In this novel are introduced Louis XI. and his Scottish Guards, Oliver le Dane and Tristan l'Hermite, Cardinal Balue, De la Marck (the "wild boar of Ardennes"), Charles the Bold, Philip des Comines, Le Glorieux (the court jester), and other well-known historic characters.

The tale is as follows: Quentin Durward first sees the countess Isabelle at a turret-window, while taking breakfast with the king. Soon after this he is enrolled by his uncle in the Scottish Guards, and saves the life of the king from the attack of a wild boar. The king, with a small retinue, visits the duke of Burgundy, who charges him with the murder of the bishop of Liège. Matters look ominous, but ultimately the duke and king are reconciled. The countess Isabelle rejects the suit of the duke of Orleans, and marries Quentin Durward, whose wounds she had dressed when he had been attacked by De la Marck and the count de Dunois, and by whom she had been conducted to Liège (1823; in English history, time, Edward IV.).

Quern-Biter, the sword of Haco I. of Norway.

Quern-biter of Hacon the Good
Wherewith at a stroke he hewed
The millstone thro and thro'.
Longfellow.

Querno (Camillo) of Apulia was introduced to pope Leo X. as a buffoon, but was promoted to the laurel. This laureate was called the "Antichrist of Wit."

Rome in her capitol saw Querno sit,
Throned on seven hills, the antichrist of wit.
Pope: The Dunciad, ii. (1728).

Querpo (Shrill), in Garth's Dispensary, is meant for Dr. Howe.

To this design shrill Querpo did agree,
A zealous member of the faculty,
His sire's pretended pious steps he treads,
And where the doctor fails, the saint succeeds.
Dispensary, iv. (1699).

Questing Beast (The), a monster called Glatisaunt, that made a noise called questing, "like thirty couple of hounds giving quest" or cry. King Pellinore (3 syl.) followed the beast for twelve months

(pt. i. 17); and after his death sir Palomidès gave it chase.

The questing beast had in shape and head like a serpent's head, and a body like a libard, buttocks like a lion, and footed like a hart; and in his body there was such a noise as it had been the noise of thirty couple of hounds questing, and such a noise that beast made wheresoever he went; and this beast evermore sir Palomides followed.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 17; ii. 53 (1470).

Quenbus (The Equinoctial of), a line in the "unknown sea," passed by the Vapians on the Greek kalends of the Olympiad era B.C. 777, according to the authority of Quinapalus (q.v.).—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, act ii. sc. 3 (1614).

Quiara and Mon'nema, man and wife; the only persons who escaped the ravages of the small-pox plague which carried off all the rest of the Guara'ni race, in Paraguay. They left the fatal spot, settled in the Mondai woods, had one son Yerûti and one daughter Mooma; but Quiâra was killed by a jaguar before the latter was born.—Southey: A Tale of Paraguay (1814). (See MONNEMA, p. 720; and MOOMA, p. 723.)

Quick (John), called "The Retired Diocletian of Islington" (1748–1831).

Quicken Trees (The Fairy Palace of the). This is one of a type of story very common in Gaelic romantic literature. One or more of the heroes are entrapped by some enchanter and held under a spell in castle, cave, or dungeon, until, after a series of adventures, they are released by the bravery or mother-wit of their companions. Erin had been invaded by Colga king of Lochlann (Denmark). Colga had been slain, and his army defeated by Finn and the Feni. The young prince Midac was spared, and was brought up by Finn. Arrived at man's estate, he set up a princely establishment in Erin, the while meditating revenge. He secured the assistance of his father's allies, as well as the services of "the king of the world" (the Roman power); and when his plans were ready he invited Finn and his heroes to a banquet. The king and most of the chiefs accepted, and soon found themselves spell-bound in the Fairy Palace of the Quicken Trees. Some few, however, were absent, hunting, amongst them Ossian the warrior-bard and the brave Dermat O'Dyna (q.v.). On their return from the chase they discovered the evil plight of their friends, courageously guarded them while under the charm, slew Midac and the enchanters, broke the spell, called together the Feni, and a terrible battle was fought, in which the mercenaries were completely routed.

(The quicken tree or quickbeam is the mountain ash or rowan tree; Gaelic, caerthainn. Many mystic virtues were anciently attributed to this tree.)

Quickly (Mistress), servant-of-all-work to Dr. Caius a French physician. She says, "I wash, wring, brew, bake, scour, dress meat and drink, make the beds, and do all myself." She is the go-between of three suitors for "sweet Anne Page," and with perfect disinterestedness wishes all three to succeed, and does her best to forward the suit of all three, "but speciously of Master Fenton."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor (1601).

Quickly (Mistress Nell), hostess of a tavern in East-cheap, frequented by Harry prince of Wales, sir John Falstaff, and all their disreputable crew. In Henry V. Mistress Quickly is represented as having married Pistol the "lieutenant of captain sir John's army." All three die before the end of the play. Her description of sir John Falstaff's death (Henry V. act ii. sc. 3) is very graphic and true to nature. In 2 Henry IV. Mistress Quickly arrests sir John for debt, but, immediately she hears of his commission, is quite willing to dismiss the bailiffs, and trust "the honey sweet" old knight again to any amount.—Shakespeare: 1 and 2 Henry IV. and Henry V.

Quid (Mr.), the tobacconist, a relative of Mrs. Margaret Bertram.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Quid Rides, the motto of Jacob Brandon, tobacco-broker, who lived at the close of the eighteenth century. It was suggested by Harry Calendon of Lloyd's coffee-house.

(Quid Ridès (Latin) means "Why do you laugh?" Quid rides, i.e. "the tobacconist rides.")

Quidnunc (Abraham), of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, an upholsterer by trade, but bankrupt. His head "runs only on schemes for paying off the National Debt, the balance of power, the affairs of Europe, and the political news of the day."

The prototype of this town politician was the father of Dr. Arne (see The Tatler, No. 155).

Harriet Quidnunc, his daughter, rescued by Belmour from the flames of a burning house, and adored by him.

John Quidnunc, under the assumed name of Rovewell, having married a rich planter's widow, returns to England, pays his father's debts, and gives his sister to Mr. Belmour for wife.—Murphy: The Upholsterer (1758).

Quidnuncs, a name given to the ancient members of certain political clubs, who were constantly inquiring, "Quidnunc? What news?"

> This the Great Mother dearer held than all
> The clubs of Quidnuncs, or her own Guildhall.
> Pope: The Dunciad, i. 269 (1728).

Quidnunkis, a monkey which climbed higher than its neighbours, and fell into a river. For a few moments the monkey race stood panic-struck, but the stream flowed on, and in a minute or two the monkeys continued their gambols as if nothing had happened.—Gay: The Quidnunkis (a fable, 1726).

Quildrive (2 syl.), clerk to old Philpot "the citizen."—Murphy: The Citizen (1761).

Quilp (Daniel), a hideous dwarf, cunning, malicious, and a perfect master in tormenting. Of hard, forbidding features, with head and face large enough for a giant. His black eyes were restless, sly, and cunning; his mouth and chin bristly with a coarse, hard beard; his face never clean, but always distorted with a ghastly grin, which showed the few discoloured fangs that supplied the place of teeth. His dress consisted of a large high-crowned hat, a worn-out dark suit, a pair of most capacious shoes, and a huge crumpled dirty white neck-cloth. Such hair as he had was a grizzled black, cut short but hanging about his ears in fringes. His hands were coarse and dirty; his finger-nails crooked, long, and yellow. He lived on Tower Hill, collected rents, advanced money to seamen, and kept a sort of wharf, containing rusty anchors, huge iron rings, piles of rotten wood, and sheets of old copper, calling himself a ship-breaker. He was on the point of being arrested for felony, when he was drowned.

He ate hard eggs, shell and all, for his breakfast, devoured gigantic prawns with their heads and tails on, chewed tobacco and water-cresses at the same time, drank scalding hot tea without winking, bit his fork and spoon till they bent again, and performed so many horrifying acts, that one might doubt if he were indeed human.—Ch. v.

Mrs. Quilp (Betsy), wife of the dwarf, a loving, young, timid, obedient, and pretty blue-eyed little woman, treated like a dog by her diabolical husband, whom she really loved but more greatly feared.—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop (1840).

Quinap'alus, the Mrs. Harris of "authorities in citations." If any one quotes from an hypothetical author, he gives Quinapalus as his authority.

What says Quinapalus: "Better a witty fool than a foolish wit."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, act i. sc. 5 (1614).

Quinbus Flestrin ["the man-mountain"]. So the Lilliputians called Gulliver (ch. ii.).—Swift: Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Lilliput," 1726).

Quince (Peter), a carpenter, who undertakes the management of the play called "Pyramus and Thisbê," in Midsummer Night's Dream. He speaks of "laughable tragedy," "lamentable comedy," "tragical mirth," and so on.—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

Quino'nes (Suero de), in the reign of Juan II. He, with nine other cavaliers, held the bridge of Orbigo against all comers for thirty-six days, and in that time they overthrew seventy-eight knights of Spain and France.

Quintano'na, the duenna of queen Guinever or Ginebra.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. ii. 6 (1615).

Quintessence (Queen), sovereign of Entéléchie, the country of speculative science visited by Pantag'ruel and his companions in their search for "the oracle of the Holy Bottle."—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, v. 19 (1545).

Quint'essence of Heaven. Besides the four elements of earth, Aristotle imagined a fifth element, out of which the stars and other ethereal bodies were formed. The motion of this "quint-essence," he said, was orbicular

. . . this ethereal "quintessence of heaven"
Flew upward, spirited with various forms,
That rolled orbicular, and turned to stars
Numberless.
Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 716, etc. (1665).

Quin'tiquinies'tra (Queen), a much-dreaded, fighting giantess. It was one of the romances in don Quixote's library condemned by the priest and barber of the village to be burnt.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. (1605).

Quintus Fixlein [Fix-line], the title and chief character of a romance by Jean Paul Friedrich Richter (1796).

Francia, like Quintus Fixlein, had perennial fireproof joys, namely, employments.—Carlyle.

Quiri'nus, Mars.

Now, by our sire Quirinus,
It was a goodly sight
To see the thirty standards
Swept down the tide of flight.
Macaulay: Lays of Ancient Rome ("Battle of the Lake Regillus," xxxvi., 1842).

Quitam (Mr.), the lawyer at the Black Bear inn at Darlington.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

(The first two words in an action on a penal statute are Qui tam. Thus, Qui tam pro domina regina, quam pro seipso, sequitur.)

Quixa'da (Gutierre), lord of Villagarcia. Don Quixote calls himself a descendant of this brave knight.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. (1605).

Quix'ote (Don), a gaunt country gentleman of La Mancha, about 50 years of age, gentle and dignified, learned and high-minded; with strong imagination perverted by romance and crazed with ideas of chivalry. He is the hero of a Spanish romance by Cervantes. Don Quixote feels himself called on to become a knight-errant, to defend the oppressed and succour the injured. He engages for his 'squire Sancho Panza, a middle-aged, ignorant rustic, selfish but full of good sense, a gourmand but attached to his master, shrewd but credulous. The knight goes forth on his adventures, thinks wind-mills to be giants, flocks of sheep to be armies, inns to be castles, and galley-slaves oppressed gentlemen; but the 'squire sees them in their true light. Ultimately, the knight is restored to his right mind, and dies like a peaceful Christian. The object of this romance was to laugh down the romances of chivalry of the Middle Ages.

(Quixote means "armour for the thighs," but Quixada means "lantern jaws." Don Quixote's favourite author was Feliciano de Sylva; his model knight was Am'adis de Gaul. The romance is in two parts, of four books each. Pt. I. was published in 1605, and pt. II. in 1615.)

(The prototype of the knight was the duke of Lerma.)

Don Quixote is a tall, meagre, lantern-jawed, hawk-nosed, long-limbed, grizzle-haired man, with a pair of large black whiskers, and he styles himself "The Knight of the Woeful Countenance."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. i. 14 (1615).

Don Quixote's Horse, Rosinantê (4 syl.), all skin and bone.

The Female Quixote or Adventures of Arabella, a novel by Mrs. Lennox (1752).

The Quixote of the North, Charles XII. of Sweden; sometimes called "The Madman" (1682, 1697–1718).

Quodling (The Rev. Mr.), chaplain to the duke of Buckingham.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

"Why," said the duke, "I had caused my little Quodling to go through his oration thus: 'Whatever evil reports had passed current during the lifetime of the worthy matron whom they had restored to dust that day, even Malice herself could not deny that she was born well, married well, lived well, and died well; since she was born at Shadwell, married to Cresswell, lived in Camberwell, and died in Bridewell.'"—Peveril of the Peak, xliv. (1823).

(Some give Clerkenwell instead of "Camberwell.")

Quos Ego—, a threat intended but withheld; a sentence broken off. Eölus, angry with the winds and storms which had thrown the sea into commotion without his sanction, was going to say he would punish them severely for this act of insubordination; but having uttered the first two words, "Whom I——," he says no more, but proceeds to the business in hand.—Virgil: Æneid, i.

"Next Monday," said he, "you will be a 'substance, and then——;" with which quos ego he went to the next boy.—Dasent: Half a Life (1850).

Quo'tem (Caleb), a parish clerk or Jack-of-all-trades.—Colman: The Review or The Wags of Windsor (1798).

I resolved, like Caleb Quotem, to have a place at the review.—Washington Irving.

R.

R. Neither Demosthênês nor Aristotle could pronounce the letter r.

R [rogues], vagabonds, etc., who were branded on the left shoulder with this letter.

They . . . may be burned with a hot burning iron of the breadth of a shilling, with a great Roman R on the left shoulder, which letter shall remain as the mark of a rogue. —Prynne: Histrio-mastix or The Players' Scourge.

If I escape the halter with the letter R
Printed upon it.
Massinger: A New Way to Pay Old Debts, iv. 2 (1625).

Rab and his Friends. Rab is a dog fond of his master and mistress, and most faithful to them. The story is contained in Dr. John Brown's Horæ Subsecivæ (1858–60).

Rab'agas, an advocate and editor of a journal called the Carmagnole. At the same office was published another radical paper, called the Crapaud Volant. Rabagas lived in the kingdom of Monaco, and was a demagogue leader of the deepest red; but was won over to the king's party by the tact of an American lady, who got him an invitation to dine at the palace, and made him chief minister of state. From this moment he became the most strenuous opponent of the "liberal" party. — Sardou: Rabagas (1872).

Rabbi Abron of Trent, a fictitious sage and most wonderful linguist. "He knew the nature of all manner of herbs, beasts, and minerals."—Reynard the Fox, xii. (1498).

Rabbits. Those rabbits have more nature in them than you commonly find in rabbits; i.e. my production is better than the production of other men. This was said by a conceited artist.—Foster: Life of Dickens, ii. 367.

Rabelais (The English). Dean Swift was so called by Voltaire (1667–1745).

Sterne (1713–1768) and Thomas Amory (1699–1788) have also been so called.

The Modern Rabelais, William Maginn (1794–1842).

Rabelais of Germany, J. Fischart, called "Mentzer" (1550–1614).

Rabelais's Poison. Rabelais, being at a great distance from Paris, and without money to pay his hotel bill or his fare, made up three small packets of brick-dust. One he labelled "Poison for the king," another "Poison for monsieur," and the third "Poison for the dauphin." The landlord instantly informed against this "poisoner," and the secretary of state removed him at once to Paris. When, however, the joke was found out, it ended only in a laugh.—Spectator ("Art of Growing Rich").

Rab'ican or Rabica'no, the horse of Astolpho. Its sire was Wind and its dam Fire. It fed on human food. The word means "short tail."—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Rabisson, a vagabond tinker and knife-grinder. He was the only person who knew about "the gold-mine" left to the "miller of Grenoble." Rabisson was murdered for his secret by Eusebe Noel the schoolmaster of Bout des Monde.—Stirling: The Gold-Mine or Miller of Grenoble (1854).

Rab'sheka (in the Bible RABSHAKEH), in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for sir Thomas Player (2 Kings xviii.).

Next him let railing Rabsheka have place—
So full of zeal, he has no need of grace.
Pt. ii. 297, 298 (1682).

Raby (Aurora), a rich young English orphan, catholic in religion, of virgin modesty, "a rose with all its sweetest leaves yet folded." She was staying in the house of lord and lady Amundeville during the parliamentary vacation. Here don Juan, "as Russian envoy," was also a guest, with several others. Aurora Raby is introduced in canto xv., and crops up here and there in the two remaining cantos; but, as the tale was never finished, it is not possible to divine what part the beautiful and innocent girl was designed by the poet to play. Probably don Juan, having sown his "wild oats," might become a not unfit match for the beautiful orphan.—Byron: Don Juan (1824).

Raby (The Rose of). (See ROSE.)

Rachael, a servant-girl at lady Peveril's of the Peak.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Rachel (2 syl.), one of the "hands" in Bounderby's mill at Coketown. She loved Stephen Blackpool, and was greatly beloved by him in return; but Stephen was married to a worthless drunkard. After the death of Stephen, Rachel watched over the good-for-nothing young widow, and befriended her.—Dickens: Hard Times (1854).

Racine of Italy (The), Metastasio (1698–1782).

Racine of Music (The), Antonio Gaspare Sacchini of Naples (1735–1786).

Racine's Monkey, J. E. de Campestron, called Le Singe de Racine.

Racket (Sir Charles), a young man of fashion, who has married the daughter of a wealthy London merchant. In the third week of the honeymoon, sir Charles paid his father-in-law a visit, and quarrelled with his bride about a game of whist. The lady affirmed that sir Charles ought to have played a diamond instead of a club. Sir Charles grew furious, and resolved upon a divorce; but the quarrel was adjusted, and sir Charles ends by saying, "You may be as wrong as you please, but I'll be cursed if I ever endeavour to set you right again."

Lady Racket, wife of sir Charles, and elder daughter of Mr. Drugget.—Murphy: Three Weeks after Marriage (1776).

Racket (Widow), a sprightly, good-natured widow and woman of fashion.

A coquette, a wit, and a fine lady.—Mrs. Cowley: The Belle's Stratagem, ii. 1 (1780).

The "Widow Racket" was one of Mrs. Pope's best parts. Her usual manner of expressing piquant carelessness consisted in tossing her head from right to left, and striking the palm of one hand with the back of the other (1740–1797).—James Smith.

Rackrent (Sir Condy), in Miss Edgeworth's novel of Castle Rackrent (1802).

Raddle (Mrs.), keeper of the lodgings occupied by Bob Sawyer. The young medical practitioner invited Mr. Pickwick and his three friends to a convivial meeting; but the termagant Mrs. Raddle brought the meeting to an untimely end.—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Radegonde (St.) or ST. RADEGUND, queen of France (born 519, died 587). She was the daughter of Bertaire king of Thuringia, and brought up a pagan. King Clotaire I. taught her the Christian religion, and married her in 538; but six years later she entered a nunnery, and lived in the greatest austerity.

There thou must walk in greatest gravity,
And seem as saintlike as St. Radegund.
Spenser: Mother Hubberd's Tale (1591).

Radigund or RADEGONE, the proud queen of the Amazons. Being rejected by Bellodant "the Bold," she revenged herself by degrading every man who fell into her power, by dressing them like women, giving them women's work to do, such as spinning, carding, sewing, etc., and feeding them on bread and water to effeminate them (canto 4). When she overthrew sir Artegal in single combat, she imposed on him the condition of dressing in "woman's weeds," with a white apron, and to spend his time in spinning flax, instead of in deeds of arms. Radigund fell in love with the captive knight, and sent Clarinda as a go-between; but Clarinda tried to win him for herself, and told the queen he was inexorable (canto 5). At length Britomart arrived, cut off Radigund's head, and liberated the captive knight (canto 7).—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 4–7 (1596).

Rag and Famish (The), the Army and Navy Club; so christened by capt. William Duff, 23rd Fusiliers.

Coming in to supper late one night, the refreshment obtainable appeared so meagre that he nicknamed the club the "Rag and Famish."—Ralph Nevill: Piccadilly to Pall Mall, p. 235.

Ragged Regiment (The), the wan figures in Westminster Abbey, in a gallery over Islip's Chapel.

Ragnarök, the last days of the world, or the twilight of the gods.—Scandinavian Mythology.

Railway King (The), George Hudson of Yorkshire, chairman of the North Midland Company. In one day he cleared by speculation £100,000. It was the Rev. Sydney Smith who gave Hudson the title of "Railway King" (1800–1871).

Rain. In India the rain-god is imagined to pour down showers from a sieve. The Mandan Indian used to call down rain by a rattle.

The Peruvians suppose there is a celestial princess who holds a rain-vase, and that thunder is the noise made by her brother striking the vase.

The Polynesians suppose that rain comes from the angry stars stoning the sun.

The Burmese say they can pull down the rain by tugging a rope.

In New Caledonia there is a regular college of rain-priests; and in Moffat's time, the rain-makers of South Africa were held in higher honour than the kings.

In Alaska the storm-spirit is propitiated by offerings of tobacco.

Weather-witches were at one time supposed to reside in Norway and other countries. And at one time the Finlanders drove a profitable trade by selling wind. (See MONT ST. MICHEL, p. 720.)

Raine (Old Roger), the tapster, near the abode of sir Geoffrey Peveril.

Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Rainy-Day Smith, John Thomas Smith, the antiquary (1766–1833).

Rajah of Mattan (Borneo) has a diamond which weighs 367 carats. The largest cut diamond in the world. It is considered to be a palladium. (See DIAMONDS, p. 277.)

Rake (Lord), a nobleman of the old school, fond of debauch, street rows, knocking down Charlies, and seeing his guests drunk. His chief boon companions are sir John Brute and colonel Bully.—Vanbrugh: The Provoked Wife (1697).

Rakeland (Lord), a libertine, who makes love to married women, but takes care to keep himself free from the bonds of matrimony.—Mrs. Inchbald: The Wedding Day (1790).

Rak'she (2 syl.), a monster, which lived on serpents and dragons. (See OURANABAD, p. 790.)

Raleigh (Sir Walter), introduced by sir W. Scott in Kenilworth. The tradition of sir Walter laying down his cloak on a miry spot for the queen to step on, and the queen commanding him to wear the "muddy cloak till her pleasure should be further known," is mentioned in ch. xv. (1821).

¶ The following is a parallel instance of instinctive politeness:—

A lady on her way to visit a sick man, came to a puddle. A little boy, who saw the difficulty she was in, stepped into the mud, and, throwing off his wooden shoes, jumped over the plash. The lady cried out, "Little boy, you have left your shoes behind you." "Yes, ma'am," he replied; "they are for you to walk on."—Temple Bar, cxxxiii. ("Politeness," a true story).

Raleigh (Sir Walter). Jealous of the earl of Essex, he plots with lord Burleigh to compass his death.—H. Jones: The Earl of Essex (1745).

RALPH, abbot of St. Augustine's, expended £43,000 on the repast given at his installation.

¶ It was no unusual thing for powerful barons to provide 30,000 dishes at a wedding breakfast. The coronation dinner of Edward III. cost £40,000, equal to half a million of money now. The duke of Clarence at his marriage entertained 1000 guests, and furnished his table with 36 courses. Archbishop Neville had 1000 egrettes served at one banquet, and the whole species seems to have been extirpated.

¶ After this it will be by no means difficult to understand why Apicius despaired of being able to make two ends meet, when he had reduced his enormous fortune to £80,000, and therefore hanged himself.

N.B.—After the winter of 1327 was over, the elder Spencer had left of the stores laid in by him the preceding November and salted down, "80 salted beeves, 500 bacons, and 600 muttons."

Ralph, son of Fairfield the miller. An outlandish, ignorant booby, jealous of his sister Patty, because she "could paint picturs and strum on the harpsicols." He was in love with Fanny the gipsy, for which "feyther" was angry with him; but "what argufies feyther's anger?" However, he treated Fanny like a brute, and she said of him, "He has a heart as hard as a parish officer. I don't doubt but he would stand by and see me whipped." When his sister married lord Aimworth, Ralph said—

Captain Ralph my lord will dub me,
Soon I'll mount a huge cockade;
Mounseer shall powder, queue, and club me.—
'Gad! I'll be a roaring blade.
If Fan should offer then to snub me,
When in scarlet I'm arrayed;
Or my feyther temp to drub me—
Let him frown, but who's afraid!
Bickerstaff: The Maid of the Mill (1647).

Ralph, or RALPHO, the 'squire of Hudibras.—Fully described in bk. i. 457–644.—S. Butler: Hudibras (1663–78).

(The prototype of "Ralph" was Isaac Robinson, a zealous butcher in Moorfields. Ralph represents the independent party, and Hudibras the presbyterian.)

 In regard to the pronunciation of this name, which in 1878 was the subject of a long controversy in Notes and Queries, Butler says—

A squire he had whose name was Ralph,
That in th' adventure went his half; . . .
And when we can, with metre safe,
We'll call him Ralpho, or plain Ra'ph.
Bk. i. 458.

Ralph (Rough), the helper of Lance Outram park-keeper at sir Geoffrey Peveril's of the Peak.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Ralph (James), an American who came to London and published a poem entitled Night (1725).

Silence, ye wolves! while Ralph to Cynthia howls,
Making night hideous; answer him, ye owls.
Pope: The Dunciad, iii. 365 (1728).

Ralph [DE LASCOURS], captain of the Uran'ia, husband of Louise de Lascours. Ralph is the father of Diana and Martha alias Orgari'ta. (See under MARTHA, p. 680.)—Stirling: Orphan of the Frozen Sea (1856).

Ralph Roister Doister, by Nicholas Udall, the first English comedy, about 1534. It contains nine male and four female characters. Ralph is a vain, thoughtless, blustering fellow, who is in pursuit of a rich widow named Custance, but he is baffled in his intention.

Ram Alley, in Fleet Street, London. Now called Hare Place. It was part of the Sanctuary.

Ramble (Sir Robert), a man of gallantry, who treats his wife with such supreme indifference that she returns to her guardian, lord Norland, and resumes her maiden name of Maria Wooburn. Subsequently, however, she returns to her husband.

Mrs. Ramble, wife of sir Robert, and ward of lord Norland.—Mrs. Inchbald: Every One has His Fault (1794).

Rambler (The), a periodical published twice a week by Dr. Johnson (1750–52).

Ram'iel (3 syl.), one of the "atheist crew" o'erthrown by Ab'diel. (The word means, according to Hume, "one who exalts himself against God.")—Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 371 (1665).

Raminago'bris. Lafontaine, in his fables, gives this name to a cat. Rabelais, in his Pantag'ruel, iii. 21, satirizes under the same name Guillaume Crétin, a poet.

Rami'rez, a Spanish monk, and father confessor to don Juan duke of Braganza. He promised Velasquez, that when he absolved the duke at bed-time, he would give him a poisoned wafer prepared by the Carmelite Castruccio. This he was about to do, when he was interrupted, and the breaking out of the rebellion saved the duke from any similar attempt. —Jephson: Braganza (1775).

Rami'ro (King) married Aldonza, who, being faithless, eloped with Alboa'zar the Moorish king of Gaya. Ramiro came disguised as a traveller to Alboazar's castle, and asked a damsel for a draught of water, and when he lifted the pitcher to his mouth, he dropped in it his betrothal ring, which Aldonza saw and recognized. She told the damsel to bring the stranger to her apartment. Scarce had he arrived there when the Moorish king entered, and Ramiro hid himself in an alcove. "What would you do to Ramiro," asked Aldonza, "if he were in your power?" "I would hew him limb from limb," said the Moor. "Then lo! Alboazar, he is now skulking in that alcove." Ramiro was now dragged forth, and the Moor said, "How would you act if our lots were reversed?" Ramiro replied, "I would feast you well, and send for my chief princes and counsellors, and set you before them, and bid you blow your horn till you died." "Then be it so," said the Moor. But when Ramiro blew his horn, his "merry men" rushed into the castle, and the Moorish king, with Aldonza and all their children, princes, and counsellors, were put to the sword.—Southey: Ramiro (a ballad from the Portuguese, 1804).

Ramorny (Sir John), a voluptuary, master of the horse to prince Robert of Scotland.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Ramsay (David), the old watchmaker near Temple Bar.

Margaret Ramsay, David's daughter. She marries lord Nigel.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Ramsbottom (Mrs.), a vile speller of the language. Theodore Hook's pseudonym in the John Bull newspaper (1829). (Winifred Jenkins, the maid of Miss Tabitha Bramble (in Smollett's Humphrey Clinker, 1770), rivals Mrs. Ramsbottom in bad spelling.)

Randal, the boatman at Lochleven Castle.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Randolph (Lord), a Scotch nobleman, whose life was saved by young Norval. For this service his lordship gave the youth a commission; but Glenalvon the heir-presumptive hated the new favourite, and persuaded lord Randolph that Norval was too familiar with his lady. Accordingly, Glenalvon and lord Randolph waylaid the lad, who being attacked slew Glenalvon in self-defence, but was himself slain by lord Randolph. When the lad was killed, lord Randolph learned that "Norval" was the son of lady Randolph by lord Douglas her former husband. He was greatly vexed, and went to the war then raging between Scotland and Denmark, to drown his sorrow by activity and danger.

Lady Randolph, daughter of sir Malcolm, was privately married to lord

Douglas, and when her first boy was born she hid him in a basket, because there was a family feud between Malcolm and Douglas. Soon after this, Douglas was slain in battle, and the widow married lord Randolph. The babe was found by old Norval a shepherd, who brought him up as his own son. When 18 years old, the lad saved the life of lord Randolph, and was given a commission in the army. Lady Randolph, hearing of the incident, discovered that young Norval was her own son Douglas. When lord Randolph, who had slain Norval, went to the wars to drive away care, lady Randolph, in her distraction, cast herself headlong from a steep precipice.—Home: Douglas (1757).

The voice of Mrs. Crawford [1734–1801], when thrown out by the vehemence of strong feeling, seemed to wither up the hearer; it was a flaming arrow, a lighting of passion. Such was the effect of her almost shriek to old Norval, "Was he alive?" It was like an electric shock, which drove the blood back to the heart, and produced a shudder of terror through the crowded theatre.—Boaden: Life of Kemble.

Random, a man of fortune with a scapegrace son. He is pale and puffy, with gout and a tearing cough. Random goes to France to recruit his health, and on his return to England gets arrested for debt in mistake for his son. He raves and rages, threatens and vows vengeance, but finds his son on the point of marrying a daughter of sir David Dunder of Dunder Hall, and forgets his evils in contemplation of this most desirable alliance.—Colman: Ways and Means (1788).

Random (Roderick), a young Scotch scapegrace in quest of fortune. At one time he revels in prosperity, at another he is in utter destitution. Roderick is led into different countries (whose peculiarities are described), and falls into the society of wits, sharpers, courtiers, and harlots. Occasionally lavish, he is essentially mean; with a dash of humour, he is contemptibly revengeful; and, though generous-minded when the whim jumps with his wishes, he is thoroughly selfish. His treatment of Strap is revolting to a generous mind. Strap lends him money in his necessity, but the heartless Roderick wastes the loan, treats Strap as a mere servant, fleeces him at dice, and cuffs him when the game is adverse. —Smollett: Roderick Random (1748).

Ranger, the madcap cousin of Clarinda, and the leading character in Hoadly's Suspicious Husband (1747).

Ran'tipole (3 syl.), or Ratipole, a madcap. One of the nicknames given to Napoleon III. (See NAPOLEON III., p. 744.)

Dick, be a little rantipolish.
Colman: Heir-at-Law, i. 2 (1797).

Raoul [Rawl], the old huntsman of sir Raymond Berenger.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Raoul di Nangis (Sir), the huguenot in love with Valentina (daughter of the comte de St. Bris, governor of the Louvre). Sir Raoul is offered the hand of Valentina in marriage, but rejects it because he fancies she is betrothed to the comte de Nevers. Nevers being slain in the Bartholomew Massacre, Raoul marries Valentina, but scarcely is the ceremony over when both are shot by the musketeers under the command of St. Bris.—Meyerbeer: Les Huguenots (opera, 1836).

Rape of the Lock (The), a poem in five cantos, in rhyming heroic lines, by Pope (1711 and 1714). The subject is a lock of Belinda's hair surreptitiously cut off by baron Plume, at a card-party given at Windsor Court. Belinda indignantly demanded back the ringlet, but after a fruitless charge it was affirmed that, like Berenice's hair, it had been transported to heaven, and henceforth shall "midst the stars inscribe Belinda's name."

Raphael (2 or 3 syl.), called by Milton "The Sociable Spirit," and "The Affable Archangel." In the book of Tobit it was Raphael who travelled with Tobias into Media and back again; and it is the same angel that holds discourse with Adam through two books of Paradise Lost, v. and vi. (1665).

Raphael, the guardian angel of John the Beloved.

 Longfellow calls Raphael "The Angel of the Sun," and says that he brings to man "the gift of faith."—Golden Legend ("Miracle-Play," iii., 1851).

The Flemish Raphael, Frans Floris. His chief works are "St. Luke at his Easel," and the "Descent of the Fallen Angels," both in Antwerp Cathedral (1520–1570).

The French Raphael, Eustace Lesueur (1617–1655).

The Raphael of Cats, Godefroi Mind, a Swiss painter, famous for his cats (1768–1814).

The Raphael of Holland, Martin van Hemskerck (1498–1574).

The Raphael of Music, Mozart (1756–1791).

Raphael's Enchanter, Giulia Fornarina, a baker's wife. Her likeness appears in several of his paintings. (See LOVERS, p. 633.)

Rapier (The), was introduced by Rowland York in 1587.

He [Rowland York] was a Londoner, famous amongst the cutters in his time for bringing in a new kind of fight—to run the point of a rapier into a man's body . . . before that time the use was with little bucklers, and with broadswords to strike and never thrust, and it was accounted unmanly to strike under the girdle.—Carleton: Thankful Remembrance (1625).

Rare Ben. Ben Jonson, the dramatist, was so called by Shakespeare (1574–1637).

Raredrench (Master), apothecary. —Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Rascal, worthless, lean. A rascal deer is a lean, poor stag. Brutus calls money "rascal counters," i.e. contemptible, ignoble coin.

When Marcus Brutus grows so covetous,
To lock such rascal counters from his friends,
Be ready, gods, with all your thunderbolts;
Dash him to pieces!
Shakespeare: Julius Cæsar, act iv. sc. 3 (1607).

Rashleigh Osbaldistone, called "the scholar," an hypocritical and accomplished villain, killed by Rob Roy. —Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

"Surely never gentleman was plagued with such a family as sir Hildebrand Osbaldistone of Osbaldistone Hall. (1) Percival, "the sot;" (2) Thorncliff, "the bully;" (3) John, "the gamekeeper;" (4) Richard, "the horse-jockey;" (5) Wilfred, "the fool;" (6) Rashleigh, "the scholar and knave."

Ras'selas, prince of Abyssinia, fourth son of the emperor. According to the custom of the country, he was confined in a private paradise, with the rest of the royal family. This paradise was in the valley of Amhara, surrounded by high mountains. It had only one entrance, which was by a cavern under a rock concealed by woods, and closed by iron gates. The prince, having made his escape with his sister Nekayah and Imlac the poet, wandered about to find out what condition or rank of life was the most happy. After careful investigation, he found no lot without its drawbacks, and resolved to return to the "happy valley."—Dr. Johnson: Rasselas (1759).

The mad astronomer, who imagined that he possessed the regulation of the weather and the distribution of the seasons, is an original character in romance; and the "happy valley," in which Rasselas resides, is sketched with poetic feeling.—Young.

Rat destroys a whole Province (A). One of the richest provinces of Holland was once inundated by a hole made in the dykes by a single water-rat.

Rat without a Tail. Witches could assume any animal form, but the tail was ever wanting. Thus, a cat without a tail, a rat without a tail, a dog without a tail, were witch-forms. (See Macbeth, act i. sc. 3.)

Rats (Devoured by). Archbishop Hatto, count Graaf, bishop Widerolf of Strasburg, bishop Adolph of Cologne, and Freiherr von Güttingen, were all devoured by rats. (See HATTO, p. 474.)

Ratcliffe (James), a notorious thief. —Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Ratcliffe (Mr. Hubert), a friend of sir Edward Manley "the Black Dwarf."—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Ratcliffe (Mrs.), the widow of "don Carlos" who rescued Sheva at Cadiz from an auto da fe.

Charles Ratcliffe, clerk of sir Stephen Bertram, discharged because he had a pretty sister, and sir Stephen had a young son. Charles supported his widowed mother and his sister by his earnings. He rescued Sheva, the Jew, from a howling London mob, and was left the heir of the old man's property.

Miss [Eliza] Ratcliffe, sister of Charles, clandestinely married to Charles Bertram, and given £10,000 by the Jew to reconcile sir Stephen Bertram to the alliance. She was handsome, virtuous, and elegant, mild, modest, and gentle.—Cumberland: The Jew (1776).

Rath'mor, chief of Clutha (the Clyde), and father of Calthon and Colmar. Dunthalmo lord of Teutha "came in his pride against him," and was overcome, whereupon his anger rose, and he went by night with his warriors, and slew Rathmor in his own halls, where his feasts had so often been spread for strangers.—Ossian: Calthon and Colmal.

Rattlin (Jack), a famous naval character in Smollett's Roderick Random. Tom Bowling is in the same novel (1749).

Rattlin the Reefer, published in the works of captain Marryat, was by Edward Howard.

On the 29th September, at Sydney, New South Wales, captain Frederick Howard, R.N., youngest son of the late Edward Howard, author of Rattlin the Reefer.—Times, November 10, 1852.

Rattray (Sir Runnion), of Runnagullion; the duelling friend of sir Mungo Malagrowther.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Raucocan'ti, the buffo of a troupe of singers going to act in Sicily. The whole were captured by Lambro the pirate, and sold in Turkey for slaves.

'Twould not become myself to dwell upon
My own merits, and, tho' young, I see, sir, you [Don Juan]
Have got a travelled air, which speaks you one
To whom the opera is by no means new.
You've heard of Raucocanti? I'm that man . . .
You was [sic] not last year at the fair of Lugo,
But next, when I'm engaged to sing there,—do go.
Byron: Don Juan, iv. 88 (1820).

RAVEN, emblem of Denmark, and standard of the Danes. Necromantic powers are ascribed to it. Asser says, in his Life of Alfred, If the Danes were destined to gain a victory, "a live crow would appear flying on the middle of the unfurled flag; but if they were doomed to be defeated, the flag would hang down motionless;" and this, he continues, "was often proved to be so."

 The raven banner was called Landeyda ("the desolation of the country"), and its device was woven by the daughters of Regner Lodbrok.

. . . we have shattered back
The hugest wave from Norseland ever yet
Surged on us, and our battle-axes broken
The Raven's wing, and dumbed the carrion croak
From the gray sea for ever.
Tennyson: Harold, iv. 3 (1875).

Raven (The), a poem by Poe (1831).

Raven (Barnaby's), Grip, a large bird, of most impish disposition. Its usual phrases were: "I'm a devil!" "Never say die!" "Polly, put the kettle on!" He also uttered a cluck like cork-drawing, a barking like a dog, and a crowing like a cock. Barnaby Rudge used to carry it about in a basket at his back. The bird drooped while it was in jail with his master, but after Barnaby's reprieve

It soon recovered its good looks, and became as glossy and sleek as ever . . . but for a whole year it never indulged in any other sound than a grave and decorous croak. . . . One bright summer morning . . . the bird advanced with fantastic steps to the door of the Maypole, and then cried, "I'm a devil!" three or four times with extraordinary rapture, . . . and from that time constantly practised and improved himself in the vulgar tongue.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge, ii. (1841).

Raven (Noah's). It is said that Noah, at the end of forty days, "sent forth a raven, which went to and fro [the ark] till the waters [of the Flood] were dried up from the earth" (Gen. viii. 7). It is usually said that the raven fed on the dead bodies, and thus supplied itself with daily food. But before the mariner's compass was invented, the sea-kings and others employed ravens to ascertain if land was in sight. If not, the raven returned to the ship, but if it saw land it did not return.

Floco, leaving Hietlandia, took certayn ravens unto him, and when he thought he had sayled a great way, he sent forth one raven, which, flying aloft, went back again to Hietlandia. . . . Whereupon Floco perceived he was nearer to Hietlandia than to any other countaye, and therefore courageously going forward, he sent forth another raven, which, because it could see no land . . . lit upon the ship again. Lastly, he sent forth a third raven . . . which through the sharpness of her sight, having discerned land, flew thither, and Floco, following, beheld the eastern side of the island.—Arngrim Jonas ("Floco's Journey from Shetland to Iceland").

Ravens of Owain (The). Owain had in his army 300 ravens, who were irresistible. It is thought that these ravens were warriors who bore this device on their shields.

A man who caused the birds to fly upon the host,
Like the ravens of Owain eager for prey.
Bleddyn Vardd: Myvyrian Archaiology, i. 365.

Ravens once White. One day, a raven told Apollo that Coro'nis, a Thessalian nymph whom he passionately loved, was faithless. Apollo, in his rage, shot the nymph, but hated the raven, and "bade him prate in white plumes never more."—Ovid: Metamorphoses, ii.

Ravenspurn, at the mouth of the Humber, where Henry IV. landed, in 1399, to depose Richard II. It no longer exists, having been wholly engulfed by the sea, but no record exists of the date of this catastrophe.

Ra'venstone or Ra'benstein, the stone gibbet of Germany. So called from the ravens which perch on it.

Do you think
I'll honour you so much as save your throat
From the ravenstone, by choking you myself?
Byron: Werner, ii. 2 (1822).

Ravenswood (Allan lord of), a decayed Scotch nobleman of the royalist party.

Master Edgar Ravenswood, the son of Allan. In love with Lucy Ashton, daughter of sir William Ashton lord-keeper of Scotland. The lovers plight their troth at the "Mermaid's Fountain," but Lucy is compelled to marry Frank Hayston laird of Bucklaw. The bride, in a fit of insanity, attempts to murder the bridegroom, and dies in convulsions. Bucklaw recovers, and goes abroad. Colonel Ashton appoints a hostile meeting with Edgar; but young Ravenswood, on his way to the place appointed, is lost in the quicksands of Kelpies Flow, in accordance with an ancient prophecy.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

(In Donizetti's opera of Lucia di Lammermoor, Bucklaw dies of the wound inflicted by the bride, and Edgar, heart-broken, comes on the stage and kills himself.)

The catastrophe in the Bride of Lammermoor, where [Edgar] Ravenswood is swallowed up by a quicksand, is singularly grand in romance, but would be inadmissible in a drama.—Encyc. Brit. (article "Romance").

Rawhead and Bloody-Bones, two bogies or bugbears, generally coupled together. In some cases the phrase is employed to designate one and the same "shadowy sprite."

Servants awe children . . . by telling them of Rawhead and Bloody-bones.—Locke.

Rayland (Mrs.), the domineering lady of the Old Manor-House, by Charlotte Smith (1749–1806).

Mrs. Rayland is a sort of queen Elizabeth in private life.—Sir W. Scott.

Raymond, count of Toulouse, the Nestor of the crusaders. He slays Aladine king of Jerusalem, and plants the Christian standard on the tower of David.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, xx. (1516).

(Introduced by sir W. Scott in Count Robert of Paris, a novel of the period of Rufus.)

Raymond (Sir Charles), a country gentleman, the friend and neighbour of sir Robert Belmont.

Colonel Raymond, son of sir Charles, in love with Rosetta Belmont. Being diffident and modest, Rosetta delights in tormenting him, and he is jealous even of William Faddle "a fellow made up of knavery, noise, and impudence."

Harriet Raymond, daughter of sir Charles, whose mother died in giving her birth. She was committed to the care of a governante, who changed her name to Fidelia, wrote to sir Charles to say that she was dead, and sold her at the age of 12 to a villain named Villard. Charles Belmont, hearing her cries of distress, rescued her and took her home. The governante at death confessed the truth, and Charles Belmont married her.—Edw. Moore: The Foundling (1748).

Ras'eka, the giver of food, one of the four gods of the Adites (2 syl.).

We called on Raseka for food.
Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, i. 24 (1797).

Razor, a barber who could "think of nothing but poor old England." He was the friend and neighbour of Quidnunc the upholsterer, who was equally crazy about the political state of the nation, and the affairs of Europe in general.—Murphy: The Upholsterer (1758).

Razor (To cut blocks with a), i.e. to crush a fly on a wheel. Oliver Goldsmith said of Edward Burke, the statesman—

Too deep for his hearers, he went on refining,
And thought of convincing, while they thought of dining;
Tho' equal to all things, to all things unfit:
Too nice for a statesman, too proud for a wit;
For a patriot too cool; for a drudge disobedient;
And too fond of the right to pursue the expedient.
In short, 'twas his fate, unemployed or in place, sir,
To eat mutton cold, and cut blocks with a razor.
Retaliation (1774).

The National Razor. The guillotine was so called in the first French Revolution.

Read (Sir William), a tailor, who set up for oculist, and was knighted by queen Anne. This quack was employed both by queen Anne and George I. Sir William could not read. He professed to cure wens, wry-necks, and hare-lips (died 1715).

None shall their rise to merit owe—
That popish doctrine is exploded quite,
Or Ralph had been no duke, and Read no knight.
A Political Squib of the Period.

 The "Ralph" referred to is Ralph Montagu, created viscount in 1682, and duke of Montagu in 1705 (died 1709).

Ready-to-Halt, a pilgrim who journeyed to the Celestial City on crutches. He joined Mr. Greatheart's party, and was carried to heaven in a chariot of fire.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, ii. (1684).

Real Life in London, or "The Rambles and Adventures of Rob Tallyho, Esq., and his cousin, the honourable Tom Dashall, through the Metropolis," by Pierce Egan (1821–22). (See LIFE IN LONDON (1824), p. 612.)

Reason (The goddess of), in the French Revolution, some say, was the wife of Momoro the printer; Lamartine says it was Mlle. Malliard, an actress; Michelet says it was Mlle. Aubray. Probably the foolery was repeated by different parties at different times—apparently thrice at least.

Chaumette, assisted by Lais, an actor of the Opera, had arranged the fête of December 20, 1793. Mlle. Maillard, an actress, brilliant with youth and talent, played the part of the goddess. She was borne in a palanquin, the canopy of which was formed of oak branches. Women in white, with tri-coloured sashes, preceded her. Attired with theatrical buskins, a Phrygian cap, and a blue chlamys over a transparent tunic, she was taken to the foot of the altar, and seated there. Behind her burnt an immense torch, symbolizing "the flame of philosophy," the true light of the world. Chaumette, taking a censer in his hands, fell on his knees to the goddess, and offered incense, and the whole concluded with dancing and song.—M. de Lamartine.

Reason (The Age of), by Thomas Paine (1792-96).

(It was answered by Watson, bishop of Llandaff, in 1796.)

Reasonableness of Christianity (The), by John Locke (1695).

Rebecca, leader of the Rebeccaites, a band of Welsh rioters, who in 1843 made a raid upon toll-gates. The captain and his guard disguised themselves in female attire.

 This name arose from a gross perversion of a text in Scripture, "And they blessed Rebekah, and said unto her, . . . let thy seed possess the gate of those which hate them" (Gen. xxiv. 60).

Rebecca, daughter of Isaac the Jew; meek, modest, and high-minded. She loves Ivanhoe, who has shown great kindness to her and to her father; and when Ivanhoe marries Rowena, both Rebecca and her father leave England for a foreign land.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Rebecca (Mistress), the favourite waiting-maid of Mrs. Margaret Bertram of Singleside.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Rebecca and Rowena, "a romance upon a romance," i.e. a satirical romance on Scott's romance of Ivanhoe; by Thackeray (1850).

Rebellion and Civil Wars in England (History of the), by Edward Hyde, earl of Clarendon (1702).

(Bishop Sprat and dean Aldrich added a continuation in 1826.)

Record, noted for his superlatives, "most presumptuous," "most audacious," "most impatient," as—

Oh, you will, most audacious. . . . Look at him, most inquisitive. . . . Under lock and key, most noble. . . . I will, most dignified.—S. Birch: The Adopted Child.

Recruiting Officer (The), a comedy by G. Farquhar (1705). The "recruiting officer" is sergeant Kite, his superior officer is captain Plume, and the recruit is Sylvia, who assumes the military dress of her brother and the name of Jack Wilful, alias Pinch. Her father, justice Balance, allows the name to pass the muster, and when the trick is discovered, to prevent scandal, the justice gives her in marriage to the captain.

Red Book of Hergest (The), a collection of children's tales in Welsh; so called from the name of the place where it was discovered. Each tale is called in Welsh a mabinogi, and the entire collection is the Mabinogion (from mab, "a child"). The tales relate chiefly to Arthur and the early British kings. A translation in three vols., with notes, was published by lady Charlotte Guest (1838-49).

Red-Cap (Mother), an old nurse at the Hungerford Stairs.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Red-Cap (Mother). Madame Buffion was so called, because her bonnet was deeply coloured with her own blood in a street fight at the outbreak of the French Revolution.—Melville.

Red-Cotton Night-Cap Country, or "Turf and Towers;" a poem by R. Browning (1873). A real-life drama enacted partly in Paris, partly in Normandy. The story is as follows: Léonce Miranda was son and heir to a wealthy Spanish jeweller in the Place Vendôme. He fell in love with an adventuress, Clara Mulhausen, retired with her from Paris, and took up his abode at Clairvaux in an old priory. His mother died from grief at her son's wrong-doing, and Miranda at first tried to abjure Clara; but, his love being too strong, he lived with her again. At last, tired of life, he threw himself from the top of his Belvedere and was killed. The title of the book arose as follows: The volume is dedicated to Miss Thackeray. She and Browning met at St. Aubyn, and she called the place, for a joke, "White-Cotton Night-Cap Country," from its sleepy appearance and the white cap universally worn. Mr. Browning called his story, Red-Cotton, etc., from the tragedy of Clairvaux.

land. His adventures, which occupy bk. i. of Spenser's Faërie Queene, symbolize the struggles and ultimate victory of holiness over sin (or protestantism over popery). Una comes on a white ass to the court of Gloriana, and craves that one of the knights would undertake to slay the dragon which kept her father and mother prisoners. The Red Cross Knight, arrayed in all the armour of God (Eph. vi. 11-17), undertakes the adventure, and goes, accompanied for a time with Una; but, deluded by Archimago, he quits the lady, and the two meet with numerous adventures. At last, the knight, having slain the dragon, marries Una; and thus holiness is allied to truth (1590).

Red Flag (A) signified war in the Roman empire; and when displayed on the capitol it was a call for assembling the military for active service.

Red Hair. Judas was represented in ancient paintings with red hair and red beard.

> His very hair is of the dissembling colour,
> Something browner than Judas's.
> Shakespeare: As You Like It, act iv. sc. 4 (1600).

Red Hand of Ulster.
Calverley of Calverley, Yorkshire. Walter Calverley, Esq., in 1605, murdered two of his children, and attempted to murder his wife and a child "at nurse." This became the subject of The Yorkshire Tragedy. In consequence of these murders, the family is required to wear "the bloody hand."

¶ The Holt family, of Lancashire, has a similar tradition connected with their coat armour.

Red Horse (Vale of the), in Warwickshire; so called from a horse cut in a hill of reddish soil, "a witness of that day we won upon the Danes."

> White horse is . . . exalted to the skies;
> But Red horse of you all contemnèd only lies.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Red Knight (The), sir Perimo'nes, one of the four brothers who kept the passages leading to Castle Perilous. In the allegory of Gareth, this knight represents noon, and was the third brother. Night, the eldest born, was slain by sir Gareth; the Green Knight, which represents the young day-spring, was overcome, but not slain; and the Red Knight, being overcome, was spared also. The reason is this: darkness is slain, but dawn is only overcome by the stronger light of noon, and noon decays into the evening twilight. Tennyson, in his Gareth and Lynette, calls sir Perimonès "Meridies" or "Noonday Sun." The Latin name is not consistent with a British tale.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 129 (1470); Tennyson: Idylls.

Red Knight of the Red Lands (The), sir Ironside. "He had the strength of seven men, and every day his strength went on increasing till noon." This knight kept the lady Lionès captive in Castle Perilous. In the allegory of sir Gareth, sir Ironside represents death, and the captive lady "the Bride" or Church triumphant. Sir Gareth combats with Night, Morn, Noon, and Evening, or fights the fight of faith, and then overcomes the last enemy, which is death, when he marries the lady or is received into the Church which is "the Lamb's Bride." Tennyson, in his Gareth and Lynette, makes the combat with the Red Knight ("Mors" or "Death") to be a single stroke; but the History says that it endured from morn to noon, and from noon to night—in fact, that man's whole life is a contest with moral and physical death.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 134-137 (1470); Tennyson: Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette").

Red Land (The). Westphalia was so called by the members of the Vehmgericht.

> Originally, none but an inhabitant of the Red Land . . . could be admitted a member of the Wissende [or secret tribunal].—Chambers: Encyclopædia, iv. 182.

Red-Lattice Phrases, ale-house talk. Red lattices or chequers were ordinary ale-house signs.—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, act ii. sc. 4 (1596).

> The chequers were the arms of Fitzwarren, the head of which house, in the days of the Henrys, was invested with the power of licensing the establishments of vintners and publicans. Houses licensed notified the same by displaying the Fitzwarren arms.—Times, April 29, 1869.

Red Pipe. The Great Spirit long ago called the Indians together, and, standing on the red pipe-stone rock, broke off a piece, which he made into a pipe, and smoked, letting the smoke exhale to the four quarters. He then told the Indians that the red pipe-stone was their flesh, and they must use the red pipe when they made peace; and that when they smoked it the war-club and scalping-knife must not be touched. Having so spoken, the Great Spirit was received up into the clouds.—American-Indian Mythology.

The red pipe has blown its fumes of peace and war to the remotest corners of the continent. It visited every warrior, and passed through its reddened stem the irrevocable oath of war and desolation. Here, too, the peace-breathing calumet was born, and fringed with eagle's quills, which had shed its thrilling fumes over the land, and soothed the fury of the relentless savage.—Catlin: Letters on . . . the North Americans, ii. 160.

Red Riding-Hood (Little), a child with a red cloak, who goes to carry cakes to her grandmother. A wolf placed itself in the grandmother's bed, and when the child remarked upon the size of its eyes, ears, and nose, replied it was the better to see, hear, and smell the little grandchild. "But, grandmamma," said the child, "what a great mouth you have got!" "The better to eat you up," was the reply, and the child was devoured by the wolf.

(This nursery tale is, with slight variations, common to Sweden, Germany, and France. In Charles Perrault's Contes des Fées (1697) it is called "Le Petit Chaperon Rouge.")

Red Sea (The). So called by the Greeks and Romans. Perhaps because it was the sea of Edom ("the red man"); perhaps because the shore is a red sand; perhaps because the waters are reddened by red sea-weeds or a red bottom. The Hebrews called it "The Weedy Sea" (Yam-Suph).

The Rede Sea is not more rede than any other sea, but in some places thereof is the gravelle rede, and therefore men clepen it the Rede Sea.—Mandeville: Travels (1499).

Red Swan (The). Odjibwa, hearing a strange noise, saw in the lake a most beautiful red swan. Pulling his bow, he took deliberate aim, without effect. He shot every arrow from his quiver with the same result; then, fetching from his father's medicine-sack three poisoned arrows, he shot them also at the bird. The last of the three arrows passed through the swan's neck, whereupon the bird rose into the air, and sailed away towards the setting sun.—Schoolcraft: Algic Researches, ii. 9 (1839).

Redgauntlet, a story, told in a series of letters, about a conspiracy formed by sir Edward Hugh Redgauntlet, on behalf of the "Young Pretender" Charles Edward, then above 40 years of age. The conspirators insist that the prince should dismiss his mistress, Miss Walkingshaw; and, as he refuses to comply with this demand, they abandon their enterprise. Just as a brig is prepared for the prince's departure from the island, colonel Campbell arrives with the military. He connives, however, at the affair, the conspirators disperse, the prince embarks, and Redgauntlet becomes the prior of a monastery abroad. This is one of the inferior novels, but is redeemed by the character of Peter Peebles.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (1824).

Redgauntlet embodies a great deal of Scott's own personal history and experience.—Chambers: English Literature, ii. 589.

Sir Alberick Redgauntlet, an ancestor of the family.

Sir Edward Redgauntlet, son of sir Alberick; killed by his father's horse.

Sir Robert Redgauntlet, an old tory, mentioned in Wandering Willie's tale.

Sir John Redgauntlet, son and successor of sir Robert, mentioned in Wandering Willie's tale.

Sir Redwald Redgauntlet, son of sir John.

Sir Henry Darsie Redgauntlet, son of sir Redwald.

Lady Henry Darsie Redgauntlet, wife of sir Henry Darsie.

Sir Arthur Darne Redgauntlet, alias Darsie Latimer, son of sir Henry and lady Darsie.

Miss Lilias Redgauntlet, alias Greenmantle, sister of sir Arthur. She marries Allan Fairford.

Sir Edward Hugh Redgauntlet, the Jacobite conspirator. He is uncle to Darsie Latimer, and is called "Laird of the Lochs," alias "Mr. Herries of Birrenswark," alias "Master Ingoldsby."—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Redi (Francis), an Italian physician and lyric poet. He was first physician to the grand-duke of Tuscany (1626-1698).

Even Redi, tho he chanted
Bacchus in the Tuscan valleys,
Never drank the wine he vaunted
In his dithyrambic sallies.
Longfellow: Drinking Song.

Redlaw (Mr.), the "haunted man." He is a professor of chemistry, who bargained with the spirit which haunted him to leave him, on condition of his imparting to others his own idiosyncrasies. From this moment the chemist carried with him the infection of sullenness. On Christmas Day the infection ceased, Redlaw lost his morbid feelings, and all who suffered by his infection, being healed, were restored to love, mirth, benevolence, and gratitude.—Dickens: The Haunted Man (1848).

Redmain (Sir Magnus), governor of the town of Berwick (fifteenth century).

He was remarkable for his long red beard, and was therefore called by the English "Magnus Red-beard," but by the Scotch, in derision, "Magnus Red-mane," as if his beard had been a horse-mane.—Godscroft, 178.

Redmond O'Neale, Rokeby's page, beloved by Rokeby's daughter Matilda, whom he marries. He turns out to be Mortham's son and heir.—Sir W. Scott: Rokeby (1812).

Reece (Captain), R.N., of the Mantelpiece; adored by all his crew. They had feather-beds, warm slippers, hot-water cans, brown Windsor soap, and a valet to every four, for captain Reece said, "It is my duty to make my men happy, and I will." Captain Reece had a daughter, ten female cousins, a niece, and a ma, six sisters, and an aunt or two, and, at the suggestion of William Lee the coxswain, married these ladies to his crew—"It is my duty to make my men happy, and I will." Last of all, captain Reece married the widowed mother of his coxswain, and they were all married on one day—"It was their duty, and they did it."—Gilbert: The Bab Ballads ("Captain Reece, R.N.").

Reeve's Tale (The). Symond Symkyn, a miller of Trompington, near Cambridge, used to serve "Soler Hall College," but was an arrant thief. Two scholars, Aleyn and John, undertook to see that a sack of corn sent to be ground was not tampered with; so one stood by the hopper, and one by the trough which received the flour. In the mean time, the miller let their horse loose, and, when the young men went to fetch it, purloined half a bushel of the flour, substituting meal instead. It was so late before the horse could be caught, that the miller offered the two scholars a "shakedown" in his own chamber, but when they were in bed he began to belabour them unmercifully. A scuffle ensued, in which the miller, being tripped up, fell upon his wife. His wife, roused from her sleep, seized a stick, and mistaking the bald pate of her husband for the night-cap of one of the young men, banged it so lustily that the man was almost stunned with the blows. In the mean time, the two scholars made off without payment, taking with them the sack and also the half bushel of flour which had been made into cakes.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (1388).

¶ Boccaccio has a similar story in his Decameron. It is also the subject of a fabliau entitled De Gombert et des Deux Clers. Chaucer borrowed his story from a fabliau given by Thomas Wright in his Anecdota Literaria, 15.

Reformado Captain, an officer shelved or degraded because his troops have been greatly reduced.

Reformation (The). It was noticed in the early Lollards, and was radiant in the works of Wycliffe.

It was present in the pulpit of Pierre de Bruys, in the pages of Arnoldo da Brescia, in the cell of Roger Bacon.

It was active in the field with Peter Revel, in the castle of lord Cobham, in the pulpit with John Huss, in the camp with John Ziska, in the class-room of Pico di Mirandola, in the observatory of Abraham Zacuto, and the college of Antonio di Lebrija, before father Martin was born.

Reg'an, second daughter of king Lear, and wife of the duke of Cornwall. Having received the half of her father's kingdom under profession of unbounded love, she refused to entertain him with his suite. On the death of her husband, she designed to marry Edmund natural son of the earl of Gloster, and was poisoned by her elder sister Goneril out of jealousy. Regan, like Goneril, is proverbial for "filial ingratitude."—Shakespeare: King Lear (1605).

Regent Diamond (The). So called from the regent duke of Orleans. This diamond, the property of France, at first set in the crown, and then in the sword of state, was purchased in India by a governor of Madras, of whom the regent bought it for £80,000.

Regillus (The Battle of the Lake). Regillus Lacus is about twenty miles east of Rome, between Gabii (north) and Lavicum (south). The Romans had expelled Tarquin the Proud from the throne, because of the most scandalous conduct of his son Sextus, who had violated Lucretia, and abused her hospitality. Thirty combined cities of Latium, with Sabines and Volscians, took the part of Tarquin, and marched towards Rome. The Romans met the allied army at the lake Regillus, and here, on July 15, B.C. 499, they won the great battle which confirmed their republican constitution, and in which Tarquin, with his sons Sextus and Titus, was slain. While victory was still doubtful, Castor and Pollux, on their white horses, appeared to the Roman dictator, and fought for the Romans. The victory was complete, and ever after the Romans observed the anniversary of this battle with a grand procession and sacrifice. The procession started from the temple of Mars outside the city walls, entered by the Porta Capēna, traversed the chief streets of Rome, marched past the temple of Vesta in the forum, and then to the opposite side of the great "square," where they had built a temple to Castor and Pollux in gratitude for the aid rendered by them in this battle. Here offerings were made, and sacrifice was offered to the Great Twin-Brothers, the sons of Leda. Macaulay has a lay called The Battle of the Lake Regillus.

Where, by the lake Regillus,
Under the Porcian height,
All in the land of Tusculum,
Was fought the glorious fight.
Macaulay: Lays of Ancient Rome (1848).

¶ A very parallel case occurs in the life of Mahomet. The Koreishites had armed to put down "the prophet;" but Mahomet met them in arms, and on January 13, 624, won the famous battle of Bedr. In the Kordn (ch. iii.), he tells us that the angel Gabriel, on his horse Haïzûm, appeared on the field with 3000 "angels," and won the battle for him.

¶ In the conquest of Mexico, we are told that St. James appeared on his grey horse at the head of the Castilian adventurers, and led them on to victory. Bernal Diaz, who was in the battle, saw the grey horse, but fancies the rider was Francesco de Morla, though, he confesses, "it might be the glorious apostle St. James" for aught he knew.

Regimen of the School of Salerno, a collection of precepts in Latin verse, written by John of Milan, a poet of the eleventh century, for Robert duke of Normandy.

A volume universally known
As the "Regimen of the School of Salern."
Longfellow: The Golden Legend (1851).

Region of Death [Marovsthulli], Thurr, near Delhi, fatal, from some atmospheric influence, especially about sunset.

Regno (The), Naples.

Are our wiser heads leaning towards an alliance with the pope and the Regno?—George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross).

Reg'ulus, a Roman general who conquered the Carthaginians (B.C. 256), and compelled them to sue for peace. While negotiations were going on, the Carthaginians, joined by Xanthippos the Lacedemonian, attacked the Romans at Tunis, and beat them, taking Regulus prisoner. In 250 the captive was sent to Rome to make terms of peace and demand exchange of prisoners; but he used all his influence with the senate to dissuade them from coming to terms with their foe. On his return to captivity, the Carthaginians cut off his eyelashes and exposed him to the burning sun, then placed him in a barrel armed with nails, which was rolled up and down a hill till the man was dead.

(This subject has furnished Pradon and Dorat with tragedies (French), and Metastasio the Italian poet with an opera called Regolo (1740). "Regulus" was a favourite part of the French actor François J. Talma.)

Rehearsal (The), a farce by George Villiers duke of Buckingham (1671). It was designed for a satire on the rhyming plays of the time. The chief character, Bayes (1 syl.), is meant for Dryden.

The name of George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, demands cordial mention by every writer on the stage. He lived in an age when plays were chiefly written in rhyme, which served as a vehicle for foaming sentiment clouded by hyperbolé. . . . The dramas of Lee and Settle . . . are made up of blatant couplets that emptily thundered through five long acts. To explode an unnatural custom by ridiculing it, was Buckingham's design in The Rehearsal, but in doing this the gratification of private dislike was a greater stimulus than the wish to promote the public good.—W. C. Russell: Representative Actors.

Reichel (Colonel), in Charles XII., by J. R. Planché (1826).

Reign of Terror (The), a term applied to a period of anarchy, bloodshed, and confiscation in the French Revolution. It began after the fall of the Girondists (May 31, 1793), and extended to the overthrow of Robespierre and his accomplices (July 27, 1794). During this short time thousands of persons were put to death.

Rejected Addresses, parodies on Wordsworth, Cobbett, Southey, Scott, Coleridge, Crabbe, Byron, Theodore Hook, etc., by James and Horace Smith; the copyright after the sixteenth edition was purchased by John Murray, in 1819, for £131. The directors of Drury Lane Theatre had offered a premium for the best poetical address to be spoken at the opening of the new building, and the brothers Smith conceived the idea of publishing a number of poems supposed to have been written for the occasion and rejected by the directors (1812).

"I do not see why they should have been rejected," said a Leicestershire clergyman, "for I think some of them are very good."—James Smith.

Rejuvenescence. (See YOUTH RESTORERS.)

Rekah, sir Rustam's horse.

Relapse (The), a comedy by Vanbrugh (1697). Reduced to three acts, and adapted to more modern times by Sheridan, under the title of A Trip to Scarborough (1777).

Rel'dresal, principal secretary for private affairs in the court of Lilliput, and great friend of Gulliver. When it was proposed to put the Man-mountain to death for high treason, Reldresal moved, as an amendment, that the "traitor should have both his eyes put out, and be suffered to live that he might serve the nation."—Swift: Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Lilliput," 1726).

 Probably the dean had the Bible story of Samson and the Philistines in his thoughts.

Relics (Sacred). The most famous are the following:—

(1) COAL. One of the coals that roasted St. Lawrence.
(2) FACE. The face of a seraph, with only part of the nose. (See below, "Snout.")
(3) FINGER. A finger of St. Andrew; one of John the Baptist; one of the Holy Ghost; and the thumb of St. Thomas.
(4) HANDKERCHIEFS (Two), with impressions of the face of Christ: one sent by our Lord Himself, as a present to Agbarus prince of Edessa; and the other given to St. Veronica, as the "Man of sorrows" was on His way to execution. The woman had lent it to Jesus to wipe His brow with, and when He returned it an impression of His face was photographed thereon.
(5) HEAD. Two heads of John the Baptist.
(6) HEM. The hem of our Lord's garment which the woman with the issue of blood touched; and the hem of Joseph's garment.
(7) LOCK OF HAIR. A lock of the hair with which Mary Magdalene wiped the Saviour's feet.
(8) NAIL. One of the nails used in the Crucifixion, set in the "iron crown of Lombardy."
(9) PHIAL OF SWEAT. A phial of the sweat of St. Michael, when he contended with Satan.
(10) RAYS OF A STAR. Some of the rays of the guiding star which appeared to the Wise Men of the East.
(11) RIB. A rib of the "Verbum caro factum," or the Word made flesh.
(12) ROD. Moses' rod.
(13) SEAMLESS COAT. The seamless coat of our Lord, for which lots were cast at the Crucifixion.
(14) SLIPPERS. A pair of slippers worn by Enoch before the Flood.
(15) SNOUT. The "snout" of a seraph, supposed to have belonged to the face (see above).
(16) SPOON. The pap-dish and spoon used by the Virgin Mary for the child Jesus.
(17) SWORD AND SHIELD. The short sword of St. Michael, and his square buckler lined with red velvet.
(18) TEAR. The tear shed by Jesus over the grave of Lazarus. It was given by an angel to Mary Magdalene.
(19) TOOTH. A tooth of our Lord Himself.
(20) WATER-POT. One of the water-pots used at the marriage at Cana, in Galilee.

This list is taken from Brady's Clavis Calendaria, 240 (1839).

It appears by the confessions of the Inquisition that instances of failure have occurred; but the sacred relics have always recovered their virtue (as Gaibert, a monk of Marchiennes informs us) "after they have been flogged with rods."—Brady, 241.

¶ In the Hotel de Cluny, Paris, I was shown a ring which I was assured contained part of one of the thorns of the "crown of thorns."

Religio Laici, a poem by Dryden. He says that at one time the clergy traded on the ignorance of the people, but that now the Bible is well known and well abused (1682).

So, all we make of Heaven's discovered will
Is not to have it, or to use it ill.

(In this poem Dryden stood fast to the Church of England. In the Hind and the Panther (1687), the Hind—

Without unspotted, innocent within,
[Which] feared no danger, for she knew no sin—

is the Church of Rome. Sir Thomas Brown wrote a prose treatise called Religio Medici, in defence of the Reformed Religion.)

Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, consisting of ballads, songs, etc., of our early poets, by Thomas Percy (1765). A capital book.

Reloxa, the clock town. (From the Spanish relox, "a clock.")

It would be an excellent joke, indeed, if the natives of Reloxa were to slay every one who only asked them what o'clock it was.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. ii. 8 (1615).

Remember Thou art Mortal! When a Roman conqueror entered the city in triumph, a slave was placed in the chariot to whisper from time to time into the ear of the conqueror, "Remember thou art a man!"

¶ Vespasian, the Roman emperor, had a slave who said to him daily, as he left his chamber, "Remember thou art a man!"

¶ In the ancient Egyptian banquets it was customary during the feast to draw a mummy in a car round the banquet-hall, while one uttered aloud, "To this estate you must come at last!"

¶ When the sultan of Serendib (i.e. Ceylon) went abroad, his vizier cried aloud, "This is the great monarch, the tremendous sultan of the Indies . . . greater than Solima or the grand Mihrage!". An officer behind the monarch then exclaimed, "This monarch, though so great and powerful, must die, must die, must die!"—Arabian Nights ("Sinbad," sixth voyage).

Remois (2 syl.), the people of Rheims, in France.

Remond, a shepherd in Britannia's Pastorals, by William Browne (1613).

> Remond, young Remond, that full well could sing,
> And tune his pipe at Pan's birth carolling;
> Who, for his nimble leaping, sweetest layes,
> A laurell garland wore on holidayes;
> In framing of whose hand dame Nature swore,
> There never was his like, nor should be more.
> Pastoral, I.

Rem'ora, a little fish, which fastens itself on the keel of a ship, and impedes its progress.

> The shippe is as insensible of the living as of the dead; as the living make it not goe the faster, so the dead make it not goe the slower, for the dead are no Rhemoras [sic] to alter the course of her passage.—Helps to Memory, etc., 56 (1630).

> A goodly ship with banners bravely dight,
> And flag on her top-gallant I espied. . . .
> All suddenly there clove unto her keel
> A little fish that men call Remora,
> Which stopped her course and held her by the heel,
> That wind nor tide could move her thence away.
> Spenser: Sonnets (1591).

Rem'ores, birds which retard the execution of a project.

> "Remores" aves in auspicio dicuntur quæ acturum aliquid remorari compellunt.—Festus: De Verborum Significatione.

Re'naud, one of the paladins of Charlemagne, always described with the properties of a borderer, valiant, alert, ingenious, rapacious, and unscrupulous. Better known in the Italian form Rinaldo (q.v.).

Renault, a Frenchman, and one of the chief conspirators in which Pierre was concerned. When Jaffier joined the conspiracy, he gave his wife Belvide'ra a surety of his fidelity, and a dagger to be used against him if he proved unfaithful. Renault attempted the honour of the lady, and Jaffier took her back in order to protect her from such insults. The old villain died on the wheel, and no one pitied him.—Otway: Venice Preserved (1682).

René, the old king of Provence, father of queen Margaret of Anjou (wife of Henry VI. of England). He was fond of the chase and tilt, poetry and music. Thiebault says he gave in largesses to knights-errant and minstrels more than he received in revenue (ch. xxix.).—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

René (2 syl.), the hero and title of a romance by Châteaubriand (1801). It was designed for an episode to his Génie du Christianisme (1802). René is a man of social inaction, conscious of possessing a superior genius; but his pride produces in him a morbid bitterness of spirit.

René [LEBLANC], notary public of Grand Pré, in Acadia (Nova Scotia). Bent with age, but with long yellow hair flowing over his shoulders. He was the father of twenty children, and had a hundred grandchildren. When Acadia was ceded by the French to England, George II. confiscated the goods of the simple colonists, and drove them into exile. René went to Pennsylvania, where he died and was buried.—Longfellow: Evangeline (1849).

Rentowel (Mr. Jabesh), a covenanting preacher.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

> With the vehemence of some pulpit-drumming Gowkthrapple [Waverley] or "precious" Mr. Jabesh Rentowel.—Carlyle.

Renzo and Lucia, the hero and heroine of an Italian novel by Alessando Manzoni, entitled The Betrothed Lover ("Promessi Sposi"). This novel contains an account of the Bread Riot and plague of Milan. Cardinal Borro'meo is, of course, introduced. There is an English translation (1827).

Representative Men, in a series of lectures by R. W. Emerson (1849); e.g.—

Plato (of a philosopher).
Swedenborg (of a mystic).
Montaigne (of a sceptic).
Shakespeare (of a poet).
Napoleon (of a man of the world).
Goethe (of a writer).

Republican Queen (The), Sophie Charlotte, wife of Frederick I. of Prussia.

Resolute (The), John Florio, philologist. He was the tutor of prince Henry (1545–1625).
(This "Florio" was the prototype of Shakespeare's "Holofernes.")

Resolute Doctor (The), John Baconthorp (*–1346).
∴ Guillaume Durandus de St. Pourçain was called "The Most Resolute Doctor" (1267–1332).

Restless (Sir John), the suspicious husband of a suspicious wife. Both are made wretched by their imaginings of the other's infidelity, but neither has the slightest ground for such suspicion.
Lady Restless, wife of sir John. As she has a fixed idea that her husband is inconstant, she is always asking the servants, "Where is sir John?" "Is sir John returned?" "Which way did sir John go?" "Has sir John received any letters?" "Who has called?" etc.; and, whatever the answer, it is to her a confirmation of her surmises.—Murphy: All in the Wrong (1761).

Retaliation, a trial of wit, mainly between Garrick and Goldsmith.

Garrick, in 1774, wrote in the form of an epitaph—

Here lies poor Goldsmith, for shortness called Noll,
Who wrote like an angel, but talked like poor Poll.

To this Goldsmith replied, and called Garrick

. . . a salad; for in him we see
Oil, vinegar, sugar, and saltness agree.

(In Goldsmith's retaliating verses, several other persons are introduced, as Burke, Cumberland, Macpherson, Reynolds, and some others.)

Return of the Druses (The), a tragedy by R. Browning (1848). The love of Aneal is divided between adoration for the Hakeem, and her love for Djabal whom she believes to be the incarnate God. (See DRUSES, p. 302.)

Reuben Dixon, a village schoolmaster of "ragged lads."

'Mid noise, and dirt, and stench, and play, and prate,
He calmly cuts the pen or views the slate.
Crabbe: Borough, xxiv. (1810).

Reuben and Seth, servants of Nathan ben Israel, the Jew at Ashby, a friend of Isaac and Rebecca.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Reullu'ra (i.e. "beautiful star"), the wife of Aodh, one of the Culdees or primitive clergy of Scotland, who preached the gospel of God in Io'na, an island south of Staffa. Here Ulvfa'gre the Dane landed, and, having put all who opposed him to death, seized Aodh, bound him in iron, carried him to the church, and demanded where the treasures were concealed. Just then appeared a mysterious figure all in white, who first unbound Aodh, and then, taking the Dane by the arm, led him up to the statue of St. Columb, which immediately fell and crushed him to death. Then turning to the Norsemen, the same mysterious figure told them to "go back, and take the bones of their chief with them;" adding, whoever lifted hand in the island again should be a paralytic for life. The "saint" then transported the remnant of the islanders to Ireland; but when search was made for Reullura, her body was in the sea, and her soul in heaven.—Campbell: Reullura.

Reutha'mir, the principal man of Balclutha a town belonging to the Britons on the river Clyde. His daughter Moina married Clessammor (Fingal's uncle on the mother's side). Reuthamir was killed by Comhal (Fingal's father) when he attacked Balclutha and burned it to the ground.—Ossian: Carthon.

Rev'eller (Lady), cousin of Valeria the blue-stocking. Lady Reveller is very fond of play, but ultimately gives it up, and is united to lord Worthy.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Basset Table (1706).

Revenge (The), the ship under the command of sir Richard Grenville, anchored at Flores, in the Azores, when a fleet of fifty-three Spanish ships hove in sight. (See GRENVILLE, p. 449.)

Revenge (The Palace of), a palace of crystal, provided with everything agreeable to life, except the means of going out of it. (See PHILAX, p. 836.)

Revenge (The), a tragedy by Young (1721). The hero is the Moor Zanga, who, being captured by the Spaniards, is condemned to slavery by don Alonzo, and in revenge excites the don to jealousy which brings about his ruin.

Revenons à nos Moutons, let us return to the matter in hand. The phrase comes from an old French comedy of the fifteenth century, entitled L'Avocat Patelin, by Blanchet. A clothier, giving evidence against a shepherd who had stolen some sheep, is for ever running from the subject to talk about some cloth of which Patelin, his lawyer, had defrauded him. The judge from time to time pulls him up, by saying, "Well, well! and about the sheep?" "What about the sheep?" (See PATELIN, p. 812.)

Revolt of Islam (The), a poem of twelve cantos, in Spenserian metre, by Percy B. Shelley (1817); the object of the story is to kindle the love of political and religious liberty. The hero and heroine are Laon and Cythna; the tyrant is Othman, who is dethroned, but by the aid of foreign mercenaries regains his crown, and commands Laon to be burnt alive. The story says that Cythna was an orphan brought up with Laon, from whom she imbibed republican principles, and vowed to devote her life to the cause. When she was quite young, the tyrant sent some of his guards to bring her to the harem. Laon resisted, and slew several of them, for which he was seized, laden with chains, and cast into prison; but ere long a friend liberated him, and, putting to sea, the boat landed him where Cythna had been taken. Here he heard of the great work which Cythna was effecting, and in due time they met, and lived together till Othman commanded Laon to be seized and burnt to death. Scarcely had he been bound to the stake, when Cythna came on horseback and induced the guards to bind her to the stake likewise; so both were burnt to death and taken to paradise.

Revolutionary Songs. By far the most popular were—

(1) La Marseillaise, both words and music by Rouget de Lisle (1792).

(2) Veillons au Salut de l'Empire, by Adolphe S. Boy (1791). Music by Dalayra. Very strange that men whose whole purpose was to destroy the empire, should go about singing, "Let us guard it!"

(3) Ça Ira, written to the tune of Le Carillon National, in 1789, while preparations were being made for the Fête de la Fédération. It was a great favourite with Marie Antoinette, who was for ever "strumming the tune on her harpsichord."

(4) Chant du Départ, by Marie Joseph de Chénier (1794). Music by Méhul. This was the most popular next to the Marseillaise.

(5) La Carmagnole. "Madame Veto avait promis de faire égorger tout Paris . . ." (1792). Probably so called from Carmagnole, in Piedmont. The burden of this dancing song is—

Dansons la Carmagnole,
Vive le son! Vive le son!
Dansons la Carmagnole,
Vive le son du canon!

(6) Le Vengeur, a cock-and-bull story, in verse, about a ship so called. Lord Howe took six of the French ships, June 1, 1794; but Le Vengeur was sunk by the crew that it might not fall into the hands of the English, and went down while the crew shouted, "Vive la République!" There is as much truth in this story as in David's picture of Napoleon "Crossing the Alps." (See VENGEUR.)

In the second Revolution we have—

(1) La Parisienne, called "The Marseillaise of 1830," by Casimir Delavigne, the same year.

(2) La France a l'Horreur du Servage, by Casimir Delavigne (1843).

(3) La Champ de Bataille, by Emile Debreaux (about 1830).

(The chief political songs of Béranger are: Adieux de Marie Stuart, La Cocarde Blanche, Jacques, La Déesse, Marquis de Carabas, Le Sacre de Charles le Simple, Le Senateur, Le Vieux Caporal, and Le Vilain.)

Rewcastle (Old John), a Jedburgh smuggler, and one of the Jacobite conspirators with the laird of Ellieslaw.—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Reynaldo, a servant to Polonius.—Shakespeare: Hamlet (1596).

Reynard the Fox, the hero of the beast-epic so called. This prose poem is a satire on the state of Germany in the Middle Ages. Reynard represents the Church; Isengrin the wolf (his uncle) typifies the baronial element; and Nodel the lion stands for the regal power. The plot turns on the struggle for supremacy between Reynard and Isengrin. Reynard uses all his endeavours to victimize every one, especially his uncle Isengrin, and generally succeeds.—Reineche Fuchs (thier-epos, 1498), by H. von Alkmaar.

Reynardine (3 syl.), eldest son of Reynard the fox. He assumed the names of Dr. Pedanto and Crabron.—Reynard the Fox, by H. von Alkmaar (1498).

Reynold of Montalbon, one of Charlemagne's paladins.

Reynolds (Sir Joshua) is thus described by Goldsmith—

Here Reynolds is laid; and, to tell you my mind,
He has not left a wiser or better behind.
His pencil was striking, resistless, and grand;
His manners were gentle, complying, and bland. . . .
To coxcombs averse, yet most civilly steering,
When they judged without skill, he was still hard of hearing;
When they talked of their Raphaels, Correggios [sic], and stuff,
He shifted his trumpet, and only took snuff.
Retaliation (1774).

N.B.—Sir Joshua Reynolds was hard of hearing, and used an ear-trumpet.

Rezio (Dr.) (See PEDRO, Dr., p. 818.)—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. liii. 10 (1615).

Rhadamanth, a justice of the peace in Somerville's Hobbinolla, a burlesque poem in blank verse (1740).

Good Rhadamanth, to every wanton clown
Severe, indulgent to himself alone.

Rhadaman'thus, son of Jupiter and Euro'pa. He reigned in the Cyclades with such impartiality, that at death he was made one of the judges of the infernal regions.

And if departed souls must rise again, . . .
And bide the judgment of reward or pain; . . .
Then Rhadamanthus and stern Minos were True types of justice while they lived here.
Lord Brooke: Monarchie, i. (1554–1628).

Rhampsini'tos, king of Egypt, usually called Ram'eses III., the richest of the Egyptian monarchs, who amassed 72 millions sterling, which he secured in a treasury of stone. By an artifice of the builder, he was robbed every night.—Herodotos, ii. 121.

Rha'sis or Mohammed Aboubekr ibn Zakaria el Razi, a noted Arabian physician. He wrote a treatise on small-pox and measles, with some 200 other treatises (850–923).

Well, error has no end;
And Rhasis is a sage.
R. Browning: Paracelsus, iii.

Rhea's Child. Jupiter is so called by Pindar. He dethroned his father Saturn.

The child
Of Rhea drove him [Saturn] from the upper sky.
Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads (1767).

Rheims (The Jackdaw of). The cardinal-archbishop of Rheims made a grand feast, to which he invited all the joblillies of the neighbourhood. There were abbots and prelates, knights and squires, and all who delighted to honour the grand panjandrum of Rheims. The feast over, water was served, and his lordship's grace, drawing off his turquoise ring, laid it beside his plate, dipped his fingers into the golden bowl, and wiped them on his napkin; but when he looked to put on his ring, it was nowhere to be found. It was evidently gone. The floor was searched, the plates and dishes lifted up, the mugs and chalices, every possible and impossible place was poked into, but without avail. The ring must have been stolen. His grace was furious, and, in dignified indignation, calling for bell, book, and candle, banned the thief, both body and soul, this life and for ever. It was a terrible curse, but none of the guests seemed the worse for it—except, indeed, the jackdaw. The poor bird was a pitiable object, his head lobbed down, his wings draggled on the floor, his feathers were all ruffled, and with a ghost of a caw he prayed the company to follow him; when lo! there was the ring, hidden in some sly corner by the jackdaw as a clever practical joke. His lordship's grace smiled benignantly, and instantly removed the curse; when lo! as if by magic, the bird became fat and sleek again, perky and impudent, wagging his tail, winking his eye, and cocking his head on one side; then up he hopped to his old place on the cardinal's chair. Never after this did he indulge in thievish tricks, but became so devout, so constant at feast and chapel, so well-behaved at matins and vespers, that when he died he died in the odour of sanctity, and was canonized, his name being changed to that of Jim Crow.—Barham: Ingoldsby Legends ("Jackdaw of Rheims," 1837).

Rhene (1 syl.), the Rhine, the Latin Rhe'nus.—Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 353 (1665).

Rhesus was on his march to aid the Trojans in their siege, and had nearly reached Troy, when he was attacked in the night by Ulysses and Diomed. In this surprise Rhesus and all his army were cut to pieces.—Homer: Iliad, x.

Rhetoric of a Silver Fee (The).

He will reverse the watchman's harsh decree,
Moved by the rhetoric of a silver fee.
Gay: Trivia, iii. 317 (1712).

Rhiannon's Birds. The notes of these birds were so sweet that warriors remained spell-bound for eighty years together, listening to them. These birds are often alluded to by the Welsh bards. (Rhiannon was the wife of prince Pwyll.)—The Mabinogion, 363 (twelfth century).

¶ The snow-white bird which the monk Felix listened to sang so enchantingly that he was spell-bound for a hundred years, listening to it.—Longfellow: Golden Legend.

Rhine (The Irish). The Blackwater is so called from its scenery.

Rhinnon Rhin Barnawd's Bottles had the virtue of keeping sweet whatever liquor was put in them.—The Mabinogion ("Kilhwch and Olwen," twelfth century).

Rhinoceros. The horn of the rhinoceros being "cut through the middle from one extremity to the other, on it will be seen several white lines representing human figures."—Arabian Nights ("Sinbad's Second Voyage").

Rhinoceros-Horn a Poison-Detector. If poison is put into a vessel made of a rhinoceros's horn, the liquid contained therein will effervesce.

Rhinoceros and Elephant. The rhinoceros with its horn gores the elephant under the belly; but blood running into the rhinoceros' eyes, blinds it, and it becomes an easy prey to the roc.—Arabian Nights ("Sinbad's Second Voyage").

Rhodalind, daughter of Aribert king of Lombardy, in love with duke Gondibert; but Gondibert preferred Birtha, a country girl, daughter of the sage Asträgon. While the duke is whispering sweet love-notes to Birtha, a page comes post-haste to announce to him that the king has proclaimed him his heir, and is about to give him his daughter in marriage. The duke gives Birtha an emerald ring, and says if he is false to her the emerald will lose its lustre; then hastens to court in obedience to the king's summons. Here the tale breaks off, and was never finished.—Sir W. Davenant: Gondibert (1605-1668).

Rhodian Venus (The). This was the "Venus" of Protog'enês mentioned by Pliny in his Natural History, xxxv. 10.

> When first the Rhodian's mimic art arrayed
> The Queen of Beauty in her Cyprian shade,
> The happy master mingled in his piece
> Each look that charmed him in the fair of Greece.
> Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, ii. (1709).

 Prior (1664-1721) refers to the same painting in his fable of Protogênes and Apelles—

> I hope, sir, you intend to stay
> To see our Venus; 'tis the piece
> The most renowned throughout all Greece.

Rhod'ope (3 syl.) or Rhod'opis, a celebrated Greek courtezan, who afterwards married Psammetichus king of Egypt. It is said that she built the third pyramid.—Pliny: Nat. Hist., xxxvi. 12.

> A stateller pyramis to her I'll rear,
> Than Rhodope's.
> Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act i. sc. 6 (1589).

Rhombus, a schoolmaster who speaks "a leash of languages at once," puzzling himself and his hearers with a jargon like that of "Holofernês" in Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost (1594).—Sidney: Pastoral Entertainment (1587).

Rhombus, a spinning-wheel or rolling instrument, used by the Roman witches for fetching the moon out of heaven.

> Quæ nunc Thessalico lunam deducere rhombo [sciet].—Martial: Epigrams, ix. 30.

Rhone of Christian Eloquence (The), St. Hilary (300-367).

Rhone of Latin Eloquence (The). St. Hilary is so called by St. Jerome (300-367).

Rhongomyant, the lance of king Arthur.—The Mabinogion ("Kilhwch and Olwen," twelfth century).

Rhuddlan. (See Statute.)

Rhymes for the Road, by Thomas Moore (1820). "Extracted from the journal of a travelling member of the Pocurante Society." In eight extracts—

> (1) Lake Geneva; (2) Fall of Venice; (3) Lord B——'s Memoirs; (4) The Ubiquitous English; (5) Florence; (6) Conspiracy of Rienzi; (7) Mary Magdalen; and (8) Rousseau.

Rhyming to Death. In 1 Henry VI. act i. sc. 1, Thomas Beaufort duke of Exeter, speaking about the death of Henry V., says, "Must we think that the subtle-witted French conjurors and sorcerers, out of fear of him, 'by magic verses have contrived his end'?" The notion of killing by incantation was at one time very common.

> Irishmen . . . will not stick to affirme that they can rime either man or beast to death.—Reginald Scot: Discoverie of Witchcraft (1564).

Ribbon. The yellow ribbon, in France, indicates that the wearer has won a médaille militaire (instituted by Napoleon III. as a minor decoration of the Legion of Honour).

N.B.—The red ribbon marks a chevalier of the Legion of Honour. A rosette indicates a higher grade than that of chevalier.

Ribbonism, the name given to the principles of a secret society in Ireland, organized about 1820, to retaliate on landlords any injuries done to their tenants. Many agrarian murders were (1858-71) attributed to the ribbonmen.

Ribemont (3 syl.), the bravest and noblest of the French host in the battle of Poitiers. He alone dares confess that the English are a brave people. In the battle he is slain by lord Audley.—Shirley: Edward the Black Prince (1640).

Ribemont (Count), in The Siege of Calais, by Colman.

Riccabocca (Dr.), an eccentricity in lord Lytton's My Novel. Though a cynic he is tender-hearted, and though a sage is most simple-minded. He loves his pipe, carries a red umbrella, and is ever ready with his Machiavellian proverbs (1853).

Riccar'do, commander of Plymouth fortress; a puritan to whom lord Walton has promised his daughter Elvira in marriage. Riccardo learns that the lady is in love with Arthur Talbot, and when Arthur is taken prisoner by Cromwell's soldiers, Riccardo promises to use his efforts to obtain his pardon. This, however, is not needful, for Cromwell, feeling quite secure of his position, orders all the captives of war to be released. Riccardo is the Italian form of sir Richard Forth.—Bellini: I Puritani (opera, 1834).

Ricciardetto, son of Aymon, and brother of Bradamante.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Rice. Eating rice with a bodkin. Aminê, the beautiful wife of Sidi Nouman, ate rice with a bodkin, but she was a ghoul. (See AMINE, p. 37.)

RICHARD, a fine, honest lad, by trade a smith. He marries on New Year's Day, Meg, the daughter of Toby Veck.—Dickens: The Chimes (1844).

Richard (Squire), eldest son of sir Francis Wronghead of Bumper Hall. A country bumpkin, wholly ignorant of the world and of literature.—Vanbrugh and Cibber: The Provoked Husband (1727).

Robert Wetherilt (1708–1745) came to Drury Lane a boy, where he showed his rising genius in the part of "squire Richard."—Chetwood: History of the Stage.

Richard (Poor). (See under POOR.)

Richard (Prince), eldest son of king Henry II.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Richard "Cœur de Lion," introduced in two novels by sir W. Scott (The Talisman and Ivanhoe). In the latter he first appears as "The Black Knight," at the tournament, and is called Le Noir Faintant or "The Black Sluggard;" also "The Knight of the Fetter-lock."

Richard a Name of Terror. The name of Richard I., like that of Attila, Bonaparte, Corvinus, Narses, Sebastian, Talbot, Tamerlane, and other great conquerors, was at one time employed in terrorem to disobedient children. (See NAMES OF TERROR, p. 743.)

His tremendous name was employed by the Syrian mothers to silence their infants; and if a horse suddenly started from the way, his rider was wont to exclaim, "Dost thou think king Richard is in the bush?" —Gibbon: Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, xi. 146 (1776–88).

The Daughters of Richard I. When Richard was in France, Fulco a priest told him he ought to beware how he bestowed his daughters in marriage. "I have no daughters," said the king. "Nay, nay," replied Fulco, "all the world knows that you have three—Pride, Covetousness, and Lechery." "If these are my daughters," said the king, "I know well how to bestow them where they will be well cherished. My eldest I give to the Knights Templars; my second to the monks; and my third, I cannot bestow better than on yourself, for I am sure she will never be divorced nor neglected."—Milles: True Nobility (1610).

The Horse of Richard I., Fennel.

Ah, Fennel, my noble horse, thou bleedest, thou art slain!—Cœur de Lion and His Horse.

The Troubadour of Richard I., Bertrand de Born.

Richard II.'s Horse, Roan Barbary.—Shakespeare: Richard II. act v. sc. 5 (1597).

Richard III., a tragedy by Shakespeare (1597). At one time, parts of Rowe's tragedy of Jane Shore were woven in the acting edition, and John Kemble introduced other clap-traps from Colley Cibber. The best actors of this part were David Garrick (1716–1779), Henry Mossop (1729–1773), and Edmund Kean (1787–1833).

The Horse of Richard III., White Surrey.—Shakespeare: Richard III. act v. sc. 3 (1597).

Richard's himself again! These words were interpolated by John Kemble from Colley Cibber.

Richelieu (Armand), cardinal and chief minister of France. The duke of Orleans (the king's brother), the count de Baradas (the king's favourite), and other noblemen conspired to assassinate Richelieu, dethrone Louis XIII., and make Gaston duke of Orleans the regent. The plot was revealed to the cardinal by Marion de Lorme, in whose house the conspirators met. The conspirators were arrested, and several of them put to death, but Gaston duke of Orleans turned king's evidence and was pardoned.—Lord Lytton: Richelieu (1839).

Richland (Miss), intended for Leontine Croaker, but she gives her hand in marriage to Mr. Honeywood, "the good-natured man," who promises to abandon his quixotic benevolence, and to make it his study in future "to reserve his pity for real distress, his friendship for true merit, and his love for her who first taught him what it is to be happy."—Goldsmith: The Good-natured Man (1768).

Richmond (The duchess of), wife of Charles Stuart, in the court of Charles II. The line became extinct, and the title was given to the Lennox family.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Richmond (The earl of), Henry of Lancaster.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Richmond Hill (The Lass of), Miss I' Anson, of Hill House, Richmond, Yorkshire. Words by M'Nally; music by James Hook, who married the young lady.

The Lass of Richmond Hill is one of the sweetest ballads in the language.—John Bull.

Rickets (Mabel), the old nurse of Frank Osbaldistone.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Riderhood (Rogue), the villain in Dickens's novel of Our Mutual Friend (1864).

Rides on the Tempest and Directs the Storm. Joseph Addison, speaking of the duke of Marlborough and his famous victories, says that he inspired the fainting squadrons, and stood unmoved in the shock of battle—

> So when an angel by divine command,
> With rising tempests shakes a guilty land,
> Such as of late o'er pale Britannia past,
> Calm and serene he drives the furious blast;
> And, pleased th' Almighty's orders to perform,
> Rides on the tempest and directs the storm.
> The Campaign (1705).

N.B.—The "tempest" referred to by Addison in these lines is that called "The Great Storm," November 26-7, 1703, the most terrible on record. The loss of property in London alone exceeded two millions sterling. Above 8000 persons were drowned, 12 men-of-war were wrecked, 17,000 trees in Kent alone were uprooted, Eddystone lighthouse was destroyed, 15,000 sheep were blown into the sea, and the bishop of Bath and Wells with his wife were killed in bed in their palace in Somersetshire.

Ridicule (Father of). François Rabelais is so styled by sir William Temple (1495-1553).

Ridolphus, one of the band of adventurers that joined the crusaders. He was slain by Argantês (bk. vii.).—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Rienzi (Nicolo Gabrini) or COLA DI RIENZI, last of the tribunes, who assumed the name of "Tribune of Liberty, Peace, and Justice" (1313-1354).

(Cola di Rienzi is the hero of a novel by lord Bulwer Lytton, entitled Rienzi, or the Last of the Tribunes, 1849.)

Rienzi, an opera by Wagner (1841). It opens with a number of the Orsini breaking into Rienzi's house, in order to abduct his sister Irênê; but in this they are foiled by the arrival of the Colonna and his followers. The outrage provokes a general insurrection, and Rienzi is appointed leader. The nobles are worsted, and Rienzi becomes a senator; but the aristocracy hate him, and Paolo Orsini seeks to assassinate him, but without success. By the machinations of the German emperor and the Colonna, Rienzi is excommunicated and deserted by all his adherents. He is ultimately fired on by the populace and killed on the steps of the capitol. The libretto is by J. P. Jackson.

The English Rienzi, William with the Long Beard, alias Fitzosbert (*-1196).

Rigaud (Mons.), a Belgian, 35 years of age, confined in a villainous prison at Marseilles for murdering his wife. He had a hooked nose, handsome after its kind but too high between the eyes, and his eyes, though sharp, were too near to one another. He was, however, a large, tall man, with thin lips, and a goodly quantity of dry hair shot with red. When he spoke, his moustache went up under his nose, and his nose came down over his moustache. After his liberation from prison, he first took the name of Lagnier, and then of Blandois, his name being Rigaud Lagnier Blandois.—Dickens: Little Dorrit (1857).

Rigdum-Funnidos, a courtier in the palace of king Chrononhotonthologos. After the death of the king, the widowed queen is advised to marry again, and Rigdum-Funnidos is proposed to her as "a very proper man." At this Aldiborontephoscophornio takes umbrage, and the queen says, "Well, gentlemen, to make matters easy, I'll have you both."—H. Carey: Chrononhotonthologos (1734).

N.B.—John Ballantyne, the publisher, was so called by sir W. Scott. He was "a quick, active, intrepid little fellow, full of fun and merriment . . . all over quaintness and humorous mimicry."

Rightful Heir (The), the play called the Sea-Captain re-christened, by lord Lytton (1868).

Rights of Man (The), by Thomas Paine (1791-2). It was written in answer to Burke's attack on the French Revolution.

Rigmarole, a confused series of statements; an incoherent story. The word was suggested by the Rageman or Rigman Rolls, which were statements of the value of the benefices of Scotland returned by the Scotch clergy. Rageman or Rigman was a legate of Scotland, employed to collect an account of Scotch benefices, that they might be taxed at Rome according to their value.

Subsequently the term was applied to four great rolls of parchment recording the acts of fealty and homage done by the Scotch nobility to Edward I. in 1296. These four rolls consisted of thirty-four pieces sewed together. The originals have perished, but a record of them is preserved in the Rolls House, Chancery Lane.

Rig'olette (3 syl.), a grisette and courtezan.—Sue: Mysteries of Paris (1842-3).

Rigoletto, an opera, describing the agony of a father obliged to witness the prostitution of his own daughter.—Verdi: Rigoletto (1852).

Rimegap (Joe), one of the miners of sir Geoffrey Peveril of the Peak.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Rimini (Francesca di), a woman of extraordinary beauty, daughter of a signore of Ravenna. She was married to Lanciotto Malatesta signore of Rimini, a man of great bravery, but deformed. His brother Paolo was extremely handsome, and with him Francesca fell in love. Lanciotto, detecting them in criminal intercourse, killed them both (1839).

(This tale forms one of the episodes of Dante's Inferno. It is the subject of a tragedy called Francesca di Rimini, by Silvio Pellico (1819); and Leigh Hunt, about the same time, published his Story of Rimini, in verse.)

Rimmon, seventh in order of the hierarchy of hell: (1) Satan, (2) Beëlzebub, (3) Moloch, (4) Chemos, (5) Thammuz, (6) Dagon, (7) Rimmon whose chief temple was at Damascus (2 Kings v. 18).

Him [Dagon] followed Rimmon, whose delightful seat
Was fair Damascus on the fertile banks
Of Al'bana and Pharphar, lucid streams.
Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 467, etc. (1667).

Rinaldo, son of the fourth marquis d'Estê, cousin of Orlando, and nephew of Charlemagne. He was the rival of Orlando in his love for Angelica, but Angelica detested him. Rinaldo brought an auxiliary force of English and Scotch to Charlemagne, which "Silence" conducted safely into Paris.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Rinaldo, the Achillês of the Christian army in the siege of Jerusalem. He was the son of Bertoldo and Sophia, but was brought up by Matilda. Rinaldo joined the crusaders at the age of 15. Being summoned to a public trial for the death of Gernando, he went into voluntary exile.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

(Pulci introduces the same character in his bernesque poem entitled Morgantê Maggiorê, which holds up to ridicule the romances of chivalry.)

Rinaldo, steward to the countess of Rousillon.—Shakespeare: All's Well that Ends Well (1598).

Rinaldo of Montalban, a knight who had the "honour" of being a public plunderer. His great exploit was stealing the golden idol of Mahomet.

In this same Mirror of Knighthood we meet with Rinaldo de Montalban and his companions, with the twelve peers of France, and Turpin the historian. . . . Rinaldo had a broad face, and a pair of large rolling eyes; his complexion was ruddy, and his disposition choleric. He was, besides, naturally profligate, and a great encourager of vagrants.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. i. 1, 6 (1605).

Ring (A Fairy). Whoever lives in a house built over a fairy-ring shall wonderfully prosper in everything.—Athenian Oracle, i. 307.

Ring (Corcud's), composed of six different metals. It ensured the wearer success in any undertaking in which he chose to embark.

"While you have it on your finger," said the old man, 'misfortune shall fly from your house, and nobody shall be able to hurt you; but one condition is attached to the gift, which is this: when you have chosen for yourself a wife, you must remain faithful to her as long as she lives. The moment you neglect her for another, you will lose the ring."—Gueulette: Chinese Tales ("Corcud and his Four Sons," 1723).

Dame Lionês's Ring, a ring given by Dame Lionês to sir Gareth during a tournament.

"That ring," said Dame Lionês, "increaseth my beauty much more than it is of itself; and this is the virtue of my ring: that which is green it will turn to red, and that which is red it will turn green; that which is blue it will turn white, and that which is white it will turn blue; and so with all other colours. Also, whoever beareth my ring can never lose blood."—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 146 (1470).

Luned's Ring. This ring rendered the wearer invisible. Luned or Lynet gave it to Owain, one of king Arthur's knights. Consequently, when men were sent to kill him he was nowhere to be found, for he was invisible.

Take this ring, and put it on thy finger, with the stone inside thy hand; and close thy hand upon the stone; and as long as thou concealest it, it will conceal thee.—The Mabinogion ("Lady of the Fountain," twelfth century).

The Steel Ring made by Seidel-Beckir. This ring enabled the wearer to read the secrets of another's heart.—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("The Four Talismans," 1743).

The Talking Ring, a ring given by Tartaro, the Basque Cyclops, to a girl whom he wished to marry. Immediately she put it on, it kept incessantly saying, "You there, and I here;" so, in order to get rid of the nuisance, she cut off her finger and threw both ring and finger into a pond.—Webster: Basque Legends, 4 (1876).

¶ The same story appears in Campbell's Popular Tales of the West Highlands, i. 111, and in Grimm's tale of The Robber and His Sons. When the robber put on the ring, it incessantly cried out, "Here I am;" so he bit off his finger, and threw it from him.

Reynard's Ring, a ring which Reynard pretended he had sent to king Lion. It had (he said) three gems—one red, which gave light in darkness; one white, which cured all blains and sprains, aches and pains, whether from wounds, fever, or indigestion; and one green, which would guard the king from every ill, both in peace and war.—Heinrich von Alkmaar: Reynard the Fox (1498).

The Virgin's Wedding Ring, kept in the Duomo of Perugia, under fourteen locks.

Ring Posies.

AEI (Greek for "always").
A heart content Can ne'er repent.
All for all.
All I refuse, And thee I choose.
Bear and forbear.
Beyond this life, Love me, dear wife.
De bon cor. (Sixteenth century; found at York.)
Death never parts Such loving hearts.
Dieu vous garde.
En bon an. (Fifteenth century; H. Illman, Esq.)
En bon foye.
Endless my love, As this shall prove.
For ever and for aye.
God alone Made us two one.
God did decree This unity.
God tend me well to keep. (The ring given by Henry VIII. to Anne of Cleves.)
Got bwar uns beid in Lieb und Leid ("With clasped hands," etc.).
Heart and hand At thy command.
I have obtained Whom God ordained.
In love abide, Till death divide.
In loving thee I love myself.
In thee, my choice, I do rejoice.
In unity Let's live and die.
Joined in one By God alone.
Joy be with you; or, in French, Joye sans cesse.
Le cuer de moy. (Fifteenth century. With Virgin and Child.)
Let love increase.
Let reason rule.
Let vs loue Like turtle-doue.
Liue to loue, loue to liue.
Live happy.
Loue for loue.
Love alway, By night and day.
Love and respect I do expect.
Love is heaven, and heaven is love.
Love me, and leave me not.
May God above Increase our love.
May you live long.
Mizpah [i.e. watch-tower].
Mutual forbearance.
My heart and I, Until I die.
My wille were. (Gold signet-ring, with a cradle as device.)
Never newa. (Alianour, wife of the duke of Somerset.)
No gift can show The love I owe.
Not two, but one, Till life is gone.
Post spinas palma.
Pray to love, and love to pray.
Quod Deus coniunsit homo non separet. (Sixteenth century; G. H. Gower, Esq.)
Silence ends strife With man and wife.
Tecta lege, lecta tege. (Ring of Matthew Paris; found at Hereford.)
Till death us depart. (Margaret, wife of the earl of Shrewsbury.)
Till my life's ende. (Elizabeth, wife of lord Latymer.)
To enjoy is to obey.
Tout pur vous. (Fifteenth century, with St. Christopher.)
Treu und fest.
True love Will ne'er remove.
Truth trieth troth.
We join our love In God above.
Wedlock, 'tis said, In heaven is made.
Whear this I giue, I wish to liue.
When this you see, Remember me.
Where hearts agree, There God will be.
Yours in heart.

