he says, "More whott [hot] than Ætn' or flaming Mongiball," but the latter is the Arabic name of Ætna; thus making Etna and Mongibello two distinct mountains; whereas the former is called by the Arabs Jabêl or Aj-jabâl, that is, "Mount Jabal," or Mon-giball.

(50) TENNYSON, in the Last Tournament, says (ver. 1), Dagonet was knighted in mockery by sir Gaw'ain; but in the History of Prince Arthur we are distinctly told that king Arthur knighted him "with his own hands" (pt. ii. 91).

¶ In Gareth and Lynette the same poet says that Gareth was the son of Lot and Bellicent; but we are told a score times and more in the History of Prince Arthur that he was the son of Margawse (Arthur's sister and Lot's wife, pt. i. 36).

> King Lot . . . wedded Margawse; Nentres . . . wedded Elain.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 2, 35, 36.

§ In the same Idyll Tennyson has changed Lionês to Lyonors; but, according to the collection of romances edited by sir T. Malory, these were quite different persons. Lionês, daughter of sir Persaunt, and sister of Linet of Castle Perilous, married sir Gareth (pt. i. 153); but Lyonors was the daughter of earl Sanam, and was the unwed mother of sir Borre by king Arthur (pt. i. 15).

§ Again, Tennyson makes Gareth marry Lynette, and leaves the true heroine, Lyonors, in the cold; but the History makes Gareth marry Lionês (Lyonors), and Gaheris his brother marries Linet.

Thus ended the history of sir Gareth, that wedded Dame Lionês of the Castle Perilous; and also of sir Gahêris, who wedded her sister Dame Linet.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur (end of pt. i.).

§ Again, in Gareth and Lynette, by erroneously beginning day with sunrise instead of the previous eve, Tennyson reverses the order of the knights, and makes the fresh green morn represent the decline of day, or, as he calls it, "Hesperus" the "Evening Star;" and the blue star of evening he makes "Phosphorus" the "Morning Star."

§ Once more, in Gareth and Lynette the late poet-laureate makes the combat between Gareth and Death finished at a single blow, but in the History Gareth fights from dawn to dewy eve. In fact, the allegory is ruined, unless man's battle of life is made to last till he dies.

Thus they fought [from sunrise] till it was past noon, and would not stint, till at last both lacked wind, and then stood they wagging, staggering, panting, blowing, and bleeding . . . and when they had rested them awhile, they went to battle again, trasing, rasing, and foyning, as two boars. Thus they endured till evening-song time.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, I. 136.

¶ In the Last Tournament Tennyson makes sir Tristram stabbed to death by sir Mark in Tintag'il Castle, Cornwall, while toying with his aunt, Isolt the Fair; but in the History he is in bed in Brittany, severely wounded, and dies of a shock, because his wife tells him the ship in which he expected his aunt to come was sailing into port with a black sail instead of a white one.

The poet-laureate has deviated so often from the collection of tales edited by sir Thomas Malory, that it would occupy too much space to point out his deviations even in the briefest manner.

(51) THACKERAY, in Vanity Fair, has taken from sir Walter Scott his allusion to Bedreddin, and not from the Arabian Nights. He has, therefore, fallen into the same error, and added three more. He says, "I ought to have remembered the pepper which the princess of Persia puts into the cream-tarts in India, sir" (ch. iii.). The charge was that Bedreddin made his cheese-cakes without putting pepper into them. But Thackeray has committed in this allusion other blunders. It was not a "princess" at all, but Bedreddin Hassan, who for the nonce had become a confectioner. He learned the art of making cheese-cakes from his mother (a widow). Again, it was not a "princess of Persia," for Bedreddin's mother was the widow of the vizier of Balsora, at that time quite independent of Persia. Nor did it happen in India.

¶ In The Newcomes (ch. xlix.) he speaks of "pea-green Payne." It was Hayne (who sued Miss Foote, in 1824, for breach of promise), not Payne, who was nicknamed "pea-green."

He was dressed in pea-green, with a pin and a chain,
And I think I heard somebody call him Squire Hayne.
Ingoldsby Legends ("The Black Mousquetaire").

¶ In Esmond he calls a bar sinister "the mark of bastardy." He meant a bend sinister.

(52) TURNER (Sharon), in his History of England (p. 63) says that William the Conqueror, after the battle of Hastings, "When he encamped the following day his health became affected, and his friends were alarmed;" and on p. 91 he says, "When a dangerous illness attacked him, he solemnly appointed his son Robert his heir;" but on p. 99 he says, "Such was his health, that he had experienced no illness to the last."

(53) VICTOR HUGO, in Les Travailleurs de la Mer, renders "the frith of Forth" by the phrase Premier des quartre, mistaking "frith" for first, and "Forth" for fourth or four. In his Marie Tudor he refers to the "History and Annals of Henry VII., par Franc Baronum," meaning "Historia, etc., Henrici Septimi, per Franciscum Baconum." He calls Barkyll Fedro a common British patronymic.

(54) VIRGIL has placed Ænēas in a harbour which did not exist at the time, "Portusque require Velinos" (Æneid, vi. 366). It was Curius Dentātus who cut a gorge through the rocks to let the waters of the Velinus into the Nar. Before this was done, the Velinus was merely a number of stagnant lakes, and the blunder is about the same as if a modern poet were to make Columbus pass through the Suez Canal.

§ In Ænēid, iii. 171, Virgil makes Ænēas speak of "Ausonia;" but as Italy was so called from Auson, son of Ulysses and Calypso, of course Æneas could not have known his name.

§ Again, in Ænēid, ix. 571, he represents Chorinæus as slain by Asy'las; but in bk. xii. 298 he is alive again. Thus—

> Chorinæum sternit Asylas.
> Bk. ix. 571.

Then—

> Obvius ambustum torrem Chorinæus ab ara
> Corripit, et venienti Ebuso plagamque ferenti
> Occupat os flammis, etc.
> Bk. xii. 298, etc.

§ Again, in bk. ix. Numa is slain by Nisus (ver. 554); but in bk. x. 562 Numa is alive, and Æneas kills him.

(55) WEBSTER, Dictionary (an early edition).

> WICKET-KEEPER, the player in cricket who stands with a bat to protect the wicket from the ball.
> LONG-STOP. (Cricket.) One who is set to stop balls sent a long distance.
> LEG. (Cricket.) To strike in the leg.
> BOWLER. One who plays bowls, or rolls in cricket.

⁂ Of course, every intelligent reader will be able to add to this long list; but no more space can be allowed for the subject in this dictionary.

Er'rua ("the mad-cap"), a young man whose wit defeated the strength of the giant Tartaro (a sort of one-eyed Polypheme). Thus the first competition was in throwing a stone. The giant threw his stone, but Errua threw a bird, which the giant supposed to be a stone, and as it flew out of sight, Errua won the wager. The next wager was to throw a bar of iron. After the giant had thrown, Errua said, "From here to Salamanca;" whereupon the giant bade him not to throw, lest the bar of iron should kill his father and mother, who lived there; so the giant lost the second wager. The third was to pull a tree up by the roots; and the giant gave in because Errua had run a cord round a host of trees, and said, "You pull up one, but I pull up all these." The next exploit was at bed-time: Errua was to sleep in a certain bed; but he placed a dead man in the bed, while he himself got under it. At midnight Tartaro took his club and belaboured the dead body most unmercifully. When Errua stood before Tartaro next morning, the giant was dumfounded. He asked Errua how he had slept. "Excellently well," said Errua, "but somewhat troubled by fleas." Other trials were made, but always in favour of Errua. At length a race was proposed, and Errua sewed into a bag the bowels of a pig. When he started, he cut the bag, strewing the bowels on the road. When Tartaro was told that his rival had done this to make himself more fleet, he cut his belly, and of course killed himself.—Rev. W. Webster: Basque Legends (1877).

(The reader will readily trace the resemblance between this legend and the exploits of Jack the Giant-killer. See also Campbell's Popular Tales of the West Highlands, ii. 327, and Grimm's Valiant Little Tailor.)

Erse (1 syl.), the native language of the West Highlanders of Scotland. Gaelic is a better word.

⁂ Erse is a corruption of Irish, from the supposition that these Highlanders were a colony from Ireland; but whether the Irish came from Scotland or the Scotch from Ireland, is one of those knotty points on which the two nations will never agree (See FIR-BOLG.)

Ers'kine (The Rev. Dr.), minister of Greyfriar's Church, Edinburgh.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Er'tanax, a fish common in the Euphratês, the bones of which were believed to impart courage and strength.

> A fish . . . haunteth the flood of Eufratês . . . it is called an ertanax, and his bones be of such a manner of kind that whoso handleth them he shall have so much courage that he shall never be weary, and he shall not think on joy nor sorrow that he hath had, but only on the thing he beholdeth before him.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 84 (1470).

Erudite (Most). Marcus Terentius Varro is called "the most erudite of the Romans" (B.C. 116–27).

Erysichthon [Erri-sik'-thon], a grandson of Neptune, who was punished by Cerês with insatiable hunger, for cutting down some trees in a grove sacred to that goddess. (See ERISICHTHON.)

Erythræ'an Main (The), the Red Sea. The "Erythræum Marê" included the whole expanse of sea between Arabia and Africa, including the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf.

> The ruddy waves he cleft in twain
> Of the Erythræan main.
> Milton: Psalm CXXXVI. (1623).

Er'ythre, Modesty personified, the virgin page of Parthen'ia or maiden chastity, in The Purple Island, by Phineas Fletcher (1633). Fully described in canto x. (Greek, eruthros, "red," from eruthriao, "to blush.")

Es'calus, an ancient, kind-hearted lord in the deputation of the duke of Vienna.—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure (1603).

Es'calus, prince of Vero'na.—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet (1598).

Es'canes (3 syl.), one of the lords of Tyre.—Shakespeare: Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

Escobar y Mendoza, a Spanish casuist, who said, "Good intentions justify crime," whence the verb escobarder, "to play the fox," "to play fast and loose."

The French have a capital name for the fox, namely, M. L'Escobar, which may be translated the "shuffler," or more freely "sly boots."—Daily News, March 25, 1878.

Escotillo [i.e. Little Michael Scott], considered by the common people as a magician, because he possessed more knowledge of natural and experimental philosophy than his contemporaries.

Es'dale (Mr.), a surgeon at Madras. —Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Esil or Eisel, vinegar. John Skelton, referring to the Crucifixion, when the soldiers gave Christ "vinegar mingled with gall," says—

Christ by crueltie Was nayled to a tree . . .
He dranke eisel and gall, To redeme vs withal.
Skelton: Colyn Clout (time, Henry VIII.).

Es'ings, the kings of Kent. So called from Eisc, the father of Hengist, as the Tuscans receive their name from Tuscus, the Romans from Romulus, the Cecrop'idæ from Cecrops, the Britons from Brutus, and so on.—Ethelwerd: Chron., ii.

Eskdale (lord), in Disraeli's novel of Coningsby (1844), is said to be designed for lord Lonsdale.

Esmeralda, a beautiful gipsy-girl, who, with tambourine and goat, dances in the place before Notre Dame de Paris, and is looked on as a witch. Qassimodo conceals her for a time in the church, but after various adventures she is gibbeted.—Victor Hugo: Notre Dame de Paris.

Esmond (Henry), a chivalrous cavalier in the reign of queen Anne; the hero of Thackeray's novel called Esmond (1852; time, queen Anne).

Esplan'dian, son of Am'adis and Oria'na. Montalvo has made him the subject of a fifth book to the four original books of Amadis of Gaul (1460).

The description of the most furious battles, carried on with all the bloody-mindedness of an Esplandian or a Bobadil [Ben Jonson: Every Man in His Humour]. —Encyc. Brit., art. "Romance."

Espriella (Manuel Alvares), the apocryphal name of Robert Southey. The poet-laureate pretends that certain "letters from England," written by this Spaniard, were translated by him from the original Spanish (three vols., 1807).

Essay on Criticism, by Pope. A poem running to 724 lines in heroic couplets. It abounds with well-known lines and happy expressions.

Essay on Man, a poem by Pope, in heroic couplets, and divided into four books or epistles. Like the Essay on Criticism, it is full of lines familiar to every educated Englishman (1732–1734).

Essays and Reviews, by six clergy, men and one layman of the Church of England, published in 1860. The writers were Dr. Temple, Dr. Rowland Williams, professor Baden Powell, professor Jowett, Wilson, Patteson, and Goodwin. The book was condemned by the bishops in Convocation, 1864.

∴ The Oxford Tract Movement began in 1833.

Essex (The earl of), a tragedy by Henry Jones (1745). Lord Burleigh and sir Walter Raleigh entertained a mortal hatred to the earl of Essex, and accused him to the queen of treason. Elizabeth disbelieved the charge; but at this juncture the earl left Ireland, whither the queen had sent him, and presented himself before her. Being very angry, she struck him, and Essex rushed into open rebellion, was taken, and condemned to death. The queen had given him a ring before the trial, telling him whatever petition he asked should be granted, if he sent to her this ring. When the time of execution drew nigh, the queen sent the countess of Nottingham to the Tower, to ask Essex if he had any plea to make, and the earl entreated her to present the ring to her majesty, and petition her to spare the life of his friend Southampton. The countess purposely neglected this charge, and Essex was executed. The queen, it is true, sent a reprieve, but lord Burleigh took care it should arrive too late. The poet says that Essex had recently married the countess of Rutland, that both the queen and the countess of Nottingham were jealous, and that this jealousy was the chief cause of the earl's death.

The abbé Boyer, La Calprenède, and Corneille have tragedies on the same subject.

¶ The general history and character of Essex was marvellously reproduced in Biron, the French conspirator in the reign of Henri IV.

Earl of Essex (1569–1601); duc de Biron (1562–1602).

Essex (The earl of), lord high constable of England, introduced by sir W. Scott in his novel called Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Estel'la, a haughty beauty, adopted by Miss Havisham. She was affianced by her wish to Pip, but married Bentley Drummle. She was the natural child of Magwitch the convict and Molly the housekeeper of Jaggers, Miss Havisham's lawyer, who introduced the child at three years old to Miss Havisham. —Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

Esther, housekeeper to Muhldenau, minister of Mariendorpt. She loves Hans, a servant to the minister, but Hans is shy, and Esther has to teach him how to woo and win her. Esther and Hans are similar to Helen and Modus, only in a lower social grade.—Knowles: The Maid of Mariendorpt (1838).

Esther (The book of), one of the historical books of the Old Testament, containing an account of queen Esther, who broke up a plot of Haman for the extirpation of the Jews in Persia.

The feast of Purim (i.e. lots) was established to commemorate this deliverance; and it was so called because the day of slaughter was fixed by "lots" (Ezra ix. 14).

Esther Hawdon, better known through the tale as Esther Summerson, natural daughter of captain Hawdon and lady Dedlock (before her marriage with sir Leicester Dedlock). Esther is a most lovable, gentle creature, called by those who know her and love her, "Dame Durden" or "Dame Trot." She is the heroine of the tale, and a ward in Chancery. Eventually she marries Allan Woodcourt, a surgeon.—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Esther Lyon, daughter of Rufus Lyon, in George Eliot's novel of Felix Holt. She eventually marries Felix (1866).

Estifa'nia, an intriguing woman, servant of donna Margaritta the Spanish heiress. She palms herself off on don Michael Perez (the copper captain) as an heiress, and the mistress of Margaritta's mansion. The captain marries her, and finds out that all her swans are only geese.—Fletcher: Rule a Wife and Have a Wife (1640).

Mrs. Pritchard was excellent in "The Queen" in Hamlet [Shakespeare], "Clarinda" [The Beau's Duel, Cenalvre], "Estifania," "Doll Common" [The Alchemist, B. Jonson].—Dibdin.

Est-il-Possible? a nickname given to George of Denmark (queen Anne's husband), because his general remark to the most startling announcement was, Est-il possible? With this exclamation he exhausted the vials of his wrath. It was James II. who gave him the sobriquet.

Est'mere (2 syl.), king of England. He went with his younger brother Adler to the court of king Adlands, to crave his daughter in marriage; but king Adlands replied that Bremor, the sowdan or sultan of Spain, had forestalled him. However, the lady, being consulted, gave her voice in favour of the king of England. While Estmere and his brother went to make preparations for the wedding, the "sowdan" arrived, and demanded the lady for his wife. A messenger was immediately despatched to inform Estmere, and the two brothers returned, disguised as a harper and his boy. They gained entrance into the palace, and Adler sang, saying, "O ladye, this is thy owne true love; no harper, but a king;" and then drawing his sword, he slew the "sowdan," Estmere at the same time chasing from the hall the "kempery men." Being now master of the position, Estmere took "the ladye faire," made her his wife, and brought her home to England.—Percy: Reliques, I. i. 5.

Estoti'iland, a vast tract of land in the north of America. Said to have been discovered by John Scalvê, a Pole, in 1477.

> The snow
> From cold Estotiland.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 685 (1665).

Estrildis or Elstred, daughter of the emperor of Germany. She was taken captive in war by Locrin (king of Britain), by whom she became the mother of Sabrin or Sabre. Gwendolen, the wife of Locrin, feeling insulted by this liaison, slew her husband, and had Estrildis and her daughter thrown into a river, since called the Sabri'na or Severn.—Geoffrey: British History, ii. 2, etc.

> Their corses were dissolved into that crystal stream,
> Their curls to curled waves.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, vi. (1612).

Etarre, a female character in the Idylls of the King, by Tennyson.

Ete'ocles and Polyni'ces, the two sons of Œ'dipos. After the expulsion of their father, these two young princes agreed to reign alternate years in Thebes. Eteoclês, being the elder, took the first turn, but at the close of the year refused to resign the sceptre to his brother; whereupon Polynicês, aided by six other chiefs, laid siege to the city. The two brothers met in combat, and each was slain by the other's hand.

¶ A similar fratricidal struggle is told of don Pedro of Castile and his half-brother don Henry. When don Pedro had estranged the Castilians by his cruelty, don Henry invaded Castile with a body of French auxiliaries, and took his brother prisoner. Don Henry visited him in prison, and the two brothers fell on each other like lions. Henry wounded Pedro in the face, but fell over a bench, when Pedro seized him. At that moment a Frenchman seized Pedro by the leg, tossed him over, and Henry slew him.—Menard: History of Du Guesclin.

(This is the subject of one of Lockhart's Spanish ballads.)

Eth'elbert, king of Kent, and the first of the Anglo-Saxon kings who was a Christian. He persuaded Gregory to send over Augustine to convert the English to "the true faith" (596), and built St. Paul's, London.—Ethelwerd: Chronicle, ii.

Good Ethelbert of Kent, first christened English king,
To preach the faith of Christ was first did hither bring Wise Augustine the monk, from holy Gregory sent . . .
That mighty fane to Paul in London did erect.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xi. (1613).

Eth'erington (The late earl of), father of Tyrrel and Bulmer.

The titular earl of Etherington, his successor to the title and estates.

Marie de Martigny (La comtesse), wife of the titular earl of Etherington.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Ethio'pian Wood, ebony.

The seats were made of Ethiopian wood,
The polished ebony.
Davenant: Gondibert, ii. 6 (died 1668).

Ethiopians, the same as Abassinians. The Arabians call these people El-habasen or Al-habasen, whence our Abassins; but they call themselves Ithiopians or Ethiopians.—Selden: Titles of Honour, vi. 64.

Where the Abassin kings their issue guard,
Mount Amara
Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 280 (1665).

Ethiop's Queen, referred to by Milton in his Il Penseroso, was Cassiope'a, wife of Ce'pheus (2 syl.) king of Ethiopia. She had a daughter named Androm'eda, whose beauty she affirmed exceeded that of the sea-nymphs. Nereus (2 syl.) complained of this insult to Neptune, and old father Earth-Shaker sent a huge sea-monster to ravage the kingdom of Ethiopia. At death Cassiopēa was made a constellation of thirteen stars.

. . . that starred Ethiop queen that strove
To set her beauty's praise above
The sea-nymphs, and their powers offended.
Milton: Il Penseroso, 19 (1638).

Ethnick Plot. The "Popish Plot" is so called in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel. As Dryden calls the royalists "Jews," and calls Charles II. "David king of the Jews," the papists were "Gentiles" (or Ethnoi), whence the "Ethnic Plot" means the plot of the Ethnoi against the people of God.

. . . well versed of old
In godly faction, and in treason bold . . .
Saw with disdain an Ethnick plot begun,
And scorned by Jebusites [Catholics] to be outdone.
Part i., lines 513-518 (1682).

Etiquette (Madame), the duchesse de Noailles, grand-mistress of the ceremonies in the court of Marie Antoinette. So called from her rigid enforcement of all the formalities and ceremonies of the ancien régime.

Et'na. Zeus buried under this mountain Enkel'ados, one of the hundred-handed giants.

The whole land weighed him down, as Etna does
The giant of mythology.
Tennyson: The Golden Supper.

Etteilla, the pseudonym of Alliette (spelt backwards), a perruquier and diviner of the eighteenth century. He became a professed cabalist, and was visited in his studio in the Hôtel de Crillon (Rue de la Verrerie) by all those who desired to unroll the Book of Fate. In 1783 he published Manière de se Récréer avec le Jeu de Cartes, nommées Tarots. In the British Museum are some divination cards published in Paris in the first half of the nineteenth century, called Grand Etteilla and Petit Etteilla, each pack being accompanied with a book of explication and instruction.

Ettercap, an ill-tempered person, who mars sociability. The ettercap is the poison-spider, and should be spelt "attercop." (Anglo-Saxon, atter-cop, "poison-spider.")

O sirs, was sic difference seen
As 'twixt wee Will and Tam?
The ane's a perfect ettercap,
The ither's just a lamb.
W. Miller: Nursery Songs.

Ettrick Shepherd (The), James Hogg, the poet, who was born in the forest of Ettrick, in Selkirkshire, and in early life was a shepherd (1772–1835).

Etty's Nine Pictures, "the Combat," the three "Judith" pictures, "Benaiah," "Ulysses and the Syrens," and the three pictures of "Joan of Arc."

"My aim," says Etty, "in all my great pictures has been to paint some great moral on the heart. 'The Combat represents the beauty of mercy; the three 'Judith pictures, patriotism [1, self-devotion to God; 2, self-devotion to man; 3, self-devotion to country]; 'Benaiah, David's chief captain,' represents valour; 'Ulysses and the Syrens,' sensual delights or the wages of sin is death; and the three pictures of 'Joan of Arc' depict religion, loyalty, and patriotism. In all, nine in number, as it was my desire to paint three times three."—W. Etty, of York (1787–1849).

Et'zel or Es'zel [i.e. Attila], king of the Huns, in the songs of the German minnesingers. A ruler over three kingdoms and thirty principalities. His second wife was Kriemhild, the widow of Siegfried. In pt. ii. of the Nibelungen Lied he sees his sons and liegemen struck down without making the least effort to save them; and is as unlike the Attila of history as a "hector" is to the noble Trojan "the protector of mankind."

Eubo'nia, Isle of Man.

He reigned over Britain and its three islands.—Nennius: History of the Britons.

(The three islands are Isle of Wight, Eubonia, and Orkney.)

Eu'charis, one of the nymphs of Calypso, with whom Telemachos was deeply smitten. Mentor, knowing his love was sensual love, hurried him away from the island. He afterwards fell in love with Anti'opê, and Mentor approved his choice.—Fénelon: Télémaque, vii. (1700).

He [Paul] fancied he had found in Virginia the wisdom of Antiopê, with the misfortunes and the tenderness of Eucharis.—Bernardin de St. Pierre: Paul and Virginia (1788).

(Eucharis is meant for Mdlle. de Fontange, maid of honour to Mde. de Montespan. For a few months she was a favourite with Louis XIV., but losing her good looks she was discarded, and died at the age of 20. She used to dress her hair with streaming ribbons, and hence this style of head-gear was called à la Fontange.)

Eu'clio, a penurious old hunks.—Plautus: Aulularia.

Now you must explain all this to me, unless you would have me use you as ill as Euclio does Staphy'la.—Sir W. Scott.

Eu'crates (3 syl.), the miller, and one of the archons of Athens. A shuffling fellow, always evading his duty and breaking his promise; hence the Latin proverb—

Vias novit, quibus effugiat Eucrates ("He has more shifts than Eucrates").

Eudo'cia (4 syl.), daughter of Eu'menês governor of Damascus. Pho'cyas, general of the Syrian forces, being in love with her, asks the consent of Eumenês, and is refused. In revenge, he goes over to the Arabs, who are besieging Damascus. Eudocia is taken captive, but refuses to wed a traitor. At the end, Pho'cyas dies, and Eudocia retires into a nunnery.—Hughes: The Siege of Damascus (1720).

Eudon (Count) of Cantabria. A baron favourable to the Moor, "too weak-minded to be independent." When the Spaniards rose up against the Moors, the first order of the Moorish chief was this: "Strike off count Eudon's head; the fear which brought him to our camp will bring him else in arms against us now" (ch. xxv.).—Southey: Roderick, etc., xiii. (1814).

Eudox'ia, wife of the emperor Valentin'ian. Petro'nius Max'imus "poisoned" the emperor, and the empress killed Maximus.—Beaumont and Fletcher: Valentinian (1617).

Eugene Aram. (See ARAM, p. 54.)

Euge'nia, called "Silence" and the "Unknown." She was wife of count de Valmont, and mother of Florian, "the foundling of the forest." In order to come into the property, baron Longueville used every endeavour to kill Eugenia and Florian, but all his attempts were abortive, and his villainy at length was brought to light.—Dimond: The Foundling of the Forest.

Eugenio, a young gentleman who turned goat-herd, because Leandra jilted him and eloped with a heartless adventurer, named Vincent de la Rosa.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. 20 ("The Goat-herd's Story," 1605).

Euge'nius, the friend and wise counsellor of Yorick. John Hall Stevenson was the original of this character.—Sterne: Tristram Shandy (1759).

Euhe'meros, a Sicilian Greek, who wrote a Sacred History to explain the historical or allegorical character of the Greek and Latin mythologies.

One could wish Euhêmêrus had never been born. It was he who spoilt [the old myths] first.—Ouida: Ariadne, i. 1.

Eulenspiegel (Thyl), i.e. "Thy Owlglass," of Brunswick. A man who runs through the world as charlatan, fool, lansquenet, domestic servant, artist, and Jack-of-all-trades. He undertakes anything, but rejoices in cheating those who employ him; he parodies proverbs, rejoices in mischief, and is brimful of pranks and drolleries.—Dr. Murner: Thyl Eulenspiegel (1543).

An English version, entitled The Merrye Jeste of a Man called Howleglass, and of the many Marvellous Thinges and Jestes that he did in his Lyfe in Eastland, was printed by William Copland. Another by K. R. H. Mackenzie, in 1860.

To few mortals has it been granted to earn such a place in universal history as Tyll Eulenspiegel. Now, after five centuries, his native village is pointed out with pride to the traveller.—Carlyle.

Eumæos (in Latin, Eumæus), the slave and swine-herd of Ulysses, hence any swine-herd.

Eu'menes (3 syl.), governor of Damascus, and father of Eudo'cia.—Hughes: Siege of Damascus (1720).

Eumnes'tes, Memory personified. Spenser says he is an old man, decrepit and half blind. He was waited on by a boy named Anamnestês. (Greek, eumnêstis, "good memory;" anamnêstis, "research.")—Faërie Queene, ii. 9 (1590).

He [Fancy] straight commits them to his treasury
Which old Eumnestes keeps, father of memory—
Eumnestes old, who in his living screen
(His living breast) the rolls and records bears
Of all the deeds and men which he hath seen,
And keeps locked up in faithful registers.
P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, vi. (1633).

Eu'noe (3 syl.), a river of purgatory, a draught of which makes the mind recall all the good deeds and good offices of life. It is a little beyond Lethê or the river of forgetfulness.

Lo! where Eunoe flows,
Lead thither; and, as thou art wont, revive
His fainting virtue.
Dante: Purgatory, xxxiii. (1308).

Euphra'sia, daughter of lord Dian, a character resembling "Viola" in Shakespeare's Twelfth Night. Being in love with prince Philaster, she assumes boy's attire, calls herself "Bellario," and enters the prince's service. Philaster transfers Bellario to the princess Arethusa, and then grows jealous of the lady's love for her tender page. The sex of Bellario being discovered, shows the groundlessness of this jealousy.—Beaumont and Fletcher: Philaster or Love Lies a-bleeding (1608).

Euphra'sia, "the Grecian daughter," was daughter of Evander, the old king of Syracuse (dethroned by Dionysius, and kept prisoner in a dungeon on the summit of a rock). She was the wife of Phocion, who had fled from Syracuse to save their infant son. Euphrasia, having gained admission to the dungeon where her aged father was dying from starvation, "fostered him at her breast by the milk designed for her own babe, and thus the father found a parent in the child." When Timoleon took Syracuse, Dionysius was about to stab Evander, but Euphrasia, rushing forward, struck the tyrant dead upon the spot.—Murphy: The Grecian Daughter (1772).

¶ The same tale is told of Xantippê (not the wife of Socratês), who preserved the life of her father Cimo'nos in prison. The guard, astonished that the old man held out so long, set a watch and discovered the secret.

There is a dungeon, in whose dim drear light
What do I gaze on? . . .
An old man, and a female young and fair,
Fresh as a nursing mother, in whose veins
The blood is nectar . . .
Here youth offers to old age the food,
The milk of his own gift . . . It is her sire,
To whom she renders back the debt of blood.
Byron: Childe Harold, iv. 148 (1817).

Eu'phrasy, the herb eye-bright; so called because it was once supposed to be efficacious in clearing the organs of sight. Hence the archangel Michael purged the eyes of Adam with it, to enable him to see into the distant future. See Milton: Paradise Lost, xi. 414-421 (1665).

Eu'phues (3 syl.), the chief character in John Lilly's Euphuês or The Anatomy of Wit (1581), and Euphuês and his England (1582). He is an Athenian gentleman, distinguished for his elegance, wit, love-making, and roving habits. Shakespeare borrowed his "government of the bees" (Henry V. act i. sc. 2) from Lilly. Euphuês was designed to exhibit the style affected by the gallants of England in the reign of queen Elizabeth. Thomas Lodge wrote a novel in a similar style, called Euphuês' Golden Legacy (1590).

(Euphues and Lucilla, published in 1716, is by some supposed to be a posthumous work of John Lilly.)

N. B.—Lilly's Euphues have given to the language the words euphuism (stilted fine writing) and euphuist (one who imitates the style of Euphues). This sort of affectation in writing pervaded many of our novels more or less even to the early part of the nineteenth century.

(Foster's Essays, 1805, 1819, were every bit as bad for their bad taste and grandiloquence, and elaborate fustian.)

"The commonwealth of your bees," replied Euphuês, "did so delight me that I was not a little sorry that either their estates have not been longer, or your leisure more; for, in my simple judgment, there was such an orderly government that men may not be ashamed to imitate it."—Lilly: Euphuest (1581).

(The romances of Calprenède and Scudéri bear the same relation to the jargon of Louis XIV. as the Euphues of Lilly to that of queen Elizabeth.)

Eure'ka I or rather HEURE'KA I ["I have discovered it!"]. The exclamation of Archime'dês, the Syracusian philosopher, when he found out how to test the purity of Hi'ero's crown.

The tale is, that Hiero suspected that a craftsman to whom he had given a certain weight of gold to make into a crown had alloyed the metal, and he asked Archimedês to ascertain if his suspicion was well founded. The philosopher, getting into his bath, observed that the water ran over, and it flashed into his mind that his body displaced its own bulk of water. Now, suppose Hiero gave the goldsmith 1 lb. of gold, and the crown weighed 1 lb., it is manifest that if the crown was pure gold, both ought to displace the same quantity of water; but they did not do so, and therefore the gold had been tampered with. Archimedês next immersed in water 1 lb. of silver, and the difference of water displaced soon gave the clue to the amount of alloy introduced by the artificer.

Vitruvius says, "When the idea occurred to the philosopher, he jumped out of his bath, and without waiting to put on his clothes, he ran home, exclaiming, 'Heurika! heurika!'"

Eurip'ides (4 syl.). When Alcestidês (4 syl.) chaffed Euripidês for having composed only three verses in three days, whereas he (Alcestidês) had composed 300, Euripidês made answer, "But my three will outlast 300 years, while your 300 will not outlive three days."

¶ Haydn made a similar remark when urged to hasten his composition of The Creation, on which he had been working nearly two years; he replied, "No! I intend it to last a long time."

Euro'pa. The Fight at Dame Europa's School, written by the Rev. H. W. Pullen, minor canon of Salisbury Cathedral. A skit on the Franco-Prussian War (1870-1871).

Europe's Liberator. So Wellington was called after the overthrow of Bonaparte (1769-1852).

Oh Wellington ... called "Saviour of the Nations" ... And "Europe's Liberator."
Byron: Don Juan, ix. 5 (1824).

Eu'rus, the east wind; Zephyr, the west wind; No'tus, the south wind; Bo'reas, the north wind. Eurus, in Italian, is called the Lev'ant ("rising of the sun"), and Zephyr is called Po'nent ("setting of the sun").

Forth rush the Levant and the Ponent winds—
Eurus and Zephyr,
Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 705 (1665).

Euryd'ice (4 syl.), the wife of Orpheus (2 syl.), killed by a serpent on her wedding night. Orpheus went down to hadês to crave for her restoration to life, and Pluto said she should follow him to earth provided he did not look back. When the poet was stepping on the confines of our earth, he turned to see if Eurydicê was following, and just caught a glance of her as she was snatched back into the shades below.

(Pope tells the tale in his Pindaric poem called Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, 1709.)

Euryt'ion, the herdsman of Ger'yon. He never slept day nor night, but walked unceasingly among his herds with his two-headed dog Orthros. "Herculês them all did overcome."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 10 (1596).

EUSTACE, one of the attendants of sir Reginald Front de Bœuf (a follower of prince John).—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Eustace (Father), or "father Eustatius," the superior and afterwards abbot of St. Mary's. He was formerly William Allan, and the friend of Henry Warden (afterwards the protestant preacher).—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Eustace (Charles), a pupil of Ignatius Polyglot. He had been clandestinely married for four years, and had a little son named Frederick. Charles Eustace confided his scrape to Polyglot, and concealed his young wife in the tutor's private room. Polyglot was thought to be a libertine, but the truth came out, and all parties were reconciled.—Poole: The Scapegoat.

Eustace (Jack), the lover of Lucinda, and "a very worthy young fellow," of good character and family. As justice Woodcock was averse to the marriage, Jack introduced himself as a music-master, and sir William Meadows, who recognized him, persuaded the justice to consent to the marriage of the young couple. This he was the more ready to do as his sister Deborah said positively he "should not do it."—Bickerstaff: Love in a Village (1762).

Euthana'sia, an easy, happy death. The word occurs in the Dunciad, and Byron has a poem so called. Euthanasia generally means a harbour of rest and peace after the storms of life: "Inveni portum; spes et fortuna valete," i.e. "I have found my Euthanasia, farewell to the battle of life." (Greek, eu thanatos, "a happy death.")

"I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of euthanasia," said Phœbe, "but then it ought to be with the consent of the victims."—Mrs. Oliphant: Phœbe, Jun., iii. 6.

A happy rural retreat . . . the Euthanasia of a life of carefulness and toil?—Encyclopædia Britannica, article, "Romance." The reference is to Gil Blas.

Eva, daughter of Torquil of the Oak. She is betrothed to Ferquhard Day.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

∴ There is an Eva in Uncle Tom's Cabin, by Mrs. Beecher Stowe (1850).

Evad'ne (3 syl.), wife of Kap'aneus (3 syl.). She threw herself on the funeral pile of her husband, and was consumed with him.

Evad'ne (3 syl.), sister of Melantius. Amintor was compelled by the king to marry her, although he was betrothed to Aspasia (the "maid" whose death forms the tragical event of the drama).—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Maid's Tragedy (1610).

The purity of female virtue in Aspasia is well contrasted with the guilty boldness of Evadnê, and the rough soldierlike bearing and manly feeling of Melantius render the selfish sensuality of the king more hateful and disgusting.—R. Chambers: English Literature, i. 204.

Evad'ne or THE STATUE, a drama by Sheil (1820). Ludov'ico, the chief minister of Naples, heads a conspiracy to murder the king and seize the crown; his great stumbling-block is the marquis of Colonna, a high-minded nobleman, who cannot be corrupted. The sister of the marquis is Evadnê (3 syl.), plighted to Vicentio. Ludovico's scheme is to get Colonna to murder Vicentio and the king, and then to debauch Evadnê. With this in view, he persuades Vicentio that Evadnê is the king's fille d'amour, and that she marries him merely as a flimsy cloak, but he adds, "Never mind, it will make your fortune." The proud Neapolitan is disgusted, and flings off Evadnê as a viper. Her brother is indignant, challenges the troth-plight lover to a duel, and Vicentio falls. Ludovico now irritates Colonna by talking of the king's amour, and induces him to invite the king to a banquet and then murder him. The king goes to the banquet, and Evadnê shows him the statues of the Colonna family, and amongst them one of her own father, who at the battle of Milan had saved the king's life by his own. The king is struck with remorse, but at this moment Ludovico enters, and the king conceals himself behind the statue. Colonna tells the traitor minister the deed is done, and Ludovico orders his instant arrest, gibes him as his dupe, and exclaims, "Now I am king indeed!" At this moment the king comes forward, releases Colonna, and orders Ludovico to be arrested. The traitor draws his sword, and Colonna kills him. Vicentio now enters, tells how his ear has been abused, and marries Evadnê.

Evan Dhu of Lochiel, a Highland chief in the army of Montrose.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Evan Dhu M'Combich, the foster-brother of M'Ivor.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Evandale (The Right Hon. W. Maxwell, lord), in the royal army under the duke of Monmouth. He is a suitor of Edith Bellenden, the granddaughter of lady Margaret Bellenden, of the Tower of Tillietudlem.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Evan'der, the "good old king of Syracuse," dethroned by Dionysius the Younger. Evander had dethroned the elder Dionysius "and sent him for vile subsistence, a wandering sophist through the realms of Greece." He was the father of Euphrasia, and was kept in a dungeon on the top of a rock, where he would have been starved to death, if Euphrasia had not nourished him with "the milk designed for her own babe." When Syracuse was taken by Timoleon, Dionysius by accident came upon Evander, and would have killed him, but Euphrasia rushed forward and stabbed the tyrant to the heart.—Murphy: The Grecian Daughter (1772). (See ERRORS OF AUTHORS (40), "Dionysius," p. 335.)

Mr. Bentley, May 4, 1796, took leave of the stage in the character of "Evander."—W. C. Russell: Representative Actors, 496.

Evangelic Doctor (The), John Wycliffe, "the Morning Star of the Reformation" (1324-1384).

Evangeline, the heroine and title of a tale in hexameter verse by Longfellow, in two parts. Evangeline was the daughter of Benedict Bellefontaine, the richest farmer of Acadia (now Nova Scotia). At the age of 17 she was legally betrothed by the notary-public to Gabriel son of Basil the blacksmith, but next day all the colony was exiled by the order of George II., and their houses, cattle, and lands were confiscated. Gabriel and Evangeline were parted, and now began the troubles of her life. She wandered from place to place to find her betrothed. Basil had settled at Louisiana, but when Evangeline reached the place Gabriel had just left; she then went to the prairies, to Michigan, and so on, but at every place she was just too late to catch him. At length, grown old in this hopeless search, she went to Pennsylvania and became a sister of mercy. The plague broke out in the city, and as she visited the almshouse she saw an old man smitten down with the pestilence. It was Gabriel. He tried to whisper her name, but death closed his lips. He was buried, and Evangeline lies beside him in the grave.

(Longfellow's Evangeline (1849) has many points of close similitude with Campbell's tale of Gertrude of Wyoming, 1809.)

Evangelist, the personification of an effectual preacher in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress (1678).

Evans (Sir Hugh), a pedantic Welsh parson and schoolmaster of extraordinary simplicity and native shrewdness.—Shakespeare: The Merry Wives of Windsor (1601).

The reader may cry out with honest sir Hugh Evans, "I like not when a 'ooman has a great peard."—Macaulay.

Henderson says, "I have seen John Edwin, in 'sir Hugh Evans,' when preparing for the duel, keep the house in an ecstasy of merriment for many minutes together without speaking a word." (1750–1790).

Evans (William), the giant porter of Charles I. He carried sir Geoffrey Hudson about in his pocket. Evans was eight feet in height, and Hudson only eighteen inches. Fuller mentions this giant amongst his Worthies.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Evans (Marian), the maiden name of Mrs. J. W. Cross, who assumed the name of George Eliot, and was the writer of numerous novels (1820–1880).

Evan'the (3 syl.), sister of Sora'no, the wicked instrument of Frederick duke of Naples, and the chaste wife of Valerio. The duke tried to seduce her, but failing in this scandalous attempt, he offered to give her to any one "for a month," at the end of which time the libertine was to suffer death. No one would accept the offer, and ultimately Evanthê was restored to her husband.—Fletcher: A Wife for a Month (1624).

E.V.B., the Hon. Mrs. Boyle, an amateur artist of the nineteenth century.

Eve (1 syl.) or Havah, the "mother of all living" (Gen. iii. 20). Before the expulsion from paradise her name was Ishah, because she was taken out of ish, i.e. "man" (Gen. ii. 23).

Eve was of such gigantic stature that when she laid her head on one hill near Mecca, her knees rested on two other hills in the plain, about two gun-shots asunder. Adam was as tall as a palm tree.—Moncony: Voyage, i. 372, etc.

Ev'eli'na (4 syl.), the heroine of a novel so called by Miss Burney (afterwards Mde. D'Arblay). Evelina marries lord Orville (1778). It gives a picture of the manners of the time.

Evelyn (Alfred), the secretary and relative of sir John Vesey. He made sir John's speeches, wrote his pamphlets, got together his facts, mended his pens, and received no salary. Evelyn loved Clara Douglas, a dependent of lady Franklin's, but she was poor also, and declined to marry him. Scarcely had she refused him, when he was left an immense fortune and proposed to Georgina Vesey. What little heart Georgina had was given to sir Frederick Blount, but the great fortune of Evelyn made her waver; however, being told that Evelyn's property was insecure, she married Frederick, and left Evelyn free to marry Clara.—Lord Lytton: Money (1840).

Evelyn (Sir George), a man of fortune, family, and character, in love with Dorrillon, whom he marries.—Mrs. Inchbald: Wives as they Were and Maids as they Are (1795).

Even Numbers are reckoned unlucky; but "there's luck in odd numbers."

The . . . crow . . . cried twice; this even, sir, is no good number.—S.S.: The Honest Lawyer (1616).

Among the Chinese, heaven is odd, and earth even. The numbers 1, 3, 5, 7, 9, belong to yang or heaven; but 2, 4, 6, 8, 10, belong to yin or earth.—Editor.

 Shakespeare says "there is divinity in odd numbers" (Merry Wives of Wind- sor, act v. sc. 1, 1596). "There's luck in odd numbers" is a common proverb.

See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, ODD NUMBERS, pp. 907, 908.

Evening Hymn (The) by Ken, bishop of Bath and Wells ("All praise to Thee, my God, this night," etc.). He also wrote The Morning Hymn ("Awake, my soul, and with the sun," etc.) (1721).

Evenings at Home by John Aikin and his sister Mrs. Barbauld, published between 1792 and 1795.

Ever Loyal City (The). Oxford was so called for its unflinching loyalty to Charles I. during the parliamentary wars.

Everard (Colonel Markham), of the Commonwealth party.

Master Everard, the colonel's father.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Ev'erett (Master), a hired witness of the "Popish Plot."—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Every Man in His Humour, a comedy by Ben Jonson (1598). The original play was altered by David Garrick. The persons to whom the title of the drama apply are: "captain Bobadil," whose humour is bragging of his brave deeds and military courage—he is thrashed as a coward by Downright; "Kitely," whose humour is jealousy of his wife—he is befooled and cured by a trick played on him by Brainworm; "Stephen," whose humour is verdant stupidity—he is played on by every one; "Kno'well," whose humour is suspicion of his son Edward, which turns out to be all moonshine; "Dame Kitely," whose humour is jealousy of her husband, but she (like her husband) is cured by a trick devised by Brainworm. Every man in his humour is liable to be duped thereby, for his humour is the "Achilles' heel" of his character.

Every Man out of His Humour, a comedy by Ben Jonson (1599).

Every One has His Fault, a comedy by Mrs. Inchbald (1794). By the fault of rigid pride, lord Norland discarded his daughter, lady Eleanor, because she married against his consent. By the fault of gallantry and defect of due courtesy to his wife, sir Robert Ramble drove lady Ramble into a divorce. By the fault of irresolution, "Shall I marry or shall I not?" Solus remained a miserable bachelor, pining for a wife and domestic joys. By the fault of deficient spirit and manliness, Mr. Placid was a hen-pecked husband. By the fault of marrying without the consent of his wife's friends, Mr. Irwin was reduced to poverty and even crime. Harmony healed these faults: lord Norland received his daughter into favour; sir Robert Ramble took back his wife; Solus married Miss Spinster; Mr. Placid assumed the rights of the head of the family; and Mr. Irwin, being accepted as the son-in-law of lord Norland, was raised from indigence to domestic comfort.

Evidences of Christianity, by Dr. Paley (1794), once a standard book in the University of Cambridge, and indispensable for the Junior students.

Evil May-Day, May 1, 1517, when the apprentices committed great excesses, especially against foreigners; and the constable of the Tower discharged his cannons on the populace. The tumult began in Cheapside (time, Henry VIII.).

Eviot, page to sir John Ramorny (master of the horse to prince Robert of Scotland).—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Evir-Allen, the white-armed daughter of Branno an Irishman. "A thousand heroes sought the maid; she refused her love to a thousand. The sons of the sword were despised, for graceful in her eyes was Ossian." This Evir-Allen was the mother of Oscar, Fingal's grandson; but she was not alive when Fingal went to Ireland to assist Cormac against the invading Norsemen, which forms the subject of the poem called Fingal, in six books.—Ossian: Fingal, iv.

Ew'ain (Sir), son of king Vrience and Morgan le Fay (Arthur's half-sister).—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, I. 72 (1470).

Ewan of Brigglands, a horse-soldier in the army of Montrose.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Ewart (Nanty, i.e. Anthony), captain of the smuggler's brig.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Ew-bughts, pens into which cows were driven to be milked. In Percy's Reliques (series iii. book i. 12) is a very pretty Scotch sonnet which begins—

> Will ye gae to the ew-bught, Marion . . .
> I fain wad marrie Marion,
> Gin Marion wad marrie me.

Excal'ibur, king Arthur's famous swords. There seems to have been two of his swords so called. One was the sword sheathed in stone, which no one could draw thence, save he who was to be king of the land. Above 200 knights tried to release it, but failed; Arthur alone could draw it, and this he did with ease, proving thereby his right of succession (pt. i. 3). In ch. 7 this sword is called Excalibur, and is said to have been so bright "that it gave light like thirty torches." After his fight with Pellinore, the king said to Merlin he had no sword, and Merlin took him to a lake, and Arthur saw an arm "clothed in white samite, that held a fair sword in the hand." Presently the Lady of the Lake appeared, and Arthur begged that he might have the sword, and the lady told him to go and fetch it. When he came to it he took it, "and the arm and hand went under the water again." This is the sword generally called Excalibur. When about to die, king Arthur sent an attendant to cast the sword back again into the lake, and again the hand "clothed in white samite" appeared, caught it, and disappeared (ch. 23).—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 3, 23 (1470).

> King Arthur's sword, Excalibur,
> Wrought by the lonely maiden of the lake;
> Nine years she wrought it, sitting in the deeps,
> Upon the hidden bases of the hills.
> Tennyson: Mort d'Arthur.

Excalibur's Sheath. "Sir," said Merlin, "look that ye keep well the scabbard of Excalibur, for ye shall lose no blood as long as ye have the scabbard upon you, though ye have never so many wounds."—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 36 (1470).

Excelsior, a poem by Longfellow (1842).

Excursion (The), a poem in blank verse, divided into nine books, by Wordsworth (1814). Wordsworth is sometimes called "the poet (or bard) of The Excursion." Byron calls it—

> A drowsy frowsy poem, my aversion.
> Don Juan.

Executioner (No). When Francis viscount d'Aspremont, governor of Bayonne, was commanded by Charles IX. of France to massacre the huguenots, he replied, "Sire, there are many under my government devoted to your majesty, but not a single executioner."

Exeter Book (The), a collection of very early poems presented by the bishop of Exeter to the library of the cathedral.

Exeter Domesday (The), a supplement to the famous Domesday Book compiled in the reign of William the Conqueror. It extends the Domesday Book to Cornwall, Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, and Wiltshire.

Exhausted Worlds . . . Dr. Johnson, in the prologue spoken by Garrick at the opening of Drury Lane, in 1747, says of Shakespeare—

> Each change of many-coloured life he drew,
> Exhausted worlds, and then imagined new.

Exile of Erin (The), a poem by Campbell (1801). Better known perhaps by its refrain of "Erin go bragh!" or "Erin, mavournin; Erin go bragh!" (Ireland, my darling; Ireland for ever!).

Exodus, the Greek title of the second book of the Old Testament, meaning "departure;" being so called because it tells us about the "departure" of the Israelites from the land of Egypt. In the original the book is a continuation of the book of Genesis, and has no name, but is referred to by the first words Now these are the names, as we refer to the canticles Te Deum and Nunc dimittis. The book may be divided into five parts—

1. The great increase of the Israelites in Egypt (ch. i.).
2. The birth of Moses (chs. ii.).
3. The "call of Moses" to lead the people out of the land of bondage (chs. iii.–xiv.).
4. The march of people till they came to Sinai in the wilderness (chs. xv.–xix.).
5. The laws and ordinances to be observed for the future (ch. xx.–xl.).

Exta (That's). That's Exta, as the woman said when she saw Kerton (a Devonshire saying), that is, "I thought my work was done, but there are more last words." "Exta" is a popular pronunciation of Exeter, and "Kerton" is Crediton. The woman was walking to Exeter for the first time, and when she reached the grand old church of Kerton or Crediton, supposed it to be Exeter Cathedral. "That's Exeter Cathedral," she said, "and the end of my journey." But it was only Kerton Church, and she had still eight more miles to walk before she got to Exeter.

Exterminator (The), Montbars, chief of a set of filibusters in the seventeenth century. He was a native of Languedoc, and conceived an intense hatred against the Spaniards on reading of their cruelties in the New World. Embarking at Havre, in 1667, Montbars attacked the Spaniards in the Antilles and in Honduras, taking Vera Cruz and Carthagēna, and slew them most mercilessly wherever he encountered them (1645-1707).

Eye. Terrible as the eye of Vathek. One of the eyes of this caliph was so terrible in anger that those died who ventured to look thereon, and, had he given way to his wrath, he would have depopulated his whole dominion.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Eye-bright or Euphra'sia ["joy-giving"]. So called from its reputed power in restoring impaired vision.

[The hermit] fumitory gets and eye-bright for the eye.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Eye of the Baltic (The), Gottland or Gothland, an island in the Baltic.

Eye of Greece (The), Athens.

Athens, the eye of Greece, mother of arts
And eloquence, native to famous wits.
Milton.

∴ Sometimes Sparta is called "The Eye of Greece" also.

Eyes (Grey). With the Arabs, grey eyes are synonymous with sin and enmity. Hence in the Kordn, xx., we read, "On that day the trumpet shall be sounded, and we will gather the wicked together, even those having grey eyes." Al Beidâwi explains this as referring to the Greeks, whom the Arabs detest, and he calls "red whiskers and grey eyes" an idiomatic phrase for "a foe."

Eyed (One-) people. The Arimaspians of Scythia were a one-eyed people.

N.B.—The Cyclops were giants with only one eye, and that in the middle of the forehead.

Tartaro, in Basque legends, was a one-eyed giant. Sinbad the sailor, in his third voyage, was cast on an island inhabited by one-eyed giants.

Eyre (Jane), a governess, who stoutly copes with adverse circumstances, and ultimately marries a used-up man of fortune, in whom the germs of good feeling and sound sense were only exhausted, not destroyed.—C. Brontë: Jane Eyre (1847).