Ring and the Book (The), a dramatic monologue (1868–69), by Robert Browning, founded on a cause célèbre of Italian history.

The case was this: There lived in Rome, in the year 1679, Pietro and Violante Comparini, an elderly couple, who, in spite of a fair income, were considerably in debt. One expedient suggested itself: they must have a child, and so enable themselves to draw on their capital, now tied up for an unknown heir-at-law. Violante, unknown to her husband, secured the infant of a disreputable woman, and became to all appearance the mother of a girl, Francesco Pompilia. There was also in Rome an impoverished noble, count Guido Franceschini, of Arezzo—he belonged to the minor ranks of the clergy, and had spent years hoping for preferment. His only chance of building up the family fortune was a rich wife. He was fifty years old, short, thin, pale, and with a projecting nose. He heard of Pompilia, proposed for her and was accepted. The Comparini were dazzled at the accounts of his wealth, whilst Pompilia's dowry was grossly exaggerated to him. They were married, and the two families lived together at Arezzo. The arrangement was disastrous, and after a few months Pietro and Violante were glad to return to Rome. After some time Violante confessed her fraud, and was told that absolution would be given her if she restored to the legal heirs the money she had defrauded them of. Pompilia was the chief sufferer; her husband treated her with great cruelty, and attacked her on the score of infidelity with a certain canon Giuseppe Caponsacchi, whom she barely knew. She appealed for protection against her husband to the archbishop and the governor, but in vain. She found she was about to become a mother, and resolved to leave her husband and go to Rome, so she placed herself under the protection of Caponsacchi, and they fled towards Rome. They were overtaken and arrested at Castlenuovo, and were conveyed to the New Prisons in Rome, where they were tried on the charge of adultery. Being found guilty, a mere nominal punishment was inflicted on them, and, in consideration of her state, Pompilia was allowed to be removed to the home of the Comparini, where she gave birth to a son. Count Guido hired four ruffians, proceeded to the house with them, and there murdered Pietro, Violante, and Pompilia. He was taken red-handed in the deed, tried, and executed.

The poem is a series of dramatic monologues, in which the whole of the evidence is weighed and sifted. So ably is it done, that one moment you think Pompilia guilty, and the next you are sure that she and the canon are innocent. The pope pronounces the final judgment, and asserts their innocence. He names Pompilia "perfect in whiteness," and calls her "my rose, I gather for the breast of God." Of Caponsacchi he says——

> And surely not so very much apart,
> Need I place thee, my warrior-priest.

To the old pope, on the threshold of another world, a clear vision is given, and he understands the chivalry of his warrior-priest towards the forlorn and suffering Pompilia, and knows that Caponsacchi has shown himself possessed of the true courage which does not shrink from temptation, but which does not fall under it. The name is explained thus: The book is a parchment-covered book Browning picked up in a square in Florence, the Piazza San Lorenzo, containing the records of the Franceschini murder case.

> The story . . . forms a circle of evidence to its one central truth; and this circle was constructed in the manner in which the workers in Etruscan gold prepares the ornament circlet which will be worn as a ring. The pure metal is too soft to bear hammer or file; it must be mixed with alloy to gain the necessary power of resistance. The ring once formed and embossed, the alloy is disengaged, and a pure gold ornament remains.—Mrs. Orr: Handbook to Browning.

Browning's material was inadequate for his purpose. It was too hard and matter-of-fact, so he supplied the alloy of fancy, and wove his own ideas into the dead record.

The masterpiece is dedicated to his dead wife, in the magnificent outburst at the end of the first book, beginning—

> O lyric Love, half-angel and half-bird,
> And all a wonder and a wild desire.

The books are as follows:—

I. The Ring and the Book (explains the name).
II. Half Rome (sympathetic to the count).
III. The Other Half Rome (against the count).
IV. Tertium Quid (thinks that both sides are probably right).
V. Count Guido Franceschini (his defence).
VI. Giuseppe Caponsacchi.
VII. Pompilia.
VIII. Dominus Hyacinthus de Archangelis (procurator of the poor).
IX. Juris Doctor Johannes-Baptista Bottinius (public prosecutor).
X. The Pope.
XI. Guido (note, the title is dropped).
XII. The Book and the Ring.

Ring of Amasis (The), the same as the "Ring of Polycrates" (4 syl.), which he flung into the sea to propitiate Nemesis for his too great prosperity; but it was brought to him again in a fish provided for his dinner.—Herodotus, iii. 40. (See FISH AND THE RING, p. 370.)

(Robert lord Lytton has a poem so called, 1863.)

Ring the Bells Backwards (To), to ring a muffled peal, to lament. Thus, John Cleveland, wishing to show his abhorrence of the Scotch, says—

> How! Providence! and yet a Scottish crew! . . .
> Ring the bells backwards. I am all on fire;
> Not all the buckets in a country quire
> Shall quench my rage.
> The Rebel Scot (1613–1659).

(See BELLS TOLLED BACKWARDS, p. 107.)

Ringdove (The Swarthy). The responses of the oracle of Dodōna, in Epīros, were made by old women called "pigeons," who derived their answers from the cooing of certain doves, the bubbling of a spring, the rustling of the sacred oak [or beech], and the tinkling of a gong or bell hung in the tree. The women were called pigeons by a play on the word peliæ, which means "old women" as well as "pigeons;" and as they came from Libya they were swarthy.

 According to fable, Zeus gave his daughter Thēbē two black doves endowed with the gift of human speech; one of them flew into Libya, and the other into Dodona. The former gave the responses in the temple of Ammon, and the latter in the oracle of Dodona.

> . . . beech or lime,
> Or that Thessalian growth
> In which the swarthy ringdove sat,
> And mystic sentence spoke.
> Tennyson.

Ringhorse (Sir Robert), a magistrate at Old St. Ronan's.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Ringwood, a young Templar.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Ringwood (The earl of), a cynic in Thackeray's novel called The Adventures of Philip (1861).

Rintherout (Jenny), a servant at Monkbarns to Mr. Jonathan Oldbuck the antiquary.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Riou (Captain), called by Nelson "The Gallant and the Good;" fell in the battle of the Baltic.

> Brave hearts! to Britain's pride
> Once so faithful and so true,
> On the deck of fame that died,
> With the gallant, good Riou.
> Campbell: Battle of the Baltic (1777–1844).

R. I. P., i.e. requiescat in pace.

Rip van Winkle slept twenty years in the Kaatskill Mountains of North America. (See WINKLE.)

¶ Epimenidēs the Gnostic slept for fifty-seven years.

¶ Nourjahad, wife of the Mogul emperor Geangir, who discovered the otto of roses, is only in a temporary sleep.

¶ Gyneth slept 500 years, by the enchantment of Merlin.

¶ St. David slept for seven years. (See ORMANDINE, p. 784.)

Riquet with the Tuft, the beau-ideal of ugliness, but with the power of bestowing wit and intelligence on the person he loved best. Riquet fell in love with a most beautiful woman, who was as stupid as Riquet was ugly, but she possessed the power of giving beauty to the person she loved best. The two married, whereupon Riquet gave his bride wit, and she bestowed on him beauty. This, of course, is an allegory. Love sees through a couleur de rose.—Perrault: Contes des Fées ("Riquet à la Houppe," 1697).

(This tale is borrowed from the Nights of Straparola. It is imitated by Mme. Villeneuve in her Beauty and the Beast.)

Risingham (Bertram), the vassal of Philip of Mortham. Oswald Wycliffe induced him to shoot his lord at Marston Moor; and for this deed the vassal demanded all the gold and movables of his late master. Oswald, being a villain, tried to outwit Bertram, and even to murder him; but it turned out that Philip of Mortham was not killed, neither was Oswald Wycliffe his heir, for Redmond O'Neale (Rokeby's page) was found to be the son and heir of Philip of Mortham.—Sir W. Scott: Rokeby (1812).

Ritho or Rython, a giant who had made himself furs of the beards of kings killed by him. He sent to king Arthur to meet him on mount Aravius, or else to send his beard to him without delay. Arthur met him, slew him, and took "fur" as a spoil. Drayton says it was this Rython who carried off Helĕna the niece of duke Hoel; but Geoffrey of Monmouth says that king Arthur, having killed the Spanish giant, told his army "he had found none so great in strength since he killed the giant Ritho;" by which it seems that the Spanish giant and Ritho are different persons, although it must be confessed the scope of the chronicle seems to favour their identity.—Geoffrey: British History, x. 3 (1142).

As how great Rython's self he [Arthur] slew . . .
Who ravished Howell's niece, young Helena the fair.
Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

Ritsonism, malignant and insolent criticism. So called from Joseph Ritson (1752–1803).

Ritson's assertion must be regarded as only an example of that peculiar species of malignant and brutal insolence in criticism, which ought from him to be denominated "Ritsonism."—Southey.

Rival Queens (The), Stati'ra and Roxa'na. Statira was the daughter of Darĭus, and wife of Alexander the Great. Roxana was the daughter of Oxyartês the Bactrian; her, also, Alexander married. Roxana stabbed Statira and killed her. —Lee: Alexander the Great or The Rival Queens (1678). (See ROXANA AND STATIRA, p. 937.)

Rivals (The), a comedy by Sheridan (1775). The rivals are Bob Acres and ensign Beverley (alias captain Absolute), and Lydia Languish is the lady they contend for. Bob Acres tells captain Absolute that ensign Beverley is a booby; and if he could find him out, he'd teach him his place. He sends a challenge to the unknown by sir Lucius O'Trigger, but objects to forty yards, and thinks thirty-eight would suffice. When he finds that ensign Beverley is captain Absolute, he declines to quarrel with his friend; and when his second calls him a coward, he flies up and exclaims, "Coward! Mind, gentlemen, he calls me 'a coward,' coward by my valour!" and when dared by sir Lucius, he replies, "I don't mind the word 'coward;' 'coward' may be said in a joke; but if he called me 'poltroon,' ods daggers and balls——" "Well, sir, what then?" "Why," rejoined Bob Acres, "I should certainly think him very ill-bred." Of course, he resigns all claim to the lady's hand.

One day, as I was walking with my customary swagger,
Says a fellow to me, "Pistol, you're a coward, though a bragger."
Now, this was an indignity no gentleman could take, sir,
So I told him flat and plump, "You lie—under a mistake, sir."

River of Juvenescence. Prester John, in his letter to Manuel Comnēnus emperor of Constantinople, says there is a spring at the foot of mount Olympus which changes its flavour hour by hour, both night and day. Whoever tastes thrice of its waters will never know fatigue or the infirmities of age.

River of Paradise, St. Bernard abbot of Clairvaux (1091–1153).

River of Swans, the Poto'mac, United States, America.

Rivers (The king of), the Tagus.

Tagus they crossed, where, midland on his way,
The king of rivers rolls his stately streams.
Southey: Roderick, the Last of the Goths, xi. (1814).

Rivers, Arise . . . In this Vacation Exercise, George Rivers (son of sir John Rivers of Westerham, in Kent), with nine other freshmen, took the part of the ten "Predicaments," while Milton himself performed the part of "Ens." Without doubt, the pun suggested the idea—

Rivers, arise; whether thou be the son
Of utmost Tweed, or Ouse, or gulphy Don,
Or Trent, who, like some earthborn giant, spreads
His thirty arms along the indented meads,
Or sullen Mole that runneth underneath,
Or Severn swift, guilty of maiden's death,
Or rocky Avon, or of sedgy Lee,
Or cooly Tyne, or ancient hallowed Dee,
Or Humber loud that keeps the Scythian's name,
Or Medway smooth, or royal towered Thame.
Milton: Vacation Exercise (1627).

Rivulet Controversy (The), a theological controversy with the Rev. T. T. Lynch, who died in 1871. He was a congregational minister of neologian views, expressed in a volume of poems called The Rivulet, and published in 1853.

Road (The Law of the).

The law of the road is a paradox quite,
In riding or driving along:
If you go to the left, you are sure to go right;
If you go to the right, you go wrong.

Road to Ruin, a comedy by Thomas Holcroft (1792). Harry Dornton and his friend Jack Milford are on "the road to ruin" by their extravagance. The former brings his father to the eye of bankruptcy; and the latter, having spent his private fortune, is cast into prison for debt. Sulky, a partner in the bank, comes forward to save Mr. Dornton from ruin; Harry advances £6000 to pay his friend's debts, and thus saves Milford from ruin; and the father restores the money advanced by Widow Warren to his son, to save Harry from the ruin of marrying a designing widow instead of Sophia Freelove, her innocent and charming daughter.

Roads (The king of), John Loudon Macadam, the improver of roads (1756–1836).

(Of course, the wit consists in the pun Rhodes and Roads.)

Roan Barbary, the charger of Richard II., which would eat from his master's hand.

> Oh, how it yearned my heart, when I beheld
> In London streets that coronation day,
> When Bolingbroke rode on Roan Barbary!
> That horse that thou so often hast bestrid;
> That horse that I so carefully have dressed!
> Shakespeare: Richard II. act v. sc. 5 (1597).

Roast Pig, one of the best essays of C. Lamb in his Essays of Elia.

Rob Roy, published in 1818, excellent for its bold sketches of Highland scenery. The character of Bailie Nicol Jarvie is one of Scott's happiest conceptions; and the carrying of him to the wild mountains among outlaws and desperadoes is exquisitely comic. The hero, Frank Osbaldistone, is no hero at all. Dramatized by I. Pocock.

> None of Scott's novels was more popular than Rob Roy, yet, as a story, it is the most ill-concocted and defective of the whole series.—Chambers: English Literature, ii. 587.

Rob Roy M'Gregor, i.e. "Robert the Red," whose surname was MacGregor. He was an outlaw, who assumed the name of Campbell in 1662. He may be termed the Robin Hood of Scotland. The hero of the novel is Frank Osbaldistone, who gets into divers troubles, from which he is rescued by Rob Roy. The last service is to kill Rashleigh Osbaldistone, whereby Frank's great enemy is removed; and Frank then marries Diana Vernon.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

> Rather beneath the middle size than above it, his limbs were formed upon the very strongest model that is consistent with agility. . . . Two points in his person interfered with the rules of symmetry: his shoulders were too broad . . . and his arms (though round, sinewy, and strong) were so very long as to be rather a deformity.—Ch. xxiii.

Rob Tally-ho, Esq., cousin of the Hon. Tom Dashall, the two blades whose rambles and adventures through the metropolis are related by Pierce Egan (1821–2).

Rob the Rambler, the comrade of Willie Steenson the blind fiddler.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Robb (Duncan), the grocer near Ellangowan.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Robber (Alexander's). The pirate who told Alexander he was the greater robber of the two, was Diomidès. See Evenings at Home ("Alexander and the Robber"). The tale is from Cicero. (See Gesta Romanorum, cxlvi.)

> Nam quum quereretur ex eo, quo scelere impulsus mare haberet infestum uno myoparone: eodem, inquit, quo tu orbem terræ.—De Repub., iii. 14 sec. 24.

Robber (Edward the). Edward IV. was so called by the Scotch.

Robert, father of Marian. He had been a wrecker, and still hankered after the old occupation. One night, a storm arose, and Robert went to the coast to see what would fall into his hands. A body was washed ashore, and he rifled it. Marian followed, with the hope of restraining her father, and saw in the dusk some one strike a dagger into a prostrate body. She thought it was her father, and when Robert was on his trial, he was condemned to death on his daughter's evidence. Black Norris, the real murderer, told her he would save her father if she would consent to be his wife; she consented, and Robert was acquitted. On the wedding day, her lover Edward returned to claim her hand, Black Norris was seized as a murderer, and Marian was saved.—Knowles: The Daughter (1836).

Robert, a servant of sir Arthur Wardour at Knockwinnock Castle.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Robert (Mons.), a neighbour of Sganarelle. Hearing the screams of Mme. Martine (Sganarelle's wife), he steps over to make peace between them, whereupon madame calls him an impertinent fool, and says, if she chooses to be beaten by her husband, it is no affair of his; and Sganarelle says, "Je la veux battre, si je le veux; et ne la veux pas battre, si je ne le veux pas;" and beats M. Robert again.—Molière: Le Médecin Malgré Lui (1666).

Robert Macaire, a bluff, free-living libertine. His accomplice is Bertrand, a simpleton and a villain.—L'Auberge des Adrets, by Antier, etc.

There is a melodrama by B. Antier, St. Amand, and Polyanthe; a continuation by Antier, St. Amand, and Maurice Alroy, called Robert Macaire; and subsequently Daumier published drawings or sketches of it, which he called Les cent-et-un Robert Macaire.

Robert Street, Adelphi, London. So called from Robert Adams, the builder.

Robert duke of Albany, brother of Robert III. of Scotland.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Robert duke of Normandy sold his dominions to Rufus for 10,000 marks, to furnish him with ready money for the crusade. He joined the crusade at the head of 1000 heavy-armed horse and 1000 light-armed Normans.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Robert earl of Huntingdon (The downfall of), a drama by Munday (1601). Robin Hood is made to die in the first act, and king John falls in love with his widow Matilda, a daughter of lord Fitzwalter.

(Davenport wrote a tragedy called King John and Matilda (1651), which covers the same ground. Matilda was poisoned by king John.)

N.B.—Maid Marian or Matilda is always spoken of as "the chaste Matilda or fair maid Marian."

Robert III. of Scotland, introduced by sir W. Scott in the Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Robert le Diable, son of Bertha and Bertramo. Bertha was the daughter of Robert duke of Normandy, and Bertramo was a fiend in the guise of a knight. The opera shows the struggle in Robert between the virtue inherited from his mother and the vice inherited from his father. His father allures him to gamble till he loses everything, and then claims his soul, but his foster-sister Alice counterplots the fiend, and rescues Robert by reading to him his mother's will.—Meyerbeer: Roberto il Diavolo (libretto by Scribe, 1831).

(Robert le Diable was the hero of an old French metrical romance (thirteenth century). This romance in the next century was thrown into prose. There is a miracle-play on the same subject.)

Robert of Paris (Count), one of the crusading princes. The chief hero of this novel is Hereward (3 syl.), one of the Varangian guard of the emperor Alexius Comnênus. He and the count fight a single combat with battle-axes; after which Hereward enlists under the count's banner, and marries Bertha also called Agatha.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Robert the Devil or Robert the Magnificent, Robert I. duke of Normandy, father of William "the Conqueror" (*, 1028-1035).

¶ Robert François Damiens, who tried to assassinate Louis XV., was popularly so called (*, 1714-1757).

Roberts, cash-keeper of Master George Heriot the king's goldsmith.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Roberts (John), a smuggler.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Robespierre's Weavers, the fish-fags and their rabble female followers of the very lowest class, partisans of Robespierre in the first French Revolution.

ROBIN, the page of sir John Falstaff.—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor (1601).

Robin, servant of captain Rovewell, whom he helps in his love adventures with Arethusa daughter of Argus.—Carey: Contrivances (1715).

Robin, brother-in-law of Farmer Crop, of Cornwall. Having lost his property through the villainy of lawyer Endless, he emigrates, and in three years returns. The ship is wrecked off the coast of Cornwall, and Robin saves Frederick the young squire. On landing, he meets his old sweetheart Margaretta at Crop's house, and the acquaintance is renewed by mutual consent.—Hoare: No Song no Supper (1790).

Robin, a young gardener, fond of the minor theatres, where he has picked up a taste for sentimental fustian, but all his rhapsodies bear upon his trade. Thus, when Wilelmina asks why he wishes to dance with her, he replies—

Ask the plants why they love a shower; ask the sunflower why it loves the sun; ask the snowdrop why it is white; ask the violet why it is blue; ask the trees why they blossom; the cabbages why they grow. 'Tis all because they can't help it, no more can I help my love for you.—Dibdin: The Waterman, i. (1774).

Robin (Old), butler to old Mr. Ralph Morton of Milnwood.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Robin Adair, written by lady Caroline Keppel, daughter of the second earl of Albemarle; she married (after the usual unsmooth run of true love) Robert Adair, a young Irish surgeon, in 1758. The air was the old Irish tune of "Eileen Aroon," which her lover had sung to her. Robin Adair left a son who became the hon. sir Robert Adair, G.C.B.

Robert Adair was the father of the right hon. sir Robert Adair, who died in 1855.

Robin Bluestring. Sir Robert Walpole was so called, in allusion to his blue ribbon as a knight of the Garter (1676-1745).

Robin Goodfellow, another name for Puck. The ballad so called is attributed by Peck to Ben Jonson, but it is not among his collected songs.

Robin Gray (Auld). The words of this song are by lady Anne Lindsay, daughter of the earl of Balcarres; she was afterwards lady Barnard. The song was written in 1772 to an old Scotch tune called The Bridegroom Grat when the Sun gaed Down. (See GRAY, p. 445.)

Robin Hood was born at Locksley, in Notts., in the reign of Henry II. (1160). His real name was Fitzooth, and it is commonly said that he was the earl of Huntingdon. Having outrun his fortune, and being outlawed, he lived as a freebooter in Barnsdale (Yorkshire), Sherwood (Notts.), and Plompton Park (Cumberland). His chief companions were Little John (whose name was Nailor), William Scadlock (or Scarlet), George Green the pinder (or pound-keeper) of Wakefield, Much a miller's son, and Tuck a friar, with one female named Marian. His company at one time consisted of a hundred archers. He was bled to death in his old age by a relative, the prioress of Kirkley's Nunnery, in Yorkshire, November 18, 1247, aged 87 years.

 An excellent sketch of Robin Hood is given by Drayton in his Polyolbion, xxvi. Sir W. Scott introduces him in two novels—Ivanhoe and The Talisman. In the former he first appears as Locksley the archer, at the tournament. He is also called "Dickon Bend-the-Bow." Ritson, in 1791, published all the ballads, songs, and poems extant on this famous outlaw; and T. L. Peacock, in 1822, wrote a romance on the outlaw, called The Maid Marian.

(The following dramatic pieces have the famous outlaw for the hero:—Robin Hood, i. (1597), Munday; Robin Hood ii. (1598), Chettle; Robin Hood (1741), an opera, by Dr. Arne and Burney; Robin Hood (1787), an opera, by O'Keefe, music by Shield; Robin Hood, by Macnally, before 1820.)

N.B.—Major tells us that this famous robber took away the goods of rich men only; never killed any person except in self-defence; never plundered the poor, but charitably fed them; and adds, "he was most humane and the prince of all robbers."—Britanniæ Historia, 128 (1740).

(There is no such date as 24 kal. of any month. Probably 14 is meant, which would be the 18th of November, the real date.)

(The abbot of St. Mary's, in York, and the sheriff of Nottingham were his bêtes noires. Munday and Chettle wrote a popular play in 1601, entitled The Death of Robert Earl of Huntingdon.)

Robin Hood's Fat Friar was friar Tuck.

1. Robin Hood in Barnsdale stood, said to a person who is not speaking to the point. This is the only line extant of a song of great antiquity, and a favourite in the law-courts.

A case in Yelverton was alluded to, but the court remarked, "You may as well say by way of inducement to a traverse, 'Robin Hood in Barnwood stood.'"—Bush v. Leake.

Mes tout un come il ust replie "Robin Whood in Barnwood stood," absque hoc q def. p. commandement sir John.—Witham v. Barker.

Robin Hood upon Greendale stood.

2. Come, turn about, Robin Hood, a challenge in defiance of exceeding pluck.

O Love, whose power and might
No creature ere withstood,
Thou forcest me to write,
Come, turn about, Robin Hood.
Wit and Drollery (1661).

3. Many talk of Robin Hood that never shot in his bow, many prate of things of which they have no practical knowledge.

Herein our author hath verified the proverb, "Talking at large of Robin Hood, in whose bow he never shot."—Fuller: Worthies, 315 (1662).

Molti parlan di Orlando
Chi non viddero mai suo brando.
Italian Proverb.

4. To sell Robin Hood's Pennyworths, sold much under the intrinsic value. As Robin Hood stole his goods, he sold them at almost any price. It is said that chapmen bought his wares most eagerly.

All men said it became me well,
And Robin Hood's pennyworths I did sell.
Randal-a-Harnaby.

Robin Hood and Guy of Gisborne, an old ballad, date unknown. It says that Robin Hood and Little John, wandering together in Sherwood Forest, saw a man standing under a tree, when Little John said he would go and ask his business. Robin Hood thought this was an affront, and threatened to break his head, whereupon Little John parted and went to Burnesdale. Here he was overpowered by the sheriff's men and bound. Meantime Robin Hood went to the stranger and asked his name and business. "I am Guy of Gisborne," said he, "and I have sworn to take one Robin Hood captive." "I am Robin Hood," said the outlaw, and the two men struggled for the mastery. Ultimately, Robin Hood slew the stranger, and cut off his head. He then changed raiment, and blew Guy's horn. "Ho! ho!" said the sheriff, "that is Guy's horn, and he has taken the outlaw captive;" so he hastened to the spot, and mistook Robin Hood for Guy of Gisborne. This enabled Robin to unbind Little John and give him secretly Guy's bow. The sheriff saw his mistake and fled, but Little John shot him in the back, and he fell dead.—Percy: Reliques, series i. bk. i. 8.

(Ritson has published many other ballads about Robin Hood, but it would occupy too much space to give their gist even in the briefest manner.)

Robin Redbreast. One tradition is that the robin pecked a thorn out of the crown of thorns when Christ was on His way to Calvary, and the blood which issued from the wound, falling on the bird, dyed its breast red.

Another tradition is that it carries in its bill dew to those shut up in the burning lake, and its breast is red from being scorched by the fire of Gehenna.

He brings cool dew in his little bill,
And lets it fall on the souls of sin;
You can see the mark on his red breast still
Of fires that scorch as he drops it in.
Whittier: The Robin.

Robin Redbreasts, Bow Street officers. So called from their red vests.

Robin Roughhead, a poor cottager and farm labourer, the son of lord Lackwit. On the death of his lordship, Robin Roughhead comes into the title and estates. This brings out the best qualities of his heart—liberality, benevolence, and honesty. He marries Dolly, to whom he was already engaged, and becomes the good genius of the peasantry on his estate.—Allingham: Fortune's Frolic (1800).

Robin and Makyne (2 syl.), an old Scotch pastoral. Robin is a shepherd, for whom Makyne sighs, but he turns a deaf ear to her, and she goes home to weep. In time, Robin sighs for Makyne, but she replies, "He who wills not when he may, when he wills he shall have nay."—Percy: Reliques, etc., II.

Robin des Bois, a mysterious hunter in the forests of Germany.

(The name occurs in one of Eugène Sue's novels.)

Robin of Bagshot, alias Gordon, alias Bluff Bob, alias Carbuncle, alias Bob Booty, one of Macheath's gang of thieves, and a favourite of Mrs. Peachum's.—Gay: The Beggar's Opera (1727).

Robins (Zerubbabel), in Cromwell's troop.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Robinson. Before you can say, Jack Robinson, a quotation from one of Hudson's songs; a tobacconist who lived at 98, Shoe Lane, in the early part of the nineteenth century.

Robinson Cru'soe (3 syl.), a tale by Daniel Defoe. Robinson Crusoe ran away from home, and went to sea. Being wrecked, he led for many years a solitary existence on an uninhabited island of the tropics, and relieved the weariness of life by numberless contrivances. At length he met a human being, a young Indian, whom he saved from death on a Friday. He called him his "man Friday," and made him his companion and servant.

(Defoe founded this story on the adventures of Alexander Selkirk, sailing-master of the privateer Cinque Ports Galley, who was left by captain Stradling on the desolate island of Juan Fernandez for four years and four months (1704-1709), when he was rescued by captain Woodes Rogers and brought to England.)

Robsart (Amy), countess of Leicester. She was betrothed to Edmund Tressilian. When the earl falls into disgrace at court for marrying Amy, Richard Varney, master of the horse, loosens a trap-door at Cumnor Place; and Amy, rushing forward to greet her husband, falls into the abyss and is killed.

Sir Hugh Robsart, of Lidcote Hall, father of Amy.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Roc, a white bird of enormous size. Its strength is such that it will lift up an elephant from the ground and carry it to its mountain nest, where it will devour it. In the Arabian Nights' Entertainments it was a roc which carried Sinbad the sailor from the island on which he had been deserted by his companions ("Second Voyage"). And it was a roc which carried Agib from the castle grounds of the ten young men who had lost their right eyes ("The Third Calender's Story"). Sinbad says one claw of the roc is as "big as the trunk of a large tree," and its egg is "fifty paces [150 feet] in circumference."

¶ The "rukh" of Madagascar lays an egg equal to 148 hen's eggs.—Comptes Rendus, etc., xxxii. 101 (1851).

Rocco, the jailer sent with Fidelio (Leonora) to dig the grave of Fernando Florestan (q.v.). — Beethoven: Fidelio (1791).

Roch'dale (Sir Simon), of the manor-house. He is a J.P., but refuses to give justice to Job Thornberry the old brazier, who demands that his son Frank Rochdale shall marry Mary [Thornberry], whom he has seduced. At this crisis, Peregrine appears, and tells sir Simon he is the elder brother, and as such is heir to the title and estates.

Frank Rochdale, son of the baronet, who has promised to marry Mary Thornberry, but sir Simon wants him to marry lady Caroline Braymore, who has £4000 a year. Lady Caroline marries the hon. Tom Shuffleton, and Frank makes the best reparation he can by marrying Mary.—Colman: John Bull (1805).

Roche's Bird (Sir Boyle), which was "in two places at the same time." The tale is that sir Boyle Roche said in the House of Commons, "Mr. Speaker, it is impossible I could have been in two places at once, unless I were a bird." This is a quotation from Jevon's play, The Devil of a Wife (seventeenth century).

Wife. I cannot be in two places at once.
Husband (Rowland). Surely no, unless thou wert a bird.

Presuming that the duplicate card is the knave of hearts, you may make a remark on the ubiquitous nature of certain cards, which, like sir Boyle Roche's bird, are in two places at once.—Drawing-room Magic.

Rochecliffe (Dr. Anthony), formerly Joseph Albany, a plotting royalist.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Rochester (The earl of), the favourite of Charles II., introduced in high feather by sir W. Scott in Woodstock, and in Peveril of the Peak in disgrace.

Rochester, to whom Jane Eyre is eventually married.—Charlotte Brontë: Jane Eyre (1847).

Rock (Capt'n), the noted Irish chieftain. Thom. Moore wrote his memoirs (1824).

Rock (Dr. Richard), a famous quack, who professed to cure every disease. He was short of stature and fat, wore a white three-tailed wig, nicely combed and frizzed upon each cheek, carried a cane, and halted in his gait.

Dr. Rock, F.U.N., never wore a hat. . . . He and Dr. Franks were at variance. . . . Rock cautioned the world to beware of bog-trotting quacks, while Franks called his rival "Dumplin' Dick." Head of Confucius, what profanation!—Goldsmith: A Citizen of the World (1759).

Oh! when his nerves had once received a shock,
Sir Isaac Newton might have gone to Rock.
Crabbe: Borough (1810).

Rock Lizards, natives of Gibraltar, born in the town, of British parents

Rocket. He rose like a rocket, and fell like the stick. Thomas Paine said this of Mr. Burke.

Rocnabad, a stream near the city of Schiraz, noted for the purity of its waters.

"I am disgusted with the mountain of the Four Fountains," said the caliph Omar ben Abdal-aziz; "and am resolved to go and drink of the stream of Rocnabad."—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Roderick, the thirty-fourth and last of the Gothic kings of Spain, son of Theod'ofred and Rusilla. Having violated Florinda, daughter of count Julian, he was driven from his throne by the Moors, and assumed the garb of a monk, with the name of "father Maccabee." He was present at the great battle of Covadonga, in which the Moors were cut to pieces, but what became of him afterwards no one knows. His helm, sword, and cuirass were found, so was his steed. Several generations passed away, when, in a hermitage near Viseu, a tomb was discovered, "which bore in ancient characters king Roderick's name;" but imagination must fill up the gap. He is spoken of as most popular.

Time has been
When not a tongue within the Pyrenees
Dared whisper in dispraise of Roderick's name,
Lest, if the conscious air had caught the sound,
The vengeance of the honest multitude
Should fall upon the traitorous head, and brand
For life-long infamy the lying lips.
Southey: Roderick, etc., xv. (1814).

Roderick's Dog was called Theron.
Roderick's Horse was Orel'io.

Roderick (The Vision of don). Roderick, the last of the Gothic kings of Spain, descended into an ancient vault near Toledo. This vault was similar to that in Greece, called the cave of Triphonios, where was an oracle. In the vault Roderick saw a vision of Spanish history from his own reign to the beginning of the nineteenth century. Period I. The invasion of the Moors, with his own defeat and death. Period II. The Augustine age of Spain, and their conquests in the two Indies. Period III. The oppression of Spain by Bonaparte, and its succour by British aid.—Sir W. Scott: The Vision of Don Roderick (1811).

Roderick Dhu, an outlaw and chief of a banditti, which resolved to win back the spoil of the "Saxon spoiler." Fitz-James, a Saxon, met him and knew him not. He asked the Saxon why he was roaming unguarded over the mountains, and Fitz-James replied that he had sworn to combat with Roderick, the rebel, till death laid one of them prostrate. "Have, then, thy wish!" exclaimed the stranger, "for I am Roderick Dhu." As he spoke, the whole place bristled with armed men. Fitz-James stood with his back against a rock, and cried, "Come one, come all; this rock shall fly ere I budge an inch." Sir Roderick, charmed with his daring, waved his hand, and all the band disappeared as mysteriously as they had appeared. Sir Roderick then bade the Saxon fight, "For," said he, "that party will prove victorious which first slays an enemy." "Then," replied Fitz-James, "thy cause is hopeless, for Red Murdock is slain already." They fought, however, and Roderick, being overcome, was made prisoner (canto v.).—Sir W. Scott: The Lady of the Lake (1810).

Roderick Random. (See RANDOM, p. 898.)

Rod'erigo or Roderi'go (3 syl.), a Venetian gentleman in love with Desdemona. When Desdemona eloped with Othello, Roderigo hated the "noble Moor," and Ia'go took advantage of this temper for his own base ends.—Shakespeare: Othello (1611).

Roderigo's suspicious credulity and impatient submission to the cheats which he sees practised on him, and which, by persuasion, he suffers to be repeated, exhibit a strong picture of a weak mind betrayed by unlawful desires to a false friend.—Dr. Johnson.

Rodhaver, the sweetheart of Zal, a Persian. Zal being about to scale her bower, she let down her long tresses to assist him, but Zal managed to fix his crook into a projecting beam, and thus made his way to the lady of his devotion.—Champion: Ferdosi.

Rodilardus, a huge cat, which attacked Panurge, and which he mistook for "a young soft-chinned devil." The word means "gnaw-lard" (Latin, rodere lardum).—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, iv. 67 (1545).

He saw in a fine painting the stories of the most famous cats: as Rodilardus [sic] hung by the heels in a council of rats, puss in boots, the marquis de Carabas, Whittington's cat, the writing cat, the cat turned woman, witches in the shape of cats, and so on.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1682).

("The marquis de Carabas." See PUSS IN BOOTS, p. 884.)

Rodmond, chief mate of the Britannia, son of a Northumbrian engaged in the coal-trade; a hardy, weather-beaten seaman, uneducated, "boisterous of manners," and regardless of truth, but tender-hearted. He was drowned when the ship struck on cape Colonna, the most southern point of Attica.

> Unskilled to argue, in dispute yet loud,
> Bold without caution, without honours proud,
> In art unschooled, each veteran rule he prized,
> And all improvement haughtily despised.
> Falconer: The Shipwreck, i. (1756).

Ro'dogune, Rhodogune, or Rho'dogyne (3 syl.), daughter of Phraa'tês king of Parthia. She married Deme'trius Nica'nor (the husband of Cleopat'ra queen of Syria, q.v.), while in captivity.—Rowe: The Royal Convert (1708).

(P. Corneille has a tragedy on the subject, entitled Rodogune, 1646.)

Rodolfo (Il conte). It is in the bed-chamber of this count that Ami'na is discovered the night before her espousal to Elvino. Ugly suspicion is excited, but the count assures the young farmer that Amina walks in her sleep. While they are talking, Amina is seen to get out of a window and walk along a narrow ledge of the mill-roof while the huge wheel is rapidly revolving. She crosses a crazy bridge, and walks into the very midst of the spectators. In a few minutes she awakes, and flies to the arms of her lover.—Bellini: La Sonnambula (opera, 1831).

Rodomont, king of Sarza or Algiers. He was Ulien's son, and called the "Mars of Africa." His lady-love was Dor'alis princess of Grana'da, but she eloped with Mandricardo king of Tartary. At Rogero's wedding, Rodomont accused him of being a renegade and traitor, whereupon they fought, and Rodomont was slain.—Orlando Innamorato (1495); and Orlando Furioso (1516).

> Who so meek? I'm sure I quake at the very thought of him; why, he's as fierce as Rodomont!—Dryden: Spanish Fryar, v. 2 (1680).

(Rodomontade (4 syl.), from Rodomont, a bragging although a brave knight.)

Rodri'go, king of Spain, conquered by the Moors. He saved his life by flight, and wandered to Guadaletê, where he begged food of a shepherd, and gave him in recompense his royal chain and ring. A hermit bade him, in penance, retire to a certain tomb full of snakes and toads, where, after three days, the hermit found him unhurt; so, going to his cell, he passed the night in prayer. Next morning, Rodrigo cried aloud to the hermit, "They eat me now; I feel the adder's bite." So his sin was atoned for, and he died.

(This Rodrigo is Roderick, the last of the Goths.)

Rodri'go, rival of Pe'dro "the pilgrim," and captain of a band of outlaws.—Fletcher: The Pilgrim (1621).

Rodri'go de Mondragon (Don), a bully and tyrant, the self-constituted arbiter of all disputes in a tennis-court of Valladolid.

> Don Rodrigo de Mondragon was about 30 years of age, of an ordinary make, but lean and muscular; he had two little twinkling eyes, that rolled in his head and threatened everybody he looked at; a very flat nose, placed between red whiskers that curled up to his very temples; and a manner of speaking so rough and passionate that his words struck terror into everybody.—Lesage: Gil Blas, ii. 5 (1715).

Rogel of Greece (The Exploits and Adventures of), part of the series called Le Roman des Romans, pertaining to "Am'adis of Gaul." This part was added by Feliciano de Silva.

Roger, the cook, who "cowde roste, sethe, broille, and frie, make mortreux, and wel bake a pye."—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (1388).

Roger (Sir), curate to "The Scornful Lady" (no name given).—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Scornful Lady (1616).

(Beaumont died 1616.)

Roger Bontemps, the personation of contentment with his station in life, and of the buoyancy of good hope. "There's a good time coming, John."

> Vous pauvres, pleins d'envie;
> Vous rich, désireux;
> Vous dont le char dévie
> Après un cours heureux;
> Vous qui perdrez peut-être
> Des titres éclatans;
> Eh! gai! prenez pour maître
> Le gros Roger Bontemps.
> Béranger (1780–1856).

> Ye poor, with envy goaded;
> Ye rich, for more who long;
> Ye who by fortune loaded
> Find all things going wrong;
> Ye who by some disaster
> See all your cables break;
> From henceforth for your master
> Should Roger Bontemps take.

Roger de Coverley (Sir), an hypothetical baronet of Coverley or Cowley, near Oxford.—Addison: The Spectator (1711, 1712, 1714).

(The prototype of this famous character was sir John Pakington, seventh baronet of the line.)

ROGE'RO, brother of Marphi'sa; brought up by Atlantês a magician. He married Brad'amant, the niece of Charlemagne. Rogero was converted to Christianity, and baptized. His marriage with Bradamant and his election to the crown of Bulgaria, conclude the poem.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Who more brave than Rodomont? who more courteous than Rogero?—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. i. (1605).

Roge'ro, son of Roberto Guiscardo the Norman. Slain by Tisaphernês.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, xx. (1575).

Roge'ro (3 syl.), a gentleman of Sicilia.—Shakespeare: The Winter's Tale (1604).

(This is one of those characters which appear in the dramatis personæ, but are never introduced in the play. Rogero not only does not utter a word, he does not even enter the stage all through the drama. In the Globe edition his name is omitted. See VIOLENTA.)

Rogero, in The Rovers, a tragedy contributed by Canning to the Anti-jacobin Review (1798-1821). It is in ridicule of the German sentimental drama. Rogero sings the famous song of the "U—niversity of Gottingen." When he matriculated, he says—

> There first for thee my passion grew,
> Sweet, sweet Matilda Pottengen;
> Thou wast the daughter of my tutor, law professor of the University of Gottingen.

Roget, the pastoral name of George Wither in the four "eglogues" called The Shepheard's Hunting (1615). The first and last "eglogues" are dialogues between Roget and Willy his young friend; in the second pastoral Cuddy is introduced, and in the third Alexis makes a fourth character. The subject of the first three is the reason of Roget's imprisonment, which, he says, is a hunt that gave great offence. This hunt is in reality a satire called Abuses Stript and Whipt. The fourth pastoral has for its subject Roget's love of poetry.

Roha, the camphor tree. "The juice of the camphor is made to run out from a wound at the top of the tree, and, being received in a vessel, is allowed to harden in the sun.—Arabian Nights ("Sinbad's Second Voyage").

Roi Fainéant ["king of sloth"], Louis XVIII. (1755, 1814-1824).

Rolster Doister (Ralph), a vain, thoughtless, blustering fellow, in pursuit of Custance a rich widow, but baffled in his endeavour.—Udall: Ralph Roister Doister (the first English comedy, 1534).

Rokeby, a poem in six cantos, by sir Walter Scott (1813). The time referred to is immediately subsequent to the battle of Marston Moor, Yorkshire (1644). Rokeby is a mansion near Greta Bridge, in Yorkshire, and the poem abounds in descriptions of the estate.

(The tale is about the love of Wilfrid Wycliffe for Matilda, heiress of the knight of Rokeby.)

Rokesmith (John), alias JOHN HARMON, secretary of Mr. Boffin. He lodged with the Wilfers, and ultimately married Bella Wilfer. John Rokesmith is described as "a dark gentleman, 30 at the utmost, with an expressive, one might say a handsome, face."—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1864).

(For the solution of the mystery, see vol. I. ii. 13.)

Ro'land, count of Mans and knight of Blaives. His mother, Bertha, was Charlemagne's sister. Roland is represented as brave, devotedly loyal, unsuspicious, and somewhat too easily imposed upon. He was eight feet high, and had an open countenance. In Italian romance he is called Orlan'do. He was slain in the valley of Roncesvallês as he was leading the rear of his uncle's army from Spain to France. Charlemagne himself had reached St. Jean Pied de Port at the time, heard the blast of his nephew's horn, and knew it announced treachery, but was unable to render him assistance (A.D. 778).

(Roland is the hero of Théroulde's Chanson de Roland; of Turpin's Chronique; of Bojardo's Orlando Innamorato; of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso; of Piccini's opera called Roland (1778); etc.)

Roland's Horn, Olivant or Olifant. It was won from the giant Jatmund, and might be heard at the distance of thirty miles. Birds fell dead at its blast, and the whole Saracen army drew back in terror when they heard it. So loud it sounded, that the blast reached from Roncesvallês to St. Jean Pied de Port, a distance of several miles.

> Roland lifts Olifant to his mouth, and blows it with all his might. The mountains around are lofty, but high above them the sound of the horn arises (i.e. the third blast it gave [i.e. Roland])—Song of Roland (as sung by Taillefer, at the battle of Hastings). See Warton: History of English Poetry, v. 1, sect. iii. (1781).

Roland's Horse, Veillantif, called in Italian Veglian'tino ("the little vigilant one").

In Italian romance, Orlando has another horse, called Brigliado'ro ("golden bridle").

Roland's Spear. Visitors are shown a spear in the cathedral of Pa'via, which they are told belonged to Roland.

Roland's Sword, Duran'dal, made by the fairies. To prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy when Roland was attacked in the valley of Roncesvallês, he smote a rock with it, and it made in the solid rock a fissure some 300 feet in depth, called to this day La Brèche de Roland.

Then would I seek the Pyrenean breach
Which Roland clove with huge two-handed sway,
And to the enormous labour left his name.
Wordsworth.

 A sword is shown at Rocamadour, in the department of Lot (France), which visitors are assured was Roland's Durandal. But the romances say that Roland, dying, threw his sword into a poisoned stream.

Death of Roland. There is a tradition that Roland escaped the general slaughter in the defile of Roncesvallês, and died of starvation while trying to make his way across the mountains.—John de la Bruiere Champier: De Cibaria, xvi. 5.

Died like Roland, died of thirst.

Nonnulli qui de Gallicis rebus historias conscripserunt, non dubitarunt posteris significare Rolandum Caroli filium, magnal sororis filium, virum certe bellica gloria omnique fortitudine nobillissimum, post ingentem Hispanorum caedem propa Pyrenaei saltus Jugs, ubi insidiis ab hoste collocatis fuerint, siti miserrime extinctum. Inde nostri intolerabili siti et immiti volentes significare se torqueri, facete aiunt "Rolandi morte se perire."—Champier: De Cibaria, xvi. 5.

Roland (The Roman). Sicinius Dentatus is so called by Niebuhr. He is not unfrequently called "The Roman Achillês" (put to death B.C. 450).

Roland and Oliver, the two most famous of the twelve paladins of Charlemagne. To give a "Roland for an Oliver" is to give tit for tat, as good as you received.

Froissart, a countryman of ours (the French), records,

Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act I. sc. 2 (1589).

Och! Mrs. Mustardpot, have you found a Rowland for your Oliver at last?—T. Knight.

Roland de Vaux (Sir), baron of Triermain, who wakes Gyneth from her long sleep of 500 years, and marries her.—Sir W. Scott: Bridal of Triermain (1813).

Rolando (Signor), a common railer against women, but brave, of a "happy wit and independent spirit." Rolando swore to marry no woman, but fell in love with Zam'ora, and married her, declaring "she was no woman but an angel."—Tobin: The Honeymoon (1804).

(The resemblance between Rolando and Benedick will instantly occur to the mind.)

Rolandseck Tower, opposite the Drachenfels. Roland was engaged to Aude, daughter of sir Gerard and lady Guibourg; but the lady, being told that Roland had been slain by Angoulaffre the Saracen, retired to a convent. The paladin returned home full of glory, having slain the Saracen. When he heard that his lady-love had taken the veil, he built Rolandseck Castle, which overlooks the convent, that he might at least see the lady to whom he could never be united. After the death of Aude, Roland "sought the battle-field again, and fell at Roncevall."—Campbell: The Brave Roland.

Roldan, "El encantado," Roldan made invulnerable by enchantment. The cleft "Roldan," in the summit of a high mountain in the kingdom of Valencia, was so called because it was made by a single back-stroke of Roldan's sword. The character is in two Spanish romances, authors unknown—Bernardo del Carpio and Roncesvallès.

This book [Rinaldo de Montalban], and all others written on French matters, shall be deposited in some dry place . . . except one called Bernardo del Carpio, and another called Roncivalles, which shall certainly accompany the rest on the bonfire.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. i. 6 (1605).

Rolla, kinsman of the inca Atali'ba, and the idol of the army. "In war a tiger chafed by the hunters' spears; in peace more gentle than the unweaned lamb" (act i. 1). A firm friend and most generous foe. Rolla is wounded in his attempt to rescue the infant child of Alonzo from the Spaniards, and dies. His grand funeral procession terminates the drama.—Sheridan: Pizarro (altered from Kotzbue, 1799).

John Kemble and two friends were returning to town in an open carriage from lord Abercorn's, and came to a toll-bar. As the toll-keeper and his daughter were fumbling for change, Kemble cried out, in the words of Rolla to the army, "We seek no change, and least of all such change as they would bring us" (act ii. 2).—Rogers: Table Talk (1856).

Rolliad (The), a series of political satires, the first of which was devoted to colonel (lord) Rollo (1784). Others satirized the poet Tickell, George Ellis, general Burgoyne, Brummel, Boscawen, the bishop of Ossory, and so on.

Rollo, duke of Normandy, called "The Bloody Brother." He caused the death of his brother Otto, and slew several others, some out of mere wantonness.—Fletcher: The Bloody Brother (1639).

Roman (The), Jean Dumont, the French painter, Le Romain (1700–1781).

Stephen Picart, the French engraver, Le Romain (1631–1721).

Giulio Pippi, called Giulio Romano (1492–1546).

Adrian van Roomen, mathematician, Andriānus Romānus (1561–1615).

Roman Achillēs, Sicinius Dentātus (slain B.C. 450).

Roman Bird (The), the eagle, the distinctive ensign of the Roman legion.

Roman Brevity. Cæsar imitated laconic brevity when he announced to Amintius his victory at Zela, in Asia Minor, over Pharnacēs, son of Mithridatēs: Veni, vidi, vici.

Poins. I will imitate the honourable Roman in brevity.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 2 (1598).

¶ Sir Charles Napier is credited with a far more laconic despatch on making himself master of Scinde in 1843. Taking possession of Hyderabad, and outflanking Shere Mohammed by a series of most brilliant manœuvres, he is said to have written home this punning despatch: Peccāvi ("I have sinned" [Scinde]).

Roman Daughter (The). Valerius Maximus (v. 4) tells us of a young Roman lady who nourished her mother in prison, as the Grecian daughter (q.v.) nourished her father. The mother was under sentence of death, but the jailer deferred the execution, and allowed the daughter to visit her, but searched her to see that she carried no food into the prison. (Pliny, in his Natural History, vii. 36, repeats the story. Festus changes the mother into the father.)

Roman Father (The), Horatius, father of the Horatii and of Horatia. The story of the tragedy is the well-known Roman legend about the Horatii and Curiatii. Horatius rejoices that his three sons have been selected to represent Rome, and sinks the affection of the father in love for his country. Horatia is the betrothed of Caius Curiatius, but is also beloved by Valerius, and when the Curiatii are selected to oppose her three brothers, she sends Valerius to him with a scarf to induce him to forego the fight. Caius declines, and is slain. Horatia is distracted; they take from her every instrument of death, and therefore she resolves to provoke her surviving brother, Publius, to kill her. Meeting him in his triumph, she rebukes him for murdering her lover, scoffs at his "patriotism," and Publius kills her. Horatius now resigns Publius to execution for murder, but the king and Roman people rescue him.—Whitehead (1741).

(Corneille has a drama on the same subject, called Horace (1639), the basis of Whitehead's tragedy.)

Roman des Romans (Le), a series of prose romances connected with Am'adis of Gaul. So called by Gilbert Saunier.

Romans (Last of the), Rienzi the tribune (1310–1354).

Charles James Fox (1749–1806).

Horace Walpole, Ultimus Romanorum (1717–1797).

Caius Cassius was so called by Brutus.

The last of all the Romans, fare thee well!
It is impossible that ever Rome
Should breed thy fellow.
Shakespeare: Julius Cæsar, act v. sc. 3 (1607).

Romans (Most Learned of the), Marcus Terentius Varro (B.C. 116–28).

Romance of the Forest (The), the best of Mrs. Radcliffe's tales (1791).

Romance of the Rose, a poetical allegory, begun by Guillaume di Lorris in the latter part of the thirteenth century, and continued by Jean de Meung in the former half of the fourteenth century. The poet dreams that Dame Idleness conducts him to the palace of Pleasure, where he meets Love, whose attendant maidens are Sweet-looks, Courtesy, Youth, Joy, and Competence, by whom he is conducted to a bed of roses. He singles out one, when an arrow from Love's bow stretches him fainting on the ground, and he is carried off. When he comes to himself, he resolves, if possible, to find his rose, and Welcome promises to aid him; Shyness, Fear, and Slander obstruct him, and Reason advises him to give up the quest. Pity and Kindness show him the object of his search; but Jealousy seizes Welcome, and locks her in Fear-Castle. Here the original poem ends. The sequel, somewhat longer than the twenty-four books of Homer's Iliad, takes up the tale from this point.

Roma'no, the old monk who took pity on Roderick in his flight (viii.), and went with him for refuge to a small hermitage on the sea-coast, where they remained for twelve months, when the old monk died.—Southey: Roderick, the Last of the Goths, i., ii. (1814).

Rome Does (Do as). The saying originated with St. Ambrose (fourth century). It arose from the following diversity in the observance of Saturday: The Milanese make it a feast, the Romans a fast. St. Ambrose, being asked what should be done in such a case, replied, "In matters of indifference, it is better to be guided by the general usage. When I am at Milan, I do not fast on Saturdays, but when I am at Rome, I do as they do at Rome."

Rome of the North. Cologne was so called (says Hope) in the Middle Ages, from its wealth, power, and ecclesiastical foundations.

Rome Saved by Geese. When the Gauls invaded Rome, a detachment in single file scaled the hill on which the capitol stood, so silently that the foremost man reached the summit without being challenged; but while striding over the rampart, some sacred geese were disturbed, and by their cackle aroused the guard. Marcus Manlius rushed to the wall, and hustled the Gaul over, thus saving the capitol.

¶ A somewhat parallel case occurred in Ireland in the battle of Glinsaly, in Donegal. A party of the Irish would have surprised the protestants if some wrens had not disturbed the guards by the noise they made in bopping about the drums and pecking on the parchment heads.—Aubrey: Miscellanies, 45.

Ro'meo, a son of Mon'tague (3 syl.), in love with Juliet the daughter of Cap'ulet; but between the houses of Montague and Capulet there existed a deadly feud. As the families were irreconcilable, Juliet took a sleeping draught, that she might get away from her parents and elope with Romeo. Romeo, thinking her to be dead, killed himself; and when Juliet awoke and found her lover dead, she also killed herself.—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet (1598).

(Fox said that Barry's "Romeo" was superior to Garrick's (S. Rogers, Table Talk). Fitzgerald says that Barry was the superior in the garden-scenes and in the first part of the tomb, but Garrick in the scene with the "friar" and in the dying part.)

Romeo and Juliet, a tragedy by Shakespeare (1598). The tale is taken from Rhomeo and Julietta, a novel by Boisteau in French, borrowed from an Italian story by Bandelio (1554).

 In 1562 Arthur Brooke produced the same tale in verse, called The Tragicall History of Romeus and Juliet. In 1567 Painter published a prose translation of Boisteau's novel.

Rominagrobis, used in French for a "cat." Rabelais tells us that Panurge applied to Rominagrobis to tell him whether he should marry or let it alone, but received no answer. (Probably professors wore cats' fur, as we use rabbits' fur in our universities, instead of ermine.) Our word "cat-gut," which is no part of a cat, shows that the word was very loosely used. Similarly, "puss" means a cat, hare, or rabbit. Thus in the Hare and the Tortoise we have the line, "Poor Puss [Hare], what a lesson you've taught men!"

Romola, a novel of Italian life by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross, 1863). (1858–1861). Romola, the heroine, marries Tito Mel'ema, a Greek.

Romp (The), a comic opera altered from Bickerstaff's Love in the City. Priscilla Tomboy is "the romp," and the plot is given under that name.

A splendid portrait of Mrs. Jordan, in her character of "The Romp," hung over the mantelpiece in the dining-room [of Adolphus Fitzclarence].—Lord W. Lennox: Celebrities, etc., i. 11.

Rom'uald (St.). The Catalans had a great reverence for a hermit so called, and, hearing that he was about to quit their country, called together a parish meeting, to consult how they might best retain him amongst them, "For," said they, "he will certainly be consecrated, and his relics will bring a fortune to us." So they agreed to strangle him; but their intention being told to the hermit, he secretly made his escape.—St. Foix: Essais Historiques sur Paris, v. 163.

(Southey has a ballad on the subject.)

Romulus (The Second and Third), Camillus and Marius. Also called "The Second and Third Founders of Rome."

Romulus and Remus, the twin sons of Silvia a vestal virgin and the god Mars. The infants were exposed in a cradle, and the floods carried the cradle to the foot of the Palatine. Here a wolf suckled them, till one Faustŭlus, the king's shepherd, took them to his wife, who brought them up. When grown to manhood, they slew Amulius, who had caused them to be exposed.

¶ The Greek legend of Tyro is in many respects similar. This Tyro had an amour with Poseidon (as Silvia had with Mars), and two sons were born in both cases. Tyro's mother-in-law confined her in a dungeon, and exposed the two infants (Pelias and Neleus) in a boat on the river Enipeus (3 syl.). Here they were discovered and brought up by a herdsman (Romulus and Remus were brought up by a shepherd), and when grown to manhood, they put to death their mother-in-law, who had caused them to be exposed (as Romulus and Remus put to death their great-uncle Amulius).

Ron, the ebony spear of prince Arthur.

> The temper of his sword, the tried Excalibor,
> The bigness and the length of Rone his noble speare,
> With Pridwin his great shield.
> Drayton: Polyolbion xv. (1612).

Ronald (Lord), in love with lady Clare, to whom he gave a lily-white doe. The day before the wedding, nurse Alice told lady Clare she was not "lady Clare" at all, but her own child. On hearing this, she dressed herself as a peasant girl, and went to lord Ronald to release him from his engagement. Lord Ronald replied, "If you are not the heiress born, we will be married to-morrow, and you shall still be lady Clare."—Tennyson: Lady Clare.

Roncesvallês (4 syl.), a defile in the Pyrenees, famous for the disaster which befell Roland and his army.

> Oh for a blast of that dread horn
> On Fontarabian echoes borne . . .
> When Roland brave and Oliver . . .
> On Roncesvallês died.
> Scott: Marmion.

(Sometimes the word has only 3 syl., as Ron-ce-valles or Ron-ce-val.)

> Ed Oliver des Vassals
> Ki morurent en Ronchevals.
> Lorris: Roman de la Rou, ll. i. 13, 191 (thirteenth century).
> And the dead who, deathless all,
> Fell at famous Roncĕval.

Rondibilis, the physician consulted by Panurge on the knotty question, "whether he ought to marry, or let it alone."—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel (1545).

N.B.—This question, which Panurge was perpetually asking every one, of course refers to the celibacy of the clergy.

Rondo (The Father of the), Jean Baptiste Davaux.

Rooden Lane. All on one side, like Rooden Lane. The village of Rooden or Roden, in Lancashire, is built all on one side of the road, the other side being the high wall of Heaton Park, the residence of the earl of Wilton. (See TAKELEY STREET.)

Rope of Ocnus (A), profitless labour. Ocnus was always twisting a rope with unwearied diligence, but an ass ate it as fast as it was twisted.

(This allegory means that Ocnus worked hard to earn money, which his wife squandered by her extravagance.)

¶ The work of Penelopê's web was "never ending, still beginning," because Penelopê pulled out at night all that she had spun during the day. Her object was to defer doing what she abhorred but knew not how to avoid.

Rope-dancer (The), Yvo de Grentmesnil, the crusader, one of the leaders of Robert duke of Normandy's party against Henry I. of England. Yvo was one of those who escaped from Antioch when it was besieged. He was let down over the wall by a rope, and to this the sobriquet refers.

Rope-maker (The Beautiful), a soubriquet of Louise Labé (1526–1565), a poetess who wrote in three languages, and who was distinguished for her courage at the siege of Perpignan.

Rope-Walk (Gone into the), taken up Old Bailey practice. The "rope" refers to the hangman's cord. — Barristers' Slang.

Roper (Margaret) was buried with the head of her father, sir Thomas More, between her hands.

> Her, who clasped in her last trance
> Her murdered father's head.
> Tennyson.

Roque (1 syl.), a blunt, kind-hearted old servitor to donna Floranthê.—Colman: The Mountaineers (1793).

Roque Guinart, a freebooter, whose real name was Pedro Rocha Guinarda. He is introduced by Cervantês in Don Quixote.

Rory O'More (1 syl.), a novel by Lover (1836). It was dramatized. Lover wrote a ballad on the same subject.

Rory o' the Hill, the signature adopted in 1880 by the writer of threatening letters to Irish landlords, to those who paid their rents, to those who occupied the farms of ejected tenants, etc. These letters were written under the authority of the "Irish Land League."

(Like the Fenians, the Land Leaguers wanted to sever Ireland from the British crown.)

Rosa, a village beauty, patronized by lady Dedlock. She marries Mrs. Rouncewell's grandson.—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Rosabelle (3 syl.), the lady's-maid of lady Geraldine. Rosabelle promised to marry L'Eclair, the orderly of chevalier Florian.—Dimond: The Foundling of the Forest.

Rosalind (i.e. Rose Daniel), the shepherd lass who rejected Colin Clout (the poet Spenser) for Menalcas (John Florio the lexicographer) (1579). Spenser was at the time in his twenty-sixth year. Being rejected by Rosalind, he did not marry till he was nearly 41, and then we are told that Elisabeth was "the name of his mother, queen, and wife" (Sonnet, 74). In the Faërie Queene, "the country lass" (Rosalind) is introduced dancing with the Graces, and the poet says she is worthy to be the fourth (bk. vi. 10, 16). In 1595 appeared the Epithala'mion, in which the recent marriage is celebrated.—Spenser: Shepheardes Calendar, i., vi. (1579).

N.B.—"Rosalinde" is an anagram for Rose Daniel, evidently a well-educated young lady of the north, and probably the "lady Mirabella" of the Faërie Queene, vi. 7. 8. Spenser calls her "the widow's daughter of the glen" (ecl. iv.), supposed to be either Burnley or Colne, near Hurstwood, in Yorkshire. Ecl. i. is the plaint of Colin for the loss of Rosalind. Ecl. vi. is a dialogue between Colin and Hobbinol his friend, in which Colin laments, and Hobbinol tries to comfort him. Ecl. xii. is a similar lament to ecl. i. Rose Daniel married John Florio the lexicographer, the "Holofernês" of Shakespeare.

Ros'alind, daughter of the banished duke who went to live in the forest of Arden. Rosalind was retained in her uncle's court as the companion of his daughter Celia; but when the usurper banished her, Celia resolved to be her companion, and for greater security Rosalind dressed as a boy, and assumed the name of Ganimed, while Celia dressed as a peasant girl, and assumed the name of Aliena. The two girls went to the forest of Arden, and lodged for a time in a hut; but they had not been long there when Orlando encountered them. Orlando and Rosalind had met before at a wrestling match, and the acquaintance was now renewed; Ganimed resumed her proper apparel, and the two were married with the sanction of the duke.—Shakespeare: As You Like It (1598).

Nor shall the griefs of Lear be alleviated, or the charms and wit of Rosalind be abated by time.—Drake: Shakespeare and His Times, ii. 554 (1817).

Rosaline, the niece of Capulet, with whom Romeo was in love before he saw Juliet. Mercutio calls her "a pale-hearted wench," and Romeo says she did not "grace for grace and love for love allow," like Juliet.—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet (1598).

(Rosaline is frequently mentioned in the first act of the play, but is not one of the dramatis personæ.)

Rosaline, a lady in attendance on the princess of France. A sharp wit was wedded to her will, and "two pitch balls were stuck in her face for eyes." Rosaline is called "a merry, nimble, stirring spirit." Biron, a lord in attendance on Ferdinand king of Navarre proposes marriage to her, but she replies—

You must be purged first, your sins are racked . . .
Therefore if you my favour mean to get,
A twelvemonth shall you spend, and never rest,
But seek the weary beds of people sick.
Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost (1594).

Rosalu'ra, the airy daughter of Nantolet, beloved by Belleur.—Fletcher: The Wild-goose Chase (1652).

Ros'amond (The Fair), Jane Clifford, daughter of Walter lord Clifford. The lady was loved not wisely but too well by Henry II., who kept her for concealment in a labyrinth at Woodstock. Queen Eleanor compelled the frail fair one to swallow poison (1177).

She was the fayre daughter of Walter lord Clifford . . Henry made for her a house of wonderfull working, so that no man or woman might come to her. This house was named "Labyrinthus," and was wrought like unto a knot, in a garden called a maze. But the queen came to her by a clue of thredde, and so dealt with her that she lived not long after. She was buried at Godstow, in a house of nunnes, with these verses upon her tombe—

Hic jacet in tumba Rosa mundi, non Rosa munda;
Non redolet, sed olet, quæ redolere solet.

Here Rose the graced, not Rose the chaste, reposes;
The smell that rises to me smelt of roses.
E. C. B.

N.B.—The subject has been a great favourite with poets. We have—

In English: (1) The tragedies of—
Bancroft or Mountford, 1693 (Henry II. . . . with the Death of Rosamond).
Daniel, before 1619 (The Complaint of Rosamond).
Hawkins, 1749 (Henry and Rosamond).
Korner, 1812 (Rosamond the Fair).

Swinburne, 1861 (Rosamond).
Tennyson, 1879 (Fair Rosamond).
(2) The operas of—
Addison, 1706; Dr. Arne, 1733; and Barnett (Rosamond the Fair), 1836.
(3) A ballad by Thomas Deloney, 1612.
(4) A poem (The Complaint of Rosamond) by S. Daniel, 1594. He supposes that the frail fair one tells her pitiful story from the lower world.
In Italian: Rosmonda, 1526, by Rucellai.
In Spanish: Rosmunda (an opera), 1840, by Gil y Zarate.
In French: Rosamondo (a poem) by C. Briffaut, 1815.
(Sir Walter Scott has introduced the beautiful soiled dove in two of his novels, viz. The Talisman and Woodstock.)
Dryden says her name was Jane—

Jane Clifford was her name, as books aver;
"Fair Rosamond" was but her nom de guerre.

We rede that in Englande was a king that had a concubyne whose name was Rose, and for hir greate bewtye he cleped hir Rose à mounde (Rosa mundi), that is to say, Rose of the world, for him thought that she passed al wymen in bewtye.—R. Fynson (1493), subsequently printed by Wynken de Worde in 1496.

N.B.—The Rosemonde of Alfieri is quite another person. (See ROSEMOND.)

Rosamond Vincy, in Middlemarch, a novel by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross), who is eventually married to Lydgate, the young doctor (1872).

Rosa'na, daughter of the Armenian queen, who helped St. George to quench the seven lamps of the knight of the Black Castle.—R. Johnson: The Seven Champions of Christendom, ii. 8, 9 (1617).

Rosciad (The), a poetical satire in heroic rhymes, by Churchill (1761).

Roscius (Quintus), the greatest of Roman actors (died B.C. 62).

What scene of death hath Roscius now to act?
Shakespeare: 3 Henry VI. act v. sc. 6 (1590).

The British Roscius, Thomas Betterton (1635–1710), and David Garrick (1716–1779).

The earl of Southampton says that Richard Burbage "is famous as our English Roscius" (1566–1619).

The Irish Roscius, Spranger Barry, "The Silver-Tongued" (1719–1777).
The Young Roscius, William Henry West Betty, who in 1803 made his début in London. He was about 12 years of age, and in fifty-six nights realized £34,000. He died, aged 84, in 1874.
The Roscius of France, Michel Boyron or Baron (1653–1729).

Roscrana, daughter of Cormac king of Ireland (grandfather of that Cormac murdered by Cairbar). Roscra'na is called "the blue-eyed and white-handed maid," and was "like a spirit of heaven, half folded in the skirt of a cloud." Subsequently she was the wife of Fingal king of Morven, and mother of Ossian "king of bards."—Ossian: Temora, vi.
N.B.—Cormac, the father of Roscrana, was great-grandfather of that Cormac who was reigning when Swaran made his invasion. The line ran thus: (1) Cormac I., (2) Cairbre his son, (3) Artho his son, (4) Cormac II. father-in-law of Fingal.

ROSE [MAYLIE], the adopted daughter of Mrs. Maylie of Chertsey mansion, which was broken into by Bill Sykes. Rose, at the time, was only 17 years of age. "Cast in so slight and exquisite a mould, so gentle and so mild, so pure and beautiful, that earth seemed not her element." She was intensely loved by Mrs. Maylie's son Henry; but she rejected his proposal till the mystery of her birth was cleared up. It turned out that her name was Rose Fleming, and she was Oliver Twist's aunt. Henry Maylie took orders, retired to a country living, and Rose became his model wife.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1838).

Rose, "the gardener's daughter," a story of happy first love, told in later years by an old man who had, in his younger days, trifled with the passion of love; but, like St. Augustin, was always "loving to love" (amans amare), and was at length heart-smitten with Rose, whom he married. (See ALICE, p. 25.)—Tennyson: The Gardener's Daughter.

Rose (Origin of the). (1) Sir John Mandeville says that a Jewish maid of Bethlehem (whom Southey names Zillah) was beloved by one Ham'uel a brutish sot. Zillah rejected his suit, and Hamuel, in revenge, accused the maiden of offences for which she was condemned to be burned alive. When brought to the stake, the flames burnt Hamuel to a cinder, but did no harm to Zillah. There she stood, in a garden of roses, for the brands which had been kindled became red roses, and those which had not caught fire became white ones. These are the first roses that ever bloomed on earth since the loss of paradise.

As the fyre began to brenne about hire, she made her preyeres to oure Lord . . . and anon was the fayer quenched and oute, and brondes that weren brennynge becomen white roseres . . . and these weren the first roseres that ever any man saughe.—Sir J. Maundeville: Voiage and Travaile.

(2) According to Mussulman tradition, the rose is thus accounted for: When Mahomet took his journey to heaven, the sweat which fell on the earth from the prophet's forehead produced white roses, and that which fell from Al Borak' (the animal he rode) produced yellow ones.

(3) A Roman legend attributes it to the blood of Venus, wounded by the dart of Cupid.

(4) A Moslem tradition attributes it to he sweat of Mahomet. (See above.)

(5) Christian tradition attributes it to the blood of the first martyr.

(6) An unauthorized legend is that when the Flood ceased, Love threw to earth a flower to show Noah that the righteous wrath of God had passed away. That flower took root and became a rose, and ever since the rose has been made the emblem of enduring love.

The waters ceased, and Love threw down a flower,
To show the wrath hath passed of God above;
The rose took root, and ever from that hour
Hath been the emblem of abiding love.
E. C. B.

Rose. On mount Cal'asay (the Indian Olympus) is a table on which lies a silver rose that contains two women, as bright and fair as pearls; one is called Brigas'iri ("lady of the mouth"), and the other Taras'iri ("lady of the tongue"), because they praise God without ceasing. In the centre of the rose is the triangle or residence of God.—Baldæus.

And when the bell hath sounded,
The Rose with all the mysteries it surrounded,
The Bell, the Table, and mount Calasay,
The holy hill itself with all thereon . . .
Dissolves away.
Southey: Curse of Kehama, xix. 11 (1809).

Rose (Couleur de), an exaggerated notion of the excellence or goodness of something, produced by hope, love, or some other favourable influence. Love, for example, sees the object beloved through a medium of heart-joy, which casts a halo round it, and invests it with a roseate hue, as if seen through glass tinted with rose-pink. Hence the lover says of Maud—

Rosy is the west, rosy is the south;
Roses are her cheeks, and a rose her mouth.
Tennyson: Maud, I. xvii. (1855).

Rose Dartle, in David Copperfield, a novel by Dickens (1849).

Rose Mackenzie, the first wife of Clive Newcome, and daughter of "The Old Campaigner," i.e. Mrs. Mackenzie. —Thackeray: The Newcomes (1855).

Rose of Arragon (The), a drama by S. Knowles (1842). The rose is Olivia, daughter of Ruphi'no (a peasant), married to prince Alonzo of Aragon. The king would not recognize the match, but sent his son to the army, and made the cortez pass an act of divorce. A revolt having been organized, the king was dethroned, and Almagro was made regent. Almagro tried to marry Olivia, and to murder her father and brother; but the prince, returning with the army, made himself master of the city, Almagro died of poison, the marriage of the prince and peasant was recognized, the revolt was broken up, and order was restored.

Rose of Har'pocrate (3 syl.). Cupid gave Harpocrate a rose, to bribe him not to divulge the amours of his mother Venus.

Red as a rose of Harpocrate.
Mrs. Browning: Isobel's Child, iii.

Rose of Paradise. The roses which grew in paradise had no thorns. "Thorns and thistles" were unknown on earth till after the Fall (Gen. iii. 18). Both St. Ambrose and St. Basil note that the roses in Eden had no thorns, and Milton says, in Eden bloomed "Flowers of all hue, and without thorn the rose."—Paradise Lost, iv. 256 (1665).

Rose of Raby, the mother of Richard III. This was Cecily, daughter of Ralph de Nevill of Raby, first earl of Westmoreland. Her husband was Richard duke of York, who was slain at the battle of Wakefield, in 1460. She died 1495.

Rose of York, the heir and head of the York faction.

When Warwick perished, Edmond de la Pole became the Rose of York, and if this foolish prince should be removed by death . . . his young and clever brother [Richard] would be raised to the rank of Rose of York.—W. Hepworth Dixon: Two Queens.

Roses (War of the). The origin of this expression is thus given by Shakespeare—

Plant. Let him that is a true-born gentleman . . .
If he supposes that I have pleaded truth,
From off this briar pluck a white rose with me.
Somerset. Let him that is no coward, nor no flatterer,
But dare maintain the party of the truth,
Pluck a red rose from off this thorn with me.

Whereupon Warwick plucked a white rose and joined the Yorkists, while Suffolk plucked a red one and joined the Lancastrians.—Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act ii. sc. 4 (1589).

Rosemond, daughter of Cunimond king of the Gepidæ. She was compelled to marry Alboin king of the Lombards, who put her father to death A.D. 567.

Alboin compelled her to drink from the skull of her own father, and Rosemond induced Peride'us (the secretary of Helmichild her lover) to murder the wretch (573). She then married Helmichild, fled to Ravenna, and sought to poison her second husband, that she might marry Longin the exarch; but Helmichild, apprised of her intention, forced her to drink the mixture she had prepared for him. This lady is the heroine of Alfieri's tragedy called Rosemonde (1749–1803). (See ROSAMOND.)

Ro'sencrants, a courtier in the court of Denmark, willing to sell or betray his friend and schoolfellow, prince Hamlet, to please a king.—Shakespeare: Hamlet (1596).

Rosetta, the wicked sister of Brunetta and Blon'dina, the mothers of Chery and Fairstar. She abetted the queen-mother in her wicked designs against the offspring of her two sisters, but, being found out, was imprisoned for life.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy. Fairy Tales ("Princess Fairstar," 1682).

Rosetta, a bright, laughing little coquette, who runs away from home because her father wants her to marry young Meadows whom she has never seen. She enters the service of justice Woodcock. Now, it so happens that sir William Meadows wishes his son to marry Rosetta, whom he has never seen, and he also runs away from home, and under the name of Thomas becomes gardener to justice Woodcock. Rosetta and young Meadows here fall in love with each other, and the wishes of the two fathers are accomplished.—Bickerstaff: Love in a Village (1763).

In 1786 Mrs. Billington made her début in "Rosetta, at once dazzling the town with the brilliancy of her vocalization and the flush of her beauty.—Leslie.

Rosetta [Belmont], daughter of sir Robert Belmont. Rosetta is high spirited, witty, confident, and of good spirits. "If you told her a merry story, she would sigh; if a mournful one, she would laugh. For yes she would say 'no,' and for no, 'yes.'" She is in love with colonel Raymond, but shows her love by teasing him, and colonel Raymond is afraid of the capricious beauty.—E. Moore: The Foundling (1748).

Rosiclear and Donsel del Phebo, the heroine and hero of the Mirror of Knighthood, a mediæval romance.

Rosinan'te (4 syl.), the steed of don Quixote. The name implies "that the horse had risen from a mean condition to the highest honour a steed could achieve, for it was once a cart-horse, and rose to become the charger of a knight-errant."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. ii. 1 (1605).

Rosinante was admirably drawn, so lean, lank, meagre, drooping, sharp-backed, and raw-boned, as to excite much curiosity and mirth.—Pt. I. ii. 1.

Rosiphele (3 syl.), princess of Armenia; of surpassing beauty, but insensible to love. She is made to submit to the yoke of Cupid by a vision which befell her on a May-day ramble.—Gower: Confessio Amantis (1393).

Rosmonda, a tragedy in Italian, by John R. Rucellai (1525). This is one of the first regular tragedies of modern times. Sophonisba, by Trissino, preceded it, being produced in 1514 and performed in 1515.

Rosny (Sabina), the young wife of lord Sensitive. "Of noble parents, who perished under the axe in France." The young orphan, "as much to be admired for her virtues as to be pitied for her misfortunes," fled to Padua, where she met lord Sensitive.—Cumberland: First Love (1796).

Ross, a Scotch nobleman who tells Macduff that his castle has been besieged, and his wife and children savagely murdered by Macbeth.—Shakespeare: Macbeth (1606).

Ross (Lord), an officer in the king's army under the duke of Monmouth.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Ross (The Man of), John Kyrle of Whitehouse, in Gloucestershire. So called because he resided in the village of Ross, Herefordshire. Kyrle was a man of unbounded benevolence, and beloved by all who knew him.

(Pope celebrates him in his Moral Essays, iii., 1709.)

Rosse (2 syl.), the sword which the dwarf Elberich gave to Otwit king of Lombardy. It was so keen that it left no gap where it cut.

¶ Balmung, the sword forged by Wieland and given to Siegfried, was so keen that it clove Amilias in two without his knowing it; but when he attempted to move he fell asunder.

This sword to thee I give; it is all bright of hue,
Whatever it may cleave no gap will there ensue.
From Almari I brought it, and Rosse is its name.
The Nibelungenlied.

Rostocostojambedanesse (M. N.), author of After Beef, Mustard.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, ii. 7 (1533).

Rothmar, chief of Tromlo. He attacked the vassal kingdom of Croma while the under-king Crothar was blind with age, resolving to annex it to his own dominion. Crothar's son, Fovar-Gormo, attacked the invader, but was defeated and slain. Not many days after, Ossian (one of the sons of Fingal) arrived with succours, renewed the battle, defeated the victorious army, and slew the invader. —Ossian: Croma.

Rothsay (The duke of), prince Robert, eldest son of Robert III. of Scotland.

Margaret duchess of Rothsay.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Rou (The Roman de), a metrical and mythical history, in Norman-French, of the dukes of Normandy from Rollo downwards, by Robert Wace (author of Le Brut).

(Rou', that is, Roul, the same as Rollo.)

Roubigné (Julie de), the heroine and title of a novel by Henry Mackenzie (1783).

Rougedragon (Lady Rachel), the former guardian of Lilias Redgauntlet.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Rouncewell (Mrs.), housekeeper at Chesney Wold to lord and lady Dedlock, to whom she is most faithfully attached. —Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Round Table (The), a table made at Carduel by Merlin for Uther the pendragon. Uther gave it to king Leodegraunce of Camelyard, and when Arthur married Guinever (the daughter of Leodegraunce) he received the table with a hundred knights as a wedding present (pt. i. 45). The table would seat 150 knights (pt. iii. 36), and each seat was appropriated. One of them was called the "Siege Perilous," because it was fatal for any one to sit therein except the knight who was destined to achieve the holy graal (pt. iii. 32). King Arthur instituted an order of knighthood called "the knights of the Round Table," the chief of whom were sir Launcelot, sir Tristram, and sir Lamerock or Lamorake. The "Siege Perilous" was reserved for sir Galahad, the son of sir Launcelot by Elaine.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur (1470).

N.B.—There is a table shown at Winchester as "Arthur's Round Table," but it corresponds in no respect with the Round Table described in the History of Prince Arthur. Round tables were not unusual, as Dr. Percy has shown, with other kings in the times of chivalry. Thus, the king of Ireland, father of Christabelle, had his "knights of the Round Table." (See "Sir Cauline," in Percy's Reliques.)

¶ In the eighth year of Edward I., Roger de Mortimer established at Kenilworth a Round Table for "the encouragement of military pastimes." Some seventy years later, Edward III. had his Round Table at Windsor; it was 200 feet in diameter!!

Round Table (The), 52 essays, 12 by Hunt and the rest by Hazlitt (1778–1830). The original design was to obtain essays from several contributors.

Harcourt's Round Table, a private political conference in the house of sir William Harcourt (January 14, 1887). Its object was, if possible, to reunite the radical party broken up by Mr. Gladstone's "Home Rule Bill."

This sense of "Round Table" is American, and is about equal to the French cercle, a club held at the private house of one of the members.

Roundabout Papers (The), a series of essays by Thackeray, contributed to the Cornhill Magazine.

Rousseau (Jean Jacques) used to say that all fables which ascribe speech and reason to dumb animals ought to be withheld from children, as being only vehicles of deception.

> I shall not ask Jean Jacques Rousseau
> If birds confabulate or no;
> 'Tis clear that they were always able
> To hold discourse—at least in fable.
> Cowper: Pairing Time Anticipated (1780).

In the eighteenth century, Jean Jacques Rousseau was often referred to by the initials J. J.

Roustam or Rostam, the Persian Hercules. He was the son of Zal, and a descendant of Djamshid. At one time Roustan killed 1000 Tartars at a blow; he slew dragons, overcame devils, captured cities, and performed other marvellous exploits. This mighty man of strength fell into disgrace for refusing to receive the doctrines of Zoroaster, and died by the hand of one of his brothers named Scheghad (sixth century B.C.).

(See RUSTAM, p. 942.)

Rover (The), Willmore, a dissolute young spark, who thinks vice "is naughty but yet nice." The hero of O'Keefe's comedy called Wild Oats (1798).

(Mrs. Behn has a comedy called The Rover, pt. i., 1677; pt. ii., 1681.)

William Mountford [1660–1692] had so much in him of the agreeable, that when he played "The Rover," it was remarked by many, and particularly by queen Mary, that it was dangerous to see him act—he made vice so alluring.—Dibdin: History of the Stage.

Rovers (The), a satirical tragedy by George Canning, designed to ridicule the German drama of the time, and published in the Anti-jacobin.

Rovewell (Captain), in love with Arethusa daughter of Argus. The lady's father wanted her to marry squire Cuckoo, who had a large estate; but Arethusa contrived to have her own way and marry captain Rovewell, who turned out to be the son of Ned Worthy, who gave the bridegroom £30,000.—Carey: Contrivances (1715).

Rowe (Nicholas), poet-laureate (1673, 1714-1718). The monument in Westminster Abbey to this poet was by Rysbrack.

Rowena (The lady), of Hargettstanstede, a ward of Cedric the Saxon, of Rotherwood. She marries Ivanhoe.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Rowland (Childe), youngest brother of Helen. Under the guidance of Merlin, he undertook to bring back his sister from elf-land, whither the fairies had carried her, and he succeeded in his perilous exploit.—An Ancient Scotch Ballad.

⁂ Allusions to sir Rowland are pretty numerous. (See Shakespeare: King Lear, act iii. sc. 4, the end; Beaumont and Fletcher: The Woman's Prize.)

A mere hobby-horse
She made the child Rowland.

(R. Browning has a poem on "Childe Roland to the Dark Tower came.")

Rowland for an Oliver (A). (See ROLAND AND OLIVER, p. 928.)

Rowley, one of the retainers of Julia Avenel (a syl.).—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Rowley (Master), formerly steward of Mr. Surface, senior, the friend of Charles Surface, and the fidus Achātes of sir Oliver Surface the rich uncle.—Sheridan: School for Scandal (1777).

Rowley (Thomas), the hypothetical priest of Bristol, said by Chatterton to have lived in the reigns of Henry VI. and Edward IV., and to have written certain poems, of which Chatterton himself was the author.

Rowley Overdees, a highwayman.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Roxa'na, daughter of Oxyartês of Bactria, and wife or concubine of Alexander the Great. Proud, imperious, and relentless, she loved Alexander with a madness of love; and, being jealous of Statira, daughter of king Darius and wife of Alexander, she stabbed her and slew her.—Lee: Alexander the Great (1678).

(Daniel Defore wrote a romance called Roxana, 1724.)

Roxa'na and Stati'ra. Dr. Doran says that Peg Woffington (as "Roxana"), jealous of Mrs. Bellamy (as "Statira") beeause she was better dressed, pulled her to the floor when she left the stage, and pummelled her with the handle of her dagger, screaming as she did so—

Nor he, nor heaven, shall shield thee from my justice.
Die, sorceress, die! and all my wrongs die with thee!
Table Traits.

So now am I as great as the famed Alexander; but my dear Statira and Roxana, don't exert yourselves so much about me.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Wonder, iii. 1 (1714).

¶ Campbell tells a very similar story of Mrs. Barry ("Roxana") and Miss Boutwell ("Statira"). The stage-manager had given to Miss Boutwell a lace veil, and Mrs. Barry out of jealousy actually stabbed her rival in acting, and the dagger went a quarter of an inch through the stays into the flesh.

Royal Colleges. There are three so called: Westminster, Trinity, and Christ Church. But King's College and Eton are sometimes called "Royal Colleges."

The collegiate character of the institution was . . . kept up by the close connexion which Elizabeth fostered between the college of Westminster and the two great collegiate houses of Christ Church and Trinity, founded or refounded by her father at Oxford and Cambridge. Together they formed "the three Royal Colleges."—Memorials of Westminster Abbey, p. 419.

Royal Martyr, Charles I., who was beheaded January 30, 1649.

Royal Mottoes or LEGENDS.

Dieu et mon droit, Richard I.
Honi soit qui mal y pense, Edward III.
Semper eadem, Elizabeth and Anne.
Je maintiendrai, William III.

Royal Style of Address.

"My Liege," the usual style till the Lancastrian usurpation.

"Your Grace," Henry IV.

"Your Excellent Grace," Henry VI.

"Most High and Mighty Prince," Edward IV.

"Your Highness," Henry VII.

"Your Majesty," Henry VIII. So addressed in 1520 by François I.

"The King's Sacred Majesty," James I.

"Your most Excellent Majesty," Charles II.

"Your most Gracious Majesty," our present style.

Royal Titles.

WILLIAM I. called himself, "Rex Anglorum, comes Normannorum et Cinomanentium."

WILLIAM II. called himself, "Rex Anglorum," or "Monarchicus Britanniæ."

HENRY I. called himself, "Rex Anglorum et dux Normannorum." Subsequent to 1106 we find "Dei gratia" introduced in charters.

HENRY II. called himself, "Rex Anglorum, et dux Normannorum et Aquitannorum, et comes Andegavorum;" or "Rex Angliæ, dux Normanniæ et Aquitaniæ, et comes Andegaviæ."

RICHARD I. began his charters with, "Dei gratia rex Angliæ, et dux Normaniæ et Aquitaniæ, et comes Andegaviæ."

JOHN headed his charters with, "Johannes, D.G. rex Angliæ, dominus Hiberniæ, dux Normanniæ et Aquitaniæ, et comes Andegaviæ." Instead of "Hiberniæ," we sometimes find "Iberniæ," and sometimes "Ybernie."

HENRY III. followed the style of his father till October, 1259, when he adopted the form, "D.G. rex Angliæ, dominus Hiberniæ, et dux Aquitaniæ."

EDWARD I. adopted the latter style. So did EDWARD II. till 1326, when he used the form, "Rex Angliæ et dominus Hiberniæ." Edward I. for thirteen years headed his charters with, "Edwardus, Dei gratia rex Angliæ, dominus Hiberniæ, et Dux Aquitaniæ." But after 1337 the form ran thus: "Edwardus D.G. rex Angliæ et Franciæ, dominus Hiberniæ, et dux Aquitaniæ;" and sometimes "Franciæ" stands before "Angliæ."

RICHARD II. began thus: "Richardus, D.G. rex Angliæ et Franciæ, et dominus Hiberniæ."

HENRY IV. continued the same style. So did HENRY V. till 1420, after which date he adopted the form, "Henricus, D.G. rex Angliæ, hæres et regens Franciæ, et dominus Hiberniæ."

HENRY VI. began, "Henricus, D.G. rex Angliæ et Franciæ, et dominus Hiberniæ."

EDWARD IV., EDWARD V., RICHARD III., HENRY VII., continued the same style.

From HENRY VIII. (1521) to GEORGE III. (1800) the royal style and title was, "by the grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, king, Defender of the Faith."

From GEORGE III. (1800) to the present day it has been, "by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, king, Defender of the Faith."

(A knowledge of these styles is of immense value in establishing the time of royal documents. Richard I. was the first to adopt the style, "king of England." The previous kings called themselves "king of the English.")

Roy's Wife of Aldivalloch, a Scotch song by Mrs. Grant of Carron (1745-1814).

Ruach, the isle of winds, visited by Pantag'ruel and his companions on their way to the oracle of the Holy Bottle. The people of this island live on wind, such as flattery, promises, and hope. The poorer sort are very ill-fed, but the great are stuffed with huge mill-draughts of the same unsubstantial puffs.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, iv. 43 (1545).

Rubáiyát (The) of Omar Khayyám was translated by Edward Fitzgerald (1857). The oldest known manuscript, which is in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, is dated from Shiraz, A.H. 865 (A.D. 1460). Ruba'i means quatrain.

Rubens's Women. The portrait of Helena Forman or Fourment, his second wife, married at the age of 16, is introduced in several of his historical pictures; but the painting called "Rubens and His Wife," in the Munich Gallery, contains the portrait of his first wife, Isabella Brandt, of Antwerp.

Rübezahl, Number Nip, a famous mountain-spirit of Germany, corresponding to our Puck.

Rübezahl in German means "counter of turnips," and Nip is a contraction of Tur-nip. The sobriquet has reference to the chief adventure. Some say Musæus invented the legend to account for the name.

Rubi, one of the cherubs or spirits of wisdom who was with Eve in paradise. He loved Liris, who was young, proud, and most eager for knowledge. She asked her angel lover to let her see him in his full glory; so Rubi came to her in his cherubic splendour. Liris, rushing into his arms, was burnt to ashes; and the kiss she gave him became a brand upon his forehead, which shot unceasing agony into his brain.—Moore: Loves of the Angels, ii. (1822).

Ru'bicon, a small river which separated ancient Italy from Cisalpine Gaul, the province allotted to Julius Cæsar. When Cæsar crossed this river, he passed beyond the limits of his own province, and became an invader of Italy.

Rubicon (Napoleon's), Moscow. The invasion of Moscow was the beginning of Napoleon's fall.

Rubo'nax, a man who hanged himself from mortification and annoyance at some verses written upon him by a poet. —Sidney: Defence of Poesie (1595).

Rubrick (The Rev. Mr.), chaplain to the baron of Bradwardine.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Ruby (Lady), the young widow of lord Ruby. Her "first love" was Frederick Mowbray, and when a widow she married him. She is described as "young, blooming, and wealthy, fresh and fine as a daisy."—Cumberland: First Love (1796).

Rucellai (John), i.e. Oricellarius, poet (1475-1525), son of Bernard Rucellai of Florence, historian and diplomatist.

As hath been said by Rucellai.
Longfellow: The Wayside Inn (prelude, 1863).

Ruchiel (3 syl.), in the old Jewish angelology, the angel who ruled the air and winds.

Ruddymane (3 syl.), the name given by sir Guyon to the babe rescued from Amavia, who had stabbed herself in grief at the death of her husband. So called because—

. . . in her streaming blood he [the infant] did embay
His little hands.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, II. i, 3 (1590).

Rudge (Barnaby), a half-wittted young man, three and twenty years old; rather spare, of a fair height and strong make. His hair, of which he had a great profusion, was red, and hung in disorder about his face and shoulders. His face was pale, his eyes glassy and protruding. His dress was green, clumsily trimmed here and there with gaudy lace. A pair of tawdry ruffles dangled at his wrists, while his throat was nearly bare. His hat was ornamented with a cluster of peacock's feathers, limp, broken, and trailing down his back. Girded to his side was the steel hilt of an old sword, without blade or scabbard; and a few knee-ribbons completed his attire. He had a large raven, named Grip, which he carried at his back in a basket, a most knowing imp, which used to cry out in a hoarse voice, "Halloa!" "I'm a devil!" "Never say die!" "Polly, put the kettle on!"

Barnaby joined the Gordon rioters for the proud pleasure of carrying a flag and wearing a blue bow. He was arrested and lodged at Newgate, from whence he made his escape, with other prisoners, when the jail was burnt down by the rioters; but both he and his father and Hugh, being betrayed by Dennis the hangman, were recaptured, brought to trial, and condemned to death, but by the influence of Gabriel Varden the locksmith, the poor half-witted lad was reprieved, and lived the rest of his life with his mother in a cottage and garden near the Maypole.

Here he lived, tending the poultry and the cattle, working in a garden of his own, and helping every one. He was known to every bird and beast about the place, and had a name for every one. Never was there a lighter-hearted husbandman, a creature more popular with young and old, a blither and more happy soul than Barnaby.—Ch. lxxxii.

Mr. Rudge, the father of Barnaby, supposed to have been murdered the same night as Mr. Haredale, to whom he was steward. The fact is that Rudge himself was the murderer both of Mr. Haredale and also of his faithful servant, to whom the crime was falsely attributed. After the murder, he was seen by many haunting the locality, and was supposed to be a ghost. He joined the Gordon rioters when they attacked and burnt to the ground the house of Mr. Haredale, the son of the murdered man, and, being arrested (ch. lvi.), was sent to Newgate, but made his escape with the other prisoners when it was burnt down by the rioters. Being betrayed by Dennis, he was brought to trial for murder, but we are not told if he was executed (ch. lxxiii.). His name is not mentioned again, and probably he suffered death.

Mrs. [Mary] Rudge, mother of Barnaby, and very like him, "but where in his face there was wildness and vacancy, in hers there was the patient composure of long effort and quiet resignation." She was a widow. Her husband (steward at the Warren), who murdered his master Mr. Haredale, and his servant, told her of his deed of blood a little before the birth of Barnaby, and the woman's face ever after inspired terror. It was thought for many years that Rudge had been murdered in defending his master, and Mrs. Rudge was allowed a pension by Mr. Haredale, son and heir of the murdered man. This pension she subsequently refused to take. After the reprieve of Barnaby, Mrs. Rudge lived with him in a cottage near the Maypole, and her last days were her happiest.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Ru'diger, a wealthy Hun, liegeman of Etzel, sent to conduct Kriemhild to Hungary. When Günther and his suite went to visit Kriemhild, Rudiger entertained them all most hospitably, and gave his daughter in marriage to Giselher (Kriemhild's brother). In the broil which ensued, Rudiger was killed fighting against Gernot, but Gernot dropped down dead at the same moment, "each by the other slain."—Nibelungen Lied (by the minnesingers, 1210).

Ru'diger, a knight who came to Waldhurst in a boat drawn by a swan. Margaret fell in love with him. At every tournament he bore off the prize, and in everything excelled the youths about him. Margaret became his wife. A child was born. On the christening day, Rudiger carried it along the banks of the Rhine, and nothing that Margaret said could prevail on him to go home. Presently, the swan and boat came in sight, and carried all three to a desolate place, where was a deep cavern. Rudiger got on shore, still holding the babe, and Margaret followed. They reached the cave, two giant arms clasped Rudiger, Margaret sprang forward and seized the infant, but Rudiger was never seen more. —Southey: Rudiger (a ballad from Thomas Heywood's notes).

Ruffians' Hall. West Smithfield was for many years so called, because of its being the usual rendezvous for duellists, pugilists, and other "ruffians."

Rufus (or the Red), William II. of England (1056, 1087–1100).

Rugby, the servant of Dr. Caius.—Shakespeare: The Merry Wives of Windsor (1598–9).

Rugg (Mr.), a lawyer living at Pentonville. A red-haired man, who wore a hat with a high crown and narrow brim. Mr. Pancks employed him to settle the business pertaining to the estate which had long lain unclaimed, to which Mr. Dorrit was heir-at-law. Mr. Rugg delighted in legal difficulties as much as a housewife in her jams and preserves.—Dickens: Little Dorrit (1857).

Ruggie'ro, a young Saracen knight, born of Christian parents. He fell in love with Bradamant (sister of Rinaldo), whom he ultimately married. Ruggiero is especially noted for possessing a hippogriff or winged horse, and a shield of such dazzling splendour that it blinded those who looked on it. He threw away this shield into a well, because it enabled him to win victory too cheaply.—Orlando Innamorato (1495), and Orlando Furioso (1516).

Rukenaw (Dame), the ape's wife, in the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox (1498).

Rule a Wife and Have a Wife, a comedy by Beaumont and Fletcher (1640). Donna Margaritta, a lady of great wealth, wishes to marry in order to mask her intrigues, and seeks for husband a man without spirit, whom she can mould to her will. Leon, the brother of Altea, is selected as the "softest fool in Spain," and the marriage takes place. After marriage, Leon shows himself firm, courageous, high-minded, but most affectionate. He "rules his wife" and her household with a masterly hand, wins the respect of every one, and the wife, wholly reclaimed, "loves. honours, and obeys" him.

"Rule Britannia." This song is in the masque of Alfred, by James Thomson (1740); afterwards dramatized by Mallet (1751).

Rulers of the World (Infants). Themistocles said his infant son Diophantos ruled his mother, his mother ruled him (Themistocles), he (Themistocles) ruled Athens, and Athens ruled the world.

Diophantus, Themistocles his sonne, would often . . . say . . . whatsoever he should seeme to require of the Athenians he should be sure to obteine, for, saithe he, "Whatsoever I wil, that wil my mother; and what my mother saith, that my father sootheth; and what my father desireth, that the Athenians wil graut most willingly."—Lyly: Euphues (1579).

¶ Cato used to say, "We rule all other men; our wives rule us; and our children rule our wives."—Plutarch: Morals, p. 428 (1603).

¶ Dr. Busby said, "Tailors [milliners] rule the world; for milliners overrule the wisest women; and women overrule the wisest men; and the wisest men overrule the world; in the same way as the mayor's infant son is the chief magistrate of the city."

The mayor's youngest son Jack overrules his mother; and Jack's mother overrules the mayor; and the mayor overrules the town.—Barnabe Rich: Honestie of this Age, p. 18 (1616).

Dr. Keats used to say that he governed all England: "I rule the Eton boys; the boys rule their mothers; their mothers rule their husbands; and their husbands rule Great Britain."

Rumolt, the chief cook of prince Günther of Burgundy.—Nibelungen Lied, 800 (1210).

Rumpelstilzchen [Rumple-stilts-skin], an irritable, deformed dwarf. He aided a miller's daughter, who had been enjoined by the king to spin straw into gold; and the condition he made with her for this service was that she should give him for wife her first daughter. The miller's daughter married the king, and when her first daughter was born the mother grieved so bitterly that the dwarf consented to absolve her of her promise, if, within three days, she could find out his name. The first day passed, but the secret was not discovered; the second passed, with no better success; but on the third day some of the queen's servants heard a strange voice singing—

Little dreams my dainty dame
Rumpelstilzchen is my name.

The queen, being told thereof, saved her child, and the dwarf killed himself from rage.—German Popular Stories.

Run-About Raid (The), Murray's insurrection against lord Darnley. So called from the hasty and incessant manner in which the conspirators posted from one part of the kingdom to another.

Runa, the dog of Argon and Ruro, sons of Annir king of Inis-Thona an island of Scandinavia.—Ossian: The War of Inis-Thona.

Runners.

(1) Iphiclês, son of Phylakos and Klymênê. Hesiod says he could run over ears of corn without bending the stems; and Demarâtos says that he could run on the surface of the sea.—Argonauts, i. 60.

(2) Camilla queen of the Volsci was so swift of foot that she could run over standing corn without bending the ears, and over the sea without wetting her feet.—Virgil: Æneid, vii. 803; xi. 433.

Not so when swift Camilla scours the plain,
Flies o er th' unbending corn, and skims along the main.
Pope.

(3) Lâdas, the swift runner of king Alexander. He ran so fast that he never left a foot-print on the ground. Lord Rosebery gave this name to one of his horses.

(4) Phidippidês, a professional courier, ran from Athens to Sparta (150 miles) in two days.

(5) Theagênês, a native of Thasos, was noted for his swiftness of foot.

(The Greek hemerodromos would run from twenty to thirty-six leagues in a day.)

The last running footman of England died (at the age of 94) in 1836. His name was Sam Cliff. His general run was sixty miles a day.

Runnymede, the name assumed by Benj. Disraeli in the Times (1805-1881).

Rupert, i.e. major Roselheim, the betrothed of Meeta "the maid of Mariendorpt."—Knowles: The Maid of Mariendorpt (1838).

Rupert (Prince), in the service of Charles II. Introduced by sir W. Scott in three of his novels—Woodstock, Legend of Montrose, and Peveril of the Peak.

Rupert (Sir), in love with Catherine. —Knowles: Love (1840).

Rupert of Debate (The). Edward Geoffrey earl of Derby, when he was Mr. Stanley, was so called by lord Lytton in New Timon (1799-1869).

Rural Sports, a georgic in two cantos, by Gay (1711).

Rush (Friar), a house-spirit, sent from the infernal regions in the seventeenth century to keep the monks and friars in the same state of wickedness they then were.

(The legends of this roistering friar are of German origin.)

"Bruder Rausch" means brother Tipple.

N.B.—Milton confounds "Jack-o'-Lantern" with friar Rush. The latter was not a field bogie at all, and was never called "Jack." Probably Milton meant "a friar with a rush-[light]." Sir Walter Scott also falls into the same error—

Better we had thro' mire and bush
Been lanthern-led by friar Rush.
Marmion (1808).

Rusil'la, mother of Roderick the last of the Goths, and wife of Theodofred rightful heir to the Spanish throne.—Southey: Roderick, etc. (1814).

Rusport (Lady), second wife of sir Stephen Rusport a City knight, and stepmother of Charlotte Rusport. Very proud, very mean, very dogmatical, and very vain. Without one spark of generosity or loving charity in her composition. She bribes her lawyer to destroy a will, but is thwarted in her dishonesty. Lady Rusport has a tendresse for major O'Flaherty; but the major discovers the villainy of the old woman, and escapes from this Scylla.

Charlotte Rusport, step-daughter of lady Rusport. An amiable, ingenuous, animated, handsome girl, in love with her cousin Charles Dudley, whom she marries.—Cumberland: The West Indian (1771).

Russet (Mr.), the choleric old father of Harriot, on whom he dotes. He is so self-willed that he will not listen to reason, and has set his mind on his daughter marrying sir Harry Beagle. She marries, however, Mr. Oakly. (See HARRIOT, p. 471.)—Colman: The Jealous Wife (1761).

Russian Byron (The), Alexander Sergeivitch Pushkin (1799–1837).

Russian History (The Father of), Nestor, a monk of Kiev. His Chronicle includes the years between 862 and 1116 (twelfth century).

Russian Murat (The), Michael Miloradowitch (1770–1820).

Rust (Martin), an absurd old antiquary. "He likes no coins but those which have no head on them." He took a fancy to Juliet, the niece of sir Thomas Lofty, but preferred his "Ænēas, his precious relic of Troy," to the living beauty; and Juliet preferred Richard Bever to Mr. Rust; so matters were soon amicably adjusted.—Foote: The Patron (1764).

Rustam, chief of the Persian mythical heroes, son of Zāl "the Fair," king of India, and regular descendant of Benjamin the beloved son of Jacob the patriarch. He delivered king Caïcāus (4 syl.) from prison, but afterwards fell into disgrace because he refused to embrace the religious system of Zoroaster. Caïcaus sent his son Asfendiar (or Isfendiar) to convert him, and, as persuasion availed nothing, the logic of single combat was resorted to. The fight lasted two days, and then Rustam discovered that Asfendiar bore a "charmed life," proof against all wounds. The valour of these two heroes is proverbial, and the Persian romances are full of their deeds of fight.

Rustam's Horse, Reksh.—Chardin: Travels (1686–1711).

(In Matthew Arnold's poem Sohrab and Rustum, Rustum fights with Sohrab, overcomes him, and finds too late he has slain his own son.)

Rustam, son of Tamur king of Persia. He had a trial of strength with Rustam son of Zāl, which was to pull away from his adversary an iron ring. The combat was never decided, for Rustam could no more conquer Rustam than Roland could overcome Oliver.—Chardin: Travels (1686–1711).

Rusticus's Pig, the pig on which Rusticus fed daily, but which never diminished. (See SCHRIMNER.)

> Two Christians, travelling in Poland, . . . came to the door of Rusticus, a heathen peasant, who had killed a fat hog to celebrate the birth of a son. The pilgrims, being invited to partake of the feast, pronounced a blessing on what was left, which never diminished in size or weight from that moment, though all the family fed on it freely every day.—Brady: Clavis Calendaria, 183.

This, of course, is a parallelism to Elijah's miracle (1 Kings xvii. 11–16).

Rut (Doctor), in The Magnetic Lady, by Ben Jonson (1602).

Ruth (The Book of). Ruth was a Moabitish maiden, whose husband's father was a Hebrew driven from his native land by a famine. She afterwards married Boaz a rich farmer of Bethlehem, and was the grandmother of king David, and so in the line of Christ's ancestry.

Ruth, a poem, by Hood (1827); by sir W. S. Maxwell (1818–1875); by Wordsworth (1799).

Ruth, the friend of Arabella an heiress, and ward of justice Day. Ruth also is an orphan, the daughter of sir Basil Thoroughgood, who died when she was two years old, leaving justice Day trustee. Justice Day takes the estates, and brings up Ruth as his own daughter. Colonel Careless is her accepted amé de cœur.—T. Knight: The Honest Thieves.

Ruthven (Lord), one of the embassy from queen Elizabeth to Mary queen of Scots.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Rutil'io, a merry gentleman, brother of Arnoldo.—Fletcher: The Custom of the Country (1647).

Rutland (The countess of), wife of the earl of Essex, whom he married when he started for Ireland. The queen knew not of the marriage, and was heart-broken when she heard of it.—Jones: The Earl of Essex (1745).

Rutland (The duchess of), of the court of queen Elizabeth.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Rutledge (Archie), constable at Osbaldistone Hall.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Rutledge (Job), a smuggler.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Rut'terkin, name of a cat the spirit of a witch, sent at one time to torment the countess of Rutland (sixteenth century).

Ruy'dera, a duenna who had seven daughters and two nieces. They were imprisoned for 500 years in the cavern of Montesi'nos, in La Mancha of Spain. Their ceaseless weeping stirred the compassion of Merlin, who converted them into lakes in the same province.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. ii. 6 (1615).

R. V. S. V. P., i.e. répondez vite s'il vous plait.

Ryence (Sir), king of Wales, Ireland, and many of the isles. When Arthur first mounted the throne, king Ryence, in scorn, sent a messenger to say "he had purfled a mantle with the beards of kings; but the mantle lacked one more beard to complete the lining, and he requested Arthur to send his beard by the messenger, or else he would come and take head and beard too." Part of the insolence was in this: Arthur at the time was too young to have a beard at all; and he made answer, "Tell your master, my beard at present is all too young for purfling; but I have an arm quite strong enough to drag him hither, unless he comes without delay to do me homage." By the advice of Merlin, the two brothers Balin and Balan set upon the insolent king, on his way to lady De Vauce, overthrew him, slew "more than forty of his men, and the remnant fled." King Ryence craved for mercy; "so they laid him on a horse-litter, and sent him captive to king Arthur."—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 24, 34 (1470).

Rymar (Mr. Robert), poet at the Spa.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Ryno, youngest of the sons of Fingal king of Morven. He fell in the battle of Lena between the Norsemen led by Swaran and the Irish led by Fingal.

"Rest!" said Fingal; "youngest of my sons, rest! Rest, O Ryno, on Lena! We, too, shall be no more. Warriors must one day fall."—Ossian: Fingal, v.

Ryparog'rapher of Wits, Rabelais (1495-1553).

(Greek, ruparos ("foul, nasty"). Pliny calls Pyricus the painter a "ryparographer.")

Rython, a giant of Brittany, slain by king Arthur. (See RITHO, p. 918.)

Rython, the mighty giant, slain,
By his good brand relieved Bretagne.
Sir W. Scott: Bridal of Triermain, ii. 11 (1813).

S.

S. P. Q. R. generally stands for Senātus Populus-Que Romanus. But Bede gives several other sentences, as—

Salva Populum Quem Redemisti.
Sono Poltroni Questi Romani.
Sancti Pater, Quid Rides?
(Ans. Rideo quia Papa sum.)
Salus Papæ, Quies Regni.
Salvasti Populum Quem Regis.
Solidavit Pace Quietem Regni.
Salvavit Pecavit Que Regnum.
Stultus Populus Quærit Romam.
French phrase: Si Peu Que Rien.
English: Seek Peaceful Quiet Repose.

It would afford amusement occasionally on a long evening to extend this list, which might easily be done.

Saadi or SADI, the Persian poet, called "The Nightingale of a Thousand Songs." His poems are The Gulistan or "Garden of Roses," The Bostan or "Garden of Fruits," and The Pend-Nâmeh, a moral poem. Saadi (1184-1263) was one of the "Four Monarchs of Eloquence" (see p. 321).

Saba or Zaba (The queen of), called Balkis. She came to the court of Solomon, and had by him a son named Melech. The queen of Ethiopia or Abyssinia is sometimes called Maqueda.—Zaga Zabo: Ap. Damian. a Goes.

The Korân (ch. xxvii.) tells us that Solomon summoned before him all the birds to the valley of ants, but the lapwing did not put in an appearance. Solomon was angry, and was about to issue an order of death, when the bird presented itself, saying, "I come from Saba, where I found a queen reigning in great magnificence, but she and her subjects worship the sun." On hearing this, Solomon sent back the lapwing to Saba with a letter, which the bird was to drop at the foot of the queen, commanding her to come at once, submit herself unto him, and accept from him the "true religion." So she came in great state, with a train of 500 slaves of each sex, bearing 500 "bricks of solid gold," a crown, and sundry other presents.

Sabbath-Breakers. The fish of the Red Sea used to come ashore on the eve of the sabbath, to tempt the Jews to violate the day of rest. The offenders at length became so numerous that David, to deter others, turned the fish into apes.—Jallâlo'ddin: Al Zamakh.

Sabbath-day Psalm (The), Ps. xcii., which begins with the words, "It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord."

Sabellan Song, incantation. The Sabelli or Samnites were noted for their magical arts and incantations.

Sabine (The). Numa the Sabine was taught the way to govern by Egĕria, one of the Camēnæ (prophetic nymphs of ancient Italy). He used to meet her in a grove, in which was a well, afterwards dedicated by him to the Camenæ.

> Our statues! . . . she
> That taught the Sabine how to rule.
> Tennyson: The Princess, ii. (1850).

Sablonnière (La), the Tuileries. The word means the "sand-pit." The tuileries means the "tile-works." Nicolas de Neuville, in the fifteenth century, built a mansion in the vicinity, which he called the "Hotel des Tuileries," and François I. bought the property for his mother in 1518.

Sabra, daughter of Ptolemy king of Egypt. She was rescued by St. George from the hands of a giant, and ultimately married her deliverer. Sabra had three sons at a birth: Guy, Alexander, and David.

> Here come I, St. George, the valiant man,
> With naked sword and spear in han',
> Who fought the dragon and brought him to slaughter,
> And won fair Sabra thus, the king of Egypt's daughter.
> Notes and Queries, December 21, 1878.

Sabreur (Le Beau), Joachim Murat (1767–1815).

Sab'rin, Sabre, or Sabri'na, the Severn, daughter of Locrine (son of Brute) and his concubine Estrildis. His queen Guendolen vowed vengeance, and, having assembled an army, made war upon Locrine, who was slain. Guendolen now assumed the government, and commanded Estrildis and Sabrin to be cast into a river, since then called the Severn.—Geoffrey: British History, ii. 5 (1142).

(An exquisite description of Sabine, sitting in state as a queen, is given in the opening of song v. of Drayton's Polyolbion; and the tale of her metamorphosis is recorded at length in song vi. Milton in Comus, and Fletcher in The Faithful Shepherdess, refer to the transformation of Sabrina into a river.)

Sabrinian Sea or Severn Sea, i.e. the Bristol Channel. Both terms occur not unfrequently in Drayton's Polyolbion.

Sacchini (Antonio Maria Gaspare), called "The Racine of Music," contemporary with Glück and Piccini (1735–1786).

> I composed a thing to-day in all the gusto of Sacchini and the sweetness of Glück.—Mrs. Cowley: A Bold Stroke for a Husband.

Sacharissa. So Waller calls the lady Dorothea Sidney, eldest daughter of the earl of Leicester, to whose hand he aspired. Sacharissa married the earl of Sunderland. (Greek, sakchar, "sugar.")

Sachente'ges (4 syl.), instruments of torture. A sharp iron collar was put round the victim's throat, and as he could not stir without cutting himself, he could neither sit, lie, nor sleep.—Ingram: Saxon Chronicle.

Sack. To give one the sack, to dismiss from further service. At one time manufacturers who employed those who worked at home put the work to be done in a bag or sack. If when brought back the work was satisfactory, the bag or sack was filled again with materials; if not, it was laid empty on the counter, and this indicated that the person would no longer be employed by the firm.

Sackbut, the landlord of a tavern, in Mrs. Centlivre's comedy A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717).

Sackerson or Sacarson and Harry Hunkes were two famous bears exhibited in the reign of queen Elizabeth at Paris Garden, Southwark.

> Publius, a student of the common law,
> To Paris Garden doth himself withdraw;
> Leaving old Ployden, Dyer, and Broke alone,
> To see old Harry Hunkes and Sacarson.
> Sir John Davies: Epigrams (about 1598).

Sacred Allegories, by the Rev. William Adams, who died 1848.

Sacred Fish, Greek, ichthus ("a fish"), is compounded of the initial Greek letters: I[esous] CH[ristos], TH[eou] U[ios], S[oter] ("Jesus Christ, God's Son, Saviour"). Tennyson, describing the "Lady of the Lake," says—

> And o'er her breast floated the sacred fish.
> Gareth and Lynette.

Sacred Isle (The), Ireland. Also called "The Holy Isle," from its multitude of saints.

The Sacred Isle, Scattery, to which St. Senātus retired, and vowed no woman should set foot thereon.

> Oh, haste and leave this sacred isle,
> Unholy bark, ere morning smile.
> Moore: Irish Melodies ("St. Senanus and the Lady," 1808).

The Sacred Isle, Enhallow, one of the Orkneys. (Norse, Eyinhalga, "holy isle.")

The Sacred Isle, the peninsula of mount Athos (Ottoman empire). This island is remarkable for being exclusively inhabited by males. Not only are females of the human race excluded, but cows also, mares, sow-pigs, hens, ducks, and females of all the animal race.—Milner: Gallery of Geography, 666.

Sacred Nine (The), the Muses, nine in number.

> Fair daughters of the Sun, the Sacred Nine,
> Here wake to ecstasy their harps divine.
> Falconer: The Shipwreck, iii. 3 (1756).

Sacred Songs, by T. Moore (1816).

Sacred War (The). (1) A war undertaken by the Amphictyonic League for the defence of Delphi against the Cirrhæans (B.C. 595–587).

(2) A war undertaken by the Athenians for the purpose of restoring Delphi to the Phocians (B.C. 448–447).

(3) A war undertaken by Philip of Macedon, as chief of the Amphictyonic League, for the purpose of wresting Delphi from the Phocians (B.C. 357).

Sa'cripant (King), king of Circassia, and a lover of Angelica. — Bojardo: Orlando Innamorato (1495); Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

> With the same stratagem, Sacripant had his steed stolen from under him, by that notorious thief Brunello, at the siege of Albracca.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iii. 9 (1605).

(The allusion is to Sancho Panza's ass, which was stolen from under him by the galley-slave Gines de Passamonte.)

Sa'cripant, a false, noisy, hectoring braggart; a kind of Pistol or Bobadil.—Tasso: Secchia Rapita (i.e. "Rape of the Bucket").

Sadah, the sixteenth night of the month Bayaman.—Persian Calendar.

Sa'dak and Kalasra'de (4 syl.). Sadak, general of the forces of Am'urath sultan of Turkey, lived with Kalasradê in retirement, and their home life was so happy that it aroused the jealousy of the sultan, who employed emissaries to set fire to their house, carry off Kalasradê to the seraglio, and seize the children. Sadak, not knowing who were the agents of these evils, laid his complaint before Amurath, and then learnt that Kalasrade was in the seraglio. The sultan swore not to force his love upon her till she had drowned the recollection of her past life by a draught of the waters of oblivion. Sadak was sent on this expedition. On his return, Amurath seized the goblet, and, quaffing its contents, found "that the waters of oblivion were the waters of death." He died, and Sadak was made sultan in his stead.—J. Ridley: Tales of the Genii ("Sadak and Kalasradê," ix., 1751).

Sadaroubay. So Eve is called in Indian mythology.

Sadder, one of the sacred books of the Guebres or Parsis.

Saddle and the Ground.

> Between the saddle and the ground,
> Mercy he sought, and mercy found;

Should be—

> Betwixt the stirrup and the ground,
> Mercy I asked, mercy I found.

It is quoted in Camden's Remains. "A gentleman fell from his horse and broke his neck. Some said it was a judgment on his evil life, but a friend, calling to mind the epitaph of St. Augustine, Misericordia Domini inter pontem et fontem, wrote the distich given above."

Saddletree (Mr. Bartoline), the learned saddler.

Mrs. Saddletree, the wife of Bartoline. —Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Sadha-Sing, the mourner of the desert.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Ssel. (See HAYSEL, p. 476.)

Ssemund Sigfusson, surnamed "the Wise," an Icelandic priest and scald. He compiled the Elder or Rhythmical Edda, often called Sæmund's Edda. This compilation contains not only mythological tales and moral sentences, but numerous sagas in verse or heroic lays, as those of Völung and Helgê, of Sigurd and Brynhilda, of Folsungs and Niflungs (pt. ii.). Probably his compilation contained all the mythological, heroic, and legendary lays extant at the period in which he lived (1054–1133).

Safa, in Arabia, the hill on which Adam and Eve came together, after having been parted for 200 years, during which time they wandered homeless over the face of the earth.

Saffron Gown. (See p. 335, col. 2.)

> She the saffron gown will never wear,
> And in no flower-strewn couch shall she be laid.
> W. Morris: Atalanta's Race.

The word saffron was wholly unknown in the Greek or Latin language. There is the Greek word saophron, but that was a girdle worn by girls, indicative of chastity. (Saffron is the Arabic saphran, through the French safran.)

Saga, the goddess of history.—Scandinavian Mythology.

Saga and Edda. The Edda is the Bible of the ancient Scandinavians. A saga is a book of instruction, generally but not always in the form of a tale, like a Welsh "mabinogi." In the Edda there are numerous sagas. As our Bible contains the history of the Jews, religious songs, moral proverbs, and religious stories, so the Edda contained the history of Norway, religious songs, a book of proverbs, and numerous stories. The original Edda was compiled and edited by Sæmund Sigfusson, an Icelandic priest and scald, in the eleventh century. It contains twenty-eight parts or books, all of which are in verse.

Two hundred years later, Snorro Sturleson of Iceland abridged, rearranged, and reduced to prose the Edda, giving the various parts a kind of dramatic form, like the dialogues of Plato. It then became needful to distinguish these two works; so the old poetical compilation is called the Elder or Rhythmical Edda, and sometimes the Sæmud Edda, while the more modern work is called the Younger or Prose Edda, and sometimes the Snorro Edda. The Younger Edda is, however, partly original. Pt. i. is the old Edda reduced to prose, but pt. ii. is Sturleson's own collection. This part contains "The Discourse of Bragi" (the scald of the gods) on the origin of poetry; and here, too, we find the famous story called by the Germans the Nibelungen Lied.

Sagas. Besides the sagas contained in the Eddas, there are numerous others. Indeed, the whole saga literature extends over 200 volumes.

I. THE EDDA SAGAS. The Edda is divided into two parts and twenty-eight lays or poetical sagas. The first part relates to the gods and heroes of Scandinavia, creation, and the early history of Norway. The Scandinavian "Books of Genesis" are the "Voluspa Saga" or "prophecy of Vola" (about 230 verses), "Vafthrudner's Saga," and "Grimner's Saga." These three resemble the Sibylline books of ancient Rome, and gave a description of chaos, the formation of the world, the creation of all animals (including dwarfs, giants, and fairies), the general conflagration, and the renewal of the world, when, like the new Jerusalem, it will appear all glorious, and there shall in no wise enter therein "anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie."

The "Book of Proverbs" in the Edda is called the "Hâvamâl Saga," and sometimes "The High Song of Odin."

The "Völsunga Saga" is a collection of lays about the early Teutonic heroes.

The "Saga of St. Olaf" is the history of this Norwegian king. He was a savage tyrant, hated by his subjects; but because he aided the priests in forcing Christianity on his subjects, he was canonized.

The other sagas in the Edda are "The Song of Lodbrok" or "Lodbrog," "Hervara Saga," the "Vilkina Saga," the "Blomsturvalla Saga," the "Ynglinga Saga" (all relating to Norway), the "Jomsvikingia Saga" and the "Knytlinga Saga" (which pertain to Denmark), the "Sturlunga Saga" and the "Eryrbiggia Saga" (which pertain to Iceland). All the above were compiled and edited by Sæmund Sigfusson, and are in verse; but Snorro Sturleson reduced them to prose in his prose version of the old Edda.

II. SAGAS NOT IN THE EDDA. Snorro Sturleson, at the close of the twelfth century, made the second great collection of chronicles in verse, called the Heimskringla Saga, or the book of the kings of Norway from the remotest period to the year 1177. This is a most valuable record of the laws, customs, and manners of the ancient Scandinavians. Samuel Laing published his English translation of it in 1844.

1. The Icelandic Sagas. Besides the two Icelandic sagas collected by Sæmund Sigfusson, numerous others were subsequently embodied in the Landama Bok, set on foot by Ari hinn Frondê, and continued by various hands.

2. Frithjof's Saga contains the life and adventures of Frithjof of Iceland, who fell in love with Ingeborg, the beautiful wife of Hring king of Norway. On the death of Hring the young widow married her Icelandic lover. Frithjof lived in the eighth century, and this saga was compiled at the beginning of the fourteenth century, a year or two after the Heimskringla. It is very interesting, because Tegnér, the Swedish poet, has selected it for his Idylls (1825), just as Tennyson has taken his idyllic stories from the Morte d'Arthur or the Welsh Mabinogion. Tegnér's Idylls have been translated into English by Latham (1838), by Stephens (1841), and by Blackley (1857).

3. The Swedish Saga or lay of Swedish "history" is the Ingvars Saga.

4. The Russian Saga or lay of Russian legendary history is the Egmunds Saga.

5. The Folks Sagas are stories from romance. From this ancient collection we have derived our nursery tales of Jack and the Bean-Stalk, Jack the Giant-Killer, the Giant who smelt the Blood of an Englishman, Blue Beard, Cinderella, the Little Old Woman cut Shorter, the Pig that wouldn't go over the Bridge, Puss in Boots, and even the first sketches of Whittington and His Cat, and Baron Munchausen. (See Dasent: Tales from the Norse, 1859.)

6. Sagas of Foreign origin. Besides the rich stores of original tales, several foreign ones have been imported and translated into Norse, such as Barlaham and Josaphat, by Rudolf of Ems, one of the German minnesingers (see p. 90). On the other hand, the minnesingers borrowed from the Norse sagas their famous story embodied in the Nibelungen Lied, called the "German Iliad," which is from the second part of Snorro Sturleson's Edda.

Sagaman, a narrator of Sagas. These ancient chroniclers differed from scalds in several respects. Scalds were minstrels, who celebrated in verse the exploits of living kings or national heroes; sagamen were tellers of legendary stories, either in prose or verse, like Scheherazâdê the narrator of the Arabian Nights, the mandarin Fum-Hoam the teller of the Chinese Tales, Moradbak the teller of the Oriental Tales, Feramorz who told the tales to Lalla Rookh, and so on. Again, scalds resided at court, were attached to the royal suite, and followed the king in all his expeditions; but sagamen were free and unattached, and told their tales to prince or peasant, in lordly hall or at village wake.

Sagam'ite (4 syl.), a kind of soup or tisan, given by American Indians to the sick.

> Our virgins fed her with their kindly bowls
> Of fever-balm and sweet sagamité.
> Campbell: Gertrude of Wyoming, i. 29 (1809).

Sagan of Jerusalem (The), in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, is mean for Compton bishop of London.

> . . . the Sagan of Jerusalem,
> Of hopeful soul, and noble stem;
> Him in the Western dome, whose weighty sense
> Flows in fit words and heavenly eloquence.
> Pt. i. 803-806.

Sage of Concord (The), Ralph Waldo Emerson, of Boston, United States, author of Literary Ethics (1838), Poems (1846), Representative Men (1850), English Traits (1856), and numerous other works (1803-1879).

> In Mr. Emerson we have a poet and a profoundly religious man, who is really and entirely undaunted by the discoveries of science, past, present, or prospective. In his case, poetry, with the joy of a Bacchanal, takes her graver brother science by the hand, and cheers him with immortal laughter. By Emerson scientific conceptions are continually transmuted into the finer forms and warmer lines of an ideal world.—Tyndall Fragments of Science.
> No one who has conversed with the Sage of Concord can wonder at the love which his neighbours feel for him, or the reverence with which he is regarded by the scholars of England and America.—Newspaper Biographical Sketch, May, 1879.

Sage of Monticello (The), Thomas Jefferson, the third president of the United States, whose country seat was at Monticello.

> As from the grave where Henry sleeps,
> From Vernon's weeping willow,
> And from the grassy pall which hides
> The Sage of Monticello . . .
> Virginia, o'er thy land of slaves
> A warning voice is swelling.
> Whittier: Voices of Freedom (1846).

Sage of Samos (The), Pythagŏras, a native of Samos (B.C. 584-506).

Sages (The Seven). (See SEVEN WISE MEN OF GREECE, p. 987.)

Sag'ittary, a monster, half man and half beast, described as "a terrible archer, which neighs like a horse, and with eyes of fire which strike men dead like lightning." Any deadly shot is a sagittary.—Guido delle Colonna (thirteenth century): Historia Troyana Prosayce Composita (translated by Lydgate).

> The dreadful Sagittary.
> Appals our numbers.
> Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida (1602).

(See also Othello, act i. sc. 1, 3. The barrack is so called from the figure of an archer over the door.)

Sagramour le De'sirus, a knight of the Round Table. (See Launcelot du Lac and Morte d'Arthur.)

Sa'hira (Al), one of the names of hell.—Sale: Al Korân, lxxix. notes.

Sailor King (The), William IV. of Great Britain (1765, 1830-1837).

Saint (The), Kang-he of China, who assumed the name of Chin-tsou-jin (1653, 1661–1722).

St. Aldobrand, the noble husband of lady Imogine, murdered by count Bertram her quondam lover.—Maturin: Bertram (1816).

St. Alme (Captain), son of Darlemont a merchant, guardian of Julio count of Haranecour. He pays his addresses to Marianne Franval, to whom he is ultimately married. Captain St. Alme is generous, high-spirited, and noble-minded.—Holcroft: The Deaf and Dumb (1785).

St. Andre, a fashionable dancing-master in the reign of Charles II.

> St. Andre's feet ne'er kept more equal time.
> Dryden: MacFlecknoe (1682).

St. An'gelo (Castle of), once called the Molês Adria'ni, the tomb of the emperor Adrian, a structure as big as a village.

St. Asaph (The dean of), in the court of queen Elizabeth.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (1821).

St. Basil Outwits the Devil. (See SINNER SAVED, p. 1010.)

St. Bef'ana, the day of the Epiphany (January 6). (See BEFANA, p. 103.)

St. Botolph (The prior of).—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

St. Brandan or San Bor'andan (The Island of), a flying island, some ninety leagues in length, west of the Canaries. In an old French geographical chart it is placed 5° west of Ferro Island, 29° N. lat. So late as 1721 Spain sent an expedition in quest of this fabulous island. The Spaniards believe that king Rodri'go ("the last of the Goths") made this island his retreat. The Portuguese assign it to St. Sebastian. The poets say it was rendered inaccessible to man by diabolical magic. Probably it owes its existence to some atmospheric illusion, such as the Fata morgana.

St. Cecili, Cecily, or Cecile (2 syl.), the daughter of noble Roman parents, and a Christian. She married Valirian. One day, she told her husband she had "an aungel . . . that with gret love, wher so I wake or slepe, is redy ay my body for to kepe." Valirian requested to see this angel, and Cecile told him he must first go to St. Urban, and, being purged by him "fro synne, than [then] schul ye se that aungel." Valirian was accordingly "cristened" by St. Urban, returned home, and found the angel with two crowns, brought direct from paradise. One he gave to Cecile and one to Valirian, saying that "bothe with the palme of martirdom schullen come unto God's blisful feste." Valirian suffered martyrdom first; then Almachius, the Roman prefect, commanded his officers to "brenne Cecile in a bath of flammês red." She remained in the bath all day and night, yet "sat she cold, and felte of it no woe." Then smote they her three strokes upon the neck, but could not smite her head off. She lingered on for three whole days, preaching and teaching, and then died. St. Urban buried her body privately by night, and her house he converted into a church, which he called the church of Cecily.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Second Nun's Tale," 1388).

St. Christopher, a native of Lycia, very tall, and fearful to look at. He was so proud of his strength that he resolved to serve only the mightiest, and went in search of a worthy master. He first entered the service of the emperor; but one day, seeing his master cross himself for fear of the devil, he quitted his service for that of Satan. This new master he found was thrown into alarm at the sight of a cross; so he quitted him also, and went in search of the Saviour. One day, near a ferry, a little child accosted him, and begged the giant to carry him across the water. Christopher put the child on his back, but found every step he took that the child grew heavier and heavier, till the burden was more than he could bear. As he sank beneath his load, the child told the giant He was Christ, and Christopher resolved to serve Christ and Him only. He died three days afterwards, and was canonized. The Greek and Latin Churches look on him as the protecting saint against floods, fire, and earthquake.—James de Voragine: Golden Legends, 100 (thirteenth century).

N.B.—His body is said to be at Valencia, in Spain; one of his arms at Compostella; a jaw-bone at Astorga; a shoulder at St. Peter's, in Rome; and a tooth and rib at Venice. His day is May 9 in the Greek Church, and July 25 in the Latin. Of course, "the Christ-bearer" is an allegory based on the name "Christopher."

The gigantic bones called his relics may serve to give reality to the fable.

(His name before conversion was Offĕrus, but after he carried Christ across the ford, it was called Christ-Offerus, shortened into Christopher, which means "the Christ-bearer.")

St. Clare (Augustin), the kind, indulgent master of uncle Tom. He was beloved by all his slaves.

Miss Evangeline St. Clare, daughter of Mr. St. Clare. Evangeline was the good angel of the family, and was adored by uncle Tom. Her death is touchingly told.

Miss Ophelia St. Clare, cousin of Augustin. She is a New England Puritan. —Mrs. Beecher Stowe: Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852).

St. Clement's Eve, a drama by sir Henry Taylor (1862). The heroine is Iolande, who tries to cure the king by dipping her finger in the sacred contents of a vial, but fails, because she is in love with a married man, and the cure can be effected only by a pure virgin.

St. Distaff, an imaginary saint, to whom January 7 or Twelfth Day is consecrated.

> Partly worke and partly play
> You must on St. Distaff's Day;
> Give St. Distaff all the right,
> Then give Christmas sport good night.
> Wit Asporting vn a Pleasant Grove of New Fancies (1657).

St. Elmo's Fires, those electric lights seen playing about the masts of ships in stormy weather.

> And sudden bursting on their raptured sight,
> Appeared the splendour of St. Elmo's light.
> Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, ix. (1516).

¶ In 1696 M. de Forbes saw more than thirty feux St. Elme on his ship.

¶ Æneas tells Dido that these electric lights danced about the head of his son Iülus when they left the burning city of Troy.

> Ecce levis summo de vertice visus Iuli
> Fundere lumen apex, tactuque innoxia molli
> Lambere flamma comas et circum tempora pasci.
> Virgil: Æneid, ii. 682–4.
> Lo! harmless flames upon Iulus' head,
> While we embraced the boy, from heaven were shed,
> Played in his hair and on his temples fed.

St. Etienne. There are sixty-nine places in France so called. A Paris newspaper stated that the "receiver of St. Etienne" had embezzled £4000, whereupon all the tax-gatherers of the sixty-nine places called St. Etienne brought separate actions against the paper, and the editor had to pay each one a hundred francs damages, besides fine and costs.—Standard, February 24, 1879.

St. Filume'na or FILOMENA, a new saint of the Latin Church. Sabatelli has a picture of this nineteenth-century saint, representing her as hovering over a group of sick and maimed, who are healed by her intercession. In 1802 a grave was found in the cemetery of St. Priscilla, and near it three tiles, with these words, in red letters—

LUMENA	PAXTE	CVMFI

A rearrangement of the tiles made the inscription, PAX TE-CUM, FI-LUMENA. That this was the correct rendering is quite certain, for the virgin martyr herself told a priest and a nun in a dream, that she was Fi[lia] Lumina, the daughter of Lumina, i.e. the daughter of the Light of the world. In confirmation of this dream, as her bones were carried to Mugnano, the saint repaired her own skeleton, made her hair grow, and performed so many miracles, that those must indeed be hard of belief who can doubt the truth of the story.

St. George is the national saint of England, in consequence of the miraculous assistance rendered by him to the arms of the Christians under Godfrey de Bouillon during the first crusade.

St. George's Sword, Askelon.

> George he shaved the dragon's beard,
> And Askelon was his razor.
> Percy: Reliques, III. iii. 25.

St. George (Le chevalier de), James Francis Edward Stuart, called "The Old (or elder) Pretender" (1688–1766).

St. Graal. (See SANGRAAL, p. 959.)

St. John, the clergyman in love with Jane Eyre, but she rejects his suit.—Charlotte Brontë: Jane Eyre (1847).

St. Le'on, the hero of a novel of the same name by W. Goodwin (1799). St. Leon becomes possessed of the "elixir of life," and of the "philosopher's stone;" but this knowledge, instead of bringing him wealth and happiness, is the source of misery and endless misfortunes.

St. Leon is designed to prove that the happiness of mankind would not have been augmented by the gift of immortal youth and inexhaustible riches.—Encyclopædia Britannica (article "Romance").

Saint Maur, one of the attendants of sir Reginald Front de Bœuf (a follower of prince John).—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

St. Nicholas, the patron saint of boys. He is said to have been bishop of Myra, in Lycia, and his death is placed in the year 326.

St. Nicholas is said to have supplied three maidens with marriage portions, by leaving at their windows bags of money. . . . Another legend describes the saint as having restored to life three [? two] murdered children.—Yonge.

St. Patrick's Purgatory, in an islet in lough Derg, Ireland. Here the saint made a cave, through which was an entrance into purgatory; and here those who liked to do so might forestall their purgatorial punishments while they were in the flesh. This was made the subject of a romance in the fourteenth century, and Calderon dramatized the subject in the seventeenth century.

Who has not heard of St. Patrick's Purgatory . . . with its chapels and its toll-houses? Thither repair yearly crowds of pious pilgrims, who would wash away at once the accumulated sins of their lives.—Wright.

(This source of revenue was abolished by order of the pope, on St. Patrick's Day, 1497.)

St. Peter's Obelisk, a stone pyramid of enormous size, on the top of which is an urn containing the relics of Julius Cæsar.

St. Prieux, the amant of Julie, in Rousseau's novel entitled Julie ou La Nouvelle Héloïse (1760).

St. Ronan's Well, a novel by sir W. Scott (1823). An inferior work; but it contains the character of Meg Dods, of the Clachan or Mowbray Arms inn; one of the very best low comic characters in the whole range of fiction.

 The tale is a good deal involved, but chiefly concerns Clara Mowbray of St. Ronan's, and the two sons of the earl of Ethrington. One of them is Frank Tyrrel, the son of his wife, but said to be illegitimate. The other is Valentine [Bulmer], the child of Mrs. Bulmer married in bigamy. Clara is deceived into a private marriage with Valentine, supposing him to be the heir of the title; but when it is proved that Frank Tyrrel is not illegitimate, and therefore the true heir, Clara dies, and Valentine is slain in a duel. The story concludes with the marriage of Dr. Quackleben and Mrs. Blower a shipowner's widow.

St. Stephen's Chapel, properly the House of Commons, but sometimes applied to the two Houses of Parliament. So called by a figure of speech from St. Stephen's Chapel, built by king Stephen, rebuilt by Edward II. and III., and finally destroyed by fire in 1834. St. Stephen's Chapel was fitted up for the use of the House of Commons in the reign of Edward IV. The great council of the nation met before in the chapter-house of the abbey.

St. Swithin, tutor of king Alfred, and bishop of Winchester. The monks wished to bury him in the chancel of the minster; but the bishop had directed that his body should be interred under the open vault of heaven. Finding the monks resolved to disobey his injunction, he sent a heavy rain on July 15, the day assigned to the funeral ceremony, in consequence of which it was deferred from day to day for forty days. The monks then bethought them of the saint's injunction, and prepared to inter the body in the churchyard. St. Swithin smiled his approbation by sending a beautiful sunshiny day, in which all the robes of the hierarchy might be displayed without the least fear of being injured by untimely and untoward showers.

St. Tammany, the patron of democracy in the American states. His day is May 1. Tammany or Tammenund lived in the seventeenth century. He was a native of Delaware, but settled on the banks of the Ohio. He was a chief sachem of his tribe, and his rule was discreet and peaceful. His great maxim was, "Unite. In peace unite for mutual happiness, in war for mutual defence."

Saints' Tragedy (The), a dramatic poem by Charles Kingsley, based on the story of Elizabeth of Hungary (1846).

Sakhar, the devil who stole Solomon's signet. The tale is that Solomon, when he washed, entrusted his signet-ring to his favourite concubine Amîna. Sakhar one day assumed the appearance of Solomon, got possession of the ring, and sat on the throne as the king. During this usurpation, Solomon became a beggar, but in forty days Sakhar flew away, and flung the signet-ring into the sea. It was swallowed by a fish, the fish was caught and sold to Solomon, the ring was recovered, and Sakhar was thrown into the sea of Galilee with a great stone round his neck.—Jallâloddin: Al Zamakh. (See FISH AND THE RING, p. 370.)

Sakhrat [Sak-rah'], the sacred stone on which mount Kâf rests. Mount Kâf is a circular plain, the home of giants and fairies. Any one who possesses a single grain of the stone Sakhrat has the power of working miracles. Its colour is emerald, and its reflection gives the blue tint to the sky.—Mohammedan Mythology.

Sa'kia, the dispenser of rain, one of the four gods of the Adites (2 syl.).

> Sakia, we invoked for rain;
> We called on Rarekia for food;
> They did not hear our prayers—they could not hear
> No cloud appeared in heaven,
> No nightly dews came down.
> Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, i. 24 (1797).

Sakunta'la, daughter of Viswamita and a water-nymph, abandoned by her parents, and brought up by a hermit. One day, king Dushyanta came to the hermitage, and persuaded Sakuntala to marry him. In due time a son was born, but Dushyanta left his bride at the hermitage. When the boy was six years old, his mother took him to the king, and Dushyanta recognized his wife by a ring which he had given her. Sakuntala was now publicly proclaimed queen, and the boy (whose name was Bhârata) became the founder of the glorious race of the Bhâratas.

(This story forms the plot of the famous drama Sakuntala by Kâlidasa, well known to us through the translation of sir W. Jones.)

Sakya-Muni, the founder of Buddhism. Sakya is the family name of Siddhartha, and muni means "a recluse." Buddha ("perfection") is a title given to Siddhartha.

Salacaca'bia or SALACACABY, a soup said to have been served at the table of Apicius.

> Bruise in a mortar parsley seed, dried peneryal, dried mint, ginger, green coriander, stoned raisins, honey, vinegar, oil, and wine. Put them into a cacabâlum, with three crusts of Pycentine bread, the flesh of a pullet, vestine cheese, pine-kernels, cucumbers, and dried onions minced small. Pour soup over the whole, garnish with snow, and serve up in the cacabulum.—King: The Art of Cookery.

Sal'ace (3 syl.) or SALACIA, wife of Neptune, and mother of Triton.

> Triton, who boasts his high Neptunian race,
> Sprung from the god by Salace's embrace.
> Camoens: Lusiad, vi. (1572).

Salad Days, days of green youth, while the blood is still cool.

> [Those were] my salad days!
> When I was green in judgment, cold in blood.
> Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, act i. sc. 5 (1608).

Sal'adin, the soldan of the East. Sir W. Scott introduces him in The Talisman, first as Sheerkohf emir of Kurdistan, and subsequently as Adonbeck el Hakim' the physician.

Salamanca, the reputed home of witchcraft and devilry in De Lancre's time (1610).

Salamanca (The Bachelor of), the title and hero of a novel by Lesage. The name of the bachelor is don Cherubim, who is placed in all sorts of situations suitable to the author's vein of satire (1704).

Salamander (A). Prester John, in his letter to Manuel Comnênus emperor of Constantinople, describes the salamander as a worm, and says it makes cocoons like a silkworm. These cocoons, being unwound by the ladies of the palace, are spun into dresses for the imperial women. The dresses are washed in flames, and not in water. This, of course, is asbestos.

Sala'nio, a friend to Anthonio and Bassânio.—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice (1598).

Salari'no, a friend to Anthonio and Bassânio.—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice (1598).

Salathiel, the Wandering Jew, a romance by George Croly (1821).

Salchichon, a huge Italian sausage. Thomas duke of Genoa, a boy at Harrow school, put forward by general Prim as an "inflated candidate" for the Spanish throne, was nicknamed "Salchichon" by the Spaniards.

Sa'leh. The Thamûdites (3 syl.) proposed that Sâleh should, by miracle, prove that Jehovah was a God superior to their own. Prince Jonda said he would believe it, if Sâleh made a camel, big with young, come out of a certain rock which he pointed out. Sâleh did so, and Jonda was converted.

(The Thamûdites were idolaters, and Sâleh the prophet was sent to bring them back to the worship of Jehovah.)

Sâleh's Camel. The camel thus miraculously produced, used to go about the town, crying aloud, "Ho! every one that wanteth milk, let him come, and I will give it him."—Sale: Al Korân, vii. notes. (See Isa. lv. 1.)

Sa'leh, son of Faras'chê (3 syl.) queen of a powerful under-sea empire. His sister was Gulna'rê (3 syl.) empress of Persia. Saleh asked the king of Samandal, another under-sea emperor, to give his daughter Giauha'rê in marriage to prince Beder, son of Gulnarê; but the proud, passionate despot ordered the prince's head to be cut off for such presumptuous insolence. However, Saleh made his escape, invaded Samandal, took the king prisoner, and the marriage between Beder and the princess Giauharê was duly celebrated.—Arabian Nights ("Beder and Giauharê").

Sa'lem, a young seraph, one of the two tutelar angels of the Virgin Mary and of John the Divine, "for God had given to John two tutelar angels, the chief of whom was Raph'ael, one of the most exalted seraphs of the hierarchy of heaven."—Klopstock: The Messiah, iii. (1748).

Sal'emal, the preserver in sickness, one of the four gods of the Adites (2 syl.).—D'Herbelot: Bibliothèque Orientale (1697).

Salern' or Saler'no, in Italy, celebrated for its school of medicine.

> Even the doctors of Salern
> Send me back word they can discern
> No cure for a malady like this.
> Longfellow: The Golden Legend (1851).

Salian Franks. So called from the Isäla or Yssel, in Holland. They were a branch of the Sicambri; hence when Clovis was baptized at Rheims, the old prelate addressed him as "Sigambrian," and said that "he must henceforth set at nought what he had hitherto worshipped, and worship what he had hitherto set at nought."

Salisbury (Earl of), William Longsword, natural son of Henry II. and Jane Clifford "The Fair Rosamond." —Shakespeare: King John (1596); sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Sallust of France (The). César Vichard (1639–1692) was so called by Voltaire.

Sally in our Alley, a ballad in seven stanzas, by Henry Carey (1737).

> Of all the girls that are so smart
> There's none like pretty Sally;
> She is the darling of my heart,
> And she lives in our alley.

Sal'macis, softness, effeminacy. Salmăcis is a fountain of Caria, near Halicarnassus, which rendered soft and effeminate those who bathed therein.

> Beneath the woman's and the water's kiss,
> Thy moist limbs melted into Salmacis . . .
> And all the boy's breath softened into sighs.
> Swinburne: Hermaphroditus.

Salmigondin or "Salmygondin," a lordship of Dipsody, given by Pantag'ruel to Panurge (2 syl.). Aloofribas, who had resided six months in the giant's mouth without his knowing it, was made castellan of the castle.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, ii. 32; iii. 2 (1533–45).

The lordship of Salmygondin was worth 67 million pounds sterling per annum in "certain rent," and an annual revenue for locusts and periwinkles, varying from £24,357 to 25 millions in a good year, when the exports of locusts and periwinkles were flourishing. Panurge, however, could not make the two ends meet. At the close of "less than fourteen days" he had forestalled three years' rent and revenue, and had to apply to Pantagruel to pay his debts.—Pantag'ruel, iii. 2.

Salmo'neus (3 syl.), king of Elis, wishing to be thought a god, used to imitate thunder and lightning by driving his chariot over a brazen bridge, and darting burning torches on every side. He was killed by lightning for his impiety and folly.

> Salmoneus, who while he his carroach drave
> Over the brazen bridge of Elis' stream,
> And did with artificial thunder brave
> Jove, till he pierced him with a lightning beam.
> Lord Brooke: Treatise on Monarchie, vi.

It was to be the literary Salmoneus of the political Jupiter.—Lord Lytton.

Sa'lo, a rivulet now called Xalon, near Bilbilis, in Celtiberia. The river is so exceedingly cold that the Spaniards used to plunge their swords into it while they were hot from the forge. The best Spanish blades owe their stubborn temper to the icy coldness of this brook.

> Sævo Bilbilin optimam metallo
> Et ferro Plateam suo sonantem,
> Quam fluctu tenui sed inquiete
> Armorum Salo temperator ambit.
> Martial: Epigrammata.

Præcipua his quidem ferri materia, sed aqua ipsa ferro violentior; quippe temperamento ejus ferrum acrius redditur; nec ullum apud eos telum probatur quod non aut in Bilbili fluvio aut Chalybe tinguatur. Unde etiam Chalybes fluvii hujus finitimi appellati, ferroque cæteris præstare dicuntur.—Justin: Historiæ Philippicæ, xliv.

Salome and the Baptist. When Salomê delivered the head of John the Baptist to her mother, Herodias pulled out the tongue and stabbed it with her bodkin.

¶ When the head of Cicero was delivered to Marc Antony, his wife Fulvia pulled out the tongue and stabbed it repeatedly with her bodkin.

Salopia, Shropshire.

> Admired Salopia! that with venial pride
> Eyes her bright form in Severn's ambient wave;
> Famed for her loyal cares in perils tried,
> Her daughters lovely, and her striplings brave.
> Shenstone: The Schoolmistress (1758).

Salsabil, a fountain of paradise, the water of which is called Zenjebil. The word Salsabil means "that which goes pleasantly down the throat;" and Zenjebil means "ginger" (which the Arabs mix with the water that they drink).

God shall reward the righteous with a garden, and silk garments. They shall repose on couches. They shall see there neither sun nor moon . . . the fruit thereof shall hang low, so as to be easily gathered. The bottles shall be silver shining like glass, and the wine shall be mixed with the water Zenjebil, a fountain in paradise named Salsabil.—Sale: Al Kor'ân, lxxvi.

Salt River (To row up), to go against the stream, to suffer a political defeat.

There is a small stream called the Salt River in Kentucky, noted for its tortuous course and numerous bars. The phrase is applied to one who has the task of propelling the boat up the stream; but in political slang it is applied to those who are "rowed up."—Inman.

Salvage Knight (The), sir Arthegal, called Artegal from bk. iv. 6. The hero of bk. v. (Justice).—Spenser: Faërie Queene (1596).

Salva'tor Rosa (The English), John Hamilton Mortimer (1741-1779).

Salvato're (4 syl.), Salva'tor Rosa, an Italian painter, especially noted for his scenes of brigands, etc. (1615-1673).

But, ever and anon, to soothe your vision,
Fatigued with these hereditary glories,
There rose a Carlo Dolce or a Titian,
Or wilder group of savage Salvatore's.
Byron: Don Juan, xiii. 71 (1823).

SAM, a gentleman, the friend of Francis'co.—Fletcher: Mons. Thomas (1619).

Sam, one of the Know-Nothings or Native American party. One of "Uncle Sam's" sons.

Sam (Dicky), a Liverpool man.

Sam (Uncle), the United States of North America, or rather the government of the states personified. So called from Samuel Wilson, uncle of Ebenezer Wilson. Ebenezer was inspector of Elbert Anderson's store on the Hudson, and Samuel superintended the workmen. The stores were marked E·A. U·S. ("Elbert Anderson, United States"), but the workmen insisted that U·S. stood for "Uncle Sam."—Mr. Frost.

Sam Silverquill, one of the prisoners at Portanferry.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Sam Slick. (See Slick.)

Sam Weller. (See Weller.)

Sa'mael (3 syl.), the prince of demons, who, in the guise of a serpent, tempted Eve in paradise. (See Samiel.)

Samandal, the largest and most powerful of the under-sea empires. The inhabitants of these empires live under water without being wetted; transport themselves instantaneously from place to place; can live on our earth or in the Island of the Moon; are great sorcerers; and speak the language of "Solomon's seal."—Arabian Nights ("Beder and Giauharê").

Samarcand Apple, a perfect panacea of all diseases. It was bought by prince Ahmed, and was instrumental in restoring Nouroun'nihar to perfect health, although at the very point of death.

In fact, sir, there is no disease, however painful or dangerous, whether fever, pleurisy, plague, or any other disorder, but it will instantly cure; and that in the easiest possible way: it is simply to make the sick person smell of the apple.—Arabian Nights ("Ahmed and Pari-Banou").

Sam'benites [Sam'-be-neets], persons dressed in the sambentto, a yellow coat without sleeves, having devils painted on it. The sambenito was worn by "heretics" on their way to execution. (See San Benito.)

And blow us up i' the open streets,
Disguised in rumps, like sambenites.
S. Butler: Hudibras, iii. 2 (1678).

Sambo, any male of the negro race.

No race has shown such capabilities of adaptation to varying soil and circumstances as the negro. Alike to them the snows of Canada, the rocky land of New England or the gorgeous profusion of the Southern States. Sambo and Cuffey expand under them all.—Beecher Stowe.

Sam'eri (Al), the proselyte who cast the golden calf at the bidding of Aaron. After he had made it, he took up some dust on which Gabriel's horse had set its feet, threw it into the calf's mouth, and immediately the calf became animated and began to low. Al Beidâwi says that Al Sâmeri was not really a proper name, but that the real name of the artificer was Mûsa ebn Dhafar. Selden says Al Sâmeri means "the keeper," and that Aaron was so called, because he was the keeper or "guardian of the people."—Selden: De Diis Syrus, i. 4 (see Al Kor'ân, ii. notes).

Sa'mian (The Long-Haired), Pythagoras or Budda Ghooroos, a native of Samos (sixth century B.C.).

Samian He'ra. Hera or Herê, wife of Zeus, was born at Samos. She was worshipped in Egypt as well as in Greece.

Samian Letter (The), the letter Y, used by Pythagoras as an emblem of the path of virtue and of vice. Virtue is like the stem of the letter. Once deviated from, the further the lines are extended the wider the divergence becomes.

When reason, doubtful, like the Samian letter,
Points him two ways, the narrower the better.
Pope: The Dunciad, iv. (1742).

Et tibi quæ Samios diduxit littera ramos.
Persius: Satires.

Samian Sage (The), Pythagoras, born at Samos (sixth century B.C.).

'Tis enough
In this late age, adventurous to have touched
Light on the numbers of the Samian Sage.
Thomson.

Samias'a, a seraph, in love with Aholiba'mah the granddaughter of Cain. When the Flood came, the seraph carried off his innamorata to another planet.—Byron: Heaven and Earth (1819).

Sa'miel, the Black Huntsman of the Wolf's Glen, who gave to Der Freischütz seven balls, six of which were to hit whatever the marksman aimed at, but the seventh was to be at the disposal of Samiel. (See SAMAEL.)—Weber: Der Freischütz (libretto by Kind, 1822).

Samiel Wind (The), the simoom.

Burning and headlong as the Samiel wind.
Moore: Lalla Rookh, i. (1817).

Samient, the female ambassador of queen Mercilla to queen Adicia (wife of the soldan). Adicia treated her with great contumely, thrust her out of doors, and induced two knights to insult her; but sir Artegal, coming up, drove at one of the unmannerly knights with such fury as to knock him from his horse and break his neck.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. (1596).

(This refers to the treatment of the deputies sent by the states of Holland to Spain for the redress of grievances. Philip ("the soldan") detained the deputies as prisoners, disregarding the sacred rights of their office as ambassadors.)

Sam'ite (2 syl.), a very rich silk, sometimes interwoven with gold or silver thread.

. . . an arm
Rose up from the bosom of the lake,
Clothed in white samite.
Tennyson: Morte d'Arthur (1858).

Sam'ma, the demoniac that John "the Beloved" could not exorcise. Jesus, coming from the Mount of Olives, rebuked Satan, who quitted "the possessed," and left him in his right mind.—Klopstock: The Messiah, ii. (1748).

Sam'oed Shore (The). Samoi'eda is a province of Muscövy, contiguous to the Frozen Sea.

Now, from the north
Of Norumbega, and the Samoed shore, . . .
Bowes and Circles . . . rend the woods, and seas upturn.
Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 695 (1665).

SAMPSON, one of Capulet's servants.—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet (1597).

Sampson, a foolish advocate, kinsman of judge Vertaigne (2 syl.).—Fletcher: The Little French Lawyer (1647).

Sampson (Dominie) or Abel Sampson, tutor to Harry Bertram son of the laird of Ellangowan. One of the best creations of romance. His favourite exclamation is "Prodigious!" Dominie Sampson is very learned, simple, and green. Sir Walter describes him as "a poor, modest, humble scholar, who had won his way through the classics, but fallen to the leeward in the voyage of life."—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

His appearance puritanical. Ragged black clothes, blue worsted stockings, pewter-headed long cane.—Guy Mannering (dramatized), i. 2.

Sampson (George), a friend of the Wilfer family. He adored Bella Wilfer, but married her youngest sister Lavinia.—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1864).

Samson. (See HERCULES, p. 485.)
The British Samson, Thomas Topham (1710–1749).
The North American Indian Samson, Kwasind.

Samson Agonistes (4 syl.), "Samson the Combatant," a sacred drama by Milton, showing Samson blinded and bound, but triumphant over his enemies, who sent for him to make sport by feats of strength on the feast of Dagon. Having amused the multitude for a time, he was allowed to rest awhile against the "grand stand," and, twining his arms round two of the supporting pillars, he pulled the whole edifice down, and died himself in the general devastation (1632).

Samson's Crown, an achievement of great renown, which costs the life of the doer thereof. Samson's greatest exploit was pulling down the "grand stand" occupied by the chief magnates of Philistia at the feast of Dagon. By this deed, "he slew at his death more than [all] they which he slew in his life."—Judg. xvi. 30.

And by self-ruin seek a Samson's crown.
Lord Brooke: Inquisition upon Fame, etc. (1554–1628).

Samuel (The Books of), two books which carry the history of the Hebrews from Eli (the high priest) almost to the close of David's reign, about 140 years.

Eli 40 years, Samuel judge 21 years, Saul king 40 years, David king 40 years. Originally the two Books of Samuel were called The First Book of Kings, and our two Books of Kings were then called The Second Book of Kings. The First Book of Samuel records the famous fight between David (the stripling) and Goliath the giant of Gath.

San Ben'ito, a short linen dress, with demons painted on it, worn by persons condemned by the Inquisition. (See SAMBENITES.)

For some time the "traitor Newman" was solemnly paraded in inquisitorial san benito before the enlightened public.—Yates: Celebrities, xxii.

San Bris (Conte di), father of Valenti'na. During the Bartholomew slaughter, his daughter and her husband (Raoul) were both shot by a party of musketeers, under the count's command.—Meyerbeer: Les Huguenots (opera, 1836).

Sancha, daughter of Garcias king of Navarre, and wife of Fernan Gonsalez of Castile. Sancha twice saved the life of her husband: (1) when he was cast into a dungeon by some personal enemies who waylaid him, she liberated him by bribing the jailer; and (2) when he was incarcerated at Leon, she effected his escape by changing clothes with him.

¶ The countess of Nithsdale effected the escape of her husband from the Tower, in 1715, by changing clothes with him.

¶ The countess de Lavalette, in 1815, liberated her husband, under sentence of death, in the same way; but the terror she suffered so affected her nervous system that she lost her senses, and never afterwards recovered them.

San'chez II. of Castile was killed at the battle of Zamo'ra, 1065.

It was when brave king Sanchez
Was before Zamora slain.
Longfellow: The Challenge.

Sanchi'ca, eldest daughter of Sancho and Teresa Panza.—Cervantes: Don Quixote (1605-15).

Sancho (Don), a rich old beau, uncle to Victoria. "He affects the misdemeanours of a youth, hides his baldness with amber locks, and complains of toothache, to make people believe that his teeth are not false ones." Don Sancho "loves in the style of Roderigo I."—Mrs. Cowley: A Bold Stroke for a Husband (1782).

Sancho Panza, the 'squire of don Quixote. A short, pot-bellied peasant, with plenty of shrewdness and good common sense. He rode upon an ass which he dearly loved, and was noted for his proverbs.

Sancho Panza's Ass, Dapple.

Sancho Panza's Island-City, Barataria, where he was for a time governor.

Sancho Panza's Wife, Teresa [Cascajo] (pt. II. i. 5); Maria or Mary [Gutierez] (pt. II. iv. 7); Dame Juana [Gutieres] (pt. I. i. 7); and Joan (pt. I. iv. 21).—Cervantes: Don Quixote (1605-15).

(The model painting of Sancho Panza is by Leslie; it is called "Sancho and the Duchess.")

Sanchoni'athon or SANCHONIATHO. Nine books ascribed to this author were published at Bremen in 1837. The original was said to have been discovered in the convent of St. Maria de Merinhão, by colonel Pereira, a Portuguese; but it was soon ascertained that no such convent existed, that there was no colonel of the name of Pereira in the Portuguese service, and that the paper bore the water-mark of the Osnabrück paper-mills. (See FORGERS, p. 386.)

Sanct-Cyr (Hugh de), the seneschal of king René, at Aix.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Sancy Diamond (The) weighs 53⅛ carats, and belonged to Charles "the Bold" of Burgundy. It was bought, in 1495, by Emmanuel of Portugal, and was sold, in 1580, by don Antonio to the sieur de Sancy, in whose family it remained for a century. The sieur deposited it with Henri IV. as a security for a loan of money. The servant entrusted with it, being attacked by robbers, swallowed it, and being murdered, the diamond was recovered by Nicholas de Harlay. We next hear of it in the possession of James II. of England, who carried it with him in his flight, in 1688. Louis XIV. bought it of him for £25,000. It was sold in the Revolution; Napoleon I. rebought it; in 1825 it was sold to Paul Demidoff for £80,000. The prince sold it, in 1830, to M. Levrat, administrator of the Mining Society; but as Levrat failed in his engagement, the diamond became, in 1832, the subject of a lawsuit, which was given in favour of the prince. We next hear of it in Bombay; in 1867 it was transmitted to England by the firm of Forbes and Co.; in 1873 it formed part of "the crown necklace" worn by Mary of Sachsen Altenburg on her marriage with Albert of Prussia; in 1876, in the investiture of the Star of India by the prince of Wales, in Calcutta, Dr. W. H.

Russell tells us it was worn as a pendant by the maharajah of Puttiala.

N.B.—Streeter, in his book of Precious Stones and Gems, 120 (1876), tells us it belongs to the czar of Russia, but if Dr. Russell is correct, it must have been sold to the maharajah.

Sand (George). Her birth-name was Amantine Lucile Aurore Dupin, afterwards Dudevant (1804–1877). ("Sand" is half Sandeau (Jules), a young man who assisted her in bringing out some of her earlier works.)

Sand-Bag. Only knights were allowed to fight with lance and sword; meaner men used an ebon staff, to one end of which was fastened a sand-bag.

> Engaged with money-bags, as bold
> As men with sand-bags did of old.
> S. Butler Hudibras (1663–78).

San'dabar, an Arabian writer, about a century before the Christian era, famous for his Parables.

> It was rumoured he could say . . .
> The Parables of Sandabar.
> Longfellow: The Wayside Inn (prelude, 1863).

Sandalphon, one of the three angels who, according to the rabbinical system of angelology, receive the prayers of the Israelites and weave them into crowns.

> Sandalphon, the angel of prayer.
> Longfellow: Sandalphon.

Sanden, the great palace of king Lion, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498).

Sandford (Harry), the companion of Tommy Merton.—T. Day: History of Sandford and Merton (1783–9).

Sandstone (The Old Red), a geological treatise by Hugh Miller (1841).

San'glamore (3 syl.), the sword of Braggadochio.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. (1590).

Sanglier (Sir), a knight who insisted on changing wives with a squire, and when the lady objected, he cut off her head, and rode off with the squire's wife. Being brought before sir Artegal, sir Sanglier insisted that the living lady was his wife, and that the dead woman was the squire's wife. Sir Artegal commanded that the living and dead women should both be cut in twain, and half of each be given to the two litigants. To this sir Sanglier gladly assented; but the squire objected, declaring it would be far better to give the lady to the knight than that she should suffer death. On this, sir Artegal pronounced the living woman to be the squire's wife, and the dead one to be the knight's.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 1 (1596).

("Sir Sanglier" is meant for Shan O'Neil, leader of the Irish insurgents in 1567. Of course, this judgment is borrowed from that of Solomon, 1 Kings iii. 16–27.)

Sanglier des Ardennes, Guillaume de la Marck (1446–1485).

Sangraal, Sancgreal, etc., generally said to be the holy plate from which Christ ate at the Last Supper, brought to England by Joseph of Arimathy. Whatever it was, it appeared to king Arthur and his 150 knights of the Round Table, but suddenly vanished, and all the knights vowed they would go in quest thereof. Only three, sir Bors, sir Percivale, and sir Galahad, found it, and only sir Galahad touched it, but he soon died, and was borne by angels up into heaven. The sangraal of Arthurian romance is "the dish" containing Christ transubstantiated by the sacrament of the Mass, and made visible to the bodily eye of man. This will appear quite obvious to the reader by the following extracts:—

> Then anon they heard cracking and crying of thunder. . . . In the midst of the blast entered a sunbeam more clear by seven times than the day, and all they were alighted of the grace of the Holy Ghost. . . . Then there entered into the hall the Holy Grale covered with white samite, but there was none that could see it, nor who bare it, but the whole hall was full filled with good odours, and every knight had such meat and drink as he best loved in the world, and when the Holy Grale had been borne through the hall, then the holy vessel departed suddenly, and they wist not whose it became.—Ch. 35.
> Then looked they and saw a man come out of the holy vessel, that had all the signs of the passion of Christ, and he said . . . "This is the holy dish wherein I ate the lamb on Sher-Thursday, and now hast thou seen it . . . yet hast thou not seen it so openly as thou shalt see it in the city of Sarras . . . therefore thou must go hence and bear with thee this holy vessel, for this night it shall depart from the realm of Logris . . . and take with thee . . . sir Percivale and sir Bors."—Ch. 107.
> So departed sir Galahad, and sir Percivale and sir Bors with him. And so they rode three days, and came to a river, and found a ship . . . and when on board, they found in the midst the table of silver and the Sancgreall covered with white samite. . . . Then sir Galahad laid him down and slept . . . and when he woke . . . he saw the city of Sarras (ch. 109). . . . At the year's end, . . . he saw before him the holy vessel, and a man kneeling upon his knees in the likeness of the bishop, which had about him a great fellowship of angels, as it had been Christ Himself . . . and when he came to the sakering of the Mass, and had done, anon he called sir Galahad, and said unto him, "Come forth, . . . and thou shalt see that which thou hast much desired to see" . . . and he beheld spiritual things . . . (ch. 124).—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 35, 101, 204 (1470).

N.B.—The earliest story of the holy graal was in verse (A.D. 1100), author unknown.

Chrétien de Troyes has a romance in eight-syllable verse on the same subject (1170).

Guiot's tale of Titurel founder of Graal-burg, and Parsival prince thereof, belongs to the twelfth century.

Wolfram von Eschenbach, a minnesinger, took Guiot's tale as the foundation of his poem (thirteenth century).

In Titurel the Younger the subject is very fully treated.

Sir T. Malory (in pt. iii. of the History of Prince Arthur, translated in 1470 from the French) treats the subject in prose very fully.

R. S. Hawker has a poem on the Sangraal, but it was never completed.

Tennyson has an idyll called The Holy Grail (1858).

Boisserée published, in 1834, at Munich, a work On the Description of the Temple of the Holy Graal.

Sangra'do (Doctor), of Valladolid. This is the "Sagredo" of Espinel's romance called Marcos de Obregon. "The doctor was a tall, meagre, pale man, who had kept the shears of Clotho employed for forty years at least. He had a very solemn appearance, weighed his discourse, and used 'great pomp of words.' His reasonings were geometrical, and his opinions his own." Dr. Sangrado considered that blood was not needful for life, and that hot water could not be administered too plentifully into the system. Gil Blas became his servant and pupil, and was allowed to drink any quantity of water, but to eat only sparingly of beans, peas, and stewed apples.

Other physicians make the healing art consist in the knowledge of a thousand different sciences, but I go a shorter way to work, and spare the trouble of studying pharmacy, anatomy, botany, and physic. Know, then, that all which is required is to bleed the patients copiously, and make them drink warm water.—Lesage: Gil Blas, ii. 2 (1715).

¶ Dr. Rezio of Barataria allowed Sancho Panza to eat "a few wafers and a thin slice or two of quince."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iii. 10 (1615).

Sanjak-Sherif, the banner of Mahomet. (See p. 654.)

Sansar, the icy wind of death, kept in the deepest entrails of the earth, called in Thalaba "Sarsar."

She passed by rapid descents known only to Eblis, . . and thus penetrated the very entrails of the earth, where breathes the Sansar or icy wind of death.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Sansculottes (3 syl.), a low, riff-raff party in the great French Revolution, so shabby in dress that they were termed "the trouser-less." The culotte is the breeches, called bræck by the ancient Gauls, and hauts-de-chausses in the reign of Charles IX.

Sansculottism, red republicanism, or the revolutionary platform of the Sansculottes.

The duke of Brunswick, at the head of a large army, invaded France to restore Louis XVI. to the throne, and save legitimacy from the sacrilegious hands of sansculottism.—G. H. Lewes: Story of Goethe's Life.

Literary Sansculottism, literature of a low character, like that of the "Minerva Press," the "Leipsic Fair," "Hollywell Street," "Grub Street," and so on.

Sansfoy, a "faithless Saracen," who attacked the Red Cross Knight, but was slain by him. "He cared for neither God nor man." Sansfoy personifies infidelity.

Sansfoy, full large of limb and every joint
He was, and cared not for God or man a point.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, I. 2 (1590).

Sansjoy, brother of Sansfoy. When he came to the court of Lucifera, he noticed the shield of Sansfoy on the arm of the Red Cross Knight, and his rage was so great that he was with difficulty restrained from running on the champion there and then, but Lucifera bade him defer the combat to the following day. Next day, the fight began; but just as the Red Cross Knight was about to deal his adversary a death-blow, Sansjoy was enveloped in a thick cloud, and carried off in the chariot of Night to the infernal regions, where Æsculapius healed him of his wounds.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, I. 4, 5 (1590).

(The reader will doubtless call to remember how the Trojan in his combat of Menelãos and Paris, in a cloud and carried off by Venus, in similar circumstances.—Hom. Iliad iii.)

Sansloy ["superstition"], the brother of Sansfoy and Sansjoy. He carried off Una to the wilderness, but when the fauns and satyrs came to her rescue, he saved himself by flight.

 The meaning of this allegory is this: Una (truth), separated from St. George (holiness), is deceived by Hypocrisy; and immediately truth joins hypocrisy, it is carried away by superstition. Spenser says the "simplicity of truth" abides with the common people, especially of the rural districts, after it is lost to towns and the luxurious great. The historical reference is to queen Mary, in whose reign Una (the Reformation) was carried captive, and religion, being mixed up with hyprocisy, degenerated into superstition; but the rural population adhered to the simplicity of the protestant faith.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. 2 (1590).

Sansonetto, a Christian regent of Mecca, vicegerent of Charlemagne.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Sansuenna, now Saragossa (q.v.).

Santa Casa, the house occupied by the Virgin Mary at her conception, and miraculously removed, in 1291, from Galilee to Loretto (q.v.).

Santa Klaus (1 syl.), the Dutch name of St. Nicholas, the patron saint of boys.

In Flanders and Holland, the children put out their shoe or stocking on Christmas Eve, in the confidence that Santa Klaus or Knecht Clobes (as they call him) will put in a prize for good conduct before morning.—Yonge.

Santiago [Sent-yah'-go], the war-cry of Spain; adopted because St. James (Sant Iago) rendered, according to tradition, signal service to a Christian king of Spain in a battle against the Moors.

Santiago for Spain. This saint was James, son of Zebedee, brother of John. He was beheaded, and caught his head in his hands as it fell. The Jews were astonished, but when they touched the body they found it so cold that their hands and arms were paralyzed.—Francisco Xavier: Anales de Galicia (1733).

Santiago's Head. When Santiago went to Spain in his marble ship, he had no head on his body. The passage took seven days, and the ship was steered by the "presiding hand of Providence."—España Sagrada, xx. 6.

Santiago had two heads. One of his heads is at Braga, and one at Compostella.

John the Baptist had half a dozen heads at the least, and as many bodies, all capable of working miracles.

Santiago leads the armies of Spain. Thirty-eight instances of the interference of this saint are gravely set down as facts in the Chronicles of Galicia, and this is superadded: "These instances are well known, but I hold it for certain that the appearances of Santiago in our victorious armies have been much more numerous, and in fact that every victory obtained by the Spaniards has been really achieved by this great captain." Once, when the rider on the white horse was asked in battle who he was, he distinctly made answer, "I am the soldier of the King of kings, and my name is James."—Don Miguel Erce Gimenez: Armas i Triunfos del Reino de Galicia, 648–9.

The true name of this saint was Jacobo. . . . We have first shortened Santo Jacobo into Santo Jac'o. We clipped it again into Sant Jaco, and by changing the J into I and the c into g, we get Sant Iago. In household names we convert Iago into D'iago or Diago, which we soften into Diego.—Ambrosio de Morales, Coronica General de España, ix. 7, sect. 2 (1586).

Santons, a body of religionists, also called Abdals, who pretended to be inspired with the most enthusiastic raptures of divine love. They were regarded by the vulgar as saints.—Olearius: Reisebeschreibung, i. 971 (1647).

He diverted himself with the number of calenders, santons, and dervises, who were continually coming and going, but especially with the Brahmins, faquirs, and other enthusiasts, who had travelled from the heart of India, and halted on their way with the emir.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Sapphi'ra, a female liar.—Acts v. 1.

She is called the village Sapphira.
Crabbe.

Sappho, in Pope's Moral Essays (epistle ii. lines 24–28), is meant for lady Mary Wortley Montagu.

Pope wrote an amatory poem which he entitled Sappho to Phaon.

The English Sappho, Mrs. Mary D. Robinson (1758–1800).

The French Sappho, Mlle. Scudéri (1607–1701).

The Scotch Sappho, Catherine Cockburn (1679–1749).

Sappho of Toulouse, Clémence Isaure (2 syl.), who instituted, in 1490, Les Jeux Floraux. She is the authoress of a beautiful Ode to Spring (1463–1513).

Sapskull, a raw Yorkshire tike, son of squire Sapskull of Sapskull Hall. Sir Penurious Muckworm wishes him to marry his niece and ward Arbella; but as Arbella loves Gaylove a young barrister, the tike is played upon thus—Gaylove assumes to be Muckworm, and his lad Slango dresses up as a woman to pass for Arbella; and while Sapskull "marries" Slango, Gaylove, who assumes the dress and manners of the Yorkshire tike, marries Arbella. Of course, the trick is then discovered, and Sapskull returns to the home of his father, befooled but not married.—Carey: The Honest Yorkshireman (1736).

Saracen (A), in Arthurian romance, means any unbaptized person, regardless of nationality. Thus, Priamus of Tuscany is called a Saracen (pt. i. 96, 67); so is sir Palomides, simply because he refused to be baptized till he had done some noble deed (pt. ii.).—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur (1470).

Saragossa, a corruption of Cæsarēa Augusta. The city was rebuilt by Augustus, and called after his name. Its former name was Salduba or Saldyva.

Saragossa (The Maid of), Augustina Zaragossa or Saragoza. When, in 1808, the city was invested by the French, she mounted the battery in the place of her lover who had been shot. Lord Byron says, when he was at Seville, "the maid" used to walk daily on the prado, decorated with medals and orders, by command of the junta. — Southey: History of the Peninsular War (1832).

Her lover sinks—she sheds no ill-timed tear;
Her chief is slain—she fills his fatal post;
Her fellows flee—she checks their base career;
The foe retires—she heads the sallying host.
. . . the flying Gaul,
Foiled by a woman's hand before a battered wall.
Byron: Childe Harold, i. 56 (1809).

Sardanapa'lus, king of Nineveh and Assyria, noted for his luxury and voluptuousness. Arbācês the Mede conspired against him, and defeated him; whereupon his favourite slave Myrra induced him to immolate himself on a funeral pile. The beautiful slave, having set fire to the pile, jumped into the blazing mass, and was burnt to death with the king her master (B.C. 817).—Byron: Sardanapalus (1819).

Sardanapa'lus of China (The), Cheo-tsin, who shut himself up in his palace with his queen, and then set fire to the building, that he might not fall into the hands of Woo-wong (B.C. 1154–1122).

Sardanapa'lus of Germany (The), Wenceslas VI. (or IV.) king of Bohemia and emperor of Germany (1359, 1378–1419).

Sardoin Herb (The), the herba Sardon'ia; so called from Sardis, in Asia Minor. It is so acrid as to produce a convulsive spasm of the face resembling a grin. Phineas Fletcher says the device on the shield of Flattery is—

The Sardoin herb . . . the word [motto] "I please in killing."
The Purple Island, viii. (1633).

Sardonian Smile or Grin, a smile of contempt. Byron expresses it when he says, "There was a laughing devil in his sneer."

But when the villain saw her so afraid,
He 'gan with guileful words her to persuade
To banish fear, and with Sardonian smile
Laughing at her, his false intent to shade.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 9 (1596).

Sarma'tia, Poland, the country of the Sarmatæ. In 1795 Poland was partitioned between Russia, Prussia, and Austria.

Oh, bloodiest picture in the book of Time!
Sarmatia fell unwept, without a crime,
Found not a generous friend, a pitying foe,
Strength in her arms, nor mercy in her woe
Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, i. (1799).

Sar'ra (Grain of), Tyrian dye; so called from sarra or sar, the fish whose blood the men of Tyre used in their purple dye.—Virgil: Georgics, ii. 506.

A military vest of purple . . .
Livelier than . . . the grain
Of Sarra, worn by kings and heroes old
In time of truce.
Milton: Paradise Lost, xi. 243 (1665).

Sarsar, the icy wind of death, called in Vathek "Sansar."

The Sarsar from its womb went forth,
The icy wind of death.
Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, i. 44 (1797).

Sartor Resartus, "The Life and Opinions of Herr Teufelsdröckh," in three books, by Thomas Carlyle (1833-34).

The title is not original, but the book is a philosophical romance, or pretended review of an hypothetical German work on dress, which gives scope to the author for remarks on all sorts of things. The words Sartor Resartus mean The Tailor tailored, or Teufelsdröckh patched by Carlyle.

Sassenach, a Saxon, an Englishman. (Welsh, seasonig adj. and saesoniad noun.)

I would, if I thought I'd be able to catch some of the Sassenachs in London.—Very Far West Indeed.

Satan, according to the Talmud, was once an archangel; but was cast out of heaven with one-third of the celestial host for refusing to do reverence to Adam.

In mediæval mythology, Satan holds the fifth rank of the nine demoniacal orders.

Johan Wier, in his De Præstigiis Dæmonum (1564), makes Beelzebub the sovereign of hell, and Satan leader of the opposition.

In legendary lore, Satan is drawn with horns and a tail, saucer eyes, and claws; but Milton makes him a proud, selfish, ambitious chief, of gigantic size, beautiful, daring, and commanding. Satan declares his opinion that "'tis better to reign in hell than serve in heaven."

(Defoe has written a Political History of the Devil, 1726.)

Satan, according to Milton, monarch of hell. His chief lords are Beëlzebub, Moloch, Chemos, Thammuz, Dagon, Rimmon, and Belial. His standard-bearer is Azar'el.

He [Satan], above the rest
In shape and gesture proudly eminent,
Stood like a tower. His form had not yet lost
All her original brightness; nor appeared
Less than archangel ruined, and the excess
Of glory obscured . . . but his face
Deep scars of thunder had intrenched, and care
Sat on his faded cheek . . . cruel his eye, but cast
Signs of remorse.
Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 589, etc. (1665).

 The word Satan means "enemy;" hence Milton says—

To whom the arch-enemy,
. . In heaven called paradise.
Paradise Lost, i. 81 (1665).

(Robert Montgomery, in 1830, published a poem called Satan, a long soliloquy of five or six thousand lines of blank verse, which obtained for its author the sobriquet of "Satan Montgomery.")

Satan is made to talk about geography, politics, newspapers, fashionable society, theatres, lord Byron, and even Martin's pictures.

Satanic School (The), a class of writers in the earlier part of the nineteenth century, who showed a scorn for all moral rules, and the generally received dogmas of the Christian religion. The most eminent English writers of this school were Bulwer (afterwards lord Lytton), Byron, Moore, and P. B. Shelley. Of French writers: Paul de Kock, Rousseau, George Sand, and Victor Hugo.

Immoral writers . . . men of diseased hearts and depraved imaginations, who (forming a system of opinions to suit their own unhappy course of conduct) have rebelled against the holiest ordinances of human society, and hating revelation which they try in vain to disbelieve, labour to make others as miserable as themselves by infecting them with a moral virus that eats into their soul. The school which they have set up may properly be called "The Satanic School."—Southey: Vision of Judgment (preface, 1822).

Satire (Father of), Archilŏchos of Paros (B.C. seventh century).

Father of French Satire, Mathurin Regnier (1573–1613).

Father of Roman Satire, Lucilius (B.C. 148–103).

Satires by Pope (1733–1738). His masterpieces, which gained him the name of the "English Horace."

(The Satires of Dr. Donne (1719), and those of bishop Hall in six books, three of which are Toothless Satires and three Biting Satires, are pronounced by Pope to be the best in the language.)

Satiro-mastix or The Untrussing of the Humorous Poet, a comedy by Thomas Dekker (1602). Ben Jonson, in 1601, had attacked Dekker in The Poetaster, where he calls himself "Horace," and Dekker "Oris'pinus." Next year (1602) Dekker replied with spirit to this attack, in a comedy entitled Satiro-mastix, where Jonson is called "Horace, junior."

Satis House, the abode of Miss Haversham, in Dickens's Great Expectations. The name was given to a house near Boley Hill, Rochester, where Richard Watts, in 1573, entertained queen Elizabeth. When the host apologized for the smallness of the house, the queen replied, Satis (it is enough); and the house was so called.

Saturday, a fatal day to the following English sovereigns from the establishment of the Tudor dynasty:—

HENRY VII. died Saturday, April 21, 1509.

GEORGE II. died Saturday, October 25, 1760.

GEORGE III. died Saturday, January 29, 1820, but of his fifteen children only three died on a Saturday.

GEORGE IV. died Saturday, June 26, 1830, but the princess Charlotte died on a Tuesday.

PRINCE ALBERT died Saturday, December 14, 1861. The duchess of Kent, the duchess of Cambridge, and the princess Alice died on a Saturday also.

 William III. (March 8, 1702), Anne (August 1, 1714), and George I. all died on a Sunday; William IV. (June 20, 1837) on a Tuesday.

Saturn, son of Heaven and Earth. He always swallowed his children immediately they were born, till his wife Rhea, not liking to see all her children perish, concealed from him the birth of Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto; and gave her husband large stones instead, which he swallowed without knowing the difference.

Much as old Saturn ate his progeny;
For when his pious consort gave him stones
In lieu of sons, of these he made no bones.
Byron: Don Juan, xiv. 1 (1824).

Saturn, an evil and malignant planet.

He is a genius full of gall, an author born under the planet Saturn, a malicious mortal, whose pleasure consists in hating all the world.—Lesage: Gil Blas, v. 12 (1724).

The children born under the sayd Saturne shall be great jangeleres and chyders . . . and they will never forgyve tyll they be revenged of theyr quarell.—Ptholomeus: Compost.

Satyr. T. Woolner calls Charles II. "Charles the Satyr."

Next flared Charles Satyr's saturnalia
Of lady nymphs.
My Beautiful Lady.

N.B.—The most famous statue of the satyrs is that by Praxitĕlês of Athens, in the fourth century.

Satyrane (Sir), a blunt but noble knight, who helps Una to escape from the fauns and satyrs.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. (1590).

And passion, erst unknown, could gain
The breast of blunt sir Satyrane.
Sir W. Scott.

("Sir Satyrane" is meant for sir John Perrot, a natural son of Henry VIII., and lord deputy of Ireland from 1583 to 1588. In 1590 he was imprisoned in the Tower for treason, and was beheaded in 1592.)

Satyr'icon, a comic romance in Latin, by Petro'nius Ar'biter, in the first century. Very gross, but showing great power, beauty, and skill.

Saul, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Oliver Cromwell. As Saul persecuted David and drove him from Jerusalem, so Cromwell persecuted Charles II. and drove him from England.

. . . ere Saul they chose,
God was their king, and God they durst depose.
Dryden: Pt. i. 418, 419 (1681).

∴ This was the "divine right" of kings.

(William Sothern published, in 1807, a poem in blank verse called Saul.)

Saul of Tarsus, it is said (Acts ix. 25), when he fled from Damascus, was let down over the wall in a basket.

¶ A parallel case is that of Carolstadt, the image-breaker, who, in 1524, would have been captured at Rotenbergh, but he made his escape "by being let down by the wall of the town in a basket."—Milman: Ecclesiastical History, iv. p. 266.

Saunders, groom of sir Geoffrey Peveril of the Peak.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Saunders (Richard), the pseudonym of Dr. Franklin, adopted in Poor Richard's Almanac, begun in 1732.

Saunders Sweepclean, a king's messenger at Knockwinnock Castle.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Saunderson (Saunders), butler, etc., to Mr. Cosmo Comyne Bradwardine baron of Bradwardine and Tully Veolan.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Saurid, king of Egypt, say the Coptites (2 syl.), built the pyramids 300 years before the Flood; and, according to the same authority, the following inscription was engraved upon one of them:—

I, king Saurid, built the pyramids . . . and finished them in six years. He that comes after me . . . let him destroy them in 600 if he can . . . I also covered them . . . with satin, and let him cover them with matting.
—Greaves: Pyramidographia (seventeenth century)

Saut de l'Allemand (Le), "du lit à la table, et de la table au lit."

Of the gods I but ask
That my life, like the Leap of the German, may be
"Du lit à la table, de la table au lit."
Moore: The Fudge Family in Paris, viii. (1818).

Savage (Captain), a naval commander.—Marryat: Peter Simple (1833).

Sav'il, steward to the elder Loveless.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Scornful Lady (1616).

(Beaumont died 1616.)

Savile Row (London). So called from Dorothy Savile the great heiress, who became, by marriage, countess of Burlington and Cork. (See CLIFFORD STREET, p. 219.)

Sav'ille (2 syl.), the friend of Doricourt. He saves lady Frances Touchwood from Courtall, and frustrates his infamous designs on the lady's honour.—Mrs. Cowley: The Belle's Stratagem (1780).

Saville (Lord), a young nobleman with Chiffinch (emissary of Charles II.).—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Saviour of Rome. C. Marius was so called after the overthrow of the Cimbri, July 30, B.C. 101.

Saviour of the Nations. So the duke of Wellington was termed after the overthrow of Bonaparte (1769–1852).

Oh, Wellington . . . called "Saviour of the Nations!
Byron: Don Juan, ix. 5 (1824).

Savoy (The), a precinct of the Strand (London), in which the Savoy Palace stood. So called from Peter earl of Savoy, uncle of queen Eleanor the wife of Henry III. Jean le Bon of France, when captive of the Black Prince, was lodged in the Savoy Palace (1356–59). The old palace was burnt down by the rebels under Wat Tyler in 1381. Henry VII. rebuilt it in 1505. St. Mary le Savoy, or the "Chapel of St. John," still stands in the precinct.

Sawney, a corruption of Sandie, a contracted form of Alexander. Sawney means a Scotchman, as Taffy [David] a Welshman, John Bull an Englishman, cousin Michael a German, brother Jonathan a native of the United States of North America, Micaire a Frenchman, Jean Baptist a French Canadian, Colin Tampon a Swiss, and so on.

Sawyer (Bob), a dissipated, struggling young medical practitioner, who tries to establish a practice at Bristol, but without success. Sam Weller calls him "Mr. Sawbones."—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Sax'ifrage (3 syl.). So called from its virtues as a lithontriptic.

So saxifrage is good, and hart's-tongue for the stone,
With agrimony, and that herb we call St. John.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Saxon. Hidgen derives this word from the Latin saxum, "a stone." This reminds one of Lloyd's derivation of "Ireland," "the land of Ire," and Ducange's "Saracen" from "Sarah, Abraham's wife." Of a similar character are "Albion" from albus, "white;" "Picts" from pictus, "painted;" "Devonshire" from Debon's share; "Isle of Wight" from "Wihtgar, son of Cerdic;" "Britain" from Brutus, a descendant of Ænēas; "Scotland" from skotos, "darkness;" "Gaul" (the French) from gallus, "a cock;" "Dublin," from dub[ium] lin[teum], "questionable linen," and so on.

Men of that cowntree ben more lyghter and stronger on the see than other scommers or theeves of the see . . . and ben called Saxones, of saxum, a stone, for they ben as hard as stones.—Polycronicon, i. 96 (1357).

Saxon, Drayton says, is so called from an instrument of war called by the Germans handseax. The seax was a short, crooked sword.

And of those crooked skains they used in war to bear,
Which in their thundering tongue the German's handseax name,
They Saxons first were named.
Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

Saxon Duke (The), mentioned by Sam Butler in his Hudibras, was John Frederick duke of Saxony, of whom Charles V. said, "Never saw I such a swine before."

Say. They say. Quhat say they? Let them say. This motto of Mareschal College, Aberdeen, is the motto of George Keith, its founder.

Say and Mean. You speak like a Laminak, you say one thing and mean another. The Basque Lamiñaks ("fairies") always say exactly the contrary to what they mean.

She said to her, "I must go from home, but your work is in the kitchen; smash the pitcher, break all the plates, beat the children, give them their breakfast by themselves, smudge their faces, and rumple well their hair." When the Lamiñak returned home, she asked the girl which she preferred—a bag of charcoal or a bag of gold, a beautiful star or a donkey's tail? The girl made answer, "A bag of charcoal and a donkey's tail." Whereupon the fairy gave her a bag of gold and a beautiful star.—Webster: Basque Legends, 53 (1876).

Sboga (Jean), the hero of a romance by C. Nodier (1818), the leader of a bandit, in the spirit of lord Byron's Corsair and Lara.

Scadder (General), agent in the office of the "Eden Settlement." His peculiarity consisted in the two distinct expressions of his profile, for "one side seemed to be listening to what the other side was doing."—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Scalds, court poets and chroniclers of the ancient Scandinavians. They resided at court, were attached to the royal suite, and attended the king in all his wars. They also acted as ambassadors between hostile tribes, and their persons were held sacred. These bards celebrated in song the gods, the kings of Norway, and national heroes. Their lays or vyses were compiled in the eleventh century by Sæmund Sigfusson, a priest and scald of Iceland; and the compilation is called the Elder or Rhythmical Edda.

Scallop-Shell (The). Every one knows that St. James's pilgrims are distinguished by scallop-shells, but it is a blunder to suppose that other pilgrims are privileged to wear them. Three of the popes have, by their bulls, distinctly confirmed this right to the Compostella pilgrim alone: viz. pope Alexander III., pope Gregory IX., and pope Clement V.

(Now, the escallop or scallop is a shell-fish, like an oyster or large cockle; but Gwillim tells us, what ignorant zoologists have omitted to mention, that the bivalve is "engendered solely of dew and air. It has no blood at all; yet no food that man eats turns so soon into life-blood as the scallop."—Display of Heraldry, 171.)

Scallop-shells used by Pilgrims. The reason why the scallop-shell is used by pilgrims is not generally known. The legend is this: When the marble ship which bore the headless body of St. James approached Bouzas, in Portugal, it happened to be the wedding day of the chief magnate of the village; and while the bridal party were at sport, the horse of the bridegroom became unmanageable, and plunged into the sea. The ship passed over the horse and its rider, and pursued its onward course, when, to the amazement of all, the horse and its rider emerged from the water uninjured, and the cloak of the rider was thickly covered with scallop-shells. All were dumfounded, and knew not what to make of these marvels, but a voice from heaven exclaimed, "It is the will of God that all who henceforth make their vows to St. James, and go on pilgrimage, shall take with them scallop-shells; and all who do so shall be remembered in the day of judgment." On hearing this, the lord of the village, with the bride and bridegroom, were duly baptized, and Bouzas became a Christian Church.—Sanctoral Portugues (copied into the Breviaries of Alcobaça and St. Cucufate).

Cunctis mare cernentibus,
Sed a profundo ducitur;
Natus Regis submergitur,
Totus plenus conchilibus.
Hymn for St. James's Day.

In sight of all the prince went down,
Into the deep sea dells;
In sight of all the prince emerged,
Covered with scallop-shells.
E. C. B.

Scalping (Rules for). The Cheyennes, in scalping, remove from the part just over the left ear, a piece of skin not larger than a silver dollar. The Arrapahoes take a similar piece from the region of the right ear. Others take the entire skin from the crown of the head, the forehead, or the nape of the neck. The Utes take the entire scalp from ear to ear, and from the forehead to the nape of the neck.

Scambister (Eric), the old butler of Magnus Troil the udaller of Zetland.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

(A udaller is one who holds his lands by allodial tenure.)

Scandal, a male character in Love for Love, by Congreve (1695).

Scandal (School for), a comedy by Sheridan (1777).

Scanderbeg. So George Castriota, an Albanian hero, was called. Amurath II. gave him the command of 5000 men; and such was his daring and success, that he was called Skander (Alexander). In the battle of Morava (1443) he deserted Amurath, and, joining the Albanians, won several battles over the Turks. At the instigation of Pius II. he headed a crusade against them, but died of a fever before Mahomet II. arrived to oppose him (1404-1467).

(Beg or Bey is Turkish for "prince.")

Scanderbeg's sword needs Scanderbeg's arm. Mahomet II. "the Great" requested to see the scimitar which George Castriota used so successfully against the Ottomans in 1461. Being shown it, and wholly unable to draw it, he pronounced the weapon to be a hoax, but received for answer, "Scanderbeg's sword needs Scanderbeg's arm to wield it."

¶ The Greeks had a similar saying, "None but Ulysses can draw Ulysses's bow."

¶ Robin Hood's bow needed Robin Hood's arm to draw it; and hence the proverb, "Many talk of Robin Hood that never shot in his bow."

Scandinavia, Sweden and Norway; or Sweden, Norway, and Denmark.

Scapegoat (The), a farce by John Poole. Ignatius Polyglot, a learned pundit, master of seventeen languages, is the tutor of Charles Eustace, aged 24 years. Charles has been clandestinely married for four years, and has a little son named Frederick. Circumstances have occurred which render the concealment of this marriage no longer decorous or possible, so he breaks it to his tutor, and conceals his young wife for the nonce in Polyglot's private room. Here she is detected by the housemaid, Molly Maggs, who tells her master; and old Eustace says, the only reparation a man can make in such circumstances is to marry the girl at once. "Just so," says the tutor. "Your son is the husband, and he is willing at once to acknowledge his wife and infant son."

Scapin, valet of Léandre son of seignior Géronte. (See FOURBERIES, p. 390.)—Molière: Les Fourberies de Scapin (1671).

J'ai, sans doute reçu du ciel un génie assez beau pour toutes les fabriques de ces gentilleses d'esprit, de ces galanteries ingénieuses, à qui le vulgaire ignorant donne le nom de fourberies; et je puis dire, sans vanité, qu'on n'a guère vu d'homme qui fût plus habile ouvrier de ressorts et d'intrigues, qui ait acquis plus de gloire que moi dans ce noble métier.—Molière: Les Fourberies de Scapin, i. 2 (1671).

(Otway has made an English version of this play, called The Cheats of Scapin, in which Léandre is Anglicized into "Leander," Géronte is called "Gripe," and his friend Argante father of Zerbinette is called "Thrifty" father of "Lucia.")

Scapi'no, the cunning, knavish servant of Gratiano the loquacious and pedantic Bolognese doctor.—Italian Mask.

Scar'amouch, a braggart and fool, most valiant in words, but constantly being drubbed by Harlequin. Scaramouch is a common character in Italian farce, originally meant in ridicule of the Spanish don, and therefore dressed in Spanish costume. Our clown is an imbecile old idiot, and wholly unlike the dashing poltroon of Italian pantomime. The best "Scaramouches" that ever lived were Tiberio Fiurelli, a Neapolitan (born 1608), and Gandini (eighteenth century).

Scar'borough Warning (A), a warning given too late to be taken advantage of. Fuller says the allusion is to an event which occurred in 1557, when Thomas Stafford seized upon Scarborough Castle, before the townsmen had any notice of his approach. Heywood says a "Scarborough warning" resembles what is now called Lynch law—punished first, and warned afterwards. Another solution is this: If ships passed the castle without saluting it by striking sail, it was customary to fire into them a shotted gun, by way of warning.

> Be sučrly seldom, and never for much . . .
> Or Scarborow warning, as ill I believe,
> When ("Sir, I arrest ye") gets hold of thy sleeve.
> Tusser: Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, x. 28 (1557).

Scarlet (Will), Scadlock, or Scathelocke, one of the companions of Robin Hood.

> "Take thy good bowe in thy hande," said Robyn,
> "Let Moche wend with the [thee],
> And so shall Wyllyam Scathelocke,
> And no man abyde with me."
> Ritson: Robin Hood Ballads, i. 1 (1520).
> The tinker looking him about,
> Robin his horn did blow;
> Then came unto him little John
> And William Scadlock too.
> Ditto, ii. 7 (1656).
> And there of him they made a > Good yeoman Robin Hood,
> Scarlet and Little John,
> And Little John, hey ho!
> Ditto, appendix 2 (1790).

In the two dramas called The First and Second Parts of Robin Hood, by Anthony Munday and Henry Chettle, Scathlock or Scadlock is called the brother of Will Scarlet.

> . . . possible that Warman's spite . . . doth hunt the lives
> Of bonnie Scarlet and his brother Scathlock.
> Pt. i. (1597).

Then "enter Warman, with Scarlet and Scathlock bounde," but Warman is banished, and the brothers are liberated and pardoned.

Scarlet Letter (The), a romance by N. Hawthorne (1850). The scarlet letter is A (Adulteress) and is a badge of shame branded on the heroine's dress. It furnishes the peg on which the story hangs.

Scarlet Woman (The), popery (Rev. xvii. 4).

> And fulminated
> Against the scarlet woman and her creed.
> Tennyson: Sea Dreams.

Scathelocke (2 syl.) or Scadlock, one of the companions of Robin Hood. Either the brother of Will Scarlet or another spelling of the name. (See SCARLET.)

Scavenger's Daughter (The), an instrument of torture, invented by sir William Skevington, lieutenant of the Tower in the reign of Henry VIII. "Scavenger" is a corruption of Skevington.

To kiss the scavenger's daughter, to suffer punishment by this instrument of torture; to be beheaded by a guillotine or some similar instrument.

Scazon, plu. Scazon'tes (3 syl.), a lame iambic metre, the last being a spondee or trochee instead of an iambus (Greek, skazo, "to halt, to hobble"), as—

> 1. Quicumque regno fidit, et magna pŏtēns.
> 2. O Musa, gressum quæ volens tratis claudum.

Or in English—

> 1. A little onward lend thy guiding hand.
> 2. He unsuspicious led him; when Sămson . . .

(1 is the usual iambic metre, 2 the scazon.)

Sceaf [Sheef], one of the ancestors of Woden. So called because in infancy he was laid on a wheatsheaf, and cast adrift in a boat; the boat stranded on the shores of Sleswig, and the infant, being considered a gift from the gods, was brought up for a future king.—Beowulf (an Anglo-Saxon epic, sixth century).

Scenes of Clerical Life, a series of tales by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross, 1858).

Scepticism (Father of Modern), Pierre Bayle (1647–1706).

Schacabac, "the hare-lipped," a man reduced to the point of starvation, invited to a feast by the rich Barmecide. (For the tale, see BARMECIDE FEAST, p. 90.)—Arabian Nights ("The Barber's Sixth Brother"). (See SHACCABAC.)

Schah'riah, sultan of Persia. His wife being unfaithful, and his brother's wife too, Schahriah imagined that no woman was virtuous. He resolved, therefore, to marry a fresh wife every night, and to have her strangled at daybreak. Scheherazâdê, the vizier's daughter, married him notwithstanding; and contrived, an hour before daybreak, to begin a story to her sister in the sultan's hearing, always breaking off before the story was finished. The sultan got interested in these tales; and, after a thousand and one nights, revoked his decree, and found in Scheherazadê a faithful, intelligent, and loving wife.—Arabian Nights' Entertainments.

Schah'zaman, sultan of the "Island of the Children of Khal'edan," situate in the open sea, some twenty days' sail from the coast of Persia. This sultan had a son, an only child, named Camaral'zaman, the most beautiful of mortals. Camaralzaman married Badoura the most beautiful of women, the only daughter of Gaiour (2 syl.) emperor of China.—Arabian Nights ("Camaralzaman and Badoura").

Schaibar (2 syl.), brother of the fairy Pari-Banou. He was only eighteen inches in height, and had a huge hump both before and behind. His beard, though thirty feet long, never touched the ground, but projected forwards. His moustaches went back to his ears, and his little pig's eyes were buried in his enormous head. He wore a conical hat, and carried for quarter-staff an iron bar of 500 lbs. weight at least.—Arabian Nights ("Ahmed and Pari-Banou").

Schamir (The), that instrument or agent with which Solomon wrought the stones of the temple, being forbidden to use any metal instrument for the purpose. Some say the Schamir was a worm; some that it was a stone; some that it was "a creature no bigger than a barleycorn, which nothing could resist."

Scheherazade [Sha-ha'-ra-zah'-de], the hypothetical relater of the stories in the Arabian Nights. She was the elder daughter of the vizier of Persia. (See above, SCHAHRIAH.)

Roused like the sultana Scheherazadê, and forced into a story.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Schems'eddin Mohammed, elder son of the vizier of Egypt, and brother of Noureddin Ali. He quarrelled with his brother on the subject of their two children's hypothetical marriage; but the brothers were not yet married, and children "were only in supposition." Noureddin Ali quitted Cairo, and travelled to Basora, where he married the vizier's daughter, and on the very same day Schemseddin married the daughter of one of the chief grandees of Cairo. On one and the same day a daughter was born to Schemseddin and a son to his brother Noureddin Ali. When Schemseddin's daughter was 20 years old, the sultan asked her in marriage, but the vizier told him she was betrothed to his brother's son, Bed'reddin Ali. At this reply, the sultan, in anger, swore she should be given in marriage to the "ugliest of his slaves," and accordingly betrothed her to Hunchback a groom, both ugly and deformed. By a fairy trick, Bedreddin Ali was substituted for the groom, but at daybreak was conveyed to Damascus. Here he turned pastry-cook, and was discovered by his mother by his cheese-cakes. Being restored to his country and his wife, he ended his life happily.—Arabian Nights ("Noureddin Ali," etc.). (See CHEESE-CAKES, p. 199.)

Schemsel'nihar, the favourite sultana of Haroun-al-Raschid caliph of Bagdad. She fell in love with Aboulhassan Ali ebn Becar prince of Persia. From the first moment of their meeting they began to pine for each other, and fell sick. Though miles apart, they died at the same hour, and were both buried in one grave.—Arabian Nights ("Aboulhassan and Schemselnihar").

Schlemihl (Peter), the hero of a popular German legend. Peter sells his shadow to an "old man in grey," who meets him while fretting under a disappointment. The name is a household term for one who makes a desperate and silly bargain.—Chamisso: Peter Schlemihl (1813).

Scholastic (The), Epipha'nius, an Italian scholar (sixth century).

Scholastic Doctor (The), Anselm of Laon (1050–1117).

Scholey (Lawrence), servant at Burgh-Westra. His father is Magnus Troil the udaller of Zetland.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

(Udaller is one who holds land by allodial tenure.)

Schonfelt, lieutenant of sir Archibald von Hagenbach a German noble.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

School for Scandal. (See SCANDAL, p. 966.)

School for Wives (L'école des Femmes, "training for wives"), a comedy by Molière (1662). Arnolphe has a crotchet about the proper training of girls to make good wives, and tries his scheme upon Agnes, whom he adopts from a peasant's cottage, and designs in due time to make his wife. He sends her from early childhood to a convent, where difference of sex and the conventions of society are wholly ignored. When removed from the convent, she treats men as if they were school-girls, kisses them, plays with them, and treats them with girlish familiarity. The consequence is, a young man named Horace falls in love with her, and makes her his wife, but Arnolphe loses his pains.

Chacun a sa méthode
En femme, comme en tout, je veux suivre ma mode . . .
Un air doux et posé, parmi d'autres enfants,
M'inspira de l'amour pour elle dès quatre ans;
Sa mère se trouvant de pauvreté pressée,
De la lui demander il me vint en pensée;
Et la bonne paysanne, apprenant mon desire,
A s'ôter cette charge eut beaucoup de plaisir.
Dans un petit couvent, loin de toute pratique,
Je la fis élever selon ma politique.
Molière: L'école des Femmes, act i. 1 (1662).

School of Husbands (L'école des Maris, "wives trained by men"), a comedy by Molière (1661). Ariste and Sganarelle, two brothers, bring up Léonor and Isabelle, two orphan sisters, according to their systems for making them in time their model wives. Sganarelle's system was to make the women dress plainly, live retired, attend to domestic duties, and have few indulgences. Ariste's system was to give the woman great liberty, and trust to her honour. Isabelle, brought up by Sganarelle, deceived him and married another; but Léonor, brought up by Ariste, made him a fond and faithful wife. Sganarelle's plan—

J'entend que la mienne vive à ma fantasie—
Que d'une serge honnête elle ait son vêtement,
Et ne porte, le noir qu' aux bons jours seulement;
Qu' enfermée au logis, en personne bien sage,
Elle s'applique toute aux choses du ménage,
A recoudre mon linge aux heures de loisir,
Ou bien à tricoter quelques bas par plaisir;
Qu' aux discours des muguets elle ferme l'oreille,
Et ne sorte jamais sans avoir qui la veille.

Ariste's plan—

Leur sexe aime à jouir d'un peu de liberté;
On le retient fort mal par tant d'austérité;
Et les soins défiants, les verroux et les grilles,
Ne font pas la vertu des femmes ni des filles;
C'est l'honneur qui les doit tenir dans le devoir,
Non la sévérité que nous leur faisons voir . . .
Je trouve que le cœur est ce qu'il faut gagner.
Molière: L'école des Maris, act i. 2 (1661).

Schoolmen. (For a list of the schoolmen of each of the three periods, see Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, 1110.)

Schoolmistress (The), a poem in Spenserian metre, by Shenstone (1737 and 1742). The "schoolmistress" was Sarah Lloyd, who taught the poet himself in infancy. She lived in a thatched cottage, before which grew a birch tree, to which allusion is made in the poem.

There dwells, in lowly shed, and mean attire,
A matron old, whom we schoolmistress name . . .
And all in sight doth rise a birchen tree.
Stanzas 2, 3.

Schreckenwald (Ital), steward of count Albert.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Schrimner, the hog which is daily roasted and eaten in Walhalla, but which becomes entire every morning.—Scandinavian Mythology. (See RUSTICUS'S PIG, p. 942.)

Schwanker (Jonas), jester of Leopold archduke of Austria.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Scian Muse (The), Simon'idês, born at Scia or Cea, now Zia, one of the Cyclades.

The Scian and the Telan Muse [Anacreon] . . .
Have found the fame your shores refuse.
Byron: Don Juan, iii. ("The Isles of Greece," 1820).

Science (The prince of), Tchuhe, "The Aristotle of China" (died A.D. 1200).

Scio (now called Chios), one of the seven cities which claimed to be the birthplace of Homer. Hence he is sometimes called "Scio's Blind Old Bard." The seven cities referred to make an hexameter verse—

Smyrna, Chios, Colophôn, Salamis, Rhodos, Argos, Athenæ; or Smyrna, Chios, Colophôn, Ithacâ, Pylos, Argos, Athenæ.
Antipater Sidonius: A Greek Epigram.

Sciol'to (3 syl.), a proud Genoese nobleman, the father of Calist a. Calista was the bride of Altamont, a young man proud and fond of her, but it was discovered on the wedding day that she had been seduced by Lothario. This led to a series of calamities: (1) Lothario was killed in a duel by Altamont; (2) a street riot was created, in which Sciolto received his death-wound; and (3) Calista stabbed herself.—Rowe: The Fair Penitent (1703).

(In Italian, Sciolto forms but two syllables, but Rowe has made it three in every case.)

Scipio "dismissed the Iberian maid" (Milton: Paradise Regained, ii.). The poet refers to the tale of Scipio's restoring a captive princess to her lover Allucius, and giving to her, as a wedding present, the money of her ransom. (See CONTINENCE, p. 232.)

During his command in Spain, a circumstance occurred which contributed more to his fame and glory than all his military exploits. At the taking of New Carthage, a lady of extraordinary beauty was brought to Scipio, who found himself greatly affected by her charms. Understanding, however, that she was betrothed to a Celtibĕrian prince named Allucius, he resolved to conquer his rising passion, and sent her to her lover without recompense. A silver shield, on which this interesting event is depicted, was found in the river Rhone by some fishermen in the seventeenth century.—Goldsmith: History of Rome, xiv. 3. (Whittaker's improved edition contains a facsimile of the shield on p. 215.)

Scipio, son of the gipsy woman Coscolĭna and the soldier Torribio Scipio. Scipio becomes the secretary of Gil Blas, and settles down with him at "the castle of Lirias." His character and adventures are very similar to those of Gil Blas himself, but he never rises to the same level. Scipio begins by being a rogue, who pilfered and plundered all who employed him, but in the service of Gil Blas he was a model of fidelity and integrity.—Lesage: Gil Blas (1715).

Sciro'nian Rocks, between Meg'ara and Corinth. So called because the bones of Sciron, the robber of Attica, were changed into these rocks, when Theseus (2 syl.) hurled him from a cliff into the sea. It was from these rocks that Ino cast herself into the Corinthian bay.—Greek Fable.

Scirum. The men of Scirum used to shoot against the stars.

Like . . . men of wit bereaven,
Which howle and shoote against the lights of heaven.
W. Browne: Britannia's Pastorals, iv. (1613).

Scobellum, a very fruitful land, the inhabitants of which were changed into beasts by the vengeance of the gods. The drunkards were turned into swine, the lechers into goats, the proud into peacocks, shrews into magpies, gamblers into asses, musicians into song-birds, the envious into dogs, idle women into milch cows, jesters into monkeys, dancers into squirrels, and misers into moles.

They exceeded cannibals in cruelty, the Persians in pride, the Egyptians in luxury, the Cretans in lying, the Germans in drunkenness, and all in wickedness.—Ridley [R. Johnson]: The Seven Champions of Christendome, iii. 10 (1617).

Scogan (Henry), M.A., a poet contemporary with Chaucer. He lived in the reigns of Richard II., Henry IV., and probably Henry V. Among the gentry who had letters of protection to attend Richard II. in his expedition into Ireland, in 1399, is "Henricus Scogan, Armiger."—Tyrwhitt's Chaucer, v. 15 (1773).

Scogan! What was he!
Oh, a fine gentleman, and a master of arts
Of Henry the Fourth's time, that made disguises
For the king's sons, and writ in ballad royal Daintily well.
Ben Jonson: The Fortunate Isles (1626).

Scogan (John), the favourite jester and buffoon of Edward IV. "Scogan's jests" were published by Andrew Borde, a physician in the reign of Henry VIII.

The same sir John [Falstaff], the very same. I saw him break Skogan's head at the court-gate, when he was a crack not thus high.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. act III. sc. 2 (1598).

N.B.—Shakespeare has confounded Henry Scogan, M.A., the poet, who lived in the reign of Henry IV., with John Scogan the jester, who lived about a century later, in the reign of Edward IV.; and, of course, sir John Falstaff could not have known him when "he was a mere crack."

Scogan's Jest. Scogan and some companions, being in lack of money, agreed to the following trick: A peasant, driving sheep, was accosted by one of the accomplices, who laid a wager that his sheep were hogs, and agreed to abide by the decision of the first person they met. This, of course, was Scogan, who instantly gave judgment against the herdsman.

¶ A similar joke is related in the Hitopadesa, an abridged version of Pilpay's Fables. In this case the "peasant" is represented by a Brahmin carrying a goat, and the joke was to persuade the Brahmin that he was carrying a dog. "How is this, friend," says one, "that you, a Brahmin, carry on your back such an unclean animal as a dog?" "It is not a dog," says the Brahmin, "but a goat;" and trudged on. Presently another made the same remark, and the Brahmin, beginning to doubt, took down the goat to look at it. Convinced that the creature was really a goat, he went on, when presently a third made the same remark. The Brahmin, now fully persuaded that his eyes were befooling him, threw down the goat and went away without it; whereupon the three companions took possession of it and cooked it.

¶ In Thyl Eulenspiegel we have a similar hoax. Eulenspiegel sees a man with a piece of green cloth, which he resolves to obtain. He employs two confederates, both priests. Says Eulenspiegel to the man, "What a famous piece of blue cloth! Where did you get it?" "Blue, you fool! why, it is green." After a short contention, a bet is made, and the question in dispute is referred to the first comer. This was a confederate, and he at once decided that the cloth was blue. "You are both in the same boat," says the man, "which I will prove by the priest yonder." The question being put to the priest, is decided against the man, and the three rogues divide the cloth amongst them.

¶ Another version is in novel 8 of Fortini. The joke was that certain kids he had for sale were capons. (See Dunlop: History of Fiction, viii., article "Ser Giovanni.")

(Dr. Andrew Borde published, in 1626, a collection of facetiæ which he called "Scogan's jests," after Scogan, the favourite court fool of Edward IV. See MILLER, Joe, p. 706.)

Scone [Skoon] Stone, a palladian stone. The tradition is that it was the "pillow" on which the Patriarch Jacob slept at Bethel. It was transported to Egypt; Gathelus (son of Cecrops king of Athens), who married Scotia (daughter of the pharaoh), alarmed at the fame of Moses, fled to Brigantia, in Spain, carrying the stone with him, as a palladium; Simon Brech (the favourite son of Milo the Scot) carried it from Brigantia to Ireland. It was afterwards heaved into the sea for an anchor during a violent storm, and when the sea lulled it was set on the Hill of Tara (Ireland), and became the Lia fail or "stone of destiny," and on it Fergus Eric and his descendants were crowned. Fergus (who led the Dalriads to Argyllshire, and became the founder of the Scottish monarchy) removed it to Dunstoffnage, and as the Scotch migrated eastwards they carried the stone with them, and, in 840, set it up in Scone. Here it was encased in a wooden chair and placed beside a cross on the east of the "monastic ceremony." The kings of Scotland, at their coronation, were seated on this chair by the earls of Fife, and it was made the Sedes principalis of Scotland, so that the kings of Scotland were called "the kings of Scone," and Perth was their capital. Edward I. took it to London, and it still remains in Westminster Abbey, where it forms the support of Edward the Confessor's chair, the coronation chair of the British monarchs.

> Ni fallat fatum, Scoti, quocunque locatum
> Invenient lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem.
> Lardner: History of Scotland, i. 67 (1832).
> Where er this stone is placed, the fates decree,
> The Scottish race shall there the sovereigns be.

(Of course, the "Scottish race" is the dynasty of the Stuarts and their successors.)