Ezra (The book of), one of the historic books of the Old Testament, which contains Ezra's account of the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity.

Ez'zelin (Sir), the gentleman who recognizes Lara at the table of lord Otho, and charges him with being Conrad the corsair. A duel ensues, and Ezzelin is never heard of more. A serf used to say that he saw a huntsman one evening cast a dead body into the river which divides the lands of Otho and Lara, and that there was a star of knighthood on the breast of the corpse.—Byron: Lara (1814).

F.

F's (The Three): Fixed tenure, Fair rent, Free sale.—Irish Land League (1880-81).

Faa (Gabriel), nephew of Meg Merrilies. One of the huntsmen at Liddesdale.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Fabian, servant to Olivia.—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night (1602).

Fabii of Rome (The), and the Justiniāni of Venice had many points of resemblance: both gave all to their country; in both cases all perished for their country except one survivor; the surviving Roman was a boy too young to carry arms,—the surviving Venetian was a monk, who, early in the twelfth century, was absolved from his vows for a time by the pope, and from him the phœnix name revived again to great lustre, the elder branch only becoming extinct in 1889, in the person of the contessa Michiel-Giustinian, who died at Venice in that year.

Fab'ila, a king devoted to the chase. One day he encountered a wild boar, and commanded those who rode with him not to interfere, but the boar overthrew him and gored him to death.—Chronica Antiqua de España, 121.

Fa'bius (The American), George Washington (1732-1799).

Fa'bius (The French), Anne duc de Montmorency, grand-constable of France (1493-1567).

Fables by Æsop, in Greek (about B.C. 570); in French verse by Lafontaine (1668); in English verse by Gay (fifty in pt. i., 1727; sixteen in pt. ii., 1738).

Fables for the Holy Alliance, six metrical and political satires. (1) The Dissolution of the Holy Alliance, at no time more to be depended on than queen Anne's palace of ice. (2) The Looking-glasses, in which kings and princes saw they were just like other men. (3) The Fly and the Bullock; the Fly is royalty and the Bullock sacrificed to it, the people. (4) The Church and State. The table is that Royalty and Divinity changed cloaks, whereby the former mounted "divine rights" and the latter was secularized. (5) The Little Cama, who when three years old became so naughty that he was whipped, and ever since then the Camas have been better behaved. (6) The Extinguishers, that is, journals which were expurgated to keep out the light, but caught fire and thus greatly increased it.

Fabricius [Fa-brish'-e-us], an old Roman, like Cincinnatus and Curius Dentātus, a type of the rigid purity, frugality, and honesty of the "good old times." Pyrrhos used every effort to corrupt him by bribes, or to terrify him, but in vain. "Excellent Fabricius," cried the Greek, "one might hope to turn the sun from its course as soon as turn Fabricius from the path of duty."

Fabricius, an author, whose composition was so obscure that Gil Blas could not comprehend the meaning of a single line of his writings. His poetry was verbose fustian, and his prose a maze of far-fetched expressions and perplexed phrases.

"If not intelligible," said Fabricius, "so much the better. The natural and simple won't do for sonnets, odes, and the sublime. The merit of these is their obscurity, and it is quite sufficient if the author himself thinks he understands them. . . . There are five or six of us who have undertaken to introduce a thorough change, and we will do so, in spite of Lopê de Vega, Cervantes, and all the fine geniuses who cavil at us."—Lesage: Gil Blas, v. 12 (1724).

Fabrit'io, a merry soldier, the friend of captain Jac'omo the woman-hater.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Captain (1613).

Face (1 syl.), alias "Jeremy," house-servant of Lovewit. During the absence of his master, Face leagues with Subtle (the alchemist) and Dol Common to turn a penny by alchemy, fortune-telling, and magic. Subtle (a beggar who knew something about alchemy) was discovered by Face near Pye Corner. Assuming the philosopher's garb and wand, he called himself "doctor;" Face, arrogating the title of "captain," touted for dupes; while Dol Common kept the house, and aided the other two in their general scheme of deception. On the unexpected return of Lovewit, the whole thing blew up; but Face was forgiven and continued in his place as house-servant.—Ben Jonson: The Alchemist (1610).

Facto'tum (Johannes), one employed to do all sorts of work for another; one in whom another confides for all the odds and ends of his household management or business.

He is an absolute Johannes Factotum, at least in his own conceit.—Greene: Groat's-worth of Wit (1592).

Faddle (William), a "fellow made up of knavery and noise, with scandal for wit and impudence for raillery. He was so needy that the very devil might have bought him for a guinea." Sir Charles Raymond says to him—

"Thy life is a disgrace to humanity. A foolish prodigality makes thee needy; need makes thee vicious; and both make thee contemptible. Thy wit is prostituted to slander and buffoonery; and thy judgment, if thou hast any, to meanness and villainy. Thy betters, that laugh with thee, laugh at thee; and all the varieties of thy life are but pitiful rewards and painful abuses."—E. Moore: The Foundling, iv. 2 (1748).

Fa'dha (Al), Mahomet's silver cuirass.

Fad'ladeen, the great nazir' or chamberlain of Aurungze'bê's harem. He criticizes the tales told by a young poet to Lalla Rookh on her way to Delhi, and great was his mortification to find that the poet was the young king his master.

Fadladeen was a judge of everything, from the pencilling of a Circassian's eyelids to the deepest questions of science and literature; from the mixture of a conserve of rose leaves to the composition of an epic poem.—T. Moore: Lalla Rookh (1817).

Fadladin'ida, wife of king Chrononhotonthologos. While the king is alive she falls in love with the captive king of the Antip'odês, and at the death of the king, when two suitors arise, she says, "Well, gentlemen, to make matters easy, I'll take you both."—Carey: Chrononhotonthologos (a burlesque).

Faerie Queene, a metrical romance, in six books, of twelve cantos each, by Edmund Spenser (incomplete).

Book I. The Red Cross Knight, the spirit of Christianity, or the victory of holiness over sin (1590).

II. The Legend of Sir Guyon, the golden mean (1590).

III. The Legend of Britomartis, chaste love. Britomartis is Diana or queen Elizabeth (1590).

IV. Cambel and Triamond, fidelity (1596).

V. The Legend of Sir Ar'tegal, justice (1596).

VI. The Legend of Sir Calidore, courtesy (1596).

. Sometimes bk. vii., called Mutability, is added; but only fragments of this book exist.

Fafnis, the dragon with which Sigurd fights.—Sigurd the Horny (a German romance based on a Norse legend).

Fag, the lying servant of captain Absolute. He "wears his master's wit, as he does his lace, at second hand." He "scruples not to tell a lie at his master's command, but it pains his conscience to be found out."—Sheridan: The Rivals (1775).

Faggot (Nicholas), clerk to Matthew Foxley, the magistrate who examined Darsie Latimer (i.e. sir Arthur Darsie Redgauntlet) after he had been attacked by rioters.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Faggots and Faggots (Ily a fagots et fagots), all things of the same sort are not equal in quality. In Molière's Le Médecin Malgré Lui, Sganarelle wants to show that his faggots are better than those of other persons, and cries out "Ay! but those faggots are not equal to mine."

Il est vrai, messieurs, que je suis le premier homme du monde pour faire des fagots . . . Je n'y épargne aucune chose, et les fais d'une façon qu'il n'y a rien à dire. . . . Il y a fagots et fagots.—Act i. sc. 6 (1666)

Fagin, an old Jew, who employs a gang of thieves, chiefly boys. These boys he teaches to pick pockets and pilfer adroitly. Fagin assumes a most suave and fawning manner, but is malicious, grasping, and full of cruelty. He is ultimately arrested, tried, and condemned to death.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Fainall, cousin by marriage to sir Wilfrid Witwould. He married a young, wealthy, and handsome widow, but the two were cat and dog to each other. The great aim of Fainall was to get into his possession the estates of his wife (settled on herself "in trust to Edward Mirabell"), but in this he failed. In outward semblance, Fainall was plausible enough, but he was a goodly apple rotten at the core, false to his friends, faithless to his wife, overreaching, and deceitful.

Mrs. Fainall. Her first husband was Languish, son of lady Wishfort. Her second husband she both despised and detested.—Congreve: The Way of the World (1700).

Thomas Davies (1720–1785), after a silence of fifteen years, performed the part of "Fainall." His expression was Garrick's, with all its fire quenched.—Boaden.

Fainasso'lis, daughter of Craca's king (the Shetland Isles). When Fingal was quite a young man, she fled to him for protection against Sora, but scarcely had he promised to take up her cause, when Sora landed, drew the bow, and she fell. Fingal said to Sora, "Unerring is thy hand, O Sora, but feeble was the foe." He then attacked the invader, and Sora fell.—Ossian: Fingal, iii.

Faint Heart never Won Fair Lady, a line in a ballad written to the "Berkshire Lady," a Miss Frances Kendrick, daughter of sir William Kendrick, second baronet. Sir William's father was created baronet by Charles II. The wooer was a Mr. Child, son of a brewer at Abingdon, to whom the lady sent a challenge.

Having read this strange relation,
He was in a consternation;
But, advising with a friend,
He persuades him to attend:
"Be of courage and make ready,
Faint heart never won fair lady."
Quarterly Review, cvl. 205–245.

Faint Heart never Won Fair Lady, name of a petit comédie brought out by Mde. Vestris at the Olympic. Mde. Vestris herself performed the part of the "fair lady."

Fair Maid of Anjou, Edith Plantagenet (see p. 314).

Fair Maid of Perth (The), a novel by sir W. Scott (1828). The "fair maid" is Catharine Glover (daughter of a glover of Perth), who kisses Henry Smith (the armourer) in his sleep on St. Valentine's Day. Smith proposes marriage, but Catharine refuses; however, at the close of the novel she becomes his wife. The concurrent plot is the amour of prince James (son of Robert III.) and Louise the Glee-maiden. The prince quarrels with his father, and puts the Glee-maiden under the charge of Smith, whom Bonthron is employed to murder. By mistake he kills Oliver the bonnet-maker instead. Certain persons suspected of the murder are appointed to touch the bier of the dead-body as a test of guilt, but the ceremony is changed for the Ordeal of Battle. Smith, in the combat, defeats the murderer, who confesses his guilt, but declares that he was instigated by the prince. The prince, being arrested, is put under the charge of Bonthron, and is secretly murdered. This leads to the execution of several persons, and then to a battle in which Smith is the victorious hero. He is offered knighthood, but refuses. The Glee-maiden casts herself down from a high precipice, and Smith marries Catharine, the glover's daughter (time, Henry IV. of England, and Robert III. of Scotland).

Fair Penitent (The), a tragedy by Rowe (1703). Calista was daughter of lord Sciol'to (3 syl.), and bride of lord Al'tamont. It was discovered on the wedding day that she had been seduced by Lotha'rio. This led to a duel between the bridegroom and the libertine, in which Lothario was killed; a street riot ensued, in which Sciolto received his death-wound; and Calista, "the fair penitent," stabbed herself. This drama is a mere réchauffé of Massinger's Fatal Dowry.

 For Fair Maids and Fair ——, see the proper name or titular name.

Fairbrother (Mr.), counsel of Effie Deans at the trial.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Fairfax (Thomas lord), father of the duchess of Buckingham.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Fairfield, the miller, and father of Patty "the maid of the mill." An honest, straightforward man, grateful and modest.—Bickerstaff: The Maid of the Mill (1765).

Fairfield (Leonard), in My Novel, by lord Lytton (1853); a bookseller's hack who becomes an eminent author.

Fairford (Mr. Alexander or Saunders), a lawyer.

Allan Fairford, a young barrister, son of Saunders, and a friend of Darsie Latimer. He marries Lilias Redgauntlet, sister of sir Arthur Darsie Redgauntlet, called "Darsie Latimer."

Peter Fairford, Allan's cousin.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Fairleigh (Frank), the pseudonym of F. E. Smedley, editor of Sharpe's London Magazine (1848, 1849). It was in this magazine that Smedley's two novels, Frank Fairleigh and Lewis Arundel, were first published.

Fairlimb, sister of Bitelas, and daughter of Rukenaw the ape, in the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox (1498).

Fair'scrieve (2 syl.), clerk of Mr. James Middleburgh, a magistrate of Edinburgh.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Fairservice (Mr.), a magistrate's clerk.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Fairservice (Andrew), the humorous Scotch gardener of sir Hildebrand Osbaldistone, of Osbaldistone Hall.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Overflowing with a humour as peculiar in its way as the humours of Andrew Fairservice.—London Athenæum.

Fairstar (Princess), daughter of queen Blon'dina (who had at one birth two boys and a girl, all "with stars on their foreheads, and a chain of gold about their necks"). On the same day, Blondina's sister Brunetta (wife of the king's brother) had a son, afterwards called Chery. The queen-mother, wishing to destroy these four children, ordered Fein'tisa to strangle them, but Feintisa sent them adrift in a boat, and told the queen-mother they were gone. It so happened that the boat was seen by a corsair, who brought the children to his wife Cor'sina to bring up. The corsair soon grew immensely rich, because every time the hair of these children was combed, jewels fell from their heads. When grown up, these castaways went to the land of their royal father and his brother, but Chery was for a while employed in getting for Fairstar (1) The dancing water, which had the gift of imparting beauty; (2) The singing apple, which had the gift of imparting wit; and (3) The green bird, which could reveal all secrets. By this bird the story of their birth was made known, and Fairstar married her cousin Chery.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Princess Fairstar," 1682).

Faithful, a companion of Christian in his walk to the Celestial City. Both were seized at Vanity Fair, and Faithful, being burnt to death, was taken to heaven in a chariot of fire.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, i. (1678).

Faithful (Jacob), the title and hero of a sea tale, by captain Marryat (1835).

Faithful (Father of the), Abraham.—Rom. iv.; Gal. iii. 6–9.

Faithful Shepherdess (The), a pastoral drama by John Fletcher (1610). The "faithful shepherdess" is Cor'in, whose lover was dead. Faithful to his memory, Corin retired from the busy world, employing her time in works of humanity, such as healing the sick, exorcizing the bewitched, and comforting the afflicted.

(A part of Milton's Comus is almost a verbal transcript of this pastoral.)

Fakar (Dhu'l), Mahomet's scimitar.

Fakenham Ghost (The). An old woman, walking to Fakenham, had to cross the churchyard after night-fall. She heard a short, quick step behind, and looking round saw what she fancied to be a four-footed monster. On she ran, faster and faster, and on came the pattering footfalls behind. She gained the churchyard gate and pushed it open, but, ah! "the monster" also passed through. Every moment she expected it would leap upon her back. She reached her cottage door and fainted. Out came her husband with a lantern, saw the "sprite," which was no other than the foal of a donkey that had strayed into the park and followed the ancient dame to her cottage door.

> And many a laugh went through the vale,
> And some conviction, too;
> Each thought some other goblin tale
> Perhaps was just as true.
> Bloomfield: The Fakenham Ghost (a fact).

Fakreddin's Valley. Over the several portals of bronze were these inscriptions: (1) THE ASYLUM OF PILGRIMS; (2) THE TRAVELLER'S REFUGE; (3) THE DEPOSITORY OF THE SECRETS OF ALL THE WORLD.

Falcon. Wm. Morris tells us that whoso watched a certain falcon for seven days and seven nights without sleeping, should have his first wish granted by a fay. A certain king accomplished the watching, and wished to have the fay's love. His wish was granted, but it proved his ruin.—The Earthly Paradise ("July").

Falconer (Mr.), laird of Balmawhapple, a friend of the old baron of Bradwardine.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Falconer (Major), brother of lady Bothwell.—Sir W. Scott: Aunt Margaret's Mirror (time, William III.).

Falconer (Edmund), the assumed name of Edmund O'Rourke, author of Extremes, or Men of the Day (a comedy, 1859).

Falernum or FALERGUS AGER, a district in the north of Campania, extending from the Massic Hills to the river Vultur'nus (in Italy). This district was noted for its wines, called "Massic" or "Falernian," the best of which was "Faustianum."

> Then with water fill the pitcher
> Wreathed about with classic fables;
> Ne'er Falernian threw a richer
> Light upon Lucullus' tables.

Falie'ro (Marino), the doge of Venice. (See MARINO.)—Byron: Marino Faliero.

Falkland, an aristocratic gentleman, of a noble, loving nature, but the victim of false honour and morbid refinement of feeling. Under great provocation, he was goaded on to commit murder, but being tried was honourably acquitted, and another person was executed for the crime. Caleb Williams, a lad in Falkland's service, accidentally became acquainted with these secret facts, but, unable to live in the house under the suspicious eyes of Falkland, he ran away. Falkland tracked him from place to place, like a blood-hound, and at length arrested him for robbery. The true statement now came out, and Falkland died of shame and a broken spirit.—Godwin: Caleb Williams (1794). (See FAULKLAND, p. 359.)

(This tale has been dramatized by G. Colman, under the title of The Iron Chest, in which Falkland is called "sir Edward Mortimer," and Caleb Williams is called "Wilford.")

Falkland, a model stage lover; jealous, generous, and gentlemanly. The lover of Julia.—Sheridan: The Rivals (1775).

Falkland, the hero and title of lord Lytton's first novel (1827).

Fall of Jerusalem (The), a dramatic poem by dean Milman (1820).

Fallacies (Popular), Charles Lamb, in his Essays of Elia (last series, 1833). He controverts sixteen, the first of which is that "a bully is always a coward," and the last is that "a sulky temper is a misfortune."

False One (The), a tragedy by Beaumont and Fletcher (1619). The subject is the amours of Julius Cæsar and Cleopat'ra.

Falsetto (Signor), a man who fawns on Fazio in prosperity, and turns his back on him when fallen into disgrace.—Dean Milman: Fazio (1815).

Falstaff (Sir John), in The Merry Wives of Windsor, and in the two parts of Henry IV., by Shakespeare. In Henry V. his death is described by Mrs. Quickly, hostess of an inn in Eastcheap. In the comedy, sir John is represented as making love to Mrs. Page, who "fools him to the top of her bent." In the historic plays, he is represented as a soldier and a wit, the boon companion of "Mad-cap Hal" (the prince of Wales). In both cases, he is a mountain of fat, sensual, mendacious, boastful, and fond of practical jokes.

In the king's army, "sir John" was captain, "Peto" lieutenant, "Pistol" ancient [ensign], and "Bardolph" corporal.

C. R. Leslie says, "Quin's 'Falstaff' must have been glorious. Since Garrick's time there have been more than one 'Richard,' 'Hamlet,' 'Romeo,' 'Macbeth,' and 'Lear;' but since Quin [1693-1766] only one 'Falstaff,' John Henderson [1747-1786]."

(Robert William Elliston (1774-1831) was the best of all "Falstaffs." His was a wonderful combination of wit, humour, sensuality, and philosophy, but he was always the gentleman.)

Falstaff, unimitated, inimitable Falstaff, how shall I describe thee? Thou compound of sense and vice: of sense which may be admired, but not esteemed; of vice which may be despised, but hardly detested. "Falstaff" is a character loaded with faults, and with those faults which naturally produce contempt. He is a thief and a glutton, a coward and a boaster, always ready to cheat the weak and prey upon the poor, to terrify the timorous and insult the defenceless. At once obsequious and malignant, yet the man thus corrupt, thus despicable, makes himself necessary to the prince by perpetual gaiety, and by unfailing power of exciting laughter.—Dr. Johnson.

Famous. "I woke one morning and found myself famous." So said Byron, after the publication of cantos i. and ii. of his Childe Harold (1812).

Fan (The), a semi-mythological poem in three books, by John Gay (1713).

Fanciful (Lady), a vain, conceited beauty, who calls herself "nice, strangely nice," and says she was formed "to make the whole creation uneasy." She loves Heartfree, a railer against woman, and when he proposes marriage to Belinda, a rival beauty, spreads a most impudent scandal, which, however, reflects only on herself. Heartfree, who at one time was partly in love with her, says to her—

"Nature made you handsome, gave you beauty to a miracle, a shape without a fault, wit enough to make them relish . . . but art has made you become the pity of our sex, and the jest of your own. There's not a feature in your face but you have found the way to teach it some affected convulsion. Your feet, your hands, your very finger-ends, are directed never to move without some ridiculous air, and your language is a suitable trumpet to draw people's eyes upon the raree-show" (act ii. sc. 1).—Vanbrugh: The Provoked Wife (1697).

Fan-Fan, alias Phelin O'Tug, "a lolly-pop maker, and manufacturer of maids of honour to the court." This merry, shy, and blundering elf, concealed in a bear-skin, makes love to Christine, the faithful attendant on the countess Marie. Phelin O'Tug says his mother was too bashful ever to let him know her, and his father always kept in the background.—Stirling: The Prisoner of State (1847).

Fang, a sheriff's officer in 2 Henry IV., Shakespeare (1598).

Fang, a bullying, insolent magistrate, who would have sent Oliver Twist to prison, on suspicion of theft, if Mr. Brownlow had not interposed on the boy's behalf.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

The original of this ill-tempered, bullying magistrate was Mr. Laing, of Hatton Garden, removed from the bench by the home secretary.—Foster: Life of Dickens, iii. 4.

Fang and Snare, two sheriff's officers.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. (1598).

Fanny (Lord). So John lord Hervey was usually called by the wits of the time, in consequence of his effeminate habits. His appearance was that of a "half wit, half fool, half man, half beau." He used rouge, drank ass's milk, and took Scotch pills (1694-1743).

Consult lord Fanny, and confide in Curll [publisher]. Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Fanny (Miss), younger daughter of Mr. Sterling, a rich City merchant. She was clandestinely married to Lovewell. "Gentle-looking, soft-speaking, sweet-smiling, and affable," wanting "nothing but a crook in her hand and a lamb under her arm to be a perfect picture of innocence and simplicity." Every one loved her, and as her marriage was a secret, sir John Melvil and lord Ogleby both proposed to her. Her marriage with Lovewell being ultimately made known, her dilemma was removed.—Colman and Garrick: The Clandestine Marriage (1766).

Fan'teries (3 syl.), foot-soldiers, infantry.

Five other bandes of English fanteries.
Gascoigne: The Fruites of Warre, 152 (died 1557).

Faquir', a religious anchorite, whose life is spent in the severest austerities and mortification.

He diverted himself, however, . . . especially with the Brahmins, faquirs, and other enthusiasts who had travelled from the heart of India, and halted on their way with the emir.—Beckford: Vathek (1786).

Farina'ta [DEGLI UBERTI], a noble Florentine, leader of the Ghibelline faction, and driven from his country in 1250 by the Guelfes (1 syl.). Some ten years later, by the aid of Mainfroi of Naples, he defeated the Guelfes, and took all the towns of Tuscany and Florence. Dantê conversed with him in the city of Dis, and represents him as lying in a fiery tomb yet open, and not to be closed till the last judgment day. When the council agreed to raze Florence to the ground, Farinata opposed the measure, and saved the city. Dantê refers to this—

> Lo! Farinata . . . his brow
> Somewhat uplifted, cried . . .
> "In that affray [i.e. at Montaperto, near the river Arbia]
> I stood not singly . . .
> But singly there I stood, when by consent
> Of all, Florence had to the ground been razed,—
> The one who openly forbade the deed."
> Dante: Inferno, x. (1300).
> Like Farinata from his fiery tomb.
> Longfellow: Dante.

Farintosh (Beau), in Robertson's comedy of School (1869).

Farm-house (The). Modely and Heartwell, two gentlemen of fashion, come into the country and receive hospitality from old Farmer Freehold. Here they make love to his daughter Aura and his niece Flora. The girls, being high-principled, convert the flirtation of the two guests into love, and Heartwell marries the niece, while Modely proposes to Aura, who accepts him, provided he will wait two months and remain constant to her.—J. P. Kemble.

Farmer George, George III.; so called because he was like a farmer in dress, manners, and tastes (1738–1820). Also called "The Farmer-King."

Farmer's Boy (The), a rural poem by R. Bloomfield (1798), who was himself a "farmer's boy" for eleven years.

Farmer's Wife (The), a musical drama by C. Dibdin (1780). Cornflower, a benevolent, high-minded farmer, having saved Emma Belton from the flames of a house on fire, married her, and they lived together in love and peace till sir Charles Courtly took a fancy to Mrs. Cornflower, and abducted her. She was soon tracked, and as it was evident that she was no particeps criminis, she was restored to her husband, and sir Charles gave his sister to Mrs. Cornflower's brother in marriage as a peace offering.

Farnese Bull [Far-nay'-se], a colossal group of sculpture, attributed to Apollônius and Tauriscus of Trallês, in Asia Minor. The group represents Dircê bound by Zethus and Amphi'on to the horns of a bull, for ill-using her mother. It was restored by Bianchi, in 1546, and placed in the Farnesê palace, in Italy.

Farnese Her'cules [Far-nay'-se], a name given to Glykon's copy of the famous statue by Lysippos (a Greek sculptor in the time of Alexander "the Great"). It represents Herculês leaning on his club, with one hand on his back. The Farnesê family became extinct in 1731.

(A copy of this statue is in the Champs Elysées, Paris.)

Fashion (Sir Brilliant), a man of the world, who "dresses fashionably, lives fashionably, wins your money fashionably, loses his own fashionably, and does everything fashionably." His fashionable asseverations are, "Let me perish, if . . . !" "May fortune eternally frown on me, if . . . !" "May I never hold four by honours, if . . . !" "May the first woman I meet strike me with a supercilious eyebrow, if . . . !" and so on.—Murphy: The Way to Keep Him (1760).

Fashion (Tom) or "Young Fashion," younger brother of lord Foppington. As his elder brother did not behave well to him, Tom resolved to outwit him, and to this end introduced himself to sir Tunbelly Clumsy and his daughter, Miss Hoyden, as lord Foppington, between whom and the knight a negotiation of marriage had been carried on. Being established in the house, Tom married the heiress, and when the veritable lord appeared, he was treated as an impostor. Tom, however, explained his ruse, and as his lordship treated the knight with great contempt and quitted the house, a reconciliation was easily effected.—Sheridan: A Trip to Scarborough (1777).

Fashionable Lover (The). Lord Abberville, a young man 23 years of age, promises marriage to Lucinda Bridgemore, the vulgar, spiteful, purse-proud daughter of a London merchant, living in Fish Street Hill. At the house of this merchant lord Abberville sees a Miss Aubrey, a handsome, modest, lady-like girl, with whom he is greatly smitten. He first tries to corrupt her, and then promises marriage; but Miss Aubrey is already engaged to a Mr. Tyrrel. The vulgarity and ill-nature of Lucinda being quite insurmountable, "the fashionable lover" abandons her. The chief object of the drama is to root out the prejudice which Englishmen at one time entertained against the Scotch, and the chief character is in reality Colin or Cawdie Macleod, a Scotch servant of lord Abberville.—Cumberland (1780).

With similar chivalry he wrote The Jew (1795), to avert the prejudice against the Jewish race.

Fastolfe (Sir John), in 1 Henry VI. This is not the "sir John Falstaff" of huge proportions and facetious wit, but the lieutenant-general of the duke of Bedford, and a knight of the Garter.

> Here had the conquest fully been sealed up
> If sir John Fastolfe had not played the coward;
> He being in the vanward . . .
> Cowardly fled, not having struck one stroke.
> Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act I. sc. 1 (1589).

From this battell [of Pataie, in France] departed without anie stroke stricken, sir John Fastolfe. . . . The duke of Bedford tooke from him the image of St. George and his garter.—Holinshed, ii. 601.

Fastra'da or FASTRADE, daughter of count Rodolph and Luitgarde. She was one of the nine wives of Charlemagne.

> Those same soft bells at even-tide
> Rang in the ears of Charlemagne,
> As seated by Fastrada's side,
> At Ingelheim, in all his pride,
> He heard their sound with secret pain.
> Longfellow: Golden Legend, vi.

Fat (The). Alfonzo II. of Portugal (1185, 1212-1223). Charles II. (le Gros) of France (832-888). Louis VI. (le Gros) of France (1078, 1108-1137).

Edward Bright of Essex weighed 44 stone (616 lbs.) at death (1720-1750). David Lambert of Leicester weighed above 52 stone (739 lbs.) at death (1770-1809).

Fat Boy (The), Joseph or Joe, a lad of astounding obesity, whose employment consisted of alternate eating and sleeping. Joe was in the service of Mr. Wardle. He was once known to "burst into a horse-laugh," and was once known to defer eating to say to Mary, "How nice you do look!"

This was said in an admiring manner, and was so far gratifying: but still there was enough of the cannibal in the young gentleman's eyes to render the compliment doubtful.—Dickens: Pickwick Papers, liv. (1836).

Fata Alci'na, sister of Fata Morga'na. She carried off Astolfo on the back of a whale to her isle, but turned him into a myrtle tree when she tired of him.—Bojardo: Orlando Innamorato (1495); Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Fata della Fonti, an enchantress, from whom Mandricardo obtained the arms of Hector.—Bojardo: Orlando Innamorato (1495).

Fata Morga'na, sister of Arthur and pupil of Merlin. She lived at the bottom of a lake, and dispensed her treasures to whom she willed. This fairy is introduced by Bojardo in his Orlando Innamorato, first as "lady Fortune," and afterwards as an enchantress. In Tasso her three daughters (Morganetta, Nivetta, and Carvilia) are introduced.

∴ "Fata Morgana" is the name given to a sort of mirage occasionally seen in the straits of Messi'na.

Fata Nera and Fata Bianca, protectresses of Guido'nè and Aquilantè.—Bojardo: Orlando Innamorato (1495).

Fata Silvanella, an enchantress in Orlando Innamorato, by Bojardo (1495).

Fatal Curiosity, an epilogue in Don Quixote (pt. I. iv. 5, 6). The subject of this tale is the trial of a wife's fidelity. Anselmo, a Florentine gentleman, had married Camilla, and, wishing to rejoice over her incorruptible fidelity, induced his friend Lothario to put it to the test. The lady was not trial-proof, but eloped with Lothario. The end was that Anselmo died of grief, Lothario was slain in battle, and Camilla died in a convent (1605).

Fatal Curiosity, by George Lillo. Young Wilmot, supposed to have perished at sea, goes to India, and, having made his fortune, returns to England. He instantly visits Charlotte, whom he finds still faithful and devotedly attached to him. He then in disguise visits his parents, with whom he deposits a casket. Agnes Wilmot, out of curiosity, opens the casket, and when she discovers that it contains jewels, she and her husband resolve to murder the owner, and secure the contents of the casket. Scarcely have they committed the fatal deed, when Charlotte enters, and tells them it is their own son whom they have killed, whereupon old Wilmot first stabs his wife and then himself. Thus was the "curiosity" of Agnes fatal to her husband, herself, and her son (1736).

¶ For a parallel case, see Notes and Queries (January 14, 1882, p. 21).

Fatal Dowry (The), a tragedy by Philip Massinger (1632). Rowe has borrowed much of his Fair Penitent from this drama.

Fatal Marriage (The), a tragedy by Thomas Southerne (1692). Isabella a nun marries Biron eldest son of count Baldwin. The count disinherits his son for this marriage, and Biron, entering the army, is sent to the siege of Candy, where he is seen to fall, and is reported dead. Isabella, reduced to the utmost poverty, after seven years of "widowhood," prays count Baldwin to help her and do something for her child, but he turns her out of doors. Villeroy (a syl.) proposes marriage to her, and her acceptance of him was "the fatal marriage," for the very next day Biron returns, and is set upon by ruffians in the pay of his brother Carlos, who assassinate him. Carlos accuses Villeroy of the murder, but one of the ruffians impeaches, and Carlos is apprehended. As for Isabella, she stabs herself and dies.

Fates. The Three Fatal Sisters were Clo'tho, Lachesis [Lak'-e-sis], and At'ropos. They dwelt in the deep abyss of Demogorgon, "with unwearied fingers drawing out the threads of life." Clotho held the spindle or distaff; Lachesis drew out the thread; and Atropos cut it off.

> Sad Clotho held the rock, the whiles the thread
> By grisly Lachesis was spun with pain,
> That cruel Atropos eftsoon undid,
> With cursèd knife cutting the twist in twain.
> Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 2 (1596).

Father—Son. It is a common observation that a father above the common rate of men has usually a son below it. Witness king Johh son of Henry II.; Edward II. son of Edward I.; Richard II. son of the Black Prince; Henry VI. son of Henry V.; Lord Chesterfield's son, etc. So in French history: Louis VIII. was the son of Philippe Auguste; Charles the Idiot was the son of Charles le Sage; Henri II. of François I. Again, in German history: Heinrich VI. was the son of Barbarossa; Albrecht I. of Rudolf; and so on, in all directions. Heroum filii noxæ is a Latin proverb.

> My trust,
> Like a good parent, did beget of him
> A falsehood, in its contrary as great
> As my trust was.
> Shakespeare: The Tempest, act i. sc. 2 (1609).

 Yet have we the proverb, "Like father, like son," which holds good in common life.

Father Suckled by His own Daughter. Euphrasia, called "the Grecian Daughter," thus preserved the life of her father Evander in prison. (See EUPHRASIA, p. 344.)

Xantippé thus preserved the life of her father Cimonos in prison.

Father of Angling (The), Isaac Walton, author of The Compleat Angler (1593-1683).

Father of English Prose (The), Roger Ascham, instructor of queen Elizabeth (1515-1568).

Father of Jests (The), Joe Miller (1684-1738).

Father Prout. (See PROUT.)

Father of His Country.

CICERO, who broke up the Catiline conspiracy (B.C. 106-43).

 The Romans offered the same title to Marius after his annihilation of the Teutŏnês and Cimbri, but he would not accept it.

JULIUS CÆSAR, after he had quelled the Spanish insurrection (B.C. 100-44).

AUGUSTUS, Pater atque Princeps (B.C. 63-31 to A.D. 14).

COSMO DE MEDICI (1389-1464).

ANDRIA DOREA; called so on his statue at Genoa (1468-1560).

ANDRONI'CUS PALÆOL'OGUS assumed the title (1260-1332).

GEORGE WASHINGTON, "Defender and Paternal Counseller of the American States" (1732-1799).

Father of the People.

LOUIS XII. of France (1462, 1498-1515).

HENRI IV. of France, "The Father and Friend of the People" (1553, 1589-1610).

LOUIS XVIII. of France (1755, 1814-1824).

GABRIEL DU PINEAU, a French lawyer (1573-1644).

CHRISTIAN III. of Denmark (1502, 1534-1559).

 For other "Fathers," see under the specific name or vocation, as BOTANY, LITERATURE, and so on.

Father's Head Nursed by a Daughter after Death. Margaret Roper "clasped in her last trance her murdered father's head." (See DAUGHTER.)

Fathers (Last of the), St. Bernard (1091-1153).

 The "Fathers of the Church" were followed by "the Schoolmen."

Fatherless. Merlin never had a father; his mother was a nun, the daughter of the king of Dimetia.

N.B.—Melchisedec, king of Salem, was "without father, without mother, having neither beginning of days, nor end of years" (Heb. vii. 3). Probably the meaning is, the priests of the Levites had a regular genealogy, both on the father's and mother's side, and not only was their birth kept on record, but also the date of their consecration, the years they lived, and the time of their death; but in regard to Melchisedec, none of these things were known, because he was not a Levite, though he was a priest.

Fathom (Ferdinand count), a villain who robs his benefactors, pillages any one, but is finally forgiven and assisted. —Smollett: The Adventures of Ferdinand count Fathom (1754).

(The gang being absent, an old beldame conveys the count to a rude apartment to sleep in. Here he found the dead body of a man lately stabbed and concealed in some straw; and the account of his sensations during the night, the horrid device by which he saved his life (by lifting the corpse into his own bed), and his escape guided by the hag, is terrifically tragic.)

The robber-scene in the old woman's hut, in Count Fathom, though often imitated since, still remains one of the most impressive and agitating night pieces of its kind.—Encyclopædia Britannica (article "Romance").

 There is a "Fathom" in The Hunchback, a play by Knowles (1831).

FAT'IMA, daughter of Mahomet, and one of the four perfect women. The other three are Khadîjah, the prophet's first wife; Mary, daughter of Imrân: and Asia, wife of that Pharaoh who was drowned in the Red Sea.

Fat'ima, a holy woman of China, who lived a hermit's life. There was "no one affected with headache whom she did not cure by simply laying her hands on them." An African magician induced this devotee to lend him her clothes and stick, and to make him the facsimile of herself. He then murdered her, and got introduced into the palace of Aladdin. Aladdin, being informed of the trick, pretended to have a bad headache, and when the false Fatima approached under the pretence of curing it, he plunged a dagger into the heart of the magician and killed him.—Arabian Nights ("Aladdin, or the Wonderful Lamp").

Fat'ima, the mother of prince Camaral'zaman. Her husband was Schah'zaman sultan of the "Isle of the Children of Khal'edan, some twenty days' sail from the coast of Persia, in the open sea."—Arabian Nights ("Camaralzaman and Badoura").

Fat'ima, the last of Bluebeard's wives. She was saved from death by the timely arrival of her brothers with a party of friends.—Perrault: Contes de Fées (1697).

Fat'imite (3 syl.). The Third Fatimite, the caliph Hakem B'amr-ellah, who professed to be incarnate deity, and the last prophet who had communication between God and man. He was the founder of the Druses (q.v.).

What say you does this wizard style himself—
Hakeem Biamrallah, the Third Fatimite?
R. Browning: The Return of the Druses, v.

Faulconbridge (Philip), called "the Bastard," natural son of king Richard I. and lady Robert Faulconbridge. An admirable admixture of greatness and levity, daring and recklessness. He was generous and open-hearted, but hated foreigners like a true-born islander.—Shakespeare: King John (1596).

Faulconrie (The Booke of), by George Turberville (1575).

Faulkland, the over-anxious lover of Julia [Melville], always fretting and tormenting himself about her whims, spirit, health, life. Every feature in the sky, every shift of the wind, was a source of anxiety to him. If she was gay, he fretted that she should care so little for his absence; if she was low-spirited, he feared she was going to die; if she danced with another, he was jealous; if she didn't, she was out of sorts.—Sheridan: The Rivals (1775). (See FALKLAND, p. 354.)

Fault-bag. A fable says that every man has a bag hanging before him in which he puts his neighbours' faults, and another behind him in which he stows his own.

Oh that you could turn your eyes towards the napes of your necks, and make but an interior survey of your good selves!—Shakespeare: Coriolanus, act ii. sc. 1 (1609).

Faun. Tennyson uses this sylvan deity of the classics as the symbol of a drunkard.

Arise and fly
The reeling Faun, the sensual feast.
Tennyson: In Memoriam, cxviii.

Faust, a famous magician of the sixteenth century, a native of Suabia. A rich uncle having left him a fortune, Faust ran to every excess; and when his fortune was exhausted, he made a pact with the devil (who assumed the name of Mephistoph'elês, and the appearance of a little grey monk) that if he might indulge his propensities freely for twenty-four years, he would at the end of that period consign to the devil both body and soul.

The compact terminated in 1550, when Faust disappeared. His sweetheart was Margheri'ta [Margaret], whom he seduced, and his faithful servant was Wagner.

(Bayle Bernard made an English version; Goethê has a dramatic poem entitled Faust (1798); Gounod an opera called Faust e Margherita (1859). See FAUSTUS.)

Faustus (Dr.), the same as Faust; but Marlowe, in his admirable tragedy, makes the doctor sell himself to Lucifer and Mephistophilis.

When Faustus stands on the brink of everlasting ruin, waiting for the fatal moment . . . a scene of enchanting interest, fervid passion, and overwhelming pathos, carries captive the sternest heart, and proclaims the first triumph of the tragic poet.—R. Chambers: English Literature, i. 171.

(W. Bayle Bernard, of Boston, U.S. America, has a tragedy on the same subject.)

Favori'ta (La), Leonora de Guzman, "favourite" of Alfonzo XI. of Castile. Ferdinando fell in love with her; and the king, to save himself from excommunication, sanctioned the marriage. But when Ferdinando learned that Leonora was the king's mistress, he rejected the alliance with indignation, and became a monk. Leonora also became a novice in the same monastery, saw Ferdinando, obtained his forgiveness, and died.—Donizetti: La Favorita (an opera, 1842).

Faw (Tibbie), the ostler's wife, in Wandering Willie's tale.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Faw'nia, the lady beloved by Dorastus.—R. Greene: Pandosto, the Triumph of Time (1588).

 Shakespeare founded his Winter's Tale on Greene's romance.

Fazio, a Florentine, who first tried to make a fortune by alchemy, but being present when Bartoldo died, he buried the body secretly, and stole the miser's money-bags. Being now rich, he passed his time with the marchioness Aldabella in licentious pleasure, and his wife Bianca, out of jealousy, accused him to the duke of being privy to Bartoldo's death. For this offence Fazio was condemned to die; and Bianca, having tried in vain to save him, went mad with grief, and died of a broken heart.—Dean Milman: Fazio (1815).

Fea (Euphane), the old housekeeper of the old udaller at Burgh-Westra.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

 A "udaller" is one who holds land by allodial tenure.

Fear Fortress, near Saragossa. An allegorical bogie fort, conjured up by fear, which vanishes as it is courageously approached and boldly besieged.

If a child disappeared, or any cattle were carried off, the frightened peasants said, "The lord of Fear Fortress has taken them." If a fire broke out anywhere, it was the lord of Fear Fortress who must have lit it. The origin of all accidents, mishaps, and disasters was traced to the mysterious owner of this invisible castle.—L'Epine: Croquemitaine, iii. 1.

Fearless (The), Jean duc de Bourgoigne, called Sans Peur (1371–1419).

Feast—Death. "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die" (1 Cor. xv. 32), in allusion to the words spoken in certain Egyptian feasts, when a mummy or the semblance of a dead body was drawn in a litter round the room before the assembled guests, while a herald cried aloud, "Gaze here, and drink, and be merry; for when you die, such will you be." (See REMEMBER YOU ARE MORTAL.)

(E. Long (Academician) exhibited a painting (12 feet by 6 feet) of this custom, in the Royal Academy exhibition, 1877.)

Featherhead (John), Esq., an opponent of sir Thomas Kittlecourt, M.P.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Featherstonehaugh (The Death of), a ballad by Robert Surtees, palmed off by him on sir W. Scott as mediæval Sir Walter quotes it in his Marmion. (See FORGERS AND FORGERIES.)

Fedalma, beloved by Don Silva. The heroine and hero of The Spanish Gypsy, a dramatic poem by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross) (1868).

Fee and Fairy. Fee is the more general term, including the latter. The Arabian Nights are not all fairy tales, but they are all fee tales or contes des fées. So, again, the Ossianic tales, Campbell's Tales of the West Highlands, the mythological tales of the Basques, Irish, Scandinavians, Germans, French, etc., may all be ranged under fee tales.

Feeble (Francis), a woman's tailor, and one of the recruits of sir John Falstaff. Although a thin, starveling yard-wand of a man, he expresses great willingness to be drawn. Sir John compliments him as "courageous Feeble," and says to him, "Thou wilt be as valiant as the wrathful dove, or most magnanimous mouse . . . most forcible Feeble."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. act iii. sc. 2 (1598).

Feeder (Mr.), B.A., usher in the school of Dr. Blimber of Brighton. He was "a kind of human barrel-organ, which played only one tune." Mr. Feeder was in the habit of shaving his head to keep it cool. He married Miss Blimber, the doctor's daughter, and succeeded to the school.—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Feenix, nephew of the Hon. Mrs. Skewton (mother of Edith, Mr. Dombey's second wife). Feenix was a very old gentleman, patched up to look as much like a young fop as possible.

Cousin Feenix was a man about town forty years ago; but he is still so juvenile in figure and manner that strangers are amazed when they discover latent wrinkles in his lordship's face, and crows' feet in his eyes. But cousin Feenix getting up at half-past seven, is quite another thing from cousin Feenix got up.—Dickens: Dombey and Son, xxxi. (1846).

Feignwell (Colonel), the suitor of Anne Lovely, an heiress. Anne Lovely had to obtain the consent of her four guardians before she could marry. One was an old beau, another a virtuoso, a third a broker on 'Change, and the fourth a canting quaker. The colonel made himself agreeable to all, and carried off his prize.—Mrs. Centlivre: A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717).

Andrew Cherry (1769–1812). His first character was "colonel Feignwell," an arduous task for a boy of 17; but he obtained great applause, and the manager of the sharing company, after passing many encomiums on his exertions, presented him with tenpence half-penny, as his dividend of the profits of the night's performance.—Percy: Anecdotes.

Feinaigle (Gregory de), a German mnemonist (1765–1820). He obtained some success by his aids to memory, but in Paris he was an object of ridicule.

Her memory was a mine . . .
For her Feinaigle's was a useless art.
Byron: Don Juan, i. 11 (1819).

Felice or Phelis, wife of sir Guy earl of Warwick, said to have "the same high forehead as Venus."

Felic'ian (Father), the catholic priest and schoolmaster of Grand Pré, in Acadia (now called Nova Scotia). He accompanied Evangeline in part of her wanderings to find Gabriel her affianced husband.—Longfellow: Evangeline (1849).

Felicians (The), the happy nation. The Felicians live under a free sovereignty, where the laws are absolute. Felicia is the French "Utopia."—Mercier de la Rivière: L'Heureuse Nation (1767).

Feliciano de Sylva, don Quixote's favourite author. The two following extracts were in his opinion unsurpassed and unsurpassable:—

The reason, most adored one, of your unreasonable unreasonableness hath so unreasonably unseated my reason, that I have no reasonable reason for reasoning against such unreasonableness.

The bright heaven of your divinity that lifts you to the stars, most celestial of women, renders you deserving of every desert which your charms so deservedly deserve.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. i. 8 (1605).

Felix, a monk who listened to the singing of a milk-white bird for a hundred years; which length of time seemed to him "but a single hour," so enchanted was he with the song.—Longfellow: The Golden Legend. (See Hildesheim.)

Felix (Don), son of don Lopez. He was a Portuguese nobleman, in love with Violante; but Violante's father, don Pedro, intended to make her a nun. Donna Isabella, having fled from home to avoid a marriage disagreeable to her, took refuge with Violante; and when colonel Briton called at the house to see Isabella, her brother don Felix was jealous, believing that Violante was the object of his visits. Violante kept "her friend's secret," even at the risk of losing her lover; but ultimately the mystery was cleared up, and a double marriage took place.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Wonder (1714).

Felix (St.), of Burgundy, who converted Sigbert (Sigebert or Sabert) king of the East Saxons (A.D. 604).—Ethelweard: Chronicles, v.

So Burgundy to us three men most reverend bare . . .
Of which was Felix first, who in th' East Saxon reign
Converted to the faith king Sigbert. Him again
Ensueth Anselm . . . and Hugh . . . [bishop of Lincoln].
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1622).

Felix Holt, the Radical, a novel by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross) (1866).

Felixmar'te (4 syl.) of Hyrcania, son of Flo'risan and Martedi'na, the hero of a Spanish romance of chivalry. The curate in Don Quixote condemned this work to the flames.—Melchior de Ortega: Caballero de Ubeda (1566).

Fell (Dr.). Tom Brown, being in disgrace, was set by Dr. Fell, dean of Christ Church (1625–1686), to translate the thirty-third epigram of Martial—

Non amo te, Zabidi, nec possum dicere quare,
Hoc tantum possum dicere, non amo te.

Which he rendered thus—

I do not like thee, Dr. Fell—
The reason why I cannot tell;
But this I know, and know full well
I do not like thee, Dr. Fell.

In French—

Je ne vous aime pas, Hylas,
Je n'en saurois dire la cause;
Je sais seulement une chose—
C'est que je ne vous aime pas.
Roger Bussy (1693).

Feltham (Black), a highwayman with captain Colepepper or Peppercull (the Alsatian bully).—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Female Quixote (The), a novel by Charlotte Lennox (1752). She has her head turned by romances, but is at last converted to common sense.

Female Soldier (A.). Mrs. Christian Davies, commonly called Mother Ross, served as a foot-soldier and dragoon under William III. and Marlborough.

Hannah Snell of Worcester, who went by the name of James Grey.

Gildippe, wife of Edward, the English baron, fought side by side with her husband, and they were both slain by Soliman.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Clorinda plays the part of a pagan Amazon in the same poem.

 A much longer list will be found in Notes and Queries (Feb. 19, 1881, p. 144).

Femmes Savantes (Les), women who go in for women's rights, science, and philosophy, to the neglect of domestic duties and wifely amenities. The "blue-stockings" are (1) Philaminte (3 syl.) the mother of Henriette, who discharges one of her servants because she speaks bad grammar; (2) Armande (2 syl.) sister of Henriette, who advocates platonic love and science; and (3) Bélise sister of Philaminte, who sides with her in all things, but imagines that every one is in love with her. Henriette, who has no sympathy with these "lofty flights," is in love with Clitandre, but Philaminte wants her to marry Trissotin, a bel esprit. However, the father loses his property through the "savant" proclivities of his wife, Trissotin retires, and Clitandre marries Henriette the "perfect" or thorough woman.—Molière: Les Femmes Savantes (1672).

Fenella, alias Zarah (daughter of Edward Christian), a pretended deaf-and-dumb fairy-like attendant on the countess of Derby. The character seems to have been suggested by that of Mignon, the Italian girl in Goethe's Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Let it be ambiguous utterance, and I will appear as "Fenella."—P. Fitzgerald: Parvenu Family, iii. 224.

Fenella, a deaf-and-dumb girl, sister of Masaniello the fisherman. She was seduced by Alfonso, son of the duke of Arcos; and Masaniello resolved to kill him. He accordingly headed an insurrection, and met with such great success that the mob made him chief magistrate of Portici, but afterwards shot him. Fenella, on hearing of her brother's death, threw herself into the crater of Vesuvius. —Auber: Masaniello (an opera, 1831).

Fénelon of Germany, Lavater (1741-1801).

Fénelon of the Reformation, J. Arnd of Germany (1555-1621).

Fenris, the demon wolf of Niflheim. When he gapes one jaw touches the earth and the other heaven. This monster will swallow up Odin at the day of doom. (Often but incorrectly written FENRIR.)—Scandinavian Mythology.

Fenton, the lover of Anne Page, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Page, gentlefolks living at Windsor. Fenton is of good birth, and seeks to marry a fortune to "heal his poverty." In "sweet Anne Page" he soon discovers that which makes him love her for herself more than for her money.—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, act iii. sc. 4 (1601).

Ferad-Artho, son of Cairbre, and only surviving descendant of the line of Conar (the first king of Ireland). On the death of Cathmor (brother of the rebel Cairbar) in battle, Ferad-Artho became "king of Ireland."—Ossian: Temora, vii. (See CONAR, p. 229.)

Fer'amorz, the young Cashmerian poet who relates poetical tales to Lalla Rookh on her journey from Delhi to Lesser Bucharia. Lalla is going to be married to the young sultan, but falls in love with the poet. On the wedding morn she is led to her bridegroom, and finds with unspeakable joy that the poet is the sultan himself.—T. Moore: Lalla Rookh (1817).

Ferda, son of Damman, chief of a hundred hills in Albion. Ferda was the friend of Cuthullin general of the Irish forces in the time of king Cormac I. Deuga'la (spouse of Cairbar) loved the youth, and told her husband if he would not divide the herd she would no longer live with him. Cuthullin, being appointed to make the division, enraged the lady by assigning a snow-white bull to the husband, whereupon Deugala induced her lover to challenge Cuthullin to mortal combat. Most unwillingly the two friends fought, and Ferda fell. "The sunbeam of battle fell—the first of Cuthullin's friends. Unhappy [unlucky] is the hand of Cuthullin since the hero fell."—Ossian: Fingal, ii.

FERDINAND, king of Navarre. He agreed with three young lords to spend three years in severe study, during which time no woman was to approach his court; but no sooner was the agreement made than he fell in love with the princess of France. In consequence of the death of her father, the lady deferred the marriage for twelve months and a day.

> . . . the sole inheritor
> Of all perfections that a man may owe [own],
> Matchless Navarre.
> Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost (1594).

Ferdinand, son of Alonso king of Naples. He falls in love with Miranda, daughter of Prospero the exiled duke of Milan.—Shakespeare: The Tempest (1609).