Scotch Guards, in the service of the French kings, were called his garde du corps. The origin of the guard was this: When St. Louis entered upon his first crusade, he was twice saved from death by the valour of a small band of Scotch auxiliaries under the commands of the earls of March and Dunbar, Walter Stewart, and sir David Lindsay. In gratitude thereof, it was resolved that "a standing guard of Scotchmen, recommended by the king of Scotland, should evermore form the body-guard of the king of France." This decree remained in force for five centuries.—Grant: The Scottish Cavalier, xx.

Sco'tia Scotland; sometimes called "Scotia Minor." The Venerable Bede tells us that Scotland was called Caledonia till A.D. 258, when it was invaded by a tribe from Ireland, and its name changed to Scotia.

Scotia Magna or Major, Ireland.

Scotland. So called, according to legend, from Scota daughter of Pharaoh. What gives this legend especial interest is, that when Edward I. laid claim to the country as a fief of England, he pleaded that Brute the British king, in the days of Eli and Samuel, had conquered it. The Scotch, in their defence, pleaded their independence in virtue of descent from Scota daughter of Pharaoh. This is not fable, but sober history.—Rymer: Fœdera, I. ii. (1703).

Scotland Yard (London). So called from a palace which stood there for the reception of the king of Scotland when he came to England to pay homage to his over-lord the king of England.

Scotland a Fief of England. When Edward I. laid claim to Scotland as a fief of the English crown, his great plea was that it was awarded to Adelstan by direct miracle, and, therefore, could never be alienated. His advocates seriously read from The Life and Miracles of St. John of Beverley this extract: Adelstan went to drive back the Scotch, who had crossed the border, and, on reaching the Tyne, St. John of Beverley appeared to him, and bade him cross the river at daybreak. Adelstan obeyed, and reduced the whole kingdom to submission. On reaching Dunbar, in the return march, Adelstan prayed that some sign might be given, to testify to all ages that God had delivered the kingdom into his hands.

Whereupon he was commanded to strike the basaltic rock with his sword. This did he, and the blade sank into the rock "as if it had been butter," cleaving it asunder for "an ell or more." As the cleft remains to the present hour, in testimony of this miracle, why, of course, cela va sans dire.—Rymer: Fœdera, I. i. 771 (1703).

Scotland's Scourge, Edward I. Scotôrum Malleus (1239, 1272–1307). His son, Edward II., buried him in Westminster Abbey, where his tomb is still to be seen, with the following inscription:—

Edwardus Longus, Scotorum Malleus, hic est.
(Our Longshanks, "Scotland's Scourge," lies here.)
Drayton: Polyolbion, xvii. (1613).

So Longshanks, Scotland's Scourge, the land laid waste.
Ditto, xxix. (1622).

Scots [scuite, "a wanderer, a rover"], the inhabitants of the western coast of Scotland. As this part is very hilly and barren, it is unfit for tillage; and the inhabitants used to live a roving life on the produce of the chase, their chief employment being the rearing of cattle.

The Caledonians became divided into two distinct nations . . . those on the western coast which was hilly and barren, and those towards the east where the land is fit for tillage. . . . As the employment of the former did not fix them to one place, they removed from one heath to another, as suited best with their convenience or inclination, and were called by their neighbours Scuite, or the "wandering nation."—Dissertation on the Poems of Ossian.

Scots (The Royal). The hundred cuirassiers, called hommes des armes, which formed the body-guard of the French king, were sent to Scotland in 1633 by Louis XIII., to attend the coronation of Charles I. at Edinburgh. On the outbreak of the civil war, eight years afterwards, these cuirassiers loyally adhered to the crown, and received the title of "The Royal Scots." At the downfall of the king, the hommes des armes returned to France.

Scott (Sir Walter), the novelist and poet (1771–1832).

The Southern Scott. Ariosto is so called by lord Byron.

First rose
The Tuscan father's "comely divine" [Dante];
Then, not unequal to the Florentine,
The southern Scott, the minstrel who called forth
A new creation with his magic line,
And, like the Ariosto of the North [sir W. Scott],
Sang ladye-love and war, romance and knightly worth.
Byron: Childe Harold, iv. 40 (1817).

(Dante was born at Florence.)

The Walter Scott of Belgium, Hendrick Conscience (nineteenth century).

The Swiss Walter Scott, Zschokke (1771–1848).

Scottish Anacreon (The). Alexander Scot is so called by Pinkerton.

Scottish Boanerges (The), Robert and James Haldane. Robert died 1842, aged 79, and James 1851.

Scottish Chiefs (The), a novel by Jane Porter (1810). Robert Bruce and William Wallace are introduced.

Scottish Hogarth (The), David Allen (1744–1796).

Scottish Homer (The), William Wilkie, author of an epic poem in rhyme entitled The Epigoniad (1753).

Scottish Solomon (The), James VI. of Scotland, subsequently called James I. of England (1566, 1603–1625).

(The French Sully more aptly called him "The Wisest Fool in Christendom.")

Scottish Teniers (The), sir David Wilkie (1785–1841).

Scottish Theoc'ritos (The), Allan Ramsay (1685–1758).

Scotus. There were two schoolmen of this name: (1) John Scotus Erigena, a native of Ireland, who died 886, in the reign of king Alfred; and (2) John Duns Scotus, a Scotchman, who died 1308. Longfellow confounds these two in his Golden Legend when he attributes the Latin version of St. Dionysius the Areopagite to the latter schoolman.

And done into Latin by that Scottish beast, Erigena Johannes.
Longfellow: The Golden Legend (1851).

Scourers, a class of dissolute young men, often of the better class, who infested the streets of London in the seventeenth century, and thought it capital fun to break windows, upset sedan-chairs, beat quiet citizens, and molest young women. These young blades called themselves at different times, Muns, Hectors, Scourers, Nickers, Hawcubites, and Mohawks or Mohocks.

Scourge of Christians (The), Noureddin-Mahmûd of Damascus (1116–1174).

Scourge of God (The), Attila king of the Huns, called Flagellum Dei (*, 434–453). Genséric king of the Vandals was called Virga Dei (*, reigned 429–477).

Scourge of Princes (The), Pietro Aretino of Arezzo, a merciless satirist of kings and princes, but very obscene and licentious. He called himself, "Aretino the Divine" (1492–1557).

> Thus Aretin of late got reputation
> By scourging kings, as Lucian did of old
> By scorning gods.
> Brooke: Inquisition upon Fame (1554–1628).

¶ Suidas called Lucian "The Blasphemer;" and he added that he was torn to pieces by dogs for his impiety. Some of his works attack the heathen philosophy and religion. His Jupiter Convicted shows Jupiter to be powerless, and Jupiter the Tragedian shows Jupiter and the other gods to be myths (120–200).

Scourge of Scotland, Edward I. Scotōrum Malleus (1239, 1272–1307).

Scrape-All, a soapy, psalm-singing hypocrite, who combines with Cheatly to supply young heirs with cash at most exorbitant usury. (See CHEATLY, p. 199.) —Shadwell: Squire of Alsatia (1688).

Scrape on, Gentlemen. Hadrian went once to the public baths, and, seeing an old soldier scraping himself with a potsherd for want of a flesh-brush, sent him a sum of money. Next day, the bath was crowded with potsherd scrapers; but the emperor said when he saw them, "Scrape on, gentlemen, but you will not scrape an acquaintance with me."

Scribble, an attorney's clerk, who tries to get married to Polly Honeycombe, a silly, novel-struck girl, but well off. He is happily foiled in his scheme, and Polly is saved from the consequences of a most unsuitable match.—Colman the Elder: Polly Honeycombe (1760).

Scriblerus (Cornelius), father of Martinus. He was noted for his pedantry, and his odd whims about the education of his son.

Martinus Scriblĕrus, a man of capacity, who had read everything; but his judgment was worthless, and his taste perverted.—(?) Arbuthnot: Memoirs of the Extraordinary Life, Works, and Discoveries of Martinus Scriblerus.

N.B.—These "memoirs" were intended to be the first instalment of a general satire on the false taste in literature prevalent in the time of Pope. The only parts of any moment that were written of this intended series were Pope's Treatise of the Bathos or Art of Sinking in Poetry, and his Memoirs of P. P., Clerk of this Parish (1727), in ridicule of Dr. Burnet's History of His Own Time. The Dunciad is, however, preceded by a Prolegomena, ascribed to Martinus Scriblerus, and contains his notes and illustrations on the poem, thus connecting this merciless satire with the original design.

Sceriever (Jock), the apprentice of Duncan Macwheeble (bailie at Tully Veolan to Mr. Cosmo Comyne Bradwardine baron of Bradwardine and Tully Veolan).—Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Scriptores Decem, a collection of ten ancient chronicles on English history, in one vol. folio, London, 1652, edited by Roger Twysden and John Selden. The volume contains: (1) Simeon Dunelmensis [Simeon of Durham], Historia; (2) Johannes Hagustaldensis [John of Hexham], Historia Continuata; (3) Richardus Hagustaldensis [Richard of Hexham], De Gestis Regis Stephani; (4) Ailredus Rievallensis [Ailred of Rieval], Historia (genealogy of the kings); (5) Radulphus de Diceto [Ralph of Diceto], Abbreviationes Chronicorum and Ymagines Historiarum; (6) Johannes Brompton, Chronicon; (7) Gervasius Doroborn-ensis [Gervase of Dover], Chronica, etc. (burning and repair of Dover Church: contentions between the monks of Canterbury and archbishop Baldwin; and lives of the archbishops of Canterbury); (8) Thomas Stubbs (a dominican), Chronica Pontificum ecc. Eborac [i.e. York]; (9) Guilielmus Thorn Cantuariensis [of Canterbury], Chronica; and (10) Henricus Knighton Leicestrensis [of Leicester], Chronica. (The last three are chronicles of "pontiffs" or archbishops.)

Scriptores Quinque, better known as Scriptores post Bedam, published at Frankfürt, 1601, in one vol. folio, and containing: (1) Willielm Malmesburien-sis, De Gestis Regum Anglorum, Historiæ Novellæ, and De Gestis Pontificum Anglorum; (2) Henry Huntindoniensis, Historia; (3) Roger Hovedeni [Hoveden], Annales; (4) Ethelwerd, Chronica, and (5) Ingulphus Croylandensis [of Croyland], Historia.

Scriptores Tres, three "hypothetical" writers on ancient history, which Dr. Bertram professed to have discovered between the years 1747 and 1757. They are called Richardus Corinensis [of Cirencester], De Situ Britanniæ; Gildas Badonicus; and Nennius Banchorensis [of Bangor]. J. E. Mayor, in his preface to Ricardi de Cirencestria Speculum Historiale, has laid bare this literary forgery. (See FORGERS, p. 386.)

(The title of Bertram's book is Britannicarum Gentium Historiæ Antiquæ, Scriptores tres. Gildas was called "Badonicus" because he was born on the day of the battle of Baden or Bath.)

Scriptores post Bedam, William of Malmesbury, Henry of Huntingdon, Roger de Hoveden, Ethelwerd, Ingulphus of Croyland.

Scripture. Parson Adams's wife said to her husband that in her opinion "it was blasphemous to talk of Scriptures out of church."—Fielding: Joseph Andrews.

A great impression in my youth
Was made by Mrs. Adams, where she cries,
"That Scriptures out of church are blasphemous."
Byron: Don Juan, xiii. 96 (1824).

Scroggen, a poor hack author, celebrated by Goldsmith in his Description of an Author's Bedchamber.

Scroggens (Giles), a peasant, who courted Molly Brown, but died just before the wedding day. Molly cried and cried for him, till she cried herself asleep. Fancying that she saw Giles Scroggens's ghost standing at her bedside, she exclaimed in terror, "What do you want?" "You for to come for to go along with me," replied the ghost. "I ben't dead, you fool!" said Molly; but the ghost rejoined, "Why, that's no rule." Then, clasping her round the waist, he exclaimed, "Come, come with me, ere morning beam." "I won't!" shrieked Molly, and woke to find "'twas nothing but a dream."—A Comic Ballad.

Scroggs (Sir William), one of the judges.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Scrooge (Ebenezer), partner, executor, and heir of old Jacob Marley, stock-broker. When first introduced, he is "a squeezing, grasping, covetous old hunks, sharp and hard as a flint;" without one particle of sympathy, loving no one, and by none beloved. One Christmas Day, Ebenezer Scrooge sees three ghosts: The Ghost of Christmas Past; the Ghost of Christmas Present; and the Ghost of Christmas To-come. The first takes him back to his young life, shows him what Christmas was to him when a schoolboy, and when he was an apprentice; reminds him of his courting a young girl, whom he forsook as he grew rich; and shows him that sweetheart of his young days married to another, and the mother of a happy family. The second ghost shows him the joyous home of his clerk Bob Cratchit, who has nine people to keep on 15*s.* a week, and yet could find wherewithal to make merry on this day; it also shows him the family of his nephew, and of others. The third ghost shows him what would be his lot if he died as he then was, the prey of harpies, the jest of his friends on 'Change, the world's uncared-for waif. These visions wholly change his nature, and he becomes benevolent, charitable, and cheerful, loving all, and by all beloved.—Dickens: A Christmas Carol (in five staves, 1843).

Scrow, the clerk of lawyer Glossin.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Scrub, a man-of-all-work to lady Bountiful. He describes his duties thus –

Of a Monday I drive the coach, of a Tuesday I drive the plough, on Wednesday I follow the hounds, on Thursday I dun the tenants, on Friday I go to market, on Saturday I draw warrants, and on Sunday I draw beer.—Farquhar: The Beaux' Stratagem, iii. 4 (1707).

One day, when Weston [1727–1776] was announced to play "Scrub," he sent to request a loan of money from Garrick, which was refused; whereupon Weston did not put in his appearance in the green-room. So Garrick came to the foot-lights and said, "Ladies and gentlemen, Mr. Weston being taken suddenly ill, he is not capable of appearing before you this evening, and so with your permission I will perform the part of 'Scrub' in his stead." Weston, who was in the gallery with a sham bailiff, now hallooed out, "I am here, but the bailiff won't let me come!" The audience roared with laughter, clamoured for Weston, insisted he should play "Scrub," and the manager was obliged to advance the loan and release the debtor.—Spirit of the Public Journals (1825).

Scrubin'da, the lady who "lived by the scouring of pots in Dyot Street, Bloomsbury Square."

Oh, was I a quart, pint, or gill,
To be scrubbed by her delicate hands! . . .
My parlour that's next to the sky
I'd quit, her blest mansion to share;
So happy to live and to die
In Dyot Street, Bloomsbury Square.
Rhodes: Bombastes Furioso (1790).

Scruple, the friend of Random. He is too honest for a rogue, and too conscientious for a rake. At Calais he met Harriet, the elder daughter of sir David Dunder of Dunder Hall, near Dover, and fell in love with her. Scruple subsequently got invited to Dunder Hall, and was told that his Harriet was to be married next day to lord Snolt, a stumpy, "gummy" fogey of five and forty. Harriet hated the idea, and agreed to elope with Scruple; but her father discovered by accident the intention, and intercepted it. However, to prevent scandal, he gave his consent to the union, and discovered that Scruple, both in family and fortune, was quite suitable for a son-in-law.—Colman: Ways and Means (1788).

Scu'damour (Sir), the knight beloved by Am'oret (whom Britomart delivered from Busyrane the enchanter), and whom she ultimately married. He is called Scudamour from [e]scu d'amour ("the shield of love"), which he carried (bk. iv. 10). This shield was hung by golden bands in the temple of Venus, and under it was written—

Blessed the man that well can use this bliss:
Whosoever be the shield, faire Amoret be his.

Sir Scudamour, determined to win the prize, had to fight with twenty combatants, overthrew them all, and the shield was his. When he saw Amoret in the company of Britomart dressed as a knight, he was racked with jealousy, and went on his wanderings, accompanied by nurse Glaucê for "his squire;" but somewhat later, seeing Britomart without her helmet, he felt that his jealousy was groundless (bk. iv. 6). His tale is told by himself (bk. iv. 10).—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii., iv. (1590-6).

Sculpture (Father of French), Jean Goujon (1510-1572). G. Pilon is so called also (1515-1590).

Scyld, the king of Denmark preceding Beowulf. The Anglo-Saxon epic poem called Beowulf (sixth century) begins with the death of Scyld.

At his appointed time, Scyld deceased, very decrepit, and went into the peace of the Lord. They . . . bore him to the sea-shore as he himself requested. . . . There on the beach stood the ring-prowed ship, the vehicle of the noble . . . ready to set out. They laid down the dear prince, the distributor of rings, in the bosom of the ship, the mighty one beside the mast . . . they set up a golden ensign high overhead . . . they gave him to the deep. Sad was their spirit, mournful their mood.—Kemble: Beowulf (an Anglo-Saxon poem, 1833).

Scylla and Charybdis. The former was a rock, in which dwelt Scylla, a hideous monster encompassed with dogs and wolves. The latter was a whirlpool, into which Charybdis was metamorphosed.—Classic Fable.

Scylla and Charybdis of Scotland, the "Swalchie whirlpool," and the "Merry Men of Mey," a bed of broken water which boils like a witch's caldron, on the south side of the Stroma Channel. ("Merry Men;" "men" is a corruption of main in this phrase.)

Scythian (That Brave), Darius the Persian. According to Herod'otos, all the south-east of Europe used to be called Scythia, and Xenophon calls the dwellers south of the Caspian Sea "Scythians" also. In fact, by Scythia was meant the south of Russia and west of Asia; hence the Hungarians, a Tartar horde settled on the east coast of the Caspian, who, in 889, crossed into Europe, are spoken of as "Scythians," and lord Brooke calls the Persians "Scythians." The reference below is to the following event in Persian history: The death of Smerdis was kept for a time a profound secret, and one of the officers about the court who resembled him, usurped the crown, calling himself brother of the late monarch. Seven of the high nobles conspired together, and slew the usurper, but it then became a question to which of the seven the crown should be offered. They did not toss for it, but they did much the same thing. They agreed to give the crown to him whose horse neighed first. Darius's horse won, and thus Darius became king of the Persian empire.

That brave Scythian,
Who found more sweetness in his horse's neighing
Than all the Phrygian, Dorian, Lydian playing.
Lord Brooke (1554-1628).

N.B.—Marlowe calls Tamburlaine of Tartary "a Scythian."

You shall hear the Scythian Tamburlaine
Threatening the world with high astounding terms.
Marlowe: Tamburlaine (prologue, 1587).

Scythian's Name (The). Humber or Humbert king of the Huns invaded England during the reign of Locrin, some 1000 years B.C. In his flight, he was drowned in the river Abus, which has ever since been called the Humber, after "the Scythian's name."—Geoffrey: British History, ii. 2 (1142); and Milton's History of England.

Or Humber loud that keeps the Scythian's name.
Milton: Vacation Exercise (1627).

Sea (The Great). The Mediterranean was so called by the ancients.

Sea (The Waterless). Prester John, in his letter to Manuel Comnēnus emperor of Constantinople, says that in his country there is a "waterless sea," which none have ever crossed. It consists of tumbling billows of sand, never at rest, and contains fish of most excellent flavour.

Three days' journey from the coast of the Sand Sea is a mountain whence rolls down a "waterless river," consisting of small stones, which crumble into sand when they reach the "sea."

Near the Sand Sea is a fountain called Mussel, because it is contained in a basin like a mussel-shell. This is a test fountain. Those who test it, strip off their clothes, and, if true and leal, the water rises three times, till it covers their head.

Sea-Born City (The), Venice.

Sea-Captain (The), a drama by lord Lytton (1839). Norman, "the sea-captain," was the son of lady Arundel by her first husband, who was murdered. He was born three days after his father's murder, and was brought up by Onslow, a village priest. At 14 he went to sea, and became the captain of a man-of-war. Lady Arundel married again, and had another son named Percy. She wished to ignore Norman, and to settle the title and estates on Percy, but it was not to be. Norman and Percy both loved Violet, a ward of lady Arundel. Violet, however, loved Norman only. A scheme laid to murder Norman failed; at the end Norman was acknowledged by his mother, reconciled to his brother, and married Violet.

Sea-Girt Isle (The), Great Britain.

Sea-Green Robespierre. So Carlyle calls Robespierre. The epithet was borrowed from Shakespeare.

> Armando. Of what complexion was Delilah?
> Moth. Of the sea-water green, sir.
> Love's Labour's Lost, act i. sc. 2 (1594).

(Delilah was called sea-green because she was jealous, and Robespierre was jealous of Danton. The whole of Carlyle's French Revolution is in imitation of the Renaissant period, the worst style possible —neither poetry nor prose. It is well that it has found no imitators.)

Sea-King's Daughter from over the Sea. So Tennyson call the princess of Wales, in his Welcome to Alexandra (March 7, 1863).

Sea of Sedge (The), the Red Sea. This sea so abounds with sedge that in the Hebrew Scriptures it is called "The Weedy or Sedgy Sea." Milton refers to it; he says the rebel angels were numberless as the

> . . . scattered sedge
> Aflote, when the fierce winds Orion armed > Hath vexed the Red Sea coast.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 304 (1665).

Sea of Stars, the source of the Yellow River, in Thibet; so called because of the musual sparkle of the waters.

> Like a sea of stars,
> The hundred sources of Hoangho [the Yellow River].
> Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, vi. 22 (1799).

Seaforth (The earl of), a royalist in the service of king Charles I.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Seasons (The), a descriptive poem in blank verse, by James Thomson, "Winter" (1726), "Summer" (1727), "Spring" (1728), "Autumn" (1730). "Winter" is inscribed to the earl of Wilmington; "Summer" to Mr. Doddington; "Spring" to the countess of Hereford; and "Autumn" to Mr. Onslow.

(1) In "Winter," after describing the season, the poet introduces his episode of a traveller lost in a snowstorm, "the creeping cold lays him along the snow, a stiffened corse," of wife, of children, and of friend unseen. The whole book contains 1069 lines.

(2) "Summer" begins with a description of the season, and the rural pursuits of haymaking and sheep-shearing; passes on to the hot noon, when "nature pants, and every stream looks languid." After describing the tumultuous character of the season in the torrid zone, he returns to England, and describes a thunderstorm, in which Celadon and Amelia are overtaken. The thunder growls, the lightnings flash, louder and louder crashes the aggravated roar, "convulsing heaven and earth." The maiden, terrified, clings to her lover for protection. "Fear not, sweet innocence," he says. "He who involves yon skies in darkness ever smiles on thee. 'Tis safety to be near thee, sure, and thus to clasp perfection." As he speaks the words, a flash of lightning strikes the maid, and lays her a blackened corpse at the young man's feet. The poem concludes with the more peaceful scenery of a summer's evening, when the story of Damon and Musidŏra is introduced. Damon had long loved the beautiful Musidora, but met with scant encouragement. One summer's evening, he accidentally came upon her bathing, and the respectful modesty of his love so won upon the damsel that she wrote upon a tree, "Damon, the time may come when you need not fly." The whole book contains 1804 lines.

(3) In "Spring" the poet describes its general features, and its influence on the vegetable and animal world. He describes a garden with its haram of flowers, a grove with its orchestra of song-birds making melody in their love, the rough world of brutes furious and fierce with their strong desire, and lastly man tempered by its infusive influence. The book contains 1173 lines.

(4) In "Autumn" we are taken to the harvest-field, where the poet introduces a story similar to that of Ruth and Boaz. His Ruth he calls "Lavinia," and his Boaz "Palēmon." He then describes partridge and pheasant shooting, hare and fox hunting, all of which he condemns. After luxuriating in the orchard and vineyard, he speaks of the emigration of birds, the falling of the sear and yellow leaf, and concludes with a eulogy of country life. The whole book contains 1371 lines.

∴ It is much to be regretted that the poet's order has not been preserved. The arrangement of the seasons into Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter, is unnatural, and mars the harmony of the poet's plan.

Seatonian Prize. The Rev. Thomas Seaton, Fellow of Clare Hall, Cambridge University, bequeathed the rents of his Kislingbury estate for a yearly prize of £40 to the best English poem on a sacred subject announced in January, and sent in on or before September 29 following.

> Shall hoary Granta call her sable sons . . .
> Shall these approach the Muse? Ah, no! she flies,
> And even spurns the great Seatonian prize
> Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Sebastes of Mytile'ne (4 syl.), the assassin in the "Immortal Guards."—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

SEBASTIAN, a young gentleman of Messalinē, brother to Viola. They were twins, and so much alike that they could not be distinguished except by their dress. Sebastian and his sister being shipwrecked, escaped to Illyria. Here Sebastian was mistaken for his sister (who had assumed man's apparel), and was invited by the countess Olivia to take shelter in her house from a street broil. Olivia was in love with Viola, and thinking Sebastian to be the object of her love, married him. —Shakespeare: Twelfth Night (1614).

Sebastian, brother of Alonso king of Naples, in The Tempest (1609).

Sebastian, father of Valentine and Alice.—Fletcher: Mons. Thomas (1619).

Sebastian, a name adopted by sir Henry Ponsonby, in his contributions to Notes and Queries. (Died 1894.)

Sebastian (Don), king of Portugal, is defeated in battle and taken prisoner by the Moors (1574). He is saved from death by Dorax a noble Portuguese, then a renegade in the court of the emperor of Barbary. The train being dismissed, Dorax takes off his turban, assumes his Portuguese dress, and is recognized as Alonzo of Alcazar.—Dryden: Don Sebastian (1690).

> The quarrel and reconciliation of Sebastian and Dorax [alias Alonzo of Alcazar] is a masterly copy from a similar scene between Brutus and Cassius [in Shakespeare's Julius Cæsar].—R. Chambers: English Literature, i. 380.

Don Sebastian, a name of terror to Moorish children.

> Nor shall Sebastian's formidable name
> Be longer used to still the crying babe.
> Dryden: Don Sebastian (1690).

Sebastian (Don), or "The House of Braganza," a romance by Anna Maria Porter (1800).

Sebastian I. of Brazil, who fell in the battle of Alcazarquebir in 1578. The legend is that he is not dead, but is patiently biding the fulness of time, when he will return, and make Brazil the chief kingdom of the earth. (See BARBAROSSA, p. 88.)

The same is said of Arthur, Barbarossa (q.v.), Bobadil, Charlemagne, Desmond, Henry the Fowler, Ogier, Theodorick, and some others.

> In fact, in parts of France it is supposed that Napoleon will come again to restore the kingdom to its glory. And when Louis Napoleon consulted the plébiscite, many voted in his favour, under the notion that he was his uncle.

Sebastoc'rator (The), the chief officer of state in the empire of Greece. Same as Protosebastos.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Sebile (2 syl.), la Dame du Lac, in the romance called Perceforest. Her castle was surrounded by a river, on which rested so thick a fog that no one could see across it. Alexander the Great abode with her a fortnight to be cured of his wounds, and king Arthur was the result of this amour (vol. i. 42).

Second Nun's Tale (The), in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. (For the tale, see ST. CECILI, p. 948.)

Secret Hill (The). Ossian said to Oscar, when he resigned to him the command of the morrow's battle, "Be thine the secret hill to-night," referring to the Gaelic custom of the commander of an army retiring to a secret hill the night before a battle, to hold communion with the ghosts of departed heroes.—Ossian: Cathlin of Clutha.

Secret Tribunal (The), the count of the Holy Vehme.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Secrets. The Depository of the Secrets of all the World was the inscription over one of the brazen portals of Fakreddin's valley.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Secrets (The Revealer of). (See under RING, The Steel Ring, p. 916.)

Sede, in Voltaire's tragedy of Mahomet, was the character in which Talma, the great French tragedian, made his début in 1787.

Sedgwick (Doomsday), William Sedgwick, a fanatical "prophet" in the Commonwealth, who pretended that it had been revealed to him in a vision that the day of doom was at hand.

Sedillo, the licentiate with whom Gil Blas took service as a footman. Sedillo was a gouty old gourmand of 69. Being ill, he sent for Dr. Sangrado, who took from him six porringers of blood every day, and dosed him incessantly with warm water, giving him two or three pints at a time, saying, "A patient cannot be blooded too much; for it is a great error to suppose that blood is needful for the preservation of life. Warm water," he maintained, "drunk in abundance, is the true specific in all distempers." When the licentiate died under this treatment, the doctor insisted it was because his patient had neither lost blood enough nor drunk enough warm water.—Lesage: Gil Blas, ii. 1, 2 (1715).

Sedley (Mr.), a wealthy London stock-broker, brought to ruin by the fall of the Funds just prior to the battle of Waterloo. The old merchant then tried to earn a meagre pittance by selling wine, coals, or lottery-tickets by commission, but his bad wine and cheap coals found but few customers.

Mrs. Sedley, wife of Mr. Sedley. A homely, kind-hearted, bonny, motherly woman in her prosperous days, but soured by adversity, and quick to take offence.

Amelia Sedley, daughter of the stock-broker, educated at Miss Pinkerton's academy, Chiswick Mall, and engaged to captain George Osborne, son of a rich London merchant. After the ruin of old Sedley, George married Amelia, and was disinherited by his father. He was adored by his young wife, but fell on the field of Waterloo. Amelia then returned to her father, and lived in great indigence, but captain Dobbin greatly loved her, and did much to relieve her worst wants. Captain Dobbin rose in his profession to the rank of colonel, and then married the young widow.

Joseph Sedley, a collector, of Boggley Wollah; a fat, sensual, conceited dandy, vain, shy, and vulgar. "His excellency" fled from Brussels on the day of the battle between Napoleon and Wellington, and returned to Calcutta, where he bragged of his brave deeds, and made it appear that he was Wellington's right hand; so that he obtained the sobriquet of "Waterloo Sedley." He again returned to England, and became the "patron" of Becky Sharp (then Mrs. Rawdon Crawley, but separated from her husband). This lady proved a terrible dragon, fleeced him of all his money, and in six months he died under very suspicious circumstances. — Thackeray: Vanity Fair (1848).

Sedley (Sir Charles), in the court of Charles II.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

See, the Conquering Hero Comes! This song stands at the opening of act ii. of Alexander the Great, a tragedy by N. Lee (1678).

(Set to music by Handel, and introduced in the oratorio of Judas Maccabæus, 1743.)

Seelencooper (Captain), superintendent of the military hospital at Ryde.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Seer (The Ploughkeepsie), Andrew Jackson Davis.

Segonti'ari, inhabitants of parts of Hampshire and Berkshire, referred to in the Commentaries of Cæsar.

Seicen'to (3 syl.), the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries of Italian notables, the period of bad taste and degenerate art. The degraded art is termed Seicentista, and the notables of the period the Seicentisti. The style of writing was inflated and bombastic, and that of art was what is termed "rococo." The chief poet was Marini (1569–1615), the chief painter Caravaggio (1569–1609), the chief sculptor Bernini (1593-1680), and the chief architect Borromini (1599-1667).

Seidel-Beckir, the most famous of all talismanists. He made three of extraordinary power: viz. a little golden fish, which would fetch from the sea whatever was desired of it; a poniard, which rendered the person who bore it invisible, and all others whom he wished to be so; and a steel ring, which enabled the wearer to read the secrets of another's heart.—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("The Four Talismans," 1743).

Seine (1 syl.), put for Paris. Tennyson calls the red republicanism of Paris, "The red fool-fury of the Seine."

Setting the Seine on fire. The Seine is a drag-net as well as a river. Hence drag-men are called in French les pêcheurs à la seine. "He'll never set the Thames on fire" is a similar pun, a temse being a sieve for sifting flour, as well as the river (French tamis, Italian tamiso, "a sieve," verb tamisare, "to sift").

Sejanus (Ælius), a minister of Tibĕrius, and commander of the prætorian guards. His affability made him a great favourite. In order that he might be the foremost man of Rome, all the children and grandchildren of the emperor were put to death under sundry pretences. Drusus, the son of Tiberius, then fell a victim. Sejanus next persuaded the emperor to retire, and Tiberius went to Campania; but when the administrator assumed the title of emperor, Tiberius, roused from his lethargy, accused him of treason. The senate condemned him to be strangled, and his remains, being treated with the grossest contumely, were kicked into the Tiber, A.D. 31.

(This was the subject of Ben Jonson's first historical play, entitled Sejanus, 1603.)

Sejjin or Sejn, the record of all evil deeds, whether by men or the genii, kept by the recording angel. It also means that dungeon beneath the seventh earth, where Eblis and his companions are confined.

Verily, the register of the deeds of the wicked is surely in Sejjin.—Sale: Al Korân, lxxxiii.

Selborne (Earl of). (See PALMER, Roundell, p. 798.)

Selby (Captain), an officer in the guards.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Self-denying Ordinance (The), the name given to an Act passed by the Long Parliament (December 9, 1644), by which the members bound themselves not to accept certain posts, particularly commands in the army.

¶ The name was given also to an arrangement made respecting British naval promotions and retirements in 1870.

SELIM, son of Abdallah, who was murdered by his brother Giaffir (pacha of Aby'dos). After the death of his brother, Giaffir (2 syl.) took Selim under his charge and brought him up, but treated him with considerable cruelty. Giaffir had a daughter named Zuleika (3 syl.), with whom Selim fell in love; but Zuleika thought he was her brother. As soon as Giaffir discovered the attachment of the two cousins, he informed his daughter that he intended her to marry Osmyn Bey; but Zuleika eloped with Selim, the pacha pursued after them, Selim was shot, Zuleika killed herself, and Giaffir was left childless and alone.—Byron: Bride of Abydos (1813).

Selim, son of Acbar. Jehanguire was called Selim before his accession to the throne. He married Nourmahal the "Light of the Haram," but a coolness rose up between them. One night, Nourmahal entered the sultan's banquet-room as a lute-player, and so charmed young Selim that he exclaimed, "If Nourmahal had so sung, I could have forgiven her!" It was enough. Nourmahal threw off her disguise, and became reconciled to her husband. — Moore: Lalla Rookh ("Light of the Haram," 1817).

Selim, son of the Moorish king of Algiers. [Horush] Barbarossa, the Greek renegade, having made himself master of Algiers, slew the reigning king, but Selim escaped. After the lapse of seven years, he returned, under the assumed name of Achmet, and headed an uprising of the Moors. The insurgents succeeded, Barbarossa was slain, the widowed queen Zaphira was restored to her husband's throne, and Selim her son married Irênê the daughter of Barbarossa.—J. Brown: Barbarossa (1742 or 1755).

Selim, friend of Etan (the supposed son of Zamti the mandarin).—Murphy: The Orphan of China (1759).

Sel'ima, daughter of Bajazet sultan of Turkey, in love with prince Axalla, but promised by her father in marriage to Omar. When Selima refused to marry Omar, Bajazet would have slain her; but Tamerlane commanded both Bajazet and Omar to be seized. So every obstacle was removed from the union of Selima and Axalla.—Rowe: Tamerlane (1702).

Sel'ima, one of the six Wise Men from the East led by the guiding star to Jesus. —Klopstock: The Messiah, v. (1771).

Se'lith, one of the two guardian angels of the Virgin Mary and of John the Divine.—Klopstock: The Messiah, ix. (1771).

Sellock (Cisly), a servant-girl in the service of lady and sir Geoffrey Peveril of the Peak.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Selma, the royal residence of Fingal, in Morven (north-west coast of Scotland).

Selma, thy halls are silent. There is no sound in the woods of Morven.—Ossian: Lathmon.

Selvaggio, the father of sir Industry, and the hero of Thomson's Castle of Indolence.

In Fairy-land there lived a knight of old,
Of feature stern, Selvaggio well y-clept;
A rough, unpolished man, robust and bold,
But wondrous poor. He neither sowed nor reaped;
Ne stores in summer for cold winter heaped.
In hunting all his days away he wore—
Now scorched by June, now in November steeped,
Now pinched by biting January sore,
He still in woods pursued the libbard and the boar.
Thomson: Castle of Indolence, ii. 5 (1745).

Sem'ele (3 syl.), ambitious of enjoying Jupiter in all his glory, perished from the sublime effulgence of the god. This is substantially the tale of the second story of T. Moore's Loves of the Angels. Liris (q.v.) requested her angel lover to come to her in all his angelic brightness; but was burnt to ashes as she fell into his embrace.

For majesty gives nought to subjects, . . .
A royal smile, a guinea's glorious rays,
Like Simelé, would kill us with its blaze.
Peter Pindar [Dr. Wolcot]: Progress of Admiration (1809).

Semi'da, the young man, the only son of a widow, raised from the dead by Jesus, as he was being carried from the walls of Nain. He was deeply in love with Cidli, the daughter of Jairus.

He was in the bloom of life. His hair hung in curls on his shoulders, and he appeared as beautiful as David when, sitting by the stream of Bethlehem, he was ravished at the voice of God.—Klopstock: The Messiah, iv. (1771).

Semir'amis, queen of Assyria, wife of Ninus. She survived her husband, and reigned. The glory of her reign stands out so prominently that she quite eclipses all the monarchs of ancient Assyria. After a reign of forty-two years, she resigned the crown to her son Ninyas, and took her flight to heaven in the form of a dove. Semiramis was the daughter of Dercẽto the fish-goddess and a Syrian youth. Being exposed in infancy, she was brought up by doves.

Semiramis of the North, Margaret, daughter of Waldemar III. of Denmark. At the death of her father, she succeeded him; by the death of her husband, Haco VIII. king of Norway, she succeeded to that kingdom also; and having conquered Albert of Sweden, she added Sweden to her empire. Thus was she queen of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden (1353–1412).

Semirămis of the North, Catharine of Russia, a powerful and ambitious sovereign; but licentious, sensual, and very immoral (1729–1796).

Semkail, the angel of the winds and waves.

I keep the winds in awe with the hand which you see in the air, and prevent the wind Haidge from coming forth. If I gave it freedom, it would reduce the universe to powder. With my other hand I hinder the sea from overflowing, without which precaution it would cover the face of the whole earth.—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("History of Abdal Motalleb," 1743).

Semo (Son of), Cuthullin general of the Irish tribes.

Sempro'nius, one of the "friends" of Timon of Athens, and "the first man that e'er received a gift from him." When Timon sent to borrow a sum of money of "his friend," he excused himself thus: "As Timon did not think proper to apply to me first, but asked others before he sent to me, I consider his present application an insult." "Go," said he to the servant, "and tell your master—

Who bates mine honour shall not know my coin."
Shakespeare: Timon of Athens, act iii. sc. 3 (1600).

Sempro'nius, a treacherous friend of Cato while in Utica. Sempronius tried to mask his treason by excessive zeal and unmeasured animosity against Cæsar, with whom he was acting in alliance. He loved Marcia, Cato's daughter, but his love was not honourable love; and when he attempted to carry off the lady by force, he was slain by Juba the Numidian prince.—Addison: Cato (1713)

I'll conceal
My thoughts in passion, 'tis the surest way.
I'll bellow out for Rome and for my country,

> And month at Cæsar till I skake the senate.
> Your cold hypocrisy's a stale device,
> A worn-out trick.
> Act I. 1.

Sena'nus (St.), the saint who fled to the island of Scattery, and resolved that no woman should ever step upon the isle. An angel led St. Can'ara to the isle, but Senanus refused to admit her.—Moore: Irish Melodies ("St. Senanus and the Lady," 1814).

Sen'eca (The Christian), bishop Hall of Norwich (1574–1656).

Sene'na (3 syl.), a Welsh maiden in love with Car'adoc. She dressed in boy's clothes, and, under the assumed name of Mervyn, became the page of the princess Goervyl. This did she that she might follow her lover to America, when Madoc colonized Caer-Madoc. Senena was promised in marriage to another; but when the wedding-day arrived and all was ready, the bride was nowhere to be found.

> . . . she doffed
> Her bridal robes, and clipt her golden locks,
> And put on boy's attire, thro' wood and wild
> To seek her own true love, and over sea,
> Forsaking all for him, she followed him.
> Southey: Madoc, ii. 23 (1805).

Sennac'herib, called by the Orientals king Moussal.—D'Herbelot: Notes to the Korân (seventeenth century).

(One of the best sacred lyrics in the language is Byron's Destruction of Sennacherib's Army.)

Sennamar, a very skilful architect who built at Hirah, for Nôman-al-Aôuar king of Hirah, a most magnificent palace. In order that he might not build another equal or superior to it for some other monarch, Nôman cast him headlong from the highest tower of the building.—D'Herbelot: Bibliothèque Orientale (1697).

¶ A parallel tale is told of Neim'heid (2 syl.), who employed four architects to build for him a palace in Ireland, and then, jealous lest they should build one like it or superior to it for another monarch, he had them all privately put to death. — O'Halloran: History of Ireland.

Sense and Sensibility, a novel by Jane Austen (1811).

Sensitive (Lord), a young nobleman of amorous proclivities, who marries Sabina Rosny, a French refugee, in Padua, but leaves her, more from recklessness than wickedness. He comes to England and pays court to lady Ruby, a rich young widow; but lady Ruby knows of his marriage to the young French girl, and so hints at it that his lordship, who is no libertine, and has a great regard for his honour, sees that his marriage is known, and tells lady Ruby he will start without delay to Padua, and bring his young wife home. This, however, was not needful, as Sabina was at the time the guest of lady Ruby. She is called forth, and lord Sensitive openly avows her to be his wife.—Cumberland: First Love (1796).

Sentimental Journey (The), by Laurence Sterne (1768). It was intended to be sentimental sketches of a tour through Italy in 1764, but he died soon after completing the first part. The tourist lands at Calais, and the first incident is his interview with a poor monk of St. Francis, who begged alms for his convent. Sterne refused to give anything, but his heart smote him for his churlishness to the meek old man. From Calais he goes to Montriul (Montreuil-sur-Mer), and thence to Nampont, near Cressy. Here occurred the incident, which is one of the most touching of all the sentimental sketches, that of "The Dead Ass." His next stage was Amiens, and thence to Paris. While looking at the Bastille, he heard a voice crying, "I can't get out! I can't get out!" He thought it was a child, but it was only a caged starling. This led him to reflect on the delights of liberty and the miseries of captivity. Giving reins to his fancy, he imaged to himself a prisoner who for thirty years had been confined in a dungeon, during all which time "he had seen no sun, no moon, nor had the voice of kinsman breathed through his lattice." Carried away by his feelings, he burst into tears, for he "could not sustain the picture of confinement which his fancy had drawn." While at Paris, our tourist visited Versailles, and introduces an incident which he had witnessed some years previously at Rennes, in Brittany. It was that of a marquis reclaiming his sword and "patent of nobility." Any nobleman in France who engaged in trade, forfeited his rank; but there was a law in Brittany that a nobleman of reduced circumstances might deposit his sword temporarily with the local magistracy, and if better times dawned upon him, he might reclaim it. Sterne was present at one of these interesting ceremonies. A marquis had laid down his sword to mend his fortune by trade, and after a successful career at Marrinicio for twenty years, returned home, and reclaimed it. On receiving his deposit from the president, he drew it slowly from the scabbard, and, observing a spot of rust near the point, dropped a tear on it. As he wiped the blade lovingly, he remarked, "I shall find some other way to get it off." Returning to Paris, our tourist starts for Italy; but the book ends with his arrival at Moulines (Moulins). Some half a league from this city he encountered Maria, whose pathetic story had been told him by Mr. Shandy. She had lost her goat when Sterne saw her, but had instead a little dog named Silvio, led by a string. She was sitting under a poplar, playing on a pipe her vespers to the Virgin. Poor Maria had been crossed in love, or, to speak more strictly, the curé of Moulines had forbidden her banns, and the maiden lost her reason. Her story is exquisitely told, and Sterne says, "Could the traces be ever worn out of her brain, and those of Eliza out of mine, she should not only eat of my bread and drink of my cup, but Maria should lie in my bosom, and be unto me as a daughter."

Sentinel and St. Paul's Clock (The). The sentinel condemned to death by court-martial for falling asleep on his watch, but pardoned because he affirmed that he heard St. Paul's clock strike thirteen instead of twelve, was John Hatfield, who died at the age of 102, June, 1770.

Sentry (Captain), one of the members of the club under whose auspices the Spectator was professedly issued.

September Massacre (The), the slaughter of loyalists confined in the Abbaye. This massacre took place in Paris between September 2 and 5, 1792, on receipt of the news of the capture of Verdun. The number of victims was not less than 1200, and some place it as high as 4000.

Un nomme Septembriseurs ceux qui accomplirent les massacres.—Bouillet: Dictionnaire Historique, etc., p. 1747.

September the Third was Cromwell's day. On September 3, 1650, he won the battle of Dunbar. On September 3, 1651, he won the battle of Worcester. On September 3, 1658, he died.

Serab, the Arabic word for the Fata morgana. (See Quintus Curtius: De Rebus Alexandri, vii.)

The Arabic word serâb signifies that false appearance which, in Eastern countries, is often seen in sandy plains about noon, resembling a large lake of water in motion. It is occasioned by the reverberation of the sunbeams. It sometimes tempts thirsty travellers out of their way, but deceives them when they come near, either going forward or quite vanishing.—Sale: Al Korân, xxiv. notes.

The actions of unbellevers are like the serâb of the plain; he who is thirsty takes it for water, and finds it deceit.—Al Korân.

Seraphic Doctor (The), St. Bonaventura, placed by Dantê among the saints of his Paradiso (1221-1274).

Seraphic Saint (The), St. Francis d'Assisi (1182-1226).

Of all the saints, St. Francis was the most blameless and gentle.—Dean Milman.

Seraphim (The), a poem by Mrs. Browning (1838). A mystical Passion-play. The time is the Crucifixion, and the angels (except the two seraphs, Ador and Zerah) have departed to the earth. The two seraphs are supposed to be outside the gate of heaven.

Seraphina Arthuret (Miss), a papist. Her sister is Miss Angelica Arthuret.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Serapion, priest of Isis.—Dryden: All for Love (1678).

Sera'pis, an Egyptian deity, symbolizing the Nile, and fertility in general.

Seraskier' (3 syl.), a name given by the Turks to a general of division, generally a pacha with two or three tails. (Persian, seri asker, "head of the army.")

. . . three thousand Moslems perished here,
And sixteen bayonets pierced the seraskier.
Byron: Don Juan, viii. 81 (1824).

Serb, a Servian or native of Servia.

Serbo'nian Bog (The). Serbon was a lake a thousand miles in compass, between mount Ca'sius and the city of Damietta, one of the eastern mouths of the Nile. The Serbonian Bog was surrounded on all sides by hills of loose sand, and the sand, carried into it by high winds, floated on the surface, and looked like a solid mass. Herodotos (Greek History, ii. 6) tells us that whole armies, deceived by the appearance, have been engulfed in the bog.

A gulf profound as that Serbonian Bog
Betwixt Damiata (3 syl.) and mount Casius old,
Where armies whole have sunk.
Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 592, etc. (1665).

N.B.—Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca Historia, i. 30) says, "Many, missing their way, have been swallowed up in this bog, together with whole armies." Dr. Smith says, "When Darius Ochus was on his way to Egypt, this bog was the scene of at least a partial destruction of the Persian army." (See also Lucan: Pharsalia, viii. 539; Classical Dictionary, article "Serbōnis Lacus.")

Sereme'nes (4 syl.), brother-in-law of king Sardanapālus, to whom he entrusts his signet-ring to put down the rebellion headed by Arbācês the Mede and Belēsis the Chaldēan soothsayer. Seremēnês was slain in a battle with the insurgents.—Byron: Sardanapalus (1819).

Sere'na, allured by the mildness of the weather, went into the fields to gather wild flowers for a garland, when she was attracted by the Blatant Beast, who carried her off in its mouth. Her cries attracted to the spot sir Calidore, who compelled the beast to drop its prey.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, vi. 3 (1596).

Serendib, now called Ceylon. When Adam and Eve were cast down from paradise, Adam fell on the isle of Serendib, and Eve near Joddah, in Arabia. After the lapse of 200 years, Adam joined Eve, and lived in Ceylon.

We passed several islands, amongst others the island of Bells, distant about ten days' sail from that of Serendib.—Arabian Nights ("Sinbad," sixth voyage).

 A print of Adam's foot is shown on Pico de Adam, in the island of Serendib or Ceylon. According to the Korân, the garden of Eden was not on our earth at all, but in the seventh heaven.—Ludovico Marracci: Al Korân, 24 (1698).

Sergis (Sir), the attendant on Irēna. He informs sir Artegal that Irena is the captive of Grantorto, who has sworn to take her life within ten days, unless some knight will volunteer to be her champion, and in single combat prove her innocent of the crime laid to her charge.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 11 (1596).

Sergius, a Nestorian monk, said to be the same as Bohcira, who resided at Bosra, in Syria. This monk, we are told, helped Mahomet in writing the Kordn. Some say it was Saïd or Felix Boheira.

Boheira's name, in the books of Christians, is Sergius.—Masudi: History, 24 (A.D. 956).

Serian Worms, silkworms from Sericum (China), the country of the Serês; hence, serica vestis, "a silk dress."

No Serian worms he knows, that with their thread
Draw out their silken lives; nor silken pride;
His lambs' warm fleece well fits his little need,
Not in that proud Sidonian tincture dyed.
P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, xii. (1633).

Seri'na, daughter of lord Acasto, plighted to Chamont (the brother of Monimia "the orphan").—Otway: The Orphan (1680).

Seriswattee, the Janus of Hindû mythology.

Sermons by Dr. Isaac Barrow (1685). One of these sermons took three hours and a half in delivery.

Charles II. called Barrow an unfair preacher, "because he so exhausted his subject, as to leave nothing for others to say."

Serpent (A), emblem of the tribe of Dan. In the old church at Totness is a stone pulpit divided into compartments, containing shields decorated with the several emblems of the Jewish tribes, of which this is one.

Dan shall be a serpent by the way, an adder in the path, that biteth the horse's heels, so that his rider shall fall backward.—Gen. xlix. 17.

(For Lucan's list of African Serpents, see PHARSALIA, p. 835.)

The Serpent and Satan. There is an Arabian tradition that the devil begged all the animals, one after another, to carry him into the garden, that he might speak to Adam and Eve, but they all refused except the serpent, who took him between two of its teeth. It was then the most beautiful of all the animals, and walked upon legs and feet.—Masudi: History, 22 (A.D. 956).

The Serpent's Punishment. The punishment of the serpent for tempting Eve was this: (1) Michael was commanded to cut off its legs; and (2) the serpent was doomed to feed on human excrements ever after.

Y llamô [Dios] a la serpiente, y a Michael, aquel que tiene la espada de Dios, y le dixo; Aquesta sierpe es acelerada, echala la primera del parayso, y cortale las piernas, y si quisiere caminar, arrastrara la vida por tierra. Y llamô à Satanas, el qual vino riendo, y dixole; Porque tu reprobo has engañado a aquestos, y los has hecho immundos? Yo quiero que toda immundicia suya, y de todos sus hijos, en saliendo de sus cuerpos entre por tu boca, porque en verdad ellos haran penitencia, y tu quedaras harto de immundicia.—Gospel of Barnabas.

Serpent d'Isabit, an enormous monster, whose head rested on the top of the Pic du Midi de Bigorre, its body filled the whole valley of Luz, St. Sauveur, and Gèdres, and its tail was coiled in the hollow below the cirque of Gavarnie. It fed once in three months, and supplied itself by making a very strong inspiration of its breath, whereupon every living thing around was drawn into its maw. It was ultimately killed by making a huge bonfire, and waking it from its torpor, when it became enraged, and drawing a deep breath, drew the bonfire into its maw, and died in agony.—Rev. W. Webster: A Pyrenean Legend (1877).

Serpent Stone. In a carn on the Mound of Mourning was a serpent which had a stone on the tail, and "whoever held this stone in one hand would have in the other as much gold as heart could desire."—The Mabinogion ("Peredur," twelfth century). (See FORTUNATUS, p. 387.)

Serpents of North Africa. (See PHARSALIA, p. 835.)

Served my God. WOLSEY said, in his fall (1530), "Had I but served my God with half the zeal I served my king, He would not in mine age have left me naked to mine enemies."—Shakespeare: Henry VIII. act iii. sc. 2 (1601).

¶ SAMRAH, when he was deposed from the government of Basorah by the caliph Moawiyah, said, "If I had served God so well as I have served the caliph, He would never have condemned me to all eternity" (seventh century).

¶ ANTONIO PEREZ, the favourite of Philip II. of Spain, said (1611), "Mon zele etoit si grand vers ces benignes puissances [i.e. Turin] qui si j'en eusse eu autant pour Dieu, je ne doubte point qu'il ne m'eut deja recompensé de son paradis."

¶ The earl of GOWRIE, when in 1584 he was led to execution, said, "If I had served God as faithfully as I have done the king [James VI.], I should not have come to this end."—Spotswood: History of the Church of Scotland, pp. 332, 333 (1653).

Service Tree. A wand of the service tree has the power of renewing the virulence of an exhausted poison. —Comtesse d'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Florina," 1682).

Ses'ame (3 syl.), the talismanic word which would open or shut the door leading into the cave of the forty thieves. In order to open it, the words to be uttered were, "Open, Sesamê!" and in order to close it, "Shut, Sesamê!" Sesamê is a plant which yields an oily grain, and hence, when Cassim forgot the word, he substituted barley, but without effect.

> Mrs. Habberfield, coming to a small iron grating, exchanged some words with my companions, which produced as much effect as the "Open, Sesamê!" of nursery renown.—Lord W. P. Lennox: Celebrities, &c., i. 53.

> Opening a handkerchief, in which he had a sample of sesamê, he inquired of me how much a large measure of the grain was worth . . . I told him that, according to the present price, a large measure was worth one hundred drachms of silver . . . and he left the sesamê with me.—Arabian Nights ("The Christian Merchant's Story").

Sesostris (The Modern), Napoleon Bonaparte (1769, 1804–1815, 1821).

> But where is he, the modern, mightier far,
> Who, born no king, made monarchs draw his car;
> The new Sesostris whose unharnessed kings,
> Freed from the bit, believe themselves with wings,
> And spurn the dust o'er which they crawled of late,
> Chained to the chariot of the chieftain's state?
> Byron: Age of Bronze (1821).

("Sesostris," in Fénelon's Télémaque, is meant for Louis XIV.)

Set'ebos, a deity of the Patagonians.

> His art is of such power,
> It would control my dam's god Setebos.
> Shakespeare: The Tempest (1609).

> The giants, when they found themselves fettered, roared like bulls, and cried upon Setebos to help them.—Eden: History of Travayle.

Seth, a servant of the Jew at Ashby. Reuben is his fellow-servant.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Settle (Elkana), the poet, introduced by sir W. Scott in Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

(Rochester tried to raise him in public estimation, so as to be a rival to Dryden.)

Seven Bishops (The). (See BISHOPS, p. 122.)

Seven in the Bible is a mystic number, probably quite indefinite. We say "six or seven," meaning an indefinite number between "three or four" and "a dozen or more."

In Brussels it plays a very conspicuous part.

> There are seven noble families springing from seven ancient castles, and these seven supply the stock from which the seven senators are selected. The seven senators form the upper council of the city. There are also seven great squares and seven gates. [This refers to the sixteenth century.]—Motley: The Dutch Republic, pt. i. 1 (1856).

Seven Bodies in Alchemy. The Sun is gold, the Moon silver, Mars iron, Mercury quicksilver, Saturn lead, Jupiter tin, and Venus copper.

> The bodies seven, eek, lo hem heer anoon:
> Sol gold is, and Luna silver we threpe;
> Mars yren, Mercurie quyksilver we clepe;
> Saturnus leed, and Jubitur is tyn,
> And Venus ciper, by my fader kyn.
> Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (prologue to "The Chanounes Yemanes Tale," 1388).

Seven Champions of Christendom (The): St. George for England; St. Andrew for Scotland; St. Patrick for Ireland; St. David for Wales; St. Denys for France; St. James for Spain; and St. Anthony for Italy.

(Richard Johnson wrote The Famous History of the Seven Champions of Christendom, 1617.)

Seven-Hilled City (The). In Latin Urbs Septicollis; ancient Rome, built on seven hills, surrounded by Servius Tullius with a line of fortifications. The seven hills are the Palatinus, the Capitolinus, the Quirinālis, the Cælius, the Aventinus, the Viminālis, and the Esquilinus.

Seven Lamps of Architecture, by Ruskin (1849). The seven lamps are Sacrifice, Truth, Power, Beauty, Life, Memory, and Obedience.

Seven Months' War (The). (See SIX MONTHS' WAR, p. 1012.)

(The first half consisted of a series of battles won by the king of Prussia; the second half consisted of a series of sieges, ending with the siege of Paris. September 1, after the battle of Sedan, Napoleon delivered his sword to William king of Prussia. January 18, 1871, William was declared emperor of Germany.)

Seven Mortal Sins (The): (1) pride, (2) wrath, (3) envy, (4) lust, (5) gluttony, (6) avarice, and (7) sloth. (See SEVEN VIRTUES, p. 986.)

Seven Rienzi's Number.

October 7, Rienzi's foes yielded to his power.
7 months Rienzi reigned as tribune.
7 years he was absent in exile.
7 weeks of return saw him without an enemy (Oct. 7).
7 was the number of the crowns the Roman convents and Roman council awarded him.

Seven Senses (The). According to Ecclesiasticus, they are seeing, hearing, tasting, feeling, smelling, understanding, and speech. (See FIVE WITS, p. 371.)

The Lord created man . . . and they received the use of the five operations of the Lord, and in the sixth place He imparted [to] them understanding, and in the seventh speech, an interpreter of the cogitations thereof.—Ecclus. xvii. 5.

Seven Sisters (The). Seven culverins cast by one Borthwick.

And these were Borthwick's "Sisters Seven,"
And culverins which France had given.
Ill-omened gift. The guns remain
The conqueror's spoil on Flodden plain.
Sir W. Scott: Marmion, iv. (1808).

(Wordsworth has a ballad called "The Seven Sisters" named Campbell. While the knight their father was away in the wars, some rovers leaped on shore. The seven sisters fled in fright, and, being pursued by the rovers, plunged into a lake. In this lake are seven small islets, and the fishers say that on these islets the seven sisters were buried by fairy hands. Wordsworth has also a pretty lyric of seventeen stanzas, called "We are Seven.")

Seven Sleepers (The). The tale of these sleepers is told in divers manners. The best accounts are those in the Korân, xviii., entitled, "The Cave, Revealed at Mecca;" The Golden Legends, by Jacques de Voragine; the De Gloria Martyrum, i. 9, by Gregory of Tours; and the Oriental Tales, by comte de Caylus (1743).

Names of the Seven Sleepers. Gregory of Tours says their names were: Constantine, Dionysius, John, Maximian, Malchus, Martinian or Marcian, and Serapion. In the Oriental Tales the names given are: Jemlikha, Mekchilinia, Mechlima, Merlima, Debermouch, Charnouch, and the shepherd Keschetiouch. Their names are not given in the Korân.

N.B.—Al Seyid, a Jacobite Christian of Najrân, says the sleepers were only three, with their dog; others maintain that their number was five, besides the dog; but Al Beidâwi, who is followed by most authorities, says they were seven, besides the dog.

∴ Duration of the Sleep. The Korân says it was "300 years and nine years over;" the Oriental Tales say 309 years; but if Gregory of Tours is followed, the duration of the sleep was barely 230 years.

The Legend of the Seven Sleepers. (1) According to Gregory of Tours, they were seven noble youths of Ephesus, who fled in the Decian persecution to a cave in mount Celion, the mouth of which was blocked up with stones. After 230 years they were discovered, and awoke, but died within a few days, and were taken in a large stone coffin to Marseilles. Visitors are still shown in St. Victor's Church their reputed stone coffin.

(If there is any truth at all in the legend, it amounts to this: In A.D. 250 some youths (three or seven) suffered martyrdom under the emperor Decius, "fell asleep in the Lord," and were buried in a cave of mount Celion. In 479 (the reign of Theodosius) their bodies were discovered, and, being consecrated as holy relics, were removed to Marseilles.)

(2) According to the Oriental Tales, six Grecian youths were slaves in the palace of Dakiānos (Decianus, Decius). This Dakianos had risen from low degrees to kingly honours, and gave himself out to be a god. Jemlikha was led to doubt the divinity of his master, because he was unable to keep off a fly which persistently tormented him, and, being roused to reflection, came to the conclusion that there must be a god to whom both Dakianos and the fly were subject. He communicated his thoughts to his companions, and they all fled from the Ephesian court till they met the shepherd Keschetiouch, whom they converted, and who showed them a cave which no one but himself knew of. Here they fell asleep, and Dakianos, having discovered them, commanded the mouth of the cave to be closed up. Here the sleepers remained 309 years, at the expiration of which time they all awoke, but died a few hours afterwards.)

The Dog of the Seven Sleepers. In the notes of the Korân by Sale, the dog's name is Kratim, Kratmer, or Katmir. In the Oriental Tales it is Catnier, which looks like a clerical blunder for Catmer, only it occurs frequently. It is one of the ten animals admitted into Mahomet's paradise. The Korân tells us that the dog followed the seven young men into the cave, but they tried to drive him away, and even broke three of its legs with stones, when the dog said to them, "I love those who love God. Sleep, masters, and I will keep guard." In the Oriental Tales the dog is made to say, "You go to seek God, but am not I also a child of God?" Hearing this, the young men were so astounded, they went immediately, and carried the dog into the cave.

The Place of Sepulture of the Seven Sleepers. Gregory of Tours tells us that the bodies were removed from mount Celion in a stone coffin to Marseilles. The Korân with Sale's notes informs us they were buried in the cave, and a chapel was built there to mark the site. (See SLEEPER.)

The Seven Sleepers turning on their sides. William of Malmesbury says that Edward the Confessor, in his mind's eye, saw the seven sleepers turn from their right sides to their left, and (he adds) whenever they turn on their sides it indicates great disasters to Christendom.

> Woe, woe to England! I have seen a vision:
> The seven sleepers in the cave of Ephesus
> Have turned from right to left.
> Tennyson: Harold, I. 1.

Seven Sleepers (The); i.e. the seven sleepy ones. So Noircarmes and his six officers were nicknamed in the siege of Valenciennes, in 1566, on account of the "sleepiness" with which they at first conducted the siege. They afterwards roused themselves and became terribly in earnest in the work of destruction.—Motley: The Dutch Republic, pt. ii. 9 (1856).

Seven Sorrows of Mary (The): (1) Simeon's prophecy, (2) the flight into Egypt, (3) Jesus missed, (4) the betrayal, (5) the crucifixion, (6) the taking down from the cross, and (7) the ascension. HER SEVEN JOYS were: (1) the annunciation, (2) the visitation, (3) the nativity, (4) the adoration of the Magi, (5) the presentation in the temple, (6) finding the lost Child, and (7) the assumption.

Seven Times Christ Spoke on the Cross: (1) "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do;" (2) "To-day shalt thou be with Me in paradise;" (3) "Woman, behold thy son! 'etc.; (4) "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" (5) "I thirst;" (6) "It is finished!" (7) 'Father, into Thy hands I commend My spirit."

Seven Towers (The), a state prison in Constantinople, near the sea of Marmora. It stands at the west of the Seraglio.

> But then they never came to "the Seven Towers."
> Byron: Don Juan, v. 150 (1820).

Seven Virtues (The): (1) faith, (2) hope, (3) charity, (4) prudence, (5) justice, (6) fortitude, and (7) temperance. The first three are called "the holy virtues." (See SEVEN MORTAL SINS, p. 985.)

Seven Weeks' War (The), that between Austria and Prussia, in 1866, for the supremacy of Germany. The war was declared by Austria, June 17, and the Peace of Presburg (giving Prussia the victory) was signed August 20.

Seven Wise Masters. Lucien the son of Dolopathus was placed under the charge of Virgil, and was tempted in manhood by his step-mother. He repelled her advances, and she accused him to the king of taking liberties with her. By consulting the stars, it was discovered that if he could tide over seven days his life would be spared; so seven wise masters undertook to tell the king a tale each, in illustration of rash judgments. When they had all told their tales, the prince related, under the disguise of a tale, the story of the queen's wantonness; whereupon Lucien was restored to favour, and the queen was put to death.—Sandabar: Parables (contemporary with king Courou).

(John Rolland of Dalkeith has rendered this legend into Scotch verse. There is an Arabic version by Nasr Allah (twelfth century), borrowed from the Indian by Sandabar. In the Hebrew version by rabbi Joel (1270), the legend is called Kalilah and Dimnah.)

Seven Wise Men (The).
One of Plutarch's brochures in the Moralia is entitled, "The Banquet of the Seven Wise Men," in which Periander is made to give an account of a contest at Chalcis between Homer and Hesiod, in which the latter wins the prize, and receives a tripod, on which he caused to be engraved this inscription—

> This Hesiod vows to the Heliconian nine,
> In Chalcis won from Homer the divine.

Seven Wise Men of Greece (The), seven Greeks of the sixth century B.C., noted for their maxims.

(1) BIAS. His maxim was, "Most men are bad" ("There is none that doeth good, no, not one," Ps. xiv. 3): Οἱ πλείους κακοί (fl. B.C. 550).

(2) CHILO. "Consider the end:" Τέλος ὅρα μακροῦ βίου (fl. B.C. 590).

(3) CLEOBŪLOS. "Avoid extremes" (the golden mean): Ἄριστον μέτρον (fl. B.C. 580).

(4) PERIANDER. "Nothing is impossible to industry" (Patience and perseverance overcome mountains): Μελέτη τὸ πᾶν (B.C. 665-585).

(5) PITTACOS. "Know thy opportunity" (Seize time by the forelock): Καιρὸν γνῶθι (B.C. 652-569).

(6) SOLON. "Know thyself:" Γνῶθι σεαυτόν (B.C. 638-558).

(7) THĀLES (a syl.). "Suretyship is the forerunner of ruin" ("He that hateth suretyship is sure," Prov. xi. 15): Ἐγγύα, πάρα δ' ἄτη (B.C. 636-546).

> First Solon, who made the Athenian laws;
> Then Chilo, in Sparta, renowned for his saws;
> In Milētos did Thalēs astronomy teach;
> Bias used in Priēnē his morals to preach;
> Cleobūlos, of Lindos, was handsome and wise;
> Mitylēnē 'gainst thraldom saw Pittācos rise;
> Periander is said to have gained, thro' his court,
> The honour that Myson, the Chenian, ought.
> E. C. B.

(It is Plato who says that Myson should take the place of Periander as one of the Seven Wise Men.)

Seven Wonders of Wales (The): (1) Snowdon, (2) Pystyl Rhaiadr waterfall, (3) St. Winifred's well, (4) Overton churchyard, (5) Gresford church bells, (6) Wrexham steeple (? tower), (7) Llangollen bridge.

Seven Wonders of the Peak (Derbyshire): The three caves called the Devil's Arse, Pool, and Eden; St. Anne's Well, which is similar in character "to that most dainty spring of Bath;" Tideswell, which ebbs and flows, although so far inland; Sandy Hill, which never increases at the base or abates in height; and the forest of the Peak, which bears trees on hard rocks.—Drayton: Polyolbion, xxvi. (a full descripton of each is given, 1622).

Seven Wonders of the World (The): (1) The pyramids of Egypt, (2) the hanging gardens of Babylon, (3) the tomb of Mausōlos, (4) the temple of Diana at Ephesus, (5) the colossos of Rhodes, (6) the statue of Zeus by Phidĭas, (7) the pharos of Egypt, or else the palace of Cyrus cemented with gold.

> The pyramids first, which in Egypt were laid;
> Next Babylon's gardens, for Amȳtis made;
> Then Mausōlus's tomb of affection and guilt;
> Fourth, the temple of Diana, in Ephesus built;
> The colossos of Rhodes, cast in brass, to the sun,
> Sixth, Jupiter's statue, by Phidias done;
> The pharos of Egypt, last wonder of old,
> Or palace of Cyrus, cemented with gold.
> E. C. B.

Seven Years.
Barbarossa changes his position in his sleep every seven years.

Charlemagne starts in his chair from sleep every seven years.

Ogier the Dane stamps his iron mace on the floor every seven years.

Olaf Redbeard of Sweden uncloses his eyes every seven years.

Seven Years' War (The), the war maintained by Frederick II. of Prussia against Austria, Russia, and France (1756-1763).

Seven against Thebes (The). At the death of Œdĭpus, his two sons Eteŏclēs and Polynīcēs agreed to reign alternate years, but at the expiration of the first year Eteoclēs refused to resign the crown to his brother. Whereupon Polynicēs induced six others to join him in besieging Thebes, but the expedition was a failure. The names of the seven Grecian chiefs who marched against Thebes were: Adrastos, Amphiarāos, Kapaneus, Hippomedon (Argives), Parthenopæos (an Arcadian), Polynicēs (a Theban), and Tydeus (an Æolian). (See EPIGONI, p. 326.)

(Æschylos has a tragedy on the subject; Statius wrote an epic poem on the subject, called the Thebaid.)

Severall, a private farm or land with enclosures; a "champion" is an open farm not enclosed.

> The country enclosèd I praise [severall];
> The other delighteth not me [champion]
> Tusser: Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, liii 1 (1557).

Severn, a corruption of Averne, daughter of Astrild. The legend is this: King Locryn was engaged to Gwendolen daughter of Corineus, but seeing Astrild (daughter of the king of Germany), who came to this island with Homber king of Hungary, fell in love with her. While Corineus lived he durst not offend him, so he married Gwendolen, but kept Astrild as a mistress, and had by her a daughter (Averne). When Corineus died, he divorced Gwendolen, and declared Astrild queen, but Gwendolen summoned her vassals, dethroned Locryn, and caused both Astrild and Averne to be cast into the river, ever since called Severn from Averne "the kinges dohter."

Sex. Milton says that spirits can assume either sex at pleasure, and Michael Psellus asserts that demons can take what sex, shape, and colour they please, and can also contract or dilate their form at pleasure.

> For spirits, when they please,
> Can either sex assume, or both; so soft
> And uncompounded is their essence pure;
> Not tied or manacled with joint and limb,
> Nor founded on the brittle strength of bones,
> Like cumbrous flesh.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 423, etc. (1665).

Sex. Cæneus and Tire'sias were at one part of their lives of the male sex, and at another part of their lives of the female sex. (See these names.)

¶ Iphis was first a woman, and then a man.—Ovid: Metamorphoses, ix. 12; xiv. 699.

Sextus [Tarquinius]. There are several points of resemblance in the story of Sextus and that of Paris son of Priam. (1) Paris was the guest of Menelāos when he eloped with his wife Helen; and Sextus was the guest of Lucretia when he defiled her. (2) The elopement of Helen was the cause of a national war between the Greek cities and the allied cities of Troy: and the defilement of Lucretia was the cause of a national war between Rome and the allied cities under Por'sena. (3) The contest between Greece and Troy terminated in the victory of Greece, the injured party; and the contest between Rome and the supporters of Tarquin terminated in favour of Rome, the injured party. (4) In the Trojan war, Paris, the aggressor, showed himself before the Trojan ranks, and defied the bravest of the Greeks to single combat, but when Menelaos appeared, he took to flight; so Sextus rode vauntingly against the Roman host, but when Herminius appeared, fled to the rear like a coward. (5) In the Trojan contest, Priam and his sons fell in battle; and in the battle of the lake Regillus, Tarquin and his sons were slain.

(Lord Macaulay has taken the "Battle of the Lake Regillus" as the subject of one of his Lays of Ancient Rome. Another of his lays, called "Horatius," is the attempt of Porsĕna to re-establish Tarquin on the throne.)

Seyd, pacha of the Morea, assassinated by Gulnare (2 syl.) his favourite concubine. Gulnare was rescued from the burning harem by Conrad "the corsair." Conrad, in the disguise of a dervise, was detected and seized in the palace of Seyd, and Gulnare, to effect his liberation, murdered the pacha.—Byron: The Corsair (1814).

Seyton, an officer attending on Macbeth.—Shakespeare: Macbeth (1600).

Seyton (Lord), a supporter of queen Mary's cause.

Catherine Seyton, daughter of lord Seyton, a maid of honour in the court of queen Mary. She appears at Kinross village in disguise.

Henry Seyton, son of lord Seyton.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Sforza, of Lombardy. He with his two brothers (Achillēs and Palamēdēs) were in the squadron of adventurers in the allied Christian army.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

N.B.—The word Sforza means "force," and, according to tradition, was derived thus: Giacomuzzo Attendolo, the son of a day labourer, being desirous of going to the wars, consulted his hatchet, resolving to enlist if it stuck fast in the tree at which he flung it. He threw it with such force that the whole blade was completely buried in the trunk (fifteenth century).

Sforza (Ludovico), duke of Milan, surnamed "the More," from mora, "a mulberry" (because he had on his arm a birth-stain of a mulberry colour). Ludovico was dotingly fond of his bride Marcelia, and his love was amply returned; but during his absence in the camp, he left Francesco lord protector, and Francesco assailed the fidelity of the young duchess. Failing in his villainy, he accused her to the duke of playing the wanton with him, and the duke, in a fit of jealousy, slew her. Sforza was afterwards poisoned by Eugenia (sister of Francesco), whom he had seduced.

Nina Sforza, the duke's daughter.—Massinger: The Duke of Milan (1622).

SGANARELLE, the "cocu imaginaire," a comedy by Molière (1660). The plot runs thus: Célie was betrothed to Lélie, but her father, Gorgibus, insisted on her marrying Valère, because he was the richer man. Célie fainted on hearing this, and dropped her lover's miniature, which was picked up by Sganarelle's wife. Sganarelle, thinking it to be the portrait of a gallant, took possession of it, and Lélie asked him how he came by it. Sganarelle said he took it from his wife, and Lélie supposed that Célie had become the wife of Sganarelle. A series of misapprehensions arose thence: Célie supposed that Lélie had deserted her for Madame Sganarelle; Sganarelle supposed that his wife was unfaithful to him; madame supposed that her husband was an adorer of Célie; and Lélie supposed that Célie was the wife of Sganarelle. In time they met together, when Lélie charged Célie with being married to Sganarelle; both stared, an explanation followed, a messenger arrived to say that Valère was married, and all went merry as a marriage peal.

Sganarelle, younger brother of Aristè (2 syl.); a surly, domineering brute, wise in his own conceit, and the dupe of the play. His brother says to him, "tous vos procédés inspire un air bizarre, et, jusques à l'habit, rend tout chez vous barbare." The father of Isabelle and Léonor, on his death-bed, committed them to the charge of Sganarelle and Aristè, who were either to marry them or dispose of them in marriage. Sganarelle chose Isabelle, but insisted on her dressing in serge, going to bed early, keeping at home, looking after the house, mending the linen, knitting socks, and never flirting with any one. The consequence was, she duped her guardian, and cajoled him into giving his signature to her marriage with Valère.

> Malheureux qui se fie à femme après cela!
> La meilleure est toujours en malice féconde;
> C'est un sexe engendré pour damner tout le monde
> Je renounce à jamais à ce sexe trompeur,
> Et je le donne tout au diable de bon cœur.
> Molière: L'école des Maris (1661).

Sganarelle (3 syl.), an old man who wanted to marry a girl fond of dances, parties of pleasure, and all the active enjoyments of young life. (For the tale, see MARIAGE FORCÉ, p. 673.)

(There is a supplement to this comedy by the same author, entitled Sganarelle ou Le Cocu Imaginaire.)

¶ This joke about marrying is borrowed from Rabelais, Pantag'ruel, iii. 35, etc. Panurge asks Trouillogan whether he would advise him to marry. The sage says, "No." "But I wish to do so," says the prince. "Then do so, by all means," says the sage. "Which, then, would you advise?" asks Panurge. "Neither," says Trouillogan. "But," says Panurge, "that is not possible." "Then both," says the sage. After this, Panurge consults many others on the subject, and lastly the oracle of the Holy Bottle.

(The plot of Molière's comedy is founded on an adventure recorded of the count of Grammont (q.v.). The count had promised marriage to la belle Hamilton, but deserted her, and tried to get to France. Being overtaken by the two brothers of the lady, they clapped their hands on their swords, and demanded if the count had not forgotten something or left something behind. "True," said the count, "I have forgotten to marry your sister;" and returned with the two brothers to repair this oversight.)

Sganarelle, father of Lucinde. (For the plot, see LUCINDE, p. 636.)—Molière: L'Amour Médecin (1665).

Sganarelle, husband of Martine. He is a faggot-maker, and has a quarrel with his wife, who vows to be even with him for striking her. Valère and Lucas (two domestics of Géronte) asks her to direct them to the house of a noted doctor. She sends them to her husband, and tells them he is so eccentric that he will deny being a doctor, but they must beat him well. So they find the faggot-maker, whom they beat soundly, till he consents to follow them. He is introduced to Lucinde, who pretends to be dumb, but, being a shrewd man, he soon finds out that the dumbness is only a pretence, and takes with him

Léandre as an apothecary. The two lovers understand each other, and Lucinde is rapidly cured with "pills matrimoniac." —Molière: Le Médecin Malgré Lui (1666).

 Sganarelle, being asked by the father what he thinks is the matter with Lucinde, replies, "Entendez-vous le Latin?" "En aucune façon," says Géronte. "Vous n'entendez point le Latin?" "Non, monsieur." "That is a sad pity," says Sganarelle, "for the case may be briefly stated thus—

Cabricias arci thuram, catalamus, singulariter, nominativo, hæc musa, la muse, bonus, bona, bonum. Deus sanctus, estne oratio Latinas? etiam, oui, quare? pourquoi? quia substantivo et adjectivum concordat in generi, numerum, et casus." "Wonderful man! says the father.—Act iii.

(See MOCK DOCTOR, p. 714.)

Sgan'arelle (3 syl.), valet to don Juan. He remonstrates with his master on his evil ways, but is forbidden sternly to repeat his impertinent admonitions. His praise of tobacco, or rather snuff, is somewhat amusing.

Tabac est la passion des honnêtes gens; et qui vit sans tabac n'est pas digne de vivre. Non seulement il réjouit et purge les cerveaux humains, mais encore il instruit les ames à la vertu, et l'on apprend avec lui à devenir honnête homme . . . il inspire des sentiments d'honneur à tous ceux qui en prennent.—Molière: Don Juan, i. 1 (1665).

S. G. O., the initials of the Rev. lord Sidney Godolphin Osborne, of the family of the duke of Leeds, in his letters in the Times on social and philanthropic subjects (1808–1889).

Shabby Gentil (The), the first part of a story by Thackeray, completed in 1860, under the title of The Adventures of Philip.

Shacabac, in Blue Beard. (See SCHACABAC, p. 967.)

I have seen strange sights. I have seen Wilkinson play "Macbeth;" Mathews, "Othello;" Wrench, "George Barnwell;" Buckstone, "Iago;" Rayner, "Penruddock;" Keeley, "Shylock;" Liston, "Romeo" and "Octavian;" G. F. Cooke, "Mercutio;" John Kemble, "Archer;" Edmund Kean, clown in a pantomime; and C. Young, "Shaccabac." —Record of a Stage Veteran.

("Macbeth," "Othello," "Iago" (in Othello), "Shylock" (Merchant of Venice), "Romeo" and "Mercutio" (in Romeo and Juliet), all by Shakespeare; "George Barnwell" (Lillo's tragedy so called); "Penruddock" (in The Wheel of Fortune, by Cumberland); "Octavian" (in Colman's drama so called); "Archer" (in The Beaux' Stratagem, by Farquhar).)

Shaddai (King), who made war upon Diabolus for the regaining of Mansoul.—Bunyan: The Holy War (1682).

Shade (To fight in the). Dieneces [Di.en'.e.sees], the Spartan, being told that the army of the Persians was so numerous that their arrows would shut out the sun, replied, "Thank the gods! we shall then fight in the shade."

Shadow (Simon), one of the recruits of the army of sir John Falstaff. "A half-faced fellow," so thin that sir John said, "a foeman might as well level his gun at the edge of a penknife" as at such a starveling.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. act iii. sc. 2 (1598).

Shadow. The man without a shadow, Peter Schlemihl. (See SCHLEMIHL, p. 968.)

Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego were cast, by the command of Nebuchadnezzar, into a fiery furnace, but received no injury, although the furnace was made so hot that the heat thereof "slew those men" that took them to the furnace.—Dan. iii. 22.

¶ By Nimrod's order, Abraham was bound and cast into a huge fire at Cûtha; but he was preserved from injury by the angel Gabriel, and only the cords which bound him were burnt. Yet so intense was the heat that above 2000 men were consumed thereby. (See Gospel of Barnabas, xxviii.; and Morgan: Mahometanism Explained, V. i. 4.)

¶ This is one of the commonest miracles in the Lives of the saints. It is told of St. Alexander, Eventius, and Theodulus; it is told of the women who anointed themselves with the blood of St. Blaise; it is told of St. Faustinus and St. Jovita; it is told of a young Jewish lad after partaking of the eucharist; it is told of St. Mamas; it is told of St. Placidus; it is told of St. Vitus, and of very many more, given with authorities and details in my Dictionary of Miracles (1884).

Shadu'kiam' and Am'be-Abad', the abodes of the peris.

Shadwell (Thomas), the poet-laureate, was a great drunkard, and was said to be "round as a butt, and liquored every chink" (1640–1692).

Besides, his [Shadwell's] goodly fabric fills the eye,
And seems designed for thoughtless majesty.
Dryden: MacFlecknoe (1682).

N.B.—Shadwell took opium, and died from taking too large a dose. Hence Pope says—

Benlowes, propitious still to blockheads, bows;
And Shadwell nods the poppy on his brows.
Pope: The Dunciad, iii. 21, 22 (1728)

(Benlowes was a great patron of bad poets, and many have dedicated to him their lucubrations. Sometimes the name is shifted into "Benevolus.")

Shadwell (Wapping, London), a corruption of St. Chad's Well.

Shaf'alus and Procrus. So Bottom the weaver calls Cephălus and Procris. (See CEPHALUS, p. 192.)

Pyramus. Not Shafalus to Procrus was so true.
Thisbe. As Shafalus to Procrus; I to you.
Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

Shaftesbury (Antony Ashley Cooper, earl of), introduced by sir W. Scott in Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Shafton (Ned), one of the prisoners in Newgate with old sir Hildebrand Osbaldistone.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Shafton (Sir Piercie), called "The knight of Wilverton," a fashionable cavaliero, grandson of old Overstitch the tailor, of Holderness. Sir Piercie talks in the pedantic style of the Elizabethan courtiers.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Johnson's speech, like sir Piercie Shafton's euphuistic eloquence, bewrayed him under every disguise.—Macaulay.

Shah (The), a famous diamond, weighing 86 carats. It was given by Chosroës of Persia to the czar of Russia. (See DIAMONDS, p. 277.)

Shah Nameh, the famous epic of Firdusi, the Homer of Khorassan. Rusten is the Achillês, Feridun the model king, Zohak the cruel and impious tyrant, Kavah (the blacksmith) the intrepid patriot who marches against Zohak, displaying his apron as a banner.

Rusten's horse is called Rakush; the prophetic bird is Simurgh; Rusten's mother is Rudabeh, her child (Rusten) is cut out of her side, and the wound was healed by milk and honey applied with a feather of the prophetic bird Simurgh. Rusten required the milk of ten wet-nurses, and when a mere youth killed an elephant with a blow of his mace.

Shakebag (Dick), a highwayman with captain Colepepper.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Shakespeare, introduced by sir W. Scott in the ante-rooms of Greenwich Palace.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

(In Woodstock there is a conversation about Shakespeare.)

Shakespeare's Home. He left London before 1613, and established himself at Stratford-on-Avon, in Warwickshire, where he was born (1564), and where he died (1616). In the diary of Mr. Ward, the vicar of Stratford, is this entry: "Shakspeare, Drayton, and Ben Jonson had a merry meeting, and, it seems, drank too hard, for Shakspeare died of a fever then contracted." (Drayton died 1631, and Ben Jonson 1637.) Probably Shakespeare died on his birthday, April 23.

Shakespeare's Monument, in Westminster Abbey, designed by Kent, and executed by Scheemakers, in 1742. The statue to Shakespeare in Drury Lane Theatre was by the same.

The statue of Shakespeare in the British Museum is by Roubiliac, and was bequeathed to the nation by Garrick. His best portrait is by Droeshout.

Two Gentlemen of Verona, 1595. Mentioned by Meres, 1598.
Winter's Tale, 1604. Acted at Whitehall, 1611.

First complete collection in folio: 1623, Isaac Jaggard and Ed. Blount; 1632, 1664, 1685. The second folio is of very little value.

His plays were first collected and published by Condell and Heminge. This is called the "First Folio," and was issued in 1623. The publishers were contemporaries and friends of the great dramatist, and spell his name "Shakespeare."

Shakespeare's Parents. His father was John Shakespeare, a glover, who married Mary Arden, daughter of Robert Arden, Esq., of Bomich, a good county gentleman.

Shakespeare's Wife, Anne Hathaway of Shottery, some eight years older than himself; daughter of a substantial yeoman.

Shakespeare's Children. One son, Hamnet, who died in his twelfth year (1585–1596). Two daughters, who survived him, Susanna, and Judith twin-born with Hamnet. Both his daughters married and had children, but the lines died out.

N.B.—Voltaire says of Shakespeare: "Rimer had very good reason to say that Shakespeare n'etait q'un vilain singe." Voltaire, in 1765, said, "Shakespeare is a savage with some imagination, whose plays can please only in London and Canada." In 1735 he wrote to M. de Cideville, "Shakespeare is the Corneille of London, but everywhere else he is a great fool (grand fou d'ailleur)."

The Shakespeare du Boulevard, Guilbert de Pixérécourt (1773–1844).

The Shakespeare of Divines, Jeremy Taylor (1613-1667).

His [Taylor's] devotional writings only want what they cannot be said to need, the name and the metrical arrangement, to make them poetry.—Heber.

Taylor, the Shakespeare of divines.—Emerson.

The Shakespeare of Eloquence. The comte de Mirabeau was so called by Barnave (1749–1791).

The Shakespeare of Germany, Augustus Frederick Ferdinand von Kotzebue (1761–1819). G. F. W. Crossman is so called also (1746–1796).

The Shakespeare of Prose Fiction. Richardson the novelist is so called by D'Israeli (1689–1761).

Shallow, a weak-minded country justice, cousin to Slender. He is a great braggart, and especially fond of boasting of the mad pranks of his younger days. It is said that justice Shallow is a satirical portrait of sir Thomas Lucy of Charlecote, who prosecuted Shakespeare for deer-stalking.—Shakespeare: The Merry Wives of Windsor (1596); and 2 Henry IV. (1598).

As wise as a justice of the quorum and custalorum in Shallow's time.—Macaulay.

Shallum, lord of a manor consisting of a long chain of rocks and mountains called Tirzah. Shallum was "of gentle disposition, and beloved both by God and man." He was the lover of Hilpa, a Chinese antediluvian princess, one of the 150 daughters of Zilpah, of the race of Cohu or Cain.—Addison: Spectator, viii. 584-5 (1712).

Shalott (The lady of), a poem by Tennyson, in four parts. Pt. i. tells us that the lady passed her life in the island of Shalott in great seclusion, and was known only by the peasantry. Pt. ii. tells us that she was weaving a magic web, and that a curse would fall on her if she looked down the river. Pt. iii. describes how sir Lancelot rode to Camelot in all his bravery; and the lady gazed at him as he rode along. Pt. iv. tells us that the lady floated down the river in a boat called The Lady of Shalott, and died heart-broken on the way. Sir Lancelot came to gaze on the dead body, and exclaimed, "She has a lovely face, and may God have mercy on her!" This ballad was afterwards expanded into the Idyll called "Elaine, the Fair Maid of Astolat" (q.v.), the beautiful incident of Elaine and the barge being taken from the History of Prince Arthur, by sir T. Malory—

"While my body is whole, let this letter be put into my right hand, and my hand bound fast with the letter until I be cold, and let me be put in a fair bed with all the richest clothes that I have about me, and so let my bed and all my rich clothes be laid with me in a chariot to the next place whereas the Thames is, and there let me be put in a barge, and but one man with me, such as ye trust to steer me thither, and that my barge be covered with black samite over and over." . . . So when she was dead, the corpse and the bed and all was led the next way unto the Thames, and there a man and the corpse and all were put in a barge on the Thames, and so the man steered the barge to Westminster, and there he rowed a great while to and fro, or any man espied.—Pt. iii. 123.

(King Arthur saw the body and had it buried, and sir Launcelot made an offering, etc. (ch. 124). See Tennyson's Lady of Shalott, 1832.)

Shamho'zai (3 syl.), the angel who debauched himself with women, repented, and hung himself up between earth and heaven.—Bereshit rabbi (in Gen. vi. 2).

¶ Harût and Marût were two angels sent to be judges on earth. They judged righteously till Zohara appeared before them, when they fell in love with her, and were imprisoned in a cave near Babylon, where they are to abide till the day of judgment.

Shandon (Captain), in Pendennis, a novel by Thackeray (1849-50).

Shandy (Tristram), the nominal hero of Sterne's novel called The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, Gentleman (1759). He is the son of Walter and Elizabeth Shandy.

Captain Shandy, better known as "Uncle Toby," the real hero of Sterne's novel. Captain Shandy was wounded at Namur, and retired on half-pay. He was benevolent and generous, brave as a lion but simple as a child, most gallant and most modest. Hazlitt says that "the character of uncle Toby is the finest compliment ever paid to human nature." His modest love-passages with Widow Wadman, his kindly sympathy for lieutenant Lefevre, and his military discussions, are wholly unrivalled.

Aunt Dinah [Shandy], Walter Shandy's aunt. She bequeathed to him £1000, which Walter fancied would enable him to carry out all the wild schemes with which his head was crammed.

Mrs. Elizabeth Shandy, mother of Tristram Shandy. The ideal of non-entity, individual from its very absence of individuality.

Walter Shandy, Tristram's father, a metaphysical don Quixote, who believes in long noses and propitious names; but his son's nose was crushed, and his name, which should have been Trismegistus ("the most propitious"), was changed in christening to Tristram ("the most unlucky"). If much learning can make man mad, Walter Shandy was certainly mad in all the affairs of ordinary life. His wife was a blank sheet, and he himself a sheet so written on and crossed and rewritten that no one could decipher the manuscript.—Sterne: The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy (1759).

SHARP, the ordinary of major Touchwood, who aids him in his transformation, but is himself puzzled to know which is the real and which the false colonel.—Dibdin: What Next?

Sharp (Richard), called "Conversation Sharp" (1760–1835).

Sharp (Rebecca), the orphan daughter of an artist. "She was small and slight in person, pale, sandy-haired, and with green eyes, habitually cast down, but very large, odd, and attractive when they looked up." Becky had the "dismal precocity of poverty," and, being engaged as governess in the family of sir Pitt Crawley, bart., contrived to marry clandestinely his son captain Rawdon Crawley, and taught him how to live in splendour "upon nothing a year." Becky was an excellent singer and dancer, a capital talker and wheedler, and a most attractive, but unprincipled, selfish, and unscrupulous woman. Lord Steyne introduced her to court; but her conduct with this peer gave rise to a terrible scandal, which caused a separation between her and Rawdon, and made England too hot to hold her. She retired to the Continent, was reduced to a Bohemian life, but ultimately attached herself to Joseph Sedley, whom she contrived to strip of all his money, and who lived in dire terror of her, dying in six months under very suspicious circumstances.—Thackeray: Vanity Fair (1848).

With Becky Sharp, we think we could be good, if we had £5000 a year.—Bayne.

Becky Sharp, with a baronet for a brother-in-law and an earl's daughter for a friend, felt the hollowness of human grandeur, and thought she was happier with the Bohemian artists in Soho.—The Express.

Sharp (Timothy), the "lying valet" of Charles Gayless. His object is to make his master, who has not a sixpence in the world, pass for a man of wealth in the eyes of Melissa, to whom he is engaged. —Garrick: The Lying Valet (1741).

Sharp-Beak, the crow's wife, in the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox (1498).

Sharpe (The Right Rev. James), archbishop of St. Andrew's, murdered by John Balfour (a leader in the covenanters' army) and his party.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Sharper (Master), the cutler in the Strand.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Sharpitlaw (Gideon), a police officer. —Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Shawonda'see, son of Mudjekeewis, and king of the south wind. Fat and lazy, listless and easy. Shawondasee loved a prairie maiden (the Dandelion), but was too indolent to woo her.—Longfellow: Hiawatha (1855).

She Stoops to Conquer, a comedy by Oliver Goldsmith (1773). Miss Hardcastle, knowing how bashful young Marlow is before ladies, stoops to the manners and condition of a barmaid, with whom he feels quite at his ease, and by this artifice wins the man of her choice.

N.B.—It is said that when Goldsmith was about 16 years old, he set out for Edgworthstown, and finding night coming on when at Ardagh, asked a man "which was the best house in the town"—meaning the best inn. The man, who was Cornelius O'Kelly, the great fencing-master, pointed to that of Mr. Ralph Fetherstone, as being the best house in the vicinity. Oliver entered the parlour, found the master of the mansion sitting over a good fire, and said he intended to pass the night there, and should like to have supper. Mr. Fetherstone happened to know Goldsmith's father, and, to humour the joke, pretended to be the landlord of "the public," nor did he reveal himself till next morning at breakfast, when Oliver called for his bill. It was not sir Ralph Fetherstone, as is generally said, but Mr. Ralph Fetherstone, whose grandson was sir Thomas.

(In Frankfort Moore's novel The Jessamy Bride (1897) there is a charming scene in which the characters discuss the title for Goldsmith's coming play.)

She-Wolf of France, Isabella wife of Edward II. and paramour of Mortimer (1295–1358). It is said that she murdered the king, her husband, by burning out his bowels with a red-hot poker. Grey, in his Bard, refers to this tradition—

> She-wolf of France, with unrelenting fangs,
> That tearst the bowels of thy mangled mate.

 It seems almost incredible, but the fact is indubitable, that pope John XXII. granted to Isabella's confessor power to give her plenary indulgence at the hour of death.

Sheba. The queen of Sheba or Saba (i.e. the Sabeans) came to visit Solomon, and tested his wisdom by sundry questions, but affirmed that his wisdom and wealth exceeded even her expectations.—1 Kings x. ; 2 Chron. ix.

> No, not to answer, madam, all those hard things
> That Sheba came to ask of Solomon
> Tennyson: The Princess, ii.

(The Arabs call her name Balkis or Belkis ; the Abyssinians, Macqueda ; and others, Aazis.)

Sheba (The queen of), a name given to Mme. Montreville (the Begum Mootee Mahul).—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Shebdiz, the Persian Bucephalos, the favourite charger of Chosroës II. or Khosrou Parviz of Persia (590–628).

Shedad, king of Ad, who built a most magnificent palace, and laid out a garden called "The Garden of Irem," like "the bowers of Eden." All men admired this palace and garden except the prophet Houd, who told the king that the foundation of his palace was not secure. And so it was, that God, to punish his pride, first sent a drought of three years' duration, and then the Sarsar or icy wind for seven days, in which the garden was destroyed, the palace ruined and Shedad, with all his subjects, died.

 It is said that the palace of Shedad or Shuddaud took 500 years in building, and when it was finished the angel of death would not allow him even to enter his garden, but struck him dead; and the rose garden of Irem was ever after invisible to the eye of man.—Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, i. (1797).

Gardens more delightful than those of Shedad.—Beckford: Vathek, p. 130 (1784).

Sheep (Lord Bantam's). These sheep had tails of such enormous length that his lordship had go-carts harnessed to the sheep for carrying their tails.

There goes Mrs. Roundabout, the cutler's wife . . . Odious puss! how she waddles along with her train two yards behind her! She puts me in mind of lord Bantam's sheep.—Goldsmith: The Bee, ii (1759).

Sheep (The Cotswold).

No brown, nor sullied black, the face or legs doth streak, . . .
[All] of the whitest kind, whose brows so woolly be,
As men in her fair sheep no emptiness should see . . .
A body long and large, the buttocks equal broad . . .
And of the fleecy face, the flank doth nothing lack,
But everywhere is stored, the belly as the back.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xiv. (1613).

Sheep-Dog (A), a lady-companion, who occupies the back seat of the barouche, carries wraps, etc., goes to church with the lady, and "guards her from the wolves," as much as the lady wishes to be guarded, but no more.

"Rawdon," said Becky, . . . "I must have a sheep-dog . . . I mean a moral shepherd's dog . . . to keep the wolves off me" . . . "A sheep dog, a companion! Becky Sharp with a sheep-dog! Isn't that good fun?"—Thackeray: Vanity Fair, xxxvii. (1848).

Sheep of the Addanc Valley. In this valley, which led to the cave of the Addanc, were two flocks of sheep, one white and the other black. When any one of the black sheep bleated, a white sheep crossed over and became black, and when one of the white sheep bleated, a black sheep crossed over and became white.—The Mabinogion ("Peredur," twelfth century).

Sheep of the Prisons, a cant term in the French Revolution for a spy under the jailers.—Dickens: A Tale of Two Cities, iii. 7 (1859).

Sheep Tilted at. Don Quixote saw the dust of two flocks of sheep coming in opposite directions, and told Sancho they were two armies—one commanded by the emperor Alifanfaron sovereign of the island of Trap'oban, and the other by the king of the Garaman'teans, called "Pentap'olin with the Naked Arm.' He said that Alifanfaron was in love with Pentapolin's daughter, but Pentapolin refused to sanction the alliance, because Alifanfaron was a Mohammedan. The mad knight rushed on the flock "led by Alifanfaron," and killed seven of the sheep, but was stunned by stones thrown at him by the shepherds. When Sancho told his master that the two armies were only two flocks of sheep, the knight replied that the enchanter Freston had "metamorphosed the two grand armies" in order to show his malice.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iii. 4 (1605).

¶ After the death of Achillês, Ajax and Ulysses both claimed the armour of Hector. The dispute was settled by the sons of Atreus (2 syl.), who awarded the prize to Ulysses. This so enraged Ajax that it drove him mad, and he fell upon a flock of sheep driven at night into the camp, supposing it to be an army led by Ulysses and the sons of Atreus. When he found out his mistake, he stabbed himself. This is the subject of a tragedy by Soph'oclês called Ajax Mad.

¶ Orlando in his madness also fell foul of a flock of sheep.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Sheep's Heads, jemmies, for wrenching doors open. Bill Sikes had sheep's head for supper before entering on the enterprise of breaking into Chertsey House—

Which gave occasion to several pleasant witticisms on the part of Mr. Sikes.—Dickens: Oliver Twist, ch. xx. p. 75 (1838).

Sheet = a rope. (See ERRORS OF AUTHORS: Allan Cunningham, p. 334.)

Pull in the sheet till the sail is above your head.—Nineteenth Century, September, 1896, p. 482

Sheffield, in Yorkshire, is so called from the river Sheaf, which joins the Don. Noted for cutlery.

The Bard of Sheffield, James Montgomery, author of The Wanderer of Switzerland, etc. (1771-1854).

With broken lyre and cheek serenely pale,
Lo! sad Alcæus wanders down the vale . . .
O'er his lost works let classic Sheffield weep;
May no rude hand disturb their early sleep!
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

The Sheffield of Germany, Solingen, famous for its swords and foils.

Shelby (Mr.), uncle Tom's first master. Being in commercial difficulties, he was obliged to sell his faithful slave. His son afterwards endeavoured to buy uncle Tom back again, but found that he had been whipped to death by the villain Legree.—Mrs. Beecher Stowe: Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852).

Shell (A). Amongst the ancient Gaels a shell was emblematic of peace. Hence when Bosmi'na, Fingal's daughter, was sent to propitiate king Erragon, who had invaded Morven, she carried with her a "sparkling shell as a symbol of peace, and a golden arrow as a symbol of war."—Ossian: The Battle of Lora.

Shells, i.e. hospitality. "Semo king of shells" ("hospitality"). When Cuthullin invites Swaran to a banquet, his messenger says, "Cuthullin gives the joy of shells; come and partake the feast of Erin's blue-eyed chief." The ancient Gaels drank from shells; and hence such phrases as "chief of shells," "hall of shells," "king of shells," etc. (king of hospitality). "To rejoice in the shell" is to feast sumptuously and drink freely.

Shelta, a Celtic language spoken by travelling tinkers, quite distinct from Romany, but some gipsies speak both or mix them up together. It resembles Old Irish, and is said to be a corrupt form of the Irish word Beire. Kuno Meyer has traced the language back to Old Irish. There is a good article on Shelta in Chambers' Cyclopædia, last edition.

Shemus-an-Snachad, or "James of the Needle," M'Ivor's tailor at Edinburgh.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Shepheardes Calendar (The), twelve eclogues in various metres, by Spenser, one for each month. January: Colin Clout (Spenser) bewails that Rosalind does not return his love, and compares his forlorn condition to the season itself. February: Cuddy, a lad, complains of the cold, and Thenot laments the degeneracy of pastoral life. March: Willie and Thomalin discourse of love (described as a person just aroused from sleep). April: Hobbinol sings a song on Eliza, queen of shepherds. May: Palinode (3 syl.) exhorts Piers to join the festivities of May, but Piers replies that good shepherds who seek their own indulgence expose their flocks to the wolves. He then relates the fable of the kid and her dam. June: Hobbinol exhorts Colin to greater cheerfulness, but Colin replies there is no cheer for him while Rosalind remains unkind and loves Menalcas better than himself. July: Morrel, a goat-herd, invites Thomalin to come with him to the uplands, but Thomalin replies that humility better becomes a shepherd (i.e. a pastor or clergyman). August: Perigot and Willie contend in song, and Cuddy is appointed arbiter. September: Diggon Davie complains to Hobbinol of clerical abuses. October: On poetry, which Cuddy says has no encouragement, and laments that Colin neglects it, being crossed in love. November: Colin, being asked by Thenot to sing, excuses himself because of his grief for Dido, but finally he sings her elegy. December: Colin again complains that his heart is desolate because Rosalind loves him not (1579).

Shepheard's Hunting (The), four "eglogues" by George Wither, while confined in the Marshalsea (1615). The shepherd Roget is the poet himself, and his "hunting" is a satire called Abuses Stript and Whipt, for which he was imprisoned. The first three eclogues are upon the subject of Roget's imprisonment, and the fourth is on his love of poetry. "Willy" is the poet's friend (William Browne of the Inner Temple, author of Britannia's Pastorals). He was two years the junior of Wither. This book is worth republishing.

SHEPHERD (The), Moses, who for forty years fed the flocks of Jethro his father-in-law.

> Sing, heavenly Muse, that on the secret top
> Of Oreb or of Sinai, didst inspire
> That shepherd who first taught the chosen seed,
> "In the beginning," how the heaven and earth
> Rose out of chaos.
> Milton. Paradise Lost, i. (1665).

Shepherd (The Ettrick). (See ETTRICK SHEPHERD, p. 342.)

Shepherd (The Gentle), George Grenville, the statesman. One day, in addressing the House, George Grenville said, "Tell me where I tell me where . . ." Pitt hummed the line of a song then very popular, beginning, "Gentle shepherd, tell me where!" and the whole House was convulsed with laughter (1712–1770).

(Allan Ramsay has a beautiful Scotch pastoral called The Gentle Shepherd, 1725.)

Shepherd (John Claridge), the signature adopted by the author of The Shepherd of Banbury's Rules to Judge of the Changes of Weather, etc. (1744). Supposed to be Dr. John Campbell, author of A Political Survey of Britain.

Shepherd-Kings (The) or Hyksos. These hyksos were a tribe of Cuthites driven from Assyria by Aralius and the Shemites. Their names were: (1) SAÏTÊS or Salâtês, called by the Arabs El-Weleed, and said to be a descendant of Esau (B.C. 1870–1851); (2) BEON, called by the Arabs Er-Reiyan, son of El-Weleed (B.C. 1851–1811); (3) APACHNAS (B.C. 1811–1750); (4) APÔPHIS, called by the Arabs Er-Reiyan II., in whose reign Joseph was sold into Egypt and was made viceroy (B.C. 1750–1700); (5) JANIAS (B.C. 1700 1651); (6) ASSETH (1651–1610). The hyksos were driven out of Egypt by Amôsis or Thethmosis, the founder of the eighteenth dynasty, and retired to Palestine, where they formed the chiefs or lords of the Philistines. (Hyksos is compounded of hyk, "king," and sos, "shepherd.")

N.B.—Apophis or Aphophis was not a shepherd-king, but a pharaoh or native ruler, who made Apachnas tributary, and succeeded him, but on the death of Aphophis the hyksos were restored.

Shepherd Lord (The), lord Henry de Clifford, brought up by his mother as a shepherd to save him from the vengeance of the Yorkists. Henry VII. restored him to his birthright and estates (1455–1543). He is the hero of much legendary narrative.

> The gracious fairy,
> Who loved the shepherd lord to meet
> In his wanderings solitary.
> Wordsworth: The White Doe of Rylstone (1815).

Shepherd of Banbury. (See SHEPHERD, JOHN CLARIDGE.)

Shepherd of Filida.

'Preserve him, Mr. Nicholas, as thou wouldst a diamond. He is not a shepherd, but an elegant courtier," said the curé.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. 6 (1605).

Shepherd of Salisbury Plain (The), the hero and title of a religious tract by Hannah More. The shepherd is noted for his homely wisdom and simple piety. The academy figure of this shepherd was David Saunders, who, with his father, had kept sheep on the plain for a century.

Shepherd of the Ocean. So Colin Clout (Spenser) calls sir Walter Raleigh in his Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1591).

Shepherd's Garland (The), nine eclogues by Drayton (1593).

Shepherd's Pipe (The), seven eclogues by W. Browne (1614).

Shepherd's Week (The), six pastorals by Gay (1714). The shepherds portrayed are every-day shepherds, not Arcadian myths. They sleep under hedges, their nosegays are hedge flowers, and the shepherdesses milk the cows and make butter.

Shepherdess (The Faithful), a pastoral drama by John Fletcher (1610). The "faithful shepherdess" is Corin, who remains faithful to her lover although dead. Milton has gathered rather largely from this pastoral in his Comus.

Sheppard (Jack), immortalized for his burglaries and escapes from Newgate. He was the son of a carpenter in Spitalfields, and was an ardent, reckless, and generous youth. Certainly the most popular criminal ever led to Tyburn for execution (1701–1724). Sir James Thornhill painted his likeness.

(Daniel Defoe made Jack Sheppard the hero of a romance in 1724; and W. H. Ainsworth, in 1839.)

Sherborne. in Dorsetshire, brings ill luck to the possessor. It belonged at one time to the see of Canterbury, and Osmund pronounced a curse on any layman who wrested it from the Church.

The first layman who held these lands was the protector Somerset, who was beheaded by Edward VI.

The next layman was sir Walter Raleigh, who was also beheaded.