> Haply so
> Miranda's hope had pictured Ferdinand
> Long ere the gaunt wave tossed him on the shore.
> Lowell.

Ferdinand, a fiery young Spaniard, in love with Leonora.—Jephson: Two Strings to your Bow (1792).

Ferdinand (Don), the son of don Jerome of Seville, in love with Clara d'Almanza, daughter of don Guzman.—Sheridan: The Duenna (1773).

Ferdinan'do, a brave soldier, who, having won the battle of Tari'fa, in 1340, was created count of Zamo'ra and marquis of Montreal. (See FAVORITA for the sequel.)—Donizetti: La Favori'ta (1842).

Fergus, fourth son of Fingal, and the only one that had issue at the death of his father. Ossian, the eldest brother, had a son named Oscar, but Oscar was slain at a feast by Cairbar "lord of Atha;" and of the other two brothers, Fillan was slain before he had married, and Ryno, though married, died without issue.

According to tradition, Fergus (son of Fingal) was the father of Congal; Congal of Arcath; and Arcath of Fergus II., with whom begins the real history of the Scots.—Ossian.

Fergus, son of Rossa, a brave hero in the army of Cuthullin general of the Irish tribes.

> Fergus, first in our joy at the feast; son of Rossa; arm of death.—Ossian: Fingal, i.

N.B.—Fer'gus is another form of Ferrăgus or Ferracute (q.v.).

Fern (Fanny), the pseudonym of Sarah Payson Willis, afterwards Eldredge, afterwards Farmington, afterwards Parton, sister of N. P. Willis, an American (1811–1872).

Fern (Will), a poor fellow, who takes charge of his brother's child, and is both honest and kind; but, alas! he dared to fall asleep in a shed, an offence which, alderman Cute maintained, must be "put down."—Dickens: The Chimes, third quarter (1844).

FERNANDO, son of John of Procida, and husband of Isoline (3 syl.) daughter of the French governor of Messi'na. The butchery of the Sicilian Vespers occurred the night after their espousals. Fernando was among the slain, and Isoline died of a broken heart.—Knowles: John of Procida (1840).

Fernando (Don), youngest son of the duke Ricardo. Gay, handsome, generous, and polite; but faithless to his friend Cardenio, for, contrary to the lady's inclination, and in violation of every principle of honour, he prevailed on Lucinda's father to break off the betrothal between his daughter and Cardenio, and to bestow the lady on himself. (For the rest, see CARDENIO.)—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. (1605).

Fernando, a Venetian captain, servant to Annophel (daughter of the governor of Candy).—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Laws of Candy (1647).

Fernando [FLORESTAN], a State prisoner of Seville, married to Leonora, who (in boy's attire and under the name of Fidēlio) became the servant of Rocco the jailer. Pizarro, governor of the jail, conceived a hatred to the State prisoner, and resolved to murder him, so Rocco and Leonora were sent to dig his grave. The arrival of the minister of state put an end to the infamous design, and Fernando was set at liberty.—Beethoven: Fidelio (1791).

Fernando, to whom Alfonzo XI. promised Leonora in marriage. (See LEONORA.)—Donizetti: La Favorita (1842).

Ferney (The Patriarch of), Voltaire; so called because he lived in retirement at Ferney, near Geneva (1694–1778).

Ferquhard Day, the absentee from the clan Chattan at the combat.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Fer'racute, a giant who had the strength of forty men, and was thirty-six feet high. He was slain by Orlando, who wounded him in the navel, his only vulnerable part.—Turpin: Chronicle of Charlemagne. (See FERRAU.)

∴ Ferracute is the prototype of Pulci's "Morgante," in his heroi-comic poem entitled Morgante Maggiore (1494).

Fer'ragus, the Portuguese giant, who took Bellisant under his care after her divorce from Alexander emperor of Constantinople.—Valentine and Orson (fifteenth century).

> My sire's tall form might grace the part
> Of Ferragus or Ascapart.
> Sir W. Scott.

Ferrand de Vaudemont (Count), duc de Lorraine, son of René king of Provence. He first appears disguised as Laurence Neipperg.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Ferrardo [GONZAGA], reigning duke of Mantua in the absence of his cousin Leonardo. He was a villain, and tried to prove Mariana (the bride of Leonardo) guilty of adultery. His scheme was this: He made Julian St. Pierre drunk with drugged wine, and in his sleep conveyed him to the duke's bed, throwing his scarf under the bed of the duchess, which was in an adjoining chamber. He then revealed these proofs of guilt to his cousin Leonardo, but Leonardo refused to believe in his wife's guilt, and Julian St. Pierre exposed the whole scheme of villainy, amply vindicating the innocence of Mariana, who turned out to be Julian's sister.—Knowles: The Wife (1833).

Ferrau, a Saracen, son of Landfu'sa. Having dropped his helmet in a river, he vowed never to wear another till he won that worn by Orlando. Orlando slew him by a wound in the navel, his only vulnerable part.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516). (See FERRACUTE.)

Ferraugh (Sir), introduced in bk. iii. 8, but without a name, as carrying off the false Florimel from Braggadoccio. In bk. iv. 2 the name is given. He is there overthrown by sir Blandamour, who takes away with him the false Florimel, the lady of snow and wax.—Spenser: Faërie Queene (1590, 1596).

Ferret, an avaricious, mean-spirited slanderer, who blasts by innuendoes, and blights by hints and cautions. He hates young Heartall, and misinterprets all his generous acts, attributing his benevolence to hush-money. The rascal is at last found out and foiled.—Cherry: The Soldier's Daughter (1804).

Ferrex, eldest son of Gorboduc a legendary king of Britain. Being driven by his brother Porrex from the kingdom, he returned with a large army, but was defeated and slain by Porrex.—Gorboduc, a tragedy by Thom. Norton and Thom. Sackville (1561).

Ferumbras (Sir). (See FIERABRAS.)

Festus, a long dramatic poem, by Philip J. Bailey (1839). In the Times the scope of the poem was given as "The exhibition of a soul gifted, tried, buffeted, beguiled; stricken, purified, redeemed, pardoned, and triumphant."

Fetnab ["tormentor of hearts"], a female favourite of the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid. While the caliph was absent in his wars, Zobeidê (3 syl.), his wife, out of jealousy, ordered Fetnab to be buried alive. Ganem happened accidentally to see the interment, rescued her, and took her home to his own private lodgings in Bagdad. The caliph, on his return, mourned for Fetnab as dead; but receiving from her a letter of explanation, he became jealous of Ganem, and ordered him to be put to death. Ganem, however, contrived to escape. When the fit of jealousy was over, the caliph heard the facts plainly stated, whereupon he released Fetnab, gave her in marriage to Ganem, and appointed the young man to a very lucrative post about the court.—Arabian Nights ("Ganem, the Slave of Love").

Fe'zon, daughter of Savary duke of Aquitaine. The Green Knight, who was a pagan, demanded her in marriage, but Orson (brother of Valentine), called "The Wild Man of the Forest," overthrew the pagan and married Fezon.—Valentine and Orson (fifteenth century).

Fiammetta, a lady beloved by Boccaccio, supposed to be Maria, daughter of Robert king of Naples. (See LOVERS.) (Italian, fiamma, "a little flame.")

Fib, an attendant on queen Mab.—Drayton: Nymphidia.

Fiction. Father of Modern Prose Fiction, Daniel Defoe (1663-1731).

Fiddler (Oliver's). Sir Roger l'Estrange was so called, because at one time he was playing a fiddle or viole in the house of John Hingston, where Cromwell was one of the guests (1616-1704).

Fiddler Joss, Mr. Joseph Poole, a reformed drunkard, who subsequently turned preacher in London, but retained his former sobriquet.

Fiddler's Green, the Elysium of sailors; a land flowing with rum and limejuice; a land of perpetual music, mirth, dancing, drinking, and tobacco; a sort of Dixie's Land or land of the leal.

Fide'le (3 syl.), the name assumed by Imogen, when, attired in boy's clothes, she started for Milford Haven to meet her husband Posthŭmus.—Shakespeare: Cymbeline (1605).

(Colins has a beautiful elegy on "Fidele.")

Fidelia, "the foundling." She is in reality Harriet, the daughter of sir Charles Raymond, but her mother dying in child-birth, she was committed to the charge of a governante. The governante sold the child, at the age of 12, to one Villiard, and then wrote to sir Charles to say that she was dead. One night, Charles Belmont, passing by, heard cries of distress, and going to the rescue took the girl home as a companion to his sister. He fell in love with her; the governante, on her death-bed, told the story of her infamy; and Charles married the foundling.—E. Moore: The Foundling (1748).

Fidel'lo. Leono'ra, wife of Fernando Florestan, assumed this name, and dressed in male attire (when her husband was a State prisoner) that she might enter the service of Rocco the jailer, and hold intercourse with her husband.—Beethoven: Fidelio (1791).

Fidès (2 syl.), mother of John of Leyden. Believing that the prophet-ruler of Westphalia had caused her son's death, she went to Munster to curse him. Seeing the ruler pass, she recognized in him her own son; but the son pretended not to know his mother, and Fidès, to save him annoyance, professed to have made a mistake. She was put into a dungeon, where John visited her; and when he set fire to his palace, Fidès rushed into the flames, and both perished together.—Meyerbeer: La Prophète (1849).

Fidessa, the companion of Sansfoy; but when the Red Cross Knight slew that "faithless Saracen," Fidessa told him she was the only daughter of an emperor of Italy; that she was betrothed to a rich and wise king; and that her betrothed being slain, she had set forth to find the body, in order that she might decently inter it. She said that in her wanderings Sansfoy had met her and compelled her to be his companion; but she thanked the knight for having come to her rescue. The Red Cross Knight, wholly deluded by this plausible tale, assured Fidessa of his sympathy and protection; but she turned out to be Duessa, the daughter of Falsehood and Shame. The sequel must be sought under the word DUESSA.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. 2 (1590).

Fi'do, Faith personified, the foster-son of Acŏë ("hearing," Rom. x. 17); his foster-sister is Meditation. Fully described in canto ix. of The Purple Island (1633), by Phineas Fletcher. (Latin, fidēs, "faith.")

Field of Blood, Aceldama, the plot of land purchased with the thirty pieces of silver which Judas had received of the high priest, and which he threw down in the temple when he saw that Jesus was condemned to death.—Matt. xxvii. 5.

Field of Blood, the battle-field of Cannæ, where Hannibal, B.C. 216, defeated the Romans with very great slaughter.

Field of Mourning, a battle-field near the city of Aragon. The battle was fought July 17, 1134, between the Christians and the Moors.

Field of Peterloo, the site of an attack made by the military upon a reform meeting held in St. Peter's Field, Manchester, August 16, 1819. As many as 60,000 persons were wounded in this absurd attack. The word is a burlesque on Waterloo.

Battles and bloodshed, September massacres, bridges of Lodi, retreats of Moscow, Waterloos, Peterloos, ten-pound franchises, tar-barrels, and guillotines.—Carlyle.

Field of the Cloth of Gold, a large plain between Ardres and Guisnes [Gheen], where François I. interviewed Henry VIII. in 1520.

They differ, as a May-day procession of chimney-sweepers differs from The Field of the Cloth of Gold.—Macaulay.

Field of the Forty Footsteps, at the back of the British Museum, once called Southampton Fields. The tradition is that two brothers, in the Monmouth rebellion, took different sides, and engaged each other in fight. Both were killed, and forty impressions of their feet were traceable in the field for years afterwards.

(Jane and Anna Maria Porter wrote a novel called The Field of the Forty Footsteps, and the Messrs. Mayhew took the same subject for a melodrama.)

Field Sports, a poem in blank verse by Somerville (1742).

Fielding (Mrs.), a little querulous old lady with a peevish face, who, in consequence of once having been better off, or of labouring under the impression that she might have been if something in the indigo trade had happened differently, was very genteel and patronizing indeed. When she dressed for a party, she wore gloves, and a cap of state "almost as tall and quite as stiff as a mitre."

May Fielding, her daughter, very pretty and innocent. She was engaged to Edward Plummer, but heard that he had died in South America, and consented to marry Tackleton the toy merchant. A few days before the day fixed for the wedding, Edward Plummer returned, and May Fielding married him. Tackleton gave them as a present the cake he had ordered for his own wedding feast.—Dickens: The Cricket on the Hearth (1845).

Fielding of the Drama, George Farquhar, author of The Beaux' Stratagem, etc. (1678–1707).

Fielding's Proverbs. These were in reality compiled by W. Henry Ireland, the Shakespeare impostor, who published Miscellaneous Papers and Instruments, under the hand and seal of William Shakespeare, including the tragedy of King Lear and a small fragment of Hamlet, from the original, 1796, folio, £4 4s. The whole a barefaced forgery.

Fierabras (Sir) [Re-á'-ra-brak], a Saracen of Spain, who made himself master of Rome, and carried away the crown of thorns and the balsam with which the Lord had been embalmed. His chief exploit was to slay the giant who guarded the bridge of Mantible, which had thirty arches, all of black marble. Ba'land of Spain assumed the name of sir Fierabras.

Balsam of Fierabras, the balsam used in embalming the body of Christ, stolen by sir Fierabras. It possessed such virtues that one single drop, taken internally, sufficed to heal the most malignant wound. (See BALSAM, p. 85.)

Fierabras of Alexandria, the giant son of admiral Baland of Spain. He possessed all Babylon, even to the Red Sea, was seigneur of Russia, lord of Cologne, master of Jerusalem, and of the Holy Sepulchre. This huge giant ended his days in the odour of sanctity, "meek as a lamb, and humble as he was meek."

Fierce (The), Alexander I. of Scotland. So called from the impetuosity of his temper (*, 1107–1124).

Fiesco, the chief character of Schiller's tragedy so called. The poet makes Fiesco killed by the hand of Verri'na the republican; but history says his death was the result of a stumble from a plank (1783).

Fig Sunday, Palm Sunday. So called from the custom of eating figs on this day, as snapdragons on Christmas Eve, plum-pudding on Christmas Day, oranges and barley sugar on St. Valentine's Eve, pancakes on Shrove Tuesday, salt cod-fish on Ash Wednesday, frumenty on Mothering Sunday (Mid-lent), cross-buns on Good Friday, gooseberry-tart on Whit Sunday, goose on Michaelmas Day, nuts on All-Hallows, and so on.

Figs of Holvan. Holvan is a stream of Persia, and the Persians say its figs are not to be equalled in the whole world.

> Luscious as the figs of Holvan.
> Saadi: Gulistan (thirteenth century).

Fig'aro, a barber of extraordinary cunning, dexterity, and intrigue.—Beaumarchais: Barbier de Séville (1775).

Fig'aro, a valet, who outwits every one by his dexterity and cunning.—Beaumarchais: Mariage de Figaro (1784).

 Several operas have been founded on these two comedies: e.g. Mozart's Nozze di Figaro (1785); Paisiello's Il Barbiere di Siviglia (1810); Rossini's Il Barbiere di Siviglia (1816).

Fig'aro, the sweetheart of Susan (favourite waiting-woman of the countess Almaviva). Figaro is never so happy as when he has two or three plots in hand. —Holcroft: The Follies of a Day (1745–1809).

Fights and Runs Away (He that).

> He that fights and runs away
> May live to fight another day
> But he that is in battle slain
> Can never rise to fight again.
> Sir John Mennis: Musarum Deliciæ (1656).

¶ Demosthenes, being reproached for running away from the battle of Chæronea, replied, [illegible]

φεύγων ("A man who runs away may fight again").

Those that fly may fight again,
Which he can never do that's slain.
S. Butler: Hudibras, III. 3 (1678).

Fighting Prelate (The), Henry Spencer, bishop of Norwich. He opposed the rebels under Wat Tyler with the temporal sword, absolved them, and then sent them to the gibbet. In 1383 he went to assist the burghers of Ghent in their contest with the count of Flanders.

The bishop of Norwich, the famous "Fighting Prelate," had led an army into Flanders.—Lord Campbell.

Filch, a lad brought up as a pick-pocket. Mrs. Peachum says, "He hath as fine a hand at picking a pocket as a woman, and is as nimble-fingered as a juggler. If an unlucky session does not cut the rope of thy life, I pronounce, boy, thou wilt be a great man in history" (act i. 1).—Gay: The Beggar's Opera (1727).

Filer, a lean, churlish man, who takes poor Toby Veck's tripe, and delivers him a homily on the sinfulness of luxury and self-indulgence.—Dickens: The Chimes (1844).

Filia Doloro'sa, the duchesse d'Angoulême, daughter of Louis XVI. Also called "The Modern Antig'onê" (1778–1851).

Filio-que. The following is the knotty point of theological controversy between the Eastern and Western Churches: Does the Holy Ghost proceed from the Father and the Son (filio-que), or from the Father only? Of course, in the Nicene Creed in the Book of Common Prayer, the question is settled so far as the Church of England is concerned.

Fillan, son of Fingal and Clatho, the most highly finished character in the poem of Temora. Fillan was younger than his nephew Oscar, and does not appear on the scene till after Oscar's death. He is rash and fiery, eager for military glory, and brave as a lion. When Fingal appointed Gaul to command for the day, Fillan had hoped his father's choice might have fallen to his own lot. "On his spear stood the son of Clatho . . . thrice he raised his eyes to Fingal; his voice thrice failed him as he spoke. . . . He strode away; bent over a distant stream . . . the tear hung in his eye. He struck at times the thistle's head with his inverted spear." Yet showed he no jealousy, for when Gaul was in danger, he risked his own life to save him. Next day was Fillan's turn to lead, and his deeds were unrivalled in dash and brilliancy. He slew Foldath, the general of the opposing army, but when Cathmor "lord of Atha," the commander-in-chief, came against him, Fillan fell. His modesty was then as prominent as his bravery. "Lay me," he said to Ossian, "in that hollow rock. Raise no stone above me. . . . I am fallen in the first of my fields, fallen without renown." Every incident of Fillan's life is beautiful in the extreme. —Ossian: Temora, v.

Fillpot (Toby), a thirsty old soul, who "among jolly topers bore off the bell." It chanced as in dog days he sat boosing in his arbour, that he died "full as big as a Dorchester butt." His body turned to clay, and out of the clay a brown jug was made, sacred to friendship, mirth, and mild ale.

His body, when long in the ground it had lain,
And time into clay had resolved it again,
A potter found out in its covert so snug,
And with part of fat Toby he formed this brown jug,
Now sacred to friendship, to mirth, and mild ale.
So here's to my lovely sweet Nan of the vale.
Rev. F. Fawkes (1721–1777).

N.B.—The two best drinking-songs in the language were both by clergymen. The other is, I Cannot Eat but Little Meat, by John Still, bishop of Bath and Wells (1543–1607).

Filome'na (Santa). At Pisa the church of San Francisco contains a chapel lately dedicated to Santa Filomena. Over the altar is a picture by Sabatelli, which represents Filomena as a nymph-like figure floating down from heaven, attended by two angels bearing the lily, the palm, and a javelin. In the foreground are the sick and maimed, healed by her intercession.

Nor ever shall be wanting here
The palm, the lily, and the spear:
The symbols that of yore
St. Filomena bore.
Longfellow: Sta. Filomena.

 Longfellow calls Florence Nightingale "St. Filomena" (born at Florence, 1820).

Finality John, lord John Russell (afterwards "earl Russell"), who maintained that the Reform Bill of 1832 was a finality (1792–1878).

Finch (Margaret), queen of the gipsies, who died aged 109, A.D. 1740. She was born at Sutton, in Kent, and was buried at Beckenham, in the same county.

Fine-ear, one of the seven attendants of Fortunio. He could hear the grass grow, and even the wool on a sheep's back.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy's Fairy Tales ("Fortunio," 168a).

 In Grimm's Goblins is the same fairy tale ("Fortunio").

Fin'etor, a necromancer, father of the Enchantress Damsel.—Vasco de Lobeira: Amadis de Gaul (thirteenth century).

Finetta, "the cinder girl," a fairy tale by the comtesse D'Aulnoy (1682). This is merely the old tale of Cinderella slightly altered. Finetta was the youngest of three princesses, despised by them, and put to all sorts of menial work. The two sisters went to balls, and left Finetta at home in charge of the house. One day she found a gold key, which opened a wardrobe full of most excellent dresses; so, arraying herself in one, she followed her sisters to the ball, but she was so fine that they knew her not, and she ran home before them. This occurred two or three times, but at last, in running home, she lost one of her slippers. The young prince resolved to marry her alone whose foot fitted the slipper, and Finetta became his wife. Finetta was also called Auricula or "Fine-ear."

Fingal (or Fion na Gael).

His father was Comhal or Combal, and his mother Morna.

(Comhal was the son of Trathal king of Morven, and Morna was the daughter of Thaddu.)

His first wife was Roscrana, mother of Ossian. His second was Clatho, mother of Fillan, etc.

(Roscrana was the daughter of Cormac I. third king of Ireland.)

His daughter was Bosmi'na, and his sons Ossian, Fillan, Ryno, and Fergus. (The son of Ossian was Oscar.)

(Fillan was younger than his nephew Oscar, and both, together with Ryno, were slain in battle before Fingal died.)

His bard and herald was Ullin. His sword Luno, so called from its maker, Luno of Lochlin (Denmark). His dog was named "Bran."

His kingdom was Morven (the north-west ceast of Scotland); his capital Semo; his subjects were Caledonians or Gaels.

The old Celtic romances picture him not so much a king as the warrior to whom and his heroes all Erin looked for deliverance from their foreign foes. His standing army were a kind of militia called Fenni, and it is from them the Fenians derive their name.

After the restoration of Ferad-Artho to the throne of Ireland, Fingal "resigned his spear to Ossian," and he died A.D. 283.

Fingal, an epic in six books, by Ossian. The subject is the invasion of Ireland by Swaran king of Lochlin (Denmark) during the reign of Cormac II. (a minor), and its deliverance by the aid of Fingal king of Morven (north-west coast of Scotland). The poem opens with the overthrow of Cuthullin general of the Irish forces, and concludes with the return of Swaran to his own land.

Finger. "Little finger, tell me true." When M. Argan wishes to pump his little daughter Louison, respecting a young gentleman who pays attentions to her elder sister, he says to the child, "Prenez-y bien garde au moins; car voilà un petit doigt, qui sait tout, qui me dira si vous mentez." When the child has told him all she knows, he puts his little finger to his ear and says, "Voilà mon petit doigt pourtant qui gronde quelque chose. Attendez. Hé! Ah, ah! Oui? Oh, oh! voilà mon petit doigt, qui me dit quelque chose que vous avez vu et que vous ne m'avez pas dit." To which the child replies, "Ah! mon papa, votre petit doigt est un menteur."—Molière. Le Malade Imaginaire, ii. 11 (1673).

Fingers. In chiromancy we give the thumb to Venus, the fore-finger to Jove, the middle finger to Saturn, the ring finger to Sol, and the little finger to Mercury.—Ben Jonson: The Alchemist, i. 2 (1610).

Finis Poloniæ. These words are attributed (but without sufficient authority) to Kosciusko the Pole, when he lay wounded by the balls of Suwaroff's troops on the field of Maciejowieze (October 10, 1794).

Percé de coups, Kosciusko s'écria en tombant "Finis Poloniæ."—Michaud: Biographie Universelle.

Finlayson (Luckie), landlady of the lodgings in the Canongate of Edinburgh.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Fin'niston (Duncan), a tenant of the laird of Gudgeonford.

Luckie Finniston, wife of Duncan.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Fion (son of Comnal), an enormous giant, who could place one foot on mount Cromleach, in Ulster, and the other on mount Crommal close by, and then dip his hand in the river Lubar, which ran between.

With one foot on the Crotmal set and one on mount Cromleach,
The waters of the Lubar stream his giant hand could reach.

Translation of the Gaelic.

Fiona, a series of traditionary old Irish poems on the subject of Fion (Finn or Fingal) M'Comnal and the heroes connected with him.

Fionnua'la, daughter of Lir. Being transformed into a swan, she was doomed to wander over certain lakes and rivers of Ireland till the Irish became Christians, but the sound of the first mass-bell in the island was to be the signal of her release. (See LIR.)

Silent, O Moyle, be the roar of thy water [County Tyrone] . . .
While murmuring mournfully Lir's lonely daughter
Tells to the night-star her tale of woes.
When shall the "swan," her death-note singing,
Sleep, with wings in darkness furl'd?
When will heaven, its sweet "bell" ringing,
Call my spirit from this stormy world?
Moore: Irish Melodies, iv. ("The Song of Fionnuala").

Fips, a mysterious person living at Austin Friars (London). He is employed by old Martin Chuzzlewit to engage Tom Pinch at a weekly salary as librarian to the Temple Library.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Fir-bolg [i.e. bowmen, from bolg, "a quiver"], a colony of Belgæ from Britain, led by Larthon to Ireland and settled in the southern parts of the island. Their chief was called "lord of Atha" (a country of Connaught), and thence Ireland was called Bolga. Somewhat later a colony of Caledonians from the western coast of Scotland settled in the northern parts of Ireland, and made Ulster their head-quarters. When Crotha was "lord of Atha," he carried off Conlama (daughter of the Cael chief) by force, and a general war between the two races ensued. The Cael was reduced to the last extremity, and sent to Trathal (grandfather of Fingal) for aid. Trathal accordingly sent over Conar with an army, and on his reaching Ulster he was made "king of the Cael" by acclamation. He utterly subdued the Fir-bolg, and became "king of Ireland;" but the Fir-bolg often rose in insurrection, and made many attempts to expel the race of Conar.—Ossian.

Fire a Good Servant, but Bad Master.

For fire and people doe in this agree,
They both good servants, both ill masters be.
Brooke: Inquisition upon Fame, etc. (1554-1608).

Fire-Brand of France (The), John Duke of Bedford, regent of France (1389-1435).

John duke of Bedford, styled "The Fire-brand of France."
Drayton: Polyolbion, xviii. (1613).

Fire-drake, a fire which flies in the night, like a dragon. Metaphorically, it means a spitfire, an irritable, passionate person.

Common people think the fire-drake to be a spirit that keepeth some hid treasure, but philosophers affirm it to be a great unequal exhalation inflamed between two clouds, the one hot and the other cold, which is the reason that it smoketh. The middle part . . . being greater than the rest, maketh it seeme like a bellie, and the two ends are like unto a head and talle.
—Bullokar: Expositor (1616).

Fire-new, i.e. bran-new (brennan, "to burn," brene, "shining").

Your fire-new stamp of honour is scarce current.
Shakespeare: Richard III. act i. sc. 3 (1597).

Fire-Worshippers (The), the third tale told by Feramorz to Lalla Rookh. It is in eight-syllable rhymes; and divided into four parts, each of which is about 500 lines. The tale (a very sad one) is as follows: Hafed (a fire-worshipper), seeking to kill Al Hassan (emir of Arabia), who had come to Persia to extirpate the Ghebers, accidentally meets Hinda the emir's daughter, and they mutually fall in love with each other. Hafed visits Hinda for several evenings in her bower, and then tells her they must part, for her father would never consent to their marriage. He then drops quietly from her bower, and joins his companions in the Ghebers' glen. Hinda, hearing that her father is preparing an expedition against the Ghebers, falls in a swoon, and her father, ignorant of the cause, sends her to her Arabian home; but the vessel in which she sails is attacked by strangers, and Hinda, blindfolded, is taken to the Ghebers' glen. Here she discovers that her lover is Hafed, and she tells him that Al Hassan is about to enter the glen with a large army, utterly to extirpate the whole race of fire-worshippers. Hafed sends Hinda away, intending that she should be restored to her father, and then prepares for the attack. Thousands of the Moslems fall, all the Ghebers are slain, and Hafed, mounting the fire-pile, dies. Hinda (by a kind of presentiment) feels assured of his death, and, falling in a swoon into the water, is drowned.—T. Moore: Lalla Rookh (1817).

Firouz Schah, son and heir of the king of Persia. One New Year's Day an Indian brought to the king an enchanted horse, which would convey the rider almost instantaneously anywhere he might wish to go to; and asked, as the price thereof, the king's daughter for his wife. Prince Firouz, mounting the horse to try it, was carried to Bengal, and there fell in love with the princess, who accompanied him back to Persia on the horse. When the king saw his son arrive safe and sound, he dismissed the Indian discourteously; but the Indian caught up the princess, and, mounting the horse, conveyed her to Cashmere. She was rescued by the sultan of Cashmere, who cut off the Indian's head, and proposed marriage himself to the princess. To avoid this alliance, the princess pretended to be mad. The sultan sent for his physicians, but they could suggest no cure. At length came one who promised to cure the lady; it was prince Firouz in disguise. He told the sultan that the princess had contracted enchantment from the horse, and must be set on it to disenchant her. Accordingly, she was set on the horse, and while Firouz caused a thick cloud of smoke to arise, he mounted with the lady through the air, saying as he did so, "Sultan of Cashmere, when you would espouse a princess who craves your protection, first learn to obtain her consent." —Arabian Nights ("The Enchanted Horse").

First Gentleman of Europe, George IV. (1762, 1820–1830). (See FUM.)

Louis d'Artois of France was so called also.

The "First Gentleman of Europe" had not yet quite lost his once elegant figure.—E. Yates: Celebrities, xvii.

First Grenadier of France. Latour d'Auverge was so called by Napoleon (1743–1800).

First Love, a comedy by Richard Cumberland (1796). Frederick Mowbray's first love, being dowerless, marries the wealthy lord Ruby, who soon dies, leaving all his fortune to his widow. In the mean time, Frederick goes abroad, and at Padua falls in with Sabina Rosny, who nurses him through a severe sickness, for which he thinks he is bound in honour to marry her. She comes with him to England, and is placed under the charge of lady Ruby. Sabina tells lady Ruby she cannot marry Frederick, because she is married already to lord Sensitive, and even if it were not so, she could not marry him, for all his affections are with lady Ruby; this she discovered in the delirium of the young man, when his whole talk was about her ladyship. In the end, lord Sensitive avows himself the husband of Sabina, and Frederick marries his first love.

Fish (One-eyed), in the mere of Snowdonia or the Snowdon group.

Snowdon . . . his proper mere did note . . .
That pool in which . . . the one-eyed fish are found.
Drayton: Polyolbion, ix. (1612).

He eats no fish, that is, "he is no papist," "he is an honest man, or one to be trusted." In the reign of queen Elizabeth papists were, generally speaking, the enemies of the Government, and hence one who did not eat fish, like a papist on fast days, was considered a protestant, and friend to the Government.

I do profess . . . to serve him truly that will put me in trust . . . and to eat no fish.—Shakespeare: King Lear, act i. sc. 4 (1605).

Fish and the Ring.

(1) Polycrătês, being too fortunate, was advised to cast away something he most highly prized, and threw into the sea an engraved gem of great value. A few days afterwards a fish came to his table, and in it was this very gem.—Herodotus, iii. 40.

(2) A certain queen, having formed an illicit attachment to a soldier, gave him a ring which had been the present of her husband. The king, being apprized thereof, got possession of the ring while the soldier was asleep, threw it into the sea, and then asked his queen to bring it him. In great alarm, she went to St. Kentigern and told him everything. The saint went to the Clyde, caught a salmon with the ring in its mouth, and gave it to the queen, who thus saved her character and her husband. This legend is told about the Glasgow arms.

(3) The arms of dame Rebecca Berry, wife of sir Thomas Elton, Stratford-le-Bow, to be seen at St. Dunstan's Church, Stepney. The tale is that a knight, hearing the cries of a woman in labour, knew that the infant was destined to become his wife. He tried to elude his destiny, and, when the infant had grown to womanhood, threw a ring into the sea, commanding the damsel never to see his face again till she could produce the ring which he had cast away. In a few days a cod-fish was caught, and the ring was found in its mouth. The young woman producing the ring, the marriage was duly consummated. —Romance of London.

(4) Solomon's signet-ring. (See SAKHAR.)

Fisher (Ralph), assistant of Roland Græme, at Avenel Castle.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Fitz-Boodle (George), a name assumed by Thackeray in a series of articles called "Fitz-Boodle Papers," contributed to Fraser's Magazine (1842).

Fitzborn, in Vivian Grey, by Disraeli (lord Beaconsfield), is said to be meant for sir Robert Peel (1826–27).

Fitz-Fulke (Hebe duchess of), a "gracious, graceful, graceless grace" (canto xvi. 49), staying with lord and lady Amundeville (4 syl.), while don Juan "the Russian envoy" was their guest. Don Juan fancied he saw in the night the apparition of a monk, which produced such an effect on his looks and behaviour as to excite attention. When the cause of his perturbation was known, lady Adeline sang to him a tale purporting to explain the apparition; but "her frolic grace" at night personated the ghost to carry on the joke. She was, however, discovered by don Juan, who was resolved to penetrate the mystery, but what followed his discovery is not recorded; and thus the sixteenth and last book of Don Juan ends.—Byron: Don Juan (1824).

Fitzurse (Lord Waldemar) a baron in the suite of prince John of Anjou (brother of Richard Cœur de Lion).—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Five, says Pythagoras, "has peculiar force in expiations. It is everything. It stops the power of poisons, and is redoubted by evil spirits. Unity or the monad is deity, or the first cause of all things—the good principle. Two or the dyad is the symbol of diversity—the evil principle. Three or the triad contains the mystery of mysteries, for everything is composed of three substances. It represents God, the soul of the world, and the spirit of man. Five is 2 + 3, or the combination of the first of the equals and the first of the unequals, hence also the combination of the good and evil powers of nature."—Pythagoras: On the Pentad.

Five Kings of France, the five directors (1795).

Five Points of Doctrine (The): (1) Predestination or particular election; (2) Irresistible grace; (3) Original sin or the total depravity of the natural man; (4) Particular redemption; and (5) The final perseverance of the saints. The Calvinists believe the affirmative of all these.

Five-pound Note. De Quincy tried in vain to raise the loan of half a crown on the security of a five-pound note. I myself had a similar difficulty in a restaurant in London.

Five Sisters (The). Window in the north transept of York Minster, so called because it has five tall lancets.

Five Wits (The): common wit, imagination, fantasy, estimation, and memory.

1. Common wit is that inward sense which judges what the five senses simply discern: thus the eye sees, the nose smells, the ear hears, and so on, but it is "common wit" that informs the brain and passes judgment on the goodness or badness of these external matters.

2. Imagination works on the mind, causing it to realize what has been presented to it.

3. Fantasy energizes the mind to act in accordance with the judgment thus pronounced.

4. Estimation decides on all matters pertaining to time, space, locality, relation, and so on.

5. Memory enables the mind to retain the recollection of what has been imparted.

> These are the five witts remowying inwardly—
> First "Common Witte," and then "Ymagination," > "Fantasy" and "Estimation" truely,
> And "Memory."
> Hawes: The Passe-tyme of Plesure, xxiv. (1515).

Flaccus. Horace the Roman poet, whose full name was Quintus Horātius Flaccus (B.C. 65–8).

Fladdock (General), a friend of the Norris family in America, and, like them, devoted to titles and aristocracy.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Flags.

BANNERS of saints and images are smaller than standards, and not slit at the extremity.

Royal Banners contain the royal coat of arms.

BANNEROLS, banners of great width; they represent alliances and descent.

PENNONS, smaller than standards. They are rounded at the extremity and charged with arms.

PENSILS, small flags shaped like the vanes which surmount pinnacles.

STANDARDS, much larger and longer than banners.

∴ The Royal British Standard has two quarters of red with the leopards of England, a quarter of yellow on which is the red lion of Scotland, and the fourth quarter a blue field on which is the harp of Ireland.

The Union Jack is a blue flag with three united crosses extending to the extreme edges: (1) St. George's cross (red on white) for England; (2) St. Andrew's cross (white on blue) for Scotland; (3) St. Patrick's cross (red on white) for Ireland. In all other flags containing the "Union Jack," the Jack is confined to the first quarter or a part thereof.

Flam'berge (2 syl.), the sword which Maugis took from Anthe'nor the Saracen admiral, when he attacked the castle of Oriande la Fée. The sword was made by Weyland, the Scandinavian Vulcan.—Romance of Maugis d'Aygremont et de Vivian son Frère.

Flamborough (Solomon), farmer. A talkative neighbour of Dr. Primrose, vicar of Wakefield. Moses Primrose marries one of his daughters.

The Misses Flamborough, daughters of the farmer. Their homeliness contrasts well with the flashy pretenders to fashion introduced by squire Thornhill.—Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield (1766).

Flame (Lord), Samuel Johnson the jester, author of Hurlo-Thrumbo, an extravaganza (1729). He dressed "in black velvet, with a white flowing periwig, and spoke sometimes in one key, and sometimes in another; danced sometimes, sometimes fiddled, and sometimes walked on stilts."

This is not Dr. Johnson, though his contemporary. The dramatist lived 1705-1773; the lexicographer lived 1709-1784.

Flammer (The Hon. Mr. Frisk), a Cantab, nephew to lord Totterly. He is a young gentleman with a vivid imagination, small income, and large debts.—Selby: The Unfinished Gentleman.

Flammock (Wilkin), a Flemish soldier and burgess at the castle of Garde Doloureuse.

Rose or Roschen Flammock, daughter of Wilkin Flammock, and attendant on lady Eveline.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Flanders (Moll), a woman of extraordinary beauty, born in Old Bailey. She was twelve years a harlot, five years a wife, twelve years a thief, and eight years a convict in Virginia; but ultimately she became rich, lived honestly, and died a penitent in the reign of Charles II. — Defoe: The Fortunes of Moll Flanders (1721).

Flanders Mare (A), Anne of Cleves, one of the wives of Henry VIII. She died at Chelsea in 1557.

Flash (Captain), a blustering, cowardly braggart, "always talking of fighting and wars." In the Flanders war he pretended to be shot, sneaked off into a ditch, and thence to England. When captain Loveit met him paying court to Miss Biddy Bellaw, he commanded the blustering coward to "deliver up his sword," and added—

"Leave this house, change the colour of your clothes and fierceness of your looks; appear from top to toe the wretch, the very wretch thou art!"—Garrick: Miss in Her Teens (1753).

Henry Woodward [1717-1777] was the best "Copper Captain," "captain Flash," and "Bobadil" of his day —Leslie: Life of Reynolds.

("Copper Captain," in Rule a Wife and Have a Wife, by Fletcher; "Bobadil," in Every Man in His Humour, by Ben Jonson.)

Flatterer. The Romans called a flatterer "a Vitellius," from Vitellius president of Syria, who worshipped Jehovah in Jerusalem, and Calig'ula in Rome. Tacitus says of him, "Exemplar apud posteros adulatorii habetur" (Annals, vi. 32).

Idem [Vitellius] miri in adulando ingenii; primus C. Cæsarem adorari ut deum instituit.—Suetonius (5 syl.): Vitel., ii.

Fla'vius, the faithful, honest steward of Timon the man-hater.—Shakespeare: Timon of Athens (1600).

Fle'ance (2 syl.), son of Banquo. After the assassination of his father, he escaped to Wales, where he married the daughter of the reigning prince, and had a son named Walter. This Walter afterwards became lord high steward of Scotland, and called himself Walter the Steward. From him proceeded in a direct line the Stuarts of Scotland, a royal line which gave James VI. of Scotland and I. of England. — Shakespeare: Macbeth (1606).

(Of course, this must not be looked on as history. Historically, there was no such person as Banquo, and therefore this descent from Fleance is mere fable.)

Flecknoe (Richard), poet-laureate to Charles II., author of dramas, poems, and other works. As a poet, his name stands on a level with Bavius and Mævius. Dryden says of him—

> . . . he reigned without dispute
> Thro' all the realms of nonsense absolute.
> Dryden: M'Flecnoe (1682)

(It was not Flecknoe but Shadwell that Dryden wished to castigate in this satire. The offence was that Dryden was removed from the post of laureate, and Shadwell appointed in his place. The angry ex-laureate says, with more point than truth, that "Shadwell never deviates into sense.")

Fledge'by (2 syl.), an over-reaching, cowardly sneak, who conceals his dirty bill-broking under the trade-name of Pubsey and Co. He is soundly thrashed by Alfred Lammle, and quietly pockets the affront. — Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1864).

Fleece (The), a poem in blank verse, divided into three books, on the subject of wool, by John Dyer (1757).

Fleece of Gold (Order of the), instituted, in 1430, by Philippe de Bourgogne, surnamed Le Bon.

Stately dames, like queens attended, knights who bore the Fleece of Gold.
Longfellow: Belfry of Bruges.

Fleecebum'pkin (3 syl.), bailiff of Mr. Ireby, the country squire.—Sir W. Scott: The Two Drovers (time, George III.).

Fleece'em (Mrs.), meant for Mrs. Rudd, a smuggler, thief, milliner, match-maker, and procuress. — Foote: The Cozeners.

Fleetwood, or The New Man of Feeling, the hero of a novel so named by W. Godwin (1805).

FLEM'ING (Archdeacon), the clergyman to whom old Meg Murdochson made her confession.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Flem'ing (Sir Malcolm), a former suitor of lady Margaret de Hautlieu.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Fleming (Lady Mary), one of the maids of honour to Mary queen of Scots. —Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Fleming (Rose), niece of Mrs. Maylie. Rose marries her cousin Harry Maylie.

She was past 17. Cast in so slight and exquisite a mould, so mild and gentle, so pure and beautiful, that earth seemed not her element, nor its rough creatures her fit companions. The very intelligence that shone in her deep blue eye . . . seemed scarcely . . . of the world, and yet the changing expression of sweetness and good-humour, the thousand lights that played about the face . . . above all the smile, the cheerful, happy smile, were made for home and fireside peace and happiness.—Dickens: Oliver Twist, xxix. (1837).

Flemish School (The), a school of painting commencing in the fifteenth century, with the brothers Van Eyck. The chief early masters were Memling, Weyden, Matsys, Mabuse, and More. The chief of the second period were Rubens, Rembrandt, Paul Potter, Cuyp, Vandyck, Snyders, Jordaens, Kaspar de Crayer, and the younger Teniers.

Fleshly School (The), a class of British poets of which Swinburne, Rossetti, Morris, etc., are exponents. So called from the sensuous character of their poetry.

(It was Thomas Maitland [i.e. R. W. Buchanan] who first gave them this appellation in the Contemporary Review.)

Fleta, a Latin treatise on English law. Author uncertain.

Fletcher (Dick), one of the crew of the pirate vessel. — Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Fleur de Marie, the betrothed of captain Phœbus — Victor Hugo: Notre Dame de Paris (1831).

Fleurant, an apothecary. He flies into a rage because Béralde (2 syl.) says to his brother, "Remettez cela à une fois, et demeurez un peu en repos." The apothecary flares out, "De quoi vous mêlez vous de vous opposer aux ordonnances de la médecine . . . je vais dire à Monsieur Purgon comme on m'a empêche d'executer ses ordres . . . Vous verrez, vous verrez."—Molière: Le Malade Imaginaire (1673).

Flib'bertigib'bet, the fiend that gives man the squint eye and hare-lip, sends mildews and blight, etc.

This is the foul fiend Flibbertigibbet . . . he gives the web and the pin [disease of the eye], squints [of] the eye, and makes the hare-lip; [he] mildews the white wheat, and hurts the poor creature of earth.—King Lear, act iii. sc. 4 (1605).

 Shakespeare got this name from bishop Harsnett's Declaration of Popish Impostures, where Flibberdigibet is one of the fiends which the Jesuits cast out of Edmund Peckham.

Flibbertigibbet or "Dickie Sludge," the dwarf grandson of Gammer Sludge (landlady of Erasmus Holiday, the schoolmaster in the vale of Whitehorse). In the entertainment given by the earl of Leicester to queen Elizabeth, Dickon Sludge acts the part of an imp.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Flim-Flams, or The Life and Errors of my Uncle, and the Amours of my Aunt, by Isaac Disraeli (1805).

Flint (Lord), chief minister of state to one of the sultans of India. He had the enviable faculty of a very short memory when he did not choose to recollect. "My people know, no doubt, but I cannot recollect," was his stock phrase.—Mrs. Inchbald: Such Things Are (1786).

Flint, jailer in The Deserter, a musical drama by Dibdin (1770).

Flint (Sir Clement), a very kind-hearted, generous old bachelor, who "trusts no one," and though he professes his undoubted belief to be "that self is the predominant principle of the human mind," is never so happy as when doing an unselfish and generous act. He settles £2000 a year on the young lord Gayville, his nephew, that he may marry Miss Alton, the lady of his choice; and says, "To reward the deserving, and make those we love happy, is self-interest in the extreme."—Burgoyne: The Heiress (1781).

Flint Jack, Edward Simpson, who used to tramp the kingdom, vending spurious flint arrow-heads, celts, and other imitation antiquities. In 1867 he was imprisoned for theft.

Flippan'ta, an intriguing lady s-maid, daughter of Mrs. Cloggit. She is in the service of Clarissa, and aids her in all her follies. — Vanbrugh: The Confederacy (1695). (See LISSARDO.)

I saw Miss Pope for the second time in the year 1790, in the character of "Flippanta."—James Smith.

Flite (Miss), a poor crazed, good-hearted woman, who has lost her wits through the "law's delay." She is always haunting the Courts of Chancery with "her documents," hoping against hope that she will receive a judgment. —Dickens: Bleak House, iv. (1852).

Flock'hart (Widow), landlady of the lodgings in the Canongate where Waverley and M'Ivor dine with the baron of Bradwardine (3 syl.).—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Flodden Field. This battle was fought September 9, 1513, and it was there that the earl of Surrey defeated the Scots. The ballad so called was written in 1664, author unknown.

Flogged by Deputy. The marquis de Leganez forbade the tutor of his son to use rigour or corporal punishment of any kind, so the tutor hit upon this device to intimidate the boy: he flogged a lad named Raphael, brought up with young Leganez as a playmate, whenever that young nobleman deserved punishment. This produced an excellent effect; but Raphael did not see its justice, and ran away.—Lesage: Gil Blas, v. i. (1724).

¶ When Henri IV. abjured the protestant faith, and was received into the Catholic Church, two ambassadors were sent to Rome as his representatives. They knelt in the portico of St. Peter's, sang the Miserere (4 syl.), and at each verse were struck with a switch on the naked shoulders. This was, by a fiction, supposed to be the penance suffered by the king for having been a protestant.

Flollo or Flollio, a Roman tribune, who held the province of Gaul under the emperor Leo. When king Arthur invaded Gaul, the tribune fled to Paris, which Arthur besieged, and Flollo proposed to decide the quarrel by single combat. To this Arthur agreed, and cleft with his sword Caliburn both the helmet and head of his adversary. Having made himself master of all Gaul, king Arthur held his court at Paris.—Geoffrey: British History, ix. 11 (1142).

And after these . . .
At Paris in the lists [Arthur] with Flollio fought;
The emperor Leon's power to raise his siege that brought.
Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

Flood (Noah's). (See RAVEN.)

Flopson, Mrs. Matthew Pocket's principal nurse.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1858).

Flor and Blancheflor, the title of a minnesong by Conrad Fleck, at one time immensely popular. It is the story of two children who fall in love with each other. There is a good deal of grace and tenderness in the tale, with an abundance of trash. Flor, the son of Feinix, a pagan king, is brought up with Blancheflor (an enfant volé). The two children love each other, but Feinix sells Blancheflor to some Eastern merchants. Flor goes in quest of Blancheflor, whom he finds in Babylon, in the palace of the sultan, who is a sorcerer. He gains access to the palace, hidden in a basket of roses; but the sultan discovers him, and is about to cast both into the flames, when, touched with human gentleness and love, he sets them free. They then return to Spain, find Feinix dead, and marry (fourteenth century).

Flo'ra, goddess of flowers. In natural history all the flowers and vegetable productions of a country or locality are called its flora; and all its animal productions its fauna.

Flora, the waiting-woman of donna Violante. In love with Lissado, the valet of don Felix.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Wonder (1714).

Mrs. Mattocks's was the most affecting theatrical leave-taking we ever witnessed. The part she chose was "Flora," to Cook's "don Felix," which she played with all the freshness and spirit of a woman in her prime.—The New Monthly (1826).

Flora, the niece of old Farmer Freehold. She is a great beauty, and captivates Heartwell, who marries her. The two are so well assorted that their "best love is after their espousals."—J. P. Kemble: The Farm-house.

Florac (Comte de), a French emigrant, courteous, extravagant, light-hearted, and vain.—Thackeray: The Newcomes (1855).

Floranthe (Donna), a lady beloved by Octavian. Octavian goes mad because he fancies Floranthe (3 syl.) is untrue to him, but Roque, a blunt, kind-hearted servitor, assures him he is mistaken, and persuades him to return home.—G. Colman: Octavian (1824).

Flor'delice (3 syl.), the mistress of Bran'dimart (king of the Distant Islands). —Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Flordespi'na, daughter of Marsiglio. —Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Florence. Mrs. Spencer Smith, daughter of baron Herbert the Austrian ambassador in England. She was born at Constantinople, during her father's residence in that city. Byron made her acquaintance in Malta, but Thomas Moore thinks his devotion was more imaginary than real. In a letter to his mother, his lordship says he "finds her [Florence] very pretty, very accomplished, and extremely eccentric."

Thou mayst find a new Calypso there.
Sweet Florence, could another ever share
This wayward, loveless heart, it would be thine.
Byron: Childe Harold, ii. 30 (1810).

Florence (The German), Dresden, also called "The Florence of the North."

Florence Dombey. (See DOMBEY.)

Florent or Florentius, a knight who promises to wed a hag if she will teach him to expound a riddle, and thus save his life.—Gower: Confessio Amantis, bk. i. (1393).

Be she foul as was Florentius' lover.
Shakspeare: Taming of the Shrew, act i. sc. v (1594).

¶ "The Wife of Bath's Tale," in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, is the same story. The ugly old hag becomes converted into a beautiful young princess, and "Florent" is called "one of Arthur's knights" (1388).

⁂ Love beautifies the plainest face.

Florentine Diamond (The), the fourth largest cut diamond in the world. It weighs 139½ carats, and was the largest diamond belonging to "Charles the Bold," duke of Burgundy. It was picked up by a Swiss peasant, who sold it to a priest for half a crown. The priest sold it for £200, to Bartholomew May of Berne. It subsequently came into the hands of pope Julius II., and the pope gave it to the emperor of Austria. (See DIAMONDS.)

Florentius. (See FLORENT.)

Flores or ISLE OF FLOWERS, one of the Azores (2 syl.). It was discovered in 1439 by Vanderberg, and is especially celebrated because it was near this isle that sir Richard Grenville, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, fought his famous sea-fight. He had only one ship with a hundred men, and was opposed by the Spanish fleet of fifty-three men-of-war. For some hours victory was doubtful, and when sir Richard was severely wounded, he wanted to sink the ship; but the Spaniards boarded it, complimented him on his heroic conduct, and he died. As the ship (the Revenge) was on its way to Spain, it was wrecked, and went to the bottom, so it never reached Spain after all. Tennyson has a poem on the subject (1878).

Flores (2 syl.), the lover of Blanchefleur.—Boccaccio: Il Filocopo (1340).

⁂ Boccaccio has repeated the tale in his Decameron, x. 5 (1352), in which Flores is called "Ansaldo," and Blanchefleur "Diano'ra." Flores and Blanchefleur, before Boccaccio's time, were noted lovers, and are mentioned as early as 1188 by Matfres Eymengau de Bezers, in his Breviari d'Amor.

Chaucer has taken the same story as the basis of the Frankelein's Tale, and Bojardo has introduced it as an episode in his Orlando Innamorato, where the lover is "Prasildo" and the lady "Tisbina." (See PRASILDO.)

The chroniclers of Charlemagne,
Of Merlin, and the Mort d'Arthure,

Flores'ki (Count), a Pole, in love with princess Lodois'ka (4 syl.). At the opening of the play he is travelling with his servant Varbel to discover where the princess has been placed by her father during the war. He falls in with the Tartar chief Kera Khan, whom he overpowers in fight, but spares his life, and thus makes him his friend. Floreski finds the princess in the castle of baron Lovinski, who keeps her a virtual prisoner; but the castle being stormed by the Tartars, the baron is slain, and the princess marries the count.—J. P. Kemble: Lodoiska.