At the death of Raleigh, James I. seized on the lands and conferred them on Car earl of Somerset, who died prematurely. His younger son Carew was attainted, committed to the Tower, and lost his estates by forfeiture.

James I. himself was no exception. He lost his eldest son the prince of Wales, Charles I. was beheaded, James II. was forced to abdicate, and the two Pretenders consummated the ill luck of the family.

Sherborne is now in the possession of Digby earl of Bristol.

(For other possessions which carry with them ill luck, see GOLD OF TOLOSA, p. 434; GOLD OF NIBELUNGEN, p. 434; GRAYSTEEL, p. 445; HARMONIA'S NECKLACE, p. 470; ILL LUCK, p. 520; etc.)

Sherborne, in Vivian Grey, a novel by Disraeli (lord Beaconsfield, 1826).

Sheridan. Byron says, in his monody, that Nature broke the die after moulding Sheridan.

Sheva, the philanthropic Jew, most modest but most benevolent. He "stints his appetite to pamper his affections, and lives in poverty that the poor may live in plenty." Sheva is "the widow's friend, the orphan's father, the poor man's protector, and the universal dispenser of charity; but he ever shrank to let his left hand know what his right hand did." Ratcliffe's father rescued him at Cadiz from an auto da fe, and Ratcliffe himself rescued him from a howling London mob. This noble heart settled £10,000 on Miss Ratcliffe at her marriage, and left Charles the heir of all his property.—Cumberland: The Jew (1776).

(The Jews of England made up a very handsome purse, which they presented to the dramatist for this championship of their race.)

Sheva, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is designed for sir Roger Lestrange, censor of the press in the reign of Charles II. Sheva was one of David's scribes (2 Sam. xx. 25), and sir Roger was editor of the Observator, in which he vindicated the court measures, for which he was knighted.

Than Sheva, none more loyal zeal have shown,
Wakeful as Judah's lion for the crown.
Absalom and Achitophel, ii. 1025-6 (1682).

Shib'boleth, the test pass-word of a secret society. When the Ephraimites tried to pass the Jordan after their defeat by Jephthah, the guard tested whether they were Ephraimites or not by asking them to say the word "Shibboleth," which the Ephraimites pronounced "Sibboleth" (Judg. xii. 1-6).

¶ In the Sicilian Vespers, a word was given as a test of nationality. Some dried peas (ciceri) were shown to a suspect: if he called them cheecharee, he was a Sicilian, and allowed to pass; but if siseri, he was a Frenchman, and was put to death (March 30, 1282).

¶ In the great Danish slaughter on St. Bryce's Day (November 13), 1002, according to tradition, a similar test was made with the words "Chichester Church," which, being pronounced hard or soft, decided whether the speaker was Dane or Saxon.

¶ The shibboleth of Wat Tyler's rebels was "Bread and cheese."

Shield. When a hero fell in fight, his shields left at home used to become bloody.—Gaelic Legendary Lore.

The mother of Culmin remains in the hall. . . . His shield is bloody in the hall. "Art thou fallen, my fair-haired son, in Erin's dismal war?"—Ossian: Temora, v.

The point of a shield. When a flag emblazoned with a shield had the point upwards, it denoted peace; and when a combatant approached with his shield reversed, it meant the same thing in mediæval times.

And behold, one of the ships outstripped the others, and they saw a shield lifted up above the side of the ship, and the point of the shield was upwards, in token of peace.—The Mabinogion ("Branwen," etc., twelfth century).

Striking the shield. When a leader was appointed to take the command of an army, and the choice was doubtful, those who were the most eligible went to some distant hill, and he who struck his shield the loudest was chosen leader.

They went each to his hill. Bards marked the sounds of the shields. Loudest rang thy boss, Duth-maruno. Thou must lead in war.—Ossian: Cath-Loda, ii.

∴ When a man was doomed to death, the chief used to strike his shield with the blunt end of his spear, as a notice to the royal bard to begin the death-song.

Cairbar rises in his arms. The clang of shields is heard.—Ossian: Temora, i.

Shield. The Gold and Silver Shield. This story is from Beaumont's Moralities. It was repeated in a collection of Useful and Entertaining Passages in Prose (1826). The substance of the tale is as follows: Two knights, approaching each other from opposite directions, came in sight of a trophy shield, one side of which was gold and the other silver. Like the disputants about the chameleon, they could not agree. "What a wonderful gold trophy is that yonder!" said one of the knights. "Gold!" exclaimed the other. "Why, do you think I've lost my sight? It is not gold, but silver.' "'Tis gold, I maintain;" "'Tis silver, I insist on." From words they almost came to blows, when luckily came by a stranger, to whom they referred the dispute, and were told that both were wrong and both were right, seeing one side of it was gold and the other side silver.

Shield of Cathmor (The). This shield had seven bosses, and the ring of each boss (when struck with a spear) conveyed a distinct telegraphic message to the tribes. The sound of one boss, for example, was for muster, of another for retreat, of a third distress, and so on, On each boss was a star, the names of which were Can'-mathon (on the first boss), Col-derna (on the second), Uloicho (on the third), Cathlin (on the fourth), Rel-durath (on the fifth), Berthin (on the sixth), and Ton-the'na (on the seventh).

In his arms strode the chief of Atha to where his shield hung, high, at night; high on a mossy bough over Lubar's streamy roar. Seven bosses rose on the shield, the seven voices of the king which his warriors received from the wind.—Ossian: Temora, vii.

Shield of Gold or GOLDEN SHIELD, the shield of Mars, which fell from heaven, and was guarded in Rome by twelve priests called Salii.

Charge for the hearth of Vesta!
Charge for the Golden Shield!
Macaulay: Regillus, xxxv.

Hail to the fire that burns for aye [of Vesta],
And the shield that fell from heaven!
Macaulay: Lays of Ancient Rome ("Battle of the Lake Regillus," xxxviii., 1842).

Shield of Love (The). This buckler was suspended in a temple of Venus by golden ribbons, and underneath was written, "WHOSEEVER BE THIS SHIELD, FAIRE AMORET BE HIS." — Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 10 (1596).

Shield of Rome (The), Fabius "Cunctator." Marcellus was called "The Sword of Rome." (See FABIUS, p. 350.)

Shift (Samuel), a wonderful mimic, who, like Charles Mathews the elder, could turn his face to anything. He is employed by sir William Wealthy to assist in saving his son George from ruin, and accordingly helps the young man in his money difficulties by becoming his agent. Ultimately, it is found that sir George's father is his creditor, the young man is saved from ruin, marries, and becomes a reformed and honourable member of society.—Foote: The Minor (1760).

Shillalah or Shillelagh, a wood near Arklow, in Wicklow, famous for its oaks and blackthorns. The Irishman's bludgeon is so called, because it was generally cut from this wood. (See SPRIG OF SHILLELAH.)

Shilling (To cut one off with a). A tale is told of Charles and John Banister. John having irritated his father, the old man said, "Jack, I'll cut you off with a shilling." To which the son replied, "I wish, dad, you would give it me now."

¶ The same identical anecdote is told of Sheridan and his son Tom.

Shimei. Dryden is satirized under this name in Pordage's Azaria and Hushai, a rejoinder to Absalom and Achitophel (1683). In Dryden's Absalom, etc., Shimei is meant for Bethel, the lord mayor.

The council violent, the rabble worse,
The Shimei taught Jerusalem [London] to curse.
Pt. i. 669, 670.

Ship. The master takes the ship out, but the mate brings her home. The reason is this: On the first night of an outward passage, the starboard watch takes the first four hours on deck, but in the homeward passage the port watch. Now, the "starboard watch" is also called the master's or captain's watch, because when there was only one mate, the master had to take his own watch (i.e. the starboard). The "port watch" is commanded by the first mate, and when there was only one, he had to stand to his own watch.

∴ When there were two mates, the second took the starboard watch. (See also BELLS, p. 107.)

Ship (The Intelligent). Ellida (Frithjof's ship) understood what was said to it; hence in the Frithjof Saga the son of Thorsten constantly addresses it, and the ship always obeys what is said to it.—Tegner: Frithjof Saga, x. (1825).

Ship-Shape. A vessel sent to sea before it is completed is called "jury-shaped" or "jury-rigged," i.e. rigged for the nonce (jour-y, "pro tempore"); while at sea, she is completed, and when all the temporary makeshifts have been changed for the proper riggings, the vessel is called "ship-shape."

Having been sent to sea in a hurry, they were little better than jury-rigged, and we are now being put into ship-shape.—Daily News, August 23, 1870.

Ship of Fools (The), or Shyp of Folys, a poem in octo-syllabic stanzas, by Alexander Barclay; designed to ridicule the vices and follies of the day. It is the allegory of a ship freighted with fools; and a paraphrase of the German satire by Sebastian Brandt (1494).

Ship of the Desert, the camel or dromedary employed in "voyages" through the sand-seas of the African deserts.

. . . let me have the long
And patient swiftness of the desert-ship,
The helmless dromedary.
Byron: The Deformed Transformed, i. 1 (1821).

Shipman's Tale (The), in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales: "The merchant's wife and the monk." The monk (Dan Johan) was on most intimate terms with the merchant, and when the merchant was about to leave home (Florence) on business, the wife borrowed a hundred francs of the monk. As the monk had not the money at hand, he borrowed the loan of the merchant. When the merchant returned home, the monk asserted that he had paid back the loan to the wife. The wife told her husband that the monk had made her a present of the money, which she had spent. The merchant, plainly seeing there was no redress, said no more about the matter, and allowed it to drop.

Shipton (Mother), the heroine of an ancient tale entitled The Strange and Wonderful History and Prophecies of Mother Shipton, etc.—T. E. Preece. (See MOTHER SHIPTON, p. 733.)

Shipwreck (The), a poem in three cantos, by William Falconer (1762). Supposed to occupy six days. The ship was the Britannia, under the command of Albert, and bound for Venice. Being overtaken in a squall, she is driven out of her course from Candia, and four seamen are lost off the lee main-yardarm. A fearful storm greatly distresses the vessel, and the captain gives command "to bear away." As she passes the island of St. George, the helmsman is struck blind by lightning. Bowsprit, foremast, and main-topmast being carried away, the officers try to save themselves on the wreck of the foremast. The ship splits on the projecting verge of cape Colonna. The captain and all his crew are lost except Arion (Falconer), who is washed ashore, and being befriended by the natives, returns to England to tell this mournful story.

Shirley, a novel by Charlotte Brontë (1849).

(John Skelton assumed the name of Shirley in his volume of essays.)

Shoe. The right shoe first. It was by the Romans thought unlucky to put on the left shoe first, or to put the shoe on the wrong foot. St. Foix says of Augustus—

Cet empereur, qui gouverna avec tant de sagesse, et dont le règne fut si florissant, restoit immobile et consterné lorsqu'il lui arrivoit par mégarde de mettre le soulier droit au pied gauche, et le soulier gauche au pied droit.

Shoe Pinches. We all know where the shoe pinches, we each of us know our own special troubles.

Lord Foppington. Hark thee, shoemaker, these shoes . . . don't fit me.
Shoemaker. My lord, I think they fit you very well.
Lord Fop. They hurt me just below the instep.
Shoem. No, my lord, they don't hurt you there.
Lord Fop. I tell you they pinch me execrably.
Shoem. Why, then, my lord——
Lord Fop. What! Wilt thou persuade me I cannot feel?
Shoem. Your lordship may please to feel what you think fit, but that shoe does not hurt you. I think I understand my trade.—Sheridan: A Trip to Scarborough, i. 2 (1777).

Shoe in Weddings. In English weddings, slippers and old shoes are thrown at the bride when she leaves the house of her parents, to indicate that she has left the house for good.

Luther being at a wedding, told the bridegroom he had placed the husband's shoe on the head of the bed, "afin qu'il prît ainsi la domination et le gouvernement."—Michelet: Life of Luther (1845).

¶ In Turkish weddings, as soon as the prayers are over, the bridegroom makes off as fast as possible, followed by the guests, who pelt him with old shoes. These blows represent the adieux of the young man.—Thirty Years in the Haram, 330.

¶ In Anglo-Saxon marriages, the father delivered the bride's shoe to the bridegroom, and the bridegroom touched the bride on the head with it, to show his authority.—Chambers' Journal, June, 1870.

Shoe the Gray Goose, to undertake a difficult and profitless business. John Skelton says the attempt of the laity to reform the clergy of his time is about as mad a scheme as if they attempted to shoe a wild goose.

What hath laymen to doo, The gray gose to shoe?
Skelton: Colyn Clout (1460–1529).

("To shoe the goose" is sometimes used as the synonym of being tipsy.)

Shoe the Mockish Mare, shoe the wild mare, similar to "belling the cat;" to do a work of danger and difficulty for general and personal benefit.

Let us see who dare Shoe the mockish mare.
Skelton: Colyn Clout (1460–1529).

∴ There is a boys' game called "Shoeing the Wild Mare," in which the players say—

Shoe the wild mare;
But if she won't be shod, she must go bare.

Herrick refers to it (Works, i. 176) when he says—

Of blind-man's-buffe, and of the care
That young men have to shooe the mare.

"To shoe the colt" means to exact a fine called "footing" from a new associate or colt. The French say, Ferrer la mule.

Shoes (He has changed his), "mutâvit calcĕos," that is, he has become a senator, or has been made a peer. The Roman senators wore black shoes, or rather black buskins, reaching to the middle of the leg, with the letter C in silver on the instep.

(For several other customs and superstitions connected with shoes, see Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, pp. 1134–5.)

Demonides' Shoes. Demonides (4 syl.) was a cripple, and when some one stole his shoes, he remarked, "Well, I hope they will fit him."—Plutarch: Morals.

¶ Lord Chatham, hearing that some one had stolen his gouty shoes, exclaimed, "I wish they may fit him."

Shonou (The Reign of), the most remote period, historic or pre-historic.

Let us first learn to know what belongs to ourselves, and then, if we have leisure, cast our reflections back to the reign of Shonou, who governed 20,000 years before the creation of the moon.—Goldsmith: A Citizen of the World, lxxv (1759).

Shoo-King (The), the history of the Chinese monarchs, by Confucius. It begins with Yoo, B.C. 2205

Shoolbred (Dame), the foster-mother of Henry Smith.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Shore (Jane), the heroine and title of a tragedy by N. Rowe (1713). Jane Shore was the wife of a London merchant, but left her husband to become the mistress of Edward IV. At the death of that monarch, lord Hastings wished to obtain her, but she rejected his advances. This drew on her the jealous wrath of Alicia (lord Hastings's mistress), who induced her to accuse lord Hastings of want of allegiance to the lord protector. The duke of Gloucester commanded the instant execution of Hastings; and, accusing Jane Shore of having bewitched him, condemned her to wander about in a sheet, holding a taper in her hand, and decreed that any one who offered her food or shelter should be put to death. Jane continued an outcast for three days, when her husband came to her succour, but he was seized by Gloucester's myrmidons, and Jane Shore died.

Miss Smithson [1800] had a splendid voice, a tall and noble person. Her "Jane Shore" put more money into the manager's pocket than Edmund Kean, Macready, Miss Foote, or Charles Kemble.—Donaldson: Recollections.

Shoreditch. The old London tradition is that Shoreditch derived its name from Jane Shore, the beautiful mistress of Edward IV., who, worn out with poverty and hunger, died miserably in a ditch in this suburb.

I could not get one bit of bread,
Whereby my hunger might be fed . . .
So, weary of my life, at lengthe
I yielded up my vital strength
Within a ditch . . . which since that daye
Is Shore-ditch called, as writers saye.
A ballad in Pepys's collection, The Woeful Lamentation of Jane Shore.

Stow says the name is a corruption of "sewer-ditch," or the common drain. Both these etymologies are only good for fable, as the word is derived from sir John de Soerdich, an eminent statesman and diplomatist, who "rode with Manney and Chandos against the French by the side of the Black Prince."

Shoreditch (Duke of). Barlow, the favourite archer of Henry VIII., was so entitled by the Merry Monarch, in royal sport. Barlow's two skilful companions were created at the same time "marquis of Islington" and "earl of Pancras."

Good king, make not good lord of Lincoln "duke of Shoreditche."—The Poore Man's Peticion to the Kinge (art. xvi., 1603).

Shorne (Sir John), noted for his feat of conjuring the devil into a boot.

To Maister John Shorne,
That blessed man borne,
For the ague to him we apply;
Which jugeleth with a bote;
I beschrewe his herte rote
That will trust him, and it be I.
Fantassie of Idolatrie.

Short-Lived Administration (The), the administration formed February 12, 1746, by William Pulteney. It lasted only two days.

Shortcake (Mrs.), the baker's wife, one of Mrs. Mailsetter's friends.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Shortell (Master), the mercer at Liverpool.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Shorthose (2 syl.), a clown, servant to lady Hartwell the widow.—Fletcher: Wit without Money (1639).

Shorthouse (Tom), epitaph of—

Hic Jacet Tom Shorthouse, sine Tom, sine Sheets, sine Riches ["sine," 1 syl.]; Qui Vixit sine Gown, sine Cloak, sine Shirt, sine Breeches.
Old London (taken from the Magna Britannia).

"Should Auld Acquaintance be Forgot?" Robert Burns, writing to Mr. Thomson, September, 1793, says, "The following song ('Auld Lang Syne') of the olden times, which has never been in print, nor even in MS., until I took it down from an old man's singing, is enough to recommend any air."

Shoulder-Blade Divination.

A divination strange the Dutch-made English have . . .
By the shoulder of a ram from off the right side pared,
Which usually they boil, the spade-bone being bared.
Which then the wizard takes, and gazing thereupon,
Things long to come foreshows . . . Scapes secretly at home . . .
Murthers, adulterous stealths, as the events of war,
The reigns and deaths of kings . . . etc.
Drayton: Polyolbion, v. (1622).

Shovel-Boards or Edward Shovel-Boards, broad shillings of Edward III. Taylor, the water-poet, tells us "they were used for the most part at shoave-board."

. . . the unthrift every day,
With my face downwards do at shoave-board play.
Taylor, the water-poet (1580–1654).

Shrewsbury (Lord), the earl marshal in the court of queen Elizabeth.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Shropshire Toast (The), "To all friends round the Wrekin."

Shufflebottom (Abel), a name assumed by Robert Southey in some of his amatory productions (1774–1843).

Shuffleton (The Hon. Tom), a man of very slender estate, who borrows of all who will lend, but always forgets to repay or return the loans. When spoken to about it, he interrupts the speaker before he comes to the point, and diverts the conversation to some other subject. He is one of the new school, always emotionless, looks on money as the summum bonum, and all as fair that puts money in his purse. The Hon. Tom Shuffleton marries lady Caroline Braymore, who has £4000 a year. (See DEBANCHE, p. 200.) —Colman junior: John Bull (1805).

"Who is this—all boots and breeches,
Cravat and cape, and spurs and switches,
Grins and grimaces, shrugs and capers,
With affectation, spleen, and vapours?"
"Oh, Mr. Richard Jones, your humble——"
"Pithee give o'er to mouthe and mumble;
Stand still, speak plain, and let us hear
What was intended for the ear.
I' faith, without the timely aid
Of bills, no part you ever played (Hob, Handy, Shuffleton, or Rover, Sharper, stroller, lounger, lover)
Could e'er distinguish from each other."
Croker: On Richard Jones, the Actor (1778–1851).

Shutters (Tom, put up the). A lieutenant threatened Mr. Hoby of St. James's Street (London) to withdraw his custom, because his boots were too tight; whereupon Mr. Hoby called to his errand-boy, "Tom, put up the shutters, lieutenant Smith threatens to withdraw his custom." This witty reproof has become a stock phrase of banter with tradesmen when threatened by a silly customer.

Shylock, the Jew who lends Anthonio (a Venetian merchant) 3000 ducats for three months, on these conditions: If repaid within the time, only the principal should be required; if not, the Jew should be at liberty to cut from Anthonio's body a pound of flesh. The ships of Anthonio being delayed by contrary winds, the merchant was unable to meet his bill, and the Jew claimed the forfeiture. Portia, in the dress of a law doctor, conducted the defence; and, when the Jew was about to take his bond, reminded him that he must shed no drop of blood, nor cut either more or less than an exact pound. If these conditions were infringed, his life would be forfeit. The Jew, feeling it to be impossible to exact the bond under such conditions, gave up the claim, but was heavily fined for seeking the life of a Venetian citizen.—Shakespeare: The Merchant of Venice (1598).

(It was of C. Macklin (1690–1797) that Pope wrote the doggerel—

This is the Jew
That Shakespeare drew;

but Edmund Kean (1787–1833) was unrivalled in this character.)

According to the kindred authority of Shylock, no man hates the thing he would not kill.—Sir W. Scott.

¶ Paul Secchi tells us a similar tale: A merchant of Venice, having been informed by private letter that Drake had taken and plundered St. Domingo, sent word to Sampson Ceneda, a Jewish usurer. Ceneda would not believe it, and bet a pound of flesh it was not true. When the report was confirmed, the pope told Secchi he might lawfully claim his bet if he chose, only he must draw no blood, nor take either more or less than an exact pound, on the penalty of being hanged.—Gregorio Leti: Life of Sextus V. (1666).

¶ The same tale is told of "Gernutus a Jewe, who, lending to a merchant a hundred crowns, would have a pound of his fleshe because he could not pay him at the time appointed." The ballad is inserted in Percy's Reliques, series i. bk. ii. 11.

Sibbald, an attendant on the earl of Monteith.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Siber, i.e. Siberia. Mr. Bell of Antermony, in his Travels, informs us that Siberia is universally called Siber by the Russians

From Guinea's coast and Siber's dreary mines.
Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, i. (1799).

Siberian Climate (A), a very cold and rigorous climate, winterly and inhospitable, with snow-hurricanes and biting winds. The valley of the Lena is the coldest reign of the globe.

Sibylla, the sibyl. (See SIBYLS.)

And thou, Alecto, feede me wyth thy foode . . .
And thou, Sibilla, when thou seest me faynte,
Addres thyselfe the gyde of my complaynte.
Sackville: Mirrour for Magistraytes ("Complaynte," etc., 1557).

Sibyls. Plato speaks of only one sibyl; Martian Capella says there were two (the Erythræan or Cumæan sibyl, and the Phrygian). Pliny speaks of the three sibyls; Jackson maintains, on the authority of Ælian, that there were four; Shakespeare speaks of the nine sibyls of old Rome (1 Henry VI. act i. sc. 2); Varro says they were ten (the sibyls of Libya, Samos, Cumæ (in Italy), Cumæ (in Asia Minor), Erythræa, Persia, Tiburtis, Delphi, Ancy'ra (in Phrygia), and Marpessa), in reference to which Rabelais says, "she may be the eleventh sibyl" (Pantag'ruel, iii. 16); the mediæval monks made the number to be twelve, and gave to each a distinct prophecy respecting Christ. But whatever the number, there was but one "sibyl of old Rome" (the Cumæan), who offered to Tarquin the nine Sibylline books.

Sibyl's Books (The). We are told that the sibyl of Cumæ (in Æŏlis) offered Tarquin nine volumes of predictions for a certain sum of money, but the king, deeming the price exorbitant, refused to purchase them; whereupon she burnt three of the volumes, and next year offered Tarquin the remaining six at the same price. Again he refused, and the sibyl burnt three more. The following year she again returned, and asked the original price for the three which remained. At the advice of the augurs, the king purchased the books, and they were preserved with great care under guardians specially appointed for the purpose.

Her remaining chances, like the sibyl's books, became more precious in an increasing ratio as the preceding ones were destroyed.—Fitzgerald: The Parvenu Family, i. 7.

Sic Vos non Vobis. (See VOS NON VOBIS.)

Sicilian Bull (The), the brazen bu invented by Perillos for the tyrant Phalăris, as an engine of torture. Perillos himself was the first victim enclosed in the bull.

As the Sicilian bull that rightfully
His cries echoed who had shaped the mould,
Did so rebellow with the voice of him
Tormented, that the brazen monster seemed Pierced through with pain.
Dante: Hell, xxvii. (1300).

Sicilian Vespers (The), the massacre of the French in Sicily, which began at Palermo, March 30, 1282, at the hour of vespers, on Easter Monday. This wholesale slaughter was provoked by the brutal conduct of Charles d'Anjou (the governor) and his soldiers towards the islanders. (See SHIBBOLETH, p. 998.)

¶ A similar massacre of the Danes was made in England on St. Bryce's Day (November 13), 1002.

¶ Another similar slaughter took place at Bruges, March 24, 1302.

(The Bartholomew Massacre (August 24, 1572) was a religious not a political movement.)

Sicilien (Le) or L'AMOUR PEINTRE, a comedy by Molière (1667). The Sicilian is don Pèdre, who has a Greek slave named Is'idore. This slave is loved by Adraste (2 syl.), a French gentleman, and the plot of the comedy turns on the way that the Frenchman allures the Greek slave away from her master. (See ADRASTE, p. 10.)

Sicily of Spain (The). Alemtejo, in Portugal, at one time "the granary of Portugal."

Sick Man of the East (The), the Turkish empire. It was Nicholas of Russia who gave this name to the moribund empire.

We have on our hands a sick man, a very sick man. It would be a great misfortune if one of these days he should happen to die before the necessary arrangements are made. . . . The man is certainly dying, and we must not allow such an event to take us by surprise. —Nicholas of Russia, to sir George Seymour, British chargé d'affaires (January 11, 1844).

¶ The sick man of Orange, don John, governor-general of the Netherlands, writing in 1577 to Philip II. of Spain, called the prince of Orange "the sick man," because he was in the way, "and wanted him finished." He said to Philip, "Money is the gruel with which we must cure this sick man," spies and assassins being expensive articles.—Motley: The Dutch Republic, v. 2. Again he says, "There is no remedy, sire, for the body but by cutting off the diseased part."

Siddartha, born at Gaya, in India, and known in Indian history as Buddha (i.e. "The Wise").

Sidney, the tutor and friend of Charles Egerton McSycophant. He loves Constantia, but conceals his passion for fear of paining Egerton, her accepted lover.—Macklin: The Man of the World (1764).

Sidney (Sir Philip). Sir Philip Sidney, though suffering extreme thirst from the agony of wounds received in the battle of Zutphen, gave his own draught of water to a wounded private lying at his side, saying, "Poor fellow, thy necessity is greater than mine."

¶ David, fighting against the Philistines, became so parched with thirst that he cried out, "Oh that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate!" And the three mighty men broke through the host of the Philistines and brought him water; nevertheless, he would not drink it, but poured it out unto the Lord.—2 Sam. xxiii. 15-17.

¶ St. Thomas Aquinas, in his last illness, stopped at the castle of Maganza, the residence of his niece Francisca. He had quite lost his appetite; but one day expressed a wish for a little piece of a certain fish. The fish mentioned was not to be found in all Italy, but after diligent search elsewhere was procured. When cooked and brought to the dying man, he refused to eat of it, but gave it as an offering to the Lord.—Alban Butler: Lives of the Saints (1745).

Sidney's Sister, Pembroke's Mother, Mary Herbert (born Sidney), countess of Pembroke, who died 1621.

> Underneath this sable hearse
> Lies the subject of all verse—
> Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother
> Death, ere thou hast killed another
> Fair and good and learned as she,
> Time shall throw his dart at thee.
> W. Browne (1645. See Lansdowne Collection No. 777, in the British Museum).

Sido'nian Tincture, purple dye, Tyrian purple. The Tyrians and Sidonians were world-famed for their purple dye.

> Not in that proud Sidonian tincture dyed.
> P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, xii. (1633).

Sid'rophel [the star-lover], William Lilly, the astrologer.

> Quoth Ralph, "Not far from hence doth dwell
> A cunning man, hight Sidrophel,
> That deals in destiny's dark counsels,
> And sage opinions of the moon sells;
> To whom all people, far and near,
> On deep importances repair."
> S Butler: Hudibras, ii. 3 (1664).

Siebel, Margheri'ta's rejected lover, in the opera of Faust e Margherita, by Gounod (1859).

Siége. Mon siége est fait, my opinion is fixed, and I cannot change it. This proverb rose thus: The abbé de Vertot wrote the history of a certain siege, and applied to a friend for some geographical particulars. These particulars did not arrive till the matter had passed the press; so the abbé remarked with a shrug, "Bah! mon siége est fait."

Siege Perilous (The). The Round Table contained sieges for 150 knights, but three of them were "reserved." Of these, two were posts of honour, but the third was reserved for him who was destined to achieve the quest of the holy graal. This seat was called "perilous," because if any one sat therein except he for whom it was reserved, it would be his death. Every seat of the table bore the name of its rightful occupant in letters of gold, and the name on the "Siege Perilous" was sir Galahad (son of sir Launcelot and Elaine).

> Said Merlin, "There shall no man sit in the two void places but they that shall be of most worship. But in the Siege Perilous there shall no man sit but one, and if any other be so hardy as to do it, he shall be destroyed."—Pt. i. 48.
> Then the old man made sir Galahad unarm; and he put on him a coat of red sandel, with a mantel upon his shoulder furred with fine ermines, . . . and he brought him unto the Siege Perilous, when he sat beside sir Launcelot. And the good old man lifted up the cloth, and found there these words written: "THE SIEGE OF SIR GALAHAD."—Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 32 (1470).

Siege of Calais, a novel by Mme. de Tencin (1681-1749). George Colman has a drama with the same title.

Siege of Corinth (The), a poetical version of the siege which took place in 1715.—Byron (1816).

Siege of Damascus. Damascus was besieged by the Arabs while Eu'menês was governor. The general of the Syrians was Pho'cyas, and of the Arabs Caled. Phocyas asked Eumenês's permission to marry his daughter Eudo'cia, but was sternly refused. (For the rest of the tale, see EUDOCIA, p. 343.)—Hughes: Siege of Damascus (1720).

Sieg'fried [Secg-freed], hero of pt. i. of the Nibelungen Lied, the old German epic. Siegfried was a young warrior of peerless strength and beauty, invulnerable except in one spot between his shoulders. He vanquished the Nibelungs, and carried away their immense hoards of gold and precious stones. He wooed and won Kriemhild, the sister of Günther king of Burgundy, but was treacherously killed by Hagan, while stooping for a draught of water after a hunting expedition.

Siegfried had a cape or cloak, which rendered him invisible, the gift of the dwarf Alberich; and his sword, called Balmung, was forged by Wieland, blacksmith of the Teutonic gods.

N.B.—This epic consists of a number of different lays by the old minnesingers, pieced together into a connected story as early as 1210. It is of Scandinavian origin, and is in the Younger Edda, amongst the "Völsunga Sagas" (compiled by Snorro, in the thirteenth century).

Siegfried's Birthplace. He was born in Phinecastle, then called Xanton.

Siegfried's Father and Mother. Siegfried was the youngest son of Siegmund and Sieglind, king and queen of the Netherlands.

Siegfried called Horny. He was called horny because when he slew the dragon, he bathed in its blood, and became covered with a horny hide which was invulnerable. A linden leaf happened to fall on his back between his shoulder-blades, and as the blood did not touch this spot, it remained vulnerable.—The Minnesingers: The Nibelungen Lied (1210).

Sieg'fried von Lindenberg, the hero of a comic German romance, by Müller (1779). Very amusing and still popular.

Sieglind [Seeg-lind], the mother of Siegfried, and wife of Siegmund king of the Netherlands.—The Minnesingers: The Nibelungen Lied (1210).

Siegmund [Seeg-mund], king of the Netherlands. His wife was Sieglind, and his son Siegfried [Seeg-freed].—The Minnesingers: The Nibelungen Lied (1210).

Sieve (The Trial of the). When a vestal was charged with inchastity, she was condemned to carry water from the Tiber in a sieve without spilling any. If she succeeded, she was pronounced innocent; but if any of the water ran out, it was a confirmation of her guilt.

Sieve and Shears, a method of discovering a thief. The modus operandi is as follows: A sieve is nicely balanced by the points of shears touching the rim, and the shears are supported on the tips of the fingers while a passage of the Bible is read, and the apostles Peter and Paul are asked whether so-and-so is the culprit. When the thief's name is uttered, the sieve spins round. Theocritos mentions this way of divination in his Idyll, iii., and Ben Jonson alludes to it—

> Searching for things lost with a sieve and shears.—The Alchemist, i. 1 (1610).

(See KEY AND BIBLE, p. 565.)

Sige'ro, "the Good," slain by Argantês. Argantês hurled his spear at Godfrey, but it struck Sigêro, who "rejoiced to suffer in his sovereign's place."—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, xi. (1575).

Sight. Nine things are necessary before the form of anything can be discerned by the eye: (1) a power to see, (2) light, (3) a visible object, (4) not too small, (5) not too rare, (6) not too near, (7) not too remote, (8) clear space, (9) sufficient time.—See sir John Davies: Immortality of the Soul, xiv. (1622).

Sight. Zarga, the Arabian heroine of the tribe of Jadîs, could see at a distance of three days' journey. Being asked by Nassân the secret of her long sight, she said it was due to the ore of antimony which she reduced to powder and applied to her eyes as a collyrium every night.

Sightly (Captain), a dashing young officer, who runs away with Priscilla Tomboy, but subsequently obtains her guardian's consent to marry her.—The Romp (altered from Bickerstaff's Love in the City).

Sigismonda, daughter of Tancred king of Salerno. She fell in love with Guiscardo her father's 'squire, revealed to him her love, and married him in a cavern attached to the palace. Tancred discovered them in each other's embrace, and gave secret orders to waylay the bridegroom and strangle him. He then went to Sigismonda, and reproved her for her degrading choice, which she boldly justified. Next day, she received a human heart in a gold casket, knew instinctively that it was Guiscardo's, and poisoned herself. Her father being sent for, she survived just long enough to request that she might be buried in the same grave as her young husband; and Tancred—

> Too late repenting of his cruel deed,
> One common sepulchre for both decreed;
> Intombed the wretched pair in royal state,
> And on their monument inscribed their fate.
> Dryden: Sigismonda and Guiscardo (from Boccaccio).

Sigismund, emperor of Austria.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Sigismunda, daughter of Siffredi lord high chancellor of Sicily, and betrothed to count Tancred. When king Roger died, he left the crown of Sicily to Tancred, on condition that he married Constantia, by which means the rival lines would be united, and the country saved from civil war. Tancred gave a tacit consent, intending to obtain a dispensation; but Sigismunda, in a moment of wounded pride, consented to marry earl Osmond. When king Tancred obtained an interview with Sigismunda, to explain his conduct, Osmond challenged him, and they fought. Osmond fell, and when his wife ran to him, he thrust his sword into her and killed her.—Thomson: Tancred and Sigismunda (1745).

Sigismunda, the heroine of Cervantes's last work of fiction. This tale is a tissue of episodes, full of most incredible adventures, astounding prodigies, impossible characters, and extravagant sentiments. It is said that Cervantes himself preferred it to his Don Quixote, just as Corneille preferred Nicomede to his Cid, and Milton Paradise Regained to his Paradise Lost.—Encyclopædia Britannica (article "Romance").

Sigurd, the hero of an old Scandinavian legend. Sigurd discovered Brynhild, encased in complete armour, lying in a death-like sleep, to which she had been condemned by Odin. Sigurd woke her by ripping up her corselet, fell in love with her, promised to marry her, but deserted her for Gudrun. This ill-starred union was the cause of an Iliad of woes.

(An analysis of this romance was published by Weber in his Illustrations of Northern Antiquities, 1810.)

Sijil (Al), the recording angel.

On that day we will roll up the heavens as the angel Al Sijil rolleth up the scroll wherein every man's actions are recorded.—Al Kordn, xxi.

Sikes (Bill), burglar, and one of Fagin's associates. He is a hardened, irreclaimable villain, but has a conscience which almost drives him mad after the murder of Nancy, who really loved him (ch. xlviii.). Bill Sikes (1 syl.) had an ill-conditioned savage dog, the beast-image of his master, which he kicked and loved, ill-treated and fondled.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Sikes endeavouring to escape from the detectives and the enraged crowd, tried to slip from the roof of a house by a rope with a running noose; but he only got it over his neck and so was strangled. His dog, in its efforts to reach its master, accidentally ran against a projecting wall, and was killed.

(The French "Bill Sikes" is "Jean Hiroux," a creation of Henri Monnier.)

Sikundra (The), a mausoleum about six miles from Agra, raised by Akhbah "the Great," in the reign of our Charles I.

Silas Marner, a novel by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross, 1861). Silas thinks himself deserted and rejected by God and man; to him a little foundling girl is sent, bringing "hope with her and forward-looking thoughts."

The Luck of Roaring Camp, by Bret Harte, is on the same lines (1870).

Silence, a country justice of asinine dulness when sober, but when in his cups of most uproarious mirth. He was in the commission of the peace with his cousin Robert Shallow.

Falstaff. I did not think Master Silence had been a man of this mettle.

Silence. Who, I? I have been merry twice and once, ere now.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. act v. sc. 3 (1598).

Sile'no, husband of Mysis; a kind-hearted man, who takes pity on Apollo when cast to earth by Jupiter, and gives him a home.—O'Hara: Midas (1764).

Silent (The), William I. prince of Orange (1533-1584).

¶ It was the principle of Napoleon III. emperor of the French to "hear, see, and say nothing."

Silent Man (The), the barber of Bagdad, the greatest chatterbox that ever lived. Being sent for to shave the head and beard of a young man who was to visit the cadi's daughter at noon, he kept him from daybreak to midday, prating, to the unspeakable annoyance of the customer. Being subsequently taken before the caliph, he ran on telling story after story about his six brothers. He was called the "Silent Man," because on one occasion, being accidentally taken up with ten robbers, he never said he was not one of the gang. His six brothers were Bachouc the hunchback, Bakbarah the toothless, Bakac the one-eyed, Alcouz the blind, Alnaschar the earless, and Schacabac the hare-lipped.—Arabian Nights ("The Barber," and "The Barber's Six Brothers").

(Napoleon III. was called "The Silent Man," or "The Man of Silence." See SILENT.)

Silent Woman (The), a comedy by Ben Jonson (1609). Morose, a miserly old fellow, who hates to hear any voice but his own, has a young nephew, sir Dauphine, who wants to wring from him a third of his property; and the way he gains his point is this: He induces a lad to pretend to be a "silent woman." Morose is so delighted with the phenomenon that he consents to marry the prodigy; but the moment the ceremony is over, the boy-wife assumes the character of a virago, whose tongue is a ceaseless clack. Morose is in despair, and signs away a third of his property to his nephew, on condition of being rid of this intolerable pest. The trick is now revealed, Morose retires into private life, and sir Dauphine remains master of the situation.

Sile'nus, son of Pan, chief of the sile'ni or older satyrs. Silēnus was the foster-father of Bacchus the wine-god, and is described as a jovial old toper, with bald head, pug nose, and pimply face.

> Old Silenus, bloated, drunken,
> Led by his inebriate satyrs.
> Longfellow: Drinking Song.

Silhouette (3 syl.), a black profile. So called from Etienne de Silhouette, contrôleur des finances under Louis XV. (1757).

> Les réformes financieres de ce ministre ayant paru mesquines et ridicules, la caricature s'en empara et l'on donna le nom de Silhouettes à ces dessins imparfaits où l'on se bornait à indiquer par un simple trait le contour des objets.

Silky, a Jew money-lender, swindler, and miser. (See SULKY.)

> You cheat all day, tremble at night, and act the hypocrite the first thing in the morning.—Holcroft. The Road to Ruin, ii. 3 (1792).

Silly Billy, William IV. of England (1765, 1830–1837).

Silu'res (3 syl.), the inhabitants of Silu'ria, that is, Herefordshire, Monmouthshire, Radnorshire, Brecon, and Glamorganshire.

> Those Silu'rēs, called by us the South Wales men.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xvi. (1613).

(Henry Vaughan, poet (1621–1695), is called "The Silurist" because he was born in South Wales.)

Silva (Don Ruy Gomez de), an old Spanish grandee, to whom Elvira was betrothed; but she detested him, and loved Ernani, a bandit-captain. (The tale is given under ERNANI, p. 330.)—Verdi: Ernani (an opera, 1841).

Silver Age (The), the age succeeding the golden, and succeeded by the iron age. The best period of the world or of a nation is its golden age, noted for giants of literature, simplicity of manners, integrity of conduct, honesty of intention, and domestic virtues. The Elizabethan was the golden age of England. The silver age of a people is noted for its elegant refinement, its delicacy of speech, its luxurious living, its politeness and artificial manners. The reign of Anne was the silver age of England. The iron age is that of commerce and hard matter-of-fact. Birth is no longer the one thing needful, but hard cash; the romance of life has died out, and iron and coals are the philosopher's stone. The age of Victoria is the iron age of England. Strange that the three ages should all be the reigns of queens!

Silver Code (The), a translation into Gothic of parts both of the Old and New Testaments, by bishop Ulfilas, in the eighth century. Still extant.

Silver-Fork School (The), a name given to a class of English novelists who gave undue importance to etiquette and the externals of social intercourse. The most distinguished are: lady Blessington (1789–1849), Theodore Hook (1716–1796), lord Lytton (1804–1873), Mrs. Trollope (1790–1863), and lord Beaconsfield (1804–1881).

Silver Pen. Eliza Meteyard was so called by Douglas Jerrold, and she adopted the pseudonym (1816–1879).

Silver Spoon. Born with a silver spoon in your mouth means born to good luck. The allusion is to the silver spoons given as prizes and at christenings. The lucky man is born with the prize in his mouth, and does not need to wait for it or require to earn it.

Silver Star of Love (The), the star which appeared to Vasco da Gama when his ships were tempest-tossed through the malice of Bacchus. Immediately the star appeared, the tempest ceased, and there was a great calm.

> The sky and ocean blending, each on fire,
> Seemed as all Nature struggled to expire;
> When now the Silver Star of Love appeared,
> Bright in the east her radiant front she reared.
> Camoëns: Lusiad, vi. (1572).

Silver-Tongued (The), Joshua Sylvester, who translated The Divine Weeks of Du Bartas (1563–1618).

William Bates, a puritan divine (1625–1699).

Henry Smith, preacher (1550–1600).

Anthony Hammond, the poet, called "Silver Tongue" (1668–1738).

Spranger Barry, the "Irish Roscius" (1719–1777).

Silver Wedding (The), the twenty-fifth anniversary; the fiftieth anniversary is the golden wedding. In Germany those persons who attain the twenty-fifth anniversary of their wedding day should be presented by their friends and family with a wreath of silver flowers, and on the fiftieth anniversary with a wreath of gold flowers. The fifth anniversary is the wooden wedding, and the seventy-fifth the diamond wedding. Sometimes the Wedding Service is repeated on the fiftieth anniversary.

(In 1879 William king of Prussia and emperor of Germany celebrated his golden wedding.)

Silverquill (Sam), one of the prisoners at Portanferry.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Silves de la Selva (The Exploits and Adventures of), part of the series called Le Roman des Romans, pertaining to "Am'adis of Gaul." This part was added by Feliciano de Silva.

Silvestre (2 syl.), valet of Octave (son of Argante and brother of Zerbinette).—Molière: Les Fourberies de Scapin (1671).

Sil'via, daughter of the duke of Milan, and the lady-love of Valentine one of the heroes of the play.—Shakespeare: The Two Gentlemen of Verona (1594).

Simmons (Widow), the seamstress; a neighbour of the Ramsays.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Si'mon (Martin), proprietor of the village Bout du Monde, and miller of Grenoble. He is called "The king of Pelvoux," and in reality is the baron de Peyras, who has given up all his estates to his nephew, the young chevalier Marcellin de Peyras, and retired to Grenoble, where he lived as a villager. Martin Simon is in secret possession of a gold-mine left him by his father, with the stipulation that he should place it beyond the reach of any private man on the day it became a "source of woe and crime." Rabisson, a travelling tinker, the only person who knows about it, being murdered, Simon is suspected; but Eusebe Noel confesses the crime. Simon then makes the mine over to the king of France, as it had proved the source both "of woe and crime."—Stirling: The Gold-Mine or Miller of Grenoble (1854).

Simon Pure, a young quaker from Pennsylvania, on a visit to Obadiah Prim (a Bristol quaker, and one of the guardians of Anne Lovely the heiress). Colonel Feignwell personated Simon Pure, and obtained Obadiah's consent to marry his ward. (For the rest, see FEIGNWELL, p. 361.)—Mrs. Centlivre: A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717).

Simonides (B.C. 664), the lyric poet, sang an ode to his patron, Scopas, at a feast. He introduced into it the praises of Castor and Pollux, so Scopas declared that he would only pay half his share of the ode; the demigods might pay the rest. Simonides left the palace to see two youths who were supposed to be waiting for him; he found nobody really there, but whilst absent the palace fell in and killed his patron—and so the demigods paid their share. (See Mrs. Orr's Handbook to Browning, p. 147.)

Si'monie or SI'MONY, the friar, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498). So called from Simon Magus (Acts viii. 9-24).

Simony (Dr.), in Foote's farce called The Cozeners, was meant for Dr. Dodd.

Sim'org, a bird "which hath seen the world thrice destroyed." It is found in Kâf; but, as Hafiz says, "searching for the simorg is like searching for the philosopher's stone." This does not agree with Beckford's account (see SIMURGH).

> In Kâf the simorg hath its dwelling-place,
> The all-knowing bird of ages, who hath seen
> The world with all its children thrice destroyed.
> Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, viii. 19 (1797).

Simpcox (Saunder), a lame man, who asserted he was born blind, and to whom St. Alban said, "Come, offer at my shrine, and I will help thee." Being brought before Humphrey duke of Gloucester, the lord protector, he was asked how he became lame; and Simpcox replied he fell from a tree, which he had climbed to gather plums for his wife. The duke then asked if his sight had been restored? "Yes," said the man; and being shown divers colours, could readily distinguish between red, blue, brown, and so on. The duke told the rascal that a blind man does not climb trees to gather their fruits; and one born blind might, if his sight were restored, know that one colour differed from another, but could not possibly know which was which. He then placed a stool before him, and ordered the constables to whip him till he jumped over it; whereon the lame man jumped over it, and ran off as fast as his legs could carry him. Sir Thomas More tells this story, and Shakespeare introduces it in 2 Henry VI. act ii. sc. 1 (1591).

Simple, the servant of Slender (cousin of justice Shallow).—Shakespeare: The Merry Wives of Windsor (1596).

Simple (The), Charles III. of France (879, 893-929).

Simple (Peter), the hero and title of a novel by captain Marryat (1833).

Simple Simon, a man more sinned against than sinning, whose misfortunes arose from his wife Margery's cruelty, which began the very morning of their marriage.

We do not know whether it is necessary to seek for a Teutonic or Northern original for this once popular book.—Quarterly Review.

Simple Story (A), a novel by Elizabeth Inchbald (1791).

Simpson (Tam), the drunken barber. —Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Simson (Jean), an old woman at Middlemas village.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Simurgh, a fabulous Eastern bird, endowed with reason and knowing all languages. It had seen the great cycle of 7000 years twelve times, and, during that period, it declared it had seen the earth wholly without inhabitant seven times.—Beckford: Vathek (notes, 1784). This does not agree with Southey's account (see SIMORG).

Sin, twin-keeper, with Death, of Hellgate. She sprang, full-grown, from the head of Satan.

> Woman to the waist, and fair,
> But ending foul in many a scaly fold
> Voluminous and vast, a serpent armed
> With mortal sting.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. (1665).

Sin'adone (The lady of), metamorphosed by enchantment into a serpent. Sir Lybius (one of Arthur's knights) slew the enchantress, and the serpent, coiling about his neck, kissed him; whereupon the spell was broken, the serpent became a lovely princess, and sir Lybius made her his wife.—Libeaux (a romance).

Sinbad, a merchant of Bagdad, who acquired great wealth by merchandise. He went seven voyages, which he related to a poor discontented porter named Hindbad, to show him that wealth must be obtained by enterprise and personal exertion.

First Voyage. Being becalmed in the Indian Ocean, he and some others of the crew visited what they supposed to be an island, but which was in reality a huge whale asleep. They lighted a fire on the whale, and the heat woke the creature, which instantly dived under water. Sinbad was picked up by some merchants, and in due time returned home.

Second Voyage. Sinbad was left, during sleep, on a desert island, and discovered a roc's egg, "fifty paces in circumference." He fastened himself to the claw of the bird, and was deposited in the valley of diamonds. Next day, some merchants came to the top of the crags, and threw into the valley huge joints of raw meat, to which the diamonds stuck, and when the eagles picked up the meat, the merchants scared them from their nests, and carried off the diamonds. Sinbad then fastened himself to a piece of meat, was carried by an eagle to its nest, and being rescued by the merchants, returned home laden with diamonds.

Third Voyage is the encounter with the Cyclops. (See ULYSSES AND POLYPHEMOS, where the account is given in detail.)

Fourth Voyage. Sinbad married a lady of rank in a strange island on which he was cast; and when his wife died, he was buried alive with the dead body, according to the custom of the land. He made his way out of the catacomb, and returned to Bagdad, greatly enriched by valuables rifled from the dead bodies.

Fifth Voyage. The ship in which he sailed was dashed to pieces by huge stones let down from the talons of two angry rocs. Sinbad swam to a desert island, where he threw stones at the monkeys, and the monkeys threw back cocoa-nuts. On this island Sinbad encountered and killed the Old Man of the Sea.

Sixth Voyage. Sinbad visited the island of Serendib (or Ceylon), and climbed to the top of the mountain "where Adam was placed on his expulsion from paradise."

Seventh Voyage. He was attacked by corsairs, sold to slavery, and employed in shooting from a tree at elephants. He discovered a tract of hill country completely covered with elephants' tusks, communicated his discovery to his master, obtained his liberty, and returned home.—Arabian Nights ("Sinbad the Sailor").

Sinbad, Ulysses, and the Cyclops. (See ULYSSES AND POLYPHEMOS.)

Sin'el, thane of Glamis, and father of Macbeth. He married the younger daughter of Malcolm II. of Scotland.

Sing (Sadha), the mourner of the desert.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Singe de Racine (Le), Campistron, the French dramatic poet (1656–1723).

Singing Apple (The), in the deserts of Libya. This apple resembled a ruby crowned with a huge diamond, and had the gift of imparting wit to those who only smelt of it. Prince Chery obtained it for Fairstar. (See SINGING TREE.)

The singing apple is as great an embellisher of wit as the dancing water is of beauty. Would you appear in public as a poet or prose-writer, a wit or a philosopher, you only need smell it, and you are possessed at once of these rare gifts of genius.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Princess Fairstar," 1682).

Singing Tree (The), a tree, every leaf of which was a mouth, and all the leaves sang together in harmonious concert.—Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters," the last story).

(In the tale of Chery and Fairstar, "the singing tree" is called "the singing apple.")

Single-Speech Hamilton, William Gerard Hamilton, statesman (1729–1796). His first speech was delivered November 13, 1775, and his eloquence threw into the shade every orator except Pitt himself.

It was supposed that he had exhausted himself in that one speech, and had become physically incapable of making a second; so that afterwards, when he really did make a second, everybody was naturally disgusted, and most people dropped his acquaintance.—De Quincey (1786–1859).

Singleton (Captain), the hero of a novel by D. Defoe, called The Adventures of Captain Singleton.

The second part [of Robinson Crusoe] scarcely rises above the level of Captain Singleton.—Encyclopædia Britannica (article "Romance").

Singular Doctor (The), William Occam, Doctor Singularis et Invincibilis (1276–1347).

N.B.—The "Occam razor" was entia non sunt multiplicanda, "entities must not be multiplied;" in other words, elements are few in number, and should be so considered.

Sin'is or SINNIS, a Corinthian robber, called "The Pine-Bender," because he fastened his victims to the branches of two adjacent pine trees bent down by force; being then left to rebound, they tore the victim to pieces.—Greek Fable.

¶ In Stephen's reign, we are told, "the barons took those supposed to have any property, and inflicted on them unutterable tortures. Some they hanged up by the feet, and smoked with foul smoke; some they hung by the thumbs, and weighted with coats of mail. They tied knotted cords about the heads of others, and twisted the cords till the pain went to the brains; others they kept in dungeons with adders and snakes. Some they tore in pieces by fastening them to two trees; and some they placed in a crucet house, i.e. a chest short and narrow, in which were spikes: the victims being forced into the chest, all their limbs were crushed and broken."—Ingram: Saxon Chronicle.

Sinner Saved (A). Cyra daughter of Proterius of Cappadōcia was on the point of taking the veil with Emmelia's sisterhood, but just before the day of renunciation, Eleēmon, her father's freed slave, who loved her, sold himself to the devil, on condition of obtaining her for his wife. Eleemon signed the bond with a drop of his heart's blood, and carried about with him a little red spot on his breast, as a perpetual reminder of the compact. The devil now sent a dream to Cyra, and another to her father, which caused them to change their plans; and on the very day that Cyra was to have taken the veil, she was given by St. Basil in marriage to Eleemon, with whom she lived happily for many years, and had a large family. One night, while her husband was asleep, Cyra saw the blood-red spot; she knew what it meant, and next day Eleemon told her the whole story. Cyra now bestirred herself to annul the compact, and went with her husband to St. Basil, to whom a free and full confession was made. Eleemon was shut up for a night in a cell, and Satan would have carried him off, but he clung to the foot of a crucifix. Next day, Satan met St. Basil in the cathedral, and demanded his bond. St. Basil assured him the bond was illegal and invalid. The devil was foiled, the red mark vanished from the skin of Eleemon, a sinner was saved, and St. Basil came off victorious.—Amphilochius: Life of St. Basil. (See Rosweyde: Vitæ Patrum, 156-8.)

(Southey has converted this legend into a ballad of nine lays, 1829.)

¶ Theophilus signed away his body and soul, but repented, and the Virgin Mary snatched him from perdition in the nick of time.

The Sinner Saved. So William Huntingdon signed himself (1744–1813). The Rev. J. Newton (1725–1807), of Olney and St. Mary Woolnoth, is also said to have done the same.

Sinon, the crafty Greek who persuaded the Trojans to drag the Wooden Horse into their city.—Virgil: Æneid, ii.

 Dantê, in his Inferno, places Sinon, with Potiphar's wife, Nimrod, and the rebellious giants, in the tenth pit of Malêbolgê (see p. 523).

Sin'toism, the primitive religion of Japan. It recognizes Tien ("the sun") as the supreme deity, under whom is a crowd of inferior gods and goddesses. The priests eat no animal food. The name is derived from Sin, a demi-god.

Sintram, the Norwegian hero of La Motte Fouqué's romance. Sintram was the son of "Biorn of the fiery eyes" and his saintly wife Verena. They lived in the castle of Drontheim.

Sio'na, a seraph to whom was committed the charge of Bartholomew the apostle.—Klopstock: Messiah, iii. (1748).

Siph'a, the guardian angel of Andrew the brother of Simon Peter.—Klopstock: The Messiah, iii. (1748).

Si'phax, a soldier, in love with princess Calis, sister of Astorax king of Paphos. The princess is in love with Polydore the brother of general Memnon ("the mad lover").—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Mad Lover (1617).

(Beaumont died 1616.)

Sir Oracle, a dictatorial prig; a dogmatic pedant.

> I am sir Oracle,
> And when I ope my lips, let no dog bark.
> Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, act i. sc. 1 (1598).

Sire. Chaucer uses this word for mother. Thus, in the "Cook's Tale," the wrestler says mockingly to young Gamelyn, "Who is thy fader? who is thy sire?"

Sirens, three sea-nymphs, whose usual abode was a small island near cape Pelŏrus, in Sicily. They enticed sailors ashore by their melodious singing, and then killed them. Their names are Parthenŏpê, Ligeia, and Leucothĕa.—Greek Fable.

Sirloin of Beef. James I., on his return from a hunting excursion, so much enjoyed his dinner, consisting of a loin of roast beef, that he laid his sword across it, and dubbed it sir Loin. At Chingford, in Essex, is a place called "Friday Hill House," in one of the rooms of which is an oak table with a brass plate let into it, inscribed with the following words: "ALL LOVERS OF ROAST BEEF WILL LIKE TO KNOW THAT ON THIS TABLE A LOIN WAS KNIGHTED BY KING JAMES THE FIRST ON HIS RETURN FROM HUNTING IN EPPING FOREST."

The tradition is that James said, "Bring hither that sur-loin, sirrah, for it is worthy of a more honourable post, being, as I may say, not sur-loin but Sir-Loin, the noblest joint of all."

¶ Knighting the loin of beef is also ascribed to Charles II.

> Our second Charles, of fame facete,
> On loin of beef did dine;
> He held his sword, pleased, o'er the meat:
> "Arise, thou famed sir Loin."
> Ballad of the New sir John Barleycorn.

¶ Henry VIII. is credited with knighting the loin before either Charles II. or his grandfather James I. The tale is that, dining with the abbot of Reading, the burly monarch ate so heartily of a loin of beef, that the abbot said he would give 1000 marks for such an appetite. "Done," said the king, and kept him in the Tower a prisoner, till his appetite was ravenous. It was then that he called the sur-loin of beef "Sir Loin."

A sir-loin of beef was so knighted, saith tradition, by king Henry.—Fuller: Church History of Britain, vi. 2, p. 299 (1655).

N.B.—Surloin is the part of the loin (sur) over the kidneys. French, sur-longe.

Sirocco, a wind, called the solano in Spain; the khamsin in Egypt; the simoom in Western Asia; and the harmattan on the coast of Guinea. The Italians say of a stupid book, Era scritto in tempo dal scirocco ("It was written during the sirocco").

Sister Anne, sister of Fatima (the seventh and last wife of Bluebeard). Fatima, being condemned to death by her tyrannical husband, requested sister Anne to ascend to the highest tower of the castle to watch for her brothers, who were momentarily expected. Bluebeard kept roaring below stairs for Fatima to be quick with her prayers; Fatima was constantly calling out from her chamber, "Sister Anne, do you see them coming?" and sister Anne was on the watch-tower, mistaking every cloud of dust for the mounted brothers. They arrived at last, rescued Fatima, and put Bluebeard to death.—Perrault: Contes ("La Barbe Bleue," 1697).

Sis'yphos, in Latin Sisyphus, a king of Corinth, noted for his avarice and fraud. He was punished in the infernal regions by having to roll uphill a huge stone, which always rolled down again as soon as it reached the top.

'.' Sisyphos is a type of avarice, never satisfied. The avaricious man reaches the summit of his ambition, and no sooner does he so than he finds the object of his desire as far off as ever.

With many a weary step, and many a groan,
Up the high hill he heaves a huge round stone;
The huge round stone, returning with a bound,
Thunders impetuous down, and smokes along the ground.
Homer: Odyssey, xi. (Pope's trans.).

Sisyphus, in the Milesian tales, was doomed to die; but when Death came to him, the wily fellow contrived to fasten the unwelcome messenger in a chair, and then feasted him till old Spare-ribs grew as fat as a prize pig. In time, Pluto released Death, and Sisyphus was caught, but prayed that he might speak to his wife before he went to hadês. The prayer was granted, and Sisyphus told his wife not to bury him, for though she might think him dead, he would not be really so. When he got to the infernal regions, he made the ghosts so merry with his jokes that Pluto reproved him, and Sisyphus pleaded that, as he had not been buried, Pluto had no jurisdiction over him, nor could he even be ferried across the Styx. He then obtained leave to return to earth, that he might persuade his wife to bury him. Now, the wily old king had previously bribed Hermês, when he took him to hadês, to induce Zeus to grant him life, provided he returned to earth again in the body; when, therefore, he did return, he demanded of Hermês the fulfilment of his promise, and Hermês induced Zeus to bestow on him life. Sisyphus was now allowed to return to earth, with a promise that he should never die again till he himself implored for death. So he lived and lived till he was weary of living, and when he went to hadês the second time, he was allotted, by way of punishment, the task of rolling a huge stone to the top of a mountain. Orpheus (a syl.) asked him how he could endure so ceaseless and vain an employment, and Sisyphus replied that he hoped ultimately to accomplish the task. "Never," exclaimed Orpheus; "it can never be done!" "Well, then," said Sisyphus, "mine is at worst but everlasting hope." —Lord Lytton: Tales of Miletus, ii.

Sitoph'agus ["the wheat-eater"], one of the mouse princes, who, being wounded in the battle, crept into a ditch to avoid further injury or danger

The lame Sitophagus, oppressed with pain,
Creeps from the desperate dangers of the plain;
And where the ditches rising weeds supply . . .
There lurks the silent mouse relieved of heat,
And, safe embowered, avoids the chance of fate.
Parnell: Battle of the Frogs and Mice, iii. (about 1712)

'.' The last two lines might be amended thus—

There lurks the trembling mouse with bated breath,
And, hid from sight, avoids his instant death.

Siward [Se-ward], the earl of Northumberland, and general of the English forces acting against Macbeth.—Shakespeare: Macbeth (1606).

Six Acts, a term given to certain acts, also named "Gagging Acts" (60 George III. and 1 George IV.), to suppress seditious meetings and publications.

Six Chronicles (The). Dr. Giles compiled and edited six Old English Chronicles for Bohn's series in 1848. They are: Ethelwerd's Chronicle, Asser's Life of Alfred, Geoffrey of Monmouth's British History, Gildas the Wise, Nennius's History of the Britons, and Richard of Cirencester's On the Ancient State of Britain. The last three were edited, in 1757, by professor Bertram, in his Scriptores Tres, but great doubt exists on the genuineness of Dr. Bertram's compilation. (See THREE WRITERS.)

Six Islands (The), which constituted "Great Brittany" before the Saxon period, were Ireland, Iceland, Gothland, the Orkneys, Norway, and Dacia (or Denmark).

Six Months' War (The), the great war between Prussia and France. The emperor (Napoleon III.) left St. Cloud July 28, 1870, and Paris capitulated January 28, 1871.

This is often called the SEVEN MONTHS' WAR. But by no calculation can this be correct. The war lasted just six months: but Napoleon declared war July 19, 1870, and the peace was signed at Frankfort, May 10, 1871.

Sixpenny War (The), the O. P. (old price) riot of Covent Garden in 1809. So called because the managers tried to raise the price of admission from 3*s.* 6*d.* to 4*s.* If the managers had not given way, the newly built theatre would have been utterly dismantled.

Sixteen-String Jack, John Rann, a highwayman. He was a great fop, and wore sixteen tags to his breeches, eight at each knee (hanged 1774).

Dr. Johnson said that Gray's poetry towered above the ordinary run of verse, as Sixteen String Jack above the ordinary foot-pad.—Boswell: Life of Johnson (1791).

Skeffington, author of Sleeping Beauty, Maids and Bachelors, etc.

And sure great Skeffington must claim our praise
For skirtless coats, and skeletons of plays.
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Skeggs (Miss Carolina Wilhelmina Amelia), the companion of "lady Blarney." These were two flash women introduced by squire Thornhill to the Primrose family, with a view of beguiling the two eldest daughters, who were both very beautiful. Sir William Thornhill thwarted their infamous purpose.—Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield (1766).

Skeleton at the Feast. Plutarch says that in Egyptian banquets towards the close a servant brought in a skeleton, and cried aloud to the guests, "Look on this! Eat, drink, and be merry; for to-morrow you die!" Herodotos says the skeleton was a wooden one, about eighteen inches in length. (See 1 Cor. xv. 32; see also REMEMBER THOU ART MORTAL! p. 907.)

The stranger feasted at his board;
But, like the skeleton at the feast,
That warning timepiece never ceased:
"For ever—Never! Never—For ever!"
Longfellow: The Old Clock on the Stairs

Skelton (Sam), a smuggler.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Sketch-book (The), a series of short tales, etc., by Washington Irving (1820).

Sketches by Boz, i.e. by Dickens (1836).

Sketches of Irish Character, by Mrs. S. C. Hall (1829).

Sketchley (Arthur), George Rose, author of Mrs. Brown (her observations on men and objects, politics and manners, etc.).

Skettles (Sir Barnet), of Fulham. He expressed his importance by an antique gold snuff-box and silk handkerchief. His hobby was to extend his acquaintances, and to introduce people to each other. Skettles, junior, was a pupil of Dr. Blimber.—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Skevington's Daughter, an instrument of torture invented by Skevington, lieutenant of the Tower in the reign of Henry VIII. It consisted of a broad iron hoop, in two parts, jointed with a hinge. The victim was put into the hoop, which was then squeezed close and locked. Here he remained for about an hour and a half in the most inexpressible torture. (Generally corrupted into the "Scavenger's Daughter.")

Skewton (The Hon. Mrs.), mother of Edith (Mr. Dombey's second wife). Having once been a beauty, she painted when old and shrivelled, became enthusiastic about the "charms of nature," and reclined in her bath-chair in the attitude she assumed in her barouche when young and well off. A fashionable artist had painted her likeness in this attitude, and called his picture "Cleopatra." The Hon. Mrs. Skewton was the sister of the late lord Feenix, and aunt to the present lord.—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Skies, snobs. (See SKY-LARK.)

Skiffins (Miss), an angular, middle-aged woman, who wears "green kid gloves when dressed for company." She marries Wemmick.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

Skimpole (Harold), an amateur artist, always sponging on his friends. Under a plausible, light-hearted manner, he was intensely selfish; but Mr. Jarndyce looked on him as a mere child, and believed in him implicitly.—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

(The original of this character was Leigh Hunt, who was greatly displeased at the skit.)

Skin (The Man without a), Richard Cumberland. So called by Garrick, on account of his painful sensitiveness of all criticism. The same irritability of temper made Sheridan caricature him in The Critic as "sir Fretful Plagiary" (1732–1811).

Skinfaxi ["shining mane"], the horse which draws the chariot of day.—Scandinavian Mythology.

Skofnung, the sword of king Rolf the Norway hero, preserved for centuries in Iceland.

Skogan. (See SCOGAN, p. 970.)

Skreigh (Mr.), the precentor at the Gordon Arms inn, Kippletringan.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Skulls. The skulls of the ancient Persians were so thin-boned that a small pebble would break them; whereas those of the Egyptians were so thick in the bone that they would not break even with the blow of a huge stone.—Herodotos:

History (in nine books, called "The Nine Muses").

Skulls at Banquets. Plutarch tells us that towards the close of an Egyptian feast a servant brought in a skeleton, and cried to the guests, "Eat, drink, and be merry; for to-morrow you die!" (See SKELETON AT THE FEAST.)

Like skulls at Memphian banquets.
Byron: Don Juan, iii. 65 (1820).

Skurliewhitter (Andrew), the scrivener.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Sky-Lark, a lark with the "skies" or 'scis. The Westminster boys used to style themselves Romans, and the "town" Volsci; the latter word was curtailed to 'sci [sky]. A row between the Westminsterians and the town roughs was called a 'sci-lark, or a lark with the Volsci.

"Snowball the skies!" thought I, not knowing that "skies" and "blackguards" were synonymous terms.—Lord W. Lennox: Celebrities, &c., i. 1.

Skylark (Ode to the), by Percy B. Shelley (1820). One of the most exquisite odes in the language.

James Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, has also an admirable poem called the Skylark. It begins—

Bird of the wilderness,
Blithsome and cumberless,
Sweet be thy matin o'er moorland and lea!

Skyresh Bol'golam, the high admiral or galbet of the realm of Lilliput. —Swift: Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Lilliput," iii., 1726).

S. L. Laud ordered William Prynne to be branded on both cheeks with the letters S. L., meaning "Schismatic libellers;" but Prynne insisted that the letters stood for Stigmata Laudis ("Laud's disgrace").

Slackbridge, one of the "hands" in Bounderby's mill at Coketown. Slackbridge is an ill-conditioned fellow, ill made, with lowering eyebrows, and, though inferior to many of the others, exercises over them a great influence. He is the orator, who stirs up his fellow-workmen to strike.—Dickens: Hard Times (1854).

Slammerkin (Mrs.). Captain Macheath says of her, "She is careless and genteel." "All you fine ladies," he adds, "who know your own beauty, affect an undress."—Gay: The Beggar's Opera, ii. 1 (1727).

Slander, an old hag, of "ragged, rude attyre, and filthy lockes," who sucked venom out of her nails. It was her duty to abuse all goodness, to frame groundless charges, to "steale away the crowne of a good name," and "never thing so well was doen, but she with blame would blot, and of due praise deprive."

A foule and loathly creature sure in sight,
And in conditions to be loathed no lesse;
For she was stuft with rancour and despight
Up to the throat, that oft with bitternesse
It forth would breake and gush in great excesse,
Pouring out streams of poyson and of gall
'Gainst all that truth or vertue doe professe,
Whom she with leasings lewdly did miscall,
And wickedly backbite. Her name men "Sclaunder call.

Spenser: Faërie Queene, IV. viii. 24 (1596).

Slang, from Slangenberg, a Dutch general, noted for his abusive and exaggerated epithets when he reproved the men under his command. The etymon is suited to the dictionary, and the following are not without wit: Italian, s-lingua, s negative and lingua = "bad language;" French, esclandre, "an event which gives rise to scandal," hence, faire esclandre, "to expose one to scandal," causer de l'escadre, "to give ground for scandal;" Greek, skandalon, "an offence, a scandal." "Slangs," fetters for malefactors.

Slango, a lad, servant of Gaylove a young barrister. He dresses up as a woman, and when squire Sapskull comes from Yorkshire for a wife, Slango passes himself off as Arbella. In the mean time, Gaylove assumes the airs and manners of a Yorkshire tike, and marries Arbella, with whom he is in love.—Carey: The Honest Yorkshireman (1736).

Slawken-Ber'gius (Hafen); an imaginary author, distinguished for the great length of his nose. In the Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy (by Sterne), Slawken-Bergius is referred to as a great authority on all lore connected with noses, and a curious tale is introduced from his hypothetical works about a man with an enormously long nose.

No nose can be justly amputated by the public, not even the nose of Slawken-Bergius himself.—Carlyle.

Slaygood (Giant), master of a gang of thieves which infested the King's highway. Mr. Greatheart slew him, and rescued Feeblemind from his grasp in a duel.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, ii. (1684).

Slea'ry, proprietor of the circus at Coketown. A stout man, with one eye fixed and one loose, a voice like the efforts of a broken pair of bellows, a flabby skin, and muddled head. He was never sober and never drunk, but always kind-hearted. Tom Gradgrind, after robbing the bank, lay concealed in this circus as a black servant, till Sleary connived at his escape. This Sleary did in gratitude to Thomas Gradgrind, Esq., M.P., who adopted and educated Cecilia Jupe, daughter of his clown, signor Jupe.

Josephine Sleary, daughter of the circus proprietor, a pretty girl of 18, who had been tied on a horse at two years old, and had made a will at 12. This will she carried about with her, and in it she signified her desire to be drawn to the grave by two piebald ponies. Josephine married E. W. B. Childers of her father's circus.—Dickens: Hard Times (1854).

Sleek (Aminadab), in The Serious Family, a comedy by Morris Barnett.

Sleeper (The). Almost all nations have a tradition about some sleeper, who will wake after a long period of dormancy.

(1) American (North). RIP VAN WINKLE, a Dutch colonist of New York, slept twenty years in the Kaatskill Mountains of North America. — W. Irving.

American Indians. The name of Montezuma, last of the Aztec emperors, is dearly cherished by American Indian tribes, who still indulge a belief that he will some day return to re-establish the ancient empire.—Researches of the Hon. E. G. Squier.

American (South). SEBASTIAN I., supposed to have fallen in the battle of Alcazarquebir, in 1578, is only asleep, and will in due time awake, return to life, and make Brazil the chief kingdom of the earth.

Arabian Legends. MAHOMMED MOHADI, the twelfth imân, is only sleeping, like Charlemagne, till Antichrist appears, when he will awake in his strength, and overthrow the great enemy of all true believers.

NOURJAHAD is only in a temporary sleep, waiting the fulness of time.

(2) British Traditions. KING ARTHUR is not dead in Avillon, but is merely metamorphosed into a raven. In due time he will awake, resume his proper person, claim the throne of Britain, and make it the head and front of all the kingdoms of the globe. "Because king Arthur bears for the nonce the semblance of a raven, the people of Britain never kill a raven" (Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. ii. 5).

GYNETH slept 500 years by the enchantment of Merlin. She was the natural daughter of king Arthur and Guendolen; and was thus punished because she would not put an end to a combat in which twenty knights were mortally wounded, including Merlin's son.—Sir W. Scott: Bridal of Triermain (1813).

MERLIN, the enchanter, is not dead, but "sleeps and sighs in an old tree, spell-bound by Vivien."—British Legend.

ST. DAVID was thrown into an enchanted sleep by Ormandine; but after sleeping for seven years, he was awoke by Merlin.

(3) French Legend. The French slain in the SICILIAN VESPERS are not really dead; but they sleep for the time being, awaiting the day of retribution.

(4) German Legends. BARBAROSSA with six of his knights sleeps in Kyffhaüsberg, in Thuringia, till the fulness of time; when they will awake and make Germany the foremost kingdom of the earth. The beard of the red king has already grown through the table slab at which he is seated; but it must wind itself three times round the table before his second advent. Barbarossa occasionally wakes and asks, "Is it time?" when a voice replies, "Not yet. Sleep on."

CHARLEMAGNE is not dead, but only asleep in Untersberg, near Saltzburg, waiting for the advent of Antichrist, when he will rouse from his slumber, go forth conquering, and will deliver Christendom that it may be fit for the second advent and personal reign of Christ.

CHARLES V. kaiser of Germany is only asleep, waiting his time, when he will awake, return to earth, "resume the monarchy over Germany, Portugal, Spain, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Denmark, putting all enemies under his feet."

KNEZ LAZAR, of Servia, supposed to have been slain by the Turks in 1389, is not really dead, but has put on sleep for a while, and at an allotted moment he will reappear in his full strength.

(5) Grecian Legends. ENDYM'ION, a beautiful youth, sleeps a perpetual sleep in Latmos. Selênê (the moon) fell in love with him, kissed him, and still lies by his side. In the British Museum is an exquisite statue of Endymion asleep.—Greek Fable.

EPIMEN'IDES (5 syl.) the Cretan poet was sent in boyhood to search for a stray sheep; being heated and weary, he stepped into a cave, and fell asleep for fifty-seven years. Epimenidês, we are told, attained the age of 154, 157, 229, and some say 289 years.—Pliny: History, vii. 12.

(6) Irish Traditions. BRIAN, surnamed "Boroimhe," king of Ireland, who conquered the Danes in twenty pitched battles, and was supposed to have been slain in the battle of Clontarf, in 1014, was only stunned. He still sleeps in his castle of Kincora, and the day of Ireland's necessity will be Brian's opportunity.

DESMOND OF KILMALLOCK, in Limerick, supposed to have perished in the reign of Elizabeth, is only sleeping under the waters of lough Gur. Every seventh year he reappears in full armour, rides round the lake early in the morning, and will ultimately reappear and claim the family estates.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (1822).

(7) Jewish Legend. ELIJAH the prophet is not dead, but sleeps in Abraham's bosom till Antichrist appears, when he will return to Jerusalem and restore all things.

(8) Russian Tradition. ELIJAH MANSUR, warrior, prophet, and priest in Asiatic Russia, tried to teach a more tolerant form of Islâm, but was looked on as a heretic, and condemned to imprisonment in the bowels of a mountain. There he sleeps, waiting patiently the summons which will be given him, when he will awake, and wave his conquering sword to the terror of the Muscovite.—Milner: Gallery of Geography, 781.

(9) Scandinavian Tradition. OLAF TRYGGVASON king of Norway, who was baptized in London, and introduced Christianity into Norway, Iceland, and Greenland. Being overthrown by Swolde king of Sweden (A.D. 1000), he threw himself into the sea and swam to the Holy Land, became an anchorite, and fell asleep at a greatly advanced age; but he is only waiting his opportunity, when he will sever Norway from Sweden, and raise it to a first-class power.

(10) Scottish Tradition. THOMAS OF ERCELDOUNE sleeps beneath the Eildon Hills, in Scotland. One day, an elfin lady led him into a cavern in these hills, and he fell asleep for seven years, when he revisited the upper earth, under a bond that he would return immediately the elfin lady summoned him. One day, as he was making merry with his friends, he heard the summons, kept his word, and has never since been seen.—Sir W. Scott: Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border.

(11) Spanish Tradition. BOBADIL EL CHICO, last of the Moorish kings of Granada, lies spell-bound near the Alhambra, but in the day appointed he will return to earth and restore the Moorish government in Spain.

(12) Swiss Legend. Three of the family of TELL sleep a semi-death at Rütli, waiting for the hour of their country's need, when they will wake up and deliver it. (See SEVEN SLEEPERS, p. 985.)

Sleeper Awakened (The). Abou Hassan, the son of a rich merchant at Bagdad, inherited a good fortune; but, being a prudent man, made a vow to divide it into two parts: all that came to him from rents he determined to set apart, but all that was of the nature of cash he resolved to spend on pleasure. In the course of a year he ran through this fund, and then made a resolve in future to ask only one guest at a time to his board. This guest was to be a stranger, and never to be asked a second time. It so happened that the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid, disguised as a merchant, was on one occasion his guest, and heard Abou Hassan say that he wished he were a caliph for one day, and he would punish a certain imân for tittle-tattling. Haroun-al-Raschid thought that he could make capital of this wish for a little diversion; so, drugging the wine, the merchant fell into a profound sleep, was conveyed to the palace, and on waking was treated as the caliph. He ordered the imân to be punished, and sent his mother a handsome gift; but at night, another sleeping draught being given him, he was carried back to his own house. When he woke, he could not decide if he had been in a dream or not, but his conduct was so strange that he was taken to a mad-house. He was confined for several days, and, being discharged, the caliph in disguise again visited him, and repeated the same game, so that next day he could not tell which had been the dream. (See SLY, p. 1019.) At length the mystery was cleared up, and he was given a post about the caliph's person, and the sultana gave him a beautiful slave for his wife. Abou Hassan now played a trick on the caliph. He pretended to be dead, and sent his young wife to the sultana to announce the sad news. Zobeida, the sultana, was very much grieved, and gave her favourite a sum of money for the funeral expenses. On her return, she played the dead woman, and Abou Hassan went to the caliph to announce his loss. The caliph expressed his sympathy, and, having given him a sum of money for the funeral expenses, went to the sultana to speak of the sad news of the death of the young bride. "The bride?" cried Zobeida; "you mean the bridegroom, commander of the faithful." "No, I mean the bride," answered the caliph, "for Abou Hassan has but just left me." "That cannot be, sire," retorted Zobeida, "for it is not an hour ago that the bride was here, to announce his death." To settle this moot point, the chief of the eunuchs was sent to see which of the two was dead; and Abou, who saw him coming, got the bride to pretend to be dead, and set himself at her head bewailing, so the man returned with the report that it was the bride who was dead, and not the bridegroom. The sultana would not believe him, and sent her aged nurse to ascertain the fact. As she approached, Abou Hassan pretended to be dead, and the bride to be the wailing widow; accordingly the nurse contradicted the report of the eunuch. The caliph and sultana, with the nurse and eunuch, then all went to see for themselves, and found both apparently dead. The caliph now said he would give 1000 pieces of gold to know which died first, when Abou Hassan cried, "Commander of the faithful, it was I who died first." The trick was found out, the caliph nearly died with laughter, and the jest proved a little mine of wealth to the court favourite.—Arabian Nights.

Sleepers. (See SEVEN SLEEPERS, p. 985.)

Sleeping Beauty (The), a lady who sleeps in a castle a hundred years, during which time an impenetrable wood springs up around the castle; but being at length disenchanted by a young prince, she marries him. The brothers Grimm have reproduced this tale in German. The old Norse tale of Brynhild and Sigurd seems to be the original of The Sleeping Beauty.—Perrault: Contes du Temps ("La Belle au Bois Dormant," 1697). (See also TRIERMAIN.)

(Tennyson has poetized this nursery story.)

Sleepless Men. Arsenus never went to bed; and St. Euthymus slept only leaning against a wall.

Euthyme se proposa d'imiter le grand Arsène dont la réputation courait alors partout l'Orient. Il jeunait toute la semain sans rien prendre que le dimanche; jamais personne ne l'a vu couché pour se reposer; quand la nature était accablée, il s'appuysait seulement contre la muraille ou il se tenait à une corde qui pendait au plancher. Dès il s' évultat en s' excitant par ces paroles du même Arsène, "A quoi penses-tu lache et misérable Arsène?"—Les Petits Bollandistes, vol. i. p. 498.

Sleipner, the horse of Odin.

Slender, one of the suitors of "sweet Anne Page." His servant's name is Simple. Slender is a country lout, cousin of justice Shallow.—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor (1596).

Slender is a perfect satire . . . on the brilliant youth of the provinces . . . before the introduction of newspapers and turnpike roads; awkward and boobyish among civil people, but at home in rude sports, and proud of exploits at which the town would laugh.—Hallam.

Slender and sir Andrew Ague-cheek are fools troubled with an uneasy consciousness of their folly, which in the latter produces a most edifying meekness and docility, and in the former awkwardness, obstinacy, and confusion.—Macaulay.

Slick (Sam), judge Thomas Chandler Haliburton of Nova Scotia, author of The Clockmaker (1837).

Sam Slick, a Yankee clockmaker and pedlar, wonderfully 'cute, a great observer, full of quaint ideas, droll wit, odd fancies, surprising illustrations, and plenty of "soft sawder." Judge Haliburton wrote the two series called Sam Slick or the Clockmaker (1837).

Sliderskew (Peg), the hag-like housekeeper of Arthur Gride. She robs her master of some deeds, and thereby brings on his ruin.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Sligo (Dr.), of Ireland. He looks with contempt on his countryman, Dr. Osasafras, because he is but a parvenu.

Osasafras! That's a name of no note. He is not a Milesian, I am sure. The family, I suppose, came over the other day with Strongbow, not above seven or eight hundred years ago.—Foote: The Devil upon Two Sticks (1768).

Slingers (or Balearic) Islands. Majorca, Minorca, and Iviça were so called, because their inhabitants were very noted for the use of the sling, at one time much employed in war.

Slingsby (Jonathan Freke), John Francis Waller, author of The Slingsby Papers (1852), etc.

Slinkton (Julius), in Dickens's story of Hunted Down (1860). He attempts the murder of Alfred Beckwith, and finally summits suicide.

Slip, the valet of young Harlowe (son of sir Harry Harlowe, of Dorsetshire). He schemes with Martin, a fellow-servant, to contract a marriage between Martin and Miss Stockwell (daughter of a wealthy merchant), in order to get possession of £10,000, the wedding portion. The plan was this: Martin was to pass himself off as young Harlowe, and marry the lady or secure the dot; but Jenny (Miss Stockwell's maid) informs Belford, the lover of Miss Stockwell, and he arrests the two knaves just in time to prevent mischief.—Garrick: Neck or Nothing (1766).

Slippers which enabled the feet to walk, knives that cut of themselves, and sabres which dealt blows at a wish, were presents brought to Vathek by a hideous monster without a name. — Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Slippery Sam, a highwayman in captain Macheath's gang. Peachum says he should dismiss him, because "the villain hath the impudence to have views of following his trade as a tailor, which he calls an honest employment."—Gay: The Beggar's Opera, i. (1727).

Slipslop (Mrs.), a lady of frail morals. — Fielding: Joseph Andrews (1742).

Slo-Fair, Chichester, the October fair, when the beasts were sold for slaughter, that they might be salted down for winter use. The next month (November) was called Blot-monath or "Blood-month," being the time when the beasts were killed. (Old English, slêan, slôh, "to slaughter;" blôt, "blood, sacrifice," from blôtan, "to shed blood.")

∴ Some idea may be gathered of the enormous number of animals salted down in November, from the mere residue left in the larder of the elder Spencer, in May, 1327. There were "80 salted beeves, 500 bacons, and 600 muttons."

Slop (Dr.), sir John Stoddart, M.D., editor of the New Times, who entertained an insane hatred of Napoleon Bonaparte, called by him "The Corsican Fiend." William Hone devised the name from Stoddart's book entitled Slop's Shave at a Broken Hone (1820), and Thomas Moore helped to popularize it (1773–1856).

Slop (Dr.), a choleric, enthusiastic and bigoted physician. He breaks dowr Tristram's nose, and crushes uncle Toby's fingers to a jelly in attempting to demonstrate the use and virtues of a newly invented pair of obstetrical forceps.—Sterne: The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, Gentleman (1759).

(Under this name, Sterne ridiculed Dr. Burton, a man-midwife of York.)

Slopard (Dame), wife of Grimbard the brock or badger, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498).

Sloppy, a love-child brought up by Betty Higden, for whom he turned the mangle. When Betty died, Mr. Boffin apprenticed him to a cabinet-maker. Sloppy is described as "a very long boy, with a very little head, and an open mouth of disproportionate capacity that seemed to assist his eyes in staring." It is hinted that he became "the prince" of Jenny Wren, the dolls' dressmaker.

Of an ungainly make was Sloppy. There was too much of him longwise, too little of him broadwise, and too many sharp angles of him angle-wise. . . . He had a considerable capital of knee, and elbow, and wrist, and ankle. Full-private Number One in the awkward squad was Sloppy.—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend, I. i. 16 (1864).

Slough of Despond (The), a deep bog, which Christian had to pass on his way to the Wicket Gate. Neighbour Pliable would not attempt to pass it, and turned back. While Christian was floundering in the slough, Help came to his aid, and assisted him over.

The name of the slough was Despond. Here they wallowed for a time, and Christian, because of the burden that was on his back, began to sink into the mire. This miry slough is such a place as cannot be mended. It is the descent whither the scum and filth that attends conviction of sin doth continually run, and therefore is it called the Slough of Despond; for still, as the sinner is awakened about his lost condition, there arise in his soul many fears and doubts and discouraging apprehensions, which all of them get together, and settle in this place, and this is the reason of the badness of this ground.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, i. (1678)

Slowboy (Tilly), nurse and general help of Mr. and Mrs. Peerybingle. She "was of a spare and straight shape, insomuch that her garments appeared to be in constant danger of sliding off her shoulders. Her costume was remarkable for its very partial development, and always afforded glimpses at the back of a pair of dead-green stays." Miss Tilly was very fond of baby, but had a surprising talent for getting it into difficulties, bringing its head in perpetual contact with doors, dressers, stair-rails, bedposts, and so on. Tilly, who had been a foundling, looked upon the house of Peerybingle the carrier as a royal residence, and loved both Mr. and Mrs. Peerybingle with all the intensity of an undivided affection. — Dickens: The Cricket on the Hearth (1845)

Sludge (Gammer), the landlady of Erasmus Holiday the schoolmaster in White Horse Vale.

Dickie Sludge or "Flibbertigibbet," her dwarf grandson.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Slum (Mr.), a patter poet, who dressed en militaire. He called on Mrs. Jarley, exhibitor of wax-works, all by accident. "What, Mr. Slum?" cried the lady of the wax-work; "who'd have thought of seeing you here?" "'Pon my soul and honour," said Mr. Slum, "that's a good remark! 'Pon my soul and honour, that's a wise remark . . . Why I came here? 'Pon my soul and honour, I hardly know what I came here for . . . What a splendid classical thing is this, Mrs. Jarley! 'Pon my soul and honour, it is quite Minervian!" "It'll look well, I fancy," observed Mrs. Jarley. "Well!" said Mr. Slum; "it would be the delight of my life, 'pon my soul and honour, to exercise my Muse on such a delightful theme. By the way—any orders, madam? Is there anything I can do for you?" (ch. xxviii.).

"Ask the perfumers," said the military gentleman, "ask the blacking-makers, ask the hatters, ask the old lottery-office keepers, ask any man among 'em what poetry has done for him, and mark my word, he blesses the name of Slum."—Dickens The Old Curiosity Shop (1840).

Slumkey (Samuel), "blue" candidate for the representation of the borough of Eatanswill in parliament. His opponent is Horatio Fizkin, who represents the "buff" interest.—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Sly (Christopher), a keeper of bears, and a tinker. In the induction of Shakespeare's comedy called Taming of the Shrew, Christopher is found dead drunk by a nobleman, who commands his servants to take him to his mansion and attend on him as a lord. The trick is played, and the "commonty" of Taming of the Shrew is performed for the delectation of the ephemeral lord.

¶ A similar trick was played by Haroun-al-Raschid on a rich merchant named Abou Hassan (see Arabian Nights, "The Sleeper Awakened," q.v.). Also by Philippe le Bon of Burgundy, on his marriage with Eleanora (see Burton: Anatomy of Melancholy, ii. 2, 4, 1624).

Slyme (Chevy), one of old Martin Chuzzlewit's numerous relations. He is a drunken, good-for-nothing vagabond, but his friend Montague Tigg considers him "an unappreciated genius." His chief peculiarity consists in his always being "round the corner."—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Small (Gilbert), the pinmaker, a hardworking old man, who loves his son most dearly.

Thomas Small, the son of Gilbert, a would-be man of fashion and maccaroni. Very conceited of his fine person, he thinks himself the very glass of fashion. Thomas Small resolves to make a fortune by marriage, and allies himself to Kate, who turns out to be the daughter of Strap the cobbler.—Knowles: The Beggar of Bethnal Green (1834).

Small Beer Poet (The), W. Thomas Fitzgerald. He is now known only for one line, quoted in the Rejected Addresses: "The tree of freedom is the British oak." Cobbett gave him the sobriquet (1759–1829).

Small-Endians, a "religious sect" in Lilliput, who made it an article of orthodoxy to break their eggs at the small end. By the Small-endians is meant the protestant party; the Roman Catholics are called the Big-endians, from their making it a sine qua non for all true Churchmen to break their eggs at the big end.—Swift: Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Lilliput," 1726).

Smallweed Family (The), a grasping, ill-conditioned lot, consisting of grandfather, grandmother, and the twins Bartholomew and Judy. The grandfather indulges in vituperative exclamations against his aged wife, with or without provocation, and flings at her anything he can lay his hand on. He becomes, however, so dilapidated at last that he has to be shaken up by his amiable granddaughter Judy in order to be aroused to consciousness.

Bart., i.e. Bartholomew Smallweed, a youth who moulds himself on the model of Mr. Guppy, the lawyer's clerk in the office of Kenge and Carboy. He prides himself on being "a limb of the law," though under 15 years of age; indeed, it is reported of him that his first long clothes were made out of a lawyer's blue bag.—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Smart (Christopher), a poet of the last century, whose poem, A Song to David, was produced in a mad-house, and indented, for want of writing materials, with a key. Rossetti said of this production that it was "a masterpiece of rich imagery, exhaustive resource, and reverberant sound" (Athenæum, February 19, 1887).

(Browning introduces Smart in his Parleyings with Certain People.)

Sma'trash (Eppie), the ale-woman at Wolf's Hope village.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Smauker (John), footman of Angelo Cyrus Bantam. He invites Sam Weller to a "swarry" of "biled mutton."—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1830).

Smectym'nuus, the title of a celebrated pamphlet containing an attack upon episcopacy (1641). The title is composed of the initial letters of the five writers, SM (Stephen Marshall), EC (Edmund Calamy), TY (Thomas Young), MN (Matthew Newcomen), UUS (William Spurstow). Sometimes one U is omitted. Butler says the business of synods is—

> To find, in lines of beard and face,
> The physiognomy of "Grace;"
> And by the sound and twang of nose,
> If all be sound within disclose . . .
> The handkerchief about the neck > (Canonical cravat of Smeck,
> From whom the institution came
> When Church and State they set on flame . . .)
> Judge rightly if "regeneration"
> Be of the newest cut in fashion.
> S. Butler: Hudibras, I. 3 (1663).

Smelfungus. Smollett was so called by Sterne, because his volume of Travels through France and Italy is one perpetual snarl from beginning to end.

> The lamented Smelfungus travelled from Boulogne to Paris, from Paris to Rome, and so on; but he set out with the spleen and jaundice, and every object he passed by was discoloured or distorted. He wrote an account of them, but 'twas nothing but the account of his own miserable feelings.—Sterne: Sentimental Journey (1768).

Smell a Voice. When a young prince had clandestinely visited the young princess brought up in the palace of the Flower Mountain, the fairy mother Violenta said, "I smell the voice of a man," and commanded the dragon on which she rode to make search for the intruder.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1682).

∴ Bottom says, in the part of "Pyramus"—

> I see a voice, now will I to the chink,
> To spy an I can hear my Thisbe's face.
> Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, act v. sc. 1 (1594).

Smelling Sins. St. Hilarian had the gift of detecting what vices or sins any one indulged in simply by the smell of their persons or garments. By the same instinctive faculty he could discern their good feelings and virtuous desires. —St. Jerome: Life of St. Hilarian (A.D. 390).

> Do you smell a fault?
> Shakespeare: King Lear, act I. sc. 1 (1605).

(This may mean something more than discern.)

> Oh! my offence is rank; it smells to heaven.
> Shakespeare: Hamlet, act iii. sc. 3 (1596).

(That is, its smell reaches heaven or goes up to heaven.)

Smike (1 syl.), a poor, half-starved, half-witted boy, the son of Ralph Nickleby. As the marriage was clandestine, the child was put out to nurse, and neither its father nor its mother ever went to see it. When about seven years old, the child was stolen by one Brooker, out of revenge, and put to school at Dotheboys Hall, Yorkshire. Brooker paid the school fees for six years, and being then transported, the payment ceased, and the boy was made a sort of drudge. Nicholas Nickleby took pity on him, and when he left, Smike ran away to join his friend, who took care of the poor half-witted creature till he died (see pp. 594, 595, original edition). — Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Smile, and be a Villain.—Shakespeare: Hamlet, act i. sc. 5 (1596).

Smiler, a sheriff's officer, in A Regular Fix, by J. M. Morton.

Smilinda, a lovelorn maiden, to whom Sharper was untrue. Pope, in his eclogue called The Basset Table (1715), makes Cordelia and Smilinda contend on this knotty point, "Who suffers most, she who loses at basset, or she who loses her lover?" They refer the question to Betty Lovet. Cordelia stakes her "lady's companion, made by Mathers, and worth fifty guineas," on the point; and Smilinda stakes a snuff-box, won at Corticelli's in a raffle, as her pledge. When Cordelia has stated the iron agony of loss at cards, and Smilinda the crushing grief of losing a sweetheart, "strong as a footman and as his master sweet," Lovet awards the lady's companion to Smilinda, and the snuff-box to Cordelia, and bids both give over, "for she wants her tea." Of course, this was suggested by Virgil: Eclogue, iii.

SMITH. In the Leisure Hour we read: "During a period of seventeen years (from 1838 to 1854, both inclusive), the births, deaths, and marriages of the Smiths registered amounted to 286,037, and it is calculated that the families of Smith in England are not less than 53,000."

∴ This must be a very great miscalculation. 286,037 in seventeen years, gives rather more than 16,825 a year, or a marriage, death, or birth to every three families per annum (nearly). If the registration is correct, the number of families must be many times the number stated.

Smith (Henry), alias "Henry Gow," alias "Gow Chrom," alias "Hal of the Wynd," the armourer, and lover of Catharine Glover, whom at the end he marries.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Smith (King), Louis Philippe of France, who escaped to England under the assumed name of "Smith."

"Mr. Smith!" exclaimed the king. "That is curious indeed; and it is very remarkable that the first person to welcome me should be Mr. Smith. Twice the assumed name by which I escaped from France has been 'Smith;' and look! this is my passport made out in the name of Smith."—Times, March 6, 1848.

Smith (Mr.), a faithful confidential clerk in the bank of Dornton and Sulky.—Holcroft: The Road to Ruin (1792).

Smith (Rainy-Day), John Thomas Smith, antiquary (1766–1833).

Smith (Wayland), an invisible farrier, who haunted the "Vale of the White Horse," in Berkshire, where three flat stones supporting a fourth commemorate the place of his stithy. His fee was sixpence, and he was offended if more were offered him.

(Sir W. Scott has introduced him in Kenilworth, time, Elizabeth.)

Smith's Prizeman, one who has obtained the prize (£25) founded in the University of Cambridge by Robert Smith, D.D., once Master of Trinity. Two prizes are awarded annually to two commencing bachelors of arts for proficiency in mathematics and natural philosophy.

Smolkin, a punic spirit.

Peace, Smolkin, peace, thou fiend!
Shakspeare: King Lear, act iii. sc. 4 (1605).

Smollett of the Stage (The), George Farquhar (1678–1707).

Smotherwell (Stephen), the executioner.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Smyr'nean Poet (The), Mimnermos, born at Smyrna (fl. B.C. 630).

Snacks, the hard, grinding steward of lord Lackwit, who by grasping got together £26,000. When lord Lackwit died, and the property came to Robin Roughhead, he toadied him with the greatest servility, but Robin dismissed him and gave the post to Frank.—Allingham: Fortune's Frolic.

Snaggs, a village portrait-taker and tooth-drawer. He says, "I draws off heads and draws out teeth," or "I takes off heads and takes out teeth." Major Touchwood, having dressed himself up to look like his uncle the colonel, pretends to have the tooth-ache. Snaggs, being sent for, prepares to operate on the colonel, and the colonel in a towering rage sends him to the right about.—Dibdin: What Next?

Snagsby (Mr.), the law-stationer in Cook's Court, Cursitor Street. A very mild specimen of the "spear half," in terrible awe of his termagant wife, whom he calls euphemistically "his little woman." He preceded most of his remarks by the words, "Not to put too fine a point upon it."—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Snail, the collector of customs, near Ellangowan House.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Snailsfoot (Bryce), the jagger or pedlar.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Snake (Mr.), a traitorous ally of lady Sneerwell, who has the effrontery to say to her, "You paid me extremely liberally for propagating the lie, but unfortunately I have been offered double to speak the truth." He says—

Ah, sir, consider, I live by the baseness of my character; and if it were once known that I have been betrayed into an honest action, I shall lose every friend I have in the world.—Sheridan: School for Scandal, v. 3 (1777).

Snap, the representation of a dragon which for many years was carried about the city of Norwich on Guild day in grand procession with flags and banners, bands of music, and whifflers with swords to clear the way, all in fancy costume. Snap was of great length, a man was in the middle of the beast to carry it, and caused its head to turn and jaws to open an amazing width, that half-pence might be tossed into it and caught in a bag. The procession was stopped in the year 1824, when Snap was laid up in St. Andrew's Hall. It has since been removed to the Castle Museum.

¶ At Metz a similar procession used to take place annually on St. Mark's Day, the French Snap being called "St. Clement's dragon."

Snare (1 syl.), sheriff's officer.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. (1598).

Snark (Hunting the), a tale by Lewis Carrol (real name Rev. Charles Dodgson) (1876).

Snawley, "in the oil and colour line." A "sleek, flat-nosed man, bearing in his countenance an expression of mortification and sanctity."—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby, iii. (1838).

Sneak (Jerry), a hen-pecked pin-maker; a paltry, pitiful, prying sneak. If ever he summoned up a little manliness, his wife would begin to cry, and Jerry was instantly softened.

Master Sneak, . . . the ancient corporation of Garratt, in consideration of your great parts and abilities, and out of respect to their landlord sir Jacob, have unanimously chosen you mayor.—Act ii.

"Jerry Sneak has become the type of hen-pecked husbands.—Temple Bar, 456 (1875).

Mrs. Sneak, wife of Jerry, a domineering tartar of a woman, who keeps her lord and master well under her thumb. She is the daughter of sir Jacob Jollup.—Foote: The Mayor of Garratt (1763).

Jerry Sneak Russell. So Samuel Russell the actor was called, because of his inimitable representation of "Jerry Sneak," which was quite a hit (1766–1845).

Sneer, a double-faced critic, who carps at authors behind their backs, but fawns on them when they are present (see act i. 1).—Sheridan: The Critic (1779).

Sneerwell (Lady), the widow of a City knight. Mr. Snake says, "Every one allows that lady Sneerwell can do more with a word or a look than many can with the most laboured detail, even when they happen to have a little truth on their side to support it."

Wounded myself, in the early part of my life, by the envenomed tongue of slander, I confess I have since known no pleasure equal to the reducing of others to the level of my own reputation.—Sheridan: School for Scandal, i. 1 (1777).

Miss Farren took leave of the stage in 1797, and her concluding words were: "Let me request, lady Sneerwell, that you will make my respects to the scandalous college of which you are a member, and inform them that lady Teazle [about to be countess of Derby], licentiate, begs leave to return the diploma they granted her, as she now leaves off practice, and kills characters no longer. A burst of applause followed, and no more of the play was listened to.—Mrs. C. Mathews.

Sneeze into a Sack (To), to be guillotined.

Who kissed La Guillotine, looked through the little window and sneezed into the sack.—Dickens: A Tale of Two Cities, iii. 4 (1859).

Sneezing. A person who sneezed was at one time supposed to be under the influence of fairies and demons, and as the name of God repelled all evil spirits, the benediction of "God bless you!" drove away the demon, and counteracted its influence.

(Judge Haliburton has a good paper "On Sneezing," in Temple Bar, 345, 1875.)

Bul. I have often, Dr. Skeleton, had it in my head to ask some of the faculty, what can be the reason that when a man happens to sneeze, all the company bows.

Skel. Sneezing, Dr. Bulruddery, was a mortal symptom that attended a pestilential disease which formerly depopulated the republic of Athens; ever since, when that convulsion occurs, a short ejaculation is offered up that the sneezing or sternuting party may not be afflicted with the same distemper.

Bul. Upon my conscience, a very learned account! Ay, and a very civil institution too!—Bickerstaff and Foote: Dr. Last in His Chariot (1769).

Snevellicci (Mr.), in Crummles's company of actors. Mr. Snevellicci plays the military swell, and is great in the character of speechless noblemen.

Mrs. Snevellicci, wife of the above, a dancer in the same theatrical company.

Miss Snevellicci, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Snevellicci, also of the Portsmouth Theatre. "She could do anything, from a medley dance to lady Macbeth." Miss Snevellicci laid her toils to catch Nicholas Nickleby, but "the bird escaped from the nets of the toiler."—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Snitchey and Craggs, lawyers. It was the opinion of Mr. Thomas Craggs that "everything is too easy," especially law; that it is the duty of wise men to make everything as difficult as possible, and as hard to go as rusty locks and hinges which will not turn for want of greasing. He was a cold, hard, dry man, dressed in grey-and-white like a flint, with small twinkles in his eyes. Jonathan Snitchey was like a magpie or raven. He generally finished by saying, "I speak for Self and Craggs," and, after the death of his partner, "for Self and Craggs deceased."

Mrs. Snitchey and Mrs. Craggs, wives of the lawyers. Mrs. Snitchey was, on principle, suspicious of Mr. Craggs; and Mrs. Craggs was, on principle, suspicious of Mr. Snitchey. Mrs. Craggs would say to her lord and master—

Your Snitcheys indeed! I don't see what you want with your Snitcheys, for my part. You trust a great deal too much to your Snitcheys, I think, and I hope you may never find my words come true.

Mrs. Snitchey would observe to Mr. Snitchey—

Snitchey, if ever you were led away by man, take my word for it, you are led away by Craggs; and if ever I can read a double purpose in mortal eye, I can read it in Craggs's eye.—Dickens: The Battle of Life, ii. (1846).

Snobs (The Book of), by Thackeray (1848).

Snodgrass (Augustus), M.P.C., a poetical young man, who travels about with Mr. Pickwick, "to inquire into the source of the Hampstead ponds." He marries Emily Wardle.—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

(M.P.C., Member of the Pickwick Club.)

Snoring (Great). "Rector of Great Snoring," a dull, prosy preacher.

Snorro Sturleson, last of the great Icelandic scalds or court poets. He was author of the Younger Edda, in prose, and of the Heimskringla, a chronicle in verse of the history of Norway from the earliest times to the year 1177. The Younger Edda is an abridgment of the Rhythmical Edda (see SÆMUND SIGFUSSON). The Heimskringla appeared in 1230, and the Younger Edda is often called the Snorro Edda. Snorro Sturleson incurred the displeasure of Hakon king of Norway, who employed assassins to murder him (1178–1241).

(The Heimskringla was translated into English by Samuel Laing in 1844.)

Snout (Tom), the tinker, who takes part in the "tragedy" of Pyrămus and Thisbe, played before the duke and duchess of Athens "on their wedding day at night." Next to Peter Quince and Nick Bottom the weaver, Snout was by far the most self-important man of the troupe. He was cast for Pyramus's father, but has nothing to say, and does not even put in an appearance during the play.—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

Snow King (The), Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, king of Sweden, killed in the Thirty Years' War, at the battle of Lutzen. The cabinet of Vienna said, in derision of him, "The Snow King is come, but he can live only in the north, and will melt away as soon as he feels the sun" (1594, 1611–1632).

At Vienna he was called, in derision, "The Snow King," who was kept together by the cold, but would melt and disappear as he approached a warmer soil.—Dr. Crichton: Scandinavia ("Gustavus Adolphus," ii. 61).

Snow King (The), Frederick elector palatine, made king of Bohemia by the protestants in the autumn of 1619, but defeated and set aside in the following autumn.

The winter king, king in times of frost, a snow king, altogether soluble in the spring, is the name which Frederick obtains in German histories.—Carlyle.

Snow Kingdom (The), Inistore, the Orkney Islands.

Let no vessel of the kingdom of snow [Norway] bound on the dark-rolling waves of Inistore.—Ossian: Fingal, i.

Snow Queen (The), Christiana queen of Sweden (1626, 1633–1689).

The princess Elizabeth of England, who married Frederick V. elector palatine, 1613, and induced him to accept the crown of Bohemia in 1619. She was crowned with her husband October 25, 1619, but fled in November, 1620, and was put under the ban of the empire in 1621. Elizabeth was queen of Bohemia during the time of snow, but was melted by the heat of the ensuing summer.

Snowdonia (The king of), Moel-y-Wyddfa ("the conspicuous peak"), the highest peak in Snowdonia, being 3571 feet above the sea-level.

Snubbin (Serjeant), retained by Mr. Perker for the defence in the famous case of "Bardell v. Pickwick." His clerk was named Mallard, and his junior Phunky, "an infant barrister," very much looked down upon by his senior.—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Snuffim (Sir Tumley), the doctor who attends Mrs. Wititterly.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Snuffle (Simon), the sexton of Garratt, and one of the corporation. He was called a "scollard, for he could read a written hand."—Foote: Mayor of Garratt, ii. 1 (1763).