Flo'rez, son of Gerrard king of the beggars. He assumes the name of Goswin, and becomes, in Bruges, a wealthy merchant. His mistress is Bertha, the supposed daughter of Vandunke the burgomaster.—Fletcher: The Beggars' Bush (1622).

Flor'ian, "the foundling of the forest," discovered in infancy by the count De Valmont, and adopted as his own son. Florian is light-hearted and volatile, but with deep affection, very brave, and the delight of all who know him. He is betrothed to his cousin, lady Geraldine, a ward of count De Valmont.—Dimond: The Foundling of the Forest.

Flor'imel "the Fair," courted by sir Sat'yrane, sir Per'idure, and sir Cal'idore (each 3 syl.), but she herself "loved none but Mar'inel," who cared not for her. When Marinel was overthrown by Britomart, and was reported to be dead, Florimel resolved to search into the truth of this rumour. In her wanderings, she came weary to the hut of a hag, but when she left the hut the hag sent a savage monster to bring her back. Florimel, however, jumped into a boat and escaped; but she fell into the hands of Proteus (2 syl.), who kept her in a dungeon "deep in the bottom of a huge great rock." One day, Marinel and his mother went to a banquet given by Proteus to the sea-gods; and as Marinel was loitering about, he heard the captive bemoaning her hard fate, and all "for love of Marinel." His heart was touched; he resolved to release the prisoner, and obtained from his mother a warrant of release, signed by Neptune himself. Proteus did not dare to disobey; so the lady was released, and became the happy bride of her liberator.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 4, 8, and iv. 11, 12 (1590, 1596).

(The name Florimel means "honey-flower.")

Florimel (The False), made by a witch of Riphæ'an snow and virgin wax, with an infusion of vermilion. Two burning lamps in silver sockets served for eyes, fine gold wire for locks, and for soul "a sprite that had fallen from heaven." Braggadoccio, seeing this false Florimel, carried "her" off as the veritable Florimel; but when she was stripped of her borrowed plumes, this waxen Florimel vanished into thin air, leaving nothing behind except the "golden girdle that was about her waist."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 8 and v. 3 (1590, 1596).

Florimel's Girdle, a girdle which gave to those who wore it "the virtue of chaste love and wifehood true;" if any woman not chaste or faithful put it on, it immediately "loosed or tore asunder." It was once the cestus of Venus; but when that queen of beauty wantoned with Mars, it fell off and was left on the "Acidalian mount."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 2 (1596).

¶ One day, sir Cambel, sir Triamond, sir Paridel, sir Blandamour, and sir Ferramont agreed to give Florimel's girdle to the most beautiful lady; when the previous question was moved, "Who was the most beautiful?" Of course, each knight, as in duty bound, adjudged his own lady to be the paragon of women, till the witch's image of snow and wax, made to represent Florimel, was produced, when all agreed that it was without peer, and so the girdle was handed to "the false Florimel." On trying it on, however, it would in no wise fit her; and when by dint of pains it was at length fastened, it instantly loosened and fell to the ground. It would fit Amoret exactly, and of course Florimel, but not the witch's thing of snow and wax.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 5 (1596).

¶ Morgan la Fée sent king Arthur a horn, out of which no lady could drink "who was not to herself or to her husband true." Ariosto's enchanted cup possessed a similar spell.

¶ A boy showed king Arthur a mantle which no wife not leal could wear. If any unchaste wife or maiden put it on, it would either go to shreds or refuse to drape her decorously.

¶ At Ephesus was a grotto containing a statue of Diana. If a chaste wife or maiden entered, a reed there (presented by Pan) gave forth most melodious sounds; but if the unfaithful or unchaste entered, its sounds were harsh and discordant.

¶ Alasnam's mirror remained unsullied when it reflected the unsullied; but became dull when the unchaste stood before it. (See CARADOC, p. 177.)

Florin'da, daughter of count Julian one of the high lords in the Gothic court of Spain. She was violated by king Roderick; and the count, in his indignation, renounced the Christian religion and called over the Moors, who came to Spain in large numbers and drove Roderick from the throne. Orpas, the renegade archbishop of Sev'ille, asked Florinda to become his bride, but she shuddered at the thought. Roderick, in the guise of a priest, reclaimed count Julian as he was dying, and as Florinda rose from the dead body—

> Her cheek was flushed, and in her eyes there beamed
> A wilder brightness. On the Goth [Roderick] she gazed,
> While underneath the emotions of that hour
> Exhausted life gave way. . . . Round his neck she threw
> Her arms, and cried, "My Roderick; mine in heaven!"
> Groaning, he clasp't her close, and in that act
> And agony her happy spirit fled.
> Southey: Roderick, etc., xxiv. (1814).

Flo'ripes (3 syl.), sister of sir Fierabras [Fe-a'-ra-brah], daughter of Laban, and wife of Guy the nephew of Charlemagne.

Florisan'do (The Exploits and Adventures of), part of the series of Le Roman des Romans, or those pertaining to Am'adis of Gaul. This part (from bk. vi. to xiv.) was added by Paez de Ribëra.

Florise (The lady), attendant on queen Berengaria.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Flor'isel of Nice'a (The Exploits and Adventures of), part of the series of Le Roman des Romans, pertaining to Am'adis of Gaul. This part was added by Felicino de Silva.

Flor'ismart, one of Charlemagne's paladins, and the bosom friend of Roland.

Florival (Mdlle.), daughter of a French physician in Belleisle. She fell in love with major Belford, while nursing him in her father's house during a period of sickness. (The tale is given under EMILY, p. 323.)—Colman: The Deuce is in Him (1762).

Flor'izel, son of Polixenês king of Bohemia. In a hunting expedition, he saw Perdîta (the supposed daughter of a shephed), fell in love with her, and courted her under the assumed name of Dor'iclês. The king tracked his son to the shepherd's house, and told Perdita that if she gave countenance to this foolery he would order her and the shepherd to be put to death. Florizel and Perdita then fled from Bohemia, and took refuge in Sicily. Being brought to the court of king Leontês, it soon became manifest that Perdita was the king's daughter. Polixenês, in the mean time, had tracked his son to Sicily, but when he was informed that Perdita was the king's daughter, his objection to the marriage ceased, and Perdita became the happy bride of prince Florizel.—Shakespeare: The Winter's Tale (1604).

Florizel, the name assumed by George IV. in his correspondence with Mrs. Robinson (actress and poetess), generally known as Per'dita, that being the character in which she first attracted his attention when prince of Wales.

 George IV. was nicknamed "prince Florizel." "Prince Florizel" in lord Beaconsfield's Endymion (1880) is meant for Napoleon III.

Flower of Chivalry, sir William Douglas, knight of Liddesdale (*–1353). Sir Philip Sidney, statesman, poet, and soldier, was also called "The Flower of Chivalry" (1554–1586). So was the Chevalier de Bayard, le Chevalier sans Peur et sans Reproche (1476–1524).

Flower of Kings. Arthur is so called by John of Exeter (sixth century).

Flower of Poets, Geoffrey Chaucer (1328–1400).

Flower of the Lev'ant. Zantê is so called from its great beauty and fertility.

> Zante! Zante! flor di Levanti.

Flower of Yarrow (The), Mary Scott, daughter of sir William Scott of Harden.

Flowers (Lovers') are stated by Spenser, in his Shepheardes Calendar, to be "the purple columbine, gilliflowers, carnations, and sops in wine" ("April").

In the "language of flowers," columbine signifies "folly," gilliflowers "bonds of love," carnations "pure love," and sops of wine (one of the carnation family) "woman's love."

> Bring hither the pinks, and purple columbine,
> With gilliflowers;
> Bring coronations, and sops in wine,
> Worne of paramours.
> Spenser: The Shepheardes Calendar ("April," 1579).

Flower Sermon, a sermon preached every Whit Monday in St. Catherine Cree. On this occasion each of the congregation carries a bunch of flowers, and a bunch of flowers is also laid on the pulpit cushion. The Flower Sermon is not now limited to St. Catherine Cree, other churches have adopted the custom.

Flowerdale (Sir John), father of Clarissa, and the neighbour of colonel Oldboy.—Bickerstaff: Lionel and Clarissa.

Flowered Robes. In ancient Greece to say "a woman wore flowered robes" was the same as to say she was a fille publique. Solon made t a law that virtuous women should appear in simple and modest apparel, but that harlots should always dress in gay and flowered robes.

As fugitive slaves are known by their stigmata, so flowered garments indicate one of the demi-monde [μοιχαλίδα].—Clemens of Alexandria.

Flowery Kingdom (The), China. The Chinese call their kingdom Hwa Kwoh, which means "The Flowery Kingdom," i.e. the flower of kingdoms.

Fluel'len, a Welsh captain and great pedant, who, amongst other learned quidities, drew this parallel between Henry V. and Alexander the Great: "One was born in Monmouth and the other in Macedon, both which places begin with M, and in both a river flowed."—Shakespeare: Henry V. act iv. sc. 7 (1599).

Flur, the bride of Cassivelaun, "for whose love the Roman Cæsar first invaded Britain."—Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("Enid").

Flute, the bellows-mender, who in the travestie of Piramus and Thisby had to take the part of Thisbe.

Flute: What is Thisbe? a wandering knight?
Quince: It is the lady Pyramus must love.
Flute: Nay, faith, let not me play a woman; I have a beard coming.—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, act i. sc. 1 (1592).

Flute (The Magic), a flute which has the power of inspiring love. When given by the powers of darkness, the love it inspires is sensual love; but when bestowed by the powers of light, it becomes subservient to the very holiest ends. In the opera called Die Zauberflöte, Tamī'no and Pamī'na are guided by it through all worldly dangers to the knowledge of divine truth (or the mysteries of Isis).—Mozart: Die Zauberflöte (1791).

Flutter, a gossip, fond of telling a good story, but, unhappily, unable to do so without a blunder. "A good-natured, insignificant creature, admitted everywhere, but cared for nowhere" (act i. sc. 3).—Mrs. Cowley: The Belle's Stratagem (1780).

Flutter (Sir Fopling), the hero in Etheridge's comedy of The Man of Mode (1676).

Fly Painted (A). The quondam shepherd lad Giotto had not been long under his master Cimabue, when he painted a fly on the nose of a head so true to nature that Cimabue tried to brush it off. (See BEE PAINTED. See also ZEUXIS AND PARRHASIOS.)

Fly-gods, Beelzebub, a god of the Philistines, supposed to ward off flies. Achor was worshipped by the Cyrēneans for a similar object. Zeus Apomy'ios was the fly-god of the Greeks.

On the east side of your shop, aloft,
Write Mathlai, Tarmael, and Baraḥ'orat;
Upon the north part, Rael, Velel, Thiel.
They are the names of those mercurial spirites
That do fright flies from boxes.
Ben Jonson: The Alchemist, i. (1610).

Flying Dutchman (The), a phantom ship, seen in stormy weather off the Cape of Good Hope, and thought to forebode ill luck. The legend is that it was a vessel laden with precious metal, but a horrible murder having been committed on board, the plague broke out among the crew, and no port would allow the ship to enter, so it was doomed to float about like a ghost, and never to enjoy rest.—Sir W. Scott.

∴ Another legend is that a Dutch captain, homeward bound, met with long-continued head winds off the Cape; but swore he would double the Cape and not put back, if he strove till the day of doom. He was taken at his word, and there he still beats, but never succeeds in rounding the point.

(Captain Marryat has a novel founded on this legend, called The Phantom Ship, 1836.)

Flying Highwayman, William Harrow, who leaped his horse over turnpike gates as if it had been furnished with wings. He was executed in 1763.

Flyter (Mrs.), landlady of the lodgings occupied by Frank Osbaldistone in Glasgow.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Fœdera (The), the public acts between the kings of England and other royal personages. It also contains the Magna Charta, numerous benefactions, and other documents. Dr. Adam Clarke was employed to carry the original work back to the Conquest. Rymer was the compiler of fifteen folio volumes (1638–1714). Robert Sanderson added five more. The Hague edition was published in ten volumes folio, and Stephen Whatley translated it into English in 1731.

Foible, the intriguing lady's-maid of lady Wishfort, and married to Waitwell (lackey of Edward Mirabell). She interlards her remarks with "says he," "he says says he," "she says says she," etc.—Congreve: The Way of the World (1700).

Fol'gard (Father), one of a gang of thieves. He pretends to be a French priest, but "his French shows him to be English, and his English shows him to be Irish."—Farquhar: The Beaux' Stratagem (1705).

Foker (Henry), son of lady Foker. He marries Blanche Amory.—Thackeray: Pendennis (1850).

Folair' (2 syl.), a pantomimist at the Portsmouth Theatre, under the management of Mr. Vincent Crummles.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Foldath, general of the Fir-bolg or Belgæ in the south of Ireland. In the epic called Tem'ora, Cathmor is the "lord of Atha," and Foldath is his general. He is a good specimen of the savage chieftain: bold and daring, but presumptuous, overbearing, and cruel. "His stride is haughty, and his red eye rolls in wrath." Foldath looks with scorn on Hidalla, a humane and gentle officer in the same army, for his delight is strife, and he exults over the fallen. In counsel Foldath is imperious, and contemptuous to those who differ from him. Unrelenting in revenge; and even when he falls with his death-wound, dealt by Fillan the son of Fingal, he feels a sort of pleasure that his ghost would hover in the blast, and exult over the graves of his enemies. Foldath had one child, a daughter, the blue-eyed Dardu-Le'na, the last of the race.—Ossian: Temora.

Folio (Tom), Thomas Rawlinson, a bibliopolist, who flourished about 1681–1725.—The Tatler.

Fon'dlewife, an uxorious banker.—Congreve: The Old Bachelor (1693).

When Mrs. Jefferson [1733–1776] was asked in what characters she excelled the most, she innocently replied, "In old men, like 'Fondlewife' and 'sir Jealous Traffic.'"—T. Davies.

("Sir Jealous Traffic" is in The Busy Body, by Mrs. Centlivre.)

Fondlove (Sir William), a vain old baronet of 60, who fancies himself a schoolboy, capable of playing boyish games, dancing, or doing anything that young men do. "How marvellously I wear! What signs of age have I? I'm certainly a wonder for my age. I walk as well as ever. Do I stoop? Observe the hollow of my back. As now I stand, so stood I when a child, a rosy, chubby boy. My arm is firm as 'twas at 20. Oak, oak, isn't it? Think you my leg is shrunk?—not in the calf a little? When others waste, 'tis growing-time with me. Vigour, sir, vigour, in every joint. Could run, could leap. Why shouldn't I marry?" So thought sir William of sir William, and he married the Widow Green, a buxom dame of 40 summers.—Knowles: The Love-Chase (1837).

Fontainebleau (Decree of), an edict passed by Napoleon I., ordering all English goods wherever found to be ruthlessly burnt (October 18, 1810).

Fontara'bia, now called Fuenterabia (in Latin Fons rapidus), near the gulf of Gascony. Here Charlemagne and all his chivalry fell by the sword of the "Spanish Saracens."—Mariana.

 Mezeray says that the rear of the king's army being cut off, Charlemagne returned and obtained a brilliant revenge.

Fool (A Royal). James I. of Great Britain was called by Sully of France "The Most Learned Fool in Christendom" (1566–1625).

Fool (The), in Shakespeare's King Lear, a wise counsellor in disguised idiotcy.

Fool (The), in the ancient morris-dance, represented the court jester. He carried in his hand a yellow bauble, and wore on his head a hood with ass's ears, the top of the hood rising into the form of a cock's neck and head, with a belt at the extreme end. The hood was blue edged with yellow and scalloped, the doublet red edged with yellow, the girdle yellow, the hose of one leg yellow and of the other blue, shoes red. (See MORRIS-DANCE.)

Fool of Quality (The), a novel by Henry Brooke (1766).

Fools. Pays de Fous. Ghent, in Belgium, is so called, because it has been for many years the Bedlam of Belgium.

Battersea is also a pays de fous, from a pun. Simples used to be grown there largely for the London apothecaries, and hence the expression, You must go to Battersea to get your simples cut.

 Bœotia was considered by the Athenians the pays de fous of Greece. Arcadia was also a folly-land; hence Arcades ambo ("both noodles alike").

Fools, Jesters, and Mirthmen.

In the following list, those in italics were mirthmen, but not licensed fools or jesters.

ADELSBURN (Burkard Kaspar), jester to George I. He was not only a fun-maker, but also a ghostly adviser of the Hanoverian.

AKSAKOFF, the fool of czarina Elizabeth of Russia (mother of Peter II.). He was a stolid brute, fond of practical jokes.

ANGELY (L.), jester to Louis XIV., and last of the licensed fools of France. He is mentioned by Boileau in Satires i. and viii.

AOPI (Monsignore), who succeeded Soglia as the merryman of Pope Gregory XVI.

ARMSTRONG (Archie), jester in the courts of James I. and Charles I. One of the characters in Scott's novel The Fortunes of Nigel. Being condemned to death by king James for sheep-stealing, Archie implored that he might live till he had read his Bible through for his soul's weal. This was granted, and Archie rejoined, with a sly look, "Then de'il tak' me 'gin I ever read a word on't!"

BERDIC, "joculator" to William the Conqueror. Three towns and five caracutes in Gloucestershire were given him by the king.

BLURT D'ARBERES (seventeenth century), fool to the duke of Mantua. During a pestilence, he conceived the idea of offering his life as a ransom for his countrymen, and actually starved himself to death to stay the plague.

BONNY (Patrick), jester to the regent Morton.

Borde (Andrew), usually called "Merry Andrew," physician to Henry VIII. (1500–1549).

BRUSQUET. Of this court fool Brantôme says, "He never had his equal in repartee" (1518–1569).

Caillet (Guillaume), who flourished about 1490. His likeness is given in the frontispiece of the Ship of Fools (1497).

CHICOT, jester of Henri III. and Henri IV. Alexandre Dumas has a novel called Chicot the Jester (1553–1591).

COLQUHOUN (Jemmy), predecessor of James Geddes, jester in the court of Mary queen of Scots.

Coryat, "prince of non-official jesters and coxcombs." Kept by prince Henry, brother of Charles I.

COULON, doctor and jester to Louis XVIII. He was the very prince of mimics. He sat for the portraits of Thiers, Molé, and comte Joseph de Villèle (died 1858).

DA'GONET (Sir), jester to king Arthur. He was knighted by the king himself.

DERRIE, a court jester to James I. Contemporary with Thom.

DUFRESNOY, poet, playwright, actor, gardener, glass-manufacturer, spendthrift, wit, and honorary fool to Louis XIV. His jests are the "Joe Millers" of France.

GEDDES (James), jester in the court of Mary queen of Scots. He was daft, and followed Jemmy Colquhoun in the motley.

GLORIEUX (Le), jester of Charles le Hardi, of Burgundy.

GONELLA, domestic jester of the duke of Ferrara. His jests are in print. Gonella used to ride a horse all skin and bone, which is spoken of in Don Quixote.

HAFOD (Jack), a retainer in the house of Mr. Bartlett, of Castlemorton, Worcestershire. He died at the close of the eighteenth century, and has given birth to the expression, "As big a fool as Jack Hafod." He was the ultimus scurrarum in Great Britain.

HEYWOOD (John), author of numerous dramatic works (1499–1595).

Jean (Seigni), or "Old John;" so called to distinguish him from Jean or Johan, called Le Fol de Madame (fl. 1380).

JOHAN, Le Fol de Madame, mentioned by Marot in his epitaphs.

Johnson (S.), familiarly known as "lord Flame," the character he played in his own extravaganza Hurlo-Thrumbo (1729).

Kyaw (General), a Saxon general, famous for his broad jests.

KILLIGREW (Thomas), called "king Charles's jester" (1611–1682).

LONGELY, jester to Louis XIII.

NARR (Klaus), jester to Frederick "the Wise," elector of Prussia.

PACE.

PATCH, court fool of Elizabeth wife of Henry VII.

PATCHE, cardinal Wolsey's jester. The cardinal made Henry VIII. a present of this "wise fool," and the king returned word that "the gift was a most acceptable one."

PATISON, licensed jester to sir Thomas More. He is introduced by Hans Holbein in his famous picture of the lord chancellor.

Paul (Jacob), baron Gundling. This merryman was laden with titles in ridicule by Frederick William I. of Prussia.

PEARCE (Dickie), fool of the earl of Suffolk. Dean Swift wrote an epitaph on him.

RAYERE, court jester to Henry I. of England.

ROSEN (Kuno von der), a private jester to the emperor Maximilian I.

SCOGAN, court jester to Edward IV.

SOGLIA (Cardinal), the fun-maker of pope Gregory XVI. He was succeeded by Aopi.

SOMERS (Will), court jester to Henry VIII. The effigy of this jester is at Hampton Court. And in Old Fish Street was once a public-house called Will Somers's tavern (1490–1560).

STEHLIN (Professor), in the household of czarina Elizabeth of Russia. He was teacher of mathematics and history to the grand-duke (Peter II.), and was also his licensed buffoon.

Tarleton (Richard), the famous clown and jester in the reign of queen Elizabeth, but not attached either to the court or to any nobleman (1530–1588).

THOM, one of the court jesters of James I. Contemporary with Derrie.

TRIBOULET, court jester to Louis XII. and François I. (1487–1536). Licinio the rival of Titian, took his likeness, which is still extant.

WALLETT (W. F.), court jester to queen Victoria. He styles himself "the queen's jester," but doubtlessly has no warrant for the title from the lord chamberlain.

WALTER, jester to queen Elizabeth.

WILL, "my lord of Leicester's jesting player;" but who this "Will" was is not known. It might be Will Johnson, Will Sly, Will Kimp, or even Will Shakespeare.

YORICK, jester in the court of Denmark. Referred to by Shakespeare in his Hamlet, act v. sc. 1.

(Dr. Doran published The History of Court Fools, in 1858.)

Fools' Paradise, unlawful pleasure; illicit love; vain hopes; the limbus fatuorum or paradise of idiots and fools.

> If ye should lead her into a fools' paradise, it were a gross . . . behaviour.—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, act ii. sc. 4 (1597).

Foot. The foot of an Arab is noted for its arch, and hence Tennyson speaks of the "delicate Arab arch of [Maud's] feet."—Maud, xvi. 1.

Foot-breadth, the sword of Thorulf Skolinson "the Strong" of Norway.

Quern-biter of Hakon the Good,
Wherewith at a stroke he hewed
The millstone thro' and thro';
And Foot-breadth of Thoralf "the Strong!"—
Were not so broad, nor yet so long,
Nor was their edge so true.
Longfellow.

Fopling Flutter (Sir), "the man of mode," the chief character of a comedy by sir George Etherege, entitled The Man of Mode, or Sir Fopling Flutter (1676).

Foppery. Vespasian the Roman emperor had a contempt for foppery. When certain young noblemen came to him smelling of perfumes, he said to them, "You would have pleased me more if you had smelt of garlic."

¶ Charlemagne had a similar contempt of foppery. One day, when he was hunting, the rain poured down in torrents, and the fine furs and silks of his suite were utterly spoilt. The king took this occasion to rebuke the court beaux for their vanity in dress, and advised them in future to adopt garments more simple and more serviceable.

Foppington (Lord), an empty-headed coxcomb, intent only on dress and fashion. His favourite oaths, which he brings out with a drawl, are: "Strike me dumb!" "Split my windpipe!" and so on. When he loses his mistress, he consoles himself with this reflection: "Now, for my part, I think the wisest thing a man can do with an aching heart is to put on a serene countenance; for a philosophical air is the most becoming thing in the world to the face of a person of quality."—Vanbrugh: The Relapse (1697).

The shoemaker in The Relapse tells lord Foppington that his lordship is mistaken in supposing that his shoe pinches.—Macaulay.

Foppington (Lord), elder brother of Tom Fashion. A selfish coxcomb, engaged to be married to Miss Hoyden, daughter of sir Tunbelly Clumsy, to whom he is personally unknown. His favourite oaths are: "Strike me dumb!" "Strike me ugly!" "Stap my vitals!" "Split my windpipe!" "Rat me!" etc.; and, in speaking, his affectation is to change the vowel o into a, as rat, naw, resalve, waurld, ardered, mauth, paund, maunth, lang, philasapher, tarture, and so on. (See CLUMSY, p. 221.)—Sheridan: A Trip to Scarborough (1777).

(This comedy is The Relapse, slightly altered and curtailed.)

Foppington (Lord), a young married man about town, most intent upon dress and fashion, whose whole life is consumed in the follies of play and seduction. His favourite oaths are: "Sun, burn me!" "Curse, catch me!" "Stap my breath!" "Let me blood!" "Run me through!" "Strike me stupid!" "Knock me down!" He is reckoned the king of all court fops.—Colley Cibber: The Careless Husband (1704).

Macklin says, "Nature formed Colley Cibber for a coxcomb . . . and his predominant tendency was to be considered among men as a leader of fashion, and among women as a beau garçon. Hence . . . his 'lord Foppington' was a model for dress, and that hauteur and nonchalance which distinguished the superior coxcombs of that day."—Percy: Anecdotes.

Ford, a gentleman of fortune living at Windsor. He assumes the name of Brook, and being introduced to sir John Falstaff, the knight informs him "of his whole course of wooing," and how at one time he eluded Mrs. Ford's jealous husband by being carried out before his eyes in a buck-basket of dirty linen.—Merry Wives of Windsor, act iii. sc. 5.

Mrs. Ford, wife of Mr. Ford. Sir John Falstaff pays court to her, and she pretends to accept his protestations of love, in order to expose and punish him. Her husband assumes for the nonce the name of Brook, and sir John tells him from time to time the progress of his suit, and how he succeeds in duping her fool of a husband.—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor (1596).

For'delis (3 syl.), wife of Bran'dimart (Orlando's intimate friend). When Brandimart was slain, Fordelis dwelt for a time in his sepulchre in Sicily, and died broken-hearted. (See FOURDELIS.)—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, bk. xii. (1516).

Forehead. A high forehead was at one time deemed a mark of beauty in women; hence Felice, the wife of Guy of Warwick, is described as having "the same high forehead as Venus."—History of Guy of Warwick.

Fore'sight (2 syl.), a mad, superstitious old man, who "consulted the stars, and believed in omens, portents, and predictions." He referred "man's goatish disposition to the charge of a star," and says he himself was "born when the Crab was ascending, so that all his affairs in life have gone backwards."

I know the signs, and the planets, and their houses; can judge of motions, direct and retrograde, of nextiles, quadrates, trines, and oppositions, fiery trigons and aquatic trigons. Know whether life shall be long or short, happy or unhappy; whether diseases are curable or incurable; if journeys shall be prosperous, undertakings successful, or stolen goods recovered.—Congreve: Love for Love, ii. (1695).

Forest (The), fifteen lyrics by Ben Jonson (1616). It contains the celebrated one—Drink to me only with thine eyes.

Forester (Sir Philip), a libertine knight. He goes in disguise to lady Bothwell's ball on his return from the Continent, but, being recognized, decamps.

Lady Jemima Forester, wife of sir Philip, who goes with her sister lady Bothwell to consult "the enchanted mirror," in which they discover the clandestine marriage and infidelity of sir Philip.—Sir W. Scott: Aunt Margaret's Mirror (time, William III.).

Forgers and Forgeries (Literary).

(1) Acta Pilâta. An apocryphal report of the Crucifixion, said to have been sent by Pontius Pilate to Tiberius the Roman emperor.

AMBER WITCH (The). (See under REINHOLD.)

(2) Annals of Tacitus (The). Said to be a forgery of Poggio Bracciolini, apostolic to eight popes (1381-1459). It is said that Cosmo de Medici agreed to pay him 500 gold sequins (about £160) for his trouble. We are further told that Poggio's MS. is still in the library of Florence, and that it was published in 1460. Johannes de Spire produced the last six books, but the work is still incomplete. In confirmation of this tale it is added "that no writer has quoted from the Annals before the close of the sixteenth century." The title "Annals of Tacitus" was given to Poggio's book by Beatus Rhenanus in 1553.

Whether these assertions are true or not, it is very generally admitted that the famous quotation paraded by Paley in his Evidences (chap. ii.) is not genuine. It speaks of Christ being crucified by Pilate, and the persecutions of the early Christians (Annals, xv. 44).

(3) ANNIUS of Viterbo (or Giovanni Nanni) (1432-1502). His Antiquitâtum Variorum Volumina, xvii. (1498) professes to be selections from Berosius, Manêtho, Megasthenes (4 syl.), Archilocus, Myrsiles (3 syl.), Fabius Pictor, Sempronius, Cato, etc.; but the pretended selections are fabrications.

(4) Apocryphal Scriptures. These are very numerous, but the best known are "The Revelation of Peter," the "Epistle of Barnabas," the "Institutions of the Apostles," the "Gospel according to the Hebrews," the "Gospel of Peter" (said to be of the second century), the "Gospel" and the "Acts of Thomas," the "Acts of the Apostles by Andrew," the "Acts of the Apostles by John," the "Gnostic Scriptures," etc.

Irenæus (bk. I. 17) tells us that the Gnostics the second century, had an innumerable number of spurious books; and that in the following age the number greatly increased. In the fourth century there were at least eighty Gospels.

(5) Apostolic Constitutions (The). A collection of ecclesiastical laws attributed to St. Clemens, a disciple of St. Peter, but pronounced to be forgeries by the Council of Constantinople in 690.

(6) BERTRAM (Dr. Charles Julius), professor of English at Copenhagen. He gave out that he had discovered, in 1747, in the library of that city, a book entitled De Situ Britanniæ, with the "Diaphragmata" (or Itinerary), by Richardus Corinensis. He published this with two other treatises (one by Gildas Badon'icus, and the other by Nennius Banchorensis), in 1757. The forgery was exposed by the Rev. J. E. Mayor, in his preface to Ricardi de Cirencestria Speculum Historiale.

It is said that the style and Latinity of Bertram's book are inconsistent with the time of Richard of Cirencester. He may possibly have based his forgeries on some chronicles and itineraries; but he has mutilated them, and falsified them by variations and additions of his own.

(7) BOECE (Hector), in his Scotorum Historia (1520), has forged the names of forty-five Scottish kings, with which he interpolated the Irish list of the Dalriadic rulers (that is, the kings of Argyllshire).

(8) CAGLIOSTRO (Count of). Alexandro de Cagliostro was certainly the most unblushing literary impostor that ever lived (1745-1795). He stole the novels of John Potocki, a Polish count, and published them as his own. The National ferreted out this and all his other impositions. His name has become a by-word of literary quacks.

(9) CHASLES FORGERIES (The). M. Chasles, a member of the French Academy of Sciences, gave out that he had purchased 27,000 MSS. for £5000; but he refused to tell where he bought them, lest (as he said) "others might go and spoil the market." Amongst these MSS. were: "A correspondence between Alexander the Great and Aristides" (4 syl.); several "letters of Attila" (king of the Huns); a letter from the "widow of Martin Luther;" several letters from "Judas Iscariot to Mary Magdalene;" others from "Lazarus to St. Peter." In regard to England, he produced a faded yellow MS. which purported to be letters from Pascal to sir Isaac Newton, to prove that Newton had pilfered his system of gravitation. This MS. he asserted belonged to the abbey of Tours, came into the possession of comte de Boisjourdain, who in 1791 was wrecked on his passage to America. The MS. was sold, and the buyer gave it to M. Chasles. Another letter was from Galileo, and stated that the law of gravitation was known and taught by him. A committee examined into these matters, when it was discovered that the whole was the forgery of a poor tool named Vrain Lucas.

(10) Christian Forgeries (The) of Brahmanic writings, printed in French at Yoerdun, in 1778, imposed even on Voltaire. A Carmelite missionary justifies the forgery, as the object is laudable.

 Similarly, the manifest forgeries in the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandistes are justified. Probably many of these were invented by the "readers" appointed to distract the attention of their fraternity at meal-times.

(11) CHURCH FORGERIES. Mosheim says, "Acts of councils, records, epistles, and whole books were forged by zealous monks, in order the more easily to rob and plunder the credulous on whom they imposed their glaring absurdities." Certainly some of the things told by the Bollandistes amply justify this startling indictment. Witness that of the "pilgrims of Compostella," told in the Acta Sanctorum, repeated by Mgr. Guerin, the pope's chaplain, in 1880, by Udal, in his Tour through Spain and Portugal, by Patrick, in his Parables of the Pilgrims (vol. xxxvii. 430, 431), and by many others. The short and long of the tale is that two roast chickens, a cock and a hen, were served at an alcaid's table, and, in order to testify to the truth of a statement told to him, jumped up alive, and all their feathers flew into the room and covered them with plumage. The two fowls were sent to Compostella, where every year they generated exactly two fowls, a cock and a hen, and then died. Pilgrims still go to Compostella to see these wonderful fowls, and, no matter how many pilgrims, each receives a feather, but the tale of feathers is not diminished. Marineus Siculus says, "Hæc Ego testor, propterea vide et interfui" (Scriptores, vol. ii. p. 805); and in allusion to this extravaganza St. Dominic of Calzada, in 1169, was represented with a cock and hen in his right hand. The axiom was, the more improbable the tale, the greater the miracle.

(12) CHATTERTON (Thomas), in 1777, published certain poems, which he affirmed were written in the fifteenth century by Thomas Rowley, a monk. The poets Gray and Mason exposed the forgery.

His other literary forgeries were: (1) The Pedigree of Burgum (a Bristol pewterer), professed to have been discovered in the muniment-room of St. Mary's Church, Redcliffe. He accordingly printed a history of the "De Bergham" family, with a poem called The Romaunt of the Cnyghte, by John de Bergham (fourteenth century). (2) A forged account of the opening of the old bridge, signed "Dunhelmus Bristolensis," and professing to have been copied from an old MS. (3) An Account of Bristol, by Turgotus, "translated out of Saxon into English, by T. Rowley." This forgery was made for the use of Mr. Catcott, who was writing a history of Bristol.

(13) Clementi'na. A spurious account of the journeys of Clemens Romānus with the apostle Peter. The Apostolic Canons and Constitutions attributed to him are also spurious. Clemens is said to have died in 102.

(14) Clementines (The). Nineteen discourses preceded by two letters. One of the letters is from St. Peter to St. James (bishop of Jerusalem), the other is from Clemens to the same. The "discourses" are spurious Christian stories. On these forgeries rest the main evidence that the apostle Peter was bishop of Rome.

What is generally understood by Clementines (3 syl.), is the third part of the Decretals of Raimond de Pennafort, with the rescript of Boniface VIII., undertaken by order of pope Clement V. The Clementines of Clement are apocryphal homilies.

(15) Codex Diplomaticus. (See under VELLA.)

(16) Croyland Abbey. The Historia Monasterii Croylandensis was at one time supposed to be written by Ingulph abbot of Croyland, in Lincolnshire (born 1030–1109); but sir Francis Palgrave, in the Quarterly Review of 1826, proved that the said history was a pure romance, composed by some monk in the thirteenth or fourteenth century.

(17) Decretals (False) (A.D. 835–845). A shameless forgery, purporting to be fifty-nine rescripts of bishops in the first four centuries, signed by such names as St. Anaclētus (who died 78), St. Alexander (who died 109), St. Fabian (who died 236), Julius (who died 837), and St.

Athanasius (who died 373). The object of these false Decretals is to diminish the authority of metropolitans over their suffragans, by establishing an appellant jurisdiction of the Roman see in all causes; and by forbidding national councils to be held without its consent. Every bishop is made amenable only to the tribunal of the pope. Every accused person might appeal to the pope from any civil sentence; the pope only could make new sees, or translate from one to another. Upon these spurious Decretals has been built up the great fabric of papal supremacy. Knoch says that these false Decretals "produced enormous changes in the Roman hierarchy, doctrine, and discipline; and that they have raised the authority of the pope to an incalculable extent."

They were proved to be forgeries by Nicolas Cusanus, in 1452; by Laurentius Valla in 1457; by Cusanus in 1586; and by Blondel in 1628. At length pope Pius VI., in 1789, had the honesty and courage to pronounce the author Impostor nequissimus, and the Decretals infamous forgeries. But they had served their purpose.

The author was either Isidore Mercator or Precator (a Cenobite), Benedict Levita of Mentz, or Riculfe (archbishop of Mentz). As they were called "Isidorian Decretals," probably Isidore Mercator was the author, and he wished his name "Isidore" to be mistaken for St. Isidore of Seville, who lived 570–636, i.e. about 200 years previously.

(18) Eikon Basilikè [I-kon Bă-sil-i-ke], published 1649. At one time attributed to Charles I. But John Gauden, writing to the bishop of Exeter, says the "book is wholly and solely my own invention." It contains a minute account of the king's trial. (See an article on the subject in the Nineteenth Century, February, 1891, p. 327.)

(19) English Mercurie (The), (1588). Once considered to be the oldest English newspaper; but in 1839 Thomas Watts, of the British Museum, published a pamphlet demonstrating it to be an impudent forgery, as the paper on which it is printed bears the Hanoverian arms with the initials G. R. (George Rex).

See an article on the subject in the Nineteenth Century, February, 1891, p. 334.

(20) Ignatian Controversy (The). The question is whether the works attributed to Ignatius, bishop of Antioch and martyr (115), are genuine and authentic or not. Daille, Semler, Hermann, Ernesti, Neander, and several other great scholars tell us "that much is spurious, and the rest has been greatly tampered with."

It is a very sad thing, but undoubtedly true, that no history or church literature which passed through the hands of the monk can be relied on.

(21) ILIVE (Jacob), in 1751, published the Book of Jasher, which the Monthly Review, in December the same year, proved to be a forgery.

The Book of Jasher is twice referred to in the Old Testament: in Josh. x. 13 and in 2 Sam. i. 18.

(22) IRELAND (S. W. H.) published, in folio, 1796, Miscellaneous Papers and Instruments, under the hand and seal of William Shakespeare, including the tragedy of King Lear and a small fragment of Hamlet, from the original, £4 4*s.* He actually produced MSS. which he had forged, and which he pretended were originals. (Strange as it may seem, Dr. Parr, Dr. Valpy, James Boswell, Herbert Croft, and the poet-laureate Pye Smith, signed a document, certifying their opinion that these forgeries were genuine. Where their ears could have been is a mystery, as Mrs. Siddons detected the forgery immediately.)

On April 2, 1796, the play of Vortigern and Rowena, "from the pen of Shakespeare," was announced for representation. It drew a most crowded house; but the fraud was detected by Malone, and Ireland made a public declaration of his impositions, from beginning to end.

(23) Isiac Table (The). A flat rectangular bronze plate, about four feet eight inches long, containing three rows of figures of Egyptian emblems and deities. It was sold by a soldier to a locksmith, who sold it to cardinal Bembo in 1527. It is now at Turin; but it is a general opinion that the table is spurious.

(24) Jasher (Book of). (See under ILIVE.)

(25) LAUDER (William) published, in 1751, false quotations from Masenius a Jesuit of Cologne, Taubmann a German, Staphorstius a learned Dutchman, and others, to "prove Milton a gross plagiarist." Dr. Douglas demonstrated that the citations were incorrect, and that often several lines had been foisted in to make the parallels. Lauder confessed the fact afterwards (1754).

The title of his book is an Essay on Milton's Use and Imitation of the Moderns.

(26) Letter of St. Peter to Pepin, forged by pope Stephen III. rendered desperate by the siege of Rome by Astolph the Lombard king. (See Milman, Latin Christianity, vol. iii. book iv. chap. xi. pp. 21–23.)

(27) Letters of Ganganelli (pope Clement XIV.), though spurious, are very interesting. They are generally attributed to Caraccioli, but Caraccioli died protesting that he was only the translator of them.

Ganganelli was born 1705, became pope in 1769, and died 1774.

(28) LETTERS OF PHAL'ARIS (The). Phalaris was tyrant of Agregentum, in Sicily, especially noted for his judgment on Perillos, inventor of the "brazen bull." Certain letters ascribed to him were published at Oxford in 1695, by Charles Boyle (earl of Orrery), who maintained their authenticity; but Richard Bentley, in the same year, published his Dissertation to prove that they are apocryphal, and no doubt Bentley was right. These letters, on philosophical subjects, profess to have been written six centuries before the Christian era, but Bentley has proved, by internal historical evidence, that they could not have been written for at least eight centuries later.

Bentley's Dissertation introduced a new era of criticism, and probably suggested to Dr. Murray the idea of an English Dictionary on the same lines.

(29) Letters of Shelley (Percy Bysshe), published in 1852, proved to be forgeries by the Athenæum in the same year. The letters profess to have been a correspondence with his friends Byron and Keats.

Percy Bysshe Shelley lived 1792–1822.

(30) Moabite Stone (The), said to have been discovered near the Dead Sea by Klein, in 1868, and broken up by Bedouins in 1869. Mr. Löwy, in 1887, pronounced it to be a forgery, one of his arguments being that the stone was more worn than the letters, in other words, that the stone was old, but the inscription modern.

(31) Mormon (Book of). The Golden Bible, the pretended work of Mormon, "the last of the Hebrew prophets." It was said to be written on golden plates about the thickness of tin. In reality it was a fiction written by the Rev. Solomon Spalding, who died in 1816. Joseph Smith gave out that the book was revealed to him by the angel Mormon, who also supplied a Urim and Thummim which would enable him to decipher the book. (See KORAN.)

(32) Orphica. An immense mass of literature which, in the third and fourth centuries, grew out of the old Orphic myths and songs; somewhat like the Ossian of Macpherson, based, it may be, on older literature. Not only the Hellenists, but also the Church Fathers appealed to these forgeries as primitive sources of the religion of ancient Greece, from which they took it for granted that Pythag'oras, Heraclitus, and Plato had drawn their theological philosophy. Wesseling and Lobeck demonstrated that these Orphica were forgeries of the third and fourth centuries; and that, so far from being the source of Greek mythology, the truth lies in the contrary direction, and the Orphica were deduced from Hesiod and Homer.

(33) PEREIRA (Colonel). (See under SANCHONI'ATHON.)

(34) Phalaris. (See under LETTERS OF PHAL'ARIS.)

(35) Phœnician Stone (The). In 1824 the learned Raoul Rochette, professor of archæology, and keeper of the cabinet of antiquities, Paris, received from Malta (for the French Academy) a stone with a bilingual inscription in Greek and what professed to be Phœnician. The stone was dated the 85th Olympiad (B.C. 436). Rochette gave the inscription credit for the antiquity it laid claim to, and sent a copy of the inscription to every noted savant in Europe for decipherment and translation. The great scholar Gesenius of Halle and the hardly less learned Hamaker of Leyden agreed with Rochette, and published comments on the stone. Yet after all it turned out to be an impudent hoax and modern forgery.

(36) Pilate's despatch to the emperor Tiberius. (See Acta Pilati.)

(37) Porphyry's Oracles of Phylosophy were proved by Dr. Lardner to be a forgery.

(38) Protevangelium (The). A gospel falsely ascribed to James the Less, first bishop of Jerusalem. It is noted for its minute details of the Virgin and of Jesus. Some ascribe it to Carinus, who died 362a.

> First of all we shall rehearse . . .
> The nativity of our Lord
> As written in the old record
> Of the protevangelium.
> Longfellow.

(39) PSALMANAZAR (George), who pretended to be a Japanese, published, in 1704, an Historical and Geographical Description of Formosa, an Island belonging to the Empire of Japan. He was an Englishman, born in London, name unknown (died 1763).

(40) MEINHOLD (Dr.). The Amber Witch, a "story of the olden times." When this story first appeared, the scholars of Germany applied to it severe tests of historical and philological criticism, to ascertain whether or not it was a relic of antiquity. Even those acute neologists, the Tübingen Reviewers, declared it to be "hoary with the lapse of centuries." When the wise ones had fully committed themselves, Dr. Meinhold came forward, and proved beyond a doubt that he was himself the author.

(41) RICHARD OF CIRENCESTER'S Diaphragmata, introduced by Dr. Stukeley as a genuine work, has been demonstrated by professor Mayor to be a forgery by Bertram.

(42) RICULFE, archbishop of Mentz or Mayence, who lived in the ninth century, published fifty-nine decretals, which he ascribed to Isidore of Seville, who died in the sixth century. The object of these letters was either to exalt the papacy, or to enforce some law assuming such exaltation. Among them is the decretal of St. Fabian, instituting the rite of the chrism, with the decretals of St. Anaclētus, St. Alexander, St. Athanasius, and so on. They have all been proved to be barefaced forgeries. (See Decretals, p. 383.)

(43) SANCHONI'ATHON. At Bremen, in 1837, were printed nine books of SANCHONI'ATHON, and it was said that the MSS. had been discovered in the convent of St. Maria de Merinhão, by a colonel Pereira in the Portuguese army; but it was ascertained that there was no such convent, nor any such colonel, and that the paper of this "ancient" MS. bore the water-mark of Osnabrück paper-mills.

(44) Scriptures. (See under Apocryphal.)

(45) Sibylline Prophecies, twelve in number, manifestly a clumsy forgery of the sixteenth century. There are twelve prophecies as there were twelve apostles, and twelve sybils are conjured up, and twelve emblems.

It would be too long to give all the details; but those curious on such a matter may see them in The Historic Note-Book, p. 823, and on p. 824 will be seen "Sibylline Verses."

(46) SIMONIDES (Constantine L. P.) (1824–1863). He palmed off numerous forgeries: one was a MS. of Homer on serpent's skin; another was a palimpsest MS. of the kings of Egypt in Greek, professed to be by Uranius of Alexandria. The Academy pronounced it to be genuine, and the Minister of Public Instruction was deputed to buy it for 5000 thalers (about £750). Professor Dindorf gave this MS. to the University of Oxford; but it was soon discovered that it was a forgery, in fact, a translation in bad Greek of extracts from Bunsen and Lepsius, and Tischendorf pronounced the palimpsest of Uranius to be a gross forgery. Simonides was imprisoned at Berlin, but was acquitted on a point of law.

(47) SMITH (Joseph). (See under MORMON.) Smith was murdered in Carthage Gaol, in 1844.

(48) SURTEES (Forgeries of). Robert Surtees, in 1806, palmed off on sir Walter Scott certain ballads of his own composition as ancient ballads discovered by him, and sir W. Scott inserted them as genuine in his Border Minstrelsy. One was The Raid of Featherstonehaugh, arising out of a feud between the Ridleys and the Featherstones, said to be taken down from the mouth of an old woman on Alston Moor. Another was a ballad called Lord Eusrie, which he asserted he took down from an old woman named Rose Smith of Bishop Middleham (aged 91). A third was Barthram's Dirge, obtained (as he said) from Ann Douglas, "a withered old crone who weeded in his garden." A whole series of legends were professedly obtained from Mrs. Brown of Falkland; and another series from Mrs. Arnut of Arbroath. (See CHATTERTON.)

It is a very common device for poets and romancers to pretend that they are recounting somebody else's words. Sir W. Scott himself has indulged freely in this device, and the line of demarcation between sir Walter's inventions and those of Robert Surtees is very fine indeed; but no one is deceived, and no mischief done to literature and history by a Mr. Dryasdust, but great mischief to both is done by the fabrications of Robert Surtees, unless the forgeries are exposed.

(49) Theodosian Code (The), said to have been compiled by command of Theodosius the Younger, emperor of the East (401, 402–450). The reputed date of the code is 438. Hallam says—

Another edict . . . annexed to the Theodosian Code extended the jurisdiction of bishops to all causes which either party chose to refer to it, even where they had already commenced in a secular court; and (the edict) declared the bishop's sentence not subject to appeal. This edict has already been proved to be a forgery. —Middle Ages, vol. ii. p. 211.

(50) Turpin's Chronicle or Chronique de l'archevêque Turpin. Turpin was archbishop of Reims, contemporary with Charlemagne. The "Chronicle" referred to is, in fact, an historic romance, having Charlemagne for its hero, and is full of marvels, such as enchanted castles, winged horses, magic horns, incantations, and so on. As a history it is worthless, but has been misleading. It is probably two or three centuries later than the era of Charlemagne, and, of course, the archbishop had no hand in it. Woodhead, the queen's librarian, tells us that pope Callixtus II. declared it to be authentic, but no scholar now believes it to be so.

(51) VELLA (Giuseppe), a literary impostor, who confessed his frauds and was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment in 1796. His forgery was the Codex Diplomaticus Siciliæ (1793). He died 1814.

This list, though long, is by no means exhaustive, and takes no notice of travellers' tales, like those of sir John Mandeville.

Forget-me-nots of the Angels. So Longfellow calls the stars; but "forgĕt-mē-nŏts" won't scan.

Silently, one by one, in the infinite meadows of heaven,
Blossomed the lovely stars, the "forget-me-nots" of the angels.
Longfellow: Evangeline (1849).

Forgive, Blest Shade . . . This celebrated epitaph in Brading Churchyard, Isle of Wight, is an altered version, by the Rev. John Gill (curate of Newchurch), of one originally composed by Mrs. Anne Steele, daughter of a Baptist minister at Bristol, on the death of Mr. Hervey.

Forks, the gallows. (Latin, furca.) Cicero (De Div., I. 26) says, "Ferens furcam ductus est" ("he was led forth, bearing his gallows"). "Furcifer" was a slave made to carry a furca for punishment.

Forked Cap, a bishop's mitre. John Skelton, speaking of the clergy, says—

They graspe and they gape,
Al to haue promocion; There's their whole deuocion,
With money, if it will hap, To catch the forked cap.
Colyn Clout (time, Henry VIII.).

Formosa. The island said by Psalmanazar to be subject to the emperor of Japan. (See FORGERS AND FORGERIES.)

Fornari'na (La), the baker's daughter, of whom Raphael was devotedly fond, and whose likeness appears in several of his pictures. Her name was Margherita.

Forrest (George), Esq., M.A., the assumed name of the Rev. J. G. Wood, author of Every Boy's Book (1855), etc.

For'tinbras, prince of Norway.—Shakespeare: Hamlet (1596).

Fortuna'tus, a man on the brink of starvation, on whom Fortune offers to bestow either wisdom, strength, riches, health, beauty, or long life. He chooses riches, and she gives him an inexhaustible purse. (See the next two articles.) His gifts prove the ruin of himself and his sons.

 This is one of the Italian tales called Nights, by Straparo'la. There is a German version, and a French one, as far back as 1535. The story was dramatized in 1553 by Hans Sachs (Sax); and in 1600 by Thomas Dekker, under the title of The Pleasant Comedie of Old Fortunatus. Ludwig Tieck, in 1816, poetized the tale under the title of Phantasus.

The purse of Fortunatus could not supply you.—Holcroft: The Road to Ruin, I. 3 (1792).

Fortunatus's Purse, a purse which was inexhaustible. It was given to Fortunatus by Fortune herself. (See SERPENT STONE.)

Fortunatus's Wishing-cap, a cap given by the sultan to Fortunatus. He had only to put it on his head and wish, when he would find himself transported to any spot he liked.

 Dekker wrote a comedy so called, based on the old romance (1600).

Fortune of Love, in ten books, by Antonio Lofrasco, a Sardinian poet.

"By my holy office," cried the curé, "since Apollo was Apollo, and the Muses were the offspring of Jove, there never was a better or more delightful volume. He who has never read it has missed a fund of entertainment. Give it me, Mr. Nicholas; I would rather have that book than a cassock of the very best Florence silk."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. 1. 6 (1605).

Fortune's Frolic, a farce by Allingham (1800). Lord Lackwit died suddenly, and the heir of his title and estates was Robin Roughhead, a poor labourer, engaged to Dolly, a cottager's daughter. The object of the farce is to show the pleasure of doing good, and the blessings which a little liberality can dispense. Robin was not spoilt by his good fortune, but married Dolly, and became the good genius of the cottage tenantry.

Fortunes of Nigel, a novel by sir W. Scott (1822). This story gives an excellent picture of the times of James I., and the account of Alsatia is wholly unrivalled. The character of king James, poor, proud, and pedantic, is a masterly historic sketch.

The tale is as follows:—

The estates of lord Nigel are very heavily mortgaged, and James I. gives his sign-manual for their release. This being promised, the tale runs thus: Lord Dalgarno, a profligate young nobleman, takes Nigel to a gambling-house, but soon afterwards, being in the company of prince Charles, he pretends not to know him. Nigel, indignant at this insult, strikes him with his sword, and flees to Alsatia for refuge. Here he is lodged in the room of an old miser, who steals from Nigel's trunk the king's sign-manual. The old miser is murdered, and his treasures pass into the hands of Moniplies, a quondam serving-man of lord Nigel. Margaret Ramsay, the watchmaker's daughter, who is in love with Nigel, induces lady Hermione (a syl.), the unhappy wife of lord Dalgarno, to interfere on Nigel's behalf, and she gives him money to aid his escape. He flees to Greenwich, where he meets the king, who sends him to the Tower for treason. Moniplies pays off the "mortgage" with the miser's money; Nigel, being set at liberty, marries Margaret, and Moniplies marries Martha, the miser's daughter. (Time, James I.)

Fortunio, one of the three daughters of an old lord, who at the age of four score was called out to join the army levied against the emperor of Matapa'. Fortunio put on military costume, and went in place of her father. On her way, a fairy gave her a horse named Comrade, not only of incredible swiftness, but all-knowing, and endowed with human speech; she also gave her an inexhaustible Turkey-leather trunk, full of money, jewels, and fine clothes. By the advice of Comrade, she hired seven gifted servants, named Strongback, Lightfoot, Marksman, Fine-ear, Boisterer, Trinquet, and Grugeon. After performing several marvellous feats by the aid of her horse and servants, Fortunio married Alfurite (3 syl.) the king of her country.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales (1682).

Fortunio's Horse, Comrade, which not only possessed incredible speed, but knew all things, and was gifted with human speech.

Fortunio's Attendants.

Trinquet drank up the lakes and ponds, and thus caught for his master the most delicate fish. Lightfoot hunted down venison, and caught hares by the ears. As for Marksman, he gave neither partridge nor pheasant any quarter; and whatever game Marksman shot, Strongback would carry without inconvenience.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Fortunio," 1682).

Fortunio's Sisters. Whatever gifts Fortunio sent her sisters, their touch rendered them immediately worthless. Thus the coffers of jewels and gold, "became only cut glass and false pistoles" the momen the jealous sisters touched them.

Fortunio's Turkey-leather Trunk, full of suits of all sorts swords, jewels, and gold. The fairy told Fortunio "she needed but to stamp with her foot, and call for the Turkey-leather trunk, and it would always come to her, full of money and jewels, fine linen and laces."—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales (1682).

Forty Thieves, also called the tale of "Ali Baba." These thieves lived in a vast cave, the door of which opened and shut at the words, "Open, Sesamê!" "Shut, Sesamê!" One day, Ali Baba, a wood-monger, accidentally discovered the secret, and made himself rich by carrying off gold from the stolen hoards. The captain tried several schemes to discover the thief, but was always outwitted by Morgia'na, the wood-cutter's female slave, who, with boiling oil, killed the whole band, and at length stabbed the captain himself with his own dagger.—Arabian Nights ("Ali Baba, or the Forty Thieves").

¶ A marvellous parallel is the following story: In the reign of Heinrich IV. of Germany, count Adalbert plundered the bishop of Treves and carried off the spoil to his stronghold. Tycho, one of the bishop's vassals, promised to avenge the affront; and, knocking at the chieftain's door, craved a draught of water. The porter brought him a cup of wine, and Tycho said to the man, "Thank thy lord for his charity, and tell him he shall meet with his reward." Returning home, he provided thirty large wine-butts, into each of which he stowed a retainer, and weapons for two others. Each cask was carried by two men to the count's stronghold, and when the door was opened, Tycho said to the porter, "See, I am come to redeem my promise." So saying, the sixty bearers carried in the thirty casks. When count Adalbert went to look at the "magnificent present," at a signal given by Tycho, the tops of the casks flew off, and the ninety armed men set on the count and slew him with his whole band of brigands. After which, they burnt the castle to the ground.

Forty-five (No. 45), the celebrated number of Wilkes's North Britain, in which the ministers were accused of "putting a lie into the king's mouth."

Forwards (Marshal). Blucher is so called for his dash and readiness to attack in the campaign of 1813 (1742–1819).

Fos'cari (Francis), doge of Venice for thirty-five years. He saw three of his sons die, and the fourth, named Jac'opo, was banished by the Council of Ten for taking bribes from his country's enemies. The old doge also was deposed at the age of 84. As he was descending the "Giant Staircase" to take leave of his son, he heard the bell announce the election of his successor, and he dropped down dead.

Jac'opo Fos'cari, the fourth and only surviving son of Francis Foscari the doge of Venice. He was banished for taking bribes of foreign princes. Jacopo had been several times tortured, and died soon after his banishment to Candia.—Byron: The Two Foscari (1820).

(Verdi has taken this subject for an opera.)

Foss (Corporal), a disabled soldier, who served many years under lieutenant Worthington, and remained his ordinary when the lieutenant retired from the service. Corporal Foss loved his master and Miss Emily the lieutenant's daughter, and he gloried in his profession. Though brusque in manner, he was tender-hearted as a child.—Colman: The Poor Gentleman (1802).

(Corporal Foss is modelled from "corporal Trim," in Sterne's Tristram Shandy, 1759.)

Foss-way, the longest of the Roman roads, from Mount Michael, in Cornwall, to Caithness (the furthest north of Scotland). Drayton says the Foss-way, Watling Street, and Icknield Street were constructed by Mulmutius, son of Cloten king of Cornwall, who gained the sceptre of Britain after the period of anarchy which followed the murder of Porrex by his mother (about B.C. 700).

The Foss exceeds me [Watling Street] many a mile.
That holds from shore to shore thel engthe of all the isle,
From where rich Cornwall points to the Iberian seas,
Till colder Caithness tells the scattered Orcades.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xvi. (1613).

FOSTER (Captain), on guard at Tully Veolan ruin.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Foster, the English champion.—Sir W. Scott: The Laird's Jock (time, Elizabeth).

Foster (Anthony), or "Tony-fire-the-Faggot," agent of the earl of Leicester at Cumnor Place.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Foster (Sir John), the English warden.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Foster (Dr. James), a dissenting minister, who preached on Sunday evenings for above twenty years (from 1728–1749), in Old Jewry (died 1753).

Let modest Foster, if he will, excel
Ten metropolitans in preaching well.
Pope.

Fotheringay (Miss), an actress whose real name is Costigan.—Thackeray: Pendennis (1850).

Foul-weather Jack, commodore Byron (1723–1786).

Foundling (The). Harriet Raymond, whose mother died in child-birth, was committed to the charge of a gouvernante, who announced to her father (sir Charles Raymond) that the child was dead. This, however, was not true, for the gouvernante changed the child's name to Fidelia, and sold her at the age of 12 to one Villiard. One night, Charles Belmont, passing Villiard's house, heard the cries of a girl for help; he rescued her and took her to his own home, where he gave her in charge to his sister Rosetta. The two girls became companions and friends, and Charles fell in love with the "foundling." The gouvernante, on her death-bed, revealed the secret to sir Charles Raymond, the mystery was cleared up, and Fidelia became the wife of Charles Belmont. Rosetta gave her hand to Fidelia's brother, colonel Raymond.—Edward Moore: The Foundling (1748).

Foundling of the Forest (The). (See FLORIAN, p. 376.)

Fountain, Bellamore, and Hare'brain, suitors to lady Hartwell, a widow. They are the chums of Valentine the gallant, who would not be persuaded to keep his estate.—Fletcher: Wit without Money (1639).

Fountain of Life, Alexander Hales, "the Irrefragible Doctor" (?–1245).

Fountain of Youth, a marvellous fountain in the island of Bim'ini (one of the Baha'ma group). It had the virtue of restoring the aged to youth again. In the Middle Ages it was really believed to exist, and Juan Ponce de Leon, among other Spanish navigators, sailed to Florida in search of it.

∴ The German writers tell us, "the water was to be drawn before sunrise—down stream, silently, and usually on Easter Sunday."—Grimm: Teutonic Mythology, p. 586.

Referunt in Borucca insula, quæ ab Hispaniola orbis novi MCC. passuum millibus distat, fontem in vertice montis esse qui senes restituat, non tamen canos mutet, nec tollat jam contractas rugas. Cujus rei præter perseverantum famam locuples testis Petrus Martyr Angerius Mediolanensis, a secretis Regis olim Hispaniarum, in suis decadibus orbis nuper inventi. Cardanus, De Subtilitate, lib. De Elementis.—Beyerlinck, Lit. F., 658 B.

∴ Sir John Mandeville asserted that he had himself drunk of the fountain; but, if so, it certainly did not confer on him "perpetual youth."

¶ Virgil says that Venus "breathed" on Æneas the rosy blush of youth.

. . . simulque juventæ
Purpureum et lætos oculis adflarat honores.
Æneid, bk. i.

Four Kings (The) of a pack of cards are Charlemagne (the Franco-German king), David (the Jewish king), Alexander (the Macedonian king), and Cæsar (the Roman king). These four kings are representatives of the four great monarchies.

Four Masters (The). (1) Michael O'Clerighe; (2) Cucoirighe O'Clerighe; (3) Maurice Conry; (4) Fearfeafa Conry. These four masters were the authors of the Annals of Donegal.

(O'Clerighe is sometimes Anglicized into Clerkson, and Cucoirighe into Peregrine.)

Four Stones marked the extent of a tumulus. With the body of a hero was buried his sword and the heads of twelve arrows; while on the surface of the tumulus was placed the horn of a deer.

Four stones rise on the grave of Cáthba, . . . Cáthba, son of Torman, thou wert a sunbeam in Erin.—Ossian: Fingal, i.

Fourberies de Scapin (Les), by Molière (1671). Scapin is the valet of Léandre, son of seignior Géronte (2 syl.), who falls in love with Zerbinette, supposed to be a gipsy, but in reality the daughter of seignior Argante (2 syl.), stolen by the gipsies in early childhood. Her brother Octave (2 syl.) falls in love with Hyacinthe, whom he supposes to be Hyacinthe Pandolphe of Tarentum, but turns out to be Hyacinthe Géronte, the sister of Léandre. Now, the gipsies demand £1500 as the ransom of Zerbinette, and Octave requires £80 for his marriage with Hyacinthe. Scapin obtains both these sums from the fathers under false pretences, and at the end of the comedy is brought in on a litter, with his head bound as if on the point of death. He begs forgiveness, which he readily obtains; whereupon the "sick man" jumps from the litter to join the banqueters. (See SCAPIN.)

Fourde'lis, personification of France, called the true love of Burbon (Henri IV.), but enticed away from him by Grantorto (rebellion). Talus (power or might) rescues her, but when Burbon catches her by her "ragged weeds," she starts back in disdain. However, the knight lifts her on his steed, and rides off with her.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 2 (1596).

Fou'rierism, a communistic system; so called from Charles Fourier of Besançon (1772–1837).

Fourolle (2 syl.), a Will-o'-the-wisp, supposed to have the power of charming sinful human beings into the same form. The charm lasted for a term of years only, unless it chanced that some good catholic, wishing to extinguish the wandering flame, made to it the sign of the cross, in which case the sinful creature became a fourolle every night, by way of penance.

She does not know the way; she is not honest, Mons. Do you not know—I am afraid to say it aloud. . . . she is—a fourolle?—Temple Bar ("Beside the Rille," i.).

Fourteen, the name of a young man who could do the work of fourteen men, but had also the appetite of fourteen men. Like Christoph'erus, he carried our Lord across a stream, for which service the Saviour gave him a sack, saying, "Whatever you wish for will come into this sack, if you only say, 'Artchila murtchila!'" (i.e. "come (or go) into my sack"). Fourteen's last achievement was this: He went to paradise, and being refused admission, poked his sack through the keyhole of the door; then crying out, "Artchila murtchila!" ("Get into the sack"), he found himself on the other side of the door, and, of course, in paradise.—Webster: Basque Legends, 195 (1877).

Fourteen. This number plays a very conspicuous part in French history, especially in the reigns of Henri IV. and Louis XIV. For example—

14th May, 1029, the first Henri was consecrated, and 14th May, 1610, the last Henri was assassinated.

14 letters compose the name of Henri de Bourbon, the 14th king of France and Navarre.

14th December, 1553 (14 centuries, 14 decades, and 14 years from the birth of Christ), Henri IV. was born, and 1553 added together = 14.

14th May, 1554, Henri II. ordered the enlargement of the Rue de la Ferronnerie. This order was carried out, and 4 times 14 years later Henri IV. was assassinated there.

14th May, 1559, was the birth of Margaret de Valois, first wife of Henri IV.

14th May, 1588, the Parisians revolted against Henri III., under the leadership of Henri de Guise.

14th March, 1590, Henri IV. gained the battle of Ivry.

14th May, 1590, Henri IV. was repulsed from the faubourgs of Paris.

14th November, 1590, "The Sixteen" took oath to die rather than serve the huguenot king Henri IV.

14th November, 1592, the Paris parlement registered the papal bull which excluded Henri IV. from reigning.

14th December, 1599, the duke of Savoy was reconciled to Henri IV.

14th September, 1606, the dauphin (Louis III.), son of Henri IV., was baptized.

14th May, 1610, Ravaillac murdered Henri IV. in the Rue de la Ferronnerie. Henri IV. lived 4 times 14 years 14 weeks, and 4 times 14 days, i.e. 56 years and 5 months.

14th May, 1643, died Louis XIII., son of Henri IV. (the same day and month as his father). And 1643 added together = 14; just as 1553 (the birth of Henri IV.) = 14.

Louis XIV. mounted the throne 1643, which added together = 14.

Louis XIV. died 1715, which added together = 14.

Louis XIV. lived 77 years, which added together = 14.
Louis XV. mounted the throne 1715, which added together = 14.
Louis XV. died 1774 (the two extremes are 14, and the two means 77 = 14.
Louis XVI. published the edict for the convocation of the states-general in the 14th year of his reign (September 27, 1788).
Louis XVIII. was restored to the throne, Napoleon abdicated, the "Peace of Paris" was signed, and the "Congress of Vienna" met in 1814; and these figures added together = 14.
In 1892 = 14 was the death of the duc de Reichstadt (only son of Napoleon I.).
1814 = 14. Louis XVIII. was restored to the throne of France.
In 1841 = 14 the law was passed for the fortification of Paris.
1805 = 14. Napoleon I. made king of Italy.
1850 = 14. Louis Philippe died.

It may be noted in our own Royal Family, that on 14th December, 1861, the prince consort died; 14th December, 1878, princess Alice died; 14th January, 1892, the duke of Clarence died.

Fourteen Hundred! the cry on 'Change when a stranger enters the sacred precincts. The question is then asked, "Will you purchase my new navy five per cents., sir?" after which the stranger is hustled out without mercy.

Fox (That), Herod Antipas (B.C. 4 to A.D. 39).

Go ye, and tell that fox, Behold, I cast out devils.—Luke xiii. 32.

Fox (The Old), marshal Soult (1769-1851).

Foxchase (Sir Harry), candidate with squire Tankard, opposed by lord Place and colonel Promise.—Fielding: Pasquin (1736).

Foxley (Squire Matthew), a magistrate who examined Darsie Latimer [i.e. sir Arthur Darsie Redgauntlet], after he had been attacked by the rioters.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Fracasse (Capitaine), the French Bombastes Furioso.—Theophile Gautier.

Fra Diavolo, the sobriquet of Michel Pozza, a Calabrian insurgent and brigand chief. In 1799 cardinal Ruffo made him a colonel in the Neapolitan army; but in 1806 he was captured by the French, and hanged at Naples. Auber has a comic opera so entitled, the libretto of which was written by Scribe, but nothing of the true character of the brigand chief appears in the opera.

Fradubio [i.e. brother Doubt]. In his youth he loved Fraelissa, but riding with her one day they encountered a knight, accompanied by Duessa (false faith), and fought to decide which lady was the fairer. The stranger knight fell, and both ladies being saddled on the victor, Duessa changed her rival into a tree. One day Fradubio saw Duessa bathing, and was so shocked at her deformity that he determined to abandon her, but the witch anointed him during sleep with herbs to produce insensibility, and then planted him as a tree beside Fraelissa. The Red Cross Knight plucked a bough from this tree, and seeing with horror that blood dripped from the rift, was told this tale of the metamorphosis.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. 2 (1590).

Frail (Lady), whose real name was lady Vane. Her adventures are related by Smollett, in his Peregrine Pickle (1751).

Frail (Mrs.), a demirep. Scandal said that she is a mixture of "pride, folly, affectation, wantonness, inconstancy, covetousness, dissimulation, malice, and ignorance, but a celebrated beauty" (act i.). She was entrapped into marriage with Tattle.—Congreve: Love for Love (1695).

Francatelli, a chef de cuisine at Windsor Castle, Crockford's, and at the Freemasons' Tavern. He succeeded Ude at Crockford's. (See Cooks, p. 232.)

Frances, daughter of Vandunke (2 syl.) burgomaster of Bruges.—Fletcher: The Beggars' Bush (1622).

Francesca, daughter of Guido da Polenta (lord of Ravenna). She was given by her father in marriage to Lanciotto, son of Malatesta lord of Rimini, who was deformed. His brother Paolo, who was a handsome man, won the affections of Francesca; but being caught in adultery, both of them were put to death by Lanciotto. Francesca told Dante that the tale of Lancelot and Guinever caused her fall. The tale forms the close of Dante's Hell, v., and is alluded to by Petrarch in his Triumph of Love, iii.

(Leigh Hunt has a poem on the subject, and Silvio Pellico has made it the subject of a tragedy.)

Francesca, a Venetian maiden, daughter of old Minotti governor of Corinth. Alp, the Venetian commander of the Turkish army in the siege of Corinth, loved her; but she refused to marry a renegade. Alp was shot in the siege, and Francesca died of a broken heart.—Byron: Siege of Corinth (1816).

Medora, Neuha, Leila, Francesca, and Theresa, it has been alleged, are but children of one family, with differences resulting from climate and circumstances.—Finden: Byron Beauties.

("Medora," in The Corsair; "Neuha," in The Island; "Leila," in The Giaour; and "Theresa," in Maxeppa.)

Franceschini Case, a celebrated cause célèbre of Italian history (1698). (See RING AND THE BOOK.)

Francesco, the "Iago" of Massinger's Duke of Milan; the duke Sforza "the More" being "Othello;" and the cause of hatred being that Sforza had seduced "Eugenia," Francesco's sister. As Iago was Othello's favourite and ancient, so Francesco was Sforza's favourite and chief minister. During Sforza's absence with the camp, Franceso tried to corrupt the duke's beautiful young bride Marcelia, and, being repulsed, accused her to the duke of wishing to play the wanton with him. The duke believed his favourite minister, and in his mad jealousy ran upon Marcelia and slew her. He was then poisoned by Eugenia, whom he had seduced.—Massinger: The Duke of Milan (1622). (See FRANCISCO.)

Franchi (Antonio), the pseudonym of Francesco Bonavino, the Italian philosopher (1634-1709). In biographical dictionaries he is best known as Antony Franchi.

Francis, the faithful, devoted servant of "the stranger." Quite impenetrable to all idle curiosity.—B. Thompson: The Stranger (1797).

Francis (Father), a Dominican monk, confessor of Simon Glover.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Francis (Father), a monk of the convent at Namur.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Franciscans, a religious order; so called from St. Francis of Assisi, the founder, in 1208. The Franciscans were called "Min'orites" (or Inferiors), from their professed humility; "Gray Friars," from the colour of their coarse clothing; "Mendicants," because they obtained their daily food by begging; "Observants," because they observed the rule of poverty. Those who lived in convents were called "Conventual Friars."

Franciscan Sisters were called "Clares," "Poor Clares," "Minoresses," "Mendicants," and "Urbanites" (3 syl.).

Francis'co, the son of Valentine. Both father and son were in love with Cellide (2 syl.); but the lady naturally prefers the son.—Fletcher: Mons. Thomas (1619).

Francisco, a musician, Antonio's boy in The Chances, a comedy by Fletcher (1620).

Francisco, younger brother of Valentine (the gentleman who will not be persuaded to keep his estate). (See FRANCESCO.)—Fletcher: Wit without Money (1639).

Franco'ni (King), Joachim Mura; so called because his dress was so exceedingly showy that he reminded one of the fine dresses of Franconi the mountebank (1767-1815).

Franguestan, famous for enamel.

Of complexion more fair than the enamel of Franguestan.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Frank, sister to Frederick; passionately in love with captain Jac'omo the woman-hater.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Captain (1613).

Beaumont died 1616.

Frank Mildmay, or The Naval Officer, a novel by captain Marryat (1829).

 It is said that Frank Mildmay is the author himself.

Frankenstein (3 syl.), a student, who constructed, out of the fragments of bodies picked from churchyards and dissecting-rooms, a human form without a soul. The monster had muscular strength, animal passions, and active life, but "no breath of divinity." It longed for animal love and animal sympathy, but was shunned by all. It was most powerful for evil, and, being fully conscious of its own defects and deformities, sought with presistency to inflict retribution on the young student who had called it into being. The monster feels that he is unlike other human beings, and in revenge murders the friend, the brother, and the bride of his creator. He tries to murder Frankenstein, but he escapes. The monster hides himself from the eye of man, in the Ultima Thule of the habitable globe, and slays Frankenstein on his way home.—Mrs. Shelley: Frankenstein (1817).

 It is a great pity that Mrs. Shelley has not given the monster a name. This anonimity has caused it to be called "Frankenstein," which, of course, is quite wrong.

In the summer of 1816, lord Byron and Mr. and Mrs. Shelley resided on the banks of the lake of Geneva . . . and the Shelleys often passed their evenings with Byron, at his house at Diodati. During a week of rain, having amused themselves with reading German ghost stories, they agreed to write something in imitation of them. "You and I," said lord Byron to Mrs Shelley, "will publish ours together." He then began his tale of the Vampire . . . but the most memorable part of this story-telling compact was Mrs. Shelley's wild and powerful romance of Frankenstein.—T. Moore: Life of Byron.

Frankford (Mr. and Mrs.). Mrs. Frankford proved unfaithful to her marriage vow, and Mr. Frankford sent her to reside on one of his estates. She died of grief; but on her death-bed her husband went to see her, and forgave her.—Heywood: A Woman Killed by Kindness (1576–1645).

Franklin (Lady), the half-sister of sir John Vesey, and a young widow. Lady Franklin had an angelic temper, which nothing disturbed, and she really believed that "whatever is, is right." She could bear with unruffled feathers even the failure of a new cap or the disappointment of a new gown. This paragon of women loved and married Mr. Graves, a dolorous widower, for ever sighing over the superlative excellences of his "sainted Maria," his first wife.—Lord Lytton: Money (1840).

The Polish Franklin, Thaddeus Czacki (1765–1813).

Franklin of Theology (The), Andrew Fuller (1754–1815).

Franklin's Tale (The), in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, is that of "Dorigen and Arvir'agus." (For the tale, see ARVIRAGUS, p. 66.)

Frankly (Charles), a light-hearted, joyous, enthusiastic young man, in love with Clarinda, whom he marries.—Dr. Hoadly: The Suspicious Husband (1747).

Franval (Madame), born of a noble family, is proud as the proudest of the old French noblesse. Captain St. Alme, the son of a merchant, loves her daughter; but the haughty aristocrat looks with disdain on such an alliance. However, her daughter Marianne is of another way of thinking, and loves the merchant's son. Her brother intercedes in her behalf, and madame makes a virtue of necessity, with as much grace as possible.—Holcroft: The Deaf and Dumb (1785).

Fraser's Magazine started in 1830.

Fra'teret'to, a fiend, who told Edgar that Nero was an angler in the Lake of Darkness.—Shakespeare: King Lear (1605).

Fraud, seen by Dantê between the sixth and seventh circles of the Inferno.

His head and upper part exposed on land,
But laid not on the shore his bestial train.
His face the semblance of a just man's wore
(So kind and gracious was its outward cheer),
The rest was serpent all. Two shaggy claws
Reached to the armpits, and the back and breast
And either side were painted o'er with nodes
And orbits.
Dante: Hell, xvii. (1300).

Freckles Cured. "The entrails of crocodiles," says Ovid, "are excellent to take freckles or spots from the face and to whiten the skin." As Pharos, an island in the mouth of the Nile, abounded in crocodiles, the poet advises those who are swarthy and freckled to use the Pharian wash.

If swarthy, to the Pharian varnish fly.
Ovid: Art of Love, iii. (B.C. 8).

Fred or Frederick Lewis prince of Wales, father of George III., was struck by a cricket-ball in front of Cliefden House, in the autumn of 1750, and died the following spring. It was of this prince that it was written, by way of epitaph—

. . . And as it is only Fred,
Who was alive, and is dead,
Why, there's no more to be said.

Frederick, the usurping duke, father of Celia and uncle of Rosalind. He was about to make war upon his banished brother, when a hermit encountered him, and so completely changed him that he not only restored his brother to his dukedom, but he retired to a religious house, and passed the rest of his life in penitence and acts of devotion.—Shakespeare: As You Like It (1598).

Frederick, the unnatural and licentious brother of Alphonso king of Naples, whose kingdom he usurped. He tried in vain to seduce Evanthê (3 syl.), the wife of Valerio. (For the sequel, see EVANTHE, p. 347.)—Fletcher: A Wife for a Month (1624).

Frederick (Don), a Portuguese merchant, the friend of don Felix.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Wonder (1714).

Frederick the Great in Flight. In 1741 was the battle of Molwitz, in which the Prussians carried the day, and the Austrians fled; but Frederick, who commanded the cavalry, was put to flight early in the action, and thinking that all was lost, fled with his staff many miles from the scene of action.

Frederick the Great from Molwitz deigned to run.
Byron: Don Juan, viii. 22 (1824).

Freeborn John, John Lilburne, the republican (1613–1657).

Freehold, a grumpy, rusty, but soft-hearted old gentleman farmer, who hates all new-fangled notions, and detests

"men of fashion." He lives in his farm-house with his niece and daughter.

Aura Freehold, daughter of Freehold. A pretty, courageous, high-spirited lass, who wins the heart of Modely, a man of the world and a libertine.—J. P. Kemble: The Farm-house.

Freelove (Lady), aunt to Harriot [Russet]. A woman of the world, "as mischievous as a monkey, and as cunning too" (act i. sc. 1).—Colman: The Jealous Wife (1761).

Free'man (Charles), the friend of Lovel, whom he assists in exposing the extravagance of his servants.—Townley: High Life Below Stairs (1759).

Free'man (Sir Charles), brother of Mrs. Sullen and friend of Aimwell.—Farquhar: The Beaux' Stratagem (1705).

Free'man (Mrs.), a name assumed by the duchess of Marlborough in her correspondence with queen Anne, who called herself "Mrs. Morley."

Freemason (The lady), the Hon. Miss Elizabeth St. Leger (afterwards Mrs. Aldworth), daughter of Arthur lord Doneraile. In order to witness the proceedings of a lodge held in her father's house, she hid herself in an empty clock-case; but, being discovered, she was compelled to become a member of the craft.

Freemasons' Buildings. St. Paul's Cathedral, London, in 604, and St. Peter's, Westminster, in 605, were both built by freemasons. Gundulph bishop of Rochester, who built White Tower, was a grand-master; so was Peter of Colechurch, architect of Old London Bridge. Henry VII.'s Chapel, Westminster, is the work of a master mason. Sir Thomas Gresham, who planned the Royal Exchange, was also a master mason; so were Inigo Jones and sir Christopher Wren. Covent Garden Theatre was founded, in 1808, by the prince of Wales, in his capacity of grand-master.

Free'port (Sir Andrew), a London merchant, industrious, generous, and of sound good sense. He was one of the members of the hypothetical club under whose auspices the Spectator was enterprised.

Freiherr von Güttingen, having collected the poor of his neighbourhood in a great barn, burnt them to death, and mocked their cries of agony. Being invaded by a swarm of mice, he shut himself up in his castle of Güttingen, in the lake of Constance; but the vermin pursued him, and devoured him alive. The castle then sank in the lake, and "if not gone, may still be seen there." (See HATTO.)

Freischütz (Der), a legendary German archer, in league with the devil. The devil gave him seven balls, six of which were to hit with a certainty any mark he aimed at; but the seventh was to be directed according to the will of the giver.—Weber: Der Freischütz (1822).

(The libretto is by F. Kind, taken from Apel's Gespensterbuch (or ghost-book), where the legend appeared in a poetic form in 1810.)

French Revolution (The), a history in three parts, by Carlyle (1837).

Frere. (See FRIARS.)

Freron (Jean), the person bitten by a mad dog, referred to by Goldsmith in the lines—

> The man recovered of the bite;
> The dog it was that died.
> Elegy on a Mad Dog.

> Un serpent mordit Jean Freron, eh bien!
> Le serpent en mourut

Gibbon: Decline and Fall, etc., vii. 4 (Milman's notes).

Preston, the enchanter who bore don Quixote especial ill-will. When the knight's library was destroyed, he was told that some enchanter had carried off the books and the cupboard which contained them. The niece thought the enchanter's name was Munaton; but the don corrected her, and said, "You mean Freston." "Yes, yes," said the niece, "I know the name ended in ton."

"That Freston," said the knight, "is doing me all the mischief his malevolence can invent; but I regard him not."—Ch. 7.

"That cursed Freston," said the knight, "who stole my closet and books, has transformed the giants into windmills" (ch. 8).—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. i. (1605).

Friar of Orders Gray (The), a ballad.

Percy, in his Reliques (bk. ii. 18), says, "Dispersed through Shakespeare's plays are innumerable little fragments of ancient ballads . . . The editor (of the Reliques) was tempted to select some of them, and with a few supplementary stanzas to connect them together. . . . One small fragment was taken from Beaumont and Fletcher.

N.B.—The Hermit, by Goldsmith (1765), was published before Percy's Friar of Orders Gray. The two are very much alike. (See EDWIN AND ANGELINA, p. 315.)

Friars. The four great religious orders were Dominicans, Franciscans, Augustines, and Carmelites (3 syl.).

Dominicans are called black friars, Franciscans gray friars, and the other two white friars. A fifth order was the Trinitarians or Crutched friars, a later foundation. The Dominicans were furthermore called Fratres Majores, and the Franciscans Fratres Minores.

(For friars famed in fable and story, see under each respective name or pseudonym.)

Friar's Tale (The), by Chaucer, in The Canterbury Tales (1388). An archdeacon employed a sumpnour as his secret spy to find out offenders, with the view of exacting fines from them. In order to accomplish this more effectually, the sumpnour entered into a compact with the devil disguised as a yeoman. Those who imprecated the devil were to be dealt with by the yeoman-devil, and those who imprecated God were to be the sumpnour's share. They came in time to an old woman "of whom they knew no wrong," and demanded twelve pence "for cursing." She pleaded poverty, when the sumpnour exclaimed, "The foul fiend fetch me if I excuse thee!" and immediately the foul fiend at his side did seize him, and made off with him.

Fribble, a contemptible molly-coddle, troubled with weak nerves. He "speaks like a lady for all the world, and never swears. . . . He wears nice white gloves, and tells his lady-love what ribbons become her complexion, where to stick her patches, who is the best milliner, where they sell the best tea, what is the best wash for the face, and the best paste for the hands. He is always playing with his lady's fan, and showing his teeth." He says when he is married—

> All the domestic business will be taken from my wife's hands. I shall make the tea, comb the dogs, and dress the children myself."—Garrick: Miss in Her Teens, ii. (1753).

Friday (My Man), a young Indian, whom Robinson Crusoe saved from death on a Friday, and kept as his servant and companion on the desert island.—Defoe: Robinson Crusoe (1709).

Friday Street (London). So called because it was the street of fishmongers, who served the Friday markets.—Stow.

Friday Tree (A), a trial, misfortune, or cross; so called from the "accursed tree" on which the Saviour was crucified on a Friday.

Friend (The Poor Man's), Nell Gwynne (1642–1691).

Friend of Man (The), the marquis de Mirabeau; so called from one of his books, entitled L'Ami des Hommes (1715–1789).

Friends.

Frenchmen: Montaigne and Etienne de la Boëtie.

Germans: Goethe and Schiller. (See Carlyle's Schiller, p. 108.)

Greeks: Achillês and Patroc'los; Diomêdês and Sthen'alos; Epaminondas and Pelop'idas; Harmo'dios and Aristogi'ton; Herculês and Iola'os; Idomeneus (4 syl.) and Merion; Pyl'adês and Ores'tês; Septim'ios and Alcander; Theseus (2 syl.) and Pirith'oos.

Jews: David and Jonathan; Christ and the beloved disciple.

Syracusians: Damon and Pythias; Sacharissa and Amôret.

Trojans: Nisus and Eury'alus.

Of Feudal History: Amys and Amyllion.

Miscellaneous: Braccio (sometimes called Fra Bartolomeo) and Mariotto, artists; Basil and Gregory; Burke and Dr. Johnson; Hadrian and Antinous (4 syl.); F. D. Maurice and C. Kingsley; William of Orange and Bentinck. (See Macaulay's History, vol. i. 411, two-vol. edit.)

Friendly (Sir Thomas), a gouty baronet living at Friendly Hall.

Lady Friendly, wife of sir Thomas.

Frank Friendly, son of sir Thomas and fellow-collegian with Ned Blushington.

Dinah Friendly, daughter of sir Thomas. She marries Edward Blushington "the bashful man."—Moncrieff: The Bashful Man.

Friendships Broken.

Queen Elizabeth and the earl of Essex.
Henry II. and Thomas Becket.
Henry VIII. and Wolsey.
J. H. Newman and Whately.
Pope Innocent III. and Otho IV.
(See Milman's Latin Christianity, v. 234.)

Friendships (Romantic). The most striking are those of Pyladês and Orestês, and of Damon and Pythias.

Frithiof [Frit-yof], a hero of Icelandic story. He married Ingeborg [In-ge-boy'e], daughter of a petty Norwegian king, and the widow of Hring. His adventures are recorded in an ancient Icelandic saga of the thirteenth century.

. Bishop Tegner has made this story the groundwork of his poem entitled The Frithiof's Saga.

Frithiof's Sword, Angurva'del.

. Frithiof means "peacemaker," and Angurvadel means "stream of anguish."

Fritz (Old), Frederick II. "the Great," king of Prussia (1712, 1740–1786).

Fritz, a gardener, passionately fond of flowers, the only subject he can talk about.—Stirling: The Prisoner of State (1847).

Frog (Nic.), the linen-draper. The Dutch are so called in Arbuthnot's History of John Bull (1712).

Nic. Frog was a cunning, sly rogue, quite the reverse of John [Bull] in many particulars; covetous, frugal; minded domestic affairs, would pinch his belly to save his pocket; never lost a farthing by careless servants or bad debts. He did not care much for any sort of diversions, except tricks of high German artists and legerdemain; no man exceeded Nic. in these. Yet it must be owned that Nic. was a fair dealer, and in that way acquired immense riches.—Dr. Arbuthnot: History of John Bull, v. (1712).

. "Frogs" are called Dutch nightingales.

It is a mistake to suppose the French are intended by this sobriquet.

Frolicsome Duke (The), a ballad in Percy's Reliques (bk. ii. 17). A duke, wanting diversion, went out one night and saw a tinker, dead drunk, fast asleep on a bench. He told his servants to take him to the mansion, put him to bed, and next morning to treat him as a duke. The tinker was amazed; but at night, after being well swilled with potent liquor, he fell asleep, and being clad in his own clothes, was carried to the bench again. He thought the whole had been a dream; and the last delusion was as diverting as the first.

¶ This trick is an incident in the "Induction" of Shakespeare's Taming of the Shrew; is told in Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy (pt. ii. 2); and was played by Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy.

Frollo (Claude), an archdeacon, absorbed by a search after the philosopher's stone. He has a great reputation for sanctity, but entertains a base passion for Esmeralda, the beautiful gipsy girl. Quasimodo flings him into the air from the top of Notre Dame, and dashes him to death.—Victor Hugo: Notre Dame de Paris (1831).

Fronde War (The), a political squabble during the ministry of Maz'arin in the minority of Louis XIV. (1648–1653).

Frondeur, a "Mrs. Candour," a backbiter, a railer, a scandal-monger; any one who flings stones at another. (French, frondeur, "a slinger," fronde, "a sling.")

"And what about Diebitsch?" began another frondeur.—Véra, 200.

Frondeurs, the malcontents in the Fronde war.

They were like schoolboys who sling stones about the streets. When no eye is upon them they are bold as bullies; but the moment a "policeman" approaches, off they scamper to any ditch for concealment.—Montglat.

Front de Bœuf (Sir Reginald), a follower of prince John of Anjou, and one of the knight's challengers. He tries to extort money from Isaac the Jew, and bids two slaves to chain him to the bars of a slow fire, but they are disturbed in this diabolical plot by the bugle's sound.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Frontaletto, the name of Sa'cripant's horse. The word means "Little head."—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Fronti'no, the horse of Bradaman'te (4 syl.). Roge'ro's horse bore the same name. The word means "Little head."—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

The renowned Frontino, which Bradamanté purchased at so high a price, could never be thought thy equal [i.e. Rosinante's equal].—Cervantes: Don Quixote (1605).

Frost (Jack), Frost personified.

Jack Frost looked forth one still, clear night,
And he said, "Now I shall be out of sight,
So over the valley and over the height
In silence I'll take my way."

Miss Gould.

Froth (Master), a foolish gentleman. Too shallow for a great crime and too light for virtue.—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure (1603).

Froth (Lord), a good boon companion; but he vows that "he laughs at nobody's jests but his own or a lady's." He says, "Nothing is more unbecoming a man of quality than a laugh; 'tis such a vulgar expression of the passion; every one can laugh." To lady Froth he is most gallant and obsequious, though her fidelity to her liege lord is by no means immaculate.

Lady Froth, a lady of letters, who writes songs, elegies, satires, lampoons, plays, and so on. She thinks her lord the most polished of all men, and his bow the pattern of grace and elegance. Lady Froth writes an heroic poem called The Syllabub, the subject of which is lord Froth's love to herself. In this poem she calls her lord "Spumoso" (Froth), and herself "Biddy" (her own name). Her conduct with Mr. Brisk is most blamable.—Congreve: The Double Dealer (1700).

Frothal, king of Sora, and son of Annir. Being driven by tempest to Sarno, one of the Orkney Islands, he is hospitably entertained by the king, and falls in love with Coma'la, daughter of Starno king of Inistore or the Orkneys. He would have carried Comala off by violence, but her brother Cathulla interfered, bound him, and, after keeping him in bonds for three days, sent him out of the island. When Starno was gathered to his fathers, Frothal returned and laid siege to the palace of Cathulla; but Fingal, happening to arrive at the island, met Frothal in single combat, overthrew him, and would have slain him, if Utha his betrothed (disguised in armour) had not interposed. When Fingal knew that Utha was Frothal's sweetheart, he not only spared the foe, but invited both Frothal and Utha to his palace, where they passed the night in banquet and song.—Ossian: Carric-Thura.

Fruit at a Call. In the tale of "The White Cat," one of the fairies, in order to supply a certain queen with ripe fruit, put her fingers in her mouth, blew three times, and then cried—

"Apricots, peaches, nectarines, plums, cherries, pears, melons, grapes, apples, oranges, citrons, gooseberries, currants, strawberries, raspberries, and all sorts of fruit; come at my call!" . . . And they came rolling in without injury.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy, Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1688).

Fuar'fed (3 syl.), an island of Scandinavia.

Fudge Family (The), a family supposed by T. Moore to be visiting Paris after the peace. It consists of Phil Fudge, Esq., his son Robert, his daughter Biddy, and a poor relation named Phelim Connor (an ardent Bonapartist and Irish patriot) acting as bear-leader to Bob. These four write letters to their friends in England. The skit is meant to satirize the parvenu English abroad.

Phil Fudge, Esq., father of Bob and Biddy Fudge; a hack writer devoted to legitimacy and the Bourbons. He is a secret agent of lord Castlereagh [Kar'sl-ray], to whom he addresses letters ii. and ix. He points out to his lordship that Robert Fudge will be very glad to receive a snug Government appointment, and hopes that his lordship will not fail to bear him in mind. Letter vi. he addresses to his brother, showing how the Fudge family is prospering, and ending thus—

Should we but still enjoy the sway
Of Sidmouth and of Castlereagh,
I hope ere long to see the day
When England's wisest statesmen, judges,
Lawyers, peers, will all be—FUDGES.

Miss Biddy Fudge, a sentimental girl of 18, in love with "romances, high bonnets, and Mde le Roy." She writes letters i., v., x., and xii., describing to her friend Dolly or Dorothy the sights of Paris, and especially how she becomes acquainted with a gentleman whom she believes to be the king of Prussia in disguise; but afterwards she discovers that her disguised king calls himself "colonel Calicot." Going with her brother to buy some handkerchiefs, her visions of glory are sadly dashed when "the hero she fondly had fancied a king" turns out to be a common linendraper. "There stood the vile treacherous thing, with the yard-measure in his hand." "One tear of compassion for your poor heart-broken friend. P.S.—You will be delighted to know we are going to hear Brunel to-night, and have obtained the governor's box; we shall all enjoy a hearty good laugh, I am sure."

Bob or Robert Fudge, son of Phil Fudge, Esq., a young exquisite of the first water, writes letters iii. and viii. to his friend Richard. These letters describe how French dandies dress, eat, and kill time. —T. Moore (1818).

(A sequel, called The Fudge Family in England, was published.)

Fulgentio, a kinsman of Roberto (king of the Two Sicilies). He was the most rising and most insolent man in the court. Cami'ola calls him "a suit-broker," and says he had the worst report among all good men for bribery and extortion. This canker obtained the king's leave for his marriage with Camiola, and he pleaded his suit as a right, not a favour; but the lady rejected him with scorn, and Adoni killed the arrogant "sprig of nobility" in a duel.—Massinger: The Maid of Honour (1637).

Fulmer, a man with many shifts, none of which succeeded. He says—

"I have been through every quarter of the compass . . . I have blustered for prerogative; I have bellowed for freedom; I have offered to serve my country; I have engaged to betray it . . . I have talked treason, writ treason . . . And here I set up as a bookseller, but men leave off reading; and if I were to turn butcher, I believe . . . they'd leave off eating."—Cumberland: The West Indian, act ii. sc. 1 (1771).

Patty Fulmer, an unprincipled, flashy woman, living with Fulmer, with the brevet rank of wife. She is a swindler, a scandal-monger, anything, in short, to turn a penny by; but her villainy brings her to grief.—Cumberland: ditto.

Fum, George IV. The Chinese fum is a mixture of goose, stag, and snake, with the beak of a cock; a combination of folly, cowardice, malice, and conceit,

> And where is Fum the Fourth, our royal bird?
> Byron: Don Juan, xi. 78 (1824).

Fum-Hoam, the mandarin who restored Malek-al-Salem king of Georgia to his throne, and related to the king's daughter Gulchenraz [Gundogdi] his numerous metamorphoses: He was first Piurash, who murdered Siamek the usurper; then a flea; then a little dog; then an Indian maiden named Massouma; then a bee; then a cricket; then a mouse; then Abzenderoud the imaum'; then the daughter of a rich Indian merchant, the jezdad of Iolcos, the greatest beauty of Greece; then a foundling found by a dyer in a box; then Dugmê queen of Persia; then a young woman named Hengu; then an ape; then a midwife's daughter of Tartary; then the only son of the sultan of Agra; then an Arabian physician; then a wild man named Kolao; then a slave; then the son of a cadi of Erzerûm; then a dervise; then an Indian prince; and lastly Fum-Hoam.—T. S. Gueulette: Chinese Tales (1723).

Fum-Houm, first president of the ceremonial academy of Pekin.—Goldsmith: Citizen of the World (1764)

Fumitory ("earth-smoke"), once thought to be beneficial for dimness of sight.

> [The hermit] fumitory gets and eye-bright for the eye
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Fungo'so, a character in Ben Jonson's drama, Every Man in His Humour (1598).

> Unlucky as Fungoso in the play.
> Pope: Essay on Criticism, 328 (1711).

Furini (Francis), a Florentine painter (1600), who at the age of 40 became a priest.—Browning: Parleyings with Certain People.

Furor [intemperate anger], a mad man of great strength, the son of Occasion. Sir Guyon, the "Knight of Temperance," overcomes both Furor and his mother, and rescues Phaon from their clutches.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 4 (1590).

Fusber'ta, the sword of Rinaldo.—Ariosto: Orlando Furiso (1516).

Fus'bos, minister of state to Artaxam'inous king of Uto'pia. When the king cuts down the boots which Bombastês has hung defiantly on a tree, the general engages the king in single combat, and slays him. Fusbos, then coming up, kills Bombastês, "who conquered all but Fusbos, Fusbos him." At the close of the farce, the slain ones rise one after the other and join the dance, promising "to die again to-morrow," if the audience desires it.—Rhodes: Bombastês Furioso.

Fusbos, a name assumed by Henry Plunkett, an early contributor to Punch.

Fy'rapel (Sir), the leopard, the nearest kinsman of king Lion, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox, by Heinrich von Alkmann (1498).

G.

Gabble Retchet, a cry like that of hounds, heard at night, foreboding trouble. Said to be the souls of unbaptized children wandering through the air till the day of judgment.

Gabor, an Hungarian who aided Ulric in saving count Stral'enheim from the Oder, and was unjustly suspected of being his murderer.—Byron: Werner (1822).

Ga'briel (2 or 3 syl.), according to Milton, is called "chief of the angelic guards" (Paradise Lost, iv. 549); but in bk. vi. 44, etc., Michael is said to be "of celestial armies prince," and Gabriel "in military prowess next."

> Go, Michael, of celestial armies prince:
> And thou in military prowess next,
> Gabriel; lead forth to battle these my sons > Invincible.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 44, etc. (1665).

 Gabriel is also called "The Messenger of the Messiah," because he was sent by the Messiah to execute His orders on the earth. He is referred to in Dan. viii. 16; ix. 21; and in Luke i. 19, 26.

Gabriel (according to the Korân and Sale's notes)—

1. It is from this angel that Mahomet professes to have received the Korân; and he acts the part of the Holy Ghost in causing believers to receive the divine revelation.—Ch. ii.

2. It was the angel Gabriel that won the battle of Bedr. Mahomet's forces were 319, and the enemy's a thousand; but Gabriel (1) told Mahomet to throw a handful of dust in the air, and on so doing the eyes of the enemy were "confounded;" (2) he caused the army of Mahomet to appear twice as many as the army opposed to it; (3) he brought from heaven 3000 angels, and, mounted on his horse Haïzûm, led them against the foe.—Ch. iii.

3. Gabriel appeared twice to Mahomet in his angelic form: first "in the highest part of the horizon," and next "by the lote tree" on the right hand of the throne of God.—Ch. liv.

4. Gabriel's horse is called Haïzûm, and, when the golden calf was made, a little of the dust from under this horse's feet being thrown into its mouth, the calf began to low, and received life.—Ch. ii.

Gabriel (according to other legends)—

The Persians call Gabriel "the angel of revelations," because he is so frequently employed by God to carry His messages to man.

The Jews call Gabriel their enemy, and the messenger of wrath; but Michael they call their friend, and the messenger of all good tidings.

In mediæval romance, Gabriel is the second of the seven spirits which stand before the throne of God, and he is frequently employed to carry the prayers of man to heaven, or bring the messages of God to man.

Longfellow, in the Golden Legend, makes Gabriel "the angel of the moon," and says that he "brings to man the gift of hope."

Gabriel Lajeunnesse, son of Basil the blacksmith of Grand Pré, in Acadia (now Nova Scotia). He was legally plighted to Evangeline, daughter of Benedict Bellefontaine (the richest farmer of the village); but next day all the inhabitants were exiled by order of George II., and their property confiscated. Gabriel was parted from his troth-plight wife, and Evangeline spent her whole life in trying to find him. After many wanderings, she went to Pennsylvania, and became a sister of mercy. The plague visited this city, and in the almshouse the sister saw an old man stricken down by the pestilence. It was Gabriel. He tried to whisper her name, but died in the attempt. He was buried, and Evangeline lies beside him in the grave.—Longfellow: Evangeline (1849).

Gabrielle (Charmante), or La Belle Gabrielle, daughter of Antoine d'Estrées (grand-master of artillery and governor of the Ile de France). Henri IV. (1590) happened to stay for the night at the château de Cœuvres, and fell in love with Gabrielle, then 19 years old. To throw a veil over his intrigue, he gave her in marriage to Damerval de Liancourt, created her duchess of Beaufort, and took her to live with him at court.

(The song beginning "Charmante Gabrielle . . ." is ascribed to Henri IV.)

Gabri'na, wife of Arge'o baron of Servia, tried to seduce Philander, a Dutch knight; but Philander fled from the house, where he was a guest. She then accused him to her husband of a wanton insult; and Argeo, having apprehended him, confined him in a dungeon. One day, Gabrina visited him there, and implored him to save her from a knight who sought to dishonour her. Philander willingly espoused her cause, and slew the knight, who proved to be her husband. Gabrina then told her champion that if he refused to marry her, she would accuse him of murder to the magistrates. On this threat he married her, but ere long was killed by poison. Gabrina now wandered about the country as an old hag, and being fastened on Odori'co, was hung by him to the branch of an elm.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Gabriolet'ta, governess of Brittany, rescued by Am'adis de Gaul from the hands of Balan ("the bravest and strongest of all giants").—Vasco de Lobeira: Amadis de Gaul, iv. 129 (fourteenth century).

Gadshill, a companion of sir John Falstaff. This thief receives his name from a place called Gadshill, on the Kentish road, notorious for the many robberies committed there.—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 4 (1597).

(Charles Dickens resided at Gadshill for several years.)

Ga'heris (Sir), son of Lot (king of Orkney) and Morgause (king Arthur's sister). Being taken captive by sir Turquine, he was liberated by sir Launcelot du Lac. One night, sir Gaheris caught his mother in adultery with sir Lamorake, and, holding her by the hair, struck off her head.

"Alas! said sir Lamorake, "why have you slain your own mother? With more right should ye have slain me." . . . And when it was known that sir Gaheris had slain his mother, king Arthur was passing wroth, and commanded him to leave his court.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 109 (1470).

Gaiour [Djow'r], emperor of China, and father of Badour'a (the "most beautiful woman ever seen upon earth"). Badoura married Camaral'zaman, the most beautiful of men.—Arabian Nights

("Camaralzaman and Badoura"). (See GIAOUR.)

Gal'ahad (Sir), the chaste son of sir Launcelot and the fair Elaine (king Pellês's daughter, pt. iii. 2), and thus was fulfilled a prophecy that she should become the mother of the noblest knight that was ever born. Queen Guenever says that sir Launcelot "came of the eighth degree from our Saviour, and sir Galahad is of the ninth . . . and, therefore, be they the greatest gentlemen of all the world" (pt. iii. 35). His sword was that which sir Balin released from the maiden's scabbard (see BALIN), and his shield belonged to king Euelake (Evelake), who received it from Joseph of Arimathy. It was a snow-white shield, on which Joseph had made a cross with his blood (pt. iii. 39). After divers adventures, sir Galahad came to Sarras, where he was made king, was shown the sangraal by Joseph of Arimathy, and even "took the Lord's body between his hands," and died. Then suddenly "a great multitude of angels did bear his soul up to heaven," and "sithence was never no man that could say he had seen the sangreal" (pt. iii. 103).

 Sir Galahad was the only knight who could sit in the "Siege Perilous," a seat in the Round Table reserved for the knight destined to achieve the quest of the holy graal, and no other person could sit in it without peril of his life (pt. iii. 32). He also drew from the iron and marble rock the sword which no other knight could release (pt. iii. 33). His great achievement was that of the holy graal. Whatever other persons may say of this mysterious subject, it is quite certain that the Arthurian legends mean that sir Galahad saw with his bodily eyes and touched with his hands "the incarnate Saviour," reproduced by the consecration of the elements of bread and wine. Other persons see the transformation by the eye of faith only, but sir Galahad saw it bodily with his eyes.

> Then the bishop took a wafer, which was made in the likeness of bread, and at the lifting up [the elevation of the host] there came a figure in the likeness of a child, and the visage was as red and as bright as fire; and he smote himself into that bread; so they saw that the bread was formed of a fleshly man, and then he put it into the holy vessel again . . . then [the bishop] took the holy vessel and came to sir Galahad as he kneeled down, and there he received his Saviour . . . then went he and kissed sir Bors . . . and kneeled at the table and made his prayers; and suddenly his soul departed . . . and a great multitude of angels bear his soul to heaven.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 101–103 (1470).