Snug, the joiner, who takes part in the "lamentable comedy" of Pyrămus and Thisbe played before the duke and duchess of Athens "on their wedding day at night." His rôle was the "lion's part." He asked the manager (Peter Quince) if he had the "lion's part written out, for," said he, "I am slow of memory;" but being told he could do it extempore, "for it was nothing but roaring," he consented to undertake it.—Shakespeare: A Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

Soane Museum (The), the museum collected by sir John Soane, architect, and preserved on its original site, No. 13, Lincoln's Inn Fields, the private residence of the founder (1753–1837). It contains Egyptian and other antiquities, valuable paintings, rare books, etc.

Soapy Sam, Samuel Wilberforce, bishop of Winchester (1805–1873).

Being asked why he was nicknamed "Soapy," he replied, "Because I have often been in hot water, but have always come out with clean hands."

Sobri'no, one of the most valiant of the Saracen army, and called "The Sage." He counselled Agrāmant to entrust the fate of the war to a single combat, stipulating that the nation whose champion was worsted should be tributary to the other. Rogēro was chosen for the pagan champion, and Rinaldo for the Christian army; but when Rogero was overthrown, Agramant broke the compact. Sobrino was greatly displeased, and soon afterwards received the rite of Christian baptism. — Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Who more prudent than Sobrino I—Cervantes: Don Quixote (1605).

Soc'ratês (The English). Dr. Johnson is so called by Boswell (1709–1784).

Mr. South's amiable manners and attachment to our Socrátês at once united me to him.—Life of Johnson (1791).

Sodom of India, Hy'derabad. So called from the beauty of the country and the depravity of the inhabitants.

Sodor and Man. Sodor is a contraction of Sodorensis. The sudor-eys or sodor-eys means "the southern isles." The bishop of Sodor and Man is bishop of Man and the southern isles.

Sofa (The). So bk. i. of The Task, by Cowper, is called; in blank verse, and running to 505 lines (1783–85).

Sofronia, a young Christian of Jerusalem, the heroine of an episode in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered (1575). The tale is this: Aladine king of Jerusalem stole from a Christian church an image of the Virgin, being told by a magician that it was a palladium, and, if set up in a mosque, the Virgin would forsake the Christian army, and favour the Mohammedan. The image was accordingly set up in a mosque, but during the night was carried off by some one. Aladine, greatly enraged, ordered the instant execution of all his Christian subjects but to prevent this massacre, Sofronia accused herself of the offence. Her lover Olindo, hearing that Sofronia was sentenced to death, presented himself before the king, and said that he and not Sofronia was the real offender; whereupon the king ordered both to instant execution; but Clorinda the Amāzon, pleading for them, obtained their pardon, and Sofronia left the stake to join Olindo at the altar of matrimony. —Bk. ii.

¶ This episode may have been suggested by a well-known incident in ecclesiastical history. At Merum, a city of Phrygia, Amachius the governor of the province ordered the temple to be opened, and the idols to be cleansed. Three Christians, inflamed with Christian zeal, went by night and broke all the images. The governor, unable to discover the culprits, commanded all the Christians of Merum to be put to death; but the three who had been guilty of the act confessed their offence, and were executed. — Socrates: Ecclesiastical History, iii. 15 (A.D. 439). (See SOPHRONIA, p. 1030.)

Softer Adams of your Academe, schoolgirls.—Tennyson: The Princess, ii.

Soham, a monster with the head of a horse, four eyes, and the body of a fiery dragon. (See OURANABAD, p. 790.)

Soho (London). The tradition is that this square was so called from the watchword of the duke of Monmouth at the battle of Sedgemoor, in 1685. The reverse of this may possibly be true, viz. that the duke selected the watchword from the name of the locality in which he lived; but the name of the place certainly existed in 1632, if not earlier.

Sohrab and Rustum, a Persian tale, in blank verse, by Matthew Arnold. Sohrab was a natural son of Rustum. He became a soldier, and carried dismay into the Persian army. Rustum, the boldest of the Persians, encountered him, not knowing who he was, and slew him. As he was dying, Rustum discovered he was his son, and buried him at Seistan. (See RUSTAM, p. 942.)

Soi-même. St. Soi-même, the "natural man," in opposition to the "spiritual man." In almost all religious acts and feelings, a thread of self may be detected, and many things are done ostensibly for God, but in reality for St. Soi-même.

They attended the church service not altogether without regard to St. Soi-même.—Asylum Christi, ii.

Soldan (The), Philip II. of Spain, whose wife was Adicia (or papal bigotry). Prince Arthur sent the soldan a challenge for wrongs done to Samient, a female ambassador (deputies of the states of Holland). On receiving this challenge, the soldan "swore and banned most blasphemously," and mounting "his chariot high" (the high ships of the Armada), drawn by horses fed on carrion (the Inquisitors), went forth to meet the prince, whom he expected to tear to pieces with his chariot scythes, or trample down beneath his horses' hoofs. Not being able to get at the soldan from the great height of the chariot, the prince uncovered his shield, and held it up to view. Instantly the soldan's horses were so terrified that they fled, regardless of the whip and reins, overthrew the chariot, and left the soldan on the ground, "torn to rags, amongst his own iron hooks and grapples keen."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 8 (1596).

 The overthrow of the soldan by supernatural means, and not by combat, refers to the destruction of the Armada by tempest, according to the legend of the medals, Flavit Jehovah, et dissipati sunt ("He blew with His blast, and they were scattered").

Soldier's Daughter (The), a comedy by A. Cherry (1804). Mrs. Cheerly, the daughter of colonel Woodley, after a marriage of three years, is left a widow, young, rich, gay, and engaging. She comes to London, and Frank Heartall, a generous-minded young merchant, sees her at the opera, falls in love with her, and follows her to her lodging. Here he meets with the Malfort family, reduced to abject poverty by speculation, and relieves them. Ferret, the villain of the piece, spreads a report that Frank gave the money as hush-money, because he had base designs on Mrs. Malfort; but Frank's character is cleared, and he leads to the altar the blooming young widow, while the return of Malfort's father places his son again in prosperous circumstances.

Soldier's Tear (The), a song by Thomas Haynes Bayly (1844).

Soldiers' Friend (The), Frederick duke of York, second son of George III., and commander of the British forces in the Low Countries during the French Revolution (1763–1827).

Solemn Doctor (The). Henry Goetnals was by the Sorbonne given the honorary title of Doctor Solemnis (1227–1293).

Solemn League and Covenant, a league to support the Church of Scotland, and exterminate popery and prelacy. Charles II. signed it in 1651, but declared it null and void at his restoration.

Soles, a shoemaker, and a witness at the examination of Dirk Hatteraick.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Solid Doctor (The), Richard Middleton (*–1304).

Soliman the Magnificent, Charles Jennens, who composed the libretto for Handel's Messiah (*–1773).

Solingen, called "The Sheffield of Germany;" famous for swords and foils.

Soli'nus, duke of Ephesus, who was obliged to pass the sentence of the law on Æge'on, a merchant, because, being a Syracusian, he had dared to set foot in Ephesus. When, however, he discovered that the man who had saved his life, and whom he best loved, was the son of Ægeon, the prisoner was released, and settled in Ephesus.—Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors (1593).

Solitude (Hymn on), by Thomson (1737).

(Alexander Pope wrote an Ode to Solitude, when about twelve years old. James Grainger wrote an Ode to Solitude, in 1766.)

Sologne, in France. There is a legend that every domestic animal, such as dogs, cats, pigs, horses, cows, etc., in Sologne, become possessed of human speech from the midnight of Christmas Eve to the midday of December 25. (See LOUP-GAROU, p. 629; WERE-WOLF.)

Solomon, an epic poem in three books, by Prior (1718). Bk. i. Solomon seeks happiness from wisdom, but comes to the conclusion that "All is vanity:" this book is entitled Knowledge. Bk. ii. Solomon seeks happiness in wealth, grandeur, luxury, and ungodliness, but comes to the conclusion that "All is vanity and vexation of spirit:" this book is entitled Pleasure. Bk. iii., entitled Power, consists of the reflections of Solomon upon human life, the power of God, life, death, and a future state. An angel reveals to him the future lot of the Jewish race, and Solomon concludes with this petition—

Restore, Great Father, Thy instructed son,
And in my act may Thy great will be done!

Solomon is called king of the ginn and fairies. This is probably a mere blunder. The monarch of these spirits was called "suleyman," and this title of rank has been mistaken for a proper name.

Solomon died standing. Solomon employed the genii in building the temple, but, perceiving that his end was at hand, prayed God that his death might be concealed from the genii till the work was completed. Accordingly, he died standing, leaning on his staff as if in prayer. The genii, supposing him to be alive, toiled on, and when the temple was fully built, a worm gnawed the staff, and the corpse fell prostrate to the earth. Mahomet refers to this as a fact—

When We [God] had decreed that Solomon should die, nothing discovered his death unto them [the genii] except the creeping thing of the earth, which gnawed his staff. And when his [dead] body fell down, the genii plainly perceived that if they had known that which is secret, they would not have continued in a vile punishment.—Al Korân, xxxiv.

N.B.—Louis XVIII. said, "A king should die standing." Vespasian said the same thing.

Solomon's Favourite Wife. Prior, in his epic poem called Solomon (bk. ii.), makes Abra the favourite.

The apples she had gathered smelt most sweet;
The cake she kneaded was the savoury meat;
All fruits their odour lost and meats their taste,
If gentle Abra had not decked the feast;
Dishonoured did the sparkling goblet stand,
Unless received from gentle Abra's hand; . . .
Nor could my soul approve the music's tone,
Till all was hushed, and Abra sang alone.
M. Prior: Solomon (1664–1721).

Al Beidâwi, Jallâlo'ddin, and Abulfeda, give Amîna, daughter of Jerâda king of Tyre, as his favourite concubine.

Solomon kills his Horses. Solomon bought a thousand horses, and went to examine them. The examination took him the whole day, so that he omitted the prayers which he ought to have repeated. This neglect came into his mind at sunset, and, by way of atonement, he slew all the horses except a hundred of the best "as an offering to God;" and God, to make him amends for his loss, gave him the dominion of the winds. Mahomet refers to this in the following passage:—

When the horses, standing on three feet, and touching the ground with the edge of the fourth foot, swift in the course, were set in parade before him [Solomon] in the evening, he said, "Verily I have loved the love of earthly good above the remembrance of my Lord; and I have spent the time in viewing these horses till the sun is hidden by the veil of night. Bring the horses back unto me." And when they were brought back, he began to cut off their legs and their necks.—Al Korân, xxxviii.

Solomon's Mode of Travelling. Solomon had a carpet of green silk, on which his throne was placed. This carpet was large enough for all his army to stand on. When his soldiers had stationed themselves on his right hand, and the spirits on his left, Solomon commanded the winds to convey him whither he listed. Whereupon the winds buoyed up the carpet, and transported it to the place the king wished to go to, and while passing thus through the air, the birds of heaven hovered overhead, forming a canopy with their wings to ward off the heat of the sun. Mahomet takes this legend as an historic fact, for he says in reference to it—

Unto Solomon We subjected the strong wind, and it ran at his command to the land whereon We had bestowed our blessing.—Al Korân, xxi.

And again—

We made the wind subject to him, and it ran gently at his command whithersoever he desired.—Al Korân, xxxviii.

Solomon's Signet-Ring. The rabbins say that Solomon wore a ring in which was set a chased stone that told him everything he wished to know.

Solomon loses his Signet-Ring. Solomon's favourite concubine was Amîna, daughter of Jerâda king of Tyre, and when he went to bathe, it was to Amîna that he entrusted his signet-ring. One day, the devil Sakhar assumed the likeness of Solomon, and so got possession of the ring, and for forty days reigned in Jerusalem, while Solomon himself was a wanderer living on alms. At the end of the forty days, Sakhar flung the ring into the sea; it was swallowed by a fish, which was given to Solomon. Having thus obtained his ring again, Solomon took Sakhar captive, and cast him into the sea of Galilee.—Al Korân (Sale's notes, ch. xxxviii.). (See JOVIAN, p. 556; FISH AND THE RING, p. 370.)

(Mahomet, in the Korân, takes this legend as an historic fact, for he says, "We [God] also tried Solomon, and placed on his throne a counterfeit body [i.e. Sakhar the devil]."—Ch. xxxviii.)

Uffan steals Solomon's Signet-Ring. Uffan the sage saw Solomon asleep, and, wishing to take off his signet-ring, gave three arrows to Aboutaleb, saying, "When the serpent springs upon me and strikes me dead, shoot one of these arrows at me, and I shall instantly come to life again."

Uffan tugged at the ring, was stung to death, but, being struck by one of the arrows, revived. This happened twice. After the third attempt, the heavens grew so black, and the thunder was so alarming, that Aboutaleb was afraid to shoot, and, throwing down the bow and arrow, fled with precipitation from the dreadful place.—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("History of Aboutaleb," 1743).

The Second Solomon, James I. of England (1566, 1603–1625).

The French king [Henri IV.] said, in the presence of lord Sanquhar, to one that called James a second Solomon, "I hope he is not the son of David the fiddler" [David Rizzio].—Osborne: Secret History, p. 231.

(Sully called him "The Wisest Fool in Christendom.")

Solomon, a tedious, consequential old butler, in the service of count Wintersen. He has two self-delusions: One is that he receives letters of confidential importance from all parts of the civilized world, but one of these "confidential letters" "from Constantinople" turns out to be from his nephew, Tim Twist the tailor, respecting a waistcoat which had been turned three times. His other self-delusion is that he is a model of economy; thus he boasts of his cellar of wine provided in a "most frugal and provident way;" and of his alterations in the park, "done with the most economical economy." The old butler is very proud of his son Peter, a half-witted lad, and thinks Mrs. Haller "casts eyes at him."—B. Thompson: The Stranger (1797).

Solomon Daisy, parish clerk and bell-ringer of Chigwell. He had little round, black, shiny eyes like beads; wore rusty black breeches, a rusty black coat, and a long-flapped waistcoat with little queer buttons like his eyes. As he sat in the firelight, he seemed all eyes, from head to foot.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Solomon of China (The), Tae-tsong I., whose real name was Lee-chee-men. He reformed the calendar, founded a very extensive library, established schools in his palace, built places of worship for the Nestorian Christians, and was noted for his wise maxims (*, 618–626).

¶ Louis IX. (i.e. St. Louis) is also called "The Solomon of France" (1215, 1226–1270).

Solon of French Prose (The), Balzac (1596–1655).

Solon of Parnassus (The). Boileau is so called by Voltaire, in allusion to his Art of Poetry (1636–1711).

Solon's Happiness. Solon said, "Call no man happy till he is dead."

Safer triumph is this funeral pomp
That hath aspired to Solon's happiness,
And triumphs over chance.

(†) Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus, act i. sc. 2 (1593).

Surely Solon did not mean that death is happiness, but that the vicissitudes of life are so great that "no man should holloa till he is out of the wood."

Solsgrace (Master Nehemiah), a presbyterian pastor.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Solus, an old bachelor, who greatly wished to be a married man. When he saw the bright sides of domestic life, he resolved he would marry; but when he saw the reverse, he determined to remain single. Ultimately, he takes to the altar Miss Spinster.—Mrs. Inchbald: Every One has His Fault (1794).

Solus (Solomon), in Buckstone's comedy of Leap Year (1850).

Solymæan Rout (The), the London rabble and rebels. Solymæa was an ancient name of Jerusalem, subsequently called Hiero-solyma, that is "sacred Solyma." As Charles II. is called "David," and London "Jerusalem," the London rebels are called "the Solymæan rout" or the rabble of Jerusalem.

The Solymæan rout, well versed of old,
In godly fiction, and in treason bold, . . .
Saw with disdain an Ethnic plot [popish plot] begun,
And scorned by Jebusites [papists] to be outdone.
Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, l. 5135, etc. (1681)

Sol'yman, king of the Saracens, whose capital was Nice. Being driven from his kingdom, he fled to Egypt, and was there appointed leader of the Arabs (bk. ix.). Solyman and Argantês were by far the most doughty of the pagan knights. The former was slain by Rinaldo (bk. xx.), and the latter by Tancred.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Sombragloomy, London, the inhabitants of which are Sombragloomians.

Somebody's Luggage, a tale in the Christmas number of All the Year Round (1864), by Dickens. The head waiter is Christopher, whose story is very amusing.

Somnambulus. Sir W. Scott so signs The Visionary (political satires, 1819).—Olphar Hamst [Ralph Thomas]: Handbook of Fictitious Names.

Somo Sala (Like the father of), a dreamer of air-castles, like the milkmaid Perrette in Lafontaine. (See COUNT NOT, etc., p. 239.)

Sompnour's Tale. (See SUMPNOR'S TALE.)

Son. It is not always the case that a "wise father makes a wise son," nor is it always the case that a son is "a chip of the old block." The subject is a very long one, but the following examples will readily occur to the reader:—

English History: Edward I., a noble king, was the son of Henry III., and the father of Edward II., both as unlike him as possible. Richard II., the fop, was the son of the Black Prince. Henry VI., a poor, worthless monarch, was the son of Henry V., the English Alexander. Richard Cromwell was the son of Oliver, but no more like his father than Hamlet was like Herculês. The only son of Addison was an idiot.

In France: The son of Charles V., le Sage, was Charles VII., the imbecile.

In Greek History: The sons of Pericles were Paralus and Xantippus, no better than Richard Cromwell. The son of Aristidês, surnamed The Just, was the infamous Lysimăchus. The son of the great historian Thucydidês were Milesias the idiot and Stephanos the stupid.

The kings of Israel and Judah give several similar examples. But it is not needful to pursue the subject further.

Son of Be'lial (A), a wicked person, a rebel, an infidel.

Now the sons of Eli were sons of Belial; they knew not [i.e. acknowledged not] the Lord.—1 Sam. ii. 12.

Son of Consolation, St. Barnabas of Cyprus (first century).—Acts iv. 36.

Son of Perdition (The), Judas Iscariot.—John xvii. 12.

Son of Perdition, Antichrist.—2 Thess. ii. 3.

Son of a Star (The), Barcochebas or Barchochab, who gave himself out to be the "star" predicted by Balaam (died A.D. 135).

There shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth.—Numb. xxiv. 17.

Son of the Last Man. Charles II. was so called by the parliamentarians. His father Charles I. was called by them "The Last Man."

Son of the Rock, echo.

She went. She called on Armar. Nought answered but the son of the rock.—Ossian: The Songs of Selma Sons of Phidias, sculptors.

Sons of Thunder or Boanerges, James and John, sons of Zebedee.—Mark iii. 17.

Song. The Father of Modern French Songs, C. F. Panard (1691–1765).

Song. What! all this for a song? So said William Cecil lord Burghley when queen Elizabeth ordered him to give Edmund Spenser £100 as an expression of her pleasure at some verses he had presented to her. When a pension of £50 a year was settled on the poet, lord Burghley did all in his power to oppose the grant. To this Spenser alludes in the lines following:—

O grief of griefs! O gall of all good hearts!
To see that virtue should despisèd be
Of him that first was raised for virtuous parts;
And now, broad-spreading like an aged tree,
Lets none shoot up that nigh him planted be.
Oh, let the man of whom the Muse is scorned,
Alive nor dead be of the Muse adorned!
Spenser: The Ruins of Time (1591).

Song of Solomon (The), in the Old Testament. Supposed by some to be an allegory of the union between Christ and His Church.

I saw the holy city [or the church] . . . coming down from God . . . prepared as a bride . . . for her husband.—Rev. xxi. 2.

Song of the Shirt (The), by T. Hood (1843). It begins—

With fingers weary and worn,
With eyelids heavy and red,
A woman sat in unwomanly rags,
Plying her needle and thread.
Stitch, stitch, stitch!
In poverty, hunger, and dirt,
And still with a voice of dolorous pitch
She sang "The song of the shirt."

Songs before Sunrise, a volume of poems by Swinburne (1871).

Songs Divine and Moral, by Dr. Isaac Watts (1720).

Songs of Degrees, psalms sung by the Jews on their march home from Babylon after their captivity. They are Pss. cxx. to cxxxiv., and were subsequently used by the priests as they went to the temple for daily service.

Songs of Zion, by James Montgomery (1822).

Sonnambula (La), Ami'na the miller's daughter. She was betrothed to Elvi'no a rich young farmer, but the night before the wedding was discovered in the bed of conte Rodolpho. This very ugly circumstance made the farmer break off the match, and promise marriage to Lisa the innkeeper's daughter. The count now interfered, and assured Elvino that the miller's daughter was a sleep-walker, and while they were still talking she was seen walking on the edge of the mill-roof while the huge mill-wheel was turning rapidly. She then crossed a crazy old bridge, and came into the midst of the assembly, when she woke and ran to the arms of her lover. Elvino, convinced of her innocence, married her, and Lisa was resigned to Alessio whose paramour she was.—Bellini's opera, La Sonnambula (1831).

(Taken from a melodrama by Romani, and adapted as a libretto by Scribe.)

Sonnets of Shakespeare (?), published in 1609. Described in the title-page as "Shakspear's Sonnets never before published." Still the authorship is doubtful.

Sooterkin, a false birth, as when a woman gives birth to a rat, dog, or other monstrosity. This birth is said to be produced by Dutch women, from their sitting over their foot-stoves.

Soper's Lane (London), now called "Queen Street."

Sophi, in Arabic, means "pure," and therefore one of the pure or true faith. As a royal title, it is tantamount to "catholic" or "most Christian."—Selden: Titles of Honour, vi. 76–7 (1614).

SOPHI'A, mother of Rollo and Otto dukes of Normandy. Rollo is the "bloody brother." — Fletcher: The Bloody Brother (1639).

Sophia, wife of Mathias a Bohemian knight. When Mathias went to take service with king Ladislaus of Bohemia, the queen Honoria fell in love with him, and sent Ubaldo and Ricardo to tempt Sophia to infidelity. But immediately Sophia perceived their purpose, she had them confined in separate chambers, and compelled them to earn their living by spinning.

Sophia's Picture. When Mathias left, Sophia gave him a magic picture, which turned yellow if she were tempted, and black if she yielded to the temptation. —Massinger: The Picture (1629).

Sophi'a (St.) or AGIA [Aya] SOFI'A, the most celebrated mosque of Constantinople, once a Christian church, but now a Mohammedan jamih. It is 260 feet long and 230 feet broad. Its dome is supported on pillars of marble, granite, and green jasper, said to have belonged to the temple of Diana at Ephesus.

Sophia's cupola with golden gleam.
Byron: Don Juan, v. 3 (1820).

Sophia (The princess), only child of the old king of Lombardy, in love with Paladore, a Briton, who saved her life by killing a boar which had gored her horse to death. She was unjustly accused of wantonness by duke Birēno, whom the king wished her to marry, but whom she rejected. By the law of Lombardy, this offence was punishable by death, but the accuser was bound to support his charge by single combat, if any champion chose to fight in her defence. Paladore challenged the duke, and slew him. The whole villainy of the charge was then exposed, the character of the princess was cleared, and her marriage with Paladore concludes the play.—Jephson: The Law of Lombardy (1779).

Sophia [FREELOVE], daughter of the Widow Warren by her first husband. She is a lovely, innocent girl, passionately attached to Harry Dornton the banker's son, to whom ultimately she is married. —Holcroft: The Road to Ruin (1792).

Sophia [PRIMROSE], the younger daughter of the vicar of Wakefield, soft, modest, and alluring. Being thrown from her horse into a deep stream, she was rescued by Mr. Burchell, alias sir William Thornhill. Being abducted, she was again rescued by him, and finally married him.—Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield (1766).

Sophia [SPRIGHTLY], a young lady of high spirits and up to fun. Tukely loves her sincerely, and knowing her partiality for the Hon. Mr. Daffodil, exposes him as a "male coquette," of mean spirit and without manly courage; after which she rejects him with scorn, and gives her hand and heart to Tukely. —Garrick: The Male Coquette (1758).

Sophocles, the Greek tragedian. Complete English translations by Potter, 1788; by Dale, 1824; and by Plumptre, 1865.

(Professor d'Arcy Thompson translated the Ajax, and Dr. Donaldson the Antigone, 4 syl.)

Sophocles wrote 120 tragedies, of which only seven are extant, viz. Ajax, Antigŏne (4 syl.), Electra, Œdipus at Colŏnus, Œdipus Tyrannus (his masterpiece), Philoctētes (4 syl.), and Trachiniæ, or The Death of Hercules.

N.B.—Euripĭdēs has also tragedies on Electra and Hercules Furens.

Sophonis'ba, daughter of Asdrubal, and reared to detest Rome. She was affianced to Masinissa king of the Numidians, but was given by her father in marriage to Syphax. Scipio insisted that this marriage should be annulled, but the Numidian sent her a bowl of poison, which she drank without hesitation.

(This subject and that of Cleopatra have furnished more dramas than any other whatsoever. For example, we have in French: J. Mairet, Sophonisbe (1630); Pierre Corneille; Lagrange-Chancel; and Voltaire. In Italian: Trissino (1514); Alfieri (1749–1803). In English: John Marston, The Wonder of Women or The Tragedy of Sophonisba (1605); Thomson, Sophonisba, 1729.)

∴ In Thomson's tragedy occurs the line, "Oh Sophonisba! Sophonisba oh!" which was parodied by "Oh Jemmy Thomson! Jemmy Thomson oh!"

There is a striking resemblance between Sophonisba and Cleopatra: both were beautiful and fascinating; both had married young; both held their conquerors in the bonds of love; both killed themselves to prevent being made Roman captives.

Sophronia, a young lady who was taught Greek, and to hate men who were not scholars. Her wisdom taught her to gauge the wisdom of her suitors, and to discover their shortcomings. She never found one up to the mark, and now she is wrinkled with age, and talks about the "beauties of the mind."—Goldsmith: A Citizen of the World, xxviii. (1759).

Sophronia. (See SOFRONIA, p. 1024.)

Sophros'yne (4 syl.), one of Logistilla's handmaids, noted for her purity. Sophrosÿnē was sent with Andronica to conduct Astolpho safely from India to Arabia.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Sophy, the eldest of a large family. She is engaged to Traddles, and is always spoken of by him as "the dearest girl in the world."—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Sops of [or in] Wine. Deptford pinks are so called.

Sora'no, a Neapolitan noble, brother of Evanthe (3 syl.) "the wife for a month," and the infamous instrument of Frederick the licentious brother of Alphonso king of Naples.—Beaumont and Fletcher: A Wife for a Month (1624).

(Beaumont died 1616.)

Sordello, a Provençal poet, whom Dantē meets in purgatory, sitting apart. On seeing Virgil, Sordello springs forward to embrace him.

(R. Browning has a poem called Sordello, and makes Sordello typical of liberty and human perfectibility.)

Sorel (Agnes), surnamed La dame de Beauté, not from her personal beauty, but from the "château de Beauté," on the banks of the Marne, given to her by Charles VII. (1409–1450).

Sorento (in Naples), the birthplace of Torquato Tasso, the Italian poet.

Sorrows of Werther, a mawkish, sentimental novel by Goethe (1774), once extremely popular. "Werther" is Goethe himself, who loves a married woman, and becomes disgusted with life because "[Char]lotte is the wife of his friend Kestner."

Werther, infusing itself into the core and whole spirit of literature, gave birth to a race of sentimentalists, who raged and wailed in every part of the world till better light dawned on them, or at any rate till exhausted nature laid itself to sleep, and it was discovered that lamenting was an unproductive labour.—Carlyle.

Sosia (in Molière, Sosie), the slave of Amphitryon. When Mercury assumes the form of Sosia, and Jupiter that of Amphitryon, the mistakes and confusion which arise resemble those of the brothers Antiph'olus and their servants the brothers Dromio, in Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors.—Plautus, Molière (1668), and Dryden (1690): Amphitryon.

His first name . . . looks out upon him like another Sosia, or as if a man should suddenly encounter his own duplicate.—C. Lamb.

Sosii, brothers, the name of two booksellers at Rome, referred to by Horace.

So'tenville (Mon. le baron de), father of Angélique, and father-in-law of George Dandin. His wife was of the house of Prudoterie, and both boasted that in 300 years no one of their distinguished lines ever swerved from virtue. "La bravoure n'y est pas plus héréditaire aux mâles, que la chasteté aux familles." They lived with their son-in-law, who was allowed the honour of paying their debts, and receiving a snubbing every time he opened his mouth that he might be taught the mysteries of the haut monde.—Molière: George Dandin (1668).

Soulis (Lord William), a man of prodigious strength, cruelty, avarice, and treachery. Old Redcap gave him a charmed life, which nothing could affect "till threefold ropes of sand were twisted round his body." Lord Soulis waylaid May the lady-love of the heir of Branxholm, and kept her in durance till she promised to become his bride. Walter, the brother of the young heir, raised his father's liegemen and invested the castle. Lord Soulis having fallen into the hands of the liegemen, "they wrapped him in lead, and flung him into a caldron, till lead, bones, and all were melted."—John Leyden (1802).

N.B.—The caldron is still shown in the Skelfhill at Ninestane Rig, part of the range of hills which separates Liddesdale and Teviotdale.

South (Squire), the archduke Charles of Austria.—Arbuthnot: History of John Bull (1712).

South Britain, all the island of Great Britain except Scotland, which is called "North Britain."

South Sea (The), the Pacific Ocean; so called by Vasco Nuñez de Balboa, in 1513. (See MISSISSIPPI BUBBLE, p. 712.)

Southampton (The earl of), the friend of the earl of Essex, and involved with him in the charge of treason, but pardoned.—Jones: The Earl of Essex (1745).

Elizabeth, 44 years 4 months 8 days.

Henry III., 56 years 20 days; Edward III., 50 years 4 months 28 days; George III., 59 years 3 months 4 days; Victoria completed her 60th year's reign June 20, 1897, and is still on the throne (April, 1898.)

Sow (A), a machine of war. It was a wooden shed which went on wheels, the roof being ridged like a hog's back. Being thrust close to the wall of a place besieged, it served to protect the besieging party from the arrows hurled against them from the walls. When the countess of March (called "Black Agnes"), in 1335, saw one of these engines advancing towards her castle, she caned out to the earl of Salisbury, who commanded the engineers—

Beware, Montagow,
For farrow shall thy sow;

and then had such a huge fragment of rock rolled on the engine that it dashed it to pieces. When she saw the English soldiers running away, the countess called out, "Lo! lo! the litter of English pigs!"

Sow of Dallweir, named "Henwen," went burrowing through Wales, and leaving in one place a grain of barley, in another a little pig, a few bees, a grain or two of wheat, and so on, and these made the places celebrated for the particular produce ever after.

 It is supposed that the sow was really a ship, and that the keeper of the sow, named Coll ab Collfrewi, was the captain of the vessel.—Welsh Triads, lvi.

Sowerberry, the parochial undertaker, to whom Oliver Twist is bound when he quits the workhouse. Sowerberry was not a badly disposed man, and he treated Oliver with a certain measure of kindness and consideration; but Oliver was ill-treated by Mrs. Sowerberry, and bullied by a big boy called Noah Claypole. Being one day greatly exasperated by the bully, Oliver gave him a thorough "drubbing," whereupon Charlotte the maidservant set upon him like a fury, scratched his face, and held him fast till Noah Claypole had pummelled him within an inch of his life. Three against one was too much for the lad, so he ran away.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Sowerberry was a tall, gaunt, large-jointed man. Mrs. Sowerberry was a short, thin, squeezed-up woman, with a vixenish countenance.

Sowerberry, a misanthrope.—Brough: A Phenomenon in a Smock Frock.

Sowerbrowst (Mr.), the maltster.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Soyer (Alexis), a celebrated cook, appointed, in 1837, chef de cuisine to the Reform Club. Alexis Soyer [Swi-yea] was the author of several works, as The Gastronomic Regenerator, The Poor Man's Regenerator, The Modern Housewife, etc. (died 1858).

Spado, an impudent rascal in the band of don Cæsar (called "captain Ramirez"), who tricks every one, and delights in mischief.—O'Keefe: Castle of Andalusia (1798).

Quick's great parts were "Isaac," "Tony Lumpkin," "Spado," and "sir Christopher Curry."—Records of a Stage Veteran.

("Isaac," in the Duenna, by Sheridan; "Tony Lumpkin," in She Stoops to Conquer, by Goldsmith; "sir Christopher Curry," in Inkle and Yarico, by G. Colman.)

Spahis, native Algerian cavalry officered by Frenchmen. The infantry are called Turcos.

Spanish Brutus (The), Alfonso Perez de Guzman, governor of Tarifa in 1293. Here he was besieged by the infant don Juan, who had Guzman's son in his power, and threatened to kill him unless Tarifa was given up. Alfonso replied, "Sooner than be guilty of such treason, I will lend Juan a dagger to carry out his threat;" and so saying, he tossed his dagger over the wall. Juan, unable to appreciate this patriotism, slew the young man without remorse.

(Lopê de Vega has dramatized this incident.)

Spanish Curate (The), Lopez.—Fletcher: The Spanish Curate (1622).

Spanish Fryar (The), a drama by Dryden (1680). It contains two plots, wholly independent of each other. The serious element is this: Leonora, the usurping queen of Aragon, is promised in marriage to duke Bertran, a prince of the blood; but is in love with Torrismond general of the army, who turns out to be the son and heir of king Sancho, supposed to be dead. Sancho is restored to his throne, and Leonora marries Torrismond. The comic element is the illicit love of colonel Lorenzo for Elvira, the wife of Gomez a rich old banker. Dominick (the Spanish fryar) helps on this scandalous amour, but it turns out that Lorenzo and Elvira are brother and sister.

Spanish Fury (The), the historical name for the attack upon Antwerp by the Spaniards, November 4, 1576, which resulted in the pillage and burning of the place and a terrible massacre of the inhabitants.

Spanish Gypsy (The), a dramatic poem by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross, 1867).

Spanish Lady (The), a ballad contained in Percy's Reliques, ii. 23. A Spanish lady fell in love with captain Popham, whose prisoner she was. A command being sent to set all the prisoners free, the lady prayed the gallant captain to make her his wife. The Englishman replied that he could not do so, as he was married already. On hearing this, the Spanish lady gave him a chain of gold and a pearl bracelet to take to his wife, and told him that she should retire to a nunnery and spend the rest of her life praying for their happiness.

It will be stuck up with the ballad of Margaret's Ghost [q v.] and the Spanish Lady, against the walls of every cottage in the country.—Bickerstaff: Love in a Village (1763).

Spanish Main (The), the coast along the north part of South America.

A parrot from the Spanish main.
Campbell.

Spanish Student (The), a dramatic poem by Longfellow (1845).

Spanish Tragedy (The), by T. Kyd (1597). Horatio (son of Hieronimo) is murdered while he is sitting in an arbour with Belimperia. Balthazar, the rival of Horatio, commits the murder, assisted by Belimperia's brother Lorenzo. The murderers hang the dead body on a tree in the garden, where Hieronimo, roused by the cries of Belimperia, discovers it, and goes raving mad.

Spanker (Lady Gay), in London Assurance, by D. Boucicault (1841).

Dazzle and lady Gay Spanker "act themselves," and will never be dropped out of the list of acting plays.—Percy Fitzgerald.

Sparabel'la, a shepherdess in love with D'Urfey, but D'Urfey loves Clum'silis, "the fairest shepherd wooed the foulest lass." Sparabella resolves to kill herself; but how? Shall she cut her windpipe with a penknife? "No," she says, "squeaking pigs die so." Shall she suspend herself to a tree? "No," she says, "dogs die in that fashion." Shall she drown herself in the pool? "No," she says, "scolding queans die so." And while in doubt how to kill herself, the sun goes down, and

The prudent maiden deemed it then too late,
And till to-morrow came deferred her fate.
Gay. Pastoral, iii. (1714).

Sparkish, "the prince of coxcombs," a fashionable fool, and "a cuckold before marriage." Sparkish is engaged to Alithea Moody, but introduces to her his friend Harcourt, allows him to make love to her before his face, and, of course, is jilted.—The Country Girl (Garrick, altered from Wycherly's Country Wife, 1675).

William Mountford [1660–1692] flourished in days when the ranting tragedies of Nat Lee and the jingling plays of Dryden . . . held possession of the stage. His most important characters were "Alexander the Great" [by Lee], and "Castalio," in the Orphan [by Otway]. Cibber highly commends his "Sparkish."—Dutton Cook.

Sparkler (Edmund), son of Mrs. Merdle by her first husband. He married Fanny, sister of Little Dorrit. Edmund Sparkler was a very large man, called in his own regiment, "Quinbus Flestrin, junior, or the Young Man-Mountain."

Mrs. Sparkler, Edmund's wife. She was very pretty, very self-willed, and snubbed her husband in most approved fashion.—Dickens: Little Dorrit (1857).

Sparsit (Mrs.), housekeeper to Josiah Bounderby, banker and mill-owner at Coketown. Mrs. Sparsit is a "highly connected lady," being the great-niece of lady Scadgers. She had a "Corfolanian nose, and dense black eyebrows," was much believed in by her master, who, when he married, made her "keeper of the bank." Mrs. Sparsit, in collusion with the light porter Bitzer, then acted the spy on Mr. Bounderby and his young wife.—Dickens: Hard Times (1854).

Spartan Broth, sorry fare.

The promoters would be reduced to dine on Spartan broth in Leicester Square.—Daily News, February 25, 1879.

Spartan Dog (A), a bloodhound.

O Spartan dog!
More fell than anguish, hunger, or the sea!
Shakespeare: Othello, act v. sc. 2 (1611).

Spartan Mother (The), said to her son going to battle, as she handed him his shield, "My son, return with this or on it," i.e. come back with it as a conqueror or be brought back on it as one slain in fight; but by no means be a fugitive or suffer the enemy to be the victorious party.

Why should I not play
The Spartan mother?
Tennyson: The Princess, ii.

Spasmodic School (The), certain authors of the nineteenth century, whose writings abound in spasmodic phrases, startling expressions, and words used out of their common acceptation. Carlyle, noted for his Germanic English, is the chief of this school. Others are Bailey author of Festus, Sydney Dobell, Gilfillan, and Alexander Smith.

(Professor Aytoun gibbeted this class of writers in his Firmilian, a Spasmodic Tragedy, 1854.)

Spear. When a king of the ancient Caledonians abdicated, he gave his spear to his successor, and "raised a stone on high" as a record to future generations. Beneath the stone he placed a sword in the earth and "one bright boss from his shield."

When thou, O stone, shalt moulder down and lose thee in the moss of years, then shall the traveller come, and whistling pass away. . . . Here Fingal resigned his spear, after the last of his fields.—Ossian: Temora, viii.

The Forward Spear, a sign of hostility. In the Ossianic times, when a stranger landed on a coast, if he held the point of his spear forwards, it indicated hostile intentions; but if he held the point behind him, it was a token that he came as a friend.

"Are his heroes many?" said Cairbar; "and lifts he the spear of battle, or comes the king in peace?" "In peace he comes not, king of Erin. I have seen his forward spear."—Ossian: Temora, i.

Spear of Achillês. Telêphos, son-in-law of Priam, opposed the Greeks in their voyage to Troy. A severe contest ensued, and Achillês with his spear wounded the Mysian king severely. He was told by an oracle that the wound could be cured only by the instrument which gave it; so he sent to Achillês to effect his cure. The surly Greek replied he was no physician, and would have dismissed the messengers with scant courtesy, but Ulysses whispered in his ear that the aid of Telephos was required to direct them on their way to Troy. Achillês now scraped some rust from his spear, which, being applied to the wound, healed it. This so conciliated Telephos that he conducted the fleet to Troy, and even took part in the war against his father-in-law.

Achillês' and his father's javelin caused
Pain first, and then the boon of health restored.
Dante: Hell, xxxi. (1300).

And other folk have wondered on . . . Achillês' . . . spere,
For he couthe with it bothe heale and dere.
Chaucer; Canterbury Tales ("The Squire's Tale," 1388).

Whose smile and frown, like to Achillês' spear,
Is able with the change to kill and cure.
Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI. act v. sc. 1 (1591).

 Probably Telephos was cured by the plant called Achillêa (milfoil or yarrow), still used in medicine as a tonic. "The leaves were at one time much used for healing wounds, and are still employed for this purpose in Scotland, Germany, France, and other countries." Achillês (the man) made the wound, achillês (the plant) healed it.

Milfoil is called Achilea from Achillês, who was taught botany by Chiron. Linnæus recommends it as a most excellent vulnerary and stiptic.

Spears of Spyinghow (The Three), in the troop of Fitzurse.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Spectator (The), a series of essays, edited by Addison, from March, 1711, to December, 1712 (555 numbers). Resumed in 1714, Pope contributed his Messiah to one of the series. Sir Roger de Coverley and Will Honeycomb are excellent characters introduced.

The Spectator is a gentleman brought up at the university, who has travelled, and finally settles in London. He goes about with his eyes open, and tells us about the theatres, about Wills, about Child, and about St. James. He takes sir Roger about, and thus furnishes a number of other excellent essays. Will Honeycomb marries, reforms, and dies, and the curtain falls.

Speech ascribed to Dumb Animals—

(1) AL BORAK, the animal which conveyed Mahomet to the seventh heaven. He not only spoke good Arabic, but had also a human face.

(2) ARION, the wonderful horse which Herculês gave to Adrastos. It not only spoke good Greek, but both his near feet were those of a man.

(3) BALAAM'S ASS spoke Hebrew to Balaam on one occasion.—Numb. xxii.

(4) The BLACK PIGEONS, one of which gave the responses in the temple of Ammon, and the other in Dodôna.—Classic Story.

(5) The BULBUL-HEZAR, which had not only human speech, but was oracular also.—Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters").

(6) COMRADE, Fortunio's horse, spoke with the voice of a man.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Fortunio").

(7) The little GREEN BIRD, which Fairstar obtained possession of, not only answered in words any questions asked it, but was also prophetic and oracular.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Chery and Fairstar").

(8) KATMÎR, the dog of the Seven Sleepers, spoke Greek.—Al Korân, xviii.

(9) SÂLEH'S CAMEL used to go about crying, in good Arabic, "Ho! every one that wanteth milk, let him come, and I will give it him."—Sale: Al Korân, vii. notes).

(10) The SERPENT which tempted Eve to eat of the forbidden fruit.—Gen. iii.

(11) TEMLIHA, the king of serpents, had the gift of human speech.—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("History of Aboutaleb").

(12) XANTHOS, one of the horses of Achillês, announced to the hero, in good Greek, his approaching death.—Classic Fable.

N.B.—Frithjof's ship, Ellida, could not speak, but it understood what was said to it (p. 999). (See TEMLIHA.)

Speech given to Conceal Thought. La parole a été donnée à l'homme pour déguiser la penser or pour l'aider à cacher sa pensée. Talleyrand is usually credited with this sentence, but captain Gronow, in his Recollections and Anecdotes, asserts that the words were those of count Montrond, a wit and poet, called "the most agreeable scoundrel and most pleasant reprobate in the court of Marie Antoinette."

¶ Voltaire, in Le Chapon et la Poularde, says, "Ils n'employent les paroles que pour déguiser leurs pensées."

¶ Goldsmith, in The Bee, iii. (October 20, 1759), has borrowed the same thought: "The true use of speech is not so much to express our wants as to conceal them."

Speech-Makers (Bad).

ADDISON could not make a speech. He attempted once in the House of Commons, and said, "Mr. Speaker, I conceive—I conceive, sir—sir, I conceive——" Whereupon a member exclaimed, "The right honourable secretary of state has conceived thrice, and brought forth nothing."

CAMPBELL (Thomas) once tried to make a speech, but so stuttered and stammered that the whole table was convulsed with laughter.

CICERO, the great orator, never got over his nervous terror till he warmed to his subject.

IRVING (Washington), even with a speech written out and laid before him, could not deliver it without a breakdown. In fact, he could hardly utter a word in public without trembling.

MOORE (Thomas) could never make a speech.

(Dickens and prince Albert always spoke well and fluently.)

Speed, an inveterate punster and the clownish servant of Valentine one of the two "gentlemen of Verona."—Shakespeare: The Two Gentlemen of Verona (1594).

Speed the Parting Guest.

Welcome the coming, speed the parting guest.
Pope: Homer's Odyssey (1725).

Speed the Plough, a comedy by Thomas Morton (1798). Farmer Ashfield brings up a boy named Henry, greatly beloved by every one. This Henry is in reality the son of "Morrington," younger brother of sir Philip Blandford. The two brothers fixed their love on the same lady, but the younger married her. Whereupon sir Philip stabbed him to the heart and fully thought him to be dead; but after twenty years the wounded man reappeared and claimed his son. Henry marries his cousin Emma Blandford; and the farmer's daughter, Susan, marries Robert only son of sir Abel Handy.

Spenlow (Mr.), father of Dora (q.v.). He was a proctor, to whom David Copperfield was articled. Mr. Spenlow was killed in a carriage accident.

Misses Lavinia and Clarissa Spenlow, two spinster aunts of Dora Spenlow, with whom she lived at the death of her father.

They were not unlike birds altogether, having a sharp, brisk, sudden manner, and a little, short, spruce way of adjusting themselves, like canaries.—Dickens: David Copperfield, xli. (1849).

Spens (Sir Patrick), a Scotch hero, sent in the winter-time on a mission to Norway. His ship, in its home passage, was wrecked against the Papa Stronsay, and every one on board was lost. The incident has furnished the subject of a famous old Scotch ballad.

Spenser of English Prose-Writers (The), Jeremy Taylor (1613–1667).

From Spenser to Flecknoe, that is, from the top to the bottom of all poetry; from the sublime to the ridiculous.—Dryden: Comment on Spenser, etc.

Spenser's Monument, in Westminster Abbey, was erected by Anne Clifford countess of Dorset.

Spider. Bruce and the Spider. (See BRUCE, p. 153.)

Spider and the Flie (The), an allegory, in seven-line stanzas, of the contention of the protestants (spiders) and the flies (catholics) (1556). (See THE HIND AND THE PANTHER, by Dryden (1687), p. 492.)

Spider Cure for Fever (A).

Only beware of the fever, my friends, beware of the fever,
For it is not, like that of our cold Acadian climate,
Cured by the wearing a spider hung round one's neck in a nutshell.
Longfellow: Evangeline, ii. 3 (1849).

Spider's Net (A). When Mahomet fled from Mecca, he hid in a cave, and a spider wove its net over the entrance. When the Koreishites came thither, they passed on, being fully persuaded that no one had entered the cave, because the cobweb was not broken.

¶ In the Talmud, we are told that David, in his flight, hid himself in the cave of Adullam, and a spider spun its net over the opening. When Saul came up and saw the cobweb, he passed on, under the same persuasion.

Spiders (Unlucky to kill). This especially refers to those small spiders called "money-spinners," which prognosticate good luck. Probably because they appear in greater numbers on a fine morning; although some say the fine day is the precursor of rain.

Spynners ben token of divynation, and of knowing what wether shal fal, for oft by weders that shal fal some spin and weve higher and lower, and multytude of spynners ever betoken moche reyne.—Berthelot: De Proprietatibus Rerum, xviii. 314 (1536).

Spiders Indicators of Gold. In the sixteenth century it was generally said that "Spiders be true signs of great stores of gold;" and the proverb arose thus: While a passage to Cathay was being sought by the north-west, a man brought home a stone, which was pronounced to be gold, and caused such a ferment that several vessels were fitted out for the express purpose of collecting cold. Frobisher, in 1577, found, in one of the islands on which he landed, similar stones, and an enormous quantity of spiders.

Spidireen (The). If a sailor is asked to what ship he belongs, and does not choose to tell, he says, "The spidireen frigate with nine decks."

¶ Officers who do not choose to tell their quarters, give B.K.S. as their address, i.e. BarracKS.

Spindle (Jack), the son of a man of fortune. Having wasted his money in riotous living, he went to a friend to borrow £100. "Let me see, you want £100, Mr. Spindle; let me see, would not £50 do for the present?" "Well," said Jack, "if you have not £100, I must be contented with £50." "Dear me, Mr. Spindle!" said the friend, "I find I have but £20 about me." "Never mind," said Jack, "I must borrow the other £30 of some other friend." "Just so, Mr. Spindle, just so. By-the-by, would it not be far better to borrow the whole of that friend, and then one note of hand will serve for the whole sum? Good morning, Mr. Spindle; delighted to see you! Tom, see the gentleman down."—Goldsmith: The Bee, iii. (1759).

Spirit of the Age (The), a series of criticisms on the "Men of the time," by Hazlitt (1825).

Spirit of the Cape (The), Adamastor, a hideous phantom, of unearthly pallor, "erect his hair uprose of withered red," his lips were black, his teeth blue and disjointed, his beard haggard, his face scarred by lightning, his eyes "shot livid fire," his voice roared. The sailors trembled at the sight of him, and the fiend demanded how they dared to trespass "where never hero braved his rage before?" He then told them "that every year the shipwrecked should be made to deplore their foolhardiness." According to Barreto, the "Spirit of the Cape" was one of the giants who stormed heaven.—Camoëns: The Lusiad (1572).

In me the Spirit of the Cape behold . . .
That rock by you the "Cape of Tempests" named . .
With wide-stretched piles I guard . . .
Great Adamastor is my dreaded name.
Canto v.

Spirit of the Mountain (The), that peculiar melancholy sound which precedes a heavy storm, very observable in hilly and mountainous countries.

The wind was abroad in the oaks. The Spirit of the Mountain roared. The blast came rustling through the hall.—Ossian: Dar-Thula.

Spiri'to, the Holy Ghost as the friend of man, personified in canto ix. of The Purple Island, by Phineas Fletcher (1633). He was married to Urania, and their offspring are: Knowledge, Contemplation, Care, Humility, Obedience, Faith or Fido, Penitence, Elpi'nus or Hope, and Love the foster-son of Gratitude. (Latin, spiritus, "spirit.")

Spitfire (Will), or WILL SPITTAL, serving-boy of Roger Wildrake the dissipated royalist.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Spittle Cure for Blindness. Spittle was once deemed a sovereign remedy for ophthalmia.—Pliny: Natural History, xxviii. 7.

¶ The blind man restored to sight by Vespasian was cured by anointing his eyes with spittle.—Tacitus: History, iv. 81; Suetonius: Vespasian, vii.

When [Jesus] had thus spoken, He spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and He anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay.—John ix. 6.

He cometh to Bethsaida; and they bring a blind man unto Him, . . . and He took the blind man by the hand, and . . . when He had spit on his eyes . . He asked him if he saw ought.—Mark viii. 22, 23.

Splendid Shilling (The), a poem in imitation of Milton's style, by John Philips (1703). (Good.) It begins thus—

Happy the man who, void of care and strife,
In silken or in leathern purse retains
A splendid shilling. He nor heart with pain
New oysters cried, nor sighs for cheerful ale.

Sponge. To throw up the sponge, to give up the contest and confess yourself beaten.

Finally, he went on his knees to the sponge and threw it up; at the same time pointing out—"That means you have won."—Dickens: Great Expectations, ch. xl. (1860).

Spontaneous Combustion. There are above thirty cases on record of death by spontaneous combustion, the most famous being that of the countess Cornelia di Baudi Cesenatê, which was minutely investigated, in 1731, by Guiseppê Bianchini, a prebend of Verona.

The next most noted instance occurred at Rheims, in 1725, and is authenticated by no less an authority than Mons. Le Cat, the celebrated physician.

In 1772 Mary Cloes of Gosford Street was burnt to death by "spontaneous combustion."—History of Coventry.

Messrs. Foderé and Mere investigated the subject of spontaneous combustion, and gave it as their fixed opinion that instances of death from such a cause cannot be doubted.

In vol. vi. of the Philosophical Transactions, and in the English Medical Jurisprudence, the subject is carefully investigated, and several examples are cited in confirmation of the fact.

Joseph Battaglia, a surgeon of Ponte Bosio, gives in detail the case of don G. Maria Bertholi, a priest of mount Valerius. While reading his breviary, the body of this priest burst into flames in several parts, as the arms, back, and head. The sleeves of his shirt, a handkerchief, and his skull-cap were all more or less consumed. He survived the injury four days. (This seems to me more like an electrical attack than an instance of spontaneous combustion.)

(See the Annual Register for 1775, p. 78.)

(Dickens, in Bleak House, ascribes the death of Krook to "spontaneous combustion." Zola, in Dr. Pascal, ch. ix., gives another instance. Captain Marryat tells us, in Jacob Faithful, that Jacob's mother was burnt to a cinder by the same means.)

Spontoon, the old confidential servant of colonel Talbot.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Spoon. One needs a long spoon to eat with the devil.—Old Proverb.

Therefore behoveth him a ful long spoon
That shall ete with a fend.
Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, 10,916 (The "Squire's Tale," 1388).

Spoons (Gossip). It was customary at one time for sponsors at christenings to give gilt spoons as an offering to their godchild. These spoons had on the handle the figure of one of the apostles or evangelists, and hence were called "Apostle spoons." The wealthy would give the twelve apostles, those of less opulence the four evangelists, and others again a single spoon. When Henry VIII. asks Cranmer to be godfather to "a fair young maid," Cranmer replies, "How may I deserve such honour, that am a poor and humble subject?" The king rejoins, "Come, come, my lord, you'd spare your spoons."—Shakespeare: Henry VIII. act v. sc. 2 (1601).

Sporus. Under this name, Pope satirized lord John Hervey (1696-1743), generally called "lord Fanny," from his effeminate habits and appearance. He was "half wit, half fool, half man, half beau." Lord John Hervey was vice-chamberlain in 1736, and lord privy seal in 1740.

That thing of silk,
Sporus, that mere white curd of asses' milk;
Satire or sense, alas! can Sporus feel,
Who breaks a butterfly upon a wheel?
Pope: Prologue to the Satires (1734).

 This lord John Hervey married the beautiful Molly Lapel; hence Pope says—

So perfect a beau and a belle
As when Hervey the handsome was wedded
To the beautiful Molly Lapel.

Spout (speaking). (See DERRY-DOWN TRIANGLE, p. 272.)

S. P. Q. R., the Romans. The letters are the initials of Senatus Populus-Que Romanus (see p. 943).

New blood must be pumped into the veins and arteries of the S. P. Q. R.—Sala (Belgravia, April, 1871).

Spracking (Joseph), a money-lender and a self-made man.

Thomas Spracking, his brother, and equal in roguery. — Wybert Reeve: Parted.

Sprat Day, November 9, the first day of sprat-selling in the streets. The season lasts about ten weeks.

Sprenger (Louis), Annette Veilchen's bachelor.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Sprig of Shillelah (The), a famous Irish song, author uncertain. The first verse is—

Och! love is the soul of a nate Irishman,
He loves all the lovely, loves all that he can,
With his sprig of shillelah and shamrock so green.
His heart is good-humoured—'tis honest and sound,
No malice nor hatred is there to be found;
He courts and he marries, he drinks and he fights,
For love, all for love, for in that he delights,
With his sprig of shillelah and shamrock so green.
(And three other stanzas.)

Sprightly (Miss Kitty), the ward of sir Gilbert Pumpkin of Strawberry Hall. Miss Kitty is a great heiress, but stage-struck; and when captain Charles Stanley is introduced, she falls in love with him, first as a "play actor," and then in reality. —Jackman: All the World's a Stage.

Spring. (See SEASONS, p. 975.)
(Mrs. Barbauld wrote an Ode to Spring, in imitation of Collins's Ode to Evening.)

Spring (A Sacred). The ancient Sabines, in times of great national danger, vowed to the gods "a sacred spring" (ver sacrum), if they would remove the danger. That is, all the children born during the next spring were "held sacred," and at the age of 20 were compelled to leave their country and seek for themselves a new home.

Spring-Heel Jack. The marquis of Waterford, in the early parts of the nineteenth century, used to amuse himself by springing on travellers unawares, to terrify them; and from time to time others have followed his silly example. Even so late as 1877–8, an officer in her majesty's service caused much excitement in the garrisons stationed at Aldershot, Colchester, and elsewhere, by his "spring-heel" pranks. In Chichester and its neighbourhood the tales told of this adventurer caused quite a little panic, and many nervous people were afraid to venture out after sunset, for fear of being "sprung" upon. I myself investigated some of the cases reported to me, but found them for the most part Fakenham ghost tales.

Springer (The). Ludwig Margrave of Thuringia was so called, because he escaped from Giebichenstein, in the eleventh century, by leaping over the river Saale.

Sprinklers (Holy Water), Danish clubs, with spiked balls fastened to chains.

Spruce, M.C. (Captain), in Lend Me Five Shillings, by J. M. Morton (1764–1838).

Spruch-Sprecher (The) or "sayer of sayings" to the archduke of Austria. —Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Spuma'dor, prince Arthur's horse. So called from the foam of its mouth, which indicated its fiery temper. —Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. (1590).
∴ In the Mabinogion, his favourite mare is called Llamrei ("the curveter").

Spurs (The Battle of), the battle of Guinnegate, in 1513, between Henry VIII. and the duc de Longueville. So called because the French used their spurs in flight more than their swords in fight. (See SPURS OF GOLD, etc.)

Spurs (To dish up the), to give one's guests a hint to go; to maunder on when the orator has nothing of importance to say. During the time of the border feuds, when a great family had come to an end of their provisions, the lady of the house sent to table a dish of spurs, as a hint that the guests must spur their horses on for fresh raids before they could be feasted again.

When the last bullock was killed and devoured, it was the lady's custom to place on the table a dish which, on being uncovered, was found to contain a pair of clean spurs—a hint to the riders that they must shift for the next meal.—Border Minstrelsy (new edit.), i. 211 note.

Spurs of Gold (Battle of the), the battle of Courtray, the most memorable in Flemish history (July 11, 1302). Here the French were utterly routed, and 700 gold spurs were hung as trophies in the church of Notre Dame de Courtray. It is called in French Journée des Eperons d'Or. (See SPURS, THE BATTLE OF.)

Marching homeward from the bloody battle of th Spurs of Gold.
Longfellow: The Belfry of Bruges.

Spy (The), a tale by J. Fenimore Cooper (1821).

Squab (The Poet). Dryden was so called by lord Rochester (1681–1701).

Squab Pie, a pie made of mutton, apples, and onions.

Cornwall squab pie, and Devon white-pot brings,
And Leicester beans and bacon fit for kings.
King: Art of Cookery.

Squab Pie, a pie made of squabs, that is, young pigeons.

Square (Mr.), a "philosopher," in Fielding's novel called The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling (1749).

Squeers (Mr. Wackford), of Dotheboys Hall, Yorkshire, a vulgar, conceited, ignorant schoolmaster, overbearing, grasping, and mean. He steals the boys' pocket money, clothes his son in their best suits, half starves them, and teaches them next to nothing. Ultimately, he is transported for purloining a deed.

Mrs. Squeers, wife of Mr. Wackford, a raw-boned, harsh, heartless virago, without one spark of womanly feeling for the boys put under her charge.

Miss Fanny Squeers, daughter of the schoolmaster, "not tall like her mother, but short like her father. From the former she inherited a voice of hoarse quality, and from the latter a remarkable expression of the right eye." Miss Fanny falls in love with Nicholas Nickleby, but hates him and spites him because he is insensible of the soft impeachment.

Master Wackford Squeers, son of the schoolmaster, a spoilt boy, who was dressed in the best clothes of the scholars. He was overbearing, self-willed, and passionate.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

The person who suggested the character of Squeers was a Mr. Shaw of Bowes. He married a Miss Laidman. The satire ruined the school, and was the death both of Mr. and Mrs. Shaw.—Notes and Queries, October 25, 1873.

Squeeze (Miss), a pawnbroker's daughter. Her father had early taught her that money is the "one thing needful," and at death left her a moderate competence. She was so fully convinced of the value of money, that she would never part with a farthing without an equivalent, and refused several offers, because she felt persuaded her suitors sought her money and not herself. Now she is old and ill-natured, marked with the small-pox, and neglected by every one.—Goldsmith: A Citizen of the World, xxxviii. (1759).

Squint (Lawyer), the great politician of society. He makes speeches for members of parliament, writes addresses, gives the history of every new play, and finds "seasonable thought" upon every possible subject.—Goldsmith: A Citizen of the World, xxix. (1759).

Squint-Eyed, [Guercino] Gian-Francesco Barbieri, the painter (1590-1666).

Squintum (Dr.). George Whitefield is so called by Foote in his farce entitled The Minor (1714-1770).

Squintum (Dr.). The Rev. Edward Irving, who had an obliquity of the eyes, was so called by Theodore Hook (1792-1834).

Squire of Dames (The), a young knight, in love with Col'umbell, who appointed him a year's service before she would consent to become his bride. The "squire" was to travel for twelve months, to rescue distressed ladies, and bring pledges of his exploits to Columbell. At the end of the year he placed 300 pledges in her hands, but instead of rewarding him by becoming his bride, she set him another task, viz. to travel about the world on foot, and not present himself again till he could bring her pledges from 300 damsels that they would live in chastity all their life. The squire told Columbell that in three years he had found only three persons who would take the pledge, and only one of these, he said (a rustic cottager), took it from a "principle of virtue;" the other two (a nun and a courtezan) promised to do so, but did not voluntarily join the "virgin martyrs." The "Squire of Dames" turned out to be Britomart.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 7, stanza 51 (1590).

(This story is imitated from "The Host's Tale," in Orlando Furioso, xxviii.)

Squire's Tale (The), in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, is the tale about Cambuscan and Algarsife (3 syl.). (See CAMBUSCAN, p. 172.)

Squirt, the apothecary's boy, in Garth's Dispensary; hence any apprentice lad or errand-boy.

Here sauntering 'prentices o'er Otway weep,
O'er Congreve smile, or over D'Urfey sleep,
Pleased sempstresses the Lock's famed Rape unfold,
And Squirts read Garth till apozems grow cold.
Gay: Trivia (1712).

(Pope wrote The Rape of the Lock, 1712.)

Squod (Phil), a grotesque little fellow, faithfully attached to Mr. George the son of Mrs. Rouncewell (housekeeper at Chesney Wold). George had rescued the little street arab from the gutter, and the boy lived at George's "Shooting Gallery" in Leicester Square (London). Phil was remarkable for limping along sideways, as if "tacking."—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

S. S., souvenance, forget-me-not; in remembrance; a souvenir.

On the Wednesday preceding Easter Day, 1465, sir Anthony was speaking to his royal sister, on his knees, all the ladies of the court gathered round him, and bound to his left knee a band of gold, adorned with stones fashioned into the letters S. S. (souvenance or remembrance), and to this band was suspended an enamelled "forget-me-not."—Lytton: Last of the Barons, iv. 5 (1849).

S. S. G. G., the letters of the Femgerichte. They stand for Stock, Stein, Gras, Grein ("Stick," "Stone," "Grass," "Groan"). What was meant by these four words is not known.

Staël (Madame de), called by Heine [Hi-ne] "a whirlwind in petticoats," and a "sultana of mind."

Stag (The) symbolizes Christ, because (according to fable) it draws serpents by its breath out of their holes, and then tramples them to death.—Pliny: Natural History, viii. 50.

Stag or Hind, emblem of the tribe of Naphtali. In the old church at Totness is a stone pulpit divided into compartments, containing shields bearing the emblems of the Jewish tribes, this being one.

Naphtali is a hind let loose.—Gen. xlix. 21.

Stag's Horn, considered in Spain a safeguard against the evil eye; hence, a small horn, silver-tipped, is often hung on the neck of a child. If an evil eye is then cast on the child, it enters the horn, which it bursts asunder.

Are you not afraid of the evil eye?
Have you a stag's horn with you?
Longfellow: The Spanish Student, iii. 5.

Stagg (Benjamin), the proprietor of the cellar in the Barbican where the secret society of "'Prentice Knights" used to convene. He was a blind man, who fawned on Mr. Sim Tappertit, "the 'prentices' glory" and captain of the "'Prentice Knights." But there was a disparity between his words and sentiments, if we may judge from this specimen: "Good night, most noble captain! farewell, brave general! bye-bye, illustrious commander!—a conceited, bragging, empty-headed, duck-legged idiot!" Benjamin Stagg was shot by the soldiery in the Gordon riots.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Stagirite (3 syl.). Aristotle is called the Stagirite because he was born at Stagira, in Macedon. Almost all our English poets call the word Stagi'rite: as Pope, Thomson, Swift, Byron, Wordsworth, B. Browning, etc.; but it should be Stagi'rite (Σταγειρίτης).

Thick like a glory round the Stagyrita,
Your rivals throng, the sages.
R. Browning: Paracelsus, i.

All the wisdom of the Stagirite.
Wordsworth.

Plato, the Stagyrite, and Tully joined.
Thomson.

As if the Stagirite o'erlooked the line.
Pope.

Is rightly censured by the Stagirite,
Who says his numbers do not fadge aright.
Swift: To Dr. Sheridan (1718).

Stagirius, a young monk to whom St. Chrysostom addressed three books, and of whom those books give an account. Matthew Arnold has a prayer in verse supposed to be uttered by Stagirius.

Stamboul (2 syl.), Constantinople.

And Stamboul's minarets must greet my sight.
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Stammerer (The), Louis II. of France, le Bégue (846, 877–879).

Michael II. emperor of the East (*, 820–829).

Notker or Notger of St. Gall (830–912).

Stanchells, head jailer at the Glasgow tolbooth.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Standard. A substantial building for water supplies, as the Water Standard of Cornhill, the Standard in Cheap, opposite Honey Lane, "which John Wells, grocer, caused to be made [? rebuilt] in his mayoralty, 1430."—Stow: Survey ("Cheapside").

The Cheapside Standard. This Standard was in existence in the reign of Edward I. In the reign of Edward III. two fishmongers were beheaded at the Cheapside Standard, for aiding in a riot. Henry IV. caused "the blank charter of Richard II." to be burnt at this place.

The Standard, Cornhill. This was a conduit with four spouts, made by Peter Morris, a German, in 1582, and supplied with Thames water, conveyed by leaden pipes over the steeple of St. Magnus's Church. It stood at the east end of Cornhill, at its junction with Gracechurch Street, Bishopsgate Street, and Leadenhall Street. The water ceased to run between 1598 and 1603, but the Standard itself remained long after. Distances from London were measured from this spot.

In the year 1775 there stood upon the borders of Epping Forest, at a distance of about twelve miles from London, measuring from the Standard in Cornhill, or rather from the spot on which the Standard used to be, a house of public entertainment called the Maypole.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge, i. (1841).

Standard (The Battle of the), the battle of Luton Moor, near Northallerton, between the English and the Scotch, in 1138. So called from the "standard," which was raised on a waggon, and placed in the centre of the English army. The pole displayed the standards of St. Cuthbert of Durham, St. Peter of York, St. John of Beverley, and St. Wilfred of Ripon, surmounted by a little silver casket containing a consecrated wafer.—Hailes: Annals of Scotland, i. 85 (1779).

The Battle of the Standard was so called from the banner of St. Cuthbert, which was thought always to secure success. It came forth at the battle of Nevil's Cross, and was again victorious. It was preserved with great reverence till the Reformation, when, in 1549, Catharine Whittingham (a French lady), wife of the dean of Durham, burnt it out of zeal against popery.—Miss Yonge: Cameos of English History, 126–8 (1868).

Standards. (See FLAGS, p. 371.)

Standing (To die). Vespasian said, "An emperor of Rome ought to die standing." Louis XVIII. of France said, "A king of France ought to die standing." This craze is not confined to crowned heads. (See SOLOMON, p. 1026.)

¶ The doge Nicolo, in 1667, died standing, repeating the act of Vespasian, "Stando excessit, ne videretur impulsus cadĕre."—Pilatius: Fasti Ducales, 289.

Standish (Miles), the Puritan captain, was short of stature, strongly built, broad in the shoulders, deep-chested, and with sinews like iron. His daughter Rose was the first to die "of all who came in the Mayflower." Miles Standish, being desirous to marry Priscilla "the beautiful puritan," sent young Alden to plead his cause; but the maiden answered archly, "Why don't you speak for yourself, John?" Soon after this, Standish was shot with a poisoned arrow, and reported to be dead. John Alden did speak for himself, and prevailed.—Longfellow: Courtship of Miles Standish (1858).

If you would be served you must serve yourself; and moreover
No man can gather cherries in Kent at the season of Christmas.
Longfellow: Courtship of Miles Standish, ix. (1858).

Standish (Mr. Justice), a brother magistrate with Bailie Trumbull.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Stanley, in the earl of Sussex's train.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Stanley (Captain Charles), introduced by his friend captain Stukely to the family at Strawberry Hall. Here he meets Miss Kitty Sprightly an heiress, who has a theatrical twist. The captain makes love to her under the mask of acting, induces her to run off with him and get married, then, returning to the hall, introduces her as his wife. All the family fancy he is only "acting," but discover too late that their "play" is a lifelong reality.—Jackman: All the World's a Stage.

Stanley Crest (The). On a chapeau gu. an eagle feeding on an infant in its nest. The legend is that sir Thomas de Lathom, having no male issue, was walking with his wife one day, and heard the cries of an infant in an eagle's nest. They looked on the child as a gift from God, and adopted it, and it became the founder of the Stanley race (time, Edward III.).

Staples (Lawrence), head jailer at Kenilworth Castle.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Star Falling. Any wish formed during the shoot of a star will come to pass.

Star of Arcady (The), the Great Bear; so called from Calisto, daughter of Lycāon king of Arcadia. The Little Bear is called the Tyrian Cynosure, from Arcas or Cynosūra son of Calisto.

And thou shalt be our star of Arcady,
Or Tyrian Cynosure (3 syl.).
Milton: Comus, 342 (1634).

(Of course, "Cynosure" signifies "dog's tail," Greek, kunos oura, meaning the star in Ursa Minor.)

Star of South Africa, a diamond discovered in the South African fields. It weighed in the rough 83½ carats; and after being cut 46½ carats.

Star of the South (The), the second largest cut diamond in the world. It weighs 254 carats. It was discovered in Brazil by a poor negress (1853).

Starch (Dr.), the tutor of Blushington.—Moncrieff: The Bashful Man (1857).

Starchat'erus, of Sweden, a giant in stature and strength, whose life was protracted to thrice the ordinary term. When he felt himself growing old, he hung a bag of gold round his neck, and told Olo he might take the bag of gold if he would cut off his head, and he did so. He hated luxury in every form, and said a man was a fool who went and dined out for the sake of better fare. One day, Helgo king of Norway asked him to be his champion in a contest which was to be decided by himself alone against nine adversaries. Starchaterus selected for the site of combat the top of a mountain covered with snow, and, throwing off his clothes, waited for the nine adversaries. When asked if he would fight with them one by one or all together, he replied, "When dogs bark at me, I drive them off all at once."—Joannes Magnus: Gothorum Suevorumque Historia (1554).

Stareleigh (Justice), a stout, pudgy little judge, very deaf, and very irascible, who, in the absence of the chief justice, sat in judgment on the trial of "Bardell v. Pickwick."—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Starno, king of Lochlin. Having been conquered by Fingal and generously set at liberty, he promised Fingal his daughter Agandecca in marriage, but meant to deal treacherously by him and kill him. Fingal accepted the invitation of Starno, and spent three days in boar-hunts. He was then warned by Agandecca to beware of her father, who had set an ambuscade to waylay him. Fingal, being forewarned, fell on the ambush and slew every man. When Starno heard thereof, he slew his daughter, whereupon Fingal and his followers took to arms, and Starno either "fled or died." Swaran succeeded his father Starno.—Ossian: Fingal, iii.; see also Cath-Loda.

Star-spangled Banner (The), a national song of the United States of America, by F. S. Key.

And the star-spangled banner, oh, long may it wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave!

Starvation Dundas, Henry Dundas the first lord Melville. So called because he introduced the word starvation into the language (1775).

Starveling (Robin), the tailor. He was cast for the part of "Thisbe's mother," in the drama played before duke Theseus (2 syl.) on "his wedding day at night." Starveling has nothing to say in the drama. — Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

State, a royal chair with a canopy over it.

Our hostess keeps her state.
Shakespeare: Macbeth, act iii. sc. 4 (1606)

Stati'ra, the heroine of La Calprenède's romance of Cassandra. Statira is the daughter of Darius, and is represented as the "most perfect of the works of creation." Oroondatês is in love with her, and ultimately marries her.

Stati'ra, daughter of Dari'us, and wife of Alexander. Young, beautiful, womanly, of strong affection, noble bearing, mild yet haughty, yielding yet brave. Her love for Alexander was unbounded. When her royal husband took Roxana into favour, the proud spirit of the princess was indignant, but Alexander, by his love, won her back again. Statira was murdered by Roxana the Bactrian, called the "Rival Queen."—Lee: Alexander the Great (1678).

Miss Boutwell was the original "Statira" of Lee's Alexander, and once, when playing with Mrs. Barry [1678] she was in danger of receiving on the stage her death-blow. It happened thus: Before the curtain drew up, the two queens, "Statira" and "Roxana" had a real rivalship about a lace veil, allotted to Miss Boutwell by the manager. This so enraged Mrs. Barry that, in "stabbing 'Statira,'" she actually thrust her dagger through her rival's stays, a quarter of an inch or more into the flesh.—Campbell: Life of Mrs. Siddons.

 Dr. Doran tells us that—

The charming George Ann Bellamy [1733–1788] procured from Paris two gorgeous dresses for the part of "Statira." When Peg Woffington, who played "Roxana," saw them, she was so overcome by malice, hatred, and all uncharitableness, that she rolled her rival in the dust, pummelled her with the handle of her dagger, and screamed in anger—

Nor he, nor heaven, shall shield thee from my justice.
Die, sorceress, die! and all my wrongs die with thee!
Table Traits.

Statius, a Roman poet (A.D. 61–96), author of an heroic poem in nine books, called the Thebaid (3 syl.) or The Seven against Thebes.

(Translated into English heroic verse (rhymes) by W. L. Lewis (2nd edition, 1773). Pope translated bk. i. in 1703; Walter Harte translated bk. vi.; and T.....rs translated the first five books.)

Bk. vi. contains the Osegruce and Games.

Statute of Rhuddlan (The). This celebrated statute annexed the principality of Wales to the English crown, and constituted its territory shire-ground (1284). (See Professor Tout's Edward I.)

Edward I. resided for a certain time at Rhuddlan Castle, during his contests with the princes of Wales (1277–1284); and it was here that Lewelyn made his personal submission to him after the Treaty of Conway. At the breaking out of the revolt of the Four Cantreds, Lewelyn's brother fell upon Rhuddlan, and took the king's justiciar prisoner, and it was after the defeat and death of Lewelyn that this statute was enacted.

Staunton (The Rev. Mr.), rector of Willingham, and father of George Staunton.

George Staunton, son of the Rev. Mr. Staunton. He appears first as "Geordie Robertson," a felon; and in the Porteous mob he assumes the guise of "Madge Wildfire." George Staunton is the seducer of Effie Deans. Ultimately he comes to the title of baronet, marries Effie, and is shot by a gipsy boy called "The Whistler," who proves to be his own natural son.

Lady Staunton, Effie Deans after her marriage with sir George. On the death of her husband, she retires to a convent on the Continent.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Steadfast, a friend of the Duberly family. — Colman: The Heir-at-Law (1797).

Steeds of the Sea, ships, a common synonym of the Runic bards.

> And thro' the deep exulting sweep
> The Thunder-steeds of Spain.
> Lord Lytton: Ode, i. (1839).

Steel Castle, a strong ward, belonging to the Yellow Dwarf. Here he confined All-Fair when she refused to marry him according to her promise.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The Yellow Dwarf," 1682).

Steele Glas (The), a mirror in which we may "see ourselves as others see us," or see others in their true likenesses. Gascoigne published, in 1576, his Steele Grasse, a satyre.

The Christel Glasse, on the other hand, reflects us as vanity dictates, and shows other people as fame paints them. These mirrors were made by Lucyl'ius (an old satirist).

> Lucylius . . . bequeathed "The Christel Glasse"
> To such as love to seme but not te be
> But unto those that love to see themselves,
> How foul or fayre soever that they are,
> He gan bequeath a Glasse of trustie Steel.
> Gascoigne: The Steele Glas (died 1577).

Steenie, i.e. "Stephen." So George Villiers duke of Buckingham was called by James I., because, like Stephen the first martyr, "all that sat in the council, looking stedfastly on him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel" (Acts vi. 15).

Steenson (Willie) or "Wandering Willie," the blind fiddler.

Steenie Steenson, the piper, in Wandering Willie's tale.

Maggie Steenson, or "Epps Anslie," the wife of Wandering Willie.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Steerforth, the young man who led little Em'ly astray. When tired of his toy, he proposed to her to marry his valet. Steerforth being shipwrecked off the coast of Yarmouth, Ham Peggotty tried to rescue him, but both were drowned.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Stein. There is a German saying that "Krems and Stein are three places." The solution lies in the word "and" (German, und). Now, Und is between Krems and Stein; so that Krems, Und, [and] Stein are three places.

Steinbach (Erwin von) designed Strasbourg Cathedral; begun 1015, and finished 1439.

> A great master of his craft,
> Erwin von Steinbach.
> Longfellow: Golden Legend (1851).

Steinernherz von Blutsacker (Francis), the scharf-gerichter or executioner.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Steinfeldt (The old baroness of), introduced in Donnerhugel's narrative.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Steinfort (The baron), brother of the countess Wintersen. He falls in love with Mrs. Haller, but, being informed of the relationship between Mrs. Haller and "the stranger," exerts himself to bring about a reconciliation.—B. Thompson: The Stranger (1797).

Stella. The lady Penelopê Devereux, the object of sir Philip Sidney's affection. She married lord Rich, and was a widow in Sidney's lifetime. Spenser says, in his Astrophel, when Astrophel (sir Philip) died, Stella died of grief, and the two "lovers" were converted into one flower, called "Starlight," which is first red, and as it fades turns blue. Some call it penthea, but henceforth (he says) it shall be called "Astrophel." It is a pure fiction that Stella died from grief at the death of Sidney, for she afterwards married Charles Blount, created by James I. earl of Devonshire. The poet himself must have forgotten his own lines—

> Ne less praiseworthy Stella do I read,
> Tho' nought my praises of her needed are,
> Whom verse of noblest shepherd lately dead [1586]
> Hath praised and raised above each other star.
> Spenser: Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1591).

Stella. Miss Hester Johnson was so called by Swift, to whom she was privately married in 1706. Hester is first perverted into the Greek aster, and "aster" in Latin, like stella, means "a star." Stella lived with Mrs. Dingley on Ormond Quay, Dublin.

> Poor Stella must pack off to town . . .
> To Liffy's stinking tide at Dublin . . .
> To be directed there by Dingley . . .
> And now arrives the dismal day,
> She must return to Ormond Quay.
> Swift: To Stella at Wood Park (1723).

Steno (Michel), one of the chiefs of the tribunal of Forty. Steno acts indecorously to some of the ladies assembled at a civic banquet given by the doge of Venice, and is turned out of the house. In revenge, he fastens on the doge's chair some scurrilous lines against the young dogaressa, whose extreme modesty and innocence ought to have protected her from such insolence. The doge refers the matter to "the Forty," who sentence Steno to two months' imprisonment. This punishment, in the opinion of the doge, is wholly inadequate to the offence, and Marino Faliero joins a conspiracy to abolish the council altogether. —Byron: Marino Faliero, the Doge of Venice (1819).

Stentor, a Grecian herald in the Trojan war. Homer says he was "great-hearted, brazen-voiced, and could shout as loud as fifty men."

> He began to roar for help with the lungs of a Stentor. —Smollett.

Steph'ano, earl of Carnûti, the leader of 400 men in the allied Christian army. He was noted for his military prowess and wise counsel.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, i. (1575).

Steph'ano, a drunken butler.—Shakespeare: The Tempest (1609).

Steph'ano, servant to Portia.—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice (1598).

STEPHEN, one of the attendants of sir Reginald Front de Bœuf (a follower of prince John).—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Stephen (Count), nephew of the count of Crèvecœur.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Stephen (Master), a conceited puppy, who thinks all inferiors are to be snubbed and bullied, and all those weaker and more cowardly than himself are to be kicked and beaten. He is especially struck with captain Bobadil, and tries to imitate his "dainty oaths." Master Stephen has no notion of honesty and high-mindedness: thus he steals Downright's cloak, which had been accidentally dropped, declares he bought it, and then that he found it. Being convicted of falsehood, he resigns all claim to it, saying in a huff, "There, take your cloak; I'll none on't." This small-minded youth is young Kno'well's cousin.—B. Jonson: Every Man in His Humour (1598).

Stephen (St.). The crown of St. Stephen, the crown of Hungary.

> If Hungarian independence should ever be secured through the help of prince Napoleon, the prince himself should accept the crown of St. Stephen.—Kossuth: Memoirs of My Exile, 1880.

The British St. Stephen, St. Alban, the British proto-martyr (died 303).

> As soon as the executioner gave the fatal stroke [which beheaded St. Alban], his eyes dropped out of his head.—Bede: Ecclesiastical History (A.D. 734).

Stephen Steelheart, the nickname of Stephen Wetheral.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Stephen of Amboise, leader of 5000 foot-soldiers from Blois and Tours in the allied Christian army of Godfrey of Bouillon. Impetuous in attack, but deficient in steady resistance. He was shot by Clorinda with an arrow (bk. xi.). —Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Stephen's (St.), a poem by lord Lytton, on leading orators (1860).

Stepney. (See BORN AT SEA, p. 138.)

Sterling (Mr.), a vulgar, rich City merchant, who wishes to see his two daughters married to titles. Lord Ogleby calls him "a very abstract of 'Change;" and he himself says, "What signifies birth, education, titles, and so forth? Money, I say—money's the stuff that makes a man great in this country."

Miss Sterling, whose Christian name is Elizabeth or Betty; a spiteful, jealous, purse-proud damsel, engaged to sir John Melvil. Sir John, seeing small prospect of happiness with such a tartar, proposed marriage to the younger sister, but she was already clandestinely married. Miss Sterling, being left out in the cold, exclaimed, "Oh that some other person, an earl or duke for instance, would propose to me, that I might be revenged on the monsters!"

Miss Fanny Sterling, an amiable, sweet-smiling, soft-speaking beauty, clandestinely married to Lovewell.—Colman and Garrick: The Clandestine Marriage (1766).

> A strange blunder was once made by Mrs. Gibbs of Covent Garden in the part of "Miss Sterling." When speaking of the conduct of Betty, who had locked the door of Miss Fanny's room and walked away with the key, Mrs. Gibbs exclaimed, "She has locked the key, and carried away the door in her pocket."—W. C. Russell: Representative Actors.

Sterry, a fanatical preacher, admired by Hugh Peters.—S. Butler: Hudibras (1663–78).

Stevens, a messenger of the earl of Sussex at Say's Court.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Stewart (Colonel), governor of the castle of Doune.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Stewart (Prince Charles Edward), surnamed "The Chevalier" by his friends, and "The Pretender" by his foes. Sir W. Scott introduces him in Waverley, and again in Redgauntlet, where he appears disguised as "father Buonaventura. (Now generally spelt Stuart.)

Stewart (Walking), John Stewart, the English traveller, who travelled on foot through Hindûstan, Persia, Nubia, Abyssinia, the Arabian Desert, Europe, and the United States (died 1822).

A most interesting man, . . . eloquent in conversation, contemplative . . . . and crazy beyond all reach of helebore, . . . yet sublime and divinely benignant in his visionariness This man, as a pedestrian traveller, had seen more of the earth's surface . . . than any man before or since.—De Quincey.

N.B.—Walking Stewart must not be confounded with John M'Douall Stuart, the Australian explorer (1818–1866).

Stewart Diamond (The), found in 1872, is the largest South African diamond discovered up to the present date. It weighed in the rough state 288½ carats, and but few diamonds in the world exceed it in size. It is of a light yellow hue, and is set as a star with eight points and a fleur de lys above. This superb stone, with the Dudley and Twin diamonds, have all been discovered in the Cape since 1870.

Steyne (Marquis of), earl of Gaunt and of Gaunt Castle, a viscount, baron, knight of the Garter and of numerous other orders, colonel, trustee of the British Museum, elder brother of the Trinity House, governor of White Friars, etc., had honours and titles enough to make him a great man; but his life was not a highly moral one, and his conduct with Becky Sharp, when she was the wife of colonel Rawdon Crawley, gave rise to a great scandal. His lordship floated through the ill report, but Mrs. Rawdon was obliged to live abroad.—Thackeray: Vanity Fair (1848).

Stick to it, says Baigent. Baigent was the principal witness for the Claimant in the great Tichborne trial, and his advice to his protégé was, "Stick to it" (1872).

Stiggins, a hypocritical, drunken, methodist "shepherd" (minister), thought by Mrs. Weller to be a saint. His time was spent for the most part in drinking pine-apple rum at the Marquis of Granby tavern.—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Still (Cornelius the), Cornelius Tacitus. (Latin, tacitus, "still.")

Cornelius the Stylle, in his firste book of his yerely exploictes, called in Latine Annales.—Fardle of Facions, iii. 3 (1555).

Still Waters Run Deep, adapted from the French novel, Le Gendre.

Stimulants used by Public Characters.

(1) BONAPARTE, snuff.
(2) BRAHAM, bottled porter.
(3) BULL (Rev. William), the nonconformist, was an inveterate smoker.
(4) BYRON, gin-and-water.
(5) CATLEY (Miss), linseed tea and madeira.
(6) COOKE (G. F.), everything drinkable.
(7) DISRAELI (lord Beaconsfield), champagne jelly.
(8) EMERY, cold brandy-and-water.
(9) ERSKINE (Lord), opium in large doses.
(10) GLADSTONE (W. E.), an egg beaten up in sherry.
(11) HENDERSON, gum arabic and sherry.
(12) HOBBES, only cold water.
(13) INCLEDON, madeira.
(14) JORDAN (Mrs.), calves'-foot jelly dissolved in warm sherry.
(15) KEAN (Edmund), beef-tea, cold brandy.
(16) KEMBLE (John), opium.
(17) LEWIS, mulled wine and oysters.
(18) NEWTON smoked incessantly.
(19) OXBERRY, strong tea.
(20) POPE, strong coffee.
(21) SCHILLER required to sit over a table deeply impregnated with the smell of apples. He stimulated his brain with coffee and champagne.
(22) SIDDONS (Mrs.), porter, not "stout."

(23) SMITH (William) drank strong coffee.

(24) WEDDERBURNE (the first lord Ashburton) used to place a blister on his chest when he had to make a great speech. —Dr. Paris: Pharmacologia (1819).

(25) WOOD (Mrs.) drank draught porter.

Stinkomalee. So Theodore Hook called the London University. The word was suggested by "Trincomalee" (in Ceylon), a name before the public at the time. Hook hated the "University," because it admitted students of all denominations.

Only look at Stinkomalee and King's College. Activity, union, craft, indomitable perseverance on the one side; indolence, indecision, internal distrust and jealousies, calf-like simplicity, and cowardice intolerable on the other.—Wilson: Noctes Ambrosianæ (1822-36).

Stirrups were unknown to the ancients; they were used sometimes in the fifth century, but were not common till the twelfth.

In the equestrian statue of Marcus Aurelius (121-180), now on the Capitoline Hill, in Rome, the rider very properly is represented without stirrups.

But the two equestrian statues of William III. (one in King William Street, London, and the other in College Green, Dublin) represented without stirrups cannot be defended. For when William III. was king (1689-1702), the use of stirrups was quite usual.

Stitch (Tom), a young tailor, a great favourite with the ladies.—The Merry History of Tom Stitch (seventeenth century).

Stock Exchange "Nicknames."

BERWICKS, North-Eastern railway shares.

BRUMS, London and North-Western railway shares (the Birmingham line).

COHENS, the Turkish '69 loan. Floated by the firm of that name.

DOGS, Newfoundland telegraph shares. (Newfoundland dogs.)

DOVERS, South-Eastern railway shares. (The line runs to Dover.)

FLOATERS, exchequer bills and other unfunded stock.

FOURTEEN HUNDRED, a stranger who has intruded into the Stock Exchange. This term was used in Defoe's time.

LAME DUCK (A), a member of the Stock Exchange who fails in his obligations.

LEEDS, Lancashire and Yorkshire railway shares.

MORGANS, the French 6 per cents. Floated by that firm.

MUTTONS, the Turkish '65 loan. (Partly secured by the sheep-tax.)

POTS, North Staffordshire railway shares. (The potteries.)

SINGAPORES (3 syl.), British Indian Extension telegraph shares.

SMELTS, English and Australian copper shares.

STAG, one who applies for an allotment of shares, and cuts off if they do not rise in price before they are awarded.

YORKS, the Great Northern railway shares.

Stock Pieces, used in university and law examinations. (See TIPS.)

Stocks' Market. So called from a pair of stocks which at one time stood there. Gardeners used to occupy all but the north and south-west part. The flower called the "stock" received its name from being sold there. The market was removed to Farringdon Street in 1737, and was then called "Fleet Market."

Where is there such a garden in Europe as the Stocks' Market? Where such a river as the Thames? Where such ponds and decoys as in Leadenhall Market for your fish and fowl?—Shadwell: Bury Fair (1689).

Stockwell (Mr.), a City merchant, who promised to give his daughter Nancy in marriage to the son of sir Harry Harlowe of Dorsetshire.

Mrs. Stockwell, the merchant's wife, who always veers round to the last speaker, and can be persuaded to anything for the time being.

Nancy Stockwell, daughter of the merchant, in love with Belford, but promised in marriage to sir Harry Harlowe's son. It so happens that sir Harry's son has privately married another lady, and Nancy falls to the man of her choice.—Garrick: Neck or Nothing (1766).

Stolen Kisses, a drama by Paul Meritt, in three acts (1877). Felix Freemantle, under the pseudonym of Mr. Joy, falls in love with Cherry, daughter of Tom Spirit once valet to Mr. Freemantle (who had come to the title of viscount Trangmar). When Tom Spirit ascertained that "Felix Joy" was the son of the viscount, he forbade all further intercourse, unless Felix produced his father's consent to the marriage. The next part of the plot pertains to the brother of Tom Spirit, who had assumed the name of Walter Temple, and, as a stock-broker, had become very wealthy. In his prosperity, Walter scornfully ignored his brother Tom, and his ambition was to marry his daughter Jenny to the son of viscount Tragmar, who owed him money. Thus the two cousins, Cherry and Jenny, came into collision; but at the end Jenny married Fred Gay a medical student, Cherry married Felix, the two brothers were reconciled, and Tom released his old master, viscount Trangmar, by destroying the bond which Walter held and gave him.

Stone of Loda, a place of worship amongst the ancient Gaels. — Ossian: Temora, v.

Stonehenge. Aurelius Ambrosius asked Merlin what memento he could raise to commemorate his victory over Vortigern; and Merlin advised him to remove "The Giant's Dance" from mount Killaraus, in Ireland, to Salisbury Plain. So Aurelius placed a fleet and 15,000 men under the charge of Uther the pendragon and Merlin for the purpose. Gilloman king of Ireland, who opposed the invaders, was routed, and then Merlin, "by his art," shipped the stones, and set them up on the plain "in the same manner as they stood on Killaraus."—Geoffrey: British History, viii. 10–12 (1142).

How Merlin, by his skill and magic's wondrous might,
From Ireland hither brought the Sonendge in a night.
Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

Stonehenge, once thought a temple, you have found
A throne, where kings, our earthly gods, were crowned.
Dryden: Epistles, ii.

Stonehenge a Trophy. It is said, in the Welsh triads, that this circle of stones was erected by the Britons to commemorate the "treachery of the Long-Knives," i.e. a conference to which the chief of the British warriors were invited by Hengist at Ambresbury. Beside each chief a Saxon was seated, armed with a long knife, and at a given signal each Saxon slew his Briton. As many as 460 British nobles thus fell, but Eldol earl of Glouces-ter, after slaying seventy Saxons (some say 660), made his escape. — Welsh Triads. (See Geoffrey's British History, bk. vi. 15.)

∴ Geoffrey says the signal of the onset was the utterance of the words Nemet oure Saxas, and that the number of the slain was 460.—Bk. vi. 15.

Stonehenge was erected by Merlin, at the command of Ambrosius, in memory of the plot of the "Long-Knives," when 300 British chiefs were treacherously massacred by Vortigern. He built it on the site of a former circle. It deviates from older bardic circles, as may be seen by comparing it with Avebury, Stanton-Drew, Keswick, etc. It is called "The Work of Ambrosius."—Cambrian Biography, art. "Merddin."

¶ MONT DIEU, a solitary mound close to Dumfermline, owes its origin, according to story, to some unfortunate monks, who, by way of penance, carried the sand in baskets from the sea-shore at Inverness.

¶ At Linton is a fine conical hill attributed to two sisters (nuns), who were compelled to pass the whole of the sand through a sieve, by way of penance, to obtain pardon for some crime committed by their brother.

¶ The Gog Magog Hills, near Cambridge, are ascribed to his Satanic majesty.

Stonewall Jackson, Thomas Jefferson Jackson, general in the southern army in the great civil war of the North American States. General Bee suggested the name in the battle of Bull Run (1861). "There is Jackson," said he to his men, "standing like a stone wall" (1826–1863).

Stork (King), a tyrant, who (according to Homer) is a "devourer of his people," and makes them submissive through fear. The allusion, of course, is to the fable of the Frogs asking for a King. Jupiter first sent them a log of wood, which they despised, so he next sent them a stork, which devoured them. (Read 1 Sam. viii.)

Storm (The Great) occurred November 26–7, 1703. This storm supplied Addison with his celebrated simile of the angel—

So when an angel by divine command,
With rising tempests shakes a guilty land,
Such as of late o'er pale Britannia past,
Calm and serene he drives the furious blast;
And, pleased th' Almighty's orders to perform,
Rides on the tempest and directs the storm.
The Campaign (1705).

Storm-and-Strain Period. The last quarter of the eighteenth century was called in Germany the Sturm-und-Drang Zeit, because every one seemed in a fever to shake off the shackles of government, custom, prestige, and religion. The poets raved in volcanic rant or sentimental moonshine; marriage was disregarded; law, both civil and divine, was poohpoohed. Goethe's Man with the Iron Hand and Sorrows of Werther—Schiller's Robbers—Klinger's tragedies—Lessing's criticisms—the mania for Shakespeare and Ossian—revolutionized the literature; and the cry went forth for untrammelled freedom, which was nicknamed "Nature." As well go unclad, and call it nature.

Storms (Cape of). The Cape of Good Hope was called by Bartholomew Diaz Cabo Tormentoso in 1486; but king John II. of Portugal gave it its present more auspicious name.

Stornello Verses, verses in which a word or phrase is harped upon, and turned about and about, as in the following example:—

Vive la France! wave our banner, the red, white, and blue;
The flag of the loyal the royal, and true.
Blue and red for our city we wave, and the white
For our sovereign the people, whose rule is their right.
Royal white, loyal blue, and forget not the red,
To show for our freedom we'll bleed and have bled.
E. C. B.

S.T.P., the same as D.D., "divinity doctor." The initials of Sanctæ Theologiæ Professor.

Strabo of Germany (The), Sebastian Munster (1489–1552).

Stradiva'rius (Antonius), born at Cremo'na, in Italy (1670–1728). He was a pupil of Andreus Amāti. The Amati family, with Stradivarius and his pupil Guarnerius (all of Cremona), were the most noted violin-makers that ever lived, insomuch that the word "Cremona" is synonymous for a first-rate violin.

The instrument on which he played
Was in Cremona's workshops made . . .
The maker from whose hands it came
Had written his unrivalled name—
"Antonius Stradivarius."
Longfellow: The Wayside Inn (prelude, 1863)

Strafford, an historical tragedy by R. Browning (1836). This drama contains portraits of Charles I., the earl of Strafford, Hampden, John Pym, sir Harry Vane, etc., both truthful and graphic. Of course, the subject of the drama is the attainder and execution of Wentworth earl of Strafford.

Straitlace (Dame Philippa), the maiden aunt of Blushington. She is very much surprised to find her nephew entertaining dinner company, and still more so that he is about to take a young wife to keep house for him instead of herself.—Moncrieff: The Bashful Man.

Stral'enheim (Count of), a kinsman of Werner, who hunted him from place to place, with a view of cutting him off, because he stood between him and the inheritance of Siegendorf. This mean, plausible, overreaching nobleman was by accident lodged under the same roof with Werner while on his way to Siegendorf. Here Werner robbed him of a rouleau of gold, and next night Ulric (Werner's son) murdered him.

Ida Stralenheim, daughter of count Stralenheim, betrothed to Ulric, whom she dearly loved; but being told by Ulric that he was the assassin of her father, she fell senseless, and Ulric departed, never to return.—Byron: Werner (1822).

The accent of this name is given by Byron sometimes on the first and sometimes on the second syllable—

Stralen'heim, altho' noble, is unheeded.
Act III. 4.
The daughter of dead Stral'enheim, your foe.
Act IV. 1.

Strange Story (A), a novel by lord Lytton (1862). Its object is to show that man and nature too require to be set off by the supernatural.

Stranger (The), the count Waldbourg. He married Adelaide at the age of 16; she had two children by him, and then eloped. The count, deserted by his young wife, lived a roving life, known only as "The Stranger;" and his wife, repenting of her folly, under the assumed name of Mrs. Haller, entered the service of the countess Wintersen, whose affection she secured. In three years' time, "the stranger" came by accident into the same neighbourhood, and a reconciliation took place.

His servant Francis says he is "a good master, though one almost loses the use of speech by living with him. A man kind and dear, though I cannot understand him. He rails against the whole world, and yet no beggar leaves his door unsatisfied. I have now lived three years with him, and yet I know not who he is. A hater of society, no doubt . . . [with] misanthropy in the head, not in the heart."—B. Thompson: The Stranger, l. 1 (1797).

(This drama is altered from Kotzebue.)

 Mrs. R. Trench says of John P. Kemble (1757–1823)—

I always saw him with pain descend to "The Stranger." It was like the genius in the Arabian tale going into the vase. First, it seemed so unlikely he should meet with such an affront, and this injured the probability of the piece; and next, "The Stranger" is really never dignified, and one is always in pain for him, poor gentleman!—Remains (1822).

Strangford (Percy Clinton Sydney Smythe, viscount), in 1803, published a translation of the poems of Camoëns, the great Portuguese poet.

Hibernian Strangford . . .
Thinkst thou to gain thy verse a higher place
By dressing Camoëns in a suit of lace?
Cease to deceive; thy pilfered harp restore,
Nor touch the Lusian bard to copy Moore.
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Strap (Hugh), a simple, generous, and disinterested adherent of Roderick Random. His generosity and fidelity, however, meet with but a base return from the heartless libertine.—Smollett: Roderick Random (1748).

We believe there are few readers who are not disgusted with the miserable reward assigned to Strap in the closing chapter of the novel. Five hundred pounds (scarce the value of the goods he had presented to his master) and the hand of a reclaimed street-walker, even when added to a Highland farm, seem but a poor recompense for his faithful and disinterested attachment.—Sir W. Scott.

Strasbourg Cathedral, designed by Erwin von Steinbach (1015–1439).

Strauchan (Old), the 'squire of sir Kenneth.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Strawberry Leaves (To win the), to be created a duke.

Strawberry Preacher (A), a "Jerusalem pony," a temporary help, who wanders from pulpit to pulpit, to preach for some society, to aid some absent or invalided minister, or to advocate some charity. The term was first used by Latimer, and the phrase means a "straying-preacher." (Anglo-Saxon, streowan, "to stray;" hence, strawberry, streow-berie, "the straying berry-plant.") Streets of London (The), a drama by Dion Boucicault (1862), adapted from the French play Les Pauvres des Paris.

Stre'mon, a soldier, famous for his singing.—Beaumont (?) and Fletcher: The Mad Lover (1617).

(Beaumont died 1616.)

Strephon, the shepherd in sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia, who makes love to the beautiful Urania (1580). It is a stock name for a lover, Cloê being usually the corresponding lady.

Captain O'Flarty was one of my dying Strephons at Scarborough. I have a very grate regard for him, and must make him a little miserable with my happiness.—Garrick: The Irish Widow, i. 3 (1757).

The servant of your Strephon . . . is my lord and master.—Garrick: Miss in Her Teens (1753).

Stretton (Hesba), the pseudonym of Miss Smith, daughter of a bookseller and printer in Wellington, Salop.; authoress of several well-known religious novels.

Strickalthrow (Merciful), in Cromwell's troop.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Strictland (Mr.), the "suspicious husband;" who suspects Clarinda, a young lady visitor, of corrupting his wife; suspects Jacintha, his ward, of lightness; and suspects his wife of infidelity; but all his suspicions being proved groundless, he promises reform.

Mrs. Strictland, wife of Mr. Strictland, a model of discretion and good nature. She not only gives no cause of jealousy to her husband, but never even resents his suspicions or returns his ill temper in the same coin.—Dr. Hoadly: The Suspicious Husband (1747).

Strike, Dakyns! the Devil's in the Hempe, the motto of the Dakynses. The reference is to an enemy of the king, who had taken refuge in a pile of hemp. Dakyns, having nosed the traitor, was exhorted to strike him with his battle-axe and kill him, which he did. Hence the crest of the family—a dexter arm . . . holding a battle-axe.

Striking the Shield, a call to battle among the ancient Gaels.

"Strike the sounding shield of Semo. It hangs at Tura's rustling gate. The sound of peace is not its voice! My heroes shall hear and obey." He went. He struck the bossy shield. The hills, the rocks reply. The sound spreads along the wood: deer start by the lake of roes. . . . "It is the shield of war," said Ronnart.—Ossian: Fingal, i.

Strom'boli, called "The Great Lighthouse of the Mediterranean" from its volcano, which is in a constant blaze.

Strong (Dr.), a benevolent old schoolmaster, to whom David Copperfield was sent whilst living with Mr. Wickfield. The old doctor doted on his young wife Annie, and supported her scapegrace cousin Jack Maldon.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Strong Men and Women.

Antæos, Atlas, Dorsânês the Indian Herculês, Guy earl of Warwick, Herculês, Macêris son of Amon, Rustam the Persian Herculês, Samson, Starchatêrus the Swede (first Christian century).

BROWN (Miss Phœbe), about five feet six inches in height, well-proportioned, round-faced, and ruddy. She could carry fourteen score, and could lift a hundredweight with each hand at the same time. She was fond of poetry and music, and her chief food was milk.—W. Hutton.

MILO of Crotôna could carry on his shoulders a four-year-old bullock, and kill it with a single blow of his fist. On one occasion, the pillar which supported the roof of a house gave way, and Milo held up the whole weight of the building with his hands.

POLYD'AMAS, the athlete. He killed a lion with a blow of his fist, and could stop a chariot in full career with one hand.

TOPHAM (Thomas) of London (1710-1749). He could lift three hogsheads of 1836 lbs.; could heave a horse over a turnpike gate; and could lift two hundredweight with his little finger.

Strongback, one of the seven attendants of Fortunio. He could never be overweighted, and could fell a forest in a few hours without fatigue.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Fortunio," 1682).

(The brothers Grimm have introduced the tale of "Fortunio" in their Goblins.)

Strongbow, Gilbert de Clare, who succeeded to the title of his brother, the earl of Hertford, in 1138, and was created earl of Pembroke (died 1149).

(Henry II. called him a "false" or "pseudo-earl.")

Strongbow (Richard of Strigal) was Richard de Clare earl of Pembroke, son of Gilbert de Clare. He succeeded Dermot king of Leinster, his father-in-law, in 1170, and died 1176.

The earl of Strigale then, our Strongbow, first that won Wild Ireland with the sword.
Drayton: Polyolbion. xviii. (1613).

Struldbrugs, the inhabitants of Luggnagg, who never die.

He had reached that period of life . . . which . . . entitles a man to admission into the ancient order of Struldbrugs.—Swift: Gulliver's Travels ("Laputa," 1726).

Strutt (Lord), the king of Spain; originally Charles II. (who died without issue); but also applied to his successor Philippe duc d'Anson, called "Philip lord Strutt."

I need not tell you of the great quarrels that happened in our neighbourhood since the death of the late lord Strutt; how the parson [cardinal Portocarero] . . . got him to settle his estate upon his cousin Philip Baboon [Bourbon], to the great disappointment of his cousin squire South [Charles of Austria].—Dr. Arbuthnot: History of John Bull, i. (1712).

Stryver (Bully), of the King's Bench Bar, counsel for the defence in Darnay's trial.

He was stout, loud, red, bluff, and free from any drawback of delicacy; had a pushing way of shouldering himself (morally and physically) into companies and conversations, that argued well for his shouldering his way on in life.—Dickens: A Tale of Two Cities, ii. 24 (1859).

Stuart Ill-Fated (The House of), as that of Œdipos.

(1) JAMES I. of Scotland, poet, murdered by conspirators at Perth, in the forty-fourth year of his age (1393, 1424-1437).

(2) JAMES II., his son, killed at the siege of Roxburgh, aged 30 (1430, 1437-1460).

(3) JAMES III., his son, was stabbed in his flight from Bannockburn by a pretended priest, aged 36 (1452, 1460-1488).

(His brother, the earl of Mar, was imprisoned in 1477, and died in durance, 1480.)

(4) JAMES IV., his son, the "Chivalrous Madman," was defeated and slain at Flodden, aged 41 (1472, 1488-1513).

(5) JAMES V., his son, was defeated at Solway Moss, November 25, and died of grief, December 14, aged 30 (1512, 1513-1542).

(6) MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, daughter of James V., was beheaded, aged 44 years 63 days (1542, 1542-1587, Old Style).

(Her husband, Henry Stuart lord Darnley, was murdered (1541-1566). Her niece, Arabella Stuart, died insane in the Tower, 1575-1615.)

(7) JAMES I. of England and VI. of Scotland. His mother, Mary queen of Scots, was beheaded; his eldest son died young; Charles I. was beheaded; Elizabeth, who married the prince palatine, had her full share of misfortunes; and his grandson was James II. and his ill-starred race.

(8) CHARLES I. his son, was beheaded, aged 48 years 69 days (1600, 1625-1649).

(9) CHARLES II., his son, was in exile from 1645 to 1661. In 1665 occurred the Great Plague, and in 1666 the Great Fire of London. He died aged 54 years 253 days (1630, 1661-1685).

(His favourite child, a natural son, defeated at Sedgemoor, July 5, was executed as a traitor, July 15, aged 46, 1649-1685.)

(10) JAMES II., brother of Charles, and son of Charles I., was obliged to abdicate to save his life, and died in exile (1633, reigned 1685-1688). James II. died a pensioner of Louis XIV. (1701).

(11) JAMES FRANCIS EDWARD "the Luckless," his son, called the "Old Pretender," was a mere cipher. His son Charles came to England to proclaim him king, but was defeated at Culloden, leaving 3000 dead on the field (1688-1765).