N.B.—Sir Galahalt the son of sir Brewnor, must not be confounded with sir Galahad the son of sir Launcelot.

Galahalt (Sir), called "The Haut Prince," son of sir Brewnor. He was one of the knights of the Round Table.

N.B.—This knight must not be confounded with sir Galahad the son of sir Launcelot and Elaine (daughter of king Pellês).

Gal'antyne (3 syl.), the steed given to Graunde Amoure by king Melyzyus.

> And I myselfe shall give you a worthy stede,
> Called Galantyne, to help you in your nede.
> Hawes: The Passe-tyme of Pleasure, xxviii. (1515).

Ga'laor (Don), brother of Am'adis of Gaul. A desultor amoris, who, as don Quixote says, "made love to every pretty girl he met." His adventures form a strong contrast to those of his more serious brother.—Amadis of Gaul (fourteenth century).

> A barber in the village insisted that none equalled "The Knight of the Sun" [i.e. Amadis], except don Galaor his brother.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. i. 1 (1605).

Gal'apas, a giant of "marvellous height" in the army of Lucius king of Rome. He was slain by king Arthur.

> [King Arthur] slew a great giant named Galapas . . . He shortened him by smiting off both his legs at the knees, saying, "Now art thou better of a size to deal with than thou wert." And after, he smote off his head.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 115 (1470).

Galaph'ron or GALLAPHRONE (3 syl.), a king of Cathay, father of Angelica.—Bojardo: Orlando Innamorato (1495); Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

> When Agrican . . . besieged Albracca . . .
> The city of Gallaphrone, whence to win
> The fairest of her sex, Angelica.
> Milton: Paradise Regained, iii. (1671).

Galasp, or rather George Gillespie, mentioned by Milton in Sonnet, x., was a Scottish writer against the independents, and one of the "Assembly of Divines" (1583–1648).

Galate'a, a sea-nymph, beloved by Polypheme (3 syl.). She herself had a heartache for Acis. The jealous giant crushed his rival under a huge rock, and Galatea, inconsolable at the loss of her lover, was changed into a fountain. The word Galatea is used poetically for any rustic maiden.

(Handel has an opera called Acis and Galatea, 1710.)

Galatēa. A statue made by Pygmalion, which became animated, caused much mischief by her want of worldly knowledge, and returned to her original state. (See FRANKENSTEIN, p. 392.)—Gilbert: Pygmalion and Galatea (1871).

Galate'a, a wise and modest lady attending on the princess in the drama of Philaster, or Love Lies a-bleeding, by Beaumont and Fletcher (1608).

Galathe'a and Phillida, two girls who meet in fancy costume, and fall in love with each other.—Lily: Galathea (1592).

Gal'atine (3 syl.), the sword of sir Gaw'ain, king Arthur's nephew.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 93 (1470).

Galbraith (Major Duncan), of Garschattachin, a militia officer.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Ga'len, an apothecary, a medical man (in disparagement). Galen was the most celebrated physician of ancient Greece, and had a greater influence on medical science than any other man before or since (A.D. 130–200).

> Unawed, young Galen bears the hostile brunt,
> Pills in his rear, and Cullen in his front.
> W. Falconer: The Midshipman.

(Dr. William Cullen, of Hamilton, Lanarkshire, author of Nosology, 1712–1790.)

Galen'ical Medicines, herbs and drugs in general, in contradistinction to minerals recommended by Paracel'sus.

Gal'enist, a herb doctor.

> The Galênist and Paracelsian.
> S. Butler: Hudibras, iii. 3 (1678).

Galeopsis, from two Greek words, galê opsis, "a cat's face;" so called because the flowers resemble the picture of a cat's face.

Galeotti Martivalle (Martius), astrologer of Louis XI. Being asked by the superstitious king if he knew the day of his own death, the crafty astrologer replied that he could not name the exact day, but he had learnt thus much by his art—that it would occur just twenty-four hours before the decease of his majesty (ch. xxix.).—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

¶ Thrasullus the soothsayer made precisely the same answer to Tibe'rius emperor of Rome.

Galera'na is called by Ariosto the wife of Charlemagne; but the nine wives of that emperor are usually given as Hamiltrude (3 syl.), Desidera'ta, Hil'degarde (3 syl.), Fastrade (2 syl.), Luitgarde, Maltegarde, Gersuinde, Regi'na, and Adalin'da.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, xxi. (1516).

Galère (2 syl.). Que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère? Scapin wants to get from Géronte (a miserly old hunks) £30, to help Leandre, the old man's son, out of a money difficulty. So Scapin vamps up a cock-and-bull story about Leandre being invited by a Turk on board his galley, where he was treated to a most sumptuous repast; but when the young man was about to quit the galley, the Turk told him he was a prisoner, and demanded £30 for his ransom within two hours' time. When Géronte hears this, he exclaims, "Que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère?" and he swears he will arrest the Turk for extortion. Being shown the impossibility of so doing, he again exclaims, "Que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère?" and it flashes into his mind that Scapin should give himself up as surety for the payment of the ransom. This, of course, Scapin objects to. The old man again exclaims, "Que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère?" and commands Scapin to go and tell the Turk that £30 is not to be picked off a hedge. Scapin says the Turk does not care a straw about that, and insists on the ransom. "Mais, que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère?" cries the old hunks; and tells Scapin to go and pawn certain goods. Scapin replies there is no time, the two hours are nearly exhausted. "Que diable," cries the old man again, "allait-il faire dans cette galère?" and when at last he gives the money, he repeats the same words, "Mais, que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère?" —Molière: Les Fourberies de Scapin, ii. 11 (1671).

(Vogue la galère means "come what may," "let what will happen.")

Gale'sian Wool, the best and finest wool, taken from sheep pastured on the meadows of Galêsus.

> Dulce pellitis ovibus Galesi flumen.
> Horace: Carm. ii. 6. 10.

Gal'gacus, chief of the Caledonians, who resisted Agricŏla with great valour. In A.D. 84 he was defeated, and died on the field. Tacitus puts into his mouth a noble speech, made to his army before the battle.

> Galgacus, their guide,
> Amongst his murthered troops there resolutely died.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1612).

Galia'na, a Moorish princess, daughter of Gadalfe king of Tolêdo. Her father built for her a palace on the Tagus, so splendid that "a palace of Galiana" has become a proverb in Spain.

Galien Restored, a mediæval romance of chivalry. Galien was the son of Jaqueline (daughter of Hugh king of Constantinople). His father was count Oliver of Vienne. Two fairies interested themselves in Jaqueline's infant son: one, named Galienne, had the child named Galien, after her own name; but the other insisted that he should be called "Restored," for that the boy would restore the chivalry of Charlemagne.—Author unknown.

Galilæan. Jesus was called a Galilæan, probably meaning that he was a native of that province. Julian said when dying, "Thou hast conquered, O Galilæan!"

> Thou hast conquered, O pale Galilæan!
> Swinburne: Hymn to Proserpine. (Poems and Ballads, 1st series, 1866.)

Galile'o [GALILEI], born at Pisa, but lived chiefly in Florence. In 1633 he published his work on the Copernican system, showing that "the earth moved and the sun stood still." For this he was denounced by the Inquisition of Rome, and accused of contradicting the Bible. At the age of 70 he was obliged to abjure his system, in order to gain his liberty. After pronouncing his abjuration, he said, in a stage whisper, E pur si muove ("It does move, though"). This is said to be a romance (1564–1642).

Galinthia, daughter of Prœtus king of Argos. She was changed by the Fates into a cat, and in that shape was made by Hecate her high priestess.—Antonius Liberalis: Metam., xxix.

Galis, in Arthurian romance, means "Wales," as sir Lamorake de Galis, i.e. sir Lamorake the Welshman.

Gallegos [Gal'-le-gose], the people of Galicia (once a province of Spain).

Gal'lia, France. "Gauls," the inhabitants of Gallia.

Gallice'næ, priestesses of Gallic mythology, who had power over the winds and waves. There were nine of them, all virgins.

Galligan'tus, the giant who lived with Hocus-Pocus the conjurer. When Jack the Giant-killer blew the magic horn, both the giant and conjurer were overthrown.—Jack the Giant-killer.

Gallo-Bel'gicus, an annual register in Latin, first published in 1598.

> It is believed . . .
> As if 'twere writ in Gallo-Belgicus.
> T. May: The Heir (1623).

Gallo-ma'nia, a furor for everything French. Generally applied to that vile imitation of French literature and customs which prevailed in Germany in the time of Frederick II. of Prussia. It is very conspicuous in the writings of Wieland (1733–1813).

Galloping Dick, Richard Ferguson the highwayman, executed in 1800.

Gal'loway (A), a small nag of the breed which originally came from Galloway, in Scotland.

Galloway (The Fair Maid of), Margaret, only daughter of Archibald fifth earl of Douglas. She married her cousin William, to whom the earldom passed in 1443. After the death of her first husband, she married his brother James (the last earl of Douglas).

Gal'lowglasses, heavy-armed Irish foot-soldiers; their chief weapon was the pole-axe. They were "grim of countenance, tall of stature, big of limb, lusty of body, and strongly built." The light-armed foot-soldiers were called "Kerns" or "Kernes" (1 syl.).

> The multiplying villainies of nature
> Do swarm upon him: from the western isles
> Of Kernes and Gallowglasses [he's] supplied.
> Shakespeare: Macbeth, act I. sc. 2 (1606).

Gallu'ra's Bird, the cock, which was the cognizance of Gallura.

> For her so fair a burial will not make
> The viper [the Milanese, whose ensign was a viper]
> As had been made by shrill Gallura's bird.
> Dante: Purgatory, viii. (1308).

Gal'way Jury, an independent jury, neither to be brow-beaten nor led by the nose. In 1635, certain trials were held in Ireland, respecting the right of the Crown to the counties of Ireland. Leitrim, Roscommon, Sligo, and Mayo gave judgment in favour of the Crown, but Galway stood out, whereupon each of the jury was fined £4000.

Ga'ma (Vasco da), the hero of Camoëns's Lusiad. Sagacious, intrepid, tender-hearted, pious, and patriotic. He was the first European navigator who doubled the Cape of Good Hope (1497).

> Gama, captain of the venturous band,
> Of bold emprise, and born for high command,
> Whose martial fires, with prudence close allied,
> Ensured the smiles of fortune on his side.
> Camoëns: Lusiad, I. (1569).

 Gama is also the hero of Meyerbeer's posthumous opera called L'Africane (1865).

Game and Playe of Chesse (The), by Caxton. The first book printed in England (1471).

Gam'elyn (3 syl.), youngest of the three sons of sir Johan di Boundys, who, on his death-bed, left "five plowes of land" to each of his two elder sons, and the residue of his property to the youngest. The eldest son took charge of Gamelyn, but entreated him shamefully. On one occasion he said to him, "Stand still, gadelyng, and bold thy peace." To which the proud boy retorted, "I am no gadelyng, but the lawful son of a lady and true knight." On this, the elder brother sent his servants to chastise him, but he drove them off "with a pestel." Not long after, Gamelyn asked his brother to lend him a horse that he might attend a wrestling-match. This he did, and "bysought Jhesu Crist that Gamelyn might breke his nekke." At the wrestling-match young Gamelyn threw the champion, and carried off the prize ram; and on his return home in triumph, he invited his followers to a banquet, which lasted seven days. When the guests were gone, Johan, by treachery, had Gamelyn bound to a tree, and kept him without food for two days, when Adam the spenser (i.e. the man who had charge of the buttery) secretly unbound him and gave him food; and Gamelyn fell upon a party of ecclesiastics, who had come to dine with his brother, and "sprinkled holy water on them with a stout oaken cudgel." The sheriff sent to apprehend the young spitfire, but he fled with Adam into the woods, and came upon a party of foresters sitting at meat. The captain gave him welcome, and Gamelyn in time became "king of the outlaws." Johan, being sheriff, had him arrested and sent to prison, but Ote, the other brother, bailed him out, and at the assize, Johan was executed, Ote was made sheriff in his brother's place, and Gamelyn became the king's chief ranger, and married "a wif both good and feyr."—Chaucer: Coke's Tale of Gamelyn.

 Lodge has made this tale the basis of his romance entitled Rosalynd or Euphues Golden Legacie (1590); and from Lodge's novel Shakespeare has borrowed the plot, with some of the characters and dialogue, of As You Like It.

Gamelyn de Guar'dover (Sir), an ancestor of sir Arthur Wardour.—Sir W. Scott: Antiquary (time, George III.).

Gamester (The), a tragedy by Ed. Moore (1753). The name of the gamester is Beverley, and the object of the play is to show the great evils of gambling, ending in despair and suicide.

Gamester (The), by Mrs. Centlivre (1705). The hero is Valere, to whom Angelica gives a picture, which she enjoins him not to lose on pain of forfeiting her hand. Valere loses it in play, and Angelica, in disguise, is the winner. After much tribulation, Valere is cured of his vice, the picture is restored, and the two are happily united in marriage.

Gammer Gurton's Needle, by Mr. S. Master of Arts. It was in existence, says Warton, in 1551 (English Poetry, iv. 32). Sir Walter Scott says, "It was the supposed composition of John Still, M.A., afterwards bishop of Bath and Wells;" but in 1551 John Still was a boy not nine years old. The fun of this comedy turns on the loss and recovery of a needle, with which Gammer Gurton was repairing the breeches of her man Hodge. The comedy contains the famous drinking-song, I Cannot Eat but Little Meat.

Gammer Gurton's Needle is a great curiosity. The popular characters, such as "The Sturdy Beggar," "The Clown," "The Country Vicar," and "The Shrew," of the sixteenth century, are drawn in colours taken from the life . . . The place is the open square of the village before Gammer Gurton's door: the action, the loss of the needle; and this, followed by the search for it, and its final recovery, is intermixed with no other thwarting or subordinate interest.—Sir W. Scott: The Drama.

Gamp (Sarah), a monthly nurse, residing in Kingsgate Street, High Holborn. Sarah was noted for her gouty umbrella, and for her perpetual reference to an hypothetical Mrs. Harris, whose opinions were a confirmation of her own. She was fond of strong tea and strong stimulants. "Don't ask me," she said, "whether I won't take none, or whether I will, but leave the bottle on the chimley-piece, and let me put my lips to it when I am so disposed." When Mrs. Prig, "her pardner," stretched out her hand to the teapot [filled with gin], Mrs. Gamp stopped the hand and said with great feeling, "No, Betsey! drink fair, wotever you do." (See HARRIS.)—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit, xlix. (1843).

 A big, pawky umbrella is called a Mrs. Gamp, and in France un Robinson, from Robinson Crusoe's umbrella.

 Mrs. Gamp and Mrs. Harris have Parisian sisters in Mde. Pochet and Mde. Gibou, creations of Henri Monnier.

Gan. (See GANELON.)

Gan'abim, the island of thieves. (Hebrew, gannab, "a thief.")—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, iv. 66 (1545).

Gan'dalin, earl of the Firm Island, and 'squire of Am'adis de Gaul.

Gandalin, though an earl, never spoke to his master but cap in hand, his head bowing all the time, and his body bent after the Turkish manner.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iii. 6 (1605).

Ganden, a dandy. So called from the Boulevard de Gand, now called the Boulevard des Italiens (Paris), the walk where the dandies disported themselves.

Gander-Cleugh ["folly-cliff"], that mysterious place where a person makes a goose of himself. Jededi'ah Cleishbotham, the hypothetical editor of The Tales of My Landlord, lived at Gandercleugh.—Sir W. Scott.

Gan'elon (2 syl.), count of Mayence, the "Judas" of Charlemagne's paladins. His castle was built on the Blocksberg, the loftiest peak of the Hartz Mountains. Charlemagne was always trusting this base knight, and was as often betrayed by him. Although the very business of the paladins was the upholding of Christianity, sir Ganelon was constantly intriguing for its overthrow. No doubt, jealousy of sir Roland made him a traitor, and he basely planned with Marsillus (the Moorish king) the attack of Roncesvalles. The character of sir Ganelon was marked with spite, dissimulation, and intrigue, but he was patient, obstinate, and enduring. He was six feet and a half in height, had large glaring eyes, and fiery red hair. He loved solitude, was very taciturn, disbelieved in the existence of moral good, and has become a by-word for a false and faithless friend. Dante has placed him in his "Inferno." (Sometimes called GAN.)

> The most faithless spy since the days of Ganelon.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot, xxiv. (1820).

Ganem, "the Slave of Love." The hero and title of one of the Arabian Nights tales. Ganem was the son of a rich merchant of Damascus, named Abou Aibou. On the death of his father he went to Bagdad, to dispose of the merchandize left, and accidentally saw three slaves secretly burying a chest in the earth. Curiosity induced him to disinter the chest, when, lo! it contained a beautiful woman, sleeping from the effects of a narcotic drug. He took her to his lodgings, and discovered that the victim was Fetnab, the caliph's favourite, who had been buried alive by order of the sultana, out of jealousy. When the caliph heard thereof, he was extremely jealous of the young merchant, and ordered him to be put to death; but he made good his escape in the guise of a waiter, and lay concealed till the angry fit of the caliph had subsided. When Haroun-al-Raschid (the caliph) came to himself, and heard the unvarnished facts of the case, he pardoned Ganem, gave to him Fetnab for a wife, and appointed him to a lucrative post about the court.

Ganor, Gano'ra, Geneura, Ginevra, Genievre, Guinevere, Guenever, are different ways of spelling the name of Arthur's wife; callled by Geoffrey of Monmouth, Guanhuma'ra or Guan'humar; but Tennyson has made Guenevere the popular English form.

Gan'ymede (3 syl.), a beautiful Phrygean boy, who was carried up to Olympos on the back of an eagle, to become cup-bearer to the gods instead of Hebê. At the time of his capture he was playing a flute while tending his father's sheep.

> There fell a flute when Ganymede went up—
> The flute that he was wont to play upon > Jean Ingelow: Honours, ii.

(Jupiter compensated the boy's father for the loss of his son, by a pair of horses.)

⁂ Tennyson, speaking of a great reverse of fortune from the highest glory to the lowest shame, says—

> They mounted Ganymede
> To tumble Vulcans on the second morn.
> The Princess, iii.

The Birds of Ganymede, eagles. Ganymede is represented as sitting on an eagle, or attended by that bird.

> To see upon her shores her fowl and conies feed,
> And wantonly to hatch the birds of Ganymede.

Gar'cias. The soul of Peter Garcias, money. Two scholars, journeying to Salamanca, came to a fountain, which bore this inscription: "Here is buried the soul of the licentiate Peter Garcias." One scholar went away laughing at the notion of a buried soul, but the other, cutting with his knife, loosened a stone, and found a purse containing 100 ducats. —Lesage: Gil Blas (to the reader, 1715).

Garcilas'o, surnamed "the Inca," descended on the mother's side from the royal family of Peru (1530–1568). He was the son of Sebastian Garcilaso, a lieutenant of Alvarado and Pizarro. Author of Commentaries on the Origin of the Incas, their Laws and Government.

It was from poetical traditions that Garcilasso [sic] composed his account of the Yncas of Peru . . . It was from ancient poems which his mother (a princess of the blood of the Yncas) taught him in his youth, that he collected the materials of his history.—Dissertation on the Era of Ossian.

Garcilaso [DE LA VEGA], called "The Petrarch of Spain," born at Toledo (1530–1568) His poems are eclogues, odes, and elegies of great naïveté, grace, and harmony.

Gar'diner (Richard), porter to Miss Seraphine Arthuret and her sister Angelica.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Gardiner (Colonel), colonel of Waverley's regiment.—Sir W. Scott's Waverley (time, George II.).

Gareth (Sir) according to ancient romance, was the youngest son of Lot king of Orkney and Morgawse Arthur's [half]-sister. His mother, to deter him from entering Arthur's court, said, jestingly, she would consent to his so doing if he concealed his name and went as a scullion for twelve months. To this he agreed, and sir Kay, the king's steward, nicknamed him "Beaumains," because his hands were unusually large. At the end of the year he was knighted, and obtained the quest of Linet', who craved the aid of some knight to liberate her sister Lionês, who was held prisoner by sir Ironside in Castle Perilous. Linet treated sir Gareth with great contumely, calling him a washer of dishes and a kitchen knave; but he overthrew the five knights and liberated the lady, whom he married. The knights were—first, the Black Knight of the Black Lands or sir Pere'ad (2 syl.), the Green Knight or sir Pertolope, the Red Knight or sir Perimo'nês, the Blue Knight or sir Persaunt of India (four brothers), and lastly the Red Knight of the Red Lands or sir Ironside.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 120–123 (1470).

 According to Tennyson, sir Gareth was "the last and tallest son of Lot king of Orkney and of Bellicent his wife." He served as a kitchen knave in king Arthur's hall a twelvemonth and a day, and was nicknamed "Beaumains." At the end of twelve months he was knighted, and obtained leave to accompany Lynette to the liberation of her sister Lyonors, who was held captive in Castle Perilous by a knight called Death or Mors. The passages to the castle were kept by four brothers, called by Tennyson Morning Star or Phos'phorus, Noonday Sun or Meridies, Evening Star or Hespĕrus, and Night or Nox, all of whom he overthrew. At length Death leapt from the cleft skull of Night, and prayed the knight not to kill him, seeing that what he did his brothers had made him do. At starting, Lynette treated Gareth with great contumely, but softened to him more and more after each victory, and at last married him.

He that told the tale in olden times
Says that sir Gareth wedded Lyonors;
But he that told it later says Lynette.
Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("Gareth and Lynette").

Gareth and Linet is in reality an allegory, a sort of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, describing the warfare of a Christian from birth to his entrance into glory. The "Bride" lived in Castle Perilous, and was named Lionês; Linet' represents the "carnal world," which, like the inhabitants of the City of Destruction, jest and jeer at everything the Christian does. Sir Gareth fought with four knights, keepers of the roads to "Zion" or Castle Perilous, viz. Night, Dawn, Midday, and Evening, meaning the temptations of the four ages of man. Having conquered in all these, he had to encounter the last enemy, which is Death, and then the bride was won—the bride who lived in Castle Perilous or Mount Zion.

 Tennyson, in his version of this beautiful allegory, has fallen into several grave errors, the worst of which is his making Gareth marry Lynette (as he spells the name), instead of the true bride. This is like landing his Pilgrim in the City of Destruction, after having finished his journey and passed the flood. Gareth's brother was wedded to the world (i.e. Linet), but Gareth himself was married to the "true Bride," who dwelt in Castle Perilous. Another grave error is making Death crave of Gareth not to kill him, as what he did he was compelled to do by his elder brothers. I must confess that this to me is quite past understanding. (See Notes and Queries, January 19, February 16, March 16, 1878.)

Gar'gamelle (3 syl.), wife of Grangousier and daughter of the king of the Parpaillons. On the day that she gave birth to Gargantua she ate 16 qrs. 2 bush. 3 pecks and a pipkin of dirt, the mere remains left in the tripe which she had for supper, although the tripe had been cleaned with the utmost care.—Rabelais: Gargantua, i. 4 (1533).

(Gargamelle is an allegorical skit on the extravagance of queens, and the dirt is their pin-money.)

Gargan'tua, son of Grangousier and Gargamelle. It needed 17,913 cows to supply the babe with milk. Like Garagantua (q.v.), he ate in his salad lettuces as big as walnut trees, in which were lurking six pilgrims from Sebastian. He founded and endowed the abbey of Theleme (2 syl.), in remembrance of his victory over Picrochole (3 syl.).—Rabelais: Gargantua, i. 7 (1533).

(Of course, Gargantua is an allegorical skit on the allowance accorded to princes for their maintenance. The name was familiar in fable before Rabelais appropriated it. When Shakespeare refers to it in As You Like It, he probably refers to one of the older stories, and not to Rabelais.)

Gargantua, by Rabelais, in French (1533). The English version by Urquhart and Motteux (1653).

Gargantua's Mare. This mare was as big as six elephants, and had feet with fingers. On one occasion, going to school, the "boy" hung the bells of Notre Dame de Paris on his mare's neck, as jingles; but when the Parisians promised to feed his beast for nothing, he restored the peal. This mare had a terrible tail, "every whit as big as the steeple of St. Mark's," and on one occasion, being annoyed by wasps, she switched it about so vigorously that she knocked down all the trees in the vicinity. Gargantua roared with laughter, and cried, "Je trouve beau ce!" whereupon the locality was called "Beauce."—Rabelais: Gargantua, i. 16 (1533).

(Of course, this "mare" is an allegorical skit on the extravagance of court mistresses, and the "tail" is the suite in attendance on them.)

Gargan'tuan Curriculum, a course of studies including all languages, all sciences, all the fine arts, with all athletic sports and calisthenic exercises. Grangousier wrote to his son, saying—

"There should not be a river in the world, no matter how small, thou dost not know the name of, with the nature and habits of all fishes, all fowls of the air, all shrubs and trees, all metals, minerals, gems, and precious stones. I would, furthermore, have thee study the Talmudists and Cabalists, and get a perfect knowledge of man, together with every language, ancient and modern, living or dead."—Rabelais: Pantagruel, ii. 8 (1533).

Gargery. (See JOE GARGERY.)—Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

Gargouille (2 syl.), the great dragon that lived in the Seine, ravaged Rouen, and was slain by St. Roma'nus in the seventh century.

Garland of Howth (Ireland), the book of the four Gospels preserved in the abbey of Howth, remains of which still exist.

Garlic, the old English gar-leac (the spear-[shaped] leek); the leaves are spear-shaped.

Garlic. The purveyor of the sultan of Casgar says he knew a man who lost his thumbs and great toes from eating garlic. The facts were these: A young man was married to the favourite of Zobeidê, and partook of a dish containing garlic; when he went to his bride, she ordered him to be bound, and cut off his two thumbs and two great toes, for presuming to appear before her without having purified his fingers. Ever after this he washed his hands 120 times with alkali and soap after partaking of garlic in a ragout.—Arabian Nights ("The Purveyor's Story").

Gar'ratt (The mayor of). Garratt is a village between Wandsworth and Tooting. In 1780 the inhabitants associated themselves together to resist any further encroachments on their common, and the chairman was called the Mayor. The first "mayor" happened to be chosen on a general election, and so it was decreed that a new mayor should be appointed at each general election. This made excellent capital for electioneering squibs, and some of the greatest wits of the day have ventilated political grievances, gibbeted political characters, and sprinkled holy water with good stout oaken cudgels under the mask of "addresses by the mayors of Garratt."

(S. Foote has a farce entitled The Mayor of Garratt, 1763.)

Garraway's, a coffee-house in Exchange Alley, which existed for 216 years, but is now pulled down. Here tea was sold in 1657 for sums varying from 16*s.* to 50*s.* per lb.

Garter. According to legend, Joan countess of Salisbury accidentally slipped her garter at a court ball. It was picked up by her royal partner, Edward III., who gallantly diverted the attention of the guests from the lady by binding the blue band round his own knee, saying, as he did so, "Honi soit qui mal y pense."

> The earl's greatest of all grandmothers
> Was grander daughter still to that fair dame
> Whose garter slipped down at the famous ball.
> R. Browning: A Blot on the 'Scutcheon, I. 3.

Garth (Mary), in Middlemarch, ultimately marries Fred Vincy. The heroine is Dorothea, who marries Cassaubon.—George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross) (1872).

Gartha, sister of prince Oswald of Vero'na. When Oswald was slain in single combat by Gondibert (a combat provoked by his own treachery), Gartha used all her efforts to stir up civil war; but Hermegild, a man of great prudence, who loved her, was the author of wiser counsel, and diverted the anger of the camp by a funeral pageant of unusual splendour. As the tale is not finished, the ultimate lot of Gartha is unknown.—Davenant: Gondibert (died 1668).

Gas (Charlatan), in Vivian Grey, a novel by Disraeli (lord Beaconsfield) (1827).

Gas'abal, the squire of don Galaor.

> Gasabal was a man of such silence that the author names him only once in the course of his voluminous history.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iii. 6 (1605).

Gascoigne (Sir William). Shakespeare says that prince Henry "struck the chief justice in the open court;" but it does not appear from history that any blow was given. The fact is this—

> One of the gay companions of the prince being committed for felony, the prince demanded his release; but sir William told him the only way of obtaining a release would be to get from the king a free pardon. Prince Henry now tried to rescue the prisoner by force, when the judge ordered him out of court. In a towering fury, the prince flew to the judgment-seat, and all thought he was about to slay the judge: but sir William said very firmly and quietly, "Syr, remember yourselfe. I kepe here the place of the kynge, your sovereigne lorde and father, to whom you owe double obedience; wherefore I charge you in his name to desyste of your wylfulnes. . . . And nowe for your contempte goo you to the prysona of the Kynges Benche, whereunto I commytte you, and remayne ye there prisoner untyll the pleasure of the kynge be further known." With which words, the prince being abashed, the noble prisoner departed and went to the King's Bench.—Sir T. Elyot: The Governour (1531).

Gashford, secretary to lord George Gordon. A detestable, cruel sneak, who dupes his half-mad master, and leads him to imagine he is upholding a noble cause in plotting against the English catholics. To wreak vengeance on Geoffrey Haredale, he incites the rioters to burn "The Warren," where Haredale resided. Gashford commits suicide.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Gaspar or Caspar ["the white one"], one of the three Magi or kings of Cologne. His offering to the infant Jesus was frankincense, in token of divinity.

(The other two were Melchior ("king of light"), who offered gold, symbolical of royalty; and Balthazar ("lord of treasures"), who offered myrrh, to denote that Christ would die. Klopstock, in his Messiah, makes the number of the Magi six, not one of which names agrees with those of Cologne Cathedral. See COLOGNE, p. 226.)

Gaspard, the steward of count De Valmont, in whose service he had been for twenty years, and to whom he was most devotedly attached.—Dimond: The Foundling of the Forest.

Gas'pero, secretary of state, in the drama called The Laws of Candy, by Beaumont and Fletcher (1647). (Beaumont died 1616.)

Gaster (Master), the ruler of an island which appears rugged and barren, but is really fertile and pleasant. He is the first master of arts in the world.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, bk. iv. (1545).

Gastrolaters, inhabitants of the island Gaster. Probably the monks.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, bk. iv. (1545).

Gate of France (Iron), Longwy, a strong military position.

Gate of Italy, that part of the valley of the Adigê which is in the vicinity of Trent and Roverêdo. It is a narrow gorge between two mountain ridges.

Gate of Tears [Babelmandeb], the passage into the Red Sea.

Gates (Iron) or Demir Kara, a celebrated pass of the Teuthras, through which all caravans between Smyrna and Brusa must needs pass.

Gates of Cilicia [pylæ Ciliciæ], a defile connecting Cappadocia and Cilicia. Now called the Pass of Gölek Bógház.

Gates of Syria [pylæ Syriæ], a Beilan pass. Near this pass was the battle-field of Issus (B.C. November, 333).

Gates of the Caspian [pylæ Caspiæ], a rent in the high mountain-wall south of the Caspian, in the neighbourhood of the modern Persian capital.

Gates of the Occult Sciences (The), forty, or as some say forty-eight, books on magic, in Arabic. The first twelve teach the art of sorcery and enchantment, the thirteenth teaches how to disenchant and restore bodies to their native shapes again. A complete set was always kept in the Dom-Daniel or school for magic in Tunis.—Continuation of the Arabian Nights ("History of Mau'graby").

Gath'erill (Old), bailiff to sir Geoffrey Peveril of the Peak.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Gauden'tio di Lucca, the hero and title of a romance by Simon Berington. He makes a journey to Mezzoramia, an imaginary country in the interior of Africa.

Gaudi'osa (Lady), wife of Pelayo; a wise and faithful counsellor, high-minded, brave in danger, and a real help-mate.—Southey: Roderick, Last of the Goths (1814).

Gaul, son of Morni of Strumon. He was betrothed to Oith'ona daughter of Nuäth, but before the day of marriage he was called away by Fingal to attend him on an expedition against the Britons. At the same time Nuäth was at war, and sent for his son Lathmon; so Oithona was left unprotected in her home. Dunrommath lord of Uthal (or Cuthal) seized this opportunity to carry her off, and concealed her in a cave in the desert island of Trom'athon. When Gaul returned to claim his betrothed, he found she was gone, and was told by a vision in the night where she was hidden. Next day, with three followers, Gaul went to Tromathon, and the ravisher coming up, he slew him and cut off his head. Oithona, armed as a combatant, mingled with the fighters and was wounded. Gaul saw what he thought a youth dying, and went to offer assistance, but found it was Oithona, who forthwith expired. Disconsolate, he returned to Dunlathmon, and thence to Morven.—Ossian: Oithona.

> His voice was like many streams.—Ossian: Fingal, iii.

(Homer makes a loud voice a thing to be much commended in a warrior.)

Gaul (A) generally means a Frenchman; and Gallia means France, the country of the Celtæ or Keltai, called by the Greeks "Gallatai," and shortened into "Galli." Wales is also called Gallia, Galis, and Gaul, especially in mediæval romance: hence, Amadis of Gaul is not Amadis of France, but Amadis of Wales; sir Lamorake de Galis is sir Lamorake of Wales. Gaul in France is Armorica or Little Britain (Brittany).

Gawain [Gaw'n], son of king Lot and Morgause (Arthur's sister). His brothers were Agravain, Ga'heris, and Ga'reth. The traitor Mordred was his half-brother, being the adulterous offspring of Morgause and prince Arthur. Lot was king of Orkney. Gawain was the second of the fifty knights created by king Arthur; Tor was the first, and was dubbed the same day (pt. i. 48). When the adulterous passion of sir Launcelot for queen Guenever came to the knowledge of the king, sir Gawain insisted that the king's honour should be upheld. Accordingly, king Arthur went in battle array to Benwicke (Brittany), the "realm of sir Launcelot," and proclaimed war. Here sir Gawain fell, according to the prophecy of Merlin, "With this sword shall Launcelot slay the man that in this world he loved best" (pt. i. 44). In this same battle the king was told that his bastard son Mordred had usurped his throne, so he hastened back with all speed, and in the great battle of the West received his mortal wound (pt. iii. 160–167).—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur (1470).

(Of Arthurian knights, Gawain is called the "Courteous," sir Kay the "Rude and Boastful," Mordred the "Treacherous," Launcelot the "Chivalrous," Galahad the "Chaste," Mark the "Dastard," sir Palomides (3 syl.) the "Saracen" i.e. unbaptized, etc.)

Gawky (Lord), Richard Grenville (1711–1770).

Gaw'rey, a flying woman, whose wings served the double purpose of flying and dress.—Pultock: Peter Wilkins (1750).

Gay (Lucien), in lord Beaconsfield's Coningsby, said to be meant for Theodore Hook (1844).

Gay (Walter), in the firm of Dombey and Son. An honest, frank, ingenuous youth, who loved Florence Dombey, and comforted her in her early troubles. Walter Gay was sent in the merchantman called The Son and Heir, as junior partner, to Barbadoes, and survived a shipwreck. After his return from Barbadoes, he married Florence.—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Gayless (Charles), the pennyless suitor of Melissa. His valet is Sharp.—Garrick: The Lying Valet (1741).

Gay'ville (Lord), the affianced husband of Miss Alscrip "the heiress," whom he detests; but he ardently loves Miss Alton, her companion. The former is conceited, overbearing, and vulgar, but very rich; the latter is modest, retiring, and lady-like, but very poor. It turns out that £2000 a year of "the heiress's" property was entailed on sir William Charlton's heirs, and therefore descended to Mr. Clifford in right of his mother. This money Mr. Clifford settles on his sister, Miss Alton (whose real name is Clifford). Sir Clement Flint tears the conveyance, whereby Clifford retains the £2000 a year, and sir Clement settles the same amount on lord Gayville, who marries Miss Alton alias Miss Clifford.

Lady Emily Gayville, sister of lord Gayville. A bright, vivacious, and witty lady, who loves Mr. Clifford. Clifford also greatly loves lady Emily, but is deterred from proposing to her, because he is poor and unequal to her in a social position. It turns out that he comes into £2000 a year in right of his mother, lady Charlton; and is thus enabled to offer himself to the lady, by whom he is accepted.—Burgoyne: The Heiress (1781).

Gaz'ban, the black slave of the old fire-worshipper, employed to sacrifice the Mussulmans to be offered on the "mountain of fire."—Arabian Nights ("Amgiad and Assad").

Gazette (Sir Gregory), a man who delights in news, without having the slightest comprehension of politics.—Foote: The Knights (1754).

Gazingi (Miss), of the Portsmouth Theatre.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Gaz'nivides (3 syl.), a Persian dynasty, which gave four kings and lasted fifty years. It was founded by Mahmoud Gazni (999–1049).

Ge'ber, an Arabian alchemist, born at Thous, in Persia (eighth century). He wrote several treatises on the "art of making gold," in the usual mystical jargon of the period; and hence our word gibberish ("senseless jargon").

Philip Geddes, grandfather of Joshua and Rachel Geddes.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Geese save the Capitol. The following are fair parallel cases:—

When the French forces under Coligny (Jan. 6, 1557) had arranged a night attack on the city of Douay, while all men slept, an old woman accidentally observed the movement of the French forces, and ran shrieking through the streets. Her clamour roused the guards, and the city was saved.—Motley: The Dutch Republic, pt. i. 2.

¶ The protestants besieged in Beziers (France) owed their safety to a drunken drummer, who, in reeling to his quarters at midnight, rang the alarm-bell of the town, not knowing what he did. And just at that moment the enemy, about to make an assault, alarmed by the bell, precipitately retreated, and the town was saved.—Flavel.

¶ I remember reading of a mouse scampering over a drum-head, and rousing the guard.

Gehen'na, the place of everlasting torment. Strictly speaking, it means the Valley of Hinnom (Ge Hinnom), where sacrifices to Moloch were offered, and where refuse of all sorts was subsequently cast, for the consumption of which fires were kept constantly burning. There was also a sort of aqua tofana, called liquor Gehennæ.

> Holy water it may be to many,
> But to me the veriest liquor Gehennas.
> Longfellow: The Golden Legend.
>
> And black Gehenna called, the type of hell.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 405 (1665).

Geierstein [Gī'-er-stine], Arnold count of.

Count Albert of Geierstein, brother of Arnold Biederman, disguised (1) as the black priest of St. Paul's; (2) as president of the secret tribunal; (3) as monk at Mont St. Victoire.

Anne of Geierstein, called "The Maiden of the Mist," daughter of count Albert, and baroness of Arnheim.

Count Heinrich of Geierstein, grandfather of count Arnold.

Count Willienald of Geierstein, father of count Arnold.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

N.B.—For sketch of the tale, see ANNE OF GEIERSTEIN, p. 46.

Geisaser (Peterkin), one of the insurgents at Liège [Le-aje].—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Geith (George), a model of untiring industry, perseverance, and moral courage. Undaunted by difficulties, he pursued his onward way, and worked as long as breath was left him.—Mrs. Trafford [Riddell]: George Geith.

Gelert, Llewellyn's favourite hound. One day, Llewellyn returned from hunting, when Gêlert met him smeared with gore. The chieftain felt alarmed, and instantly went to look for his baby son. He found the cradle overturned, and all around was sprinkled with gore and blood. He called his child, but no voice replied, and, thinking the hound had eaten it, he stabbed the animal to the heart. The tumult awoke the baby boy, and on searching more carefully, a huge wolf was found under the bed, quite dead. Gêlert had slain the wolf and saved the child.

> And now a gallant tomb they raise,
> With costly sculpture decked;
> And marbles, storied with his praise,
> Poor Gêlert's bones protect.
> Hon. W. R. Spencer: Beth-Gelert ("Gêlert's Grave").

¶ This tale, with a slight difference, is common to all parts of the world. It is told in the Gesta Romanorum of Folliculus, a knight; but the wolf is a "serpent," and Folliculus, in repentance, makes a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. In the Sanskrit version, given in the Pantschatantra (A.D. 540), the tale is told of the brahmin Devasaman, an "ichneumon" and "black snake" taking the places of the dog and the wolf. In the Arabic version by Nasr-Allah (twelfth century), a "weasel" is substituted for the dog; in the Mongolian Uligerun a "polecat;" in the Persion Sindibadnâmch, a "cat;" and in the Hitopadesa (iv. 3). an "otter." In the Chinese Forest of Pearls from the Garden of the Law, the dog is an "ichneumon," as in the Indian version (A.D. 668). In Sandabar, and also in the Hebrew version, the tale is told of a dog. A similar tale is told of czar Piras of Russia; and another occurs in the Seven Wise Masters.

Gel'latly (Davie), idiot servant of the baron of Bradwardine (3 syl.).

Old Janet Gellatly, the idiot's mother.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

(In some editions the word is spelt "Gellatley.")

Geloi'os, Silly Laughter personified. Geloios is slain by Encra'tês (temperance) in the battle of Mansoul. (Greek, gêloios, "facetious.")

> Geloios next ensued, a merry Greek,
> Whose life was laughter vain, and mirth misplaced;
> His speeches broad, to shame the modest cheek;
> Nor cared he whom, or when, or how disgraced.
> P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, viii., st. [illegible]

Gem of Normandy, Emma, daughter of Richard "the Fearless," duke of Normandy. She first married Ethelred II. of England, and then Canute, but survived both, and died in 1052.

There is a story told that Emma was once brought to trial on various charges of public and private misconduct, but that she cleared herself by the ordeal of walking blindfold over red-hot ploughshares without being hurt.—E. A. Freeman: Old English History, 265.

Gem of the Ocean. Ireland is called by T. Moore "first gem of the ocean, first pearl of the sea."

Gems Emblems of the Twelve Apostles.

ANDREW, the bright blue sapphire, emblematic of his heavenly faith.

BARTHOLOMEW, the red carnelian, emblematic of his martyrdom.

JAMES, the white chalcedony, emblematic of his purity.

JAMES THE LESS, the topas, emblematic of delicacy.

JOHN, the emerald, emblematic of his youth and gentleness.

MATTHEW, the amethyst, emblematic of sobriety. Matthew was once a "publican," but was "sobered" by the leaven of Christianity.

MATTHIAS, the chrysolite, pure as sunshine.

PETER, the jasper, hard and solid as the rock of the Church.

PHILIP, the friendly sardonyx.

SIMEON of Cana, the pink hyacinth, emblematic of sweet temper.

THADDEUS, the chrysoprase, emblematic of serenity and trustfulness.

THOMAS, the beryl, indefinite in lustre, emblematic of his doubting faith.

Gems symbolic of the Months.

January, the jacinth or hyacinth, symbolizing constancy and fidelity.

February, the amethyst, symbolizing peace of mind and sobriety.

March, the blood-stone or jasper, symbolizing courage and success in dangerous enterprise.

April, the sapphire and diamond, symbolizing repentance and innocence.

May, the emerald, symbolizing success in love.

June, the agate, symbolizing long life and health.

July, the carnelian, symbolizing cure of evils resulting from forgetfulness.

August, the sardonyx or onyx, symbolizing conjugal felicity.

September, the chrysolite, symbolizing preservation from folly, or its cure.

October, the aqua-marine, opal, or beryl, symbolizing hope.

November, the topaz, symbolizing fidelity and friendship.

December, the turquoise or ruby, symbolizing brilliant success.

 Some doubt exists between May and June, July and August. Thus some give the agate to May, and the emerald to June; the carnelian to August, and the onyx to July.

Gembok or Gemsboc, a sort of stag, a native of South Africa. It is a heavy, stout animal, which makes such use of its horns as even to beat off the lion.

Far into the heat among the sands,
The gembok nations, snuffing up the wind
Drawn by the scent of water; and the bands
Of tawny-bearded lions pacing, blind
With the sun-dazzle . . . and spiritless for lack of rest.
Jean Ingelow: The Four Bridges.

Gem'ini ["the twins"]. Castor and Pollux are the two principal stars of this constellation; the former has a bluish tinge, and the latter a damask red.

As heaven's high twins, whereof in Tyrian blue
The one revelveth; through his course immense
Might love his fellow of the damask hue.
Jean Ingelow: Honours, i.

Gemini. Mrs. Browning makes Eve view in the constellation Gemini a symbol of the increase of the human race, and she loved to gaze on it.—A Drama of Exile (1850).

Genesis. The Greek name for the first book of the Old Testament. The Jews call it "In the beginning," from the first words (chap. i. 1). The Greek word means "Origin," and the book is so called because it tells us the "origin" of all created things. It carries down the history of the world for 2369 years.

Its main subjects are the history of Adam and Eve till their expulsion from paradise; the Flood; and the dispersion of the human race.

It contains also a brief account of Cain and Abel, two sons of Adam; of Noah and his three sons; of the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and a pretty full account of Joseph, a romance of life more romantic than any fiction ever written.

Geneu'ra. (See GINEURA, p. 424.) (Queen Guinever or Guenever is sometimes called "Geneura" or "Genevra.")

Gene'va Bull (The). Stephen Marshall, a Calvinistic preacher.

Geneviève (St.), the patron saint of Paris, born at Nanterre. She was a shepherdess, but went to Paris when her parents died, and was there during Attila's invasion (A.D. 451). She told the citizens that God would spare the city, and "her prediction came true." At another time she procured food for the Parisians suffering from famine. At her request, Clovis built the church of St. Pierre et St. Paul, afterwards called Ste. Geneviève (3 syl.). Her day is January 3. Her relics are deposited in the Panthéon now called by her name (419-512).

Genii or Ginn, an intermediate race between angels and men. They ruled on earth before the creation of Adam.—D'Herbelot: Bibliothèque Orientale, 357 (1697).

∴ Solomon is supposed to preside over the whole race of genii. This seems to have arisen from a mere confusion of words of somewhat similar sound. The chief of the genii was called a suleyman, which got corrupted into a proper name.

Genii (Tales of the), translated from the Persian by sir Charles Morell (1765).

Charles Morell is the pseudonym of the Rev. James Ridley.

Genius and Common Sense. T. Moore says that Common Sense and Genius once went out together on a ramble by moonlight. Common Sense went prosing on his way, arrived home in good time, and went to bed; but Genius, while gazing at the stars, stumbled into a river and was drowned.

¶ This story is told of Thalês the philosopher by Plato. Chaucer has also an allusion thereto in his Miller's Tale.

So ferde another clerk with 'stronomye:
He walkèd in the feeldès for to prye
Upon the sterrès, what ther should 'befall,
Til he was in a marlé pit I-fall.
Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, 3457, etc. (1388).

Geona'ro, the natural son of Lucrezia di Borgia (daughter of pope Alexander VI.) before her marriage with Alfonso duke of Ferra'ra. He was brought up by a Neapolitan fisherman. In early manhood he went to Venice, heard of the scandalous cruelty of Lucrezia, and, with the heedless petulance of youth, mutilated the duke's escutcheon by striking out the B, thus converting Borgia into Orgia (orgies). (For the rest of the tale, see BORGIA, p. 138.)—Donizetti: Lucrezia di Borgia (1834).

Gennil (Ralph), a veteran in the troop of sir Hugo de Lacy.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Genove'fa, wife of Siegfried count palatine of Brabant. Being suspected of infidelity, she was driven into the forest of Ardennes, where she gave birth to a son, who was suckled by a white doe. After a time, Siegfried discovered his error, and both mother and child were restored to their proper home.—German Popular Stories.

Tieck and Müller have popularized the tradition, and Raupach has made it the subject of a drama.

Gentle Shepherd (The), George Grenville. In one of his speeches, he exclaimed in the House, "Tell me where!" when Pitt hummed the line of a popular song, "Gentle Shepherd, tell me where!" and the House was convulsed with laughter (1712-1770).

Gentle Shepherd (The), the title and chief character of Allan Ramsay's pastoral drama (1725).

Gentleman of Europe (The First), George IV. (1762, 1820-1830).

It was the "first gentleman in Europe" in whose high presence Mrs. Rawdon passed her examination, and took her degree in reputation; so it must be flat disloyalty to doubt her virtue. What a noble appreciation of character must there not have been in Vanity Fair when that august sovereign was invested with the title of Premier Gentilhomme of all Europe!—Thackeray: Vanity Fair (1848).

The First Gentleman of Europe, Louis d'Artois.

Gentleman Painter (The). Rubens is spoken of by Charles Beane as le gentilhomme de la peinture (1577-1640).

Gentleman Smith, William Smith, actor, noted for his gentlemanly deportment on the stage (1730-1790).

Geoffrey, archbishop of York.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Geoffrey, the old ostler of John Mengs (innkeeper at Kirchhoff).—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Geoffrey Crayon, the hypothecal name of the author of the Sketch-Book, by Washington Irving of New York (1818–1820).

GEORGE (Honest). General Monk, George duke of Albemarle, was so called by the votaries of Cromwell (1608–1670).

George (Mr.), a stalwart, handsome, simple-hearted fellow, son of Mrs. Rouncewell the housekeeper at Chesney Wold. He was very wild as a lad, and ran away from his mother to enlist as a soldier; but on his return to England he opened a shooting-gallery in Leicester Square, London. When sir Leicester Dedlock, in his old age, fell into trouble, George became his faithful attendant.—. Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

George (St.), the patron saint of England. He was born at Lydda, but brought up in Cappadocia, and suffered martyrdom in the reign of Diocletian, April 23, A.D. 303. Mr. Hogg tells us of a Greek inscription at Ezra, in Syria, dated 346, in which the martyrdom of St. George is referred to. At this date was living George bishop of Alexandria, with whom Gibbon, in his Decline and Fall, has confounded the patron saint of England; but the bishop died in 362, or fifty-nine years after the prince of Cappadocia. (See RED CROSS KNIGHT.)

(Mussulmans revere St. George under the name of "Gherghis.")

St. George's Bones were taken to the church in the city of Constantine.

St. George's Head. One of his heads was preserved at Rome. Long forgotten, it was rediscovered in 751, and was given in 1600 to the church of Ferrara. Another of his heads was preserved in the church of Mares-Moutier, in Picardy.

St. George's Limbs. One of his arms fell from heaven upon the altar of Pantaleon, at Cologne. Another was preserved in a religious house of Barala, and was transferred thence in the ninth century to Cambray. Part of an arm was presented by Robert Flanders to the city of Toulouse; another part was given to the abbey of Auchin, and another to the countess Matilda.

George and the Dragon (St.). St. George, son of lord Albert of Coventry, was stolen in infancy by "the weird lady of the woods," who brought the lad up to deeds of arms. His body had three marks: a dragon on the breast, a garter round one of the legs, and a blood-red cross on the right arm. When he grew to manhood, he fought against the Saracens. In Libya he heard of a huge dragon, to which a damsel was daily given for food, and it so happened that when he arrived the victim was Sabra, the king's daughter. She was already tied to the stake when St. George came up. On came the dragon; but the knight, thrusting his lance into the monster's mouth, killed it on the spot. Sabra, being brought to England, became the wife of her deliverer, and they lived happily in Coventry till death.—Percy: Reliques, III. iii. 2.

This is a mere skit by John Grubb, and has no pretension to an historical fact.

St. George and the Dragon, on old guinea-pieces, was the design of Pistrucci. It was an adaptation of a didrachm of Tarentum, B.C. 250.

 The encounter between George and the dragon took place at Berytus (Beyrut).

(The tale of St. George and the dragon is told in the Golden Legends of Jacques de Voragine. See S. Baring-Gould's Curious Myths of the Middle Ages.)

George I. and the duchess of Kendal (1719). The duchess was a German, whose name was Erangard Melrose de Schulemberg. She was created duchess of Munster, in Ireland, baroness Glastonbury, countess of Feversham, and duchess of Kendal (died 1743).

George II. His favourite was Mary Howard, duchess of Suffolk.

 George II., when angry, vented his displeasure by kicking his hat about the room. We are told that Xerxes vented his displeasure at the loss of his bridges by ordering the Hellespont to be fettered, lashed with 300 stripes, and insulted.

 The nickname of the prince of Wales, eldest son of George II., was "prince Titi," from a pseudonym which he adopted in the memoirs which he wrote. The name was suggested by a fairy tale by St. Hyacinthe, called The History of Prince Titi.