(12) CHARLES EDWARD, the "Young Pretender," was son of the "Old Pretender." After the defeat at Culloden he fled to France, was banished from that kingdom, and died at Rome a drunken dotard (1720-1788).

(13) HENRY BENEDICT, cardinal York, the last of the race, was a pensioner of George III.

The Mary Stuart of Italy, Jane I. of Naples (1327, 1343-1382).

Jane married her cousin André of Hungary, who was assassinated two years after his marriage, when the widow married the assassin. So Mary Stuart married her cousin lord Darnley, 1565, who was murdered 1567, and the widow married Bothwell, the assassin.

Jane fled to Provence, 1347, and was strangled in 1382. So Mary Stuart fled to England in 1568, and was put to death in 1587 (Old Style).

Jane, like Mary, was remarkable for her great beauty, her brilliant court, her voluptuousness, and the men of genius she drew around her; but Jane, like Mary, was also noted for her deplorable administration.

(La Harpe wrote a tragedy called Jeanne de Naples (1765). Schiller has an adaptation of it, 1821.)

Stuarts' Fatal Number (The). This number is 88.

(1) James III. was killed in flight near Bannockburn, 1488.

(2) Mary Stuart was beheaded 1588 (New Style).

(3) James II. of England was dethroned 1688.

(4) Charles Edward died 1788.

(James Stuart, the "Old Pretender," was born 1688, the very year that his father abdicated.)

(5) James Stuart, the famous architect, died 1788.

(Some affirm that Robert II., the first Stuart king, died 1388, the year of the great battle of Otterburn; but the death of this king is more usually fixed in the spring of 1390.)

Stubble (Reuben), bailiff to Farmer Cornflower, rough in manner, severe in discipline, a stickler for duty, "a plain, upright, and downright man," true to his master and to himself.—Dibdin: The Farmer's Wife (1780).

Stubbs, the beadle at Willingham. The Rev. Mr. Staunton was the rector.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Stubbs (Miss Sissly or Cecilia), daughter of squire Stubbs, one of Waverley's neighbours.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Stuffy (Matthew), an applicant to Velinspeck, a country manager, for a situation as prompter, for which he says he is peculiarly qualified by that affection of the eyes vulgarly called a squint, which enables him to keep one eye on the performers and the other on the book at the same time.—C. Mathews: At Home (1818).

Stuffy is one of the richest bits of humour we ever witnessed. His endless eulogies upon the state of things in the immortal Garrick's time are highly ludicrous.—Contemporary Paper.

Stukely (2 syl.), a destestable man. "'Twould be as easy to make him honest as brave" (act i. 2). He pretends to be the friend of Beverley, but cheats him. He aspires to the hand of Miss Beverley, who is in love with Lewson.—E. Moore: The Gamester (1753).

Stukely (Will), the companion of Little John. In the morris-dance on May-day, Little John used to occupy the right hand side of Robin Hood, and Will Stukely the left. (See STUTLY.)

Stukely (Captain Harry), nephew of sir Gilbert Pumpkin of Strawberry Hall.—Jackman: All the World's a Stage.

Stupid Boys. St. Thomas Aquinas; also called at school "The Dumb Ox" (1224-1274). Manlius Torquatus.

Manlius Torquatus, l'un des plus grands capitaines de Rome, paraisait, dans sa jeunesse, imbecille et stupide.—Dictionnaire Historique (1819).

Walter Scott was a dull school-boy; so was lord Byron, and many other first-class men.

Sturgeon (Major), J.P., "the fishmonger from Brentford," who turned volunteer. This bragging major makes love to Mrs. Jerry Sneak.—Foote: The Mayor of Garratt (1763).

We had some desperate duty, sir Jacob . . . such marchings and counter-marchings, from Brentford to Ealing, from Ealing to Acton, from Acton to Uxbridge. Why, there was our last expedition to Hounslow; that day's work carried off major Molossas. . . . But to proceed. On we marched, the men all in high spirits, to attack the gibbet where Gardel is hanging; but, turning down a narrow lane to the left, as it might be about there, in order to possess a pigstye, that we might take the gallows in flank, and secure a retreat, who should come by but a drove of fat oxen for Smithfield! The drums beat in front, the dogs barked in the rear, the oxen set up a gallop; on they came, thundering upon us, broke through our ranks in an instant, and threw the whole corps into confusion.—Act i. 2.

Sturmthal (Melchoir), the banneret of Berne, one of the Swiss deputies.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Stutly (Will), sometimes called Will Stukely, a companion of Little John. In the morris-dance on May-day, Little John occupied the right hand side of Robin Hood, and Will Stutly the left. His rescue from the sheriff of Nottingham by Robin Hood, forms the subject of one of the Robin Hood ballads.

When Robin Hood in the greenwood lived,
Under the greenwood tree,
Tidings there came to him with speed,
Tidings for certaintie,
That Will Stutly surprizéd was,
And eke in prison lay;
Three varlets that the sheriff hired,
Did likely him betray.
Robin Hood's Rescuing Will Stutly, lv. 1§.

Styles (Tom or John) or Tom o' Styles, a phrase name at one time used by lawyers in actions of ejectment. Jack Noakes and Tom Styles used to act in law the part that N or M acts in the church. The legal fiction has been abolished.

I have no connection with the company further than giving them, for a certain fee and reward, my poor opinion as a medical man, precisely as I may give it to Jack Noakes or Tom Styles.—Dickens.

(Tom Styles, Jack Noakes, John Doe, and Richard Roe are all Mrs. Harrises of the legal profession, nomina et præterea nihil.)

Styx, one of the five rivers of hell. The others are Ach'eron ("the river of grief"), Cocȳtus ("the river of wailing"), Phleg'ethon ("the river of liquid fire"), and Le'thê ("the river of oblivion"). Styx means "the river of hate." (Greek, stugeo, "I hate.")

Abhorred Styx, the flood of deadly hate;
Sad Acheron, of sorrow, black and deep;
Cocytus, named of lamentation loud,
Heard on the rueful stream; fierce Phlegethon,
Whose waves of torrent fire inflame with rage.
Far off from these, a slow and silent stream,
Lethê, the river of oblivion, rolls.
Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 577, etc. (1665).

N.B.—Dantê places the rivers in different circles of the Inferno; thus, he makes the Achĕron divide the border-land from limbo. The former realm is for the "praiseless and the blameless dead;" limbo is for the unbaptized. He places the Stygian Lake of "inky hue" in the fifth circle, the realm of those who put no restraint on their anger. The fire-stream of Phlegethon he fixes to the eighth steep, the "hell of burning, where it snows flakes of fire," and where blasphemers are confined. He places "the frozen river" of Cocytus in the tenth pit of Malêbolgê, a region of thick-ribbed ice, the lowest depth of hell, where Judas and Lucifer are imprisoned. Lethê, he says, is no river of hell at all; but it is the one wish of all the infernals to get to it, that they may drink its water and forget their torments; being, however, in "Purgatory," they can never get near it.—The Divine Comedy (1300–11).

Sublime and Beautiful (An Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the), by Burke (1757).

Subtle, the "alchemist," an artful quack, who pretends to be on the eve of discovering the philosopher's stone. Sir Epicure Mammon, a rich knight, is his principal dupe, but by no means his only one.—Ben Jonson: The Alchemist (1610).

Subtle, an Englishman settled in Paris. He earns a living by the follies of his countrymen who visit the gay capital.

Mrs. Subtle, wife of Mr. Subtle, and a help-meet for him.—Foote: The Englishman in Paris (1753).

Subtle Doctor (The), Duns Scotus, famous for his metaphysical speculations in theology (1265–1308).

(This must not be confounded with John Duns Scotus, called Erigĕna, who died 873.)

Suburra. So-and-so is the Suburra of London, the most disreputable quarter, being the chief haunt of the "demi-monde." The Suburra of Rome was a district "ubi meretrĭcum erant domicilia."

Senem (quod omnes rideant) adulterum
Latrent Suburanæ canes
Nardo perunctum.
Horace: Epode, v.

Subvolvans, inhabitants of the moon, in everlasting strife with the Privolvans The former live under ground in cavities, "eight miles deep and eighty round;" the latter on "the upper ground." Every summer the under-ground lunatics come to the surface to attack the "grounders," but at the approach of winter, slink back again into their holes.—S. Butler: The Elephant in the Moon (1754).

Success. Corcud's ring ensured success. (See RING, p. 916.)

Such Things Are, a comedy by Mrs. Inchbald (1786). The scene lies in India, and the object of the play is to represent the tyranny of the old régime, and the good influence of the British element, represented by Haswell the royal physician. The main feature is an introduction to the dungeons, and the infamous neglect of the prisoners, amongst whom is Arabella, the sultan's beloved English wife, whom he has been searching for unsuccessfully for fifteen years. Haswell receives the royal signet, and is entrusted with unlimited power by the sultan.

Suckfist (Lord), defendant in the great Pantagruelian lawsuit, known as "lord Busqueue v. lord Suckfist," in which the plaintiff and defendant pleaded in person. After hearing the case, the bench declared, "We have not understood one single circumstance of the matter on either side." But Pantagruel gave judgment, and as both plaintiff and defendant left the court fully persuaded that the verdict was in his own favour, they were both highly satisfied, "a thing without parallel in the annals of the law." —Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, ii. 11-13 (1533).

Suddlechop (Benjamin), "the most renowned barber in all Fleet Street." A thin, half-starved creature.

Dame Ursula Suddlechop, the barber's wife. "She could contrive interviews for lovers, and relieve frail fair ones of the burden of a guilty passion." She had been a pupil of Mrs. Turner, and learnt of her the secret of making yellow starch, and two or three other prescriptions more lucrative still. The dame was scarcely 40 years of age, of full form and comely features, with a joyous, good-humoured expression.

Dame Ursula had acquaintances . . . among the quality, and maintained her intercourse . . . partly by driving a trade in perfumes, essences, pomades, headgears from France, not to mention drugs of various descriptions, chiefly for the use of ladies, and partly by other services more or less connected with the esoteric branches of her profession.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel, viii. (time, James I.).

Suds (Mrs.), any washerwoman or laundress.

Suerpo Santo, called St. Elmo, Castor and Pollux, St. Hermes; a corposant or electric light occasionally seen on a ship's mast before or after a storm.

I do remember . . . there came upon the toppe of our maine-yarde and maine-maste a certaine little light . . . which the Spaniards call the Suerpo Santo. . . . This light continued aboord our ship about three houres, flying from maste to maste, and from top to top.—Hackluyt: Voyages (1598).

Suffusion, that dimness of sight which precedes a cataract. It was once thought that a cataract was a thin film growing externally over the eye and veiling the sight; but it is now known that the seat of the disease is the crystalline humour (between the outer coat of the eye and the vitreous humour). Couching for this disease is performed with a needle, which is passed through the external coat, and driven into the crystalline humour. (See DROP SERENE, p. 301.)

So thick a "drop serene" hath quenched their orbs,
Or dim "suffusion" veiled.
Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 25 (1665).

Suicides from Books.

(1) CLEOM'BROTOS, the Academic philosopher, killed himself after reading Plato's Phædon, that he might enjoy the happiness of the future life so enchantingly described.

(2) FRÄULEIN VON LASSBERG drowned herself in spleen, after reading Goethe's Sorrows of Werther.

Suleyman. (See GENII, p. 412.)

Sulin-Sifad'da, one of the two steeds of Cuthullin general of the Irish tribes. The name of the other was Dusronnal.

Before the right side of the car is seen the snorting horse; the high-maned, broad-breasted, proud, wide-leaping, strong steed of the hill. Loud and resounding is his hoof; the spreading of his mane above is like a stream of smoke on a ridge of rocks. Bright are the sides of his steed. His name is Sulin-Sifadda.—Ossian: Fingal, i.

Dusronnal snorted over the bodies of heroes. Sifadda bathed his hoof in blood.—Ditto.

Sulky (Mr.), executor of Mr. Warren, and partner in Dornton's bank. With a sulky, grumpy exterior, he has a kind heart, and is strictly honest. When Dornton is brought to the brink of ruin by his son's extravagance, Sulky comes nobly forward to the rescue. (See SILKY, p. 1007.)—Holcroft: The Road to Ruin (1792).

And oh! for monopoly. What a blest day,
When the lank and the silk shall, in fond combination
(Like Sulky and Silky, that pair in the play),
Cry out with one voice for "high rents" and "starvation"!
Moore: Ode to the Goddess Ceres (1806).

Sullen (Squire), son of lady Bountiful by her first husband. He married the sister of sir Charles Freeman, but after fourteen months their tempers and dispositions were found so incompatible that they mutually agreed to a divorce.

He says little, thinks less, and does nothing at all. Faith! but he's a man of great estate, and values nobody.—Act i. 1.

Parson Trulliber, sir Wilful Witwould, sir Francis Wronghead, squire Western, squire Sullen,—such were the people who composed the main strength of the tory party for sixty years after the Revolution.—Macaulay.

("Parson Trulliber," in Joseph Andrews (by Fielding); "sir Wilful Witwould," in The Way of the World (Congreve); "sir Francis Wronghead," in The Provoked Husband (by Cibber); "squire Western," in Tom Jones (by Fielding).)

Mrs. Sullen, sister of sir Charles Freeman, and wife of squire Sullen. They had been married fourteen months when they agreed mutually to a separation, for in no one single point was there any compatibility between them. The squire was sullen, the lady sprightly; he could not drink tea with her, and she could not drink ale with him; he hated ombre and picquet, she hated cock-fighting and racing; he would not dance, and she would not hunt. When squire Sullen separated from his wife, he was obliged to return the £20,000 which he had received with her as a dowry.—Farquhar: The Beaux' Stratagem (1707).

Sul-Malla, daughter of Conmor king of Inis-Huna and his wife Clun-galo. Disguised as a warrior, Sul-Malla follows Cathmor to the war; but Cathmor, walking his rounds, discovers Sul-Malla asleep, falls in love with her, but exclaims, "This is no time for love." He strikes his shield to rouse the host to battle, and is slain by Fingal. The sequel of Sul-Malla is not given.

Clun-galo came; she missed the maid. "Where art thou, beam of light? Hunters from the mossy rock, saw you the blue-eyed fair? Are her steps on grassy Lumon; near the bed of roses? Ah, me! I behold her bow in the hall. Where art thou, beam of light?"—Ossian: Temora, vi.

(This has been set to music by sir H. Bishop.)

Sultan's Horse (The). According to tradition, nothing will grow where the sultan's horse treads.

Byzantians boast that on the clod
Where once the sultan's horse hath trod,
Grows neither grass, nor shrub, nor tree.
Swift: Pethox the Great (1723).

Summer, one of the poems in Thomson's Seasons (1727).

Summer King, Amadeus of Spain.

Summer of All Saints, the fine weather which generally occurs in October and November; also called St. Martin's Summer (L'été de S. Martin) and St. Luke's Summer.

Then followed that beautiful season,
Called by the pious Acadian peasants the summer of All Saints.
Longfellow: Evangeline, i. 2 (1849).

 All Saints' Day, November 1; St. Martin's Day, November 11; St. Luke's Day, October 18.

Expect St. Martin's summer, halcyon days.
Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act i. sc. 2 (1589).

All Hallowen Summer is the same as "All Saints' Summer."

Farewell, all Hallowen summer.
Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act i. sc. 2 (1589).

Summerland, supposed to be the Crimea or Constantinople "over the Hazy Sea." This is given by Thomas Jones of Tregaron as the place from which the Britons originally emigrated.—T. Jones: The Historical Triads (sixteenth century).

Summerson (Esther). (See ESTHER HAWDON, p. 341.)

Summons to Death.

(1) JACQUES MOLAY, grand-master of the Knights Templars, as he was led to the stake, summoned the pope (Clement V.) within forty days, and the king (Philippe IV.) within forty weeks, to appear before the throne of God to answer for his murder. They both died within the stated times.

(2) MONTREAL D'ALBANO, called "Fra Moriale," knight of St. John of Jerusalem, and captain of the Grand Company in the fourteenth century, when sentenced to death by Rienzi, summoned him to follow within the month. Rienzi was within the month killed by the fickle mob.

(3) PETER and JOHN DE CARVAJAL, being condemned to death on circumstantial evidence alone, appealed, but without success, to Ferdinand IV. of Spain. On their way to execution, they declared their innocence, and summoned the king to appear before God within thirty days. Ferdinand was quite well on the thirtieth day, but was found dead in his bed next morning.

(4) GEORGE WISHART, a Scotch reformer, was condemned to the stake by cardinal Beaton. While the fire was blazing about him, the martyr exclaimed in a loud voice, "He who from yon high place beholdeth me with such pride, shall be brought low, even to the ground, before the trees which have supplied these faggots have shed their leaves." It was March when these words were uttered, and the cardinal died in June.

(5) NANNING KOPPEZOON, after enduring the most horrible tortures, was led to execution, when Jurian Epeszoon tried to drown what he said by praying in a very loud voice. Nanning summoned Jurian to appear before the judgment-seat within three days, and within three days he actually did die.—Motley: The Dutch Republic, pt. iv. 2.

Sumpnor's Tale (The), in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. This is rather a satire on the interminable begging of the friars. The mendicant is bamboozled by Farmer Thomas. However, the friar told the tale of a certain king who commanded his officer to take to execution a man charged with murder. On the way they encountered the man supposed to be murdered, and the officer led back the accused. The king, instead of discharging the innocent man, commanded all the three to be put to death—the officer, for disobeying orders; the accused, because the king had commanded him to be executed; and the man supposed to have been murdered, because he was the cause of death to the other two. (See PISO'S NOTION OF JUSTICE, p. 850.)

A sumpnor is a packman or pedlar.

Sun (The). The device of Edward III. was the sun bursting through a cloud. Hence Edward III. is called "our half-faced sun."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI. act iv. sc. 1 (1592).

Sun (City of the). Rhodes was so called, because Apollo was its tutelar deity. On or Heliopŏlis, Egypt, was a sun-city (Greek, helios polis, "sun city").

Sun Inn, Westminster. This sign was adopted because it was the badge of Richard II. The "sun" was the cognizance of the house of York.

Now is the winter of our discontent
Made glorious summer by this sun of York.
Shakespeare: Richard III. act i. sc. 1 (1597).

Sun-Steeds. Brontê ("thunder") and Amethĕa ("no loiterer"), Æthon ("fiery red") and Pyroïs ("fire"); Lampos ("shining like a lamp"), used only at noon; Philogĕa ("effulgence"), used only in the westering course.

(Phaëton ("the shining one") and Abraxas (the Greek numeral for 365) were the horses of Aurora or the morning sun.)

Sun on Easter Day. It was at one time maintained that the sun danced on Easter Day.

But oh! she dances such a way,
No sun upon an Easter Day
Is half so fine a sight.
Suckling: The Wedding (died 1641).

Whose beauty makes the sprightly sun
To dance, as upon Easter Day.
Cleveland: The General Eclipse (died 1659).

Sunday is the day when witches do penance.

Till on a day (that day is every prime [first day]),
When witches wont do penance for their crime.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, I. iii. 40 (1590).

Sunflower (The) is so called simply because the flower resembles a picture-sun, with its yellow petals like rays round its darker disc. Thomas Moore is in error when he says it turns towards the sun. I have had sunflowers turning to every point of the compass, and, after narrowly watching them, have seen in them no tendency to turn towards the sun, or to shift their direction.

The sunflower turns on her god, when he sets,
The same look which she turned when he rose.
Moore: Irish Melodies, ii. ("Believe Me, if all those Endearing Young Charms," 1814).

Sun'ith, one of the six Wise Men of the East led by the guiding star to Jesus. He had three holy daughters.—Klopstock: The Messiah, v. (1771).

Sunium's Marbled Steep, cape Colonna, once crowned with a temple of Minerva.

Here marble columns, long by time defaced,
Moss-covered, on the lofty cape are placed,
There reared by fair devotion to sustain
In older times Tritonia's sacred fane [temple of Minerva].
Falconer: The Shipwreck, iii. 5 (1762).

Sunshine of St. Eulalie' (3 syl.), Evangeline.

Sunshine of St. Eulălie was she called, for that was the sunshine
Which, as the farmers believed, would load their orchards with apples.
Longfellow: Evangeline, i. 1 (1849).

Super Grammat'icam, Sigismund emperor of Germany (1366, 1411–1437).

At the council of Constance, held 1414, Sigismund used the word schisma as a noun of the feminine gender (illa nefanda schisma). A prig of a cardinal corrected him, saying, "'Schisma,' your highness, is neuter gender;" when the kaiser turned on him with ineffable scorn, and said, "I am king of the Romans, and what is grammar to me?" [Ego sum rex Romanus [? Romanorum], et super grammaticam.]—Carlyle: Frederick the Great (1858).

Superb (The). Genŏa is called La Superba, from its general appearance from the sea.

Superstitions.

(1) About animals.
(2) About precious stones.
(3) (See WARNING-GIVERS.)

(1) Superstitions about Animals.

(1) ANT. When ants are unusually busy, foul weather is at hand.

Ants never sleep.—Emerson: Nature, iv.

Ants lay up food for winter use.—Prov. vi. 6–8; xxx. 25.

Ants' eggs are an antidote to love.

(2) ASS. The mark running down the back of an ass, and cut at right angles over the shoulders, is the cross of Christ, impressed on the animal because Christ rode on an ass in His triumphant entry into Jerusalem.

Three hairs taken from the "cross" of an ass will cure the hooping-cough, but the ass from which the hairs are plucked will die.

The ass is deaf to music, and hence Apollo gave Midas the ears of an ass, because he preferred the piping of Pan to the music of Apollo's lute.

(3) BARNACLE. A barnacle broken off a ship turns into a Solan goose.

Like your Scotch barnacle, now a block,
Instantly a worm, and presently a great goose.
Marston: The Malcontent (1604).

(4) BASILISK. The basilisk can kill at a distance by the "poison" of its glance.

There's not a glance of thine
But, like a basilisk, comes winged with death.
Lee: Alexander the Great, v. 2 (1678).

(5) BEAR. The cub of a bear is licked into shape and life by its dam.

So watchful Bruin forms with plastic care
Each growing lump, and brings it to a bear.
Pope: The Dunciad, i. 101 (1728).

(6) BEAVER. When a beaver is hunted, it bites off the part which the hunters seek, and then, standing upright, shows the hunters it is useless to continue the pursuit. — Eugenius Philalethes: Brief Natural History, 89.

(7) BEE. If bees swarm on a rotten tree, a death will occur in the family within the twelvemonth.

Swarmed on a rotten stick the bees I spied,
Which erst I saw when Goody Dobson dyed.
Gay: Pastoral, v. (1714).

Bees will never thrive if you quarrel with them or about them

If a member of the family dies and the bees are not put into mourning, they will forsake their hive.

It is unlucky for a stray swarm of bees to flight on your premises.

(8) BEETLE. Beetles are both deaf and blind.

(9) CAT. When cats wash their ears more than usual, rain is at hand.

When the cat washes her face over her ears, wee shall have great shore of raine.—Melton: Astrologaster, 45.

The sneezing of a cat indicates good luck to a bride.

Crastina nupturæ lux est prosperrima sponsæ:
Felix fele bonum sternuit omen amor.
Robert Keuchen: Crepundia, 413.

If a cat sneezes thrice, a cold will run through the family.

Satan's favourite form is that of a black cat, and hence it is the familiar of witches.

A cat has nine lives.

Tybalt. What wouldst thou have with me?
Mer. Good king of cats, nothing but one of your nine lives.—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, act iii. sc. 1 (1595).

(10) CHAMELEONS live on air only.

I saw him eat the air for food.
Lloyd: The Chameleon.

(11) COW. If a milkmaid neglects to wash her hands after milking, her cows will go dry.

Curst cows have curt horns. Curst means "angry, fierce."

God sends a curst cow short horns.—Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing, act ii. sc. 1 (1600).

(12) CRICKET. Crickets bring good luck to a house. To kill crickets is unlucky. If crickets forsake a house, a death in the family will soon follow.

It is a signe of death to some in a house, if the crickets on a sudden forsake the chimney.—Melton: Astrologaster, 45.

(13) CROCODILES moan and sigh, like persons in distress, to allure travellers and make them their prey.

As the mournful crocodile
With sorrow snares relenting passengers.
Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI. act iii sc. 1 (1591).

Crocodiles weep over the prey which they devour.

The crocodile will weep over a man's head when he [it] hath devoured the body, and then he will eat up the head too.—Bullokar: English Expositor (1616).

Paul Lucas tells us that the humming-bird and lapwing enter fearlessly the crocodile's mouth, and the creature never injures them, because they pick its teeth. —Voyage fait en 1714.

(14) CROW. If a crow croaks an odd number of times, look out for foul weather; if an even number, it will be fine.

[The superstitious] listen in the morning whether the crow crieth even or odd, and by that token presage the weather.—Dr. Hall: Characters of Vertues and Vices, p. 87.

If a crow flies over a house and croaks thrice, it is a bad omen.—Ramesey: Elminthologia, 271 (1668).

If a crow flutters about a window and caws, it forebodes a death.

Night crowes screech aloud,
Fluttering 'bout casements of departing soules.
Marston: Antonio and Mellida, ii. (1602).

Several crows fluttered about the head of Cicero on the day he was murdered by Popillius Lænas . . . one of them even made its way into his chamber, and pulled away the bedclothes.—Macaulay: History of St. Kilda, 176.

If crows flock together early in the morning, and gape at the sun, the weather will be hot and dry; but if they stalk at nightfall into water, and croak, rain is at hand.—Willsford: Nature's Secrets, 133.

When crows [? rooks] forsake a wood in a flock, it forebodes a famine.—Supplement to the Athenian Oracle, 476.

(15) DEATH-WATCH. The clicking or tapping of the beetle called a death-watch is an omen of death to some one in the house.

Chamber-maids christen this worm a "Death-watch," Because, like a watch, it always cries "click;" Then woe be to those in the house that are sick, For sure as a gun they will give up the ghost . . .

But a kettle of scalding hot water injected
Infallibly cures the timber infected;
The omen is broken, the danger is over,
The maggot will die, and the sick will recover.
Swift: Wood an Insect (1725).

(16) DOG. If dogs howl by night near a house, it presages the death of a sick inmate.

If doggs howle in the night neer an house where somebody is sick, 'tis a signe of death.—Dr. N. Home: Dæmonologie, 60.

When dogs wallow in the dust, expect foul weather: "Canis in pulvere volutans . . ."

Præscia ventorum, se volvit odora canum vis;
Numina diffatur pulveris instar homo.
Robert Kirchen: Crepundia, 211.

Dog's blood. The Chinese say that the blood of a dog will reveal a person who has rendered himself invisible.

(17) ECHINUS. An echinus, fastening itself on a ship's keel, will arrest its motion like an anchor.—Pliny: Natural History, xxxii. 1.

(18) EGG. The tenth egg is always the largest.

Decumana ova dicuntur, quia ovum decimum majus nascitur.—Festus.

(19) ELEPHANT. Elephants celebrate religious rites.—Pliny: Natural History, viii. 1.

Elephants have no knees.—Eugenius Philalethes: Brief Natural History, 89.

The elephant hath joints, but none for courtesy; his legs are for necessity, not for flexure.—Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, act iii. sc. 3 (1602).

(20) FISH. If you count the number of fish you have caught, you will catch no more that day.

(21) FROG. To meet a frog is lucky, indicating that the person is about to receive money.

Some man hadde levyr to mete a frogge on the way than a knight . . . for than they say and leve that they shal have golde.—Dives and Pauper (first precepte, xlvi., 1493).

When frogs croak more than usual, it is a sign of bad weather.

(22) GNATS. When gnats fly low, it indicates rain at hand. When they fly high, and are at all abundant, fine weather may be expected.

(23) GUINEA-PIG. A guinea-pig has no ears.

(24) HADDOCK. The black spot on each side of a haddock, near the gills, is the impression of St. Peter's finger and thumb, when he took the tribute money from the fish's mouth.

The haddock has spots on either side, which are the marks of St. Peter's fingers when he catched that fish for the tribute.—Matellus: Dialogues, &c., 57 (1693).

(25) HAIR. If a dog bites you, any evil consequence may be prevented by applying three of the dog's hairs to the wound.

Take the hair, it is well written,
Of the dog by which you're bitten;
Work off one wine by his brother,
And one labour by another.
Athenæus (ascribed to Aristophanes).

(26) HARE. It is unlucky if a hare runs across a road in front of a traveller. The Roman augurs considered this an ill omen.

If an hare cross their way, they suspect they shall be rob'd or come to some mischance.—Ramesey: Elminthologia, 271 (1668).

It was believed at one time that hares changed their sex every year.

(27) HEDGEHOG. Hedgehogs foresee a coming storm.—Bodenham: Garden of the Muses, 153 (1600).

Hedgehogs fasten on the dugs of cows, and drain off the milk.

(28) HORSE. If a person suffering from hooping-cough asks advice of a man riding on a piebald horse, the malady will be cured by doing what the man tells him to do.

A horse-shoe fastened inside a door will preserve from the influence of witches and the evil eye. (See TALISMANS, p. 1074.)

(29) JACKAL. The jackal is the lion's provider. It hunts with the lion, and provides it with food by starting prey as dogs start game.

(30) LADY-BUG. It is unlucky to kill a lady-bug.

(31) LAP-WING (The). A handmaid of the Virgin Mary, having purloined one of her mistress's dresses, was converted into a lapwing, and condemned for ever to cry, Tyvit! Tyvit! (i.e. "I stole it! I stole it!").

(32) LION. The lion will not injure a royal prince.

Fetch the Numidian lion I brought over;
If she be sprung from royal blood, the lion
Will do her reverence, else he will tear her.
Beaumont (?) and Fletcher: The Mad Lover (1617).
(Beaumont died 1616.)

The lion will not touch the true prince.—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 4 (1598).

The lion hates the game-cock and is jealous of it. Some say because the cock wears a crown (its crest); and others because it comes into the royal presence "booted and spurred."

The fiercest lion trembles at the crowing of a cock.—Pliny: Natural History, viii. 19.

According to legend, the lion's whelp is born dead, and remains so for three days, when the father breathes on it, and it receives life.

(33) LIZARD. The lizard is man's special enemy, but warns him of the approach of a serpent.

Lizards. When queen Elizabeth sent a sculptured lizard to the wife of the prince of Orange, the princess wrote back, "'Tis the fabled virtue of the lizard to awaken sleepers when a serpent is creeping up to sting them. Your majesty is the lizard, and the Netherlands the serpent. Pray God they may escape the serpent's tooth!"—Motley: The Dutch Republic, pt. iv. 5.

(34) MAGPIE. To see one magpie is unlucky; to see two denotes merriment or a marriage; to see three, a successful journey; four, good news; five, company.—Grose.

Another superstition is: "One for sorrow; two for mirth; three, a wedding; four, a death."

> One's sorrow, two's mirth,
> Three's a wedding, four's a birth,
> Five's a christening, six's a dearth,
> Seven's heaven, eight is hell,
> And nine's the devil his ane sel'.
> Old Scotch Rhyme.

In Lancashire, to see two magpies flying together is thought to be unlucky.

> I have heard my gronny say, hoode os leefe o seen two owd harries as two pynots [magpies].—Tim Bobbin: Lancashire Dialect, 31 (1775).

When the magpie chatters, it denotes that you will see strangers.

(35) MAN. A person weighs more fasting than after a good meal.

The Jews maintained that man has three natures—body, soul, and spirit. Diogĕnês Laertius calls the three natures body, phrên, and thumos; and the Romans called them manês, anĭma, and umbra.

There is a nation of pygmies. (See PYGMY, p. 885.)

The Patagonians are of gigantic stature.

There are men with tails, as the Ghilanes, a race of men "beyond the Sennaar;" the Niam-niams of Africa; the Narea tribes; certain others south of Herrar, in Abyssinia; and the natives in the south of Formosa. (See TAILS, p. 1071.)

(36) MARTIN. It is unlucky to kill a martin.

(37) MOLE. Moles are blind. Hence the common expression, "Blind as a mole."

> Pray you, tread softly, that the blind mole may not > Hear a footfall.
> Shakespeare: The Tempest, act iv. sc. 1 (1609).

(38) MOON-CALF, the offspring of a woman, engendered solely by the power of the moon.—Pliny: Natural History, x. 64.

(39) MOUSE. To eat food which a mouse has nibbled will give a sore throat

It is a bad omen if a mouse gnaws the clothes which a person is wearing.—Burton: Anatomy of Melancholy, 214 (1621).

A fried mouse is a specific for smallpox.

(40) OSTRICH. An ostrich can digest iron.

> Stephen. I could eat the very hilts for anger.
> Kno'well. A sign of your good digestion; you have an ostrich stomach.—Ben Jonson: Every Man in His Humour, iii. 1 (1598).

> I'll make thee eat iron like an ostrich, and swallow my sword.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI. act iv. sc. 10 (1591).

(41) OWL. If owls screech with a hoarse and dismal voice, it bodes impending calamity. (See OWL, p. 792.)

> The oulê that of deth the bodê bringeth.
> Chaucer: Assembly of Foules (1358).

(42) PELICAN. A pelican feeds its young brood with its blood.

> The pelican turneth her beak against her brest, and therewith pierceth it till the blood gush out, wherewith she nourisheth her young.—Eugenius Philalethes: Brief Natural History, 93.

> Than sayd the Pellycane,
> "When my brydts be slayne,
> With my bloude I them reuyue [revive]."
> Scrypture doth record,
> The same dyd our Lord,
> And rose from deth to lyue [life].
> Skelton: Armoury of Byrdts (died 1529).

> And, like the kind, life-rendering pelican,
> Repast them with my blood.
> Shakespeare: Hamlet, act iv. sc. 5 (1596).

(43) PHŒNIX. There is but one phœnix in the world, which, after many hundred years, burns itself to death, and from its ashes another phœnix rises up.

> Now I will believe, . . . that in Arabia
> There is one tree, the phœnix' throne; one phœnix
> At this hour reigning there.
> Shakespeare: The Tempest, act iii. sc. 3 (1609).

The phœnix is said to have fifty orifices in its bill, continued to its tail. After living its 1000 or 500 years, it builds itself a funeral pile, sings a melodious elegy, flaps its wings to fan the fire, and is burnt to ashes.

> The enchanted pile of that lonely bird
> Who sings at the last his own death-lay,
> And in music and perfume dies away.
> Moore: Lalla Rookh ("Paradise and the Peri," 1817).

The phœnix has appeared five times in Egypt: (1) in the reign of Sesostris; (2) in the reign of Amăsis; (3) in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphos; (4) a little prior to the death of Tiberius; and (5) during the reign of Constantine. Tacitus mentions the first three (Annales, vi. 28).

(44) PIG. In the fore feet of pigs is a very small hole, which may be seen when the pig is dead and the hair carefully removed. The legend is that the devils made their exit from the swine through the fore feet, and left these holes. There are also six very minute rings round each hole, and these are said to have been made by the devils' claws (Mark v. 11–13).

When pigs carry straw in their mouths, rain is at hand.

When swine carry bottles of hay or straw to hide them, rain is at hand.—The Husbandman's Practice, 137 (1664).

When young pigs are taken from the sow, they must be drawn away backwards, or the sow will be fallow.

The bacon of swine killed in a waning moon will waste much in the cooking.

When hogs run grunting home, a storm is impending.—The Cabinet of Nature, 262 (1637).

It is unlucky for a traveller if a sow crosses his path.

If, going on a journey on business, a sow cross the road, you will meet with a disappointment, if not an accident, before you return home.—Grose.

To meet a sow with a litter of pigs is very lucky.

If a sow is with her litter of pigs, it is lucky, and denotes a successful journey.—Grose.

Langley tells us this marvellous bit of etymology: "The bryde anoynteth the poostes of the doores with swynes grease, . . . to dryve awaye misfortune, wherefore she had her name in Latin uxor, 'ab ungendo' [to anoint]."—Translation of Polydore Vergil, 9.

(45) PIGEON. If a white pigeon settles on a chimney, it bodes death to some one in the house

No person can die on a bed or pillow containing pigeons' feathers.

If anybody be sick and lye a-dying, if they [sic] lie upon pigeons' feathers they will be languishing and never die, but be in pain and torment.—British Apollo, ii. No. 93 (1710).

The blue pigeon is held sacred in Mecca.—Pott.

(46) PORCUPINE. When porcupines are hunted or annoyed, they shoot out their quills in anger.

(47) RAT. Rats forsake a ship before a wreck, or a house about to fall.

They prepared
A rotten carcass of a boat; the very rats
Instinctively had quit it.
Shakespeare: The Tempest act I. sc. 2 (1609).

If rats gnaw the furniture of a room, there will be a death in the house ere long.—Grose.

(The bucklers at Lanuvium being gnawed by rats, presaged ill fortune, and the battle of Marses, fought soon after, confirmed the superstition.)

The Romans said that to see a white rat was a certain presage of good luck —Pliny: Natural History, viii. 57.

(48) RAVEN. Ravens are ill-omened birds.

The hoarse night raven, trompe of doleful dreere.
Spenser.

Ravens seen on the left-hand side of a person bode impending evil.

Sæpe sinistra cava prædixit ab ilice cornix.
Virgil: Bucolics. I.

Ravens call up rain.

Hark
How the curst raven, with her harmless voice,
Invokes the rain!
Smart: Hop Garden, II. (died 1770)

When ravens [? rooks] forsake a wood, it prognosticates famine.

This is because ravens bear the character of Saturn, the author of such calamities.—Athenian Oracle (supplement, 476).

Ravens forebode pestilence and death.

Like the sad-presaging raven, that tolls
The sick man's passport in her hollow beak,
And, in the shadow of the silent night,
Does shake contagion from her sable wing.
Marlowe: The Jew of Malta (1633)

Ravens foster forsaken children.

Some say that ravens foster forlorn children.
(?) Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus, act ii. sc. 3 (1593).

It is said that king Arthur is not dead, but is only changed into a raven, and will in due time resume his proper form and rule over his people gloriously.

The raven was white till it turned tell-tale, and informed Apollo of the faithlessness of Corônis. Apollo shot the nymph for her infidelity, but changed the plumage of the raven into inky blackness for his officious prating.—Ovid: Metamorphoses, ii.

He [Apollo] blacked the raven o'er,
And bid him prate in his white plumes no more.
Addison: Translation of Ovid, ii.

If ravens gape against the sun, heat will follow; but if they busy themselves in preening or washing, there will be rain.

(49) REM'ORA. A fish called the remora can arrest a ship in full sail.

A little fish that men call remora,
Which stopped her course, . . .
That wind nor tide could move her.
Spenser: Sonnets (1591).

(50) ROBIN. The red of a robin's breast is produced by the blood of Jesus. While the "Man of sorrows" was on His way to Calvary, a robin plucked a thorn from His temples, and a drop of blood, falling on the bird, turned its bosom red.

Another legend is that the robin used to carry dew to refresh sinners parched in hell, and the scorching heat of the flames turned its feathers red.

He brings cool dew in his little bill,
And lets it fall on the souls of sin;
You can see the mark on his red breast still,
Of fires that scorch as he drops it in.
Whittier: The Robin.

If a robin finds a dead body unburied, it will cover the face at least, if not the whole body.—Grey · On Shakespeare, ii. 226.

The robins so red, now these babies are dead,
Ripe strawberry leaves doth over them spread.
Babes in the Wood.

It is unlucky either to keep or to kill a robin. J. H. Pott says, if any one attempts to detain a robin which has sought hospitality, let him "fear some new calamity."—Poems (1780).

(51) SALAMANDER. The salamander lives in the fire.

Should a glass-house fire be kept up without extinction for more than seven years, there is no doubt but that a salamander will be generated in the cinders.—J. P. Andrews. Anecdotes, etc., 359.

The salamander seeks the hottest fire to breed in, but soon quenches it by the extreme chill of its body.—Pliny: Natural History, x. 67; xxix. 4.

Food touched by a salamander is poisonous.—Ditto, xxix. 23.

(52) SALIVA. The human saliva is a cure for blindness.—Ditto, xxviii. 7.

If a man spits on a serpent, it will die.—Ditto, vii. 2.

The human saliva is a charm against fascination and witchcraft.

Thrice on my breast I spit, to guard me safe
From fascinating charms.
Theocritus.

To unbewitch the bewitched, you must spit into the shoe of your right foot.—Scot: Discoverie of Witchcraft (1584).

Spitting for luck is a most common superstition.

Fishwomen generally spit upon their hansel.—Grose.

A blacksmith who has to shoe a stubborn horse, spits in his hand to drive off the "evil spirit."

The swarty smith spits in his buckthorne fist.
Browne: Britannia's Pastorals, i. (1613).

If a pugilist spits in his hand, his blows will be more telling.—Pliny: Natural History, xxviii. 7.

(53) SCORPION. Scorpions sting themselves—sometimes to death.

Scorpions have an oil which is a remedy for their stings.

'Tis true the scorpion's oil is said
To cure the wounds the venom made,
S. Butler: Hudibras, iii. 2 (1678).

(54) SPIDER. It is unlucky to kill a money-spinner.

Small spiders, called "money-spinners," prognosticate good luck, if they are not destroyed or removed from the person on whom they attach themselves.—Pard.

The bite of a spider is venomous.

No spider will spin its web on an Irish oak.

Spiders will never set their webs on a cedar roof.—Caughey: Letters (1845).

Spiders indicate where gold is to be found. (See SPIDERS INDICATORS OF GOLD, p. 1036.)

There are no spiders in Ireland, because St. Patrick cleared the island of all vermin.

Spiders envenom whatever they touch.

There may be in the cup
A spider steeped, and one may drink, depart,
And yet partake no evil.
Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, act ii. sc. 1 (1604).

A spider enclosed in a quilt and hung round the neck will cure the ague.—Mrs. Delany: A Letter dated March 1, 1743.

I . . . hung three spiders about my neck, and they drove my ague away.—Elias Ashmole: Diary (April 11, 1681).

A spider worn in a nutshell round the neck is a cure for fever.

Cured by the wearing a spider hung round one's neck in a nutshell.
Longfellow: Evangeline, ii. (1849).

Spiders spin only on dark days.

The subtle spider never spins
But on dark days his slimy gins.
S. Butler: On a Nonconformist, iv.

Spiders have a natural antipathy to toads.

(55) STAG. Stags draw, by their breath, serpents from their holes, and then trample them to death. (Hence the stag has been used to symbolize Christ.)—Pliny: Natural History, viii. 50.

(56) STORK. It is unlucky to kill a stork.

According to Swedish legend, a stork fluttered round the cross of the crucified Redeemer, crying, Styrkè! styrkè! ("Strengthen ye! strengthen ye!"), and was hence called the styrk or stork, but ever after lost its voice.

(57) SWALLOW. According to Scandinavian legend, this bird hovered over the cross of Christ, crying, Svalè! Svalè! ("Cheer up! cheer up!"), and hence it received the name of svalè or swallow, "the bird of consolation."

If a swallow builds on a house, it brings good luck. (See SWALLOW, p. 1064.)

Swallows spend the winter underground.

The swallow is said to bring home from the sea-shore a stone which gives sight to her fledglings.

Seeking with eager eyes that wondrous stone which the swallow
Brings from the shore of the sea, to restore the sight of its fledglings.
Longfellow: Evangeline, I. 2 (1849).

To kill a swallow is unlucky.

When swallows fly high, the weather will be fine.

When swallows fleet soar high and sport in air,
He told us that the welkin would be clear.
Gay: Pastoral, I. (1714).

(58) SWANS cannot hatch without a crack of thunder.

The swanne cannot hatch without a cracke of thunder.—Lord Northampton: Defensive, etc. (1583)

The swan retires from observation when about to die, and sings most melodiously. (See SWAN, p. 1064.)

Swans, a little before their death, sing most sweetly.—Pliny: Natural History, X. 23.

(59) TARANTULA. The tarantula is poisonous.

The music of a tarantula will cure its venomous bite.

(60) TOAD. Toads spit poison but they carry in their head an antidote thereto.

. . . the toad ugly and venomous,
Wears yet a precious jewel in its head.
Shakespeare: As You Like It, act II. sc. 1 (1600).

In the dog days, toads never open their mouths.

Toads are never found in Ireland, because St. Patrick cleared the island of all vermin.

(61) UNICORN. Unicorns can be caught only by placing a virgin in their haunts.

The horn of a unicorn dipped into a liquor will show if it contains poison.

(62) VIPER. Young vipers destroy their mothers when they come to birth.

(63) WEASEL. To meet a weasel is unlucky.—Congreve: Love for Love.

You never catch a weasel asleep.

(64) WOLF. If a wolf sees a man before the man sees the wolf, he will be struck dumb.

Men are sometimes changed into wolves.—Pliny: Natural History. (See WERE-WOLF.)

A wolf's tooth used at one time to be hung on the neck of a child to charm away fear.

(65) WREN. If any one kills a wren, he will break a bone before the year is out.

'A parted even just between twelve and one, e'en at the turning o' the tide.—Shakespeare: Henry V. act II. sc. 3 (Falstaff's death, 1599).

He [Barkis] dies when the tide goes out, confirming the superstition that people can't die till the tide goes out, or be born till it is in.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

If the fourth book of the Iliad be laid under the head of a patient suffering from quartan ague, it will cure him at once.

Maonias Iliados quartum suppone timenti.
Serenus Sammonicus: Prec. 50.

(See also TALISMANS, p. 1074.)

N.B.—There may possibly be a spice of truth in some of the above, especially those relating to the weather.

(2) Superstitions about Precious Stones.

R. B. means Rabbi Benoni (fourteenth century); S. means Streeter, Precious Stones (1877).

(1) AGATE quenches thirst, and, if held in the mouth, allays fever.—R. B.

It is supposed, at least in fable, to render the wearer invisible, and also to turn the sword of foes against themselves.

The agate is the emblem of health and long life, and is dedicated to June. In the Zodiac it stands for Scorpio.

(2) AMBER is a cure for sore throats and all glandular swellings.—R. B.

It is said to be a concretion of birds' tears.—Chambers.

Around thee shall glisten the loveliest amber
That ever the sorrowing sea-bird hath wept.
T. Moore: Lalla Rookh ("Fire-Worshippers," 1817).

The birds which wept amber were the sisters of Meleager, called Meleagrides, who never ceased weeping for their brother's death.—Pliny: Natural History, XXXVII. 2, 11.

(3) AMETHYST banishes the desire of drink, and promotes chastity.—R. B.

The Greeks thought that it counteracted the effects of wine.

The amethyst is an emblem of humility and sobriety. It is dedicated to February and Venus. In the Zodiac it stands for Sagittarius, in metallurgy for copper, in Christian art it is given to St. Matthew, and in the Roman Catholic Church it is set in the pastoral ring of bishops, whence it is called the "prelate's gem," or pierre d'évêque.

(4) CAT'S-EYE, considered by the Cingalese as a charm against witchcraft, and to be the abode of some genii.—S., 168.

(5) CORAL, a talisman against enchantments, witchcraft, thunder, and other perils of flood and field. Hence the use of coral necklaces. It was consecrated to Jupiter and Phœbus.—S., 233.

Red coral worn about the person is a certain cure for indigestion.—R. B.

(6) CRYSTAL induces visions, promotes sleep, and ensures good dreams.—R. B.

It is dedicated to the moon, and in metallurgy stands for silver.

(7) DIAMOND produces somnambulism, and promotes spiritual ecstasy.—R. B.

The diamond is an emblem of innocence, and is dedicated to April and the sun. In the Zodiac it stands for Virgo, in metallurgy for gold, in Christian art invulnerable faith.

(8) EMERALD promotes friendship and constancy of mind.—R. B.

If a serpent fixes its eyes on an emerald, it becomes blind.—Ahmed ben Abdalazis: Treatise on Jewels.

The emerald is an emblem of success in love, and is dedicated to May. In the Zodiac it signifies Cancer. It is dedicated to Mars, in metallurgy it means iron, and in Christian art is given to St. John.

(9) GARNET preserves health and joy.—R. B.

The garnet is an emblem of constancy, and, like the jacinth, is dedicated to January.

This was the carbuncle of the ancients, which they said gave out light in the dark.

(10) LOADSTONE produces somnambulism.—R. B.

It is dedicated to Mercury, and in metallurgy means quicksilver.

(11) MOONSTONE has the virtue of making trees fruitful, and of curing epilepsy.—Diascorides.

It contains in it an image of the moon, representing its increase and decrease every month.—Andreas Baccius.

(12) ONYX contains in it an imprisoned devil, which wakes at sunset and causes terror to the wearer, disturbing sleep with ugly dreams.—R. B.

Cupid, with the sharp point of his arrows, cut the nails of Venus during sleep, and the parings, falling into the Indus, sank to the bottom and turned into onyxes.—S., 212.

In the Zodiac it stands for Aquarius; some say it is the emblem of August and conjugal love; in Christian art it symbolizes sincerity.

(13) OPAL is fatal to love, and sows discord between the giver and receiver.—R. B.

Given as an engagement token, it is sure to bring ill luck.

The opal is an emblem of hope, and is dedicated to October.

(14) RUBY. The Burmese believe that rubies ripen like fruit. They say a ruby in its crude state is colourless, and, as it matures, changes first to yellow, then to green, then to blue, and lastly to a brilliant red, its highest state of perfection and ripeness.—S., 142.

The ruby signifies Aries in the Zodiacal signs; but some give it to December, and make it the emblem of brilliant success.

(15) SAPPHIRE produces somnambulism, and impels the wearer to all good works.—R. B.

In the Zodiac it signifies Leo, and in Christian art is dedicated to St. Andrew, emblematic of his heavenly faith and good hope. Some give this gem to April.

Les anciens regardaient la topaze comme utile contre l'épilepsie et la mélancolie.—Boullat: Dictionnaire Universel des Sciences, etc. (1855).

The topaz is an emblem of fidelity, and is dedicated to November. In the Zodiac it signifies Taurus, and in Christian art is given to St. James the Less.

(17) TURQUOISE, given by loving hands, carries with it happiness and good fortune. Its colour always pales when the well-being of the giver is in peril.—S., 170.

The turquoise is the emblem of prosperity, and is dedicated to December. It is the Saturnian stone, and stands for lead in metallurgy.

N.B.—A bouquet composed of diamonds, loadstones, and sapphires combined, renders a person almost invincible and wholly irresistible.—R. B.

All precious stones are purified by honey.

All kinds of precious stones cast into honey become more brilliant thereby, each according to its colour, and all persons become more acceptable when they join devotion to their graces. Household cares are sweetened thereby, love is more loving, and business becomes more pleasant.—S. F. de Sales: The Devout Life, iii. 13 (1708).

N.B.—To exhaust the subject of superstitions, even restricted to animals and precious stones, would require more pages than can be spared in this book.

Supporters in Heraldry represent the pages who supported the banner. These pages, before the Tudor period, were dressed in imitation of the beasts, etc., which typified the bearings or cognizances of their masters.

Sura, any one ethical revelation; thus each chapter of the Korân is a Sura.

Hypocrites are apprehensive lest a Sura should be revealed respecting them, to declare unto them that which is in their hearts.—Al Korân, ix.

Surface (Sir Oliver), the rich uncle of Joseph and Charles Surface. He appears under the assumed name of Premium Stanley.

Charles Surface, a reformed scapegrace, and the accepted lover of Maria the rich ward of sir Peter Teazle. In Charles, the evil of his character was all on the surface.

William Smith [1730-1790]. To portray upon the stage a man of the true school of gentility required pretensions of no ordinary kind, and Smith possessed these in a singular degree, giving to "Charles Surface" all that finish which acquired for him the distinction of Gentleman Smith."—Life of Sheridan (Bohn's edit.

Joseph Surface, elder brother of Charles, an artful, malicious, but sentimental knave; so plausible in speech and manner as to pass for a "youthful miracle of prudence, good sense, and benevolence." Unlike Charles, his good was all on the surface.—Sheridan: School for Scandal (1777).

(John Palmer (1747-1798) was so admirable in this character that he was called emphatically "The Joseph Surface.")

Surgeon's Daughter (The), a novel by sir Walter Scott, laid in the time of George II. and III., and published in 1827. The heroine is Menie Gray, daughter of Dr. Gideon Gray of Middlemas. Adam Hartley, the doctor's apprentice, loves her, but Menie herself has given her heart to Richard Middlemas. It so falls out that Richard Middlemas goes to India. Adam Hartley also goes to India, and, as Dr. Hartley, rises high in his profession. One day, being sent for to visit a sick fakir', he sees Menie Gray under the wing of Mme. Montreville. Her father had died, and she had come to India, under madame's escort, to marry Richard; but Richard had entrapped the girl for a concubine in the haram of Tippoo Saib. When Dr. Hartley heard of this scandalous treachery, he told it to Hyder Ali the father of Tippoo Saib. He and his son were so disgusted at the villainy that they condemned Richard Middlemas to be trampled to death by a trained elephant, and liberated Menie, who returned to her native country under the escort of Dr. Hartley.

Surgery (Father of French), Ambrose Paré (1517-1590).

Surly, a gamester and friend of sir Epicure Mammon, but a disbeliever in alchemy in general, and in "doctor" Subtle in particular.—Ben Jonson: The Alchemist (1610).

Surplus (Mr.), a lawyer; Mrs. Surplus; and Charles Surplus the nephew. —Morton: A Regular Fix.

Surrey (White), name of the horse used by Richard III. in the battle of Bosworth Field.

Saddle White Surrey for the field to-morrow. Shakespeare: King Richard III. act v. sc. 3 (1597).

Surtees Society (The), so named from Robert Surtees, the historian, who lived 1779-1834. It was established in 1834 for the publication of MSS. dealing with the history of the region lying between the Humber and the Forth, the Mersey and the Clyde.

Surtur, a formidable giant, who is to set fire to the universe at Ragnarök, with flames collected from Muspelheim.—Scandinavian Mythology.

Sur'ya (2 syl.), the sun-god, whose car is drawn by seven green horses, the charioteer being Dawn.—Sir W. Jones: From the Veda.

Susan means "white lily." Susannah, "my white lily." Susa, in Persia, received its name from its white lilies. (Hebrew and Persian.)

Susanna, the wife of Joacim. She was accused of adultery by the Jewish elders, and condemned to death; but Daniel proved her innocence, and turned the criminal charge on the elders themselves.—History of Susanna.

Susannah, in Sterne's novel entitled The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, Gentleman (1759).

Suspicious Husband (The), a comedy by Dr. Hoadly (1747). Mr. Strictland is suspicious of his wife, his ward Jacintha, and Clarinda a young lady visitor. With two attractive young ladies in the house, there is no lack of intrigue, and Strictland fancies that his wife is the object thereof; but when he discovers his mistake, he promises reform.

Sussex (The earl of), a rival of the earl of Leicester, in the court of queen Elizabeth; introduced by sir W. Scott in Kenilworth (1821).

Sut'leme'me (4 syl.), a young lady attached to the suite of Nouron'ihar the emir's daughter. She greatly excelled in dressing a salad.

Sutor. Ne sutor supra Crepidam. A cobbler, having detected an error in the shoe-latchet of a statue made by Apelles, became so puffed up with conceit that he proceeded to criticize the legs also; but

Apellês said to him, "Stick to the last, friend." The cobbler is qualified to pass an opinion on shoes, but anatomy is quite another thing. (See STIRRUPS, p. 1046.)

¶ Boswell, one night sitting in the pit of Covent Garden Theatre with his friend Dr. Blair, gave an imitation of a cow lowing, which the house greatly applauded. He then ventured another imitation, but failed; whereupon the doctor turned to him and whispered in his ear, "Stick to the cow."

¶ A wigmaker sent a copy of verses to Voltaire, asking for his candid opinion on some poetry he had perpetrated. The witty patriarch of Ferney wrote on the MS., "Make wigs," and returned it to the barber-poet.

¶ Pope advised Wycherly "to convert his poetry into prose."

Sutton (Sir William), uncle of Hero Sutton the City maiden.—Knowles: Woman's Wit, etc. (1838).

Suwarrow (Alexander), a Russian general, noted for his slaughter of the Poles in the suburbs of Warsaw in 1794, and the still more shameful butchery of them on the bridge of Prague. After having massacred 30,000 in cold blood, Suwarrow went to return thanks to God "for giving him the victory." Campbell, in his Pleasures of Hope, i., refers to this butchery; and lord Byron, in Don Juan, vii. 8, 55, to the Turkish expedition (1786–1792).

> A town which did a famous siege endure . . .
> By Suvaroff or Anglicè Suwarrow.
> Byron: Don Juan, vii. 8 (1824).

Suzanne, the wife of Chalomel the chemist and druggist.—J. R. Ware: Piperman's Predicament.

Swallow Stone. The swallow is said to bring home from the sea-shore a stone which gives sight to her fledglings.

> Oft in the barns they climbed to the populous nests on the rafters,
> Seeking with eager eyes that wondrous stone which the swallow
> Brings from the shore of the sea, to restore the sight of its fledglings.
> Longfellow: Evangeline, I. 1 (1849).

Swallow's Nest, the highest of the four castles of the German family called Landschaden, built on a pointed rock almost inaccessible. The founder was a noted robber-knight. (See SUPERSTITIONS, "Swallow," p. 1060.)

SWAN. Fionnuāla, daughter of Lir, was transformed into a swan, and condemned to wander for many hundred years over the lakes and rivers of Ireland, till the introduction of Christianity into that island. (See LIR, p. 617.)

(T. Moore has a poem on this subject in his Irish Melodies, entitled "The Song of Fionnuāla," 1814.)

Swan (The), called the bird of Apollo or of Orpheus (2 syl.). (See SUPERSTITIONS, "Swan," p. 1061.)

Swan (The knight of the), Helias king of Lyleforte, son of king Oriant and Beatrice. This Beatrice had eight children at a birth, one of which was a daughter. The mother-in-law (Matabrune) stole these children, and changed all of them, except Helias, into swans. Helias spent all his life in quest of his sister and brothers, that he might disenchant them and restore them to their human forms.—Thoms: Early English Prose Romances, iii. (1858).

> Eustachius venit ad Buillon ad domum ducissæ quæ uxor erat militis qui vocabatur "Miles Cygal."—Reiffenberg: Le Chevalier au Cygne.

Swan (The Order of the). This order was instituted by Frederick II. of Brandenburg, in commemoration of the mythical "Knight of the Swan" (1443).

Swan. The Mantuan Swan, Virgil, born at Mantua (B.C. 70–19).

The Sweet Swan of Avon. Shakespeare was so called by Ben Jonson (1564–1616).

The Swan of Cambray, Fénelon archbishop of Cambray (1651–1715).

The Swan of Lichfield, Miss Anna Seward, poetess (1747–1809).

The Swan of Padua, count Francesco Algarotti (1712–1764).

The Swan of the Meander, Homer, a native of Asia Minor, where the Meander flows (fl. B.C. 905).

The Swan of the Thames, John Taylor, "water-poet" (1580–1654).

> Taylor, their better Charon, lends an oar,
> Once Swan of Thames, tho' now he sings no more.
> Pope: The Dunciad, iii. 19 (1728).

Swan Alley, London. So called from the Beauchamps, who at one time lived there, and whose cognizance is a swan.

Swan-Tower of Cleves. So called because the house of Cleves professed to be descended from the "Knight of the Swan" (q.v.).

Swans and Thunder. It is said that swans cannot hatch without a crack of thunder. Without doubt, thunder is not unfrequent about the time of the year when swans hatch their young.

Swane (1 syl.) or Swegen, surnamed "Fork-Beard," king of the Danes, joins Alaff or Olaf [Tryggvesson] in an invasion of England, was acknowledged king, and kept his court at Gainsbury. He commanded the monks of St. Edmund's Bury to furnish him a large sum of money, and as it was not forthcoming, went on horseback at the head of his host to destroy the minster, when he was stabbed to death by an unknown hand. The legend is that the murdered St. Edmund rose from the grave and smote him.

The Danes landed here again . . .
With those disordered troops by Alaff hither led,
In seconding their Swane . . . but an English yet there was . . .
Who washed his secret knife in Swane's relentless gore.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xii. (1613).

Swanston, a smuggler.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Swaran, king of Lochlin (Denmark), son and successor of Starno. He invaded Ireland in the reign of Cormac II. (a minor), and defeated Cuthullin general of the Irish forces. When Fingal arrived, the tide of battle was reversed, and Swaran surrendered. Fingal, out of love to Agandecca (Swaran's sister), who once saved his life, dismissed the vanquished king with honour, after having invited him to a feast. Swaran is represented as fierce, proud, and high-spirited; but Fingal as calm, moderate, and generous.—Ossian: Fingal.

Swash-Buckler (A), a riotous, quarelsome person. Nash says to Gabriel Harvey, "Turpe senex miles, 'tis time for such an olde fool to leave playing the swash-buckler" (1598).

Swedenborgians (calling themselves the NEW JERUSALEM CHURCH) are believers in the doctrines taught in the theological writings of Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772). The principal points are that Jesus Christ is the only God and contains a Trinity of attributes; salvation is attained by obedience to the Lord's commandments; the sacred Scripture has a soul or spiritual sense, which exists among the angels, and this has now been revealed; "there is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body," and man continues to live on without interruption in the spiritual world when he drops his material body at death.

Swedish Nightingale (The), Jenny Lind, the public singer. She married Mr. Goldschmidt, and retired (1821–1886).

Swee'dlepipe (Paul), known as "Poll," barber and bird-fancier; Mrs. Gamp's landlord. He is a little man, with a shrill voice but a kind heart; in appearance "not unlike the birds he was so fond of." Mr. Sweedlepipe entertains a profound admiration of Bailey, senior, whom he considers to be a cyclopædia "of all the stable-knowledge of the time."—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Sweepclean (Saunders), a king's messenger at Knockwinnock Castle.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Sweet Singer of Israel (The), David, who wrote some of the Psalms.

Sweet Singer of the Temple, George Herbert, author of a poem called The Temple (1593–1633).

Sweno, son of the king of Denmark. While bringing succours to Godfrey, he was attacked in the night by Solyman, at the head of an army of Arabs, and himself with all his followers were left dead before they reached the crusaders. Sweno was buried in a marble sepulchre, which appeared miraculously on the field of battle, expressly for his interment (bk. viii.). — Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Sweno, Dani regis filius, cum mille quingentis equitibus cruce insignitis, transmisso ad Constantinopolem Bosphoro inter Antiochiam ad reliquos Latinos iter faciebat; insidiis Turcorum ad unum omnes cum regio juvene cæsi.—Paolo Emilio: History (1539).

¶ This is a very parallel case to that of Rhesus. This Thracian prince was on his march to Troy, bringing succours to Priam, but Ulysses and Diomed attacked him at night, slew Rhesus and his army, and carried off all the horses.—Homer: Iliad, x.

Swertha, housekeeper of the elder Mertoun (formerly a pirate).—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Swidger (William), custodian of a college. His wife was Milly, and his father Philip. Mr. Swidger was a great talker, and generally began with, "That's what I say," à propos of nothing.—Dickens: The Haunted Man (1848).

Swim. In the swim, in luck's way. The metaphor is borrowed from the Thames fishermen, who term that part of the river most frequented by fish the swim, and when an angler gets no bite, he is said to have cast his line out of the swim or where there is no swim.

. In university slang, to be in ill luck, ill health, ill replenished with money, is to be out of it (i.e. the swim).

Swimmers. (1) Leander used to swim across the Hellespont every night, to visit Hero.—Musæus: De Amore Herois et Leandri.

(2) Lord Byron and lieutenant Ekenhead accomplished the same feat in 1 hr. 10 min., the distance (allowing for drifting) being four miles.

(3) A young native of St. Croix, in 1817, swam over the sound "from Cronenburgh [? Cronberg] to Graves" in 2 hr. 40 min., the distance being six English miles.

(4) Captain Boyton, in May, 1875, swam or floated across the Channel from Grisnez to Fan Bay (Kent) in 23 hr.

(5) Captain Webb, August 24, 1875, swam from Dover to Calais, a distance of about thirty miles including drift, in 22 hr. 40 min.

(6) H. Gurr was one of the best swimmers ever known. J. B. Johnson, in 1871, won the championship for swimming.

Swing (Captain), a name assumed by certain persons who, between 1830 and 1833, used to send threatening letters to those who used threshing-machines. The letters ran thus—

Sir, if you do not lay by your threshing-machine, you will hear from Swing.

Swiss Family Robinson. This tale is an abridgment of a German tale by Joachim Heinrich Kampe.

Switzerland (Franconian), the central district of Bavaria.

The Saxon Switzerland, the district of Saxony both sides of the river Elbê.

Switzers, guards attendant on a king, irrespective of their nationality. So called because at one time the Swiss were always ready to fight for hire.

The king, in Hamlet, says, "Where are my Switzers?" i.e. my attendants; and in Paris to the present day we may see written up, Parlez au Suisse ("speak to the porter"), be he Frenchman, German, or of any other nation.

Law, logicke, and the Switzers may be hired to fight for anybody.—Nashe: Christ's Tears over Jerusalem (1594).

Swiveller (Mr. Dick), a dirty, smart young man, living in apartments near Drury Lane. His language was extremely flowery, and interlarded with quotations: "What's the odds," said Mr. Swiveller, à propos of nothing, "so long as the fire of the soul is kindled at the taper of conwiviality and the wing of friendship never moults a feather?" His dress was a brown body-coat with a great many brass buttons up the front, and only one behind, a bright check neckcloth, a plaid waistcoat, soiled white trousers, and a very limp hat, worn the wrong side foremost to hide a hole in the brim. The breast of his coat was ornamented with the cleanest end of a very large pocket-handkerchief; his dirty wristbands were pulled down and folded over his cuffs; he had no gloves, and carried a yellow cane having a bone handle and a little ring. He was for ever humming some dismal air. He said min for "man," forgit, jine; called wine or spirits "the rosy," sleep "the balmy," and generally shouted in conversation, as if making a speech from the chair of the "Glorious Apollers" of which he was perpetual "grand." Mr. Swiveller looked amiably towards Miss Sophy Wackles, of Chelsea. Quilp introduced him as clerk to Mr. Samson Brass, solicitor, Bevis Marks. By Quilp's request, he was afterwards turned away, fell sick of a fever, through which he was nursed by "the marchioness" (a poor house-drab), whom he married, and was left by his aunt Rebecca an annuity of £125.

"Is that a reminder to go and pay?" said Trent, with a sneer. "Not exactly, Fred," said Richard. "I enter in this little book the names of the streets that I can't go down while the shops are open. This dinner to-day closes Long Acre. I bought a pair of boots in Great Queen Street last week, and made that 'no thoroughfare' too. There's only one avenue to the Strand left open now, and I shall have to stop up that to-night with a pair of gloves. The roads are closing so fast in every direction, that in about a month's time, unless my aunt sends me a remittance, I shall have to go three or four miles out of town to get over the way."—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop, viii. (1840)

Sword. (For the names of the most famous swords in history and fiction, see Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 1196.) Add the following:—

Ali's sword, Zulfagar.

Koll the Thrall's sword, named Greysteel.

Ogier the Dane had two swords, made by Munifican, viz. Sauvagine and Courtain or Curtâna.

He [Ogier] drew Curtain his sword from out its sheath.
W. Morris: Earthly Paradise, 634.

Strong-o'-the-Arm had three swords, viz. Baptism, Florence, and Graban made by Ansias.

The Marvel of the Sword. When king Arthur first appears on the scene, he is brought into notice by the "Marvel of the Sword;" and sir Galahad, who was to achieve the holy graal, was introduced to knighthood by a similar adventure. That of Arthur is thus described—

In the greatest church of London . . . there was seen in the churchyard against the high altar a great stone, foursquare like to a marble stone, and in the midst thereof was an anvil of steel a foot in height, and therein stuck a fair sword naked by the point, and letters of gold were written about the sword that said thus: Whoso pulleth out this sword of this stone and anvil, is rightwise king born of England. [Arthur was the only person who could draw it out, and so he was acknowledged to be the rightful king.]—Pt. i. 3, 4.

¶ The sword adventure of sir Galahad, at the age of 15, is thus given—

The king and his knights came to the river, and they found there a stone floating, as it had been of red marble, and therein stuck a fair and rich sword, and in the pomell thereof were precious stones wrought with subtil letters of gold. Then the barons read the letters, which said in this wise: Never shall man take me hence, but only he by whom I ought to hang, and he shall be the best knight of the world. [Sir Galahad drew the sword easily, but no other knight was able to pull it forth.]—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 30, 31 (1470).

¶ A somewhat similar adventure occurs in the Amädis de Gaul. Whoever succeeded in drawing from a rock an enchanted sword, was to gain access to a subterranean treasure (ch. cxxx.; see also chs. lxxii., xcix.).

The Irresistible Sword. The king of Araby and Ind sent Cambuscan' king of Tartary a sword that would pierce any armour; and if the smiter chose he could heal the wound again by striking it with the flat of the blade.—Chaucer: The Squire's Tale (1388).

Sword and the Maiden (The). Soon after king Arthur succeeded to the throne, a damsel came to Camelot girded with a sword which no man defiled by "shame, treachery, or guile" could draw from its scabbard. She had been to the court of king Ryence, but no knight there could draw it. King Arthur tried to draw it, but with no better success; all his knights tried also, but none could draw it. At last a poor ragged knight named Balin, who had been held in prison for six months, made the attempt, and drew the sword with the utmost ease, but the knights insisted it had been done by witchcraft. The maiden asked sir Balin to give her the sword, but he refused to do so, and she then told him it would bring death to himself and his dearest friend; and so it did; for when he and his brother Balan jousted together, unknown to each other, both were slain, and were buried in one tomb.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 27-44 (1470).

Sword in the City Arms (London). Stow asserts that the sword or dagger in the City arms was not added in commemoration of Walworth's attack on Wat Tyler, but that it represents the sword of St. Paul, the patron saint of London. This is not correct. Without doubt the cognizance of the City, previous to 1381, was St. Paul's sword, but after the death of Tyler it was changed into Walworth's dagger.

Brave Walworth, knight, lord mayor, that slew
Rebellious Tyler in his alarmes;
The king, therefore, did give him in lieu
The dagger to the city armes.
Fishmongers' Hall ("Fourth Year of Richard II., 1381).

Sword-God. The Scythians worship a naked sword. Attila received his sword from heaven. (See Sir Edward Creasy, p. 153.)

Sword of God (The). Khaled, the conqueror of Syria (632-8), was so called by Mohammedans.

Sword of Rome (The), Marcellus. Fabius was called "The Shield of Rome" (time of Hannibal's invasion).

Swordsman (The Handsome). Joachim Murat was called Le Beau Sabreur (1767-1815).

Sybaris, a river of Lucania, in Italy, whose waters had the virtue of restoring vigour to the feeble and exhausted.—Pliny: Natural History, XXXI. ii. 10.

Syb'arite (3 syl.), an effeminate man, a man of pampered self-indulgence. Seneca tells us of a sybarite who could not endure the nubble of a folded rose leaf in his bed.

[Her bed] softer than the soft sybarite's, who cried
Aloud because his feelings were too tender
To brook a ruffled rose leaf by his side.
Byron: Don Juan, vi. 89 (1824).

Sybil, or "The Two Nations," a novel by Disraeli (lord Beaconsfield, 1845).

Sybil Warner, in lord Lytton's novel The Last of the Barons (1843).

Syc'orax, a foul witch, the mistress of Ariel the fairy spirit, by whom for some offence he was imprisoned in the rift of a cloven pine tree. After he had been kept there for twelve years, he was liberated by Prospero the rightful duke of Milan and father of Miranda. Sycorax was the mother of Caliban.—Shakespeare: The Tempest (1609).

If you had told Sycorax that her son Caliban was as handsome as Apollo, she would have been pleased, witch as she was.—Thackeray.

Those foul and impure mists which their pens, like the raven wings of Sycorax, had brushed from fern and bog.—Sir W. Scott: The Drama.

Syddall (Anthony), house-steward at Osbaldistone Hall.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Sydenham (Charles), the frank, open-hearted, trusty friend of the Woodvilles. —Cumberland: The Wheel of Fortune (1779).

Syl, a monster like a basilisk, with human face, but so terrible that no one could look on it and live. (See OURANABAD, p. 790.)

¶ Medusa's hair, changed into snakes, was so terrible that whosoever set eyes on it was changed to stone.

¶ The basilisk, king of serpents, looked any one dead who set eyes on it.

Sylla (Cornelius), the rival of Ma'rius. Being consul, he had ex-officio a right to lead in the Mithridatic war (B.C. 88), but Marius got the appointment of Sylla set aside in favour of himself. Sylla, in dudgeon, hastened back to Rome, and insisted that the "recall" should be reversed. Marius fled. Sylla pursued the war with success, returned to Rome in triumph, and made a wholesale slaughter of the Romans who had opposed him. As many as 7000 soldiers and 5000 private citizens fell in this massacre, and all their goods were distributed among his own partisans. Sylla was now called "Perpetual Dictator," but in two years retired into private life, and died the year following (B.C. 78).

(Jouy has a good tragedy in French called Sylla (1822), and the character of "Sylla" was a favourite one with Talma the French actor. In 1594 Thomas Lodge produced his historical play called Wounds of Civil War, lively set forth in the True Tragedies of Marius and Sylla.)

Sylli (Signor), an Italian exquisite, who walks fantastically, talks affectedly, and thinks himself irresistible. He makes love to Camiola "the maid of honour," and fancies, by posturing, grimaces, and affectation, to "make her dote on him." He says to her, "In singing, I am a Siren, in dancing, a Terpsichorê." "He could tune a ditty lovely well," and prided himself "on his pretty spider fingers, and the twinkling of his two eyes." Of course, Camiola sees no charms in these effeminacies; but the conceited puppy says he "is not so sorry for himself as he is for her" that she rejects him. Signor Sylli is the silliest of all the Syllis.—Massinger: The Maid of Honour (1637). (See TAPPERTIT.)

Sylva, Evelyn's treatise on forest trees (1664). Its object was to induce people to plant forest trees.

Sylvia, daughter of justice Balance, and an heiress. She is in love with captain Plume, but promised her father not to "dispose of herself to any man without his consent." As her father feared Plume was too much a libertine to make a steady husband, he sent Sylvia into the country to withdraw her from his society; but she dressed in her brother's military suit, assumed the name of Jack Wilfred alias Pinch, and enlisted. When the names were called over by the justices, and that of "Pinch" was brought forward, justice Balance "gave his consent for the recruit to dispose of [himself] to captain Plume," and the permission was kept to the letter, though not in its intent. However, the matter had gone too far to be revoked, and the father made up his mind to bear with grace what without disgrace he could not prevent.—Farquhar: The Recruiting Officer (1705).

I am troubled neither with spleen, choler, nor vapours. I need no salts for my stomach, no harts-horn for my head, nor wash for my complexion. I can gallop all the morning after the hunting-horn, and all the evening after a fiddle.—Act i. 2.

Sylvio de Rosalva (Don), the hero and title of a novel by C. M. Wieland (1733–1813). Don Sylvio, a quixotic believer in fairyism, is gradually converted to common sense by the extravagant demands which are made on his belief, assisted by the charms of a mortal beauty. The object of this romance is a crusade against the sentimentalism and religious foolery of the period.

Symkyn (Symond), nicknamed "Disdainful," a miller, living at Trompington, near Cambridge. His face was round, his nose flat, and his skull "pilled as an ape's." He was a thief of corn and meal, but stole craftily. His wife was the village parson's daughter, very proud and arrogant. He tried to outwit Aleyn and John, two Cambridge scholars, but was himself outwitted, and most roughly handled also. — Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Reeve's Tale," 1388).

Symmes's Hole. Captain John Cleve Symmes maintained that there was, at 82° N. lat., an enormous opening through the crust of the earth into the globe. The place to which it led he asserted to be well stocked with animals and plants, and to be lighted by two under-ground planets named Pluto and Proserpine. Captain Symmes asked sir Humphry Davy to accompany him in the exploration of this enormous "hole" (*–1829).

N.B.—Halley the astronomer (1656–1742) and Holberg of Norway (1684–1754) believed in the existence of Symmes's hole.

Symon'ides the Good, king of Pentap'olis.—Shakespeare: Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

Symphony (The Father of), Francis Joseph Haydn (1732–1809).

Symple'gades (4 syl.), two rocks at the entrance of the Euxine Sea. To navigators they sometimes look like one rock, and sometimes the light between shows they are two. Hence the ancient Greeks said that they opened and shut. Olivier says "they appear united or joined together according to the place from which they are viewed."

> . . . when Argo passed
> Through Bosphorus, betwixt the justling rocks.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 1017 (1665).

Synia, the portress of Valhalla.—Scandinavian Mythology.

Syntax (Dr.), a simple-minded, pious, hen-pecked clergyman, green as grass, but of excellent taste and scholarship, who left home in search of the picturesque. His adventures are told by William Coombe in eight-syllable verse, in three tours: (1) The Tour in Search of the Picturesque, published in 1812; (2) The Tour in Search of Consolation, published in 1820; and (3) The Tour in Search of a Wife, published in 1821.

(Other tours were published, but Coombe was not the author.)

Dr. Syntax's Horse was called Grizzle, all skin and bone.

Synter'esis, Conscience personified.

> On her a royal damsel still attends,
> And faithful counsellor, Synter'esis.
> P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, vi. (1633).

Syphax, chief of the Arabs who joined the Egyptian armament against the crusaders. "The voices of these allies were feminine, and their stature small."—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, xvii. (1575).

Syphax, an old Numidian soldier in the suite of prince Juba in Utica. He tried to win the prince from Cato to the side of Cæsar; but Juba was too much in love with Marcia (Cato's daughter) to listen to him. Syphax with his "Numidian horse" deserted in the battle to Cæsar, but the "hoary traitor" was slain by Marcus the son of Cato.—Addison Cato (1713).

Syrinx, a nymph beloved by Pan, and changed at her own request into a reed, of which Pan made his pipe.—Greek Fable.

Syrinx, in Spenser's Eclogue, iv., is Anne Boleyn, and "Pan" is Henry VIII. (1579).

T.

T. Tusser has a poem on Thriftiness, twelve lines in length, and in rhyme, every word of which begins with t (died 1580).

> The thrifty that teacheth the thriving to thrive,
> Teach timely to traverse, the thing that thou 'trive.
> Transferring thy toiling, to timeliness taught,
> This teacheth thee temp'rance, to temper thy thought.
> Take Trusty (to trust to) that thinkest to thee,
> That trustily thriftiness trowleth to thee.
> Then temper thy travell, to tarry the tide;
> This teacheth thee thriftiness, twenty times tryed.
> Take thankfull thy talent, thank thankfully those
> That thriftily teacheth [? teach thee] thy time to transpose.
> Troth twice to be teached, teach twenty times ten,
> This trade thou that takest, take thrift to thee then.
> Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, xlix. (1557).

Leon Placentius, a dominican, wrote a poem in Latin hexameters, called Pugna Porcorum, 253 lines long, every word of which begins with p (died 1548).

(See P, p. 793, for other alliterative verses.)

Taau, the god of thunder. The natives of the Hervey Islands believe that thunder is produced by the shaking of Taau's wings.—J. Williams: Missionary Enterprises in the South Sea Islands, 109 (1837).

Tabakiera, a magic snuff-box, which, upon being opened, said, Que quieres? ("What do you want?"); and upon being told the wish, it was there and then accomplished. The snuff-box is the counterpart of Aladdin's lamp, but appears in numerous legends slightly varied (see for example, Campbell's Tales of the West Highlands, ii. 293-303, "The Widow's Son").—Rev. W. Webster: Basque Legends, 94 (1876).

Tabarin, a famous vendor of quack medicines, born at Milan, who went to Paris in the seventeenth century. By his antics and rude wit he collected great crowds together, and in ten years (1620-30) became rich enough to buy a handsome château in Dauphine. The French aristocracy, unable to bear the satire of a charlatan in a château, murdered him.

(The jests and witty sayings of this farceur were collected together in 1622, and published under the title of L'Inventaire Universel des Œuvres de Tabarin, contenant ses Fantaisies, Dialogues, Paradoxes, Farces, etc. In 1858 an edition of his works was published by G. Aventin.)

Tabbard (The), the inn in Southwark from which Chaucer supposes his Pilgrims start for Canterbury.

A "tabbard" is a herald's coat.

Table Talk, a poem in ten-syllabic rhymes by Cowper, in the form of dialogue between A and B, published in 1782.

There are also the Table Talk of John Selden; the Table Talk of Coleridge (1835); the Table Talk of Samuel Rogers (1856); etc.

Tablets of Moses, a variety of Scotch granite, composed of felspar and quartz, so arranged as to present, when polished, the appearance of Hebrew characters on a white ground.

Tachebrune (2 syl.), the horse of Ogier le Dane. The word means "brown spot."

Taciturnian, an inhabitant of L'Isle Taciturne or Taciturna, meaning London and the Londoners.

A thick and perpetual vapour covers this island, and fills the souls of the inhabitants with a certain sadness, misanthropy, and irksomeness of their own existence. Alaciel [the genius] was hardly at the first barriers of the metropolis when he fell in with a peasant bending under the weight of a bag of gold; . . . but his heart was sad and gloomy, . . . and he said to the genius, "Joy! I know it not; I never heard of it in this island."—De la Dixmie: L'Isle Taciturne et l'Isle Enjouée (1759).

Tacket (Tibb), the wife of old Martin the shepherd of Julian Avenel of Avenel Castle.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Tackleton, a toy merchant, called Gruff and Tackleton, because at one time Gruff had been his partner; he had, however, been bought out long ago. Tackleton was a stern, sordid, grinding man; ugly in looks, and uglier in his nature; cold and callous, selfish and unfeeling; his look was sarcastic and malicious; one eye was always wide open, and one nearly shut. He ought to have been a money-lender, a sheriff's officer, or a broker, for he hated children and hated playthings. It was his greatest delight to make toys which scared children, and you could not please him better than to say that a toy from his warehouse had made a child miserable the whole Christmas holidays, and had been a nightmare to it for half its childlife. This amiable creature was about to marry May Fielding, when her old sweetheart Edward Plummer, thought to be dead, returned from South America, and married her. Tackleton was reformed by Peerybingle, the carrier, bore his disappointment manfully, sent the bride and bridegroom his own wedding-cake, and joined the festivities of the marriage banquet.—Dickens: The Cricket on the Hearth (1845).

Tactus, a character in the play called The Combat of the Tongue and the Five Senses, by Antony Brewer (1580), in which the tongue claims to be the Sixth Sense. When the play, says Chetwood, was performed at Cambridge in 1607, Oliver Cromwell took the part of Tactus, in which occur these words—

Roses and bays, pack hence! This crown and robe
My brows and body circles and invests.
How gallantly it fits me!

(The quotation affords a good hunting-ground for our Priscians.)

Taffril (Lieutenant), of H.M. gunbrig Search. He is in love with Jenny Caxton the milliner.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Taffy, a Welshman. The word is simply Davy (David) pronounced with aspiration. David is the most common Welsh name; Sawney (Alexander), the most common Scotch; Pat (Patrick), the most common Irish; and John (John Bull), the most common English. So we have cousin Michael for a German, Micaire for a Frenchman, Colin Tampon for a Swiss, and brother Jonathan in the United States of North America.

Taffy, that is, Talbot Wynne, of Yorkshire, an admirable character in Trilby, a novel by Du Maurier (1895). He marries Miss Bagot, "Little Billee's" sister.

Taffy in the Sedan chair, referred to in Goldsmith's Citizen of the World (1759), is this: One stormy night, when the streets (which were neither paved nor swept) were knee-deep in mud, Taffy was going in full fig (pumps and white silk stockings) to an evening party. So he hired a Sedan chair, but as it had neither seat nor bottom, he was obliged to slump through the dirty streets, wholly unable to pick his way, and at every step he took the bottom ledge of the Sedan knocked against his heels and made them bleed. On arriving at his friend's house, covered with blood and dirt, he was asked how he liked his accommodation. "Well," said Taffy, "I think it was almost as bad as walking."

Tag, wife of Puff, and lady's-maid to Miss Biddy Bellair.—Garrick: Miss in Her Teens (1753).

Tahmuras, a king of Persia, whose exploits in Fairy-land among the peris and deevs are fully set forth by Richardson in his Dissertation.

Tail made Woman (Man's). According to North American legend, God in anger cut off man's tail, and out of it made woman.

Tails (Men with). (1) The Niam-nianis, an African race between the gulf of Benin and Abyssinia, are said to have tails. Mons. de Castlenau (1851) tells us that the Niam-niams "have tails forty centimetres long, and between two and three centimetres in diameter." Dr. Hubsch, physician to the hospitals of Constantinople, says, in 1853, that he carefully examined a Niam-niam negress, and that her tail was two inches long. Mons. d'Abbadie, in his Abyssinian Travels (1852), tells us that south of the Herrar is a place where all the men have tails, but not the females. "I have examined," he says, "fifteen of them, and am positive that the tail is a natural appendage." Dr. Wolf, in his Travels and Adventures, ii. (1861), says, "There are both men and women in Abyssinia with tails like dogs and horses." He heard that, near Narea, in Abyssinia, there were men and women with tails so muscular that they could "knock down a horse with a blow."

(2) John Struys, a Dutch traveller, says, in his Voyages (1650), that "all the natives on the south of Formosa have tails." He adds that he himself personally saw one of these islanders with a tail "more than a foot long."

(3) It is said that the Ghilane race, which numbers between 30,000 and 40,000 souls, and dwell "far beyond the Senaar," have tails three or four inches long. Colonel du Corret assures us that he himself most carefully examined one of this race named Bellal, a slave belonging to an emir in Mecca, whose house he frequented.—World of Wonders, 206.

(4) The Poonangs of Borneo are said to be a tail-bearing race.

Individual Examples. (1) Dr. Hubsch, referred to above, says that he examined at Constantinople the son of a physician whom he knew intimately, who had a decided tail, and so had his grandfather.

(2) In the middle of the present (the nineteenth) century, all the newspapers made mention of the birth of a boy at Newcastle-on-Tyne with a tail, which "wagged when he was pleased."

(3) In the College of Surgeons at Dublin may be seen a human skeleton with a tail seven inches long.

Tails given by way of Punishment. (1) Polydore Vergil asserts that when Thomas à Becket came to Stroud, the mob cut off the tail of his horse; and in eternal reproach, "both they and their offspring bore tails." Lambarde repeats the same story in his Perambulation of Kent (1576).

For Becket's sake Kent always shall have tails.—Marvel.

(2) John Bale, bishop of Ossory in the reign of Edward VI., tells us that John Capgrave and Alexander of Esseby have stated it as a fact that certain Dorsetshire men cast fishes' tails at St. Augustine, in consequence of which "the men of this county have borne tails ever since."

(3) We all know the tradition that Cornishmen are born with tails.

Taillefer, a valiant warrior and minstrel in the army of William the Conqueror. At the battle of Hastings (or Senlac) he stimulated the ardour of the Normans by songs in praise of Charlemagne and Roland. The soldier-minstrel was at last borne down by numbers, and fell fighting.

He was a juggler or minstrel, who could sing songs and play tricks. . . . So he rode forth singing as he went, and as some say throwing his sword up in the air and catching it again.—E. A. Freeman: Old English History, 332.

Tailors (Nine). A toll of a bell is called a "teller," and at the death of a man the death-bell is tolled thrice three times. "Nine tellers mark a man" became perverted into "Nine tailors make a man."—Notes and Queries, March 4, 1877.

Tailors of Tooley Street. (See THREE TAILORS, p. 1104.)

Taish. Second sight is so called in Ireland.—Martin: Western Isles, 3.

Dark and despairing, my sight I may seal;
But man cannot cover what God would reveal.
'Tis the sunset of life gives me mystical lore,
And coming events cast their shadows before.
Campbell: Lochiel's Warning (1802).

Taj, in Agra (East India), the mausoleum built by shah Jehan to his favourite sultana Moomtaz-i-Mahul, who died in childbirth of her eighth child. It is of white marble, and is so beautiful that it is called "A Poem in Marble," and "The Marble Queen of Sorrow."

Takeley Street. All on one side, like Takeley Street. Takeley is a village entirely on one side of the high-road. It faces Hallingbury Park, and is on the north side of the road from Bishop's Stortford to Dunmow. (See ROODEN LANE, p. 931.)

Talbert [Tŏl'-but], John Talbert or rather Talbot, "The English Achillês," first earl of Shrewsbury (1373-1453).

Our Talbert, to the French so terrible in war,
That with his very name their babes they used to scare.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xviii. (1613).

TALBOT (John), a name of terror in France. Same as above.

They in France, to feare their young children, crye,
"The Talbot cometh!"—Hall: Chronicles (1545).

Is this the Talbot, so much feared abroad,
That with his name the mothers still their babes?
Shakespeare. 1 Henry VI. act iv. sc. 3 (1589).

Talbot (Colonel), an English officer, and one of Waverley's friends.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Talbot (Lord Arthur), a cavalier who won the love of Elvira daughter of lord Walton; but his lordship had promised his daughter in marriage to sir Richard Ford, a puritan officer. The betrothal being set aside, lord Talbot became the accepted lover, and the marriage ceremony was fixed to take place at Plymouth. In the mean time, lord Arthur assisted the dowager queen Henrietta to escape, and on his return to England was arrested by the soldiers of Cromwell, and condemned to death; but Cromwell, feeling secure of his position, commanded all political prisoners to be released, so lord Arthur was set at liberty, and married Elvira.—Bellini: I Puritani (1834).

Talbot (Lying Dick), the nickname given to Tyrconnel, the Irish Jacobite, who held the highest offices in Ireland in the reign of James II. and in the early part of William III.'s reign (died 1691).

Tale of a Tub, a comedy by Ben Jonson (1618). This was the last comedy brought out by him on the stage; the first was Every Man in His Humour (1598).

In the Tale of a Tub, he [Ben Jonson] follows the path of Aristoph'anês, and lets his wit run into low buffoonery, that he might bring upon the stage Inigo Jones, his personal enemy.—Sir W. Scott: The Drama.

Tale of a Tub, a religious satire by dean Swift (1704). Its object is to ridicule the Roman Catholics under the name of Peter, and the presbyterians under the name of Jack [Calvin]. The Church of England is represented by Martin [Luther].

Gulliver's Travels and the Tale of a Tub must ever be the chief corner-stones of Swift's fame.—Chambers: English Literature, ii. 547.

Tale of Two Cities (A), a novel by Dickens (1859). The two cities are London and Paris during the revolution of 1789.

Tales. (1) Chinese Tales, being the transmigrations of the mandarin Fum-Hoam, told to Gulchenraz daughter of the king of Georgia. (See FUM-HOAM, p. 398.)—Gueulette (originally in French, 1723).

(2) Fairy Tales, a series of tales, originally in French, by the comtesse D'Aulnoy (1698). Some are very near copies of the Arabian Nights. The best-known are "Chery and Fairstar," "The Yellow Dwarf," and "The White Cat."

(About the same time (1697), Claude Perrault published, in French, his famous Fairy Tales, chiefly taken from the Sagas of Scandinavia.)

(3) Moral Tales, twenty-three tales by Marmontel, originally in French (1761). They were intended for drafts of dramas. The design of the first tale, called "Alcibiădês," is to expose the folly of expecting to be loved "merely for one's self." The design of the second tale, called "Soliman II.," is to expose the folly of attempting to gain woman's love by any other means than reciprocal love; and so on. The second tale has been dramatized.

(4) Oriental Tales, by the comte de Caylus, originally in French (1743). A series of tales supposed to be told by Moradbak, a girl of 14, to Hudjadge shah of Persia, who could not sleep. It contains the tale of "The Seven Sleepers of Ephesus" (See MORADBAK, p. 724.)

Tales of Fashionable Life, by Maria Edgeworth. Three volumes appeared in 1809, and three more in 1812.

Tales of a Grandfather, in three series, by sir W. Scott; told to his grandson, "Hugh Littlejohn." His real name was John Hugh Lockhart, and he died on December 15, 1831, aged eleven years. These tales are supposed to be taken from Scotch chronicles, and embrace the most prominent and graphic incidents of Scotch history. Series i., to the amalgamation of the two crowns in James I.; series ii., to the union of the two parliaments in the reign of queen Anne; series iii., to the death of Charles Edward the Young Pretender.

Tales of My Landlord, tales supposed to be told by the landlord of the Wallace inn, in the parish of Gandercleuch, "edited and arranged by Jedediah Cleishbotham, schoolmaster and parish clerk" of the same parish, but in reality corrected and arranged by his usher, Peter or Patrick Pattison, who lived to complete five of the novels, but died before the last two were issued. These novels are arranged thus: First Series, "The Black Dwarf" and "Old Mortality;" Second Series, "Heart of Midlothian;" Third Series, "Bride of Lammermoor" and "Legend of Montrose;" Posthumous, "Count Robert of Paris" and "Castle Dangerous."—Sir W. Scott. (See Black Dwarf, introduction.)

Tales of the Crusaders, by sir W. Scott, include The Betrothed and The Talisman.

Tales of the Genii, that is, tales told by genii to Iracagem their chief, respecting their tutelary charges, or how they had discharged their functions as the guardian genii of man. Patna and Coulor, children of Giualar (imân of Terki), were permitted to hear these accounts rendered, and hence they have reached our earth. The genius Barhaddan related the history of his tutelary charge of Abu'dali, a merchant of Bagdad. The genius Mamlouk told how he had been employed in watching over the dervise Alfouran. Next, Omphram recounted his labours as the tutelar genius of Hassan Assar caliph of Bagdad. The genius Hassarack tells his experience in the tale of Kelaun and Guzzarat. The fifth was a female genius, by name Houadir, who told the tale of Urad, the fair wanderer, her ward on earth. Then rose the sage genius Macoma, and told the tale of the sultan Misnar, with the episodes of Mahoud and the princess of Cassimir. The affable Adiram, the tutelar genius of Sadak and Kalas'rade, told of their battle of life. Last of all rose the venerable genius Nadan, and recounted the history of his earthly charge named Mirglip the dervise. These tales, by James Ridley, 1765, are said to be from the Persian, and are ascribed to Horam son of Asmar.

Tales of the Hall, poems by Crabbe (1819).

Talgol, a butcher in Newgate market, who obtained a captain's commission in Cromwell's army for his bravery at Naseby.

> Talgol was of courage stout . . .
> Inured to labour, sweat, and toil,
> And, like a champion, shone with oil . . .
> He many a boar and huge dun cow
> Did, like another Guy, o'erthrow . . .
> With greater troops of sheep he'd fought
> Than Ajax or bold don Quixote.
> S. Butler: Hudibras, I. 2 (1663).

Taliesin or TALIESSIN, son of St. Henwig, chief of the bards of the West, in the time of king Arthur (sixth century). In the Mabinogion are given the legends connected with him, several specimens of his songs, and all that is historically known about him. The bursting in of the sea through the neglect of Seithenin, who had charge of the embankment, and the ruin which it brought on Gwyddno Garanhir, is allegorized by the bursting of a pot called the "caldron of inspiration," through the neglect of Gwion Bach, who was set to watch it.

> That Taliessen, once which made the rivers dance,
> And in his rapture raised the mountains from their trance,
> Shall tremble at my verse.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

Talisman (The), a novel by sir W. Scott, and one of the best of the thirty-two which he wrote (1825). It is the story of Richard Cœur de Lion being cured of a fever in the Holy Land, by the soldan. His noble enemy Saladin, hearing of his illness, assumed the disguise of Adonbec el Hakim, the physician, and visited the king. He filled a cup with spring water, into which he dipped the talisman, a little red purse that he took from his bosom, and when it had been steeped long enough, he gave the draught to the king to drink (ch. ix.). During the king's sickness, the archduke of Austria planted his own banner beside that of England; but immediately Richard recovered from his fever, he tore it down, and gave it in custody to sir Kenneth. While Kenneth was absent, he left his dog in charge of the banner; but on his return, found the dog wounded and the banner stolen. King Richard, in his rage, ordered sir Kenneth to execution, but pardoned him at the intercession of "the physician" (Saladin). Sir Kenneth's dog showed such a strange aversion to the marquis de Montserrat that suspicion was aroused, the marquis was challenged to single combat, and, being overthrown by sir Kenneth, confessed that he had stolen the banner. The love-story interwoven is that between sir Kenneth the prince royal of Scotland, and lady Edith Plantagenet the king's kinswoman, with whose marriage the tale concludes.

¶ This aversion of the dog is very like the aversion of Montdidier's dog Dragon to Macaire. (See MACAIRE, p. 646.)

Talismans. (1) In order to free a house of vermin, the figure of the obnoxious animal should be made in wax in "the planetary hour."—Warburton: Critical Inquiry into Prodigies . . . (1727).

> He swore that you had robbed his house,
> And stolen his talismanic louse.
> S. Butler: Hudibras, lii. 1 (1678).

(2) The Abraxas stone, a stone with the word ABRAXAS engraved on it, is a famous talisman. The word symbolizes the 365 intelligences between deity and man.

(3) In Arabia, a talisman, consisting of a piece of paper containing the names of the seven sleepers of Ephesus, is still used, "to ward the house from ghosts and demons."

(4) A stone with a hole through it is sometimes hung on the handle of a stable key to keep off evil spirits.

(The subject is a very long one.)

The Four Talismans. Houna, surnamed Seidel-Beckir, a talismanist, made three of great value: viz. a little golden fish, which would fetch out of the sea whatever it was bidden; a poniard, which rendered invisible not only the person bearing it, but all those he wished to be so; and a ring of steel, which enabled the wearer to read the secrets of men's hearts. The fourth talisman was a bracelet, which preserved the wearer from poison. —Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("The Four Talismans," 1743).

Talking Bird (The), called Bulbul-he'zar. It had the power of human speech, and when it sang all the song-birds in the vicinity came and joined in concert. It was also oracular, and told the sultan the tale of his three children, and how they had been exposed by the sultana's two jealous sisters.—Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters," the last tale).

(The talking bird is called "the little green bird" in "The Princess Fairstar," one of the Fairy Tales of the comtesse D'Aulnoy, 1682.)

Tallboy (Old), forester of St. Mary's Convent. — Sir W. Scott: Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Talleyrand. This name, anciently written "Tailleran," was originally à sobriquet derived from the words tailler les rangs ("cut through the ranks").

 Talleyrand is erroneously credited with the mot, "La parole a été donnée à l'homme pour l'aider à cacher sa pensée [or déguiser la penser]." (See SPEECH, p. 1035.)

Talos, son of Perdix, sister of Dædălos, inventor of the saw, compasses, and other mechanical instruments. His uncle, jealous of him, threw him down from the citadel of Athens, and he was changed into a partridge.

Talos, a man of brass, made by Hephaistos (Vulcan). This wonderful automaton was given to Minos to patrol the island of Crete. It traversed the island thrice every day, and if a stranger came near, made itself red hot, and squeezed him to death.

Talus, an iron man, representing power or the executive of a state. He was Astræa's groom, whom the goddess gave to sir Artĕgal. This man of iron, "unmovable and resistless without end," "swift as a swallow, and as a lion strong," carried in his hand an iron flail, "with which he threshed out falsehood, and did truth unfold." When sir Artegal fell into the power of Radigund queen of the Amăzons, Talus brought Britomart to the rescue.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 1 (1596).

Talût. So the Mohammedans call Saul.

> Verily God hath set Talût king over you . . . Samuel said, Verily God hath chosen him, and hath caused him to increase in knowledge and stature.—Al Kordn, ii.

Talvi, a pseudonym of Mrs. Robinson. It is simply the initials of her maiden name, Therese Albertine Louise von Iakob.

Tam O'Shanter, a tale by Burns, which he considered his best. Founded on a legend that no sort of bogie could pass the middle of a running stream. Tam saw a hellish legion dancing in Alloway Kirk (near Ayr), and being excited cried out, "Weel done, Cutty Sark!" Immediately the lights were extinguished, and Tam rode for his life to reach the river Doon. He had himself passed the mid-stream, but his horse's tail had not reached it, so Cutty Sark caught hold of it and pulled it off (1791).

Tam o' Todshaw, a huntsman, near Charlie's Hope farm.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Tam o' the Cowgate, the sobriquet of sir Thomas Hamilton, a Scotch lawyer, who lived in the Cowgate, at Edinburgh (*–1563).

Tamburlaine the Great, the Tartar conqueror (1336–1405). In history called Tamerlane (q.v.).

(The hero and title of a tragedy by C. Marlow (1587). Shakespeare (2 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 4) makes Pistol quote a part of this turgid play.

> Holla, ye pampered jades of Asia.
> What! can ye draw but twenty miles a day,
> And have so proud a chariot at your heels,
> And such a coachman as great Tamburlaine?

In the stage direction—

> Enter Tamburlaine, drawn in his chariot by Trebizon and Soria, with bits in their mouths, reins in his left hand, in his right a whip with which he scourgeth them.

(See TAMERLANE.)

Tame (1 syl.), a river which rises in the vale of Aylesbury, at the foot of the Chiltern, and hence called by Drayton "Chiltern's son." Chiltern's son" marries Isis (Cotswold's heiress), whose son and heir is Thames. This allegory forms the subject of song xv. of the Polyolbion, and is the most poetical of them all.

Tamer Tamed (The), a kind of sequel to Shakespeare's comedy The Taming of the Shrew. In the Tamer Tamed, Petruchio is supposed to marry a second wife, by whom he is hen-pecked. —Fletcher (1647).

Tamerlane, emperor of Tartary, in Rowe's tragedy so called, is a noble, generous, high-minded prince, the very glass and fashion of all conquerors, in his forgiveness of wrongs, and from whose example Christians may be taught their moral code. Tamerlane treats Bajazet, his captive, with truly godlike clemency, till the fierce sultan plots his assassination. Then longer forbearance would have been folly, and the Tartar had his untamed captive chained in a cage, like a wild beast. —Rowe: Tamerlane (1702).

(It is said that Louis XIV. was Rowe's "Bajazet," and William III. his "Tamerlane.")

∴ Tamerlane is a corruption of Timour Lengh ("Timour the Lame"). He was one-handed and lame also. His name was used by the Persians in terrorem. (See TAMBURLAINE THE GREAT.)

Taming of the Shrew (The), a comedy by Shakespeare (1594). The "shrew" is Kathari'na, elder daughter of Baptista of Padua. She is tamed by the stronger mind of Petruchio into a most obedient and submissive wife.

(This drama is founded on A pleasaunt conceited Historie, called The Taming of a Shrew. As it hath beene sundry times acted by the right honourable the Earle of Pembrooke his servants, 1607.)

The induction is borrowed from Heuterus, Rerum Burgundearum, iv., a translation of which into English, by E. Grimstone, appeared in 1607. The same trick was played by Haroun-al-Raschid on the merchant Abou Hassan (Arabian Nights, "The Sleeper Awakened"); and by Philippe the Good of Burgundy. (See Burton: Anatomy of Melancholy, II. ii. 4; see also The Frolicksome Duke or the Tinker's Good Fortune, a ballad. See Percy: Reliques.)

N.B.—Beaumont and Fletcher wrote a kind of sequel to this comedy, called The Tamer Tamed, in which Petruchio is supposed to marry a second wife, by whom he is hen-pecked (1647).

¶ The Honeymoon, a comedy by Tobin (1804), is a similar plot; but the shrew is tamed with far less display of obstreperous self-will.

Tami'no and Pami'na, the two lovers who were guided by the magic flute through all worldly dangers to the knowledge of divine truth (or the mysteries of Isis).—Mozart: Die Zauberflöte (1791).

Tammany, an Indian chief, called in the United States St. Tammany, and adopted as the tutelary genius of one branch of the democratic party. The chief was of the Delaware nation, and lived in the seventeenth century. He was a great friend of the Whites, and often restrained the violence of his warriors against them. His great motto was, "Union, in peace for prosperity, in war for defence." It is said that he still appears at times, and discourses on political economy and social wisdom. St. Tammany's Day is May 1.

The Americans sometimes call their tutelar saint Tamendy, a corruption of Tammenund, the renowned chief.—F. Cooper.

Tammany Ring, a cabal; a powerful organization of unprincipled officials, who grow rich by plundering the people. So called from Tammany Hall, the headquarters of the high officials of the United States. Their corrupt practices were exposed in 1871.

Tammuz, the month of July. St. Jerome says the Hebrews and Syrians call the month of June "Tammuz." (See THAMMUZ.)

Tam'ora, queen of the Goths, in love with Aaron the Moor.—(?) Shakespeare: Titus Andron'icus (1593).

N.B.—The classic name is Andronicus, but Titus Andronicus is a purely fictitious character.

Tamper (Colonel), betrothed to Emily. (For the plot, see EMILY, p. 323.)—Colman, sen.: The Deuce is in Him (1762).

Tamson (Peg), an old woman at Middlemas village.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Tanaquill, wife of Tarquinius priscus of Rome. She was greatly venerated by the Romans, but Juvenal uses the name as the personification of an imperious woman with a strong independent will. In the Faërie Queene Spenser calls Gloriana (queen Elizabeth) "Tanaquill" (bk. i. introduction, 1590).

TANCRED, son of Eudes and Emma. He was the greatest of all the Christian warriors except Rinaldo. His one fault was "woman's love," and that woman Corinda, a pagan (bk. i.). He brought 800 horse to the allied crusaders under Godfrey of Bouillon. In a night combat, Tancred unwittingly slew Corinda, and lamented her death with great and bitter lamentation (bk. xii.). Being wounded, he was tenderly nursed by Erminia, who was in love with him (bk. xix.).—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

(Rossini has an opera entitled Tancredi, 1813.)

Tancred, prince of Otranto, one of be crusaders, probably the same as the one above.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Tancred, or The New Crusader, a romance by Disraeli (lord Beaconsfield). Tancred is a young English nobleman who visits the Holy Land, but ruins himself in purposeless adventures (1847).

Tancred (Count), the orphan son of Manfred, eldest grandson of Roger I. of Sicily, and rightful heir to the throne. His father was murdered by William the Bad, and he himself was brought up by Siffre'di lord high chancellor of Sicily. While only a count, he fell in love with Sigismunda the chancellor's daughter; but when king Roger died, he left the throne to Tancred, provided he married Constantia, daughter of William the Bad, and thus united the rival lines. Tancred gave a tacit consent to this arrangement, intending all the time to obtain a dispensation from the pope, and marry the chancellor's daughter; but Sigismunda could not know his secret intentions, and, in a fit of irritation, married the earl Osmond. Now follows the catastrophe: Tancred sought an interview with Sigismunda, to justify his conduct, but Osmond challenged him to fight. Osmond fell, and stabbed Sigismunda when she ran to his succour.—Thomson: Tancred and Sigismunda (1745).