George III. and the Fair Quakeress. When George III. was about 20 years of age, he fell in love with Hannah Lightfoot, daughter of a linen-draper in Market Street, St. James's. He married her in Kew Church, 1759, but of course the marriage was not recognised. (See LOVERS.)

N.B.—The following year (September, 1760) he married the princess Charlotte of Mecklenburg-Strelitz. Hannah Lightfoot married a Mr. Axford, and passed out of public notice.

(The nickname of George III. was "Farmer George," or "The Farmer King.")

George IV. and Mrs. Mary Robinson, generally called Perdita. Mary Darby, at the age of 15, married Mr. Robinson, who lived a few months on credit, and was then imprisoned for debt. Mrs. Robinson sought a livelihood on the stage, and George IV., then prince of Wales and a mere lad, saw her as "Perdita," fell in love with her, corresponded with her under the assumed name of "Florizel," and gave her a bond for £20,000, subsequently cancelled for an annuity of £500 (1758–1800).

 George IV. was born in 1762, and was only 16 in 1778, when he fell in love with Mrs. Robinson. The young prince suddenly abandoned her, and after two other love affairs, privately married, at Carlton House (in 1785), Mrs. Fitzherbert, a lady of good family, and a widow, seven years his senior. The marriage being contrary to the law, he married the princess Caroline of Brunswick, in 1795; but still retained his connection with Mrs. Fitzherbert, and added a new favourite, the countess of Jersey.

(The nicknames of George IV. were "The First Gentleman of Europe," "Fum the Fourth," "Prince Florizel," "The Adonis of 50," or "The Fat Adonis of 50.")

George [DE LAVAL], a friend of Horace de Brienne (q. vl.). Having committed forgery, Carlos (alias marquis d'Antas), being cognizant of it, had him in his power; but Ogarita (alias Martha) obtained the document, and returned it to George.—Stirling: Orphan of the Frozen Sea (1856).

George-a-Greene, the pinner or pound-keeper of Wakefield, one of the chosen favourites of Robin Hood.

> Veni Wakefield peramœnum,
> Ubi quærens Georgium Greenum,
> Non inveni, sed in lignum,
> Fixum reperi Georgii signum,
> Ubi altam bibi feram,
> Donec Georgio fortior eram.
> Drunken Barnaby (1648).

> Once in Wakefield town, so pleasant,
> Sought I George-a-Green, the peasant;
> Found him not, but spied instead, sir,
> On a sign, "The George's Head," sir;
> Valiant grown with ale like nectar.
> What cared I for George or Hector?—B. C. B.

(Robert Greene has a comedy entitled George-a-Greene, the Pinner of Wakefield (1589). There is also an old prose romance recounting his contests with Robin Hood and Little John.)

George Barnwell. (See BARNWELL, p. 91.)

George Street (Strand, London), one of a series of streets named after the second duke of Buckingham. The series consists of George Street, Villiers Street, Duke Street, and Buckingham Street.

Georges (The Four), lectures by Thackeray on the kings and customs of the times referred to, with satire, epigram, and humour (1856–7).

Georgian Women (The). Allah, wishing to stock his celestial harem, commissioned an imaum to select for him forty of the loveliest women he could find. The imaum journeyed into Frankistan, and from the country of the Inglis carried off the king's daughter. From Germany he selected other maidens; but when he arrived at Gori (north-west of Tiflis) he fell in love with one of the beauties, and tarried there. Allah punished him by death, but the maidens remained in Gori, and became the mothers of the most beautiful race of mortals in the whole earth.—A Legend.

Georgina [Vesey], daughter of sir John Vesey. Pretty, but vain and frivolous. She loved, as much as her heart was susceptible of such a passion, sir Frederick Blount; but wavered between her liking and the policy of marrying Alfred Evelyn, a man of great wealth. When she thought the property of Evelyn was insecure, she at once gave her hand to sir Frederick.—Lord Lytton: Money (1840).

Geraint' (Sir), of Devon, one of the knights of the Round Table. He was married to E'nid, only child of Yn'iol. Fearing lest Enid should be tainted by the queen, sir Geraint left the court, and retired to Devon. Half sleeping and half waking, he overheard part of Enid's words, and fancying her to be unfaithful to him, treated her for a time with great harshness; but when he was wounded Enid nursed him with such wifely tenderness that he could no longer doubt her fealty, and a complete understanding being established, "they crowned a happy life with a fair death."—Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("Geraint and Enid").

Ger'aldin (Lord), son of the earl of Glenallan. He appears first as William Lovell, and afterwards as major Neville. He marries Isabella Wardour (daughter of sir Arthur Wardour).

Sir Aymer de Geraldin, an ancestor of lord Geraldin.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Ger'aldine (3 syl.), a young man, who comes home from his travels to find his playfellow (that should have been his wife) married to old Wincott, who receives him hospitably as a friend of his father's, takes delight in hearing tales of his travels, and treats him most kindly. Geraldine and the wife mutually agree not in any wise to wrong so noble and confiding an old gentleman.—Heywood: The English Traveller (1576–1645).

Geraldine (Lady), an orphan, the ward of her uncle count de Valmont. She is betrothed to Florian "the foundling of the forest," and the adopted son of the count. This foundling turns out to be his real son, who had been rescued by his mother and carried into the forest to save him from the hands of Longueville, a desperate villain.—Dimond: The Foundling of the Forest.

Geraldine (The Fair), the lady whose praises are sung by Henry Howard earl of Surrey. Supposed to be lady Elizabeth Fitzgerald, daughter of Gerald Fitzgerald ninth earl of Kildare. She married the earl of Lincoln.

> That favoured strain was Surrey's raptured line;
> The fair and lovely form, the lady Geraldine.
> Sir W. Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel (1805).

Geraldine's Courtship (Lady), a poem by Mrs. Browning (1844). The lady falls in love with a peasant-poet, whom she marries.

Gerard (John), an English botanist (1545–1607), who compiled the Catalogus Arborum, Fruticum, et Plantorum, tam Indigenarum quam Exoticarum, in Horto Johanis Gerardi. Also author of the Herbal or General History of Plants (1597).

> Of these most helpful herbs yet tell we but a few,
> To those unnumbered sorts of simples here that grew...
> Not skilful Gerard yet shall ever find them all.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Gerard, attendant of sir Patrick Charteris (provost of Perth).—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Gerhard the Good, a merchant of Cologne, who exchanges his rich friegh for a cargo of Christian slaves, that he might give them their liberty. He retains only one, who is the wife of William king of England. She is about to marry the merchant's son, when the king suddenly appears, disguised as a pilgrim. Gerhard restores the wife, ships both off to England, refuses all recompense, and remains a merchant as before.—Rudolf of Ems (a minnesinger): Gerhard the Good (thirteenth century).

Ger'ion. So William Browne, in his Britannia's Pastorals (fifth song), calls Philip of Spain. The allusion is to Geryon of Gadês (Cadis), a monster with three bodies (or, in other words, a king over three kingdoms) slain by Hercules.

 The three kingdoms over which Philip reigned were Spain, Germany, and the Netherlands.

Gerlinda or Girlint, the mother of Hartmuth king of Norway. When Hartmuth carried off Gudrun the daughter of Hettel (Attila), and she refused to marry him, Gerlinda put her to the most menial work, such as washing the dirty linen. But her lover, Herwig king of Heligoland, invaded Norway, and having gained a complete victory, put Gerlinda to death.—An Anglo-Saxon Poem (thirteenth century).

German Literature (Father of), Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729-1781).

Germany, formerly called Tongres. The name was changed according to fable) in compliment to Ger'mana, sister of Julius Cæsar, and wife of Salvius Brabon duke of Brabant.—Jehan de Maire: Illustrations de Gaule, iii. 20–23.

 Geoffrey of Monmouth says that Ebraucus, one of the descendants of Brute king of Britain, had twenty sons, all of whom, except the eldest, settled in Tongres, which was then called Germany, because it was the land of the germans or brothers.

> These germans did subdue all Germany,
> Of whom it hight.
> Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 10 (1590).

Geron'imo, the friend of Sganarelle (3 syl.). Sganarelle asks him if he would advise his marrying. "How old are you?" asks Geronimo; and being told that he is 63, and the girl under 20, says, "No." Sganarelle, greatly displeased at his advice, declares he is hale and strong, that he loves the girl, and has promised to marry her. "Then do as you like," says Geronimo.—Molière: Le Mariage Forcé (1664).

¶ This joke is borrowed from Rabelais. Panurge asks Pantag'ruel whether he advises him to marry. "Yes," says the prince; whereupon Panurge states several objections. "Then don't," says the prince. "But I wish to marry," says Panurge. "Then do it by all means," says the prince. Every time the prince advises him to marry, Panurge objects; and every time the prince advises the contrary, the advice is equally unacceptable. The oracle of the Holy Bottle, being consulted, made answer, "Do as you like."—Pantag'ruel, iii. 9 (1545)

Géronte' (2 syl.), father of Léandre and Hyacinthe; a miserly old hunks. He has to pay Scapin £30 for the "ransom" of Léandre, and after having exhausted every evasion, draws out his purse to pay the money, saying, "The Turk is a villain!" "Yes," says Scapin. "A rascal!" "Yes," says Scapin. "A thief!" "Yes," says Scapin. "He would wring from me £30! would he?" "Yes," says Scapin. "Oh, if I catch him, won't I pay him out?" "Yes," says Scapin. Then, putting his purse back into his pocket, he walks off, saying, "Pay the ransom, and bring back the boy." "But the money; where's the money?" says Scapin. "Oh, didn't I give it you?" "No," says Scapin. "I forgot," says Géronte, and he pays the money (act ii. sc. 11).—Molière: Les Fourberies de Scapin (1671).

(In the English version, called The Cheats of Scapin, by Otway, Géronte is called "Gripe," Hyacinthe is called "Clara," Léandre is Angelicized into "Leander," and the sum of money borrowed is £200, instead of 500 écus.)

Géronte (2 syl.), the father of Lucinde (2 syl.). He wanted his daughter to marry Horace, but as she loved Léandre, in order to avoid a marriage she detested, she pretended to have lost the power of articulate speech, and only answered, "Han, hi, hon!" "Han, hi, hon, han!" Sganarelle, "le médecin malgré lui," seeing that this jargon was put on, and ascertaining that Léandre was her lover, introduced him as an apothecary, and the young man soon effected a perfect cure with "pills matrimoniac."—Molière: Le Médecin Malgré Lui (1666).

Ger'rard, king of the beggars, disguised under the name of Clause. He is the father of Flores the rich merchant of Bruges.—Fletcher: The Beggars' Bush (1622).

Ger'trude (2 syl.), Hamlet's mother. On the death of her husband, who was king of Denmark, she married Claudius, the late king's brother. Gertrude was accessory to the murder of her first husband, and Claudius was principal. Claudius prepared poisoned wine, which he intended for Hamlet; but the queen, not knowing it was poisoned, drank it and died. Hamlet, seeing his mother fall dead, rushed on the king and killed him.—Shakespeare: Hamlet (1596).

(In the Historie of Hamblett, Gertrude is called "Geruth.")

Gertrude of Wy'oming, daughter of the patriarch Albert. One day, an Indian brought to Albert a lad (nine years old) named Henry Waldegrave (2 syl.), and told the patriarch he had promised the boy's mother, at her death, to place her son under his care. The lad remained at Wyoming for three years, and was then sent to his friends. When grown to manhood, Henry Waldegrave returned to Wyoming, and married Gertrude; but three months afterwards, Brandt, at the head of a mixed army of British and Indians, attacked the settlement, and both Albert and Gertrude were shot. Henry Waldegrave then joined the army of Washington, which was fighting for American independence.—Campbell: Gertrude of Wyoming (1809).

N.B.—Campbell accents Wyoming on the first syllable, but it is more usual to throw the accent on the second.

Gerundio (Fray), i.e. Friar Gerund, the hero and title of a Spanish romance, by the jesuit De l'Isla. It is a satire on the absurdities and bad taste of the popular preachers of the time. It is full of quips and cranks, tricks of acting, and startling sentimentality.—Joseph Isla: Life of Friar Gerund (1758).

Ge'ryon's Sons, the Spaniards; so called from Geryon, an ancient king of Spain, whose oxen were driven off by Her'culês. This task was one of the hero's "twelve labours." Milton uses the expression in Paradise Lost, xi. 410 (1665).

Geryon'eo, a human monster with three bodies. He was of the race of giants, "being the son of Geryon, the tyrant who gave all strangers" as food to his kine, the fairest and the fiercest kine alive." Geryoneo promised to take the young widow Belgê (2 syl.) under his protection; but it was like the wolf protecting the lamb, for "he gave her children to a dreadful monster to devour." In her despair, she applied to king Arthur for help, and the British king, espousing her cause, soon sent Geryoneo "down to the house of dole."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 10, 11 (1596).

 "Geryoneo" is the house of Austria, and Philip of Spain in particular. "King Arthur" is England, and the earl of Leicester in particular. The "Widow Belgê" is the Netherlands; and the monster that devoured her children the inquisition, introduced by the duke of Alva. "Geryoneo" had three bodies, for Philip ruled over three kingdoms—Spain, Germany, and the Netherlands. The earl of Leicester, sent in 1585 to the aid of the Netherlands, broke off the yoke of Philip.

Gesa, solemn vows, injunctions, and prohibitions. In old Celtic romances, to place a person under gesa bonds was to adjure him so solemnly that he dare not disobey without loss of honour and reputation. Sometimes the gesa were imposed with spells, so as to draw down ill luck as well as loss of honour on the persons who disregarded the injunction.

Gesmas, the impenitent thief crucified with our Lord. In the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, he is called Gestas. The penitent thief was Dismas, Dysmas, Demas, or Dumacus.

> Three bodies on three crosses hang supine:
> Dismas and Gesmas and the Power Divine.
> Dismas seeks heaven, Gesmas his own damnation,
> The Mid-one seeks our ransom and salvation.
> E. C. B.: Translation of a Latin Charm.

Gessler (Albrecht), the brutal and tyrannical governor of Switzerland appointed by Austria over the three forest cantons. When the people rose in rebellion, Gessler insulted them by hoisting his cap on a pole, and threatening death to any one who refused to bow down to it in reverence. William Tell refused to do so, and was compelled to shoot at an apple placed on the head of his own son. Having dropped an arrow by accident, Gessler demanded why he had brought a second. "To shoot you," said the intrepid mountaineer, "if I fail in my task." Gessler then ordered him to be cast into Kusnacht Castle, "a prey to the reptiles that lodged there." Gessler went in the boat to see the order executed, and as the boat neared land, Tell leapt on shore, pushed back the boat, shot Gessler, and freed his country from Austrian domination.—Rossini: Guglielmo Tell (1829). (See EGIL, p. 316.)

Gesta Romano'rum, first published in 1473. The book is divided into 152 chapters, and is made up of old chronicles, lives of saints, Oriental apologies, and romantic inventions. The author is said to have been Helinandus. (See Hazlitt's English Poetry, vol. i.)

Geta, according to sir Walter Scott, the representative of a stock slave and rogue in the new comedy of Greece and Rome (? Getês).

> The principal character, upon whose devices and ingenuity the whole plot usually turns, is the Geta of the piece—a witty, roguish, insinuating, and malignant slave, the confidant of a wild and extravagant son, whom he aids in his pious endeavours to cheat a suspicious, severe, and griping father.—Sir W. Scott: The Drama.

Ghengis Khan, a title assumed by Tamerlane or Timour the Tartar (1336–1405).

Ghilan, a district of Persia, notoriously unhealthy, and rife with fever, ague, cholera, and plague. Hence the Persian proverb—

> "Let him who is tired of life retire to Ghilan."

Ghost (The), so graphically described by Defoe, was the apparition of Mrs. Veal, and the place referred to is Botathen, in Little Petherick, Cornwall.

¶ The ghost of Mr. Dingley of Launceston, Cornwall, was described by [Dr.] John Ruddle or Ruddell (seventeenth century).

Giaffir [Djaf-fir], pacha of Aby'dos, and father of Zuleika [Zu-lee-kah]. He tells his daughter he intends her to marry the governor of Magne'sia, but Zuleika has given her plight to her cousin Selim. The lovers take to flight; Giaffir pursues and shoots Selim; Zuleika dies of grief and the father lives on, a broken-hearted old man, calling to the winds, "Where is my daughter?" and echo answers, "Where?"—Byron: Bride of Abydos (1813).

Giam'schid [Jam-shid], a suleyman of the Peris. Having reigned seven hundred years, he thought himself immortal; but God, in punishment, gave him a human form, and sent him to live on earth, where he became a great conqueror, and ruled over both the East and West. The bulwark of the Peris' abode was composed of green chrysolite, the reflection of which gives to the sky its deep blue-green hue.

> Soul beamed forth in every spark
> That darted from beneath the lid,
> Bright as the jewel of Giamschid.
> Byron: The Giaour (1813).

She only wished the amorous monarch had shown more ardour for the carbuncle of Giamschid.—Beckford: Vathek (1786).

Giants of Mythology and Fable.

Strabo makes mention of the skeleton of a giant 60 cubits in height. Pliny tells us of another 46 cubits. Boccaccio describes the body of a giant from bones discovered in a cave near Trapani, in Sicily, 200 cubits in length. One tooth of this "giant" weighed 200 ounces; but Kircher says the tooth and bones were those of a mastodon.

(1) AC'AMAS, one of the Cyclops.—Greek Fable.

(2) ADAMASTOR, the giant Spirit of the Cape. His lips were black, teeth blue, eyes shot with livid fire, and voice louder than thunder.—Camoëns: Lusiad, v.

(4) AG'RIOS, one of the giants called Titans. He was killed by the Parcæ.—Greek Fable.

(5) ALCYONEUS [Al'-si-ō-nuce] or AL'CION, brother of Porphyrion. He stole some of the Sun's oxen, and Jupiter sent Hercules against him, but he was unable to prevail, for immediately the giant touched the earth he received fresh vigour. Pallas, seizing him, carried him beyond the moon, and he died. His seven daughters were turned into halcyons or kingfishers.—Apollonius Rhodius: Argonautic Expedition, i. 6.

(6) AL'GEBAR'. The giant Orion is so called by the Arabs.

(7) ALIFANFARON or ALIPHARNON, emperor of Trapoban.—Don Quixote.

(8) ALOE'OS (4 syl.), son of Titan and Terra.—Greek Fable.

(9) ALOI'DES (4 syl.), sons of Alœ'us (4 syl.), named Otos and Ephialtês (q.v.).

(10) AM'ERANT, a cruel giant, slain by Guy of Warwick.—Percy: Reliques.

(11) ANGOLAFFER, the Saracen giant. He was 21 cubits high, his face measured 3 feet in breadth, his nose was 9 inches long, his arms and legs 6 feet. He had the strength of thirty men, and his mace was the solid trunk of an oak tree, 300 years old. The tower of Pisa lost its perpendicularity by the weight of this giant leaning against it to rest himself. He was slain in single combat by Roland, at Fronsac.—L'Epine: Conquemistaine.

(12) ANTÆOS, 60 cubits (85 feet) in height.—Plutarch.

(13) ARGES (2 syl.), one of the Cyclops.—Greek Fable.

(14) ASCAPART, a giant 30 feet high, and with 12 inches between his eyes. Slain by sir Bevis of Southampton.—British Fable.

(16) BALAN, "bravest and strongest of the giant race."—Amadis of Gaul.

(17) BELLE, famous for his three leaps, which gave names to the places called Wanlip, Burstall, and Belle-grave.—British Fable.

(18) BELLE'RUS, the giant from whom Cornwall derived its name "Bellerium."—British Fable.

(19) BLUNDERBORE (3 syl.), the giant who was drowned because Jack scuttled his boat.—Jack the Giant-killer.

(21) BROBDINGNAG, a country of giants, to whom an ordinary-sized man was "not half so big as the round little worm pricked from the lazy finger of a maid."—Swift: Gulliver's Travels.

(22) BRONTES (2 syl.), one of the Cyclops.—Greek Fable.

(23) BURLONG, a giant mentioned in the romance of Sir Tryamour.

(24) CACUS, of mount Aventine, who dragged the oxen of Hercules into his cave tail foremost.—Greek Fable.

(25) CALIG'ORANT, the Egyptian giant, who entrapped travellers with an invisible net.—Ariosto.

(26) CARACULIAMBO, the giant that don Quixote intended should kneel at the foot of Dulcin'ea.—Cervantes: Don Quixote.

(27) CŒUS or CŒUS, son of Heaven and Earth. He married Phœbê, and was the father of Latôna.—Greek Fable.

(28) CHALBROTH, the stem of all the giant race.—Rabelais: Pantagruel.

(29) CHRISTOPHERUS or ST. CHRISTOPHER, the giant who carried Christ across a ford, and was well-nigh borne down with the "child's" ever-increasing weight.—Christian Legend.

(30) CLYTIOS, one of the giants who made war upon the gods. Vulcan killed him with a red-hot iron mace.—Greek Fable.

(31) COLBRAND, the Danish giant slain by Guy of Warwick.—British Fable.

(32) CORFLAMBO, a giant who was always attended by a dwarf.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 8.

(33) CORI'NEUS (3 syl.). (See GOGMAGOG.)

(34) CORMORAN', the Cornish giant who fell into a pit 20 feet deep, dug by Jack and filmed over with a thin layer of grass and gravel.—Jack the Giant-killer.

(35) CORMORANT, a giant discomfited by sir Brian.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, vi. 4.[2]

(36) COTTOS, one of the three-hundred-headed giants, son of Heaven and Earth. His two brothers were Briareus (3 syl.) and Gyges.

(37) COULIN, the British giant pursued by Debon, and killed by falling into a deep chasm.—British Fable.

(38) CYCLOPS, giants with only one eye, and that in the middle of the forehead. They lived in Sicily, and were blacksmiths.—Greek Fable.

(39) DESPAIR, of Doubting Castle, who found Christian and Hopeful asleep on his grounds, and thrust them into a dungeon. He evilly entreated them, but they made their escape by the key "Promise."—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, i.

(40) DONDASCH, a giant contemporary with Seth. "There were giants in the earth in those days."—Oriental Fable.

(41) ENCEL'ADOS, "most powerful of the giant race." Overwhelmed under mount Etna.—Greek Fable.

(42) EPHIALTES (4 syl.), a giant who grew 4 inches every month.—Greek Fable.

(43) ERIX, son of Goliath [sic] and grandson of Atlas. He invented legerdemain.—Duchat: Œuvres de Rabelais (1711).

(44) EU'RYTOS, one of the giants who made war with the gods. Bacchus killed him with his thyrsus.—Greek Fable.

(45) FERRACUTE, a giant 36 feet in height, with the strength of forty men.—Turpin's Chronicle.

(46) FERRAGUS, a Portuguese giant.—Valentine and Orson.

(47) FIERABRAS, of Alexandria, "the greatest giant that ever walked the earth."—Mediæval Romance.

(48) FION, son of Comnal, an enormous giant, who could place his feet on two mountains, and then stoop and drink from a stream in the valley between.—Gaelic Legend.

(49) FIORGWYN, the gigantic father of Brigra.—Scandinavian Mythology.

(50) FRACASSUS, father of Perrigus, and son of Morganta.

> Primus erat quidam Fracassus prole gigantis,
> Cujus stirps olim Morganto venit ab illo,
> Qui bacchiconcm campense ferre solebat,
> Cum que mille hominum colpos fracasset in una.
> Merlin Cocaius [i.e. Theophile Folengo]
> Histoire Macaronique (1606).

(51) GABBARA, father of Goliah [sic] of Segundilla, and inventor of the custom of drinking healths.—Duchat: Œuvres de Rabelais (1711).

(52) GILAPAS, the giant slain by king Arthur.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur.

(53) GALLIGANTUA, the giant who lived with Mahomet the conqueror.—Jack the Giant-killer.

(54) GARAGANTUA, same as Gargantua (q.v.).

(55) GARGANTUA, a giant so large that it required 900 ells of linen for the body of his shirt, and 200 more for the gussets; 406 ells of velvet for his shoes, and 1100 cow-hides for their soles. His toothpick was an elephant's tusk, and 17,913 cows were required to give him milk. This was the giant who swallowed five pilgrims, with their staves, in a salad.—Rabelais: Gargantua.

(56) GEMMAGOG, son of the giant Oromëdon, and inventor of Poulan shoes, i.e. shoes with a spur behind, and turned-up toes fastened to the knees. These shoes were forbidden by Charles V. of France, in 1365, but the fashion revived again.—Duchat; Œuvres de Rabelais (1711).

(57) GERYON'EO, a giant with three bodies [Philip II. of Spain].—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 11.

(58) GIRALDA, the giantess. A statue of victory on the top of an old Moorish tower in Seville.

(59) GODMER, son of Albion, a British giant slain by Canu'tus, one of the companions of Brute.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 10.

(60) GOEM'AGOT, the Cornish giant who wrestled with Cori'neus (3 syl.), and was hurled over a rock into the sea. The place where he fell was called "Lam Goëmagot."—Geoffrey: British History.

(61) GOGMAGOG, king of the giant race of Albion when Brute colonized the island. He was slain by Cori'neus (3 syl.). The two statues of Guildhall represent Gogmagog and Corineus. The giant carries a pole-axe and spiked balls. This is the same as Goëmagot.

(62) GRANGOUSIA, the giant king of Utopia.—Rabelais: Pantagruel.

(63) GRANTORTO, the giant who withheld the inheritance of Irena.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v.

(64) GRIM, the giant slain by Greatheart, because he tried to stop pilgrims on their way to the Celestial City.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, ii.

(65) GRUM'BO, the giant up whose sleeve Tom Thumb crept. The giant, thinking some insect had crawled up his sleeve, gave it a shake, and Tom fell into the sea, when a fish swallowed him.—Tom Thumb.

(66) GYGES, who had fifty heads and a hundred hands. He was one of the Titans.—Greek Fable.

(67) HAPMOUCHE, the giant "fly-catcher." He invented the drying and smoking of neats' tongues.—Duchat: Œuvres de Rabelais (1711).

(au) RIECHART (F. H.), 8 feet 3 inches, of Friedberg. His father and mother were both giants.

(av) SALMERON (Martin), 7 feet 4 inches. A Mexican.

(aw) SAM (Big), 6 feet 10 inches. (See M'DONALD.)

(ax) SHERIDAN (Francis), 7 feet 8 inches. (See FRANK.)

(ay) SWAN (Miss Anne Hansen), 7 feet; of Nova Scotia.

(az) TOLLER (J.), 8 feet. Born 1795; died 1819, aged 24.

(aa) VON BRUSTED, of Norway, 8 feet. Exhibited in London, 1881.

 In 1682, a giant 7 feet 7 inches was exhibited in Dublin. A Swede 8 feet 6 inches was in the body-guard of a king of Prussia. A human skeleton 8 feet 6 inches is preserved in the museum of Trinity College, Dublin.

Becanus says he had seen a man nearly 10 feet high, and a woman fully 10 feet. Gasper Bauhin speaks of a Swiss 8 feet in height. Del Rio says he saw a Piedmontese in 1572 more than 9 feet in stature. C. S. F. Warren, M.A., says (in Notes and Queries, August 14, 1875) that his father knew a lady 9 feet high; "her head touched the ceiling of a good-sized room." Vanderbrook says he saw a black man, at Congo, 9 feet high.

 It will be seen that the tallest man was ELRAZER who was 10½ feet. Andronicus was 10 feet.

Giant of Literature, Dr. Samuel Johnson (1709–1783).

Giant's Causeway, a basaltic mole in Ireland, said to be the commencement of a causeway from Ireland to Scotland.

Giant's Dance (The), Stonehenge,

(See Geoffrey's British History, viii. 10–12.)

Giant's Grave (The), a height on the Adriatic shore of the Bosphorus, much frequented by holiday parties.

'Tis a grand sight from off "The Giant's Grave
To watch the progress of those rolling seas
Between the Bosphorus, as they lash and lave Europe and Asia.

Byron: Don Juan, v. 5 (1820).

Giant's Leap (Lam Goëmagot) or "Goëmagot's Leap." Now called Haw, near Plymouth. The legend is that Corineus (3 syl.) wrestled with Goëmagot king of the Albion giants, raised the monster on his shoulder, and, carrying him to the top of a high rock, heaved him into the sea.

At the beginning of the encounter, Corineus and the giant standing front to front held each other strongly in their arms, and panted aloud for breath, but Goëmagot presently grasping Corineus with all his might, broke three of his ribs, two on his right side and one on his left. At which Corineus, highly enraged, roused up his whole strength, and snatching up the giant, ran with him on his shoulders to the neighbouring cliff, and heaved him into the sea. . . . The place where he fell is called Lam Goëmagot or Goëmagot's Leap to this day.—Geoffrey: British History, l. 16 (1142).

Giants' War (The). There are two wars with the celestials in Greek mythology, viz. that waged by the Titans, and that waged by the giants. The former lasted ten years, and was a war between Kronos (a Titan) and Zeus (1 syl.) for "universal empire." In this war Zeus was victorious, and he hurled the followers of Kronos into Tartăros.

The latter war was from a revolt of the twenty-four giants against Zeus. The revolters were overcome by the aid of the other gods and the assistance of Hercules.

Giaour [djow'-er]. Byron's tale called The Giaour is supposed to be told by a Turkish fisherman who had been employed all the day in the gulf of Ægi'na, and landed his boat at nightfall on the Piræ'us, now called the harbour of Port Leonê. He was eye-witness of all the incidents, and in one of them a principal agent (see line 352, "I hear the sound of coming feet . . .").

 The tale is this: Leilah, the beautiful concubine of the caliph Hassan, falls in love with a giaour, flees from the seraglio, is overtaken, put to death, and cast into the sea. The Giaour cleaves Hassan's skull, flees for his life, and becomes a monk. Six years afterwards he tells his history to his father confessor on his death-bed, and prays him to "lay his body with the humblest dead, and not even to inscribe his name on his tomb." Accordingly, he is called "the Giaour," and is known by no other name (1813).

"He who hath bent him o'er the dead," etc., is in this poem.

A giaour is an unbeliever, one who disbelieves the Mohammedan faith.

Giauha're (4 syl.), daughter of the king of Saman'dal, the mightiest of the under-sea empires. When her father was made captive by king Saleh, she emerged for safety to a desert island, where she met Bed'er the young king of Persia, who proposed to make her his wife; but Giauharê "spat on him," and changed him "into a white bird with red beak and red legs." The bird was sold to a certain king, and, being disenchanted, resumed the human form. After several marvellous adventures, Beder again met the under-sea princess, proposed to her again, and she became his wife and queen of Persia.—Arabian Nights ("Beder and Giauharê"). (See BEDER, p. 101.)

Gibbet, a foot-pad and a convict, who "left his country for his country's good." He piqued himself on being "the best-behaved man on the road."

'Twas for the good of my country I should be abroad.—Farquhar: The Beaux' Stratagem, iii. 3 (1707).

I thought it rather odd . . . and said to myself, as Gibbet said when he heard that Almwell had gone to church, "That looks suspicious."—James Smith.

Gibbet (Master), secretary to Martin Joshua Bletson (parliamentary commissioner).—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Gib'bie (Guse), a half-witted lad in the service of lady Bellenden.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Like Goose Gibbie of famous memory, he first kept the turkeys, and then, as his years advanced, was promoted to the more important office of minding the cows.—Kingsley.

Gibby, a Scotch Highlander in attendance on colonel Briton. He marries Inis, the waiting-woman of Isabella.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Wonder (1714).

Gibou (Madame), a type of feminine vulgarity. A hard-headed, keen-witted, coarsely clever, and pragmatical maîtress femme, who believes in nothing but a good digestion and money in the Funds.—Henri Monnier: Scenes Populaires (1852).

Mde. Pochet and Mde. Gibou are the French "Mrs. Gamp and Mrs. Harris."

Gibraltar of America, Quebec.

Gibraltar of Greece, a precipitous rock 700 feet above the sea.

Gibraltar of the New World, Cape Diamond, in the province of Quebec.

Gibson (Janet), a young dependent on Mrs. Margaret Bertram of Singleside. —Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Gideon's Stratagem (Judg. vii. 16–20).

¶ A parallel case is recorded in Venetian history. When Anco'na was besieged by the Venetians, in 1174, Aldruda count of Bertinoro sent a small army to their aid. When it reached the summit of Falcognesa, in sight of Ancona, Marcheselli ordered every man to bind to the head of his lance several lighted torches, and to spread themselves out as wide as possible. It was night-time, and the men marched slowly down the mountain. Christian was dismayed, thought the relief party ten times more numerous than it really was, decamped, and the siege was raised.

Gifford (John). This pseudonym has been adopted by three authors: (1) John Richards Green, Blackstone's Commentaries Abridged (1823); (2) Edward Foss, An Abridgment of Blackstone's Commentaries (1821); (3) Alexander Whellier, The English Lawyer.

Gifford (William), author of The Baviad, a poetical satire, which annihilated the Della Crusea school of poets (1794). In 1796 Gifford published The Maeviad, to expose the low state of dramatic authorship.

He was a man with whom I had no literary sympathies. . . . He had, however, a heart full of kindness for all living creatures except authors; them he regarded as a fishmonger regards eels, or as Izaak Walton did worms.—Southey.

Giggleswick Fountain ebbs and flows eight times a day. The tale is that Giggleswick was once a nymph living with the Oreads on mount Craven. A satyr chanced to see her, and resolved to win her; but Giggleswick fled to escape her pursuer, and praying to the "topic gods" (the local genii), was converted into a fountain, which still pants with fear. The tale is told by Drayton, in his Polyolbion, xxviii. (1622).

Gil Blas, son of Blas of Santilla'ne 'squire or "escudero" to a lady, and brought up by his uncle, canon Gil Perès. Gil Blas went to Dr. Godines's school, of Oviedo [Ov-e-a'-do], and obtained the reputation of being a great scholar. He had fair abilities, a kind heart, and good inclinations, but was easily led astray by his vanity. Full of wit and humour, but lax in his morals. Duped by others at first, he afterwards played the same devices on those less experienced. As he grew in years, however, his conduct improved, and when his fortune was made he became an honest, steady man.—Lesage: Gil Blas (1715).

Gil Blas, by Lesage, bks. i.–iii., published in French in 1715; bks. iv.–vi., in 1724; bks. vii.–xii. in 1735. English versions: by Smollett (1761); by Procter (1774); by Smart (1861); etc.

 Lesage borrowed largely from the romance of Espinel, called Vida del Escudero Marcos de Obregon (1618), from which he has taken his prologue, the adventure of the parasite (bk. i. 2), the dispersion of the company of Cacabelos by the muleteer (bk. i. 3), the incident of the robber's cave (bk. i. 4, 5), the surprise by the corsairs, the contributions levied by don Raphael and Ambrose (bk. i. 15, 16), the service with the duke of Lerma, the character of Sangrado (called by Espinel Sagredo), and even the reply of don Matthias de Silva when asked to fight a duel early in the morning, "As I never rise before one, even for a party of pleasure, it is unreasonable to expect that I should rise at six to have my throat cut" (bk. iii. 8).

Gil Morrice. "Gil" is a variant of childe = don. (See MORRICE.)

Gilbert, butler to sir Patrick Charteris, provost of Perth.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Gilbert (Sir), noted for the sanative virtue of his sword and cere-cloth. Sir Launcelot touched the wounds of sir Meliot with sir Gilbert's sword and wiped them with the cere-cloth, and "anon a wholer man was he never in all his life." —Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 110 (1470).

Gilbert with the White Hand, one of the companions of Robin Hood, mentioned often in The Lyttell Geste of Robyn Hode (fytte v. and vii.).

Thair saw I Maitlaind upon auld Beird Gray,
Robene Hude, and Gilbert "with the quhite hand,"
Quhom Hay of Nauchton slew in Madin-land.
Scottish Poems, i. 122.

Gilbertsclough, cousin to lady Margaret Bellenden.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Gildas (The Wise), author of the chronicle De Excidio Britanniæ, first printed in 1525, utterly worthless as a history, extremely dull, meagre, and obscure. His book may be divided into two periods: (1) from the invasion of Britain by the Romans; and (2) from the revolt of Maximus to his own time. (He lived 493–570.)

Gildas de Ruys (St.), near Vannes, in France. This monastery was founded in the sixth century by St. Gildas "the Wise." Birth and death dates uncertain.

> For some of us knew a thing or two
> In the abbey of St. Gildas de Ruys.
> Longfellow: The Golden Legend.

Gil'deroy, a famous robber. There were two of the name, both handsome Scotchmen, both robbers, and both were hanged. One lived in the seventeenth century, and "had the honour" of robbing cardinal Richelieu and Oliver Cromwell. The other was born in Roslin, in the eighteenth century, and was executed in Edinburgh for "stealing sheep, horses, and oxen." In the Percy Reliques, I. iii. 12 is the lament of Gilderoy's widow at the execution of her "handsome" and "winsome" Gilderoy; and Campbell has a ballad on the same subject. Both are entitled Gilderoy, and refer to the latter robber; but in Thomson's Orpheus Caledonius, ii. is a copy of the older ballad.

 Thomson's ballad places Gilderoy in the reign of Mary "queen of Scots," but this is not consistent with the tradition of his robbing Richelieu and Cromwell. We want a third Gilderoy for the reign of queen Mary—one living in the sixteenth century.

Higher than Gilderoy's Kite. According to ancient custom, the greater the crime, the higher the gallows. Hence Haman was hanged on a very high gibbet. The gallows of Montrose was 30 feet high; and the ballad says of Gilderoy—

> Of Gilderoy sae frald they were,
> They bound him mickle strong,
> Tull Edenburrow they led him thair,
> And on a gallows hung;
> They hung him high above the rest
> He was so trim a boy. . . .

"Higher than Gilderoy's kite." Gilderoy was raised so high that he was like a kite in the air.

Gilding a Boy. Leo XII. killed the boy Mortara by gilding him all over to adorn a pageant.

Gildip'pe (3 syl.), wife of Edward an English baron, who accompanied her husband to Jerusalem, and performed prodigies of valour in the war (bk. ix.). Both she and her husband were slain by Solyman (bk. xx.).—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

GILES, a farmer in love with Patty, "the maid of the mill," who was promised to him by her father; but Patty refuses to marry him. Ultimately, the "maid of the mill" marries lord Aimworth. Giles is a blunt, well-meaning, working farmer, of no education, no refinement, no notion of the amenities of social life.—Bickerstaff: The Maid of the Mill (1765).

Giles (1 syl.), serving-boy to Claud Halcro.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Giles (1 syl.), warder of the Tower.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Giles (2 syl.), jailer of sir Reginald Front de Bœuf.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Giles (Will), apprentice of Gibbie Girder the cooper at Wolf's Hope village.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Giles, the "farmer's boy," "meek, fatherless, and poor," the hero of Robert Bloomfield's principal poem, which is divided into "Spring," "Summer," "Autumn," and "Winter" (1798).

Giles of Antwerp, Giles Coignet, the painter (1530–1600).

Gilfillan (Habakkuk), called "Gifted Gilfillan," a Camero'nian officer and enthusiast.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Gill (Harry), a farmer, who forbade old Goody Blake to carry home a few sticks, which she had picked up from his land, to light a wee-bit fire to warm herself by. Old Goody Blake cursed him for his meanness, saying he should never from that moment cease from shivering with cold; and sure enough, from that hour, a-bed or up, summer or winter, at home or abroad, his teeth went "chatter, chatter, chatter still." Clothing was of no use, fires of no avail, for, spite of all, he muttered, "Poor Harry Gill is very cold."—Wordsworth: Goody Blake and Harry Gill (1798).

> No word to any man he utters,
> A-bed or up, to young or old;
> But ever to himself he mutters,
> "Poor Harry Gill is very cold."

Gilla Dacker and his Horse (The Pursuit of the). This is one of the old Celtic romances, and has been described as "a marvellous and very beautiful creation." It is a humorous story of a trick, and a very serious practical joke, which was played by Avarta, a Dedannan enchanter, on sixteen of the Feni (Fingal's heroes), whom he carried off on his horse from Erin to "The Land of Promise," and of the adventures of Finn (Fingal), Dermat O'Dyna (q.v.), and the others in their pursuit of Avarta, who had taken the shape of the Gilla Dacker (Lazy Fellow), to recover their companions.

Gil'lamore (3 syl.) or Guillamur, king of Ireland, being slain in battle by Arthur, Ireland was added by the conqueror to his own dominions.

How Gillamore again to Ireland he pursued . . .
And having slain the king, the country waste he laid.
Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

Gil'lian, landlady of don John and don Frederic.—Fletcher: The Chances (1620).

Gil'lian (Dame), tirewoman to lady Eveline, and wife of Raoul the huntsman.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Gills (Solomon), ship's instrument maker. A slow, thoughtful old man, uncle of Walter Gay, who was in the house of Mr. Dombey, merchant. Gills was very proud of his stock-in-trade, but never seemed to sell anything.—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Gillyflower, from the French giroflée, from giroffe ("a clove," called by Chaucer "gilofre"). The common stock, the wallflower, rocket, clove pink, are so called. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 519.)

Gillyflowers. A nosegay of these flowers was given by the fairy Amazo'na to Carpil'lona in her flight. The virtue of this nosegay was, that so long as the princess had it about her person, those who knew her before would not recognize her.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Princess Carpillona," 1682).

Gilpin (John), a linen-draper and train-band captain, living in London. His wife said to him, "Though we have been married twenty years, we have taken no holiday;" and at her advice the well-to-do linen-draper agreed to make a family party, and dine at the Bell, at Edmonton. Mrs. Gilpin, her sister, and four children went in the chaise, and Gilpin promised to follow on horseback. As madam had left the wine behind, Gilpin girded it in two stone bottles to his belt, and started on his way. The horse, being fresh, began to trot, and then to gallop; and John, being a bad rider, grasped the mane with both his hands. On went the horse, off flew John Gilpin's cloak, together with his hat and wig. The dogs barked, the children screamed, the turnpike-men (thinking he was riding for a wager) flung open their gates. He flew through Edmonton, and never stopped till he reached Ware, when his friend the calender gave him welcome, and asked him to dismount. Gilpin, however, declined, saying his wife would be expecting him. So the calender furnished him with another hat and wig, and Gilpin harked back again, when similar disasters occurred, till the horse stopped at his house in London.—Cowper: John Gilpin (1782).

(John Gilpin was a Mr. Beyer, of Paternoster Row, who died in 1791, and it was lady Austin who told the anecdote to the poet. The marriage adventure of commodore Trunnion, in Peregrine Pickle, is a similar adventure.)

Giltspur Street, a street in West Smithfield, built on the route taken by the knights (who wore gilt spurs) on their way to Smithfield, where the tournaments were held.

Gines de Passamonte, one of the galley-slaves set free by don Quixote. Gines had written a history of his life and adventures. After being liberated, the slaves set upon the knight; they assulted him with stones, robbed him and Sancho of everything they valued, broke to pieces "Mambrino's helmet," and then made off with all possible speed, taking Sancho's ass with them. After a time the ass was recovered (pt. I. iv. 3).

"Hark ye, friend," said the galley-slave, "Gines is my name, and Passamonté the title of my family."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iii. 8 (1605).

 This Gines reappears in pt. II. li. 7 as "Peter the showman," who exhibits the story of "Melisendra and don Gayferos." The helmet also is presented whole and sound at the inn, where it becomes a matter of dispute whether it is a basin or a helmet.

Gineura, the troth-plight bride of Ariodantês, falsely accused of infidelity, and doomed to die unless she found within a month a champion to do battle for her honour. The duke who accused her felt confident that no champion would appear, but on the day appointed Ariodantês himself entered the lists. The duke was slain, the lady vindicated, and the champion became Gineura's husband.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516). Also GENEURA.

¶ Shakespeare, in Much Ado about Nothing, makes Hero falsely accused of infidelity, through the malice of don John, who induces Margaret (the lady's attendant) to give Borachio a rendezvous at the lady's chamber window. While this was going on, Claudio, the betrothed lover of Hero, was brought to a spot where he might witness the scene, and, believing Margaret to be Hero, was so indignant, that next day at the altar he denounced Hero as unworthy of his love. Benedict challenged Claudio for slander, but the combat was prevented by the arrest and confession of Borachio. Don John, finding his villainy exposed, fled to Messina.

¶ Spenser has introduced a similar story in his Faërie Queene, v. 11 (the tale of "Irena," q.v.).

Gin'evra, the young Italian bride who, playing hide-and-seek, hid herself in a large trunk. The lid accidentally fell down, and was held fast by a spring-lock. Many years afterwards the trunk was sold and the skeleton discovered.—Rogers: Italy (1822).

¶ T. Haynes Bayley wrote a ballad called The Mistletoe Bough, on the same tradition. He calls the bridegroom "young Lovel."

¶ A similar narrative is given by Collet, in his Causes Célèbres.

¶ Marwell Old Hall, once the residence of the Seymours, and subsequently of the Dacre family, has a similar tradition attached to it, and "the very chest is now the property of the Rev. J. Haygarth, rector of Upham."—Post-Office Directory.

¶ Bramshall, Hampshire, has a similar tale and chest.

¶ The same tale is also told of the great house at Malsanger, near Basingstoke.

Gingerbread (Giles), the hero of an English nursery tale.

Jack the Giant-killer, Giles Gingerbread, and Tom Thumb will flourish in wide-spreading and never-ceasing popularity.—Washington Irving.

Ginn or Jân (singular masculine Jinnee, feminine Jinniyeh), a species of beings created long before Adam. They were formed of "smokeless fire" or fire of the simoom, and were governed by monarchs named suleyman, the last of whom was Jân-ibn-Jân or Gian-ben-Gian, who "built the pyramids of Egypt." Prophets were sent to convert them, but on their persistent disobedience an army of angels drove them from the earth. Among the ginn was one named Aza'zel. When Adam was created, and God commanded the angels to worship him, Azazel refused, saying, "Why should the spirits of fire worship a creature made of earth?" Whereupon God changed him into a devil, and called him Iblis or Eblis ("despair").

Ginnistan, the country of the Ginn.—Persian Mythology.

Gi'ona, a leader of the anabaptists, once a servant of comte d'Oberthal, but discharged from his service for theft. He joined the rebellion of the anabaptists, but, with the rest of the conspirators, betrayed the "prophet-king," John of Leyden, when the emperor arrived with his army.—Meyerbeer: Le Prophète (1849).

Giovan'ni (Don), a Spanish libertine of the aristocratic class. His valet, Leporello, says, "He had 700 mistresses in Italy, 800 in Germany, 91 in France and Turkey, and 1003 in Spain." When the measure of his iniquity was full, a legion of foul fiends carried him off to the devouring gulf.—Mozart: Don Giovanni (1787).

(The libretto of this opera is by Lorenzo da Pontê.)

 The original of this character was don Juan Teno'rio, of Seville, who lived in the fourteenth century. The traditions concerning him were dramatized by Tirso de Mo'lina; thence passed into Italy and France. Glück has a musical ballet called Don Juan (1765); Molière, a comedy on the same subject (1665); and Thomas Corneille (brother of the Grand Corneille) brought out, in 1673, a comedy on the same subject, called Le Feston de Pierre, which is the second title of Molière's Don Juan. Goldoni, called "The Italian Molière," has also a comedy on the same favourite hero.

Gipsey, the favourite greyhound of Charles I.

One evening, his [Charles I.] dog scraping at the door, he commanded me [sir Philip Warwick] to let in Gipsey.—Memoirs, 329.

Gipsey Ring, a flat gold ring, with stones let into it, at given distances. So called because the stones were originally Egyptian pebbles—i.e. agate and jasper.

Gipsey-wort, botanical name Lycopus, from two Greek words luk(ou) pous ("wolf's foot"). Threlkeld says, "Gypsies do die themselves of a blackish hue with the juice of this plant."

Gipsies' Head-quarters, Yetholm, Roxburgh.

Head-quarters of the gipsies here.
Double Acrostic ("Queen").

 The tale is that the gipsies are wanderers because they refused to shelter the Virgin and Child in their flight into Egypt.—Aventinus: Annales Boiorum, viii.

Giralda of Seville, called by the Knight of the Mirrors a giantess, whose body was of brass, and who, without ever shifting her place, was the most unsteady and changeable female in the world. In fact, this Giralda was no other than the brazen statue on a steeple in Seville, serving for a weathercock.

"I fixed the changeable Giralda . . . I obliged her to stand still; for during the space of a whole week no wind blew but from the north."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. i. 14 (1615).

Giraldus Cambrensis, the literary name of Girald de Barri. He was author of the Itinerarium Cambriæ, the Descriptio Cambriæ; and his work on Ireland was criticized by John Lynch, who called his book Cambrensis Eversus. Giraldus was born in Pembroke, and lived 1146–1222 (that is, about the time of Henry II.).

Girder (Gibbie, i.e. Gilbert), the cooper at Wolf's Hope village.

Jean Girder, wife of the cooper.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Girdle (Armi'da's), a cestus worn by Armi'da, which, like that of Venus, possessed the magical charm of provoking irresistible love.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Flor'imel's Girdle, the prize of a grand tournament, in which sir Sat'yrane (3 syl.), sir Brianor, sir Sanglier, sir Artegal, sir Cambel, sir Tri'amond, Brit'omart, and others took part. It was accidentally dropped by Florimel in her flight (bk. iii. 7, 31), picked up by sir Satyrane, and employed by him for binding the monster which frightened Florimel to flight; afterwards it came again into sir Satyrane's possession, when he placed it for safety in a golden coffer. It was a gorgeous girdle, made by Vulcan for Venus, and embossed with pearls and precious stones; but its chief merit was

> It gave the virtue of chaste love
> And wifehood true to all that it did bear;
> But whosoever contrary doth prove,
> Might not the same about her middle wear,
> But it would loose, or else asunder tear.
> Spenser: Fairie Queene, iii. 7 (1590).

¶ Other tests of chastity were: "Arthur's drinking-horn," mentioned in the Morte d'Arthur. The "court mantel," mentioned in the ballad called "The Boy and the Mantel," in Percy's Reliques. The "enchanted cup," mentioned in Orlando Furioso, ii., etc. (See CHASTITY, p. 198.)

Venus's Girdle, a girdle on which was embroidered the passions, desires, joys, and pains of love. It was usually called a cestus, which means "embroidered," and was worn lower down than the cin'gulum or matron's girdle, but higher up than the zone or maiden's girdle. It was said to possess the magical power of exciting love. Homer describes it thus—

> In this was every art, and every charm,
> To win the wisest, and the coolest warm;
> Fond love, the gentle vow, the gay desire,
> The kind deceit, the still reviving fire,
> Persuasive speech, and more persuasive sighs,
> Silence that spoke, and eloquence of eyes.
> Pope: Iliad, xiv.

Girdle of Opakka, foresight and prudence.

"The girdle of Opakka, with which Kifri the enchanter is endued, what is it," said Shemshelnar, "but foresight and prudence—the best 'girdle' for the sultans of the earth!"—Sir G. Morell (i.e. J. Ridley), Tales of the Genii ("History of Mahoud," tale vii., 1751).

Girdles, impressed with mystical characters, were bound with certain ceremonies round women in gestation, to accelerate the birth and alleviate the pains of labour. It was a Druid custom, observed by the Gaels, and continued in practice till quite modern times.

Aldo offered to give Erragon, "a hundred steeds, children of the rein; a hundred hawks with fluttering wing, . . . and a hundred girdles to bind high-bosomed maids, friends of the births of heroes."—Ossian: The Battle of Lora.

Girnington (The laird of), previously Frank Hayston, laird of Bucklaw, the bridegroom of Lucy Ashton. He is found wounded by his bride on the wedding night, recovers, and leaves the country; but the bride goes mad and dies.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Gjallar, Heimdall's horn, which he blows to give the gods notice when any one approaches the bridge Bifröst.—Scandinavian Mythology.

Gladiator (The dying), more correct, as some think, Galatian. This famous statue, found at Nettuno (the ancient Antium), was the work of Agasias, a sculptor of Ephesus.

Glads'moor (Mr.), almoner of the earl of Glenallan, at Glenallan House.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Glamorgan, according to British fable, is gla or glyn Morgan (valley or glen of Morgan). Cundah and Morgan (says Spenser) were sons of Gonorill and Regan, the two elder daughters of king Leyr. Cundah chased Morgan into Wales, and slew him in the glen which perpetuates his name.

Then gan the bloody brethren both to raise
But fierce Cundah gan shortly to envy
His brother Morgan . . .
Raisd warre, and him in batteill overthrew;
Whence as he to those woody hilles did fly,
Which hight of him Gla-morgan, there him slew.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 10, 33 (1590).

This is not quite in accordance with Geoffrey's account—

Some restless spirits . . . inspired Margan with vain conceits, . . . who marched with an army through Cunedagius's country, and began to burn all before him; but he was met by Cunedagius, with all his forces, who attacked Margan, . . . and, putting him to flight, . . . killed him in a town of Kambria, which since his death has been called Margan to this day.—British History, ii. 15 (1142).

Glasgow (The bishop of).—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous, xix. (time, Henry I.).

Glasgow Arms, an oak tree with a bird above it, and a bell hanging from one of the branches; at the foot of the tree a salmon with a ring in its mouth. The legend is that St. Kentigern built the city and hung a bell in an oak tree to summon the men to work. This accounts for the "oak and bell." Now for the rest: A Scottish queen having formed an illicit attachment to a soldier, presented her paramour with a ring, the gift of her royal husband. This coming to the knowledge of the king, he contrived to abstract it from the soldier while he was asleep, threw it into the Clyde, and then asked his queen to show it him. The queen, in great alarm, ran to St. Kentigern, and confessed her crime. The father confessor went to the Clyde, drew out a salmon with the ring in its mouth, handed it to the queen, and by this means both prevented a scandal and reformed the repentant lady.

¶ In 1688 James II., in his escape, threw the Great Seal (Clavis regni) into the Thames, as he was on his way to Sheerness to meet the vessel which was to take him to the continent. But the Seal was found by a fisherman in his net, and delivered to the prince of Orange.

¶ There are several stories somewhat similar. One is told of Dame Rebecca Berry, wife of Thomas Elton of Stratford Bow, and relict of sir John Berry (1696), the heroine of the ballad called The Cruel Knight. The story runs thus: A knight, passing by a cottage, heard the cries of a woman in labour. By his knowledge of the occult sciences, he knew that the infant was doomed to be his future wife; but he determined to elude his destiny. When the child was of a marriageable age, he took her to the seaside, intending to drown her, but relented, and, throwing a ring into the sea, commanded her never to see his face again, upon pain of death, till she brought back that ring with her. The damsel now went as cook to a noble family, and one day, as she was preparing a cod-fish for dinner, she found the ring in the fish, took it to the knight, and thus became the bride of sir John Berry. The Berry arms show a fish, and in the dexter chief a ring.

¶ In Bewdley church, near Ribbesford manor, on the door north of the aisle, is the effigy of a young huntsman shooting a buck, and a salmon. The legend is as follows: The daughter of lord Ribbesford was in love with a young huntsman named John de Horsell, to whom she gave a valuable ring. When her father asked her what had become of her ring, she told him she had lost it while bathing. Lord Ribbesford promised, if any one found it and brought it to the manor, he might claim in reward his daughter in marriage. While John de Horsell was hunting, a salmon leaped out of a stream and was accidentally shot by an arrow aimed at a buck. The young lover inserted the ring in the salmon's mouth, and sent the fish as a present to his lordship, who, in compliance with his word, gave him his daughter for his bride.

Glass (Mrs.), a tobacconist, in London, who befriended Jeanie Deans while she sojourned in town, whither she had come to crave pardon from the queen for Effie Deans, her half-sister, lying under sentence of death for the murder of her infant born before wedlock.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Glass Armour. When Chery went to encounter the dragon that guarded the singing apple, he arrayed himself in glass armour, which reflected objects like a mirror. Consequently, when the monster came against him, seeing its reflection in every part of the armour, it fancied hundreds of dragons were coming against it, and ran away in alarm into a cave, which Chery instantly closed up, and thus became master of the situation.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Princess Fairstar," 1682).

Glass Slipper. Cinderella's "glass" slipper (souliers de verre) is probably a blunder for "fur" slippers (souliers de vair). At least so Littré thinks—

C'est parcequ'on n'a pas compris ce mot, maintenant par usité, qu'on a imprimé dans plusieurs editions du conte de Cendrillon souliers de verre (ce qui est absurde) au lieu de souliers de vair, c. à d. souliers fourrés de vair.—Littré.

. All the earliest editions, however, have pantoufles en verre, not vair. (See Notes and Queries, October 24, 1896, p. 331.)

Glasse (Mrs.), author of a cookery-book, immortalized by the saying, "First catch [skin] your hare, then cook it." Mrs. Glasse is the assumed name of Dr. John Hill (1716–1775).

A great variety of learned dainties which Mrs. Glasse herself would not disdain to add to her high-flavoured catalogue.—Edinburgh Review.

I know it all, from a lark to a loin of beef; and in the economy of the table, would-n't hold a candle to Hannah Glasse herself.—Cumberland: First Love, ii. 1 (1796).

Glas'tonbury, in Arthurian romance, was the burial-place of king Arthur. Selden, in his Illustrations of Drayton, gives an account of Arthur's tomb "betwixt two pillars," and says that "Henry II. gave command to Henry de Bois (then abbot of Glastonbury) to make great search for the body of the British king, which was found in a wooden coffin some 16 foote deepe, and afterwards they found a stone on whose lower side was fixed a leaden cross with the name inscribed."

Glastonbury Thorn. The legend is that Joseph of Arimathēa stuck his staff into the ground in "the sacred isle of Glastonbury," and that this thorn blossoms "on Christmas Day" every year. St. Joseph was buried at Glastonbury.

Not great Arthur's tomb, nor holy Joseph's grave,
From sacrilege had power their sacred bones to save . . .
[Here] trees in winter bloom and bear their summer's green.
Drayton: Polyolbion, iii. (1612).

Glatisant, the questing beast. It had the head of a serpent, the body of a libbard, buttocks of a lion, foot of a hart, and in its body "there was a noise like that of thirty couple of hounds questing" (i.e. in full cry). Sir Palomi'dēs the Saracen was for ever following this beast. —Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 52, 53, 149 (1470).

Glau'ce (2 syl.), nurse of the princess Brit'omart. She tried by charms to "undo" her lady's love for sir Artegal, "but love that is in gentle heart begun, no idle charm can remove." Finding her sorcery useless, she took the princess to consult Merlin, and Merlin told her that by marrying Artegal she would found a race of kings from which would arise "a royal virgin that shall shake the power of Spain." The two now started in quest of the knight, but in time got separated. Glaucē became "the 'squire" of sir Scu'damore, but reappears (bk. iii. 12) after the combat between Britomart and Artegal, reconciles the combatants, and the princess consents "to be the love of Artegal, and to take him for her lord" (bk. iv. 5, 6).—Spenser: Faërie Queene (1590, 1596).

GLAUCUS, a fisherman of Bœo'tia. He observed that all the fish which he laid on the grass received fresh vigour, and immediately leaped into the sea. This grass had been planted by Kronos, and when Glaucus tasted it, he also leaped into the sea, and became a prophetic marine deity. Once a year he visited all the coasts of Greece, to utter his predictions. Glaucus is the sailors' patron deity.

[By] old soothsaying Glaucus' spell.
Milton: Comus, 874 (1634).

As Glaucus, when he tasted of the herb
That made him peer among the ocean gods.
Dante: Paradise, i. (1311).

Glaucus, son of Hippolytus. Being smothered in a tub of honey, he was restored to life by [a] dragon given him by Escula'pios (probably a medicine so called).—Apollodorus: Bibliotheca, 23.

Glaucus, in lord Lytton's Last Days of Pompeii (1834).

Glaucus, of Chios, inventor of the art of soldering metal.—Pausanias: Itinerary of Greece.

Glaucus (A Second), one who ruins himself by horses. This refers to Glaucus, son of Sis'yphos, who was killed by his horses. Some say he was trampled to death by them, and some that he was eaten by them.

Glaucus, or The Wonders of the Shore. The natural history of the beach, by C. Kingsley (1855).

Glaucus's Swop, Glauci et Diomēdis permutatio, a very foolish exchange. Homer (Iliad, vi.) tells us that Glaucus changed his golden armour for the iron one of Diomēdēs. The French say, C'est le troc de Glaucus et de Diomede. This Glaucus was the grandson of Bellerophon. (In Greek, "Glaukos.")

Glee-maiden (The), Louise, who has a love-passage with the son of Robert III. of Scotland. After the death of the prince, she casts herself down a steep precipice, and is never heard of more.—Sir W. Scott: The Fair Maid of Perth (1828) (time, Henry IV.).

Glem, the scene of Arthur's battle, is in Northumberland.

> The fight that all day long
> Rang by the white mouth of the violent Glem.
> Tennyson.

Glenallan (Joscelind dowager countess of), whose funeral takes place by torchlight in the Catholic chapel.

The earl of Glenallan, son of the dowager countess.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Glenalvon, heir of lord Randolph. When young Norval, the son of lady Randolph, makes his unexpected appearance, Glenalvon sees in him a rival, whom he hates. He insinuates to lord Randolph that the young man is a suitor of lady Randolph's, and, having excited the passion of jealousy, contrives to bring his lordship to a place where he witnesses their endearments. A fight ensues, in which Norval slays Glenalvon, but is himself slain by lord Randolph, who then discovers too late that the supposed suitor was his wife's son.—Home: Douglas (1757).

Glenarvon, a novel by lady Caroline Lamb (1816). Its object is to represent the dangers arising from a devotion to fashion. The hero is said to be meant for lord Byron.

Glencoe (2 syl.), the scene of the massacre of M'Ian and thirty-eight of his glenmen, in 1692. All Jacobites were commanded to submit to William III. by the end of December, 1691. M'Ian was detained by a heavy fall of snow, and sir John Dalrymple, the master of Stair, sent captain Campbell to make an example of "the rebel."

(Talfourd has a drama entitled Glencoe, or the Fall of the M'Donalds.)

Glendale (Sir Richard), a papist conspirator with Redgauntlet.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Glendin'ning (Elspeth) or ELSPETH BRYDONE (2 syl.), widow of Simon Glendinning of the Tower of Glendearg.

Halbert and Edward Glendinning, sons of Elspeth Glendinning.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Glendinning (Sir Halbert), the knight of Avenel, husband of lady Mary of Avenel (2 syl.).—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Glendoveer', plu. Glendoveers, the most beautiful of the good spirits of Hindû mythology.

> . . . the glendoveers,
> The loveliest of all of heavenly birth.
> Southey: Curse of Kehama, vi. 2 (1809).

Glendow'er (Owen), a Welsh nobleman, descended from Llewellyn (last of the Welsh kings). Sir Edmund Mortimer married one of his daughters. Shakespeare makes him a wizard, but very highly accomplished.—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. (1597).

Glengar'ry. So M'Donald of Glengarry (who gave in his adhesion to William III.) is generally called. (See GLENCOE.)

Glenpro'sing (The old lady), a neighbour of old Jasper Yellowley.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Glenthorn (Lord), the hero of Miss Edgeworth's novel called Ennui. Spoiled by indolence and bad education, he succeeds, by a course of self-discipline, in curing his mental and moral faults, and in becoming a useful member of society (1809).

> The history of lord Glenthorn affords a striking picture of ennui, and contains some excellent delineations of character.—Chambers: English Literature, ii. 569.

Glenvar'loch (Lord), or Nigel Olifaunt, the hero of Scott's novel called The Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Glinter, the palace of Foresti "the peace-maker," son of Balder. It stood on pillars of gold, and had a silver roof.

Globe of Glass (Reynard's). Reynard declared it would reveal what was being done, no matter how far off; and that it would give information about anything it was consulted on. This famous globe, according to Reynard, was set in a wooden frame which no one could injure. Reynard asserted that he had sent this valuable treasure to the queen as a present; but it never reached her majesty, as it had no existence but in the cunning brain of Master Fox.—Heinrich von Alkmann: Reynard the Fox (1498).

Gloria'na, "the greatest glorious queen of Faëry-land."

> By Gloriana I mean [true] Glory in my general intention, but in my particular I conceive the most excellent and glorious person of our sovereign the queen [Elizabeth], and her kingdom in Faerye-land.—Spenser: Introduction to the Faërie Queene (1590).

Glorious John, John Dryden (1631–1701).

Glorious Preacher (The), St. John Chrysostom (i.e. John Goldenmouth, 354–407).

Glory (Old), sir Francis Burdett (1770–1844).

Glory Hole, a cupboard, ottoman, box, or other receptacle, where anything may be thrown for the nonce to get it out of sight rapidly. A cupboard at the head of a staircase for brooms, etc., is so called.

Glosiovellir, the Scandinavian paradise.

Glossin (Gilbert), a knavish lawyer, who purchases the Ellangowan estate, and is convicted by counsellor Pleydell of kidnapping Henry Bertrand the heir. Both Glossin and Dirk Hatteraick, his accomplice, are sent to prison; and in the night Hatteraick first strangles the lawyer and then hangs himself.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

GLOUCESTER (The duke of), brother of Charles II.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Gloucester (Richard duke of), in the court of king Edward IV.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Gloucester (Robert of) wrote a History of England in rhyme, from the age of Brute or Brutus to about 1300. It is Geoffrey's Chronicle in bad verse. He lived in the reign of Henry III.

Gloucester (The earl of), in the court of king Henry II.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Glover (Simon), the old glover of Perth, and father of the "fair maid."

Catherine Glover, "the fair maid of Perth," daughter of Simon the glover, and subsequently bride of Henry Smith the armourer.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Glover (Heins), the betrothed of Trudchen [i.e. Gertrude] Pavilion, daughter of the syndic's wife.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Glowrowrum (The old lady), a friend of Magnus Troil.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Glubdub'drib, the land of sorcerers and magicians, where Gulliver was shown many of the great men of antiquity.—Swift: Gulliver's Travels (1726).

Glück, a German musical composer, greatly patronized by Mary Antoinette. Young France set up against him the Italian Piccini. Between 1774 and 1780 every street, coffee-house, school, and drawing-room of Paris canvassed the merits of these two composers, not on the score of their respective talents, but as the representatives of the German and Italian schools of music. The partisans of the German school were called Glückists, and those of the Italian school Piccinists.

> Est-ce Glück, est-ce Puccini,
> Que doit couronner Polymnie?
> Donc entre Glück et Puccini
> Tout le Parnasse est désuni.
> L'un soutient ce que l'autre nie,
> Et Clio veut battre Uranie.
> Pour moi, qui crains tout manie,
> Plus irrésolu que Baboue
> N'épousant Piccini ni Glück,
> Je n'y connais rien: ergo Glück.

¶ A similar contest raged in England between the Bononcinists and Handelists. The prince of Wales was the leader of the Handel or German party, and the duke of Marlborough of the Bononcini or Italian school. (See TWEEDLEDUM.)

Glumdalca, queen of the giants, captive in the court of king Arthur. The king cast love-glances at her, and made queen Dollallolla jealous; but the giantess loved lord Grizzle, and lord Grizzle loved the princess Huncamunca, and Huncamunca loved the valiant Tom Thumb.—Tom Thumb, by Fielding the novelist (1730), altered by O'Hara, author of Midas (1778).

Glum-dal'clitch, a girl nine years old "and only forty feet high." Being such a "little thing," the charge of Gulliver was committed to her during his sojourn in Brobdingnag.—Swift: Gulliver's Travels.

> Soon as Glumdalclitch missed her pleasing care,
> She wept, she blubbered, and she tore her hair.
> Pope.

Glumms, the male population of the imaginary country Nosmnbdsgrsutt, visited by Peter Wilkins. The glumms, like the females, called gawreys (q.v.), had wings, which served both for flying and dress.—Pultock: Peter Wilkins (1750).

Glutton (The), Vitellius the Roman emperor (born A.D. 15, began to reign A.D. 69, and died the same year). Visiting the field after the battle of Bedriac, in Gaul, he exclaimed, "The body of a dead enemy is a delightful perfume."

¶ Charles IX. of France, when he went in grand procession to visit the gibbet on which admiral Coligny was hanging, had the wretched heartlessness to exclaim, in doggerel verse—

> Fragrance sweeter than the rose
> Rises from our slaughtered foes.

Glutton (The), Gabius Apicius, who lived during the reign of Tiberius. He spent £800,000 on the luxuries of the table, and when only £80,000 of his large fortune remained, he hanged himself, thinking death preferable to "starvation on such a miserable pittance." (See LUCULLUS.)

Gna, the messenger of Frigga.—Scandinavian Mythology.

Goats. The Pleiades are called in Spain The Seven Little Goats.

So it happened that we passed close to the Seven Little Goats.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iii. 5 (1615).

∴ Sancho Panza affirmed that two of the goats were of a green colour, two carnation, two blue, and one motley; "but," he adds, "no he-goat or cuckold ever passes beyond the horns of the moon.

Goatsnose, a prophet, born deaf and dumb, who uttered his predictions by signs.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, iii. 20 (1545).

Gobbo (Old), the father of Launcelot. He was stone blind.

Launcelot Gobbo, son of Old Gobbo. He left the service of Shylock the Jew for that of Bassa'nio a Christian. Launcelot Gobbo is one of the famous clowns of Shakespeare.—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice (1698).

Gob'ilyve (Godfrey), the assumed name of False Report. He is described as a dwarf, with great head, large brows, hollow eyes, crooked nose, hairy cheeks, a pied beard, hanging lips, and black teeth. His neck was short, his shoulders awry, his breast fat, his arms long, his legs "kewed," and he rode "brigge-a-bragge on a little nag." He told sir Graunde Amoure he was wandering over the world to find a virtuous wife, but hitherto without success. Lady Correction met the party, and commanded Gobilyve (3 syl.) to be severely beaten for a lying varlet.—Hawes: The Passetyme of Plesure, xxix., xxxi., xxxii. (1515).

Goblin Stories, by the brothers Grimm, in German prose (1812). They have been translated into English.

God. Full of the god, full of wine, partly intoxicated.

God made the country, and man made the town.—Cowper's Task ("The Sofa"). Varro, in his De Re Rustica, has, "Divina Natura agros dedit, ars humana ædificavit urbes."

God sides with the strongest. Napoleon I. said, "Le bon Dieu est toujours du coté des gros bataillons." Julius Cæsar made the same remark.

God Save the King. (See 2 Kings xi. 12; 1 Sam. x. 24.) To avoid the wretched rhyme of "laws" and "voice" in our National Anthem, I would suggest the following triplet:—

May she our laws defend,
Long live the nation's friend,
And make all discord end:
God save the Queen.

God's Acre, a churchyard or cemetery.

I like that ancient Saxon phrase which calls
The burial-ground God's Acre!
Longfellow: God's Acre.

God's Table. The Korân informs us that God has written down, in what is called "The Preserved Table," every event, past, present, and to come, from the beginning to the end of time. The most minute are not omitted (ch. vi.).

God's Token, a peculiar eruption on the skin; a certain indication of death in those afflicted with the plague.

A Will and a Tolling bell are as present death as God's token.—Two Wise Men and all the rest Fools (1619).

Godam, a nickname applied by the French to the English, in allusion to a once popular oath.

Godfrey [DE BOUILLON], the chosen chief of the allied crusaders, who went to wrest Jerusalem from the hands of the Saracens. Calm, circumspect, prudent, and brave, he despised "worldly empire, wealth, and fame."—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Godfrey (Sir Edmondbury), a magistrate killed by the papists. He was very active in laying bare their nefarious schemes, and his body was found pierced with his own sword, in 1678.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

∴ Dryden calls sir Edmondbury "Agag," and Dr. Titus Oates he calls "Corah."

Corah might for Agag's murder call,
In terms as coarse as Samuel used to Saul.
Absalom and Achitophel, i. 677, 678 (1681).

Godfrey (Miss), an heiress, daughter of an Indian governor.—Foote: The Liar (1761).

Godfrey Case, in George Eliot's (Mrs. J. W. Cross) novel of Silas Marner, marries Nancy Lammeter (1861).

God'inez (Doctor), a schoolmaster, "the most expert flogger in Oviedo" (Ov-e-a'-do). He taught Gil Blas, and "in six years his worthy pupil understood a little Greek, and was a tolerable Latin scholar."—Lesage: Gil Blas, i. (1715).

Godi'va or Godgifu, wife of earl Leofric earl of Mercia. The tale is that she persistently begged her husband to remit a certain tax which oppressed the people of Coventry. Leofric, annoyed at her importunity, told her he would do so when she had ridden on horseback naked through the city at midday (meaning never); but the countess took him at his word, gave orders that all people should shut up their windows and doors, and she actually rode naked through the town, and delivered the people from the tax. The tale further says that all the people did as the lady bade them except Peeping Tom, who looked out, and was struck blind.

The tale is told by Dugdale, and is supposed to have occurred somewhere about 1057.

⁂ Rapin says that the countess commanded all persons to keep within doors, and away from windows during her ride. One man, named Tom of Coventry, took a peep at the lady as she passed by, but it cost him his life.

⁂ This legend is told at length by Drayton, in his Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Tennyson, in his Godiva, has reproduced this story (1842).

N.B.—Matthew of Westminster (1307) is the first to record the story of lady Godiva, but the addition of Peeping Tom dates from the reign of Charles II. In Smithfield Wall is a grotesque figure of the inquisitive Tom, "in flowing wig and Stuart cravat."

¶ In regard to the terms granted by Leofric to lady Godiva, it may be mentioned that Rudder, in his History of Gloucester, informs us that "the privilege of cutting wood in the Herdŭoles was granted to the parishioners of St. Briavel's Castle, in Gloucestershire, on precisely similar terms by the earl of Hereford, who was, at the time, lord of Dean Forest."

Godless Florins, English two-shilling pieces issued by Shiel when master of the mint. He was a Roman Catholic, and left out F.D. (defender of the faith) from the legend. They were issued and called in the same year (1849).

I have one of these florins before me. Both F.D. and D.G. are omitted. Hence they were both Godless and also Graceless Florins.

Godmanchester Hogs and Huntingdon Sturgeon.

During a very high flood in the meadows between Huntingdon and Godmanchester, something was seen floating, which the Godmanchester people thought was a black hog, and the Huntingdon folk declared was a sturgeon. When rescued from the water, it proved to be a young donkey.—Lord Brayebrooke (Pepys, Diary, May 22, 1667).

Godmer, a British giant, son of Albion, slain by Canu'tus one of the companions of Brute.

> Those three monstrous stones . . .
> Which that huge son of hideous Albion,
> Great Godmer, threw in fierce contention
> At bold Canutus; but of him was slain.
> Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 10 (1590).

Godolphin, a novel by lord Lytton (1833).

Goëmagot's Leap, or "Lam Goëmagot," now called Haw, near Plymouth; the place where the giant fell when Corin'eus (3 syl.) tossed him down the craggy rocks, by which he was mangled to pieces.—Geoffrey: British History, i. 16 (1142).

⁂ Southey calls the word Lan-gamagog. (See GOGMAGOG.)

Goëmot or Goëmagot, a British giant, twelve cubits high, and of such prodigious strength that he could pull up a full-grown oak at one tug. Same as Gogmagog (q.v.).

> On a certain day, when Brutus was holding a solemn festival to the gods, . . . this giant, with twenty more of his companions, came in upon the Britons, among whom he made a dreadful slaughter; but the Britons at last . . . killed them every one but Goëmagot . . . him Brutus preserved alive, out of a desire to see a combat between the giant and Corineus, who took delight in such encounters. . . . Corineus carried him to the top of a high rock, and tossed him into the sea. —Geoffrey: British History, i. 16 (1142).

Goer'vyl, sister of prince Madoc, and daughter of Owen late king of North Wales. She accompanied her brother to America, and formed one of the colony of Caer-madoc, south of the Missouri (twelfth century). — Southey: Madoc (1805).

Goethe, a German novelist, poet, etc. (1749–1832), published—

The Achilliad, about 1800.
Farbenlehre, 1810.
Hermann and Dorothea (a poem), 1797.
Metamorphosis of Plants (an essay), 1790
Werther (a romance), 1774.
Wilhelm Meister (a romance), pt. i. in 1794-96; pt. ii., 1821.

⁂ For dramatic works, see Faust, etc. APPENDIX II.

Goetz von Berlichingen, or Gottfried of the Iron Hand, a famous

German burgrave, who lost his right hand at the siege of Landshut. The iron hand which replaced the one he had lost is still shown at Juxthausen, the place of his birth. Gottfried took a prominent part in the wars of independence against the electors of Brandenberg and Bavaria, in the sixteenth century (1480–1562). (See SILVER HAND.)

(Goethe has made this the title and subject of an historical drama.)

Goffe (Captain), captain of the pirate vessel.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Gog, according to Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix., was "prince of Magog" (a country or people). Calmet says Camby'sês king of Persia is meant; but others think Antiochus Epiph'anês is alluded to.

Gog, in Rev. xx. 7–9, means Antichrist. Gog and Magog, in conjunction, mean all princes of the earth who are enemies of the Christian Church.

(Sale says Gog is a Turkish tribe.—Al Korân, xviii. note.)

Gog and Magog. Prester John, in his letter to Manuel Comnênus, emperor of Constantinople, speaks of Gog and Magog as two separate nations tributary to him. These, with thirteen others, he says, are now shut up behind inaccessible mountains, but at the end of the world they will be let loose, and will overrun the whole earth.—Albericus (Trium Fontium): Chronicles (1242).

¶ Sale tells us that Gog and Magog are called by the Arabs "Yajûj" and "Majûj," which are two nations or tribes descended from Japhet, son of Noah. Gog, according to some authorities, is a Turkish tribe; and Magog is the tribe called "Gilân" by Ptolemy, and "Geli" or "Galæ" by Strabo.—Al Korân, xviii. note.

¶ Respecting the re-appearance of Gog and Magog, the Korân says, "They [the dead] shall not return . . . till Gog and Magog have a passage opened for them, and they [the dead] shall hasten from every high hill," i.e. the resurrection (ch. xxi.).

Gog and Magog in London. The two statues of Guildhall so called are in reality the statues of Gogmagog or Goëmagot and Corineus (3 syl.), referred to in the next article. (See also CORINEUS.) The Albion giant is known by his pole-axe and spiked ball. Two statues so called stood on the same spot in the reign of Henry V.; but those now seen were made by Richard Saunders, in 1708, and are fourteen feet in height.

> In Hone's time, children and country visitors were told that every day, when the giants heard the clock strike twelve, they came down to dinner.—Old and New London, i. 387.

Another tale was that they then fell foul of each other in angry combat.

Gog'magog, king of the Albion giants, eighteen feet in height, killed by Corin in a wrestling-match, and flung by him over the Hoe or Haw of Plymouth. For this achievement, Brute gave his follower all that horn of land now called Cornwall, Cor'n[w]all, a contraction of Corinall. The contest is described by Drayton in his Polyolbion, i. (1612).

> H'en thus unmoved
> Stood Corineus, the sire of Guendolen,
> When, grappling with his monstrous enemy,
> He the brute vastness held aloft, and bore,
> And headlong hurled, all shattered to the sea,
> Down from the rock's high summit, since that day
> Called Lan-'gæma'gog.
> Southey: Joan of Arc, viii. 395.

¶ Spenser throws the accent of Corineus on the second syllable, Southey on the first, while Drayton makes it a word of four syllables, and accents the third.

Gog'magog Hill, the higher of the two hills some three miles south-east of Cambridge. It once belonged to the Balsham Hills, but "being rude and bearish, regarding neither God nor man," it was named in reproach Gogmagog. The legend is that this Gogmagog Hill was once a huge giant, who fell in love with the nymph Granta, and, meeting her alone, told her all his heart, saying—

> "Sweeting mine, if thou mine own wilt be,
> I've many a pretty gaud I keep in store for thee:
> A nest of broad-faced owls, and goodly urchins too
> (Nay, nymph, take heed of me, when I begin to woo)
> And better far than that, a bulchin two years old,
> A curled-pate calf it is, and oft could have been sold:
> And yet besides all this, I've goodly bear-whelps tway,
> Full dainty for my joy when she's disposed to play;
> And twenty sows of lead to make our wedding ring;"

but the saucy nymph only mocked the giant, and told his love-story to the Muses, and all made him their jest and sport and laughter.—Drayton: Polyolbion, xxi. (1622).

Goitre.

> When we were boys,
> Who would believe that there were mountaineers
> Dew-lapp'd like bulls, whose throats had hanging at 'em
> Wallets of flesh?
> Shakespeare: The Tempest, act iii. sc. 3 (1609).

Gold Hair, a true story of Pornic. A young girl died there in the odour of sanctity, and was buried near the high altar of the church of St. Gilles. Years after, the pavement was taken up over her grave, and thirty double louis were found, which had been buried in her gold hair at her own request.—Browning: Poems (1864).

Gold of Nibelungen (The), unlucky wealth. "To have the gold of Nibelungen" is to have a possession which seems to bring a curse with it. The uncle who murdered "the babes in the wood" for their estates and money, got the "gold of Nibelungen;" nothing from that moment went well with him—his cattle died, his crops failed, his barns were destroyed by fire or tempest, and he was reduced to utter ruin. (See NIBELUNGEN.)—Icelandic Edda.

Gold of Tolo'sa (The), ill gains, which never prosper. The reference is to Cæpio the Roman consul, who, on his march to Gallia Narbonensis, stole from Tolosa (Toulouse) the gold and silver consecrated by the Cimbrian Druids to their gods. He was utterly defeated by the Cimbrians, and some 112,000 Romans were left dead on the field of battle (B.C. 106). (See HARMONIA'S NECKLACE.)

Gold Poured down the Throat. Marcus Licin'ius Crassus, surnamed "The Rich," one of the first Roman triumvirate, tried to make himself master of Parthia, but being defeated and brought captive to Oro'dês king of Parthia, he was put to death by having molten gold poured down his throat. "Sate thy greed with this," said Orodês.

¶ Manlius Nepos Aquilius tried to restore the kings of Bithynia and Cappado'cia, dethroned by Mithridatês; but being unsuccessful and made prisoner, he was put to death by Mithridatês by molten gold poured down his throat.

¶ In hell, the avaricious are punished in the same way, according to the Shepheardes Calendar.

> And ladles full of melted gold
> Were poured adown their throats.
> The Dead Man's Song (1579).

Gol'demar (King), a house-spirit, sometimes called king Vollmar. He lived three years with Neveling von Hardenberg, on the Hardenstein at the Ruhr, and the chamber in which he lived is still called Vollmar's chamber. This house-spirit, though sensible to the touch, was invisible. It played beautifully on the harp, talked freely, revealed secrets, and played dice. One day, a person determined to discover its whereabouts, but Goldemar cut him to pieces and cooked the different parts. Never after this was there any trace of the spirit. The roasted fragments disappeared in the Lorrain war in 1651, but the pot in which the man's head was boiled was built into the kitchen wall of Neveling von Hardenberg, where it remains to this day.—Steinen: German Mythology, 477.

Golden Ass (The), a romance in Latin by Apule'ius (5 syl.), in eleven books. It is the adventures of Lucian, a young man who had been transformed into an ass but still retained his human consciousness. It tells us the miseries which he suffered at the hands of robbers, eunuchs, magistrates, and so on, till the time came for him to resume his proper form. It is full of wit, racy humour, and rich fancy; and contains the exquisite episode of Cupid and Psy'chê (bks. iv., v., vi.).

(This very famous satire, together with the Asinus of Lucian, was founded on a satire of the same name by Lucius of Patræ, and has been imitated in modern times by Niccolo Machiavelli. T. Taylor, in 1822, published a translation of the Aureus Asinus; and sir G. Head, in 1851. Lafontaine has an imitation of the episode; and Mrs. Tighe turned it into Spenserian verse in 1805.)

(Boccaccio has borrowed largely from The Golden Ass, and the incidents of the robbers in Gil Blas are taken from it.)

Golden Dragon of Bruges (The). The golden dragon was taken in one of the crusades from the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, and placed on the belfry of Bruges; but Philip van Artevelde (2 syl.) transported it to Ghent, where it still adorns the belfry.

> Saw great Artevelde victorious scale the Golden Dragon's nest.
> Longfellow: The Belfry of Bruges.

Golden Fleece (The), the fleece of the ram which transported Phryxos to Colchis. When Phryxos arrived there, he sacrificed the ram and gave the fleece to king Æëtês, who hung it on a sacred oak. It was stolen by Jason, in his "Argonautic expedition."

The Golden Fleece of the North. Fur and peltry of Siberia are so called.

Golden Fountain (The), a fountain which in twenty-four hours would convert any metal or mineral into gold.—R. Johnson: The Seven Champions of Christendom, ii. 4 (1617).

Golden Gate of Constantinople, added by Theodosius to Constantine's wall. It consists of a triumphal arch, surmounted with a bronze statue of Victory. The gate is amply decorated with gilt ornaments and inscriptions. (See Count Robert of Paris, ii., by sir W. Scott.)

Golden Horn (The), the inlet of the Bosphŏrus on which Constantinople stands; so called from its shape and beauty.

Golden Legends (The), a collection of hagiology, made in the thirteenth century by James de Voragine, a Dominican. The legends consist of 177 sections, each of which is devoted to a particular saint or festival, arranged in the order of the calendar. Longfellow wrote a dramatic poem so called (1851).

Golden Mouth, St. Chrysostom (347-407). The name is the Greek chrusos stŏma, "gold mouth."

Golden State (The), California, in North America.

Golden Stream (The). Joannes Damascēnus (died 750).

Golden-tongued (The), St. Peter of Ravenna (433-450). Our equivalent is a free translation of the Greek chrysol'ogos (chrusos logos, "gold discourse").

Golden Valley (The), the eastern portion of Limerick; so called from its great fertility.

Golden Water (The). One drop of this water in the basin of a fountain would fill it, and then throw up a jet d'eau of exquisite device. It was called "golden" because the water looked like liquid gold. —Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters," the last tale).

(In Chery and Fairstar, by the comtesse D'Aulnoy, the "golden water" is called the "dancing water.")

Goldfinch (Charles), a vulgar, horsy fellow, impudent and insolent in manner, who flirts with Widow Warren, and conspires with her and the Jew Silky to destroy Mr. Warren's will. By this will the widow was left £600 a year, but the bulk of the property went to Jack Milford his natural son, and Sophia Freelove the daughter of Widow Warren by a former marriage. (See BEAGLE, p. 98.)

Father was a sugar-baker, grandfather a slop-seller, I'm a gentleman.—Holcroft: The Road to Ruin, ii. 1 (1792).

Goldiebirds (Messrs.), creditors of sir Arthur Wardour.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Gold-mine (The) or Miller of Grenoble, a drama by E. Stirling (1854). (For the plot, see SIMON.)

Gold-mine of Europe (The). Transylvania was once so called; but the supply of gold obtained therefrom has now very greatly diminished.

Gold-mines (King of the), a powerful, handsome prince, who was just about to marry the princess All-Fair, when Yellow Dwarf claimed her as his betrothed, and carried her to Steel Castle on a Spanish cat. (For the rest of the tale, see ALL-FAIR, p. 28.)—Comtesse d'Aulnoy: The Yellow Dwarf (1682).

Gold-purse of Spain, Andalu'cia, from which city Spain derives its chief wealth.

Goldsmith (Oliver).

Here lies Nolly Goldsmith, for shortness called Noll,
Who wrote like an angel, and talked like poor poll.
David Garrick.

Goldsmith (Rev. J.), one of the many pseudonyms adopted by sir Richard Phillips, in a series of school books. Some other of his false names were the Rev. David Blair, James Adair, Rev. C. Clarke, etc., with noted French names for educational French books.

Goldsmith's Monument, in Westminster Abbey, is by Nollekens.

Gold'thred (Lawrence), mercer, near Cumnor Place.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Gold'y. Oliver Goldsmith was so called by Dr. Johnson (1728-1774).

Gol'gotha ["the place of a skull"], a small elevated spot north-west of Jerusalem, where criminals used to be executed. In modern poetry it stands for a battle-field or place of great slaughter.

Except they meant to bathe in reeking wounds,
Or memorize another Golgotha.
Shakespeare: Macbeth, act i. sc. 2 (1606).

 In the University of Cambridge, the dons' gallery in Great St. Mary's is called "Golgotha," because the heads of the colleges sit there.

Gol'gotha (The City). Temple Bar, London, used to be so called because the heads of traitors, etc., were at one time exposed there after decapitation. This was not done from any notion of punishment, but simply to advertise the fact as a warning to evil-doers. Temple Bar was removed from the Strand in 1878.

Goliards (The), clerical buffoons, jongleurs, and minstrels. The Confessio Golias, attributed to Walter Mapes, is the supposed confession of a Goliard. His three sins were a love of dice, wine, and women.

Golightly (Mr.), the fellow who wants to borrow 5*s.* in Lend Me Five Shillings, a farce by J. M. Morton.

Goltho, the friend of Ul'finore (3 syl.). He was in love with Birtha, daughter of lord As'tragon the sage; but Birtha loved the duke Gondibert. The tale being unfinished, the sequel is not known.—Davenant: Gondibert (died 1668).

Gomer or Godmer, a British giant, slain by Canu'tus one of the companions of Brute. (See GOEMOT, p. 432.)

Since Gomer's giant brood inhabited this isle.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xiv. (1613).

Gomez, a rich banker, 60 years of age, married to Elvi'ra, a young wife. He is mean, covetous, and jealous. Elvi'ra has a liaison with colonel Lorenzo, which Dominick, her father-confessor, aids and abets; but the amour is constantly thwarted, and it turns out that Lorenzo and Elvira are brother and sister. —Dryden: The Spanish Fryar (1680).

Gon'dibert (Duke), of the royal line of Lombardy. Prince Oswald of Verona, out of jealousy, stirs up a faction fight against him, which is limited by agreement to four combatants on each side. Oswald is slain by Gondibert, and Gondibert is cured of his wounds by lord As'tragon, a philosopher and sage. Rhodalind, the only child of Aribert king of Lombardy, is in love with the duke, but the duke is betrothed to Birtha. One day, while Gondibert was walking with his affianced Birtha, a messenger from the king came post haste to tell him that Aribert had publicly proclaimed him his heir, and that Rhodalind was to be his bride. Gondibert still told Birtha he would remain true to her, and gave her an emerald ring, which would turn pale if his love declined. As the tale was never finished, the sequel cannot be given.—Davenant: Gondibert (died 1668).

Gon'eril, eldest daughter of king Lear, and wife of the duke of Albany. She treated her aged father with such scant courtesy, that he could not live under her roof; and she induced her sister Regan to follow her example. Subsequently, both the sisters fell in love with Edmund, natural son of the earl of Gloucester, whom Regan designed to marry when she became a widow. Goneril, out of jealousy, now poisoned her sister, and "after slew herself." Her name is proverbial for "filial ingratitude."—Shakespeare: King Lear (1605).

Gonin, a buffoon of the sixteenth century, who acquired great renown for his clever tricks, and gave rise to the French phrase, Un tour de maître Gonin ("a trick of Master Gonin's").

Gonnella, domestic jester to the margrave Nicolo d'Este, and to his son Borso duke of Ferrara. The horse he rode on was ossa atque pellis totus, and, like Rosinantê, has become proverbial. Gonnella's jests were printed in 1506.

Gonsales [Gon-salley], Fernan Gonsalez or Gonsalvo, a Spanish hero of the tenth century, whose life was twice saved by his wife Sancha. His adventures have given birth to a host of ballads.

(There was a Hernandez Gonsalvo of Cordôva, called "The Great Captain" (1443-1515), to whom some of the ballads refer, and this is the hero of Florian's historical novel entitled Gonsalve de Cordoue (1791), borrowed from the Spanish romance called The Civil Wars of Granada, by Gines Perez de la Hita.)

Gonza'lo, an honest old counsellor of Alonso king of Naples.—Shakespeare. The Tempest (1609).

Gonza'lo, an ambitious but politic lord of Venice.—Fletcher: The Laws of Candy (1647).

Good Earl (The), Archibald eighth earl of Angus, who died in 1588.

Good Even, Good Robin Hood! civility extorted by fear, as "Good Mr. Highwayman, good gentlemen!" of Mrs. Hardcastle in her terror.

Clapping his rod on the borde,
No man dare utter a word . . .
He [Wolsey] said, "How say ye, my lordes?" . . .
Good even, good Robin Hood.
Skelton: Why Come ye not to Court? (died 1529).

Good Hope (Cape of). When Bartholomew Diaz first discovered this cape, in 1497, he called it "The Cape of Storms" (Cabo Tormentoso); but John II. king of Portugal changed the name to that of "Good Hope."

¶ The Euxine Sea (i.e. "the hospitable sea") was first called "The Axine Sea" ("the inhospitable"), from the terror with which it was viewed by the early Greeks; but it was subsequently called by the more courteous name. However, the older name is the one which now generally prevails; thus we call it in English "The Black Sea," and the Turks, Greeks, and Russians call it inhospitable, and not hospitable.

Good Man (A). Count Cassel says, "In Italy a good man means a religious one, in France a cheerful one, in Spain a wise one, and in England a rich one."—Inchbald: Lovers' Vows, ii. 2 (1800).

Good Regent (The), James Stuart, earl of Murray, regent of Scotland after the imprisonment of queen Mary. (Born 1533, regent 1567, assassinated 1570.)

Goodenough (Dr.), a physician in Thackeray's novel, the Adventures of Philip (1860).

Goodfellow (Robin), son of king Oberon. When six years old, he was so mischievous that his mother threatened to whip him, and he ran away; but falling asleep, his father told him he should have anything he wished for, with power to turn himself into any shape, so long as he did harm to none but knaves and queans.

His first exploit was to turn himself into a horse, to punish a churl, whom he conveyed into a great plash of water and left there, laughing, as he flew off, "Ho, ho, ho!" He afterwards goes to a farm-house, and, taking a fancy to the maid, does her work during the night. The maid, watching him, and observing him rather bare of clothes, provides him with garments, which he puts out, laughing "Ho, ho, ho!" He next changes himself into a Will-o'-the-wisp, to mislead a party of merry-makers, and having misled them all night, he left them at daybreak, with a "Ho, ho, ho!" At another time, seeing a fellow ill-using a maiden, he changed himself into a hare, ran between his legs, and then growing into a horse, tossed him into a hedge, laughing "Ho, ho, ho!"—The Mad Pranks and Merry Jests of Robin Goodfellow (1580), (Percy Society, 1841).

Goodfellow (Robin), a general name for any domestic spirit, as imp, urchin, elve, hag, fay, Kit-wi'-the-can'stick, spoorn, man-i'-the-oak, Puck, hobgoblin, Tom-tumbler, bug, bogie, Jack-o'-lantern, Friar's lantern, Will-o'-the-wisp, Ariel, nixie, kelpie, etc., etc.

A bigger kind than these German kobolds is that called with us Robin Goodfellows, that would in those superstitious times grind corn for a mess of milk, cut wood, or do any manner of drudgery work. . . . These have several names . . . but we commonly call them Pucks.—Burton: Anatomy of Melancholy, 47 (1602).

Robin Goodfellow, "a shrewd, knavish spirit" in Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream (1594).

N.B.—The Goodfellows, being very numerous, can hardly be the same as Robin son of Oberon, but seem to obtain the name because their character was similar, and, indeed, Oberon's son must be included in the generic name.

Goodman of Ballengeich, the assumed name of James V. of Scotland when he made his disguised visits through the districts round Edinburgh and Stirling.

¶ Haroun-al-Raschid, Louis XI., Peter "the Great," etc., made similar visits in disguise, for the sake of obtaining information by personal inspection.

Good'man Grist, the miller, a friend of the smugglers.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Goodman's Fields, Whitechapel, London. So called from a large farmer of the name of Goodman.

At this farm I myself in my youth have fetched many a ha'p'orth of milk, and never had less than three ale-pints in summer and one in winter, always hot from the kine, and strained. One Trolop and afterward Goodman was the farmer there, and had thirty or forty kine to the pail.—Stow: Survey of London (1598).

Goodricke (Mr.), a Catholic priest at Middlemas.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Goodsire (Johnnie), a weaver, near Charles's Hope farm.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Goodwill, a man who had acquired £10,000 by trade, and wished to give his daughter Lucy in marriage to one of his relations, in order to keep the money in the family; but Lucy would not have any one of the boobies, and made choice instead of a strapping footman. Goodwill had the good sense to approve of the choice.—Fielding: The Virgin Unmasked.

Goody Blake, a poor old woman detected by Harry Gill picking up sticks from his farm-land. (See GILL, Harry.)

Goody Palsgrave, a name of contempt given to Frederick V. elector palatine. He is also called the "Snow King" and the "Winter King," because the protestants made him king of Bohemia in the autumn of 1619, and he was set aside in the autumn of 1620.

Goody Two-shoes, a nursery tale by Oliver Goldsmith, written in 1765 for Newbery, St. Paul's Churchyard. The second title is Mrs. Margery Two-shoes.

Goose Gibbie, a half-witted lad, first entrusted to "keep the turkeys," but afterwards "advanced to the more important office of minding the cows."—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time Charles II.).

Gooseberry Pie, a mock pindaric ode by Southey (1799).

O Jane, with truth I praise thy pie,
And will not you in just reply
Praise my pindaric ode?

Goosey Goderich, Frederick Robinson, created viscount Goderich in 1827. So called by Cobbett, for his incapacity as a statesman (premier 1827–1828).

Gor'boduc, GORBODUG, or GORBOGUD, a mythical British king, who had two sons (Ferrex and Porrex). Ferrex was driven by his brother out of the kingdom, and on attempting to return with a large army, was defeated by him and slain. Soon afterwards, Porrex himself was murdered in his bed by his own mother, who loved Ferrex the better.—Geoffrey: British History, ii. 16 (1142).

> And Gorbogud, till far in years he grew;
> When his ambitious sonnes unto them twayne
> Arraught the rule, and from their father drew:
> Stout Ferrex and stout Porrex him in prison threw.
> But oh! the greedy thirst of royall crowne . . .
> Stird Porrex up to put his brother downe;
> Who unto him assembling forreigne might,
> Made warre on him, and fell himself in fight;
> Whose death t' avenge, his mother, mercilesse
> (Most mercilesse of women, Wyden hight),
> Her other sonne fast sleeping did oppresse,
> And with most cruell hand him murdred pitilesse.
> Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 10, 34, 35 (1590).

Gor'boduc, the first historical play in the language. The first three acts by Thomas Norton, and the last two by Thomas Sackville afterwards lord Buckhurst (1562). It is further remarkable as being the father of iambic ten-syllable blank verse.

> Those who last did tug
> In worse than civil war, the sons of Gorbodug.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1612).

Gor'brias, lord-protector of Ibe'ria, and father of king Arba'ces (3 syl.).—Beaumont and Fletcher: A King or No King (1611).

Gor'dius, a Phrygian peasant, chosen by the Phrygians for their king. He consecrated to Jupiter his wagon, and tied the yoke to the draught-tree so artfully that the ends of the cord could not be discovered. A rumour spread abroad that he who untied this knot would be king of Asia, and when Alexander the Great was shown it, he cut it with his sword, saying, "It is thus we loose our knots."

Gordon (The Rev. Mr.), chaplain in Cromwell's troop.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Gordon (Lord George), leader of the "No Popery riots" of 1779. Half mad, but really well-intentioned, he countenanced the most revolting deeds, urged on by his secretary Gashford. Lord George Gordon died in jail, 1793.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Gordo'nius or Gordon (Bernard), a noted physician of the thirteenth century in the Rouergue (France), author of Lilium Medicinæ, de Morborum prope Omnium Curatione, septem Particulis Distributum (Naples, 1480).

> And has Gordonius "the divine,"
> In his famous Lily of Medicine . . .
> No remedy potent enough to restore you?
> Longfellow: The Golden Legend.

Gor'gibus, an honest, simple-minded citizen of middle life, father of Madelon and uncle of Cathos. The two girls have had their heads turned by novels, but are taught by a harmless trick to discern between the easy manners of a gentleman and the vulgar pretensions of a lackey.—Molière: Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659).

Gorgibus, father of Célie. He is a headstrong, unreasonable old man, who tells his daughter that she is for ever reading novels, and filling her mind with ridiculous notions about love. "Vous parlez de Dieu bien moins que de Lélie," he says, and insists on her giving up Lélie for Valère, saying, "S'il ne l'est amant, il le sera mari," and adds, "L'amour est souvent un fruit du mariage."

> Jetez-moi dans le feu tous ces méchants écrit [sic romances]
> Qui gâtent tous les jours tant de jeunes esprits;
> Lisez moi, comme il faut, au lieu de ces sornettes,
> Les Quatrains de Pibrac, et les doctes Tablettes
> Du conseiller Matthieu; l'ouvrage est de valeur,
> Et pein de beaux dictons à réciter par cœur.
> Molière: Sganarelle (1660).

Gor'lois (3 syl.), said by some to be the father of king Arthur. He was lord of Tintag'el Castle, in Cornwall; his wife was Igrayne (3 syl.) or Igerna, and one of his daughters (Bellicent) was, according to some authorities, the wife of Lot king of Orkney.

 Gorlois was not the father of Arthur, although his wife (Igerna or Igrayne) was his mother.

> Then all the kings asked Merlin, "For what cause is that beardless boy Arthur made king?" "Sirs, said Merlin, "because he is king Uther's son, born in wedlock. . . . More than three hours after the death of Gorlois did the king wed the fair Igrayne."—Malory: History of Prince Arthur, I. 2, 6 (1470).
> [Uther] was sorry for the death of Gorlois, but rejoiced that Igerna was now at liberty to marry again . . . they continued to live together with much affection and had a son and daughter, whose names were Arthur and Anne.—Geoffrey: British History, iii. 20 (1148).

 It is quite impossible to reconcile the contradictory accounts of Arthur's sister and Lot's wife. Tennyson says Bellicent, but the tales compiled by sir T. Malory all give Margause. Thus in La Mort d'Arthur, I. 2, we read, "King Lot of Lothan and of Orkeney wedded Margawse [Arthur's sister]" (pt. I. 36), "whose sons were Gawaine, Agravaine, Gahĕris, and Gareth;" but Tennyson says Gareth was "the last tall son of Lot and Bellicent."

Gor'mal, the mountain range of Sevo.

Her arm was white like Gormal's snow; her bosom whiter than the foam of the main when roll the waves beneath the wrath of winds.—Fragment of a Norse Tale.

Gosh, the Right Hon. Charles Arbuthnot, the most confidential friend of the duke of Wellington, with whom he lived.

Gosling (Giles), landlord of the Black Bear inn, near Cumnor Place.

Cicely Gosling, daughter of Giles.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Gospel Doctor (The), John Wycliffe (1324-1384).

Gospel of the Golden Rule, "Do as you would be done by," or "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them."—Luke vi. 31.

He preached to all men everywhere
The Gospel of the Golden Rule.
Longfellow: The Wayside Inn (prelude).

Gospeller (The Hot), Dr. R. Barnes, burnt at Smithfield, 1540.

Gos'samer (i.e. God's seam or thread). The legend is that gossamer is the ravellings of the Virgin Mary's winding-sheet, which fell away on her ascension into heaven.

Gossips (Prince of), Samuel Pepys, noted for his gossiping Diary, commencing January 1, 1659, and continued for nine years (1632-1703).

Goswin, a rich merchant of Bruges, who is in reality Florez, son of Gerrard king of the beggars. His mistress, Bertha, the supposed daughter of Vandunke the burgomaster of Bruges, is in reality the daughter of the duke of Brabant.—Fletcher: The Beggars' Bush (1622).

Gotham (Merry Tales of the Men of), supposed to have been compiled in the reign of Henry VIII. by Andrew Borde. The legend is that king John, on his way to Lynn Regis, intended to pass through Gotham, in Nottinghamshire, with his army, and sent heralds to prepare his way. The men of Gotham were resolved, if possible, to prevent this expense and depredation, so they resolved to play the fool. Some raked the moon out of the pond, some made a ring to hedge in a bird, some did other equally foolish things, and the heralds told the king that the Gothamites were utter fools, and advised the king to go another way. So the king and his heralds were befooled, and the men of Gotham saved their bacon. But "wise as the men of Gotham" grew into a proverb to indicate a fool.