Tancredi, the Italian form of Tancred (q.v.). The best of the early operas of Rossini (1813).

Tankard (Squire), candidate with sir Harry Foxchase, opposed to lord Place and colonel Promise.—Fielding: Pasquin (1736).

Tanner of Tamworth (The), the man who mistook Edward IV. for a highwayman. After some little altercation, they changed horses, the king giving his hunter for the tanner's cob worth about four shillings; but as soon as the tanner mounted the king's horse, it threw him, and the tanner gladly paid down a sum of money to get his old cob back again. King Edward now blew his hunting-horn, and the courtiers gathered round him. "I hope [i.e. expect] I shall be hanged for this," cried the tanner; but the king, in merry pin, gave him the manor of Plumpton Park, with 300 marks a year. —Percy: Reliques, etc.

Tannhäuser (Sir), called in German the Ritter Tannhäuser, a Teutonic knight, who wins the love of Lisaura, a Mantuan lady. Hilario the philosopher often converses with the Ritter on supernatural subjects, and promises that Venus herself shall be his mistress, if he will summon up his courage to enter Venusberg. Tannhäuser starts on the mysterious journey, and Lisaura, hearing thereof, kills herself. At Venusberg the Ritter gives full swing to his pleasures, but in time returns to Mantua, and makes his confession to pope Urban. His holiness says to him, "Man, you can no more hope for absolution than this staff which I hold in my hand can be expected to bud." So Tannhäuser flees in despair from Rome, and returns to Venusberg. Meanwhile the pope's staff actually does sprout, and Urban sends in all directions for the Ritter, but he is nowhere to be found.

(Tieck, in his Phantasus (1812) introduces the story. Wagner (in 1845) brought out an operatic spectacle, called Tannhäuser. The companion of Tannhäuser was Eckhardt.)

¶ The tale of Tannhäuser is substantially the same as that of Thomas of Erceldoun, also called "Thomas the Rhymer," who was so intimate with Faëry folk that he could foretell what events would come to pass. He was also a bard, and wrote the famous lay of Sir Tristrem. The general belief is that the seer is not dead, but has been simply removed from the land of the living to Faëry-land, whence occasionally he emerges, to busy himself with human affairs. Sir W. Scott has introduced the legend in Castle Dangerous, v. (See ERCELDOUN, p. 328.)

Taouism, the system of Taou, that invisible principle which pervades everything. Pope refers to this universal divine permeation in the well-known lines: it—

> Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,
> Glows in the stars, and blossoms in the trees,
> Lives through all life, extends through all extent,
> Spreads undivided, operates unspent.
> Pope: Essay on Man, i. (1733).

Tapestried Chamber (The), a tale by sir W. Scott, laid in the reign of George II. There are but two characters introduced. General Browne goes on a visit to lord Woodville, and sleeps in the "tapestered chamber," which is haunted. He sees the "lady in the Sacque," describes her to lord Woodville next morning, and recognizes her picture in the portrait-gallery.

> The back of this form was turned to me, and I could observe, from the shoulders and neck, it was that of an old woman, whose dress was an old-fashioned gown, which, I think, ladies call a sacque—that is, a sort of robe completely loose in the body, but gathered into broad plaits upon the neck and shoulders, which fall down to the ground, and terminate in a species of train.

Tap'ley (Mark), an honest, light-hearted young man, whose ambition was "to come out jolly" under the most unfavourable circumstances. Greatly attached to Martin Chuzzlewit, he leaves his comfortable situation at the Blue Dragon to accompany him to America, and in "Eden" has ample opportunities of "being jolly" so far as wretchedness could make him so. On his return to England, he marries Mrs. Lupin, and thus becomes landlord of the Blue Dragon.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit, xiii., xxi., etc. (1843).

> Charles [VII. of France] was the Mark Tapley of kings, and bore himself with his usual "jollity" under this afflicting news. It was remarked of him that "no one could lose a kingdom with greater gaiety"—White.

Tappertit (Sim, i.e. Simon), the apprentice of Gabriel Varden, locksmith. He was just 20 in years, but 200 in conceit. An old-fashioned, thin-faced, sleek-haired, sharp-nosed, small-eyed little fellow was Mr. Sim Tappertit, about five feet high, but thoroughly convinced in his own mind that he was both good-looking and above the middle size, in fact, rather tall than otherwise. His figure, which was slender, he was proud of; and with his legs, which in knee-breeches were perfect curiosities of littleness, he was enraptured. He had also a secret notion that the power of his eye was irresistible, and he believed that he could subdue the haughtiest beauty "by eyeing her." Of course, Mr. Tappertit had an ambitious soul, and admired his master's daughter Dolly. He was captain of the secret society of "'Prentice Knights," whose object was "vengeance against their tyrant masters." After the Gordon riots, in which Tappertit took a leading part, he was found "burnt and bruised, with a gun-shot wound in his body, and both his legs crushed into shapeless ugliness." The cripple, by the locksmith's aid, turned shoe-black under an archway near the Horse Guards, thrived in his vocation, and married the widow of a rag-and-bone collector. While an apprentice, Miss Miggs, the "protestant" shrewish servant of Mrs. Varden, cast an eye of hope on "Simmun;" but the conceited puppy pronounced her "decidedly scraggy," and disregarded the soft impeachment.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841). (See SYLLI, p. 1068.)

Taproba'na, the island of Ceylon.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Tapwell (Timothy), husband of Froth, put into business by Wellborn's father, whose butler he was. When Wellborn was reduced to beggary, Timothy behaved most insolently to him; but as soon as he supposed he was about to marry the rich dowager lady Allworth, the rascal fawned on him like a whipped cur.—Massinger: A New Way to Pay Old Debts (1625).

Tara (The Hill of), in Meath, Ireland. Here the kings, the clergy, the princes, and the bards used to assemble in a large hall, to consult on matters of public importance.

> The harp that once thro' Tara's halls
> The soul of music shed,
> Now hangs as mute on Tara's walls
> As if that soul were fled.
> Moore: Irish Melodies ("The Harp that Once . . ." 1814).

The Fes of Tara, the triennial convention established by Ollam Fodlah or Ollav Fola, in B.C. 900 or 950. When business was over, the princes banqueted together, each under his shield suspended by the chief herald on the wall according to precedency. In the reign of Cormac, the palace of Tara was 900 feet square, and contained 150 apartments, and 150 dormitories each for sixty sleepers. As many as 1000 guests were daily entertained in the hall.

Tara's Psaltery or Psalter of Tara, the great national register or chronicles of Ireland, read to the assembled princes when they met in Tara's Hall in public conference.

> Their tribe, they said, their high degree,
> Was sung in Tara's Psaltery.
> Campbell: O'Connor's Child.

Tarpa (Spurius Metius), a famous critic of the Augustan age. He sat in the temple of Apollo with four colleagues to judge the merit of theatrical pieces before they were produced in public.

> He gives himself out for another Tarpa; decides boldly, and supports his opinions with loudness and obstinacy.—Lesage: Gil Blas, xi. 10 (1735).

Tarpe'ian Rock. So called from Tarpeia, daughter of Spurius Tarpeius governor of the citadel on the Saturnian (i.e. Capitoline) Hill of Rome. The story is that the Sabines bargained with the Roman maid to open the gates to them, for the "ornaments on their arms." As they passed through the gates, they threw on her their shields, saying, "These are the ornaments we bear on our arms." She was crushed to death, and buried on the Tarpeian Hill. Ever after, traitors were put to death by being hurled headlong from the hill-top.

> Bear him to the rock Tarpeian, and from thence > Into destruction cast him.
> Shakespeare: Coriolanus, act iii. sc. 1 (1610).

N.B.—G. Gilfillan, in his introduction to Longfellow's poems, makes an erroneous allusion to the Roman traitress. He says Longfellow's "ornaments, unlike those of the Sabine [sic] maid, have not crushed him."

Tarquin, a name of terror in Roman nurseries.

> The nurse, to still her child, will tell my story,
> And fright her crying babe with Tarquin's name.
> Shakespeare: Rape of Lucrece (1594).

The Fall of Tarquin. The well-known Roman story of Sextus Tarquinius and Lucretia has been dramatized by various persons, as: N. Lee (1679); John Howard Payne, Brutus or The Fall of Tarquin (1820)—this is the tragedy in which Edmund Kean appeared with his son Charles at Glasgow, the father taking "Brutus" and the son "Titus." Arnault produced a tragedy in French, entitled Lucrèce, in 1792; and Ponsard in 1843. Alfieri has a tragedy called Brutus, on the same subject. It also forms indirectly the subject of one of the lays of lord Macaulay, called The Battle of the Lake Regillus (1842), a battle undertaken by the Sabines for the restoration of Tarquin, but in which the king and his two sons were left dead upon the field.

Tarquinius (Sextus), having violated Lucretia wife of Tarquinius Collatinus, caused an insurrection in Rome, whereby the magistracy of kings was changed for that of consuls.

¶ A parallel case is given in Spanish history: Roderick the Goth, king of Spain, having violated Florinda daughter of count Julian, was the cause of Julian's inviting over the Moors, who invaded Spain, drove Roderick from the throne, and the Gothic dynasty was set aside for ever.

Tartaro, the Basque Cyclops; of giant stature and cannibal habits, but not without a rough bonhommie. Intellectually very low in the scale, and invariably beaten in all contests with men. Galled in spirit by his ill success, the giant commits suicide. Tartaro, the son of a king, was made a monster out of punishment, and was never to lose his deformity till he married. One day, he asked a girl to be his bride, and on being refused, sent her "a talking ring," which talked without ceasing immediately she put it on; so she cut off her finger and threw it into a large pond, and there the Tartaro drowned himself.—Rev. W. Webster: Basque Legends, 1-4 (1876).

In one of the Basque legends, Tartaro is represented as a Polyphēmos. (See ULYSSES AND POLYPHEMOS.)

Tartlet (Tim), servant of Mrs. Pattypan, to whom also he is engaged to be married. He says, "I loves to see life, because vy, 'tis so agreeable."—Cobb: The First Floor, i. 2 (1756-1818).

Tartuffe (2 syl.), the chief character and title of a comedy by Molière (1664). Tartuffe is a religious hypocrite and impostor, who uses "religion" as the means of gaining money, covering deceit, and promoting self-indulgence. He is taken up by one Orgon, a man of property, who promises him his daughter in marriage; but his true character being exposed, he is not only turned out of the house, but is lodged in jail for felony.

(Isaac Bickerstaff has adapted Molière's comedy to the English stage, under the title of The Hypocrite (1768). Tartuffe he calls "Dr. Cantwell," and Orgon "sir John Lambert." It is thought that "Tartuffe" is a caricature of Père la Chaise, the confessor of Louis XIV., who was very fond of truffles (French, tartuffes), and that this suggested the name to the dramatist.)

Tartuffe (Kaiser), William I. the king of Prussia and German emperor (1797-1888).

> I write to you, my dear Augusta,
> To say we've had a reg'lar "buster.
> Ten thousand Frenchmen sent below;
> "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow."
> Punch (during the Franco-Prussian war).

N.B.—I pass no opinion on this allusion, but simply state an historic fact; and the quotation given suffices to confirm it.

Tartuffe of the Revolution. J. N. Pache is so called by Carlyle (1740-1823).

> Swim Pache sits sleek-headed, frugal, the wonder of his own ally for humility of mind. . . . Sit there, Tartuffe, till wanted.—Carlyle.

Task (The), a poem in blank verse, in six books, of about five hundred lines each, by Cowper. The books are called respectively "The Sofa," "The Timepiece," "The Garden," "The Winter's Evening," "The Morning Walk," and "The Evening Walk" (1783-5).

Tasnar, an enchanter, who aided the rebel army arrayed against Misnar sultan of Delhi. A female slave undertook to kill the enchanter, and went with the sultan's sanction to carry out her promise. She presented herself to Tasnar and Ahu'bal, and presented papers which she said she had stolen. Tasnar, suspecting a trick, ordered her to be bow-strung, and then detected a dagger concealed about her person. Tasnar now put on the slave's dress, and, transformed into her likeness, went to the sultan's tent. The vizier commanded the supposed slave to prostrate "herself" before she approached the throne, and while prostrate he cut off "her" head. The king was angry, but the vizier replied, "This is not the slave, but the enchanter. Fearing this might occur, I gave the slave a pass-word, which this deceiver did not give, and was thus betrayed. So perish all the enemies of Mahomet and Misnar his vicegerent upon earth!"—Sir C. Morell [J. Ridley]: Tales of the Genii, vi. (1751).

Tasnim, a fountain in Mahomet's paradise; so called from its being conveyed to the very highest apartments of the celestial mansions.

> They shall drink of pure wine . . . and the water mixed therewith shall be of Tasnim, a fountain whereof those shall drink who approach near unto the divine presence.—Al Koran, lvi.

Tasso and Leonora. When Tasso the poet lived in the court of Alfonso II. the reigning duke of Ferrara, he fell in love with Leonora d'Este (2 syl.) the duke's sister; but "she saw it not or viewed with disdain" his passion, and the poet, moneyless, fled half mad to Naples. After an absence of two years, in which the poet was almost starved to death by extreme poverty, his friends, together with Leonora, induced the duke to receive him back; but no sooner did he reach Ferrara than Alfonso sent him to an asylum, and here he was kept for seven years, when he was liberated by the instigation of the pope. But he died soon afterwards (1544-1595).

Taste, a farce by Foote (1753), to expose the imposition of picture-dealers and sellers of virtu generally.

Tasting Death. The rabbis say there are three drops of gall on the sword of death: one drops in the mouth and the man dies; from the second the pallor of death is suffused; from the third the carcase turns to dust.—Purchas: His Pilgrimage (1613).

Tati'nus, a Greek who joined the crusaders with a force of 200 men armed with "crooked sabres" and bows. These Greeks, like the Parthians, were famous in retreat; but when a drought came they all sneaked off home.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, xiii. (1575).

Tatius (Achilles), the acolyte, an officer in the Varangian guard.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Tatlanthe (3 syl.), the favourite of Fadladinida (queen of Queerummania and wife of Chrononhotonthologos). She extols the warlike deeds of the king, supposing the queen will feel flattered by her praises; and Fadladinida exclaims, "Art mad, Tatlanthe? Your talk's distasteful. . . . You are too pertly lavish in his praise!" She then guesses that the queen loves another, and says to herself, "I see that I must tack about," and happening to mention "the captive king," Fadladinida exclaims, "That's he! that's he! that's he! I'd die ten thousand deaths to set him free." Ultimately the queen promises marriage to both the captive king and Rigdum-Funnidos "to make matters easy." Then, turning to her favourite, she says—

> And now, Tatlanthe, thou art all my care;
> Where shall I find thee such another pair?
> Pity that you, who've served so long and well,
> Should die a virgin and lead apes in hell.
> Choose for yourself, dear girl, our empire round;
> Your portion is twelve hundred thousand pound.
> Carey: Chrononhotonthologos (1734).

Tatler (The), a serial started by Richard Steele in 1709, and continued to 1711.

Tattle, a man who ruins characters by innuendo, and so denies a scandal as to confirm it. He is a mixture of "lying, foppery, vanity, cowardice, brag, licentiousness, and ugliness, but a professed beau" (act i.). Tattle is entrapped into marriage with Mrs. Frail.—Congreve: Love for Love (1695).

("Mrs. Candour," in Sheridan's School for Scandal (1777), is a Tattle in petti coats.)

Tattycoram, a handsome girl, with lustrous dark hair and eyes, who dressed very neatly. She was taken from the Foundling Hospital (London) by Mr. Meagles to wait upon his daughter. Tattycoram was called in the hospital Harriet Beadle. Harriet was changed first to Hatty, then to Tatty, and Coram was added because the Foundling Hospital was established by Captain Coram. She was most impulsively passionate, and when excited had no control over herself. Miss Wade enticed her away for a time, but afterwards she returned to her first friends.—Dickens: Little Dorrit (1857).

Tavern of Europe (The). Paris was called by prince Bismarck, Le Cabaret de l'Europe.

Tawny (The). Alexandre Bonvici'no the historian was called Il Moretto (1514-1564).

Tawny Coats, sumpners, apparitors, officers whose business it was to summon offenders to the courts ecclesiastical, attendants on bishops.

> The bishop of London met him, attended on by a goodly company of gentlemen in tawny coats.—Stow: Chronicles of England, 822 (1561).

Taylor, "the water-poet," called the Swan of the Thames. He wrote four score books, but never learnt "so much as the accidents" (1580-1654).

> Taylor, their better Charon, lends an oar,
> Once Swan of Thames, tho' now he sings no more.
> Pope: The Dunciad, iii. 19 (1728).

Taylor (Dr. Chevalier John). He called himself "Opthalminator, Pontificial, Imperial, and Royal." He died 1767. Hogarth has introduced him in his famous picture "The Undertakers' Arms." He is one of the three figures atop, to the left hand of the spectator; the other two are Mrs. Mapp and Dr. Ward.

Teacher of Germany (The), Philip Melancthon, the reformer (1497-1560).

Teachwell (Mrs.), a pseudonym of lady Ellinor Fenn, wife of sir John Fenn, of East Dereham, Norfolk.

Teague (1 syl.), an Irish lad, taken into the service of colonel Careless, a royalist, whom he serves with exemplary fidelity. He is always blundering, and always brewing mischief, with the most innocent intentions. His bulls and blunders are amusing and characteristic.

—Howard: The Committee (1670), altered by T Knight into The Honest Thieves.

Who . . has not a recollection of the incomparable Johnstone [Irish Johnstone] in "Teague," picturesquely draped in his blanket, and pouring forth his exquisite humour and mellifluous brogue in equal measure?—Mrs C. Mathews: Tea Table Talk.

∴ The anecdote of Munden, as "Obadiah," when Johnstone, as "Teague," poured a bottle of lamp-oil down his throat instead of sherry-and-water, is one of the raciest ever told. (See OBADIAH, p. 766.)

Tearless Battle (The), a battle fought B.C. 367, between the Lacedæmonians and the combined armies of the Arcadians and Argives (2 syl.). Not one of the Spartans fell, so that, as Plutarch says, they call it "The Tearless Battle."

¶ Not one was killed in the Abyssinian expedition under sir R. Napier (1867-8).

Tears—Amber. The tears shed by the sisters of Pha'ëton were converted into amber —Greek Fable.

Around thee shall glisten the loveliest amber
That ever the sorrowing sea-bird hath wept.
T. Moore: Lalla Rookh ("Fire-Worshippers," 1817).

(According to Pliny (Natural History, xxxvii. 2, 11), amber is a concretion of birds' tears. But the birds were the sisters of Meleäger, who never ceased weeping for his untimely death.)

Tearsheet (Doll), a common courtezan.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. (1598).

Teazle (Sir Peter), a man who, in old age, married a country girl who was lively and fond of pleasure. Sir Peter was for ever nagging at her for her inferior birth and rustic ways, but secretly loving her and admiring her naïveté. He says to Rowley, "I am the sweetest-tempered man alive, and hate a teasing temper, and so I tell her ladyship a hundred times a day."

No one could deliver such a dialogue as is found in "sir Peter Teazle," with such point as T. King [1730-1805]. He excelled in a quiet, sententious manner of speech. There was an epigrammatic style in everything he uttered. His voice was musical, his action slow, his countenance benignant and yet firm.—Watkins: Life of Sheridan (1817).

Lady Teazle, a lively, innocent, country maiden, who married sir Peter, old enough to be her grandfather. Planted in London in the whirl of the season, she formed a liaison with Joseph Surface; but being saved from disgrace, repented and reformed.—Sheridan: School for Scandal (1777).

On April 3, 1797, Miss Farren, about to marry the earl of Derby, took her final leave of the stage in the character of "lady Teazle." Her concluding words were applicable in a very remarkable degree to herself: "Let me request, lady Sneerwell, that you will make my respects to the scandalous college of which you are a member, and inform them that lady Teazle, licentiate, begs leave to return the diploma they granted her, as she now leaves off practice, and kills characters no longer." A passionate burst of tears here revealed the sensibility of the speaker, while a stunning burst of applause followed from the audience, and the curtain was drawn down upon the play, for no more would be listened to.—Mrs. C. Mathews

Teeth. Rigord, an historian of the thirteenth century, tells us that the number of human teeth was reduced when Chosroës the Persian carried away the true cross discovered by St. Helëna. Before that time Christians were furnished with thirty and in some cases with thirty-two teeth, but since then no human being has had more than twenty-three teeth. (See Historiens de France, xviii.)

∴ The normal number of teeth is thirty-two still. This "historic fact" is of a piece with that which ascribes to woman one rib more than to man (Gen. ii. 21, 22).

Teetotal. The origin of this word is ascribed to Richard (Dicky) Turner, who, in addressing a temperance meeting in September, 1833, reduplicated the word total to give it emphasis: "We not only want total abstinence, we want more, we want t-total abstinence." The novelty and force of the expression took the meeting by storm.

It is not correct to ascribe the word to Mr. Swindlehurst of Preston, who is erroneously said to have stuttered.

N.B.—Both these statements are mere tales. The fact is this: The old temperance party used to place O. P. (Old Pledge) after their names; but the new party put T. (total) after their names.

Te'ian Muse (The), Anacreon, born at Teïos, in Ionia, and called by Ovid (Tristia, ii. 364) Teïa Musa (B.C. 563-478).

The Scian and the Teian Muse . . . [Simonidês and Anacreon]
Have found the fame your shores refuse.
Byron: Don Juan, iii. 86 ("The Isles of Greece," 1820).

∴ Probably Byron meant Simonidês of Ceos. Horace (2 Odes 1, 38) speaks of "Ceæ munera næniæ," meaning Simonidês; but Scios or Scio properly means Chios, one of the seven places which laid claim to Homer. Both Ceos and Chios are isles of Greece.

Teilo (St.), a Welsh saint, who took an active part against the Pelagian heresy. When he died, three cities contended for his body, but happily the multiplication of the dead body into three put an end to the strife. Capgrave insists that the ipsissime body was at Llandaff.—English Martyrology.

Teirtu's Harp, which played of itself, merely by being asked to do so, and when desired to cease playing did so.—The Mabinogion ("Kilhwch and Olwen," twelfth century).

¶ St. Dunstan's harp discoursed most enchanting music without being struck by any player.

¶ The harp of the giant, in the tale of Jack and the Bean-Stalk, played of itself. In one of the old Welsh tales, the dwarf named Dewryn Fychan stole from a giant a similar harp.

Telemachos, the only son of Ulysses and Penelŏpê. When Ulysses had been absent from home nearly twenty years, Telemachos went to Pylos and Sparta to gain information about him. Nestor received him hospitably at Pylos, and sent him to Sparta, where Menelāos told him the prophecy of Proteus (2 syl.) concerning Ulysses. Telemachos then returned home, where he found his father, and assisted him in slaying the suitors. Telemachos was accompanied in his voyage by the goddess of wisdom, under the form of Mentor, one of his father's friends. (See TÉLÉMAQUE.)—Greek Fable.

Télémaque (Les Aventures de), a French prose epic, in twenty-four books, by Fénelon (1699). The first six books contain the story of the hero's adventures told to Calypso, as Ænēas told the story of the burning of Troy and his travels from Troy to Carthage to queen Dido. Télémaque says to the goddess that he started with Mentor from Ithăca in search of his father, who had been absent from home for nearly twenty years. He first went to inquire of old Nestor if he could give him any information on the subject, and Nestor told him to go to Sparta, and have an interview with Menelāos. On leaving Lacedæmonia, he got shipwrecked off the coast of Sicily, but was kindly entertained by king Acestês, who furnished him with a ship to take him home (bk. i.). This ship falling into the hands of some Egyptians, he was parted from Mentor, and sent to feed sheep in Egypt. King Sesostris, who conceived a high opinion of the young man, would have sent him home, but he died; and Télémaque was incarcerated by his successor in a dungeon overlooking the sea (bk. ii.). After a time, he was released, and sent to Tyre. Here he would have been put to death by Pygmalĭon, had he not been rescued by Astarbê, the king's mistress (bk. iii.). Again he embarked, reached Cyprus, and sailed thence to Crete. In this passage he saw Amphitrītê, the wife of the sea-god, in her magnificent chariot drawn by sea-horses (bk. iv.). On landing in Crete, he was told the tale of king Idoměneus (4 syl.), who made a vow if he reached home in safety after the siege of Troy, to offer in sacrifice the first living being that came to meet him. This happened to be his own son; but when Idomeneus proceeded to do according to his vow, the Cretans were so indignant that they drove him from the island. Being without a ruler, the islanders asked Télémaque to be their king (bk. v.). This he declined, but Mentor advised the Cretans to place the reins of government in the hands of Aristodēmos. On leaving Crete, the vessel was again wrecked, and Télémaque with Mentor was cast on the island of Calypso (bk. vi.). Calypso fell in love with the young prince, and, in order to detain him in her island, burnt the ship which Mentor had built to carry him home. Mentor, however, being resolved to quit the island, threw Télémaque from a crag into the sea, and then leaped in after him. They had now to swim for their lives, and keep themselves afloat till they were picked up by some Tyrians (bk. vii.). The captain of the ship was very friendly to Télémaque, and promised to take him to Ithaca, but the pilot by mistake landed him on Salentum (bk. ix.). Here Télémaque, being told that his father was dead, determined to go down to the infernal regions to see him (bk. xviii.). In hadês he was informed that Ulysses was still alive (bk. xix.). So he returned to the upper earth (bk. xxii.), embarked again, and this time reached Ithaca, where he found his father; and Mentor left him.

Tell (Guglielmo or William), chief of the confederates of the forest cantons of Switzerland, and son-in-law of Walter Furst. Having refused to salute the Austrian cap which Gessler, the governor, had set up in the market-place of Altorf, he was condemned to shoot an apple from the head of his own son. Tell succeeded in this perilous task, but, letting fall a concealed arrow, was asked by Gessler with what intent he had secreted it. "To kill thee, tyrant," he replied, "if I had failed." The governor now ordered him to be carried in chains across lake Lucerne to Küssnacht Castle, "there to be devoured alive by reptiles;" but, a violent storm having arisen on the lake, he was unchained, that he might take the helm. Gessler was on board, and when the vessel neared the castle, Tell leapt ashore, gave the boat a push into the lake, and shot the governor. After this he liberated his country from the Austrian yoke (1307).

¶ This story of William Tell is told of a host of persons. For example: Egil, the brother of Wayland, was commanded by king Nidung to shoot an apple from the head of his son. Egil, like Tell, took two arrows, and being asked why, replied, as Tell did to Gessler, "To shoot thee, tyrant, if I fail in my task."

¶ A similar story is told of Olaf and Eindridi, in Norway. King Olaf dared Eindridi to a trial of skill. An apple was placed on the head of Eindridi's son, and the king shooting at it grazed the boy's head, but the father carried off the apple clean. Eindridi had concealed an arrow to aim at the king, if the boy had been injured.

¶ Another Norse tale is told of Hemingr and Harald son of Sigurd (1066). After various trials of skill, Harald told Hemingr to shoot a nut from the head of Bjorn, his young brother. In this he succeeded, not with an arrow, but with a spear.

¶ A similar tale is related of Geyti, son of Aslak, and the same Harald. The place of trial was the Faroe Isles. In this case also it was a nut placed on the head of Bjorn.

¶ Saxo Grammaticus tells nearly the same story of Toki, the Danish hero, and Harald; but in this trial of skill Toki killed Harald.—Danorum Regum Heroumque Historia (1514).

¶ Reginald Scot says that Puncher shot a penny placed on his son's head, but had another arrow ready to slay the duke Remgrave who had set him the task (1584).

N.B.—It is said of Domitian, the Roman emperor, that if a boy held up his hands with the fingers spread, he could shoot eight arrows in succession through the spaces without touching one of the fingers.

¶ The story is told of Korroglu, the famous Persian bandit poet. When the lad Demurchy Oglou applied to be admitted into his band, Kurroglu commanded him to sit on the ground in the Persian manner. He then placed an apple on the lad's head with a ring from his own finger on the top of it. The bandit shot sixty arrows through the ring. As the lad neither winced nor changed colour, he was instantly admitted into the band.

¶ William of Cloudesley, to show the king his skill in shooting, bound his eldest son to a stake, put an apple on his head, and at the distance of 300 feet, cleft the apple in two without touching the boy.

> I have a son is seven year old,
> He is to me full dear.
> I will hym tye to a stake . . .
> And lay an apple upon his head,
> And go six score paces hym fro,
> And I myselfe with a broad arrow
> Will cleve the apple in two.
> Percy: Reliques.

(Similar feats of skill are told of Adam Bell and Clym of the Clough.)

Historic facts in confirmation of Tell's exploit. In Altorf market-place, the spot is still pointed out where Tell shot the apple from his son's head, and Kissling's statue has four reliefs on the pedestal: (1) Tell shooting the apple; (2) Tell leaping from the boat; (3) Gessler's death; and (4) the death of Tell at Schachenbach. Of course, there are no proofs of the historic fact, any more than the numerous traditions and monuments of Romulus are a proof that such a person ever existed, or Tennyson's Idylls of king Arthur and his knights of the Table-Round.

> See Romen fire in Hampden's bosom swell,
> And fate and freedom in the shaft of Tell.
> Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, i. (1799).

(The legend of William Tell has furnished Florian with the subject of a novel in French (1788); A. M. Lemierre with his tragedy of Guillaume Tell (1766); Schiller with a tragedy in German, Wilhelm Tell (1804); Knowles with a tragedy in English, William Tell (1840); and Rossini with the opera of Guglielmo Tell, in Italian, 1829.)

> Macready's performance in Tell [Knowles's drama] is always first rate. No actor ever affected me more than Macready did in some scenes of that play [1793-1873].—Rogers.

Tellus's Son, Antæos son of Posei'don and Gê, a giant wrestler of Lib'ya, whose strength was irresistible so long as he touched his mother (earth). Hercules, knowing this, lifted him into the air, and crushed him to death. Near the town of Tingis, in Mauritania, is a hill in the shape of a man called "The Hill of Antæos," and said to be his tomb.

So some have feigned that Tellus giant son
Drew many new-born lives from his dead mother;
Another rose as soon as one was done,
And twenty lost, yet still remained another.
For when he fell and kissed the barren heath,
His parent straight inspired successive breath,
And tho' herself was dead, yet ransomed him from death.
P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, ix. (1633).

¶ Similarly, Bernado del Carpio lifted Orlando in his arms, and squeezed him to death, because his body was proof against any instrument of war.

Te'mir, i.e. Tamerlane. The word occurs in Paradise Lost, xi. 389 (1665).

Temliha, king of the serpents, in the island of serpents. King Temliha was "a small yellow serpent, of a glowing colour," with the gift of human speech, like the serpent which tempted Eve.—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("History of Aboutaleb," 1743). (See SPEECH ASCRIBED TO DUMB ANIMALS, p. 1034.)

Tem'ora, in Ulster, the palace of the Caledonian kings in Ireland. The southern kingdom was that of the Fir-bolg or Belgæ from South Britain, whose seat of government was at Atha, in Connaught.

Tem'ora, in eight books, the longest of the Ossianic prose-poems. The subject is the dethronement of the kings of Connaught, and the consolidation of the two Irish kingdoms in that of Ulster. It must be borne in mind that there were two colonies in Ireland—one the Fir-bolg or British Belgæ, settled in the south, whose king was called the "lord of Atha," from Atha, in Connaught, the seat of government; and the other the Cael, from Caledonia, in Scotland, whose seat of government was Temŏra, in Ulster. When Crothar was "lord of Atha," he wished to unite the two kingdoms, and with this view carried off Conlāma, only child of the rival king, and married her. The Caledonians of Scotland interfered, and Conar the brother of Fingal was sent with an army against the usurper, conquered him, reduced the south to a tributary state, and restored in his own person the kingdom of Ulster. After a few years, Cormac II. (a minor) became king of Ulster and over-lord of Connaught. The Fir-bolg seizing this opportunity of revolt, Cairbar "lord of Atha" threw off his subjection, and murdered the young king in his palace of Temora. Fingal interfered in behalf of the Caels; but no sooner had he landed in Ireland, than Cairbar invited Oscar (Fingal's grandson) to a banquet, picked a quarrel with him, and both fell dead, each by the other's hand. On the death of Cairbar, Foldath became leader of the Fir-bolg, but was slain by Fillan son of Fingal. Fillan, in turn, was slain by Cathmor brother of Cairbar. Fingal now took the lead of his army in person, slew Cathmor, reduced the Fir-bolg to subjection, and placed on the throne Ferad-Artho, the only surviving descendant of Conar (first of the kings of Ulster of Caledonian race).

Tempê (2 syl.), a valley in Greece, between mount Olympus and mount Ossa. The word was employed by the Greek and Roman poets as a synonym for any valley noted for its cool shades, singing birds, and romantic scenery.

They would have thought, who heard the strain,
They saw in Tempé's vale her native maids,
Amidst the festal-sounding shades,
To some unwearied minstrel dancing.
Collins: Ode to the Passions (1746).

TEMPEST (The), a drama by Shakespeare (1609). Prospero and his daughter Miranda lived on a desert island, enchanted by Sycŏrax who was dead. The only other inhabitants were Caliban, the son of Sycorax, a strange misshapen thing like a gorilla, and Ariel a sprite, who had been imprisoned by Sycorax for twelve years in the rift of a pine tree, from which Prospero set him free. One day, Prospero saw a ship off the island, and raised a tempest to wreck it. By this means, his brother Anthonio, prince Ferdinand, and the king of Naples were brought to the island. Now, it must be known that Prospero was once duke of Milan; but his brother Anthonio, aided by the king of Naples, had usurped the throne, and set Prospero and Miranda adrift in a small boat, which was wind-driven to this desert island. Ferdinand (son of the king of Naples) and Miranda fell in love with each other, and the rest of the shipwrecked party being brought together by Ariel, Anthonio asked forgiveness of his brother, Prospero was restored to his dukedom, and the whole party was conducted by Ariel with prosperous breezes back to Italy.

(Dryden has a drama called The Tempest, 1668.)

Tempest (The), a sobriquet of marshal Junot, one of Napoleon's generals, noted for his martial impetuosity (1771–1813).

Tempest (The Hon. Mr.), late governor of Senegambia. He was the son of lord Hurricane; impatient, irascible, headstrong, and poor. He says he never was in smooth water since he was born, for, being only a younger son, his father gave him no education, taught him nothing, and then buffeted him for being a dunce.

> First I was turned into the army; there I got broken bones and empty pockets. Then I was banished to the coast of Africa, to govern the savages of Senegambia.—The Wheel of Fortune, act ii. 1.

Miss Emily [Tempest], daughter of Mr. Tempest; a great wit of very lively parts. Her father wanted her to marry sir David Daw, a great lout with plenty of money, but she fixed her heart on captain Henry Woodville, the son of a man ruined by gambling. The prospect was not cheering, but Penruddock came forward, and, by making them rich, made them happy. —Cumberland: The Wheel of Fortune (1779).

Tempest (Lady Betty), a lady with beauty, fortune, and family, whose head was turned by plays and romances. She fancied a plain man no better than a fool, and resolved to marry only a gay, fashionable, dashing young spark. Having rejected many offers because the suitor did not come up to her ideal, she was gradually left in the cold. Now she is company only for aunts and cousins, in ball-rooms is a wallflower, and in society generally is esteemed a piece of fashionable lumber.—Goldsmith: A Citizen of the World, xxviii. (1759).

Templars (Knights), an order of knighthood founded in 1118 for the defence of the Temple in Jerusalem. Dissolved in 1312, when their lands, etc., were transferred to the Hospitallers. The Templars wore a white robe with a red cross; but the Hospitallers a black robe with a white cross.

Temple (The). When Solomon was dying, he prayed that he might remain standing till the Temple was completely finished. The prayer was granted, and he remained leaning on his staff till the Temple was completed, when the staff was gnawed through by a worm, and the body fell to the ground.—Charles White: The Cashmere Shawl.

Temple (Launcelot), the nom de plume of John Armstrong, the poet (1709–1779).

Temple (Miss), governess at Lowood's Institution, and the good genius of the family.—Charlotte Brontë: Jane Eyre (1847).

Temple Bar, called "The City Golgotha," because the heads of traitors, etc., were at one time exposed there after decapitation. The Bar was removed in 1878.

Templeton (Laurence), the pseudonym under which sir W. Scott published Ivanhoe. The preface is initialed L. T., and the dedication is to the Rev. Dr. Dryasdust (1820).

Ten Animals in Paradise (The). According to Mohammedan belief, ten animals, besides man, are admitted into heaven: (1) Kratim, Ketmir, or Catnier, the dog of the seven sleepers; (2) Balaam's ass; (3) Solomon's ant; (4) Jonah's whale; (5) the calf [sic] offered to Jehovah by Abraham in lieu of Isaac; (6) the ox of Moses; (7) the camel of the prophet Salech or Saleh; (8) the cuckoo of Belkis; (9) Ishmael's ram; and (10) Al Borak, the animal which conveyed Mahomet to heaven.

(There is diversity in some lists of the ten animals. Some substitute for Balaam's ass the ass of Aazis, Balkis, or Maqueda, queen of Sheba, who went to visit Solomon. And some, but these can hardly be Mohammedans, think the ass on which Christ rode to Jerusalem should not be forgotten. None seem inclined to increase the number. See also ANIMALS, p. 45.)

Ten Commandments (A Woman's), the two hands, with which she scratches the faces of those who offend her.

> Could I come near your beauty with my nails,
> I'd set my ten commandments in your face.
> Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI. act i. sc. 3 (1591).

Tenantius, the father of Cymbeline and nephew of Cassibelan. He was the younger son of Lud the king of the southern part of Britain. On the death of Lud, his younger brother Cassibelan succeeded, and on the death of Cassibelan the crown came to Tenantius, who refused to pay the tribute to Rome exacted from Cassibelan on his defeat by Julius Cæsar.

Tendo Achillis, a strong sinew running along the heel to the calf of the leg. So called because it was the only vulnerable part of Achillês. The tale is that Thetis held him by the heel when she dipped him in the Styx, in consequence of which the water did not wet the child's heel. The story is post-Homeric.

Tenglio, a river of Lapland, on the banks of which roses grow.

I was surprised to see upon the banks of this river [the Tenglio] roses as lovely a red as any that are in our own gardens.—Mons. de Maupertuis: Voyage au Cercle Polaire (1738).

Teniers, a Dutch artist, noted for his pictures of country wakes, alehouses, and merry meetings (1582–1649).

The English Teniers, George Morland (1763–1804).

The Scottish Teniers, sir David Wilkie (1785–1841).

The Teniers of Comedy, Florent Carton Dancourt (1661–1726).

Tennis-Ball of Fortune (The), Pertinax, the Roman emperor. He was first a charcoal-seller, then a schoolmaster, then a soldier, then an emperor; but within three months he was dethroned and murdered (126–193; reigned from January 1 to March 28, A.D. 193).

Tent (Prince Ahmed's), a tent given to him by the fairy Pari-Banou. It would cover a whole army, yet would fold up into so small a compass that it might be carried in one's pocket.—Arabian Nights.

¶ Solomon's carpet of green silk was large enough to afford standing room for a whole army, but might be carried about like a pocket-handkerchief.

¶ The ship Skidbladnir would hold all the deities of Valhalla, but might be folded up like a roll of parchment.

¶ Bayard, the horse of the four sons of Aymon, grew larger or smaller, as one or more of the four sons mounted on its back.—Villeneuve: Les Quatre Fils Aymon.

Tents (The father of such as dwell in), Jabal.—Gen. iv. 20.

Terebin'thus, Ephes-dammim or Pas-dammim.—1 Sam. xvii. 1.

O thou that 'gainst Goliath's impious head
The youthful arms in Terebinthus sped,
When the proud foe, who scoffed at Israel's band,
Fell by the weapon of a stripling hand.
Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, vii. (1575).

Terence, the slave of a Roman senator, whose name he bore. His six comedies are: (1) the Andrea, or woman of Andros (B.C. 166); (2) the Step-mother (B.C. 165); (3) the Self-Tormentor (B.C. 163); (4) the Eunuch (B.C. 162); (5) Phormio (B.C. 161); and (6) the Brothers (B.C. 160).

There are several translations of his comedies into English; for instance, by Bentley, in 1726; by Parry, in 1857; etc.

The Terence of England, Richard Cumberland (1732–1811).

Here Cumberland lies, having acted his parts;
The Terence of England, the mender of hearts;
A flattering painter, who made it his care
To draw men as they ought to be, not as they are . . .
Say . . . wherefore his characters, thus without fault, . . .
Quite sick of pursuing each troublesome elf,
He grew lazy at last, and drew men from himself.
Goldsmith: Retaliation (1774).

Tere'sa, the female associate of Ferdinand count Fathom.—Smollett: Count Fathom (1754).

Teresa d'Acunha, lady's-maid of Joseline countess of Glenallan.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Teresa Panza, wife of Sancho Panza. In pt. I. i. 7 she is called Dame Juana [Gutierez]. In pt. II. iv. 7 she is called Maria [Gutierez]. In pt. I. iv. she is called Joan.—Cervantes: Don Quixote (1605–15).

Tereus [Te'-ruse], king of Daulis, and the husband of Procnê. Wishing afterwards to marry Philomêla, her sister, he told her that Procnê was dead. He lived with his new wife for a time, and then cut out her tongue, lest she should expose his falsehood to Procnê; but it was of no use, for Philomela made known her story in the embroidery of a peplus. Tereus, finding his home too hot for his wickedness, rushed after Procnê with an axe, but the whole party was metamorphosed into birds. Tereus was changed into a hoopoo (some say a lapwing, and others an owl), Procnê into a swallow, and Philomela into a nightingale.

So was that tyrant Tereus' nasty lust
Changed into Upupa's foul-feeding dust.
Lord Brooke: Declination of Monarchie.

¶ Those who have read Titus Andronicus (usually bound up with Shakespeare's plays) will call to mind the story of Lavinia, defiled by the sons of Tamôra, who afterwards plucked out her tongue and cut off her hands; but she told her tale by guiding a staff with her mouth and stumps, and writing it in the sand.

Fair Philomela, she but lost her tongue,
And in a tedious sampler sewed her mind.
But, lovely niece, that mean is cut from thee;
A craftier Tereus, cousin, hast thou met.

And he hath cut those pretty fingers off,
That could have better sewed than Philomel.
Act ii. sc. 4 (1593).

Ter'il (Sir Walter). The king exacts an oath from sir Walter to send his bride Cælestina to court on her wedding night. Her father, to save her honour, gives her a mixture supposed to be poison, but in reality only a sleeping draught, from which she awakes in due time, to the amusement of the king and delight of her husband. — Dekker: Satiromastix (1602).

Termagant, an imaginary being, supposed by the crusaders to be a Mohammedan deity. In the Old Moralities, the degree of rant was the measure of the wickedness of the character portrayed; so Pontius Pilate, Judas Iscariot, Termagant, the tyrant, Sin, and so on, were all ranting parts. Painters expressed degrees of wickedness by degrees of shade.

I would have such a fellow whipped for o'erdoing Termagant.—Shakespeare: Hamlet, act iii. sc. 2 (1596).

Termagant, the maid of Harriet Quidnunc. She uses most wonderful words, as paradropsical for "rhapsodical," perjured for "assured," physiology for "philology," curacy for "accuracy," signification for "signification," importation for "import," anecdote for "antidote," infirmaries for "infirmities," intimidate for "intimate."—Murphy: The Upholsterer (1758).

Ter'meros, a robber of Peloponnesos, who killed his victims by cracking their skulls against his own.

Termosi'ris, a priest of Apollo, in Egypt; wise, prudent, cheerful, and courteous.—Fénelon: Télémaque, ii. (1700).

Ternotte, one of the domestics of lady Eveline Berenger "the betrothed." —Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Terpin (Sir), a king who fell into the power of Radigund queen of the Amazons. Refusing to dress in female attire, as the queen commanded, to sew, card wool, spin, and do house work, he was doomed by her women to be gibbeted. Sir Artegal undertook his cause, and a fight ensued, which lasted all day. When daylight closed, Radigund proposed to defer the contest till the following day, to which sir Artegal agreed. Next day, the knight was victorious; but when he saw the brave queen bleeding to death, he took pity on her, and, throwing his sword aside, ran to succour her. Up started Radigund as he approached, attacked him like a fury, and, as he had no sword, he was, of course, obliged to yield. So the contest was decided against him, and sir Terpin was "gibbeted by women," as Radigund had commanded.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 5 (1596).

Terpsichore '[Terp-sic'-o-re], the Muse of dancing.—Greek Fable.

Terrible (The), Ivan IV. or II. of Russia (1529, 1533–1584).

Terror of France (The), John Talbot first earl of Shrewsbury (1373–1453).

Is this the Talbot, so much feared abroad,
That with his name the mothers still their babes
Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act ii. sc. 3 (1589).

Terror of the World (The), Attila king of the Huns (*–453).

Terry Alts, a lawless body of rebels, who sprang up in Clare (Ireland) after the union, and committed great outrages. (The "Thrashers" of Connaught, the "Carders," the followers of "captain Right" in the eighteenth century, those of "captain Rock" who appeared in 1822, and the "Fenians" in 1865, were similar disturbers of the peace. The watchword of the turbulent Irish, some ten years later, was "Home Rule.")

Tesoretto, an Italian poem by Brunetto preceptor of Dantê (1285). The poet says he was returning from an embassy to the king of Spain, and met a scholar on a bay mule, who told him of the overthrow of the Guelfi. Struck with grief, he lost his road, and wandered into a wood, where Dame Nature accosted him, and disclosed to him the secrets of her works. On he wandered till he came to a vast plain, inhabited by Virtue and her four daughters, together with Courtesy, Bounty, Loyalty, and Prowess. Leaving this, he came to a fertile valley, which was for ever shifting its appearance, from round to square, from light to darkness. This was the valley of queen Pleasure, who was attended by Love, Hope, Fear, and Desire. Ovid comes to Tesoretto at length, and tells him how to effect his escape.

Tessa, in love with Tito Melema.—George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross): Romola (1863).

Tes'sira, one of the leaders of the Moorish host.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Tests of Chastity. Alasnam's mirror (p. 18); the brawn or boar's head (p. 145); drinking-horns (see ARTHUR'S DRINKING-HORN, p. 64; SIR CARADOC AND THE DRINKING-HORN, p. 178); Florimel's girdle (p. 376); grotto of Ephesus (p. 452); the test mantle (p. 668); oath on St. Antony's arm was held in supreme reverence, because it was believed that whoever took the oath falsely would be consumed by "St. Antony's fire" within the current year; the trial of the sieve (p. 1005).

Tests of Fidelity. Canacé's mirror (p. 174); Gondibert's emerald ring (p. 436). The corsned or "cursed mouthful," a piece of bread consecrated by exorcism, and given to the "suspect" to swallow as a test: "May this morsel choke me if I am guilty," said the defendant, "but turn to wholesome nourishment if I am innocent." Ordeals (p. 779), combats between plaintiff and defendant, or their representatives. (See SEA, p. 975.)

Tête Bottée, Philippe de Commines [Cum.min], politician and historian (1445-1509).

You, sir Philippe des Comines [sic], were at a hunting-match with the duke, your master; and when he alighted, after the chase, he required your services in drawing off his boots. Reading in your looks some natural resentment, . . . he ordered you to sit down in turn, and rendered you the same office . . . but . . . no sooner had he plucked one of your boots off than he brutally beat it about your head . . . and his privileged fool, Le Glorieux, . . . gave you the name of Tête Bottée.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward, xxx. (time, Edward IV.).

Te'thys, daughter of Heaven and Earth, the wife of Ocean and mother of the river-gods. In poetry it means the sea generally.

The golden sun above the watery bed
Of hoary Tēthys raised his beamy head.
Hoole's Ariosto, viii.

By the earth-shaking Neptune's mace [trident],
And Tēthys' grave majestic pace.
Milton: Comus, 870 (1634).

Tetrachor'don, the title of one of Milton's books about marriage and divorce. The word means "the four strings;" by which he means the four chief places in Scripture which bear on the subject of marriage.

A book was writ of late called Tetrachordon.
Milton: Sonnet, x.

Teucer, son of Telāmon of Salāmis, and brother of Telamon Ajax. He was the best archer of all the Grecks at the siege of Troy.

I may, like a second Teucer, discharge my shafts from behind the shield of my ally.—Sir W. Scott.

Teufelsdroeckh (Herr) [pronounce Toi-fels-drurk], an eccentric German professor and philosopher. The object of the satire is to expose all sorts of shams, social as well as intellectual.—Carlyle: Sartor Resartus (1849).

Teutonic Knights (The), an order organized by Frederick duke of Suabia, in Palestine (1190). St. Louis gave them permission to quarter on their arms the fleur-de-lis (1250). Abolished in 1809 by Napoleon I. It still exists in Austria.

Texartis, a Scythian soldier, killed by the countess Brenhilda.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Tezoz'omoc, chief of the priests of the Az'tecas. He fasted ten months to know how to appease the national gods, and then declared that the only way was to offer "the White strangers" on their altars. Tezozomoc was killed by burning lava from a volcanic mountain.

Tezozomoc
Beholds the judgment . . . and sees
The lava floods beneath him. His hour
Is come. The fiery shower, descending, heaps
Red ashes round. They fall like drifted snows,
And bury and consume the accursed priest.
Southey: Madoc, ii. 26 (1805).

Thaddeus of Warsaw, the hero and title of a novel by Jane Porter (1803).

Thaddu, the father of Morna, who became the wife of Comhal and the mother of Fingal.—Ossian.

Tha'is (2 syl.), an Athenian courtezan, who induced Alexander, in his cups, to set fire to the palace of the Persian kings at Persepŏlis.

The king seized a flambeau with zeal to destroy;
Thaïs led the way to light him to his prey,
And, like another Helen, fired another Troy.
Dryden: Alexander's Feast (1697).

Thaïs'a, daughter of Simon'idēs king of Pentap'olis. She married Per'iclēs prince of Tyre. In her voyage to Tyre, Thaïsa gave birth to a daughter, and dying, as it was supposed, in childbirth, was cast into the sea. The chest in which she was placed drifted to Ephesus, and fell into the hands of Cer'imon, a physician, who soon discovered that she was not dead. Under proper care, she entirely recovered, and became a priestess in the temple of Diana. Periclēs, with his daughter and her betrothed husband, visiting the shrine of Diana, they became known to each other, and the whole mystery was cleared up.—Shakespeare: Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

Thal'aba ebn Hateb, a poor man, who came to Mahomet, requesting him to beg God to bestow on him wealth, and promising to employ it in works of godliness. The "prophet" made the petition, and Thalaba rapidly grew rich. One day, Mahomet sent to the rich man for alms, but Thalaba told the messengers their demand savoured more of tribute than of charity, and refused to give anything; but afterwards repenting, he took to the "prophet" a good round sum. Mahomet now refused to accept it, and, throwing dust on the ungrateful churl, exclaimed, "Thus shall thy wealth be scattered!" and the man became poor again as fast as he had grown rich.—Al Kor'ân, ix. (Sale's notes).

Thal'aba the Destroyer—that is, the destroyer of the evil spirits of Dom-Daniel. He was the only surviving child of Hodei'rah (3 syl.) and his wife Zei'nab (2 syl.); their other eight children had been cut off by the Dom-Danielists, because it had been decreed by fate that "one of the race would be their destruction." When a mere stripling, Thalâba was left motherless and fatherless (bk. i.); he then found a home in the tent of a Bedouin named Mo'ath, who had a daughter Onei'za (3 syl.). Here he was found by Abdaldar, an evil spirit sent from Dom-Daniel to kill him; but the spirit was killed by a simoom just as he was about to stab the boy, and Thalaba was saved (bk. ii.). He now drew from the finger of Abdaldar the magic ring which gave him power over all spirits; and, thus armed, he set out "to avenge the death of his father" (bk. iii.). On his way to Babylon, he was encountered by a merchant, who was in reality the sorcerer Loba'ba in disguise. This sorcerer led Thalaba astray into the wilderness, and then raised up a whirlwind to destroy him; but the whirlwind was the death of Lobaba himself, and again Thalaba escaped (bk. iv.). He reached Babylon at length, and met there Mohâreb, another evil spirit, disguised as a warrior, who conducted him to the "mouth of hell." Thalaba detected the villainy, and hurled the false one into the abyss (bk. v.). The young "Destroyer" was next conveyed to "the paradise of pleasure," but he resisted every temptation, and took to flight just in time to save Oneiza, who had been brought there by violence (bk. vi.). He then killed with a club Aloe'dia, the presiding spirit of the garden, was made vizier, and married Oneiza, who died on the bridal night (bk. vii.). Distracted at this calamity, Thalaba wandered towards Kâf, and entered the house of an old woman, who was spinning thread. He expressed surprise at the extreme fineness of the thread, but Maimu'na (the old woman) told him, fine as it was, he could not break it. Thalaba felt incredulous, and wound it round his wrists, when, lo! he became utterly powerless; and Maimuna, calling up her sister Khwala, conveyed him helpless to the island of Moha'reb (bk. viii.). Here he remained for a time, and was at length liberated by Maimuna, who repented of her sins and turned to Allah (bk. ix.). Being liberated from the island of Mohâreb, our hero wandered, cold and hungry, into a dwelling, where he saw Laila, the daughter of Okba the sorcerer. Okba rushed forward with intent to kill him, but Laila interposed, and fell dead by the hand of her own father (bk. x.). Her spirit, in the form of a green bird, now became the guardian angel of "The Destroyer," and conducted him to the simorg, who directed him the road to Dom-Daniel (bk. xi.), which he reached in time, slew the surviving sorcerers, and was received into heaven (bk. xii.).—Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer (1797).

Thales'tris, queen of the Am'azons; any bold, heroic woman.

> As stout Ar'mida [g.v.], bold Thalestris.
> And she [Rodalind, g.v.] that would have been the mistress
> Of Gondibert.
> S. Butler: Hudibras, i. 2 (1663).

In Pope's Rape of the Lock, "Thalestris" is meant for Mrs. Morley, sister of sir George Brown, called in the poem "sir Plume."

Thali'a, the Muse of pastoral song. She is often represented with a crook in her hand.

> Turn to the gentler melodies which suit
> Thalia's harp, or Pan's Arcadian lute.
> Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, ii. (1799).

Thaliard, a lord of Antioch.—Shakespeare: Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

Thames (Swan of the), John Taylor, the "water-poet." He never learnt grammar, but wrote four score books in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. (1580–1654).

> Taylor, their better Charon, lends an oar,
> Once Swan of Thames, tho' now he sings no more.

Tham'mus, God of the Syrians, and fifth in order of the hierarchy of hell: (1) Satan, (2) Beëlzebub, (3) Moloch, (4) Chemos, (5) Thammuz (the same as Ado'nis). Thammuz was slain by a wild boar in mount Leb'anon, from whence the river Adonis descends, the water of which, at a certain season of the year, becomes reddened. Addison saw it, and ascribes the redness to a minium washed into the river by the violence of the rain.

> Thammuz came next behind,
> Whose annual wound in Lebanon allured
> The Syrian damsels to lament his fate
> In amorous ditties all a summer's day;
> While smooth Adonis from his native rock
> Ran purple to the sea, supposed with blood
> Of Thammuz yearly wounded.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 446, etc. (1665).

Thamu'dites (3 syl.), people of the tribe of Thamûd. They refused to believe in Mahomet without seeing a miracle. On a grand festival, Jonda, prince of the Thamûdites, told Sâleh, the prophet, that the god which answered by miracle should be acknowledged God by both. Jonda and the Thamûdites first called upon their idols, but received no answer. "Now," said the prince to Sâleh, "if your God will bring a camel big with young from that rock, we will believe." Scarcely had he spoken, when the rock groaned and shook and opened; and forthwith there came out a camel, which there and then cast its young one. Jonda became at once a convert, but the Thamûdites held back. To add to the miracle, the camel went up and down among the people, crying, "Ho! every one that thirsteth, let him come, and I will give him milk!" (Compare Isa. lv. 1.)

> Unto the tribe of Thamûd we sent their brother Sâleh. He said, "O my people, worship God; ye have no god besides him. Now hath a manifest proof come unto you from the Lord. This she-camel of God is a sign unto you; therefore dismiss her freely . . . and do her no hurt, lest a painful punishment seize upon you."—Al Korân, vii.

(Without doubt, the reader will at once call to mind the contest between Elijah and the priests of Baal, so graphically described in 1 Kings xviii.)

Tham'yris (Blind), a Thracian poet, who challenged the Muses to a contest of song, and was deprived of sight, voice, and musical skill for his presumption (Pliny: Natural History, iii. 33, and vii. 57). Plutarch says he had the finest voice of any one, and that he wrote a poem on the War of the Titans with the Gods. Suidas tells us that he composed a poem on creation. And Plato, in his Republic (last book), feigns that the spirit of the blind old bard passed into a nightingale at death. Milton spoke of—

> Blind Thamyris and blind Mæon'idês [Homer].
> Paradise Lost, iii. 35 (1665).

Thancmar, chatelain of Bourbourg, the great enemy of Bertulphe the provost of Bruges. (See PROVOST OF BRUGES, p. 879.)

Thaumast, an English pundit, who went to Paris, attracted by the rumour of the great wisdom of Pantag'ruel. He arranged a disputation with that prince, to be carried on solely by pantomime, without the utterance of a single word. Panurge undertook the disputation for the prince, and Pantagruel was appointed arbiter. Many a knotty point in magic, alchemy, the cabala, geomancy, astrology, and philosophy was argued out by signs alone, and the Englishman freely confessed himself fully satisfied, for "Panurge had told him even more than he had asked."—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, ii. 19, 20 (1553). (See JOHN AND THE ABBOT, p. 551.)

Thaumaturga. Filumêna is called La Thaumaturge du Dixneuvième Siecle. (See ST. FILUMENA, p. 949.)

Thaumatur'gus. (1) Gregory bishop of Neo-Cæsarêa, in Cappadocia, was so called on account of his numerous miracles (212–270).

(2) ALEXANDER OF HOHENLOHE was a worker of miracles.

(3) APOLLONIUS OF TYA'NA "raised the dead, healed the sick, cast out devils, freed a young man from a lamia or vampire of which he was enamoured, uttered prophecies, saw at Ephesus the assassination of Domitian at Rome, and filled the world with the fame of his sanctity" (A.D. 3–98).—Philostratos: Life of Apollonius of Tyana, in eight books.

(4) ST. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX was called "The Thaumaturgus of the West" (1091–1153).

(5) FRANCIS D'ASSISI (St.), founder of the Franciscan order (1182–1226).

(6) J. J. GASSNER of Bratz, in the Tyrol, exorcised the sick and cured their diseases "miraculously" (1727–1779).

(7) ISIDORE (St.) of Alexandria (370–440).—Damascius: Life of St. Isidore (sixth century).

(8) JAMBLICHUS, when he prayed, was raised ten cubits from the ground, and his body and dress assumed the appearance of gold. At Gadâra he drew from two fountains the guardian spirits, and showed them to his disciples.—Eunapius: Jamblichus (fourth century).

(9) MAHOMET "the prophet." (1) When he ascended to heaven on Al Borak, the stone on which he stepped to mount rose in the air as the prophet rose; but when Mahomet forbade it to follow any further, it remained suspended in mid-air. (2) He took a scroll of the Korân out of a bull's horn. (3) He brought down the moon, and, having made it pass through one sleeve and out of the other, allowed it to return to its place in heaven.

(10) PASCAL (Blaise) was a miracle-worker (1623–1662).

(11) PLOTI'NUS, the Neo-platonic philosopher (205–270).—Porphyrius: Vita Plotini (A.D. 301).

(12) PROCLUS, a Neo-platonic philosopher (410–485).—Marinus: Vita Procli (fifth century).

(13) SOSPITRA possessed the omniscience of seeing all that was done in every part of the whole world. — Eunapius: Œdeseus (fourth century).

(14) VESPASIAN, the Roman emperor, cured a blind man and a cripple by his touch during his stay at Alexandria.

(15) VINCENT DE PAUL, founder of the "Sisters of Charity," was a worker of miracles (1576–1660).

Thaumaturgus of the West, St. Bernard of Clairvaux (1091–1153).

Thaumaturgus Physicus, a treatise on natural magic, by Gaspar Schott (1657–9).

Theag'enes and Chariclei'a (The Loves of), a love story, in Greek, by Heliodorus bishop of Trikka (fourth century). A charming fiction, largely borrowed from by subsequent novelists, and especially by Mlle. de Scudéri, Tasso, Guarini, and D'Urfé. The tale is this: Some Egyptian brigands met one morning on a hill near the mouth of the Nile, and saw a vessel laden with stores lying at anchor. They also observed that the banks of the Nile were strewn with dead bodies and the fragments of food. On further examination, they beheld Charicleia sitting on a rock tending Theagĕnês, who lay beside her severely wounded. Some pirates had done it, and to them the vessel belonged. We are then carried to the house of Nausiclês, and there Calasiris tells the early history of Charicleia, her love for Theagenês, and their capture by the pirates.

Thea'na (3 syl.) is Anne countess of Warwick.

> Ne less praiseworthy I Theana read . . .
> She is the well of bounty and brave mind,
> Excelling most in glory and great light,
> The ornament is she of womankind,
> And court's chief garland with all virtues dight.
> Spenser: Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1595).

Thebaid (The), a Latin epic poem in twelve books, by Statius (about a century after Virgil). Laïos, king of Thebes, was told by an oracle that he would have a son, but that his son would be his murderer. To prevent this, when the son was born he was hung on a tree by his feet, to be devoured by wild beasts. The child, however, was rescued by some of the royal servants, who brought him up, and called his name Œdĭpos, or Club-foot, because his feet and ankles were swollen by the thongs. One day, going to Thebes, the chariot of Laïos nearly drove over the young Œdipos; a quarrel ensued, and Laïos was killed. Œdipos, not knowing whom he had slain, went on to Thebes, and ere long married the widowed queen Jocasta, not knowing that she was his mother, and by her he had two sons and two daughters. The names of the sons were Et'eoclês and Polynîcês. These sons, in time, dethroned their father, and agreed to reign alternate years. Etĕoclês reigned first, but at the close of the year refused to resign the crown to his brother, and Polynicês made war upon him. This war, which occurred some forty-two years before the siege of Troy, and about the time that Debŏrah was fighting with Siserra (Judg. iv.), is the subject of the Thebaid.

The first book recapitulates the history given above, and then goes on to say that Polynicês went straight to Argos, and laid his grievance before king Adrastos (bk. i.). While at Argos, he married one of the king's daughters, and Tydeus the other. The festivities being over, Tydeus was sent to Thebes to claim the throne for his brother-in-law, and, being insolently dismissed, denounced war against Eteoclês. The villainous usurper sent fifty ruffians to fall on the ambassador on his way to Argos, but they were all slain, except one, who was left to carry back the news (bk. ii.). When Tydeus reached Argos, he wanted his father-in-law to march at once against Thebes, but Adrastos, less impetuous, made answer that a great war required time for its organization. However, Kapăneus (3 syl.), siding with Tydeus [Ti'-duce], roused the mob (bk. iii.), and Adrastos at once set about preparations for war. He placed his army under six chieftains, viz. Polynicês, Tydeus, Amphiarāos, Kapaneus, Parthenopæos, and Hippomĕdon, he himself acting as commander-in-chief (bk. iv.). Bks. v. and vi. describe the march from Argos to Thebes. On the arrival of the allied army before Thebes, Jocasta tried to reconcile her two sons, but, not succeeding in this, hostilities commenced, and one of the chiefs, named Amphiaraos, was swallowed up by an earthquake (bk. vii.). Next day, Tydeus greatly distinguished himself, but fell (bk. viii.). Hippomedon and Partheno-pæos were both slain the day following (bk. ix.). Then came the turn of Kapaneus, bold as a tiger, strong as a giant, and a regular dare-devil in war. He actually scaled the wall, he thought himself sure of victory, he defied even Jove to stop him, and was instantly killed by a flash of lightning (bk. x.). Polynicês was now the only one of the six remaining, and he sent to Eteoclês to meet him in single combat. The two brothers met, they fought like lions, they gave no quarter, they took no rest. At length, Eteoclês fell, and Polynicês, running up to strip him of his arms, was thrust through the bowels, and fell dead on the dead body of his brother. Adrastos now decamped, and returned to Argos (bk. xi.). Creon, having usurped the Theban crown, forbade any one on pain of death to bury the dead; but when Theseus king of Athens heard of this profanity, he marched at once to Thebes, Creon died, and the crown was given to Theseus (bk. xii.).

Theban Bard (The), THEBAN EAGLE, or THEBAN LYRE, Pindar, born at Thebes (B.C. 522–442).

> Ye that in fancied vision can admire
> The sword of Brutus and the Theban lyre.
> Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, i. (1799).

Thecla (St.), said to be of noble family, in Ico'nium, and to have been converted by the apostle Paul. She is styled in Greek martyrologies the proto-martyress, but the book called The Acts of Paul and Thecla is considered to be apocryphal.

> On the reliquary shelf

Thekla, daughter of Wallenstein.—Schiller, Wallenstein (1799).

Thélème (Abbey of), the abbey given by Grangousier to friar John for the aid he rendered in the battle against Picrochole king of Lerné. The abbey was stored with everything that could contribute to sensual indulgence and enjoyment. It was the very reverse of a convent or monastery. No religious hypocrites, no pettifogging attorneys, no usurers were admitted within it; but it was filled with gallant ladies and gentlemen, faithful expounders of the Scriptures, and every one who could contribute to its elegant recreations and general festivity. Their only law was: "FAY CE QUE VOULDRAS."—Rabelais: Gargantua, i. 52–57 (1533).

Thélème, the Will personified.—Voltaire: Thélème and Macare.

The'lu, the female or woman.

> And divers coloured trees and fresh array [hair]
> Much grace the town [head], but most the Thalu gay;
> But all in winter [old age] turn to snow, and soon decay.
> P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, v. (1633).

Themistocles' Infant Ruler of the World. (See RULERS, p. 940.)

Thenot, an old shepherd bent with age, who tells Cuddy, the herdsman's boy, the fable of the oak and the briar. An aged oak, once a most royal tree, was wasted by age of its foliage, and stood with bare head and sear branches. A pert bramble grew hard by, and snubbed the oak, calling it a cumberer of the ground. It even complained to the lord of the field, and prayed him to cut it down. The request was obeyed, and the oak was felled; but now the bramble suffered from the storm and cold, for it had no shelter, and the snow bent it to the ground, where it was draggled and defiled. The application is very personal. Cuddy is the pert, flippant bramble, and Thenot the hoary oak; but Cuddy told the old man his tale was long and trashy, and bade him hie home, for the sun was set.—Spenser: Shepheardes Calendar, ii. (1579).

(Thenot is introduced also in ecl. iv., and again in ecl. xi., where he begs Colin to sing something; but Colin declines because his mind is sorrowing for the death of the shepherdess Dido.)

The'not, a shepherd who loved Coria chiefly for her "fidelity" to her deceased lover. When "the faithful shepherdess" knew this, in order to cure him of his passion, she pretended to return his love. Thenot was so shocked to see his charm broken that he lost even his respect for Corin, and forsook her.—John Fletcher: The Faithful Shepherdess (1610).

Theoc'ritos (of Siracus), in Latin Theocritus, a Greek bucolic poet. His poems (thirty in number) are called Idylls, or pictures of Sicilian life, and not like Virgil's, which are highly imaginative "Arcadian shepherds." About three centuries B.C.

English translations by J. Banks (1853); Dr. M. J. Chapman (the best); C. S. Calverley (1869); F. Fawkes (1767).

The Portuguese Theocritus, Saadi di Miranda (1495–1551).

The Scotch Theocritus, Allan Ramsay, author of The Gentle Shepherd (1685–1758).

The Sicilian Theocritus, Giovanni Meli of Palermo, immortalized by his eclogues and idylls (1740–1815).

Theod'ofred, heir to the Spanish throne, but incapacitated from reigning because he had been blinded by Witi'za. Theodofred was the son of Chindasuintho, and father of king Roderick. As Witiza, the usurper, had blinded Theodofred, so Roderick dethroned and blinded Witiza. —Southey: Roderick, etc. (1814).

N.B.—In mediæval times, no one with any personal defect was allowed to reign, and one of the most ordinary means of disqualifying a prince for succeeding to a throne was to put out his eyes. Of course, the reader will call to mind the case of our own prince Arthur, the nephew of king John; and scores of instances in Italian, French, Spanish, German, Russian, and Scandinavian history might be added. (See KINGSHIP, p. 575.)

Theod'omas, a famous trumpeter at the siege of Thebes.

> At every court ther cam loud menstralcye
> That never trompéd Joab for to heere,
> Ne he Theodomas yit half so cleere
> At Thebés, when the cité was in doute.
> Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, 9592, etc. (1388).

Theodo'ra, sister of Constantine the Greek emperor. She entertained most bitter hatred against Rogêro for slaying her son, and vowed vengeance. Rogero, being entrapped in sleep, was confined by her in a dungeon, and fed on the bread and water of affliction, but was ultimately released by prince Leon. —Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1526).

The'odore (3 syl.), son of general Archas "the loyal subject" of the great-duke of Muscovia. A colonel, valorous but impatient. —Fletcher: The Loyal Subject (1618).

The'odore (3 syl.) of Ravenna, brave, rich, honoured, and chivalrous. He loved Honória "to madness," but "found small favour in the lady's eyes." At length, however, the lady relented and married him. (See HONORIA, p. 500.)—Dryden: Theodore and Honoria (from Boccaccio).

Theodore, son of the lord of Clarinsal, and grandson of Alphonso. His father thought him dead, renounced the world, and became a monk of St. Nicholas, under the assumed name of Austin. By chance, Theodore was sent home in a Spanish bark, and found his way into some secret passage of the count's castle, where he was seized and taken before the count. Here he met the monk Austin, and was made known to him. He informed his father of his love for Adelaide, the count's daughter, and was then told that if he married her he must renounce his estates and title. The case stood thus: If he claimed his estates, he must challenge the count to mortal combat, and renounce the daughter; but if he married Adelaide, he must forego his rights, for he could not marry the daughter and slay his father-in-law. The perplexity is solved by the death of Adelaide, killed by her father by mistake, and the death of the count by his own hand. —Jephson: Count of Narbonne (1782).

Theod'orick, king of the Goths, called by the German minnesingers Diderick of Bern (Verôna).

Theodorick or "Alberick of Mortemar," an exiled nobleman, hermit of Engaddi, and an enthusiast.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Theodo'rus (Master), a learned physician, employed by Ponocratês to cure Gargantua of his vicious habits. The doctor accordingly "purged him canonically with Anticyrian hellebore, cleansed from his brain all perverse habits, and made him forget everything he had learned of his other preceptors."—Rabelais: Gargantua, i. 23 (1533).

Hellebore was made use of to purge the brain, in order to fit it the better for serious study.—Pliny: Natural History, xxv. 25; Aulus Gellius, Attic Nights, xvii. 15.

Theodo'sius, the hermit of Cappadocia. He wrote the four gospels in letters of gold (423–529).

Theodosius, who of old,
Wrote the gospels in letters of gold.
Longfellow. The Golden Legend (1851).

Theophilus (St.), of Adana, in Cilicia (sixth century). He was driven by slander to sell his soul to the devil on condition that his character was cleared. The slander was removed, and no tongue wagged against the thin-skinned saint. Theophilus now repented of his bargain, and, after a fast of forty days and forty nights, was visited by the Virgin, who bade him confess to the bishop. This he did, received absolution, and died within three days of brain fever.—Jacques de Voragine: The Golden Legend's (thirteenth century).

¶ This is a very stale trick, told of many a saint. Southey has poetized one of them in his ballad of St. Basil or The Sinner Saved (1829). Eleëmon sold his soul to the devil on condition of his procuring him Cyra for wife. The devil performed his part of the bargain, but Eleemon called off, and St. Basil gave him absolution. (See SINNER SAVED, p. 1010.)

Theophras'tus of France (The), Jean de la Bruyère, author of Caractères (1646–1696).

Theresa, the miller's wife, who adopted and brought up Amina, the orphan, called "the somnambulist."—Bellini: La Sonnambula (libretto by Scribe, 1831).

There'sa, daughter of the count palatine of Padolia, beloved by Mazeppa. Her father, indignant that a mere page should presume to his daughter's hand, had Mazeppa bound to a wild horse, and set adrift. The subsequent history of Theresa is not recorded.—Byron: Mazeppa (1819).

Medora [wife of the Corsair], Neuha [in The Island], Leila [in The Giaour], Francesca [in The Siege of Corinth], and Theresa, it has been alleged, are but children of one family, with differences resulting only from climate and circumstance.—Finden: Byron Beauties.

There'sa (Sister), with Flora M'Ivor at Carlisle.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Theringe (Mme. de), the mother of Louise de Lascours, and grandmother of Diana de Lascours and Martha alias Orgari'ta "the orphan of the Frozen Sea."—Stirling: The Orphan of the Frozen Sea (1856).

Thermopylæ. When Xerxes invaded Greece, Leonidas was sent with 300 Spartans, as a forlorn hope, to defend the pass leading from Thessaly into Locris, by which it was thought the Persian host would penetrate into southern Greece. They resisted for three successive days the repeated attacks of the most brave and courageous of Xerxes' army. The Persians, however, having discovered a path over the mountains, fell on Leonidas in the rear, and the "brave defenders of the hot-gates" were cut to pieces (August 7, B.C. 480).

Theron, the favourite dog of Roderick the last Gothic king of Spain. When the discrowned king, dressed as a monk, assumed the name of "father Maccabee," although his tutor, mother, and even Florinda failed to recognize him, Theron knew him at once, fawned on him with fondest love, and would never again leave him till the faithful creature died. When Roderick saw his favourite—

He threw his arms around the dog, and cried,
While tears streamed down, "Thou, Theron, thou hast known Thy poor lost master; Theron, none but thou!"
Southey: Roderick, etc., xv. (1814).

Thersi'tes (3 syl.), a deformed, scurrilous Grecian chief, "loquacious, loud, and coarse." His chief delight was to inveigh against the kings of Greece. He squinted, halted, was gibbous behind and pinched before, and on his tapering head grew a few white patches of starveling down (Iliad, ii.).

His brag, as Thersites, with elbows abroad,
Tusser: Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, liv. (1557).

The'seus (2 syl.), the Attic hero. He induced the several towns of Attica to give up their separate governments and submit to a common jurisdiction, whereby the several petty chiefdoms were consolidated into one state, of which Athens was the capital.

¶ Similarly, the several kingdoms of the Saxon heptarchy were consolidated into one kingdom by Egbert; but in this latter case, the might of arms, and not the power of conviction, was the instrument employed.

Theseus, duke of Athens. On his return home after marrying Hypolita, a crowd of female suppliants complained to him of Creon king of Thebes. The duke therefore set out for Thebes, slew Creon, and took the city by assault. Among the captives taken in this siege were two knights, named Palămon and Arcite, who saw the duke's sister from their dungeon window, and fell in love with her. When set at liberty, they told their loves to the duke, and Theseus (2 syl.) promised to give the lady to the best man in a single combat. Arcite overthrew Palamon, but as he was about to claim the lady his horse threw him, and he died; so Palamon lost the contest, but won the bride.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Knight's Tale," 1388).

N.B.—In classic story, Theseus is called "king;" but Chaucer styles him "duke," that is, dux, "leader or emperor" imperātor.

Thes'pian Maids (The), the nine Muses. So called from Thes'pia in Bœotia, near mount Helicon, often called Thespia Rupes.

Those modest Thespian maids thus to their Isis sung
Drayton: Polyolbion, xv. (1613).

Thespi'o, a Muse. The Muses were called Thespi'adês, from Thespia, in Bœo'tia, at the foot of mount Helicon.

Tell me, oh, tell me then, thou holy Muse,
Sacred Thespio.

Thet'is, mother of Achillês. She was a sea-nymph, daughter of Nereus the sea-god.—Grecian Story.

Theuerdank, a sobriquet of kaiser Maximilian I. of Germany (1459, 1493-1519).

They will never cut off my head to make you King. So said Charles II. to his brother, the duke of York, who urged his brother Charles to be more discreet in his conduct. Of course, he alluded to the decapitation of his father.

Thiebalt, a Provençal, one of Arthur's escorts to Aix.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Thiers (Monsieur). His nicknames were "Attila le Petit," "Tamerlan à lunettes," "Caméléon," "General Bonne," and "Le roi de Versailleux."

Thieves (The Two). The penitent thief crucified with Jesus has been called by sundry names, as Demas, Dismas, Titus, Matha, and Vicimus.

The impenitent thief has been called Gestas, Dumachas, Joca, and Justinus.

In the Apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus the former is called Dysmas and the latter Gestas. In the Story of Joseph of Arimathea the former is called Demas and the latter Gestas. (See TITUS.)

Thieves (His ancestors proved). It is sir Walter Scott who wrote and proved his "ancestors were thieves," in the Lay of the Last Minstrel, Iv. 9.

A modern author spends a hundred leaves
To prove his ancestors notorious thieves.
The Town Eclogue.

Thieves Screened. It is said of Edward the Confessor that one day, while lying on his bed for his afternoon's nap, a courtier stole into his chamber, and, seeing the king's casket, helped himself freely from it. He returned a second time, and on his third entrance, Edward said, "Be quick, or Hugoline (the chamberlain) will see you." The courtier was scarcely gone, when the chamberlain entered and instantly detected the theft. The king said, "Never mind, Hugoline; the fellow who has taken it no doubt has greater need of it than either you or I." (Reigned 1042-1066.)

¶ Several similar anecdotes are told of Robert the Pious of France. At one time he saw a man steal a silver candlestick off the altar, and said, "Friend Ogger, run for your life, or you will be found out" At another time, one of the twelve poor men in his train cut off a rich gold pendant from the royal robe, and Robert, turning to the man, said to him, "Hide it quickly, friend, before any one sees it." (Reigned 996-1031.)

¶ The following is told of two or three kings, amongst others of Ludwig the Pious, who had a very overbearing wife. A beggar under the table, picking up the crumbs which the king let down, cut off the gold fringe of the royal robe, and the king whispered to him, "Take care the queen doesn't see you."

Thieves of Historic Note.

(1) AUTOL'YCOS, son of Hermês; a very prince of thieves. He had the power of changing the colour and shape of stolen goods, so as to prevent their being recognized.—Greek Fable.

(2) BARLOW (Jimmy), immortalised by the ballad-song—

My name it is Jimmy Barlow;
I was born in the town of Carlow;
And here I lie in Maryboro' jail,
All for the robbing of the Dublin mail.

(3) CARTOUCHE, the Dick Turpin of France (eighteenth century).

(4) COTTINGTON (John), in the time of the Commonwealth, who emptied the pockets of Oliver Cromwell when lord protector, stripped Charles II. of £1500, and stole a watch and chain from lady Fairfax.

(5) DUVAL (Claude), a French highwayman, noted for his gallantry and daring (*-1670). (See below, "James Whitney," who was a very similar character.)

(Alexander Dumas has a novel entitled Claude Duval, and Miss Robinson has introduced him in White Friars.)

(6) FRITH (Mary), usually called "Moll Cutpurse." She had the honour of robbing general Fairfax on Hounslow Heath. Mary Frith lived in the reign of Charles I., and died at the age of 75 years.

(Nathaniel Field has introduced Mary Frith, and made merry with some of her pranks, in his comedy Amends for Ladies, 1618.)

(7) GALLOPING DICK, executed in Aylesbury in 1800.

(8) GRANT (Captain), the Irish highwayman, executed at Maryborough in 1816.

(9) GREENWOOD (Samuel), executed at Old Bailey in 1822.

(10) HASSAN, the "Old Man of the Mountain," once the terror of Europe. He was chief of the Assassins (1056-1124).

(11) HOOD (Robin), and his "merry men all," of Sherwood Forest. Famed in song, drama, and romance. Probably he lived in the reign of Richard Cœur de Lion.

(Sir W. Scott has introduced him both in The Talisman and in Ivanhoe. Stow has recorded the chief incidents of his life (see under the year 1213). Ritson has compiled a volume of ballads respecting him. Drayton has given a sketch of him in the Polyolbion, xxvi. The following are dramas on the same outlaw, viz.:—The Playe of Robyn Hode, very proper to be played in Maye games (fifteenth century); Skelton, at the command of Henry VIII., wrote a drama called The Downfall of Robert Earl of Huntington (about 1500); The Downfall of Robert earl of Huntington, by Munday (1597); The Death of Robert Earle of Huntington, otherwise called Robin Hood of Merrie Sherwodde, by H. Chettle (1598). Chettle's drama is in reality a continuation of Munday's, like the two parts of Shakespeare's plays, Henry IV. and Henry V. Robin Hood's Penn'orths, a play by Wm. Haughton (1600); Robin Hood and His Pastoral May Games (1624), Robin Hood and His Crew of Soldiers (1627), both anonymous; The Sad Shepherd or a Tale of Robin Hood (unfinished), B. Jonson (1637); Robin Hood, an opera (1730); Robin Hood, an opera by Dr. Arne and Burney (1741); Robin Hood, a musical farce (1751); Robin Hood, a comic opera (1784); Robin Hood, an opera by O'Keefe, music by Shield (1787); Robin Hood, by Macnally (before 1820). Sheridan began a drama on the same subject, which he called The Foresters.)

(12) PERIPHE'TES (4 syl.), of Argŏlis, surnamed "The Club-Bearer," because he used to kill his victims with an iron club.—Grecian Story.

(13) PROCRUSTES (3 syl.), a famous robber of Attica. His real name was Polypēmon or Damastēs, but he received the sobriquet of Procrustēs or "The Stretcher," from his practice of placing all victims that fell into his hands on a certain bedstead. If the victim was too short to fit it, he stretched the limbs to the right length; if too long, he lopped off the redundant part.—Grecian Story.

(14) REA (William), executed at Old Bailey in 1828.

(15) SHEPPARD (Jack), an ardent, reckless, generous youth, wholly unrivalled as a thief and burglar. His father was a carpenter in Spitalfields. Sentence of death was passed on him in August, 1724; but when the warders came to take him to execution, they found he had escaped. He was apprehended in the following October, and again made his escape. A third time he was caught, and in November suffered death. Certainly one of the most popular burglars that ever lived (1701-1724).

(Daniel Defoe made Jack Sheppard the hero of a romance in 1724, and H. Ainsworth in 1839.)

(16) SINIS, a Corinthian highwayman, surnamed "The Pine-Bender," from his custom of attaching the limbs of his victims to two opposite pine trees forcibly bent down. Immediately the pine trees were released, they bounded back, tearing the victim limb from limb.—Grecian Story.

(17) TER'MEROS, a robber of Peloponnesos, who killed his victims by cracking their skulls against his own.

(18) TURPIN (Dick), a noted highwayman (1711–1739). His ride to York [not historic] is described by H. Ainsworth in his Rookwood (1834).

(19) WHITNEY (James), the last of the "gentlemanly" highwaymen. He prided himself on being "the glass of fashion, and the mould of form." Executed at Porter's Block, near Smithfield (1660–1694).

(20) WILD (Jonathan), a cool, calculating, heartless villain, with the voice of a Stentor. He was born at Wolverhampton, in Staffordshire, and, like Sheppard, was the son of a carpenter. Unlike Sheppard, this cold-blooded villain was universally execrated. He was hanged at Tyburn (1682–1725).

(Defoe made Jonathan Wild the hero of a romance in 1725; Fielding in 1744.)

Think [Cogito ergo sum]. This was the unphilosophical axiom of Descartes.

Of course he assumes what he ought to prove. He assumes the existence of a thinker, and then says his existing being exists. He might just as well say a tree is green, a rose is red, sugar is sweet, therefore these things exist.

 "Higher than himself can no man think" was the saying of Protăgŏras.

Therefore eternity, omnipotence, deity, etc., are unthinkable subjects.

Thinks I to Myself, a novel by Nares (good), 1811.

Third Founder of Rome (The), Caius Marius. He was so called because he overthrew the multitudinous hordes of Cambrians and Teutŏnēs who came to lick up the Romans as the oxen of the field lick up grass (B.C. 102).

(The first founder was Romulus, and the second Camillus.)

Thirsil and Thelgon, two gentle swains who were kinsmen. Thelgon exhorts Thirsil to wake his "too long sleeping Muse;" and Thirsil, having collected the nymphs and shepherds around him, sang to them the song of The Purple Island.—Phineas Fletcher: The Purple Island, i., ii. (1633).

Thirsty (The), Colman Itadach, surnamed "The Thirsty," was a monk of the rule of St. Patrick. Itadach, in strict observance of St. Patrick's rule, refused to quench his thirst in the hot harvest-field, and died in consequence.

Thirteen Precious Things of Britain.

(1) DYRNWYN (the sword of Rhydderch Hael). If any man except Hael drew this blade, it burst into a flame from point to hilt.

(2) THE BASKET OF GWYDDNO GARANHIR. If food for one man were put therein, it multiplied till it sufficed for a hundred.

(3) THE HORN OF BRAN GALED, in which was always found the very beverage that each drinker most desired.

(4) THE PLATTER OF RHEGYNYDD YSGOLHAIG, which always contained the very food that the eater most liked.

(5) THE CHARIOT OF MORGAN MWYNVAWR. Whoever sat therein was transported instantaneously to the place he wished to go to.

(6) THE HALTER OF CLYDNO EIDDYN. Whatever horse he wished for was always found therein. It hung on a staple at the foot of his bed.

(7) THE KNIFE OF LLAWFRODDED FARCHAWG, which would serve twenty-four men simultaneously at any meal.

(8) THE CALDRON OF TYRNOG. If meat were put in for a brave man, it was cooked instantaneously; but meat for a coward would never get boiled therein.

(9) THE WHETSTONE OF TUDWAL TUDCLUD. If the sword of a brave man was sharpened thereon, its cut was certain death; but if of a coward, the cut was harmless.

(10) THE ROBE OF PADARN BEISRUDD, which fitted every one of gentle birth, but no churl could wear it.

(11) THE MANTLE OF TEGAU EURVRON, which only fitted ladies whose conduct was irreproachable.

(12) THE MANTLE OF KING ARTHUR, which could be worn or used as a carpet, and whoever wore it or stood on it was invisible. This mantle or carpet was called Gwen.

N.B.—The ring of Luned rendered the wearer invisible so long as the stone of it was concealed.

(13) THE CHESSBOARD OF GWENDOLEN. When the men were placed upon it they played of themselves. The board was of gold, and the men silver.—Welsh Romance.

Thirteen Unlucky. It is said that it is unlucky for thirteen persons to sit down to dinner at the same table, because one of the number will die before the year is out. This silly superstition is very ancient, but in Christian countries has been confirmed by the "Last Supper," when Christ and His twelve disciples sat at meat together. Jesus, of course, was crucified; and Judas Iscariot hanged himself.

¶ At a banquet in the Valhalla, Loki once intruded, making up thirteen, and Baldur was slain. (This is a mere allegory.)

Any odd number of mixed guests at a dinner-table must be awkward to seat; but certainly there would be a greater likelihood of one dying before the close of the year with fourteen than with thirteen guests.

Thirty (The). So the Spartan senate established by Lycurgos was called.

Similarly, the Venetian senate was called "The Forty."

Thirty Tyrants (The). So the governors appointed by Lysander the Spartan over Athens were called (B.C. 404). They continued in power only eight months, when Thrasybûlos deposed them and restored the republic.

"The Thirty" put more people to death in eight months of peace than the enemy had done in a war of thirty years.—Xenophon.

Thirty Tyrants of Rome (The), a fanciful name, applied by Trebellius Pollio to a set of adventurers who tried to make themselves masters of Rome at sundry times between A.D. 260 and 267.

The number was not thirty, and the analogy between them and "The Thirty Tyrants of Athens" is scarcely perceptible.

Thirty Years' War (The), a series of wars between the protestants and catholics of Germany, terminated by the "Peace of Westphalia." The war arose thus: The emperor of Austria interfered in the struggle between the protestants and catholics, by depriving the protestants of Bohemia of their religious privileges; in consequence of which the protestants flew to arms. After the contest had been going on for some years, Richelieu joined the protestants (1635), not from any love to their cause, but solely to humiliate Austria and Spain (1618–1648).

¶ The Peloponnesian war between Athens and Sparta is called "The Thirty Years' War" (B.C. 404–431).

Thisbe (2 syl.), a beautiful Babylonian maid, beloved by Pyrămus, her next-door neighbour. As their parents forbade their marriage, they contrived to hold intercourse with each other through a chink in the garden wall. Once they agreed to meet at the tomb of Ninus. Thisbê was the first at the trysting-place, but, being scared by a lion, took to flight, and accidentally dropped her robe, which the lion tore and stained with blood. Pyramus, seeing the blood-stained robe, thought that the lion had eaten Thisbê, and so killed himself. When Thisbê returned and saw her lover dead, she killed herself also. Shakespeare has burlesqued this pretty tale in his Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

Thom'alin, a shepherd who laughed to scorn the notion of love, but was ultimately entangled in its wiles. He tells Willy that one day, hearing a rustling in a bush, he discharged an arrow, when up flew Cupid into a tree. A battle ensued between them, and when the shepherd, having spent all his arrows, ran away, Cupid shot him in the heel. Thomalin did not much heed the wound at first, but soon it festered inwardly and rankled daily more and more.—Spenser: Shepheardes Calendar, iii. (1579).

N.B.—Thomalin is again introduced in ecl. vii., when he inveighs against the catholic priests in general, and the shepherd Palinode (3 syl.) in particular. This eclogue could not have been written before 1578, as it refers to the sequestration of Grindal archbishop of Canterbury in that year.

Thomas (Monsieur), the fellow-traveller of Valentine. Valentine's niece Mary is in love with him.—Fletcher: Mons. Thomas (1619).

Thomas (Sir), a dogmatical, prating, self-sufficient squire, whose judgments are but "justices' justice."—Crabbe: Borough, x. (1810).

Thomas à Kempis, the pseudonym of Jean Charlier de Gerson (1363–1429). Some say, of Thomas Hämmerlein of Kempen, an Augustan (1380–1471).

Thomas and Fair Ellinor (Lord), a ballad (author and date unknown). Lord Thomas greatly loved the fair Ellinor, but married a wealthy "brown maid," and Ellinor went to the wedding. Lord Thomas said to her that he "loved her little finger better than he loved his bride's whole body;" whereupon the bride stabbed Ellinor with a penknife to the heart; lord Thomas then cut off the head of his bride, and fell upon his own sword. And

There never three lovers together did meete
That sooner again did parte.
Percy: Reliques, series iii. bk. 1, No. 18.

¶ "Lord Thomas and lady Annet" and "Margaret and sweet William" are very similar ballads.

Thomas the Rhymer or "Thomas of Erceldoun," an ancient Scottish bard. His name was Thomas Learmont, and he lived in the days of Wallace (thirteenth century).

This personage, the Merlin of Scotland, . . . was a magician as well as a poet and prophet. He is alleged still to be living in the land of Faëry, and is expected to return at some great convulsion of society, in which he is to act a distinguished part.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

N.B.—If Thomas the Rhymer lived in the thirteenth century, it is an anachronism to allude to him in Castle Dangerous, the plot of which novel is laid in the twelfth century.

(Thomas the Rhymer, and Thomas Rymer are totally different persons. The latter was an historiographer, who compiled The Fœdera, 1638-1713.)

Thopas (Sir), a native of Poperyng, in Flanders; a capital sportsman, archer, wrestler, and runner. Sir Thopas resolved to marry no one but an "elf-queen," and accordingly started for Faëryland. On his way he met the three-headed giant Olifaunt, who challenged him to single combat. Sir Thopas asked permission to go for his armour, and promised to meet the giant next day. Here mine host broke in with the exclamation, "Intolerable stuff!" and the story was left unfinished. — Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Rime of sir Thopas," 1388).

Thor, eldest son of Odin and Frigga; strongest and bravest of the gods. He launched the thunder, presided over the air and the seasons, and protected man from lightning and evil spirits.

His wife was Sif ("love").
His chariot was drawn by two he-goats.
His sword or hammer was called Mjolner.
His belt was Megingiard. Whenever he put it on his strength was doubled.
His palace was Thrudvangr. It contained 540 halls.
Thursday is Thor's day.—Scandinavian Mythology.

(The word means "Refuge from terror." See DONAR, p. 292.)

Thoresby (Broad), one of the troopers under Fitzurse.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Thorn'berry (Joe), a brazier in Penzance. He was a blunt but kind man, strictly honest, most charitable, and doting on his daughter Mary. Job Thornberry is called "John Bull," and is meant to be a type of a genuine English tradesman, unsophisticated by cant and foreign matters. He failed in business "through the treachery of a friend;" but Peregrine, to whom he had lent ten guineas, returning from Calcutta, after an absence of thirty years, gave him £10,000, which he said his loan had grown to by honest trade.

Mary Thornberry, his daughter, in love with Frank Rochdale, son and heir of sir Simon Rochdale, whom ultimately she married.—Colman: John Bull (1805).

Thornhaugh (Colonel), an officer in Cromwell's army.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Thornhill (Sir William), alias Mr. Burchell, about 30 years of age. Most generous and most whimsical, most benevolent and most sensitive. Sir William was the landlord of Dr. Primrose, the vicar of Wakefield. After travelling through Europe on foot, he had returned and lived incognito. In the garb and aspect of a pauper, Mr. Burchell is introduced to the vicar of Wakefield. Twice he rescued his daughter Sophia—once when she was thrown from her horse into a deep stream, and once when she was abducted by squire Thornhill. Ultimately he married her.—Goldsmith: The Vicar of Wakefield (1766).

Thornhill (Squire), nephew of sir William Thornhill. He enjoyed a large fortune, but was entirely dependent on his uncle. He was a sad libertine, who abducted both the daughters of Dr. Primrose, and cast the old vicar into jail for rent after the entire loss of his house, money, furniture, and books by fire. Squire Thornhill tried to impose upon Olivia Primrose by a false marriage, but was caught in his own trap, for the marriage proved to be legal in every respect. — Goldsmith: The Vicar of Wakefield (1766).

This worthy citizen abused the aristocracy much on the same principle as the fair Olivia depreciated squire Thornhill;—he had a sneaking affection for what he abused.—Lord Lytton.

Thornton (Captain), an English officer.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Thornton (Cyril), the hero and title of a novel of military adventure, by captain Thomas Hamilton (1827).

Thorough Doctor (The). William Varro was called Doctor Funditus (thirteenth century).

Thoughtful (Father), Nicholas

Cat'inet, a marshal of France. So called by his soldiers for his cautious and thoughtful policy (1637-1712).

Thoughtless (Miss Betty), a virtuous, sensible, and amiable young lady, utterly regardless of the conventionalities of society, and wholly ignorant of etiquette. She is consequently for ever involved in petty scrapes most mortifying to her sensitive mind. Even her lover is alarmed at her gaucherie, and deliberates whether such a partner for life is desirable.—Mrs. Heywood: Miss Betty Thoughtless (1697-1758).

(Mrs. Heywood's novel evidently suggested the Evelina of Miss Burney, 1778.)

Thoulouse (Raymond count of), one of the crusading princes.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Thousand and One Days (The), the Persian Tales, first published at Paris in five vols. (1710-12); published in London in two vols. (1892). They are said to be French imitations of the Arabian Nights. This has been disproved by W. C. Clouston (see Notes and Queries, January 26, 1895, p. 63, etc.). The truth is the other way—Mon. Petis de la Croix translated the Persian Tales into French.

Thousand and One Nights (The), "The Arabian Nights' Tales," at one time supposed to be the inventions of Mon. Galland; but now proved (by Mon. Zotemberg) to be genuine Arabic, as the original MSS. have been discovered, and the MSS. have been safely deposited in the National Library of Paris.

I have in my library four vols., each of about 500 pp., called Continuations of the Arabian Nights, translated by Dom Chuvis and Mon. Cazotte from the Arabian MS. into French, and translated into English in 1792.

Thraso, a bragging, swaggering captain, the Roman Bobadil (q.v.).—Terence: The Eunuch (A.D. 162).

Thraso, duke of Mar, one of the allies of Charlemagne.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Threadneedle Street (London), a corruption of Thryddamen or Thryddenal Street, i.e. the third street from Cheapside. (Anglo-Saxon, thridda, "third.")

Three.
(1) A Divine number (Subordinates).
(2) A symbolic number.
(3) Miscellaneous.

(1) Three a Divine Number. (1) Pythagoras calls three the perfect number, expressive of "beginning, middle, and end," and he makes it a symbol of deity.

(2) AMERICAN INDIANS: Otkon (creator), Messou (providence), Atahuata (the Logos).

(Called Otkon by the Iroquois, and Otkee by the Virginians.)

(3) ARMORICA. The korrigans or fays of Armorica are three times three.

(4) BRAHMINS: Brahma, Vishnu, Siva.

(5) BUDDHISTS: Buddha, Annan Sonsja, Rosia Sonsja.

(These are the three idols seen in Buddhist temples; Buddha stands in the middle.)

(6) CHRISTIANS: The Father, the Son (the Logos), the Holy Ghost or Spirit.

(When, in creation, the earth was without form and void, "the Spirit moved over the face," and put it into order.)

(7) EGYPTIANS (Ancient). Almost each nome had its own triad, but the most general were Osiris, Isis, Horus; Eicton, Cneph (creator), Phtha.—Jamblichus.

(8) ETRUSCANS. Their college consisted of three times three gods.

> Lars Porsĕna of Clusium,
> By the nine gods he swore
> That the great house of Tarquin
> Should suffer wrong no more.
> Macaulay: Lays of Ancient Rome
> ("Horatius," 1842).

(9) KAMTSCHADALES: Koutkhou (creator of heaven), Kouhttigith, his sister (creator of earth), Outleigin (creator of ocean).

(10) PARSEES: Ahura (the creator), Vohu Mano ("entity"), Akem Mano ("nonentity").

(11) PERSIANS: Oromasdês or Oromâzês (the good principle), Arimanês (the evil principle), Mithras (fecundity).

(Others give Zervanê (god the father), and omit Mithras from the trinity.)

(12) PERUVIANS (Ancient): Pachama (goddess mother), Virakotcha (= Jupiter), Mamakotcha (= Neptune). They called their trinity "Tangatanga" (i.e. "three in one").

(13) PHŒNICIANS: Kolpia (the Logos), Baaut ("darkness"), Mot ("matter").

(14) ROMANS (Ancient): Jupiter (god of heaven), Neptune (god of earth and sea), Pluto (god of hell).

(Their whole college of gods consisted of four times three deities.)

(15) SCANDINAVIANS: Odin ("life"), Hœnir ("motion"), Loda ("matter").

(16) TAHITIANS: Taroataihetoomoo (chief deity), Tepapa (the fecund principle), Tettoomatataya (their offspring).

In the Christian Creed the Holy Ghost "proceedeth from the Father and the Son."

(17) Lao-Tseu, the Chinese philosopher, says the divine trinity is: Ki, Hi, Ouei.

(18) Orpheus says it is: Phanês (light), Urânos (heaven), Kronos (time).

(19) Plato says it is: Tô Agâthon (goodness), Nous (intelligence), Psuchê (the mundane soul).

(20) Pythagoras says it is: Monad (the unit or oneness), Nous, Psuchê.

(21) Vossius says it is: Jupiter (divine power), Minerva (the Logos), Juno (divine progenitiveness).

Subordinate. The orders of ANGELS are three times three, viz.: (1) Seraphim, (2) Cherubim, (3) Thrones, (4) Dominions, (5) Virtues, (6) Powers, (7) Principalities, (8) Archangels, (9) Angels.—Dionysius the Areopagite.

In heaven above
The effulgent bands in triple circles move.
Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, xi. 13 (1575).

The CITIES OF REFUGE were three on each side the Jordan.

The FATES are three: Clotho (with her distaff, presides at birth), Lachêsis (spins the thread of life), Atrŏpos (cuts the thread).

The FURIES are three: Tisiponê, Alecto, Megæra.

The GRACES are three: Euphros'ynê (cheerfulness of mind), Aglaia (mirth), Thalî (good-tempered jest).

The JUDGES OF HADES are three: Minos (the chief baron), Æacus (the judge of Europeans), Rhadamanthus (the judge of Asiatics and Africans).

The MUSES are three times three.

Jupiter's thunder is three-forked (trifidum); Neptune's trident has three prongs; Pluto's dog Cerbĕrus has three heads. The rivers of hell are three times three, and Styx flows round it thrice three times.

In Scandinavian mythology, there are three times three earths; three times three worlds in Niflheim; three times three regions under the dominion of Hel.

According to a mediæval tradition, the heavens are three times three, viz. the Moon, Venus, Mercury, the Sun, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, the fixed stars, and the primum mobîlê.

(2) Three a Symbolic Number.

(1) In the Tabernacle and the Jewish Temple.

The Temple consisted of three parts: the porch, the temple proper, and the holy of holies. It had three courts: the court of the priests, the court of the people, and the court of foreigners. The innermost court had three rows, and three windows in each row (1 Kings vi. 36; vii. 4).

¶ Similarly, Ezekiel's city had three gates on each side (Ezek. xlviii. 31). Cyrus left direction for the rebuilding of the temple: it was to be three score cubits in height, and three score cubits wide, and three rows of great stones were to be set up (Ezra vi. 3, 4). In like manner, the "new Jerusalem" is to have four times three foundations: (1) jasper, (2) sapphire, (3) chalcedony, (4) emerald, (5) sardonyx, (6) sardius, (7) chrysolyte, (8) beryl, (9) topaz, (10) chrysoprase, (11) jacinth, (12) amethyst. It is to have three gates fronting each cardinal quarter (Rev. xxi. 13-20).

(2) In the Temple Furniture: The golden candlestick had three branches on each side (Exod. xxv. 32); there were three bowls (ver. 33); the height of the altar was three cubits (Exod. xxvii. 1); there were three pillars for the hangings (ver. 14); Solomon's molten sea was supported on oxen, three facing each cardinal point (1 Kings vii. 25).

(3) Sacrifices and Offerings: A meat offering consisted of three tenth deals of fine flour (Lev. xiv. 10); Hannah offered up three bullocks when Samuel was devoted to the temple (1 Sam. i. 24); three sorts of beasts—bullocks, rams, and lambs—were appointed for offerings (Numb. xxix.); the Jews were commanded to keep three national feasts yearly (Exod. xxiii. 14-17); in all criminal charges three witnesses were required (Deut. xvii. 6).

(3) Miscellaneous Threes. Joshua sent three men from each tribe to survey the land of Canaan (Josh. xviii. 4). Job had three friends (Job ii. 11). Abraham was accosted by three men (angels), with whom he pleaded to spare the cities of the plain (Gen. xviii. 2). Nebuchadnezzar cast three men into the fiery furnace (Dan. iii. 24). David had three mighty men of valour, and one of them slew 300 of the Philistines with his spear (2 Sam. xxiii. 9, 18). Nebuchadnezzar's image was three score cubits high (Dan. iii. 1). Moses was hidden three months from the Egyptian police (Exod. ii. 2). The ark of the covenant was three months in the house of Obed-edom (2 Sam. vi. 11). Balaam smote his ass three times before the beast upbraided him (Numb. xxii. 28). Samson mocked Delilah three times (Judg. xvi. 15). Elijah stretched himself three times on the child which he restored to life (1 Kings xvii. 21). The little horn plucked up three horns by the roots (Dan. vii. 8). The bear seen by Daniel in his vision had three ribs in its mouth (ver. 5). Joab slew Absalom with three darts (2 Sam. xviii. 14). God gave David the choice of three chastisements (2 Sam. xxiv. 12). The great famine in David's reign lasted three years (2 Sam. xxi. 1); so did the great drought in Ahab's reign (Luke iv. 25). There were three men transfigured on the mount, and three spectators (Matt. xvii. 1-4). The sheet was let down to Peter three times (Acts x. 16). There are three Christian graces: Faith, hope, and charity (1 Cor. xiii. 13). There are three that bear record in heaven, and three that bear witness on earth (1 John v. 7, 8). There were three unclean spirits that came out of the mouth of the dragon (Rev. xvi. 13).

So again. Every ninth wave is said to be the largest.

> [They] watched the great sea fall,
> Wave after wave, each mightier than the last;
> Till last, a ninth one, gathering half the deep
> And full of voices, slowly rose and plunged,
> Roaring, and all the wave was in a flame.
> Tennyson: The Holy Grail (1858-59).

A wonder is said to last three times three days. The scourge used for criminals is (or used to be) a "cat o' nine tails." Possession is nine points of the law, being equal to (1) money to make good a claim, (2) patience to carry a suit through, (3) a good cause, (4) a good lawyer, (5) a good counsel, (6) good witnesses, (7) a good jury, (8) a good judge, (9) good luck. Leases used to be granted for 999 years. Ordeals by fire consisted of three times three red-hot ploughshares.

There are three times three crowns recognized in heraldry, and three times three marks of cadency.

We show honour by a three times three in drinking a health.

The worthies are three Jews, three pagans, and three Christians: viz. Joshua, David, and Judas Maccabæus; Hector, Alexander, and Julius Cæsar; Arthur, Charlemagne, and Godfrey of Bouillon. The worthies of London are three times three also: (1) sir William Walworth, (2) sir Henry Pritchard, (3) sir William Sevenoke, (4) sir Thomas White, (5) sir John Bonham, (6) Christopher Croker, (7) sir John Hawkwood, (8) sir Hugh Caverley, (9) sir Henry Maleverer (Richard Johnson: The Nine Worthies of London).

∴ Those who take any interest in this subject can easily multiply the examples here set down to a much greater number. (See below, the Welsh Triads.)

Three Ardent Lovers of Britain (The): (1) Caswallawn son of Beli, the ardent lover of Flur daughter of Mugnach Gorr; (2) Tristan or Tristram son of Talluch, the ardent lover of Yseult wife of March Meirchawn his uncle, generally called king Mark of Cornwall; (3) Kynon son of Clydno Eiddin, the ardent lover of Morvyth daughter of Urien of Rheged.—Welsh Triads.

Three Battle Knights (The) in the court of king Arthur: (1) Cadwr earl of Cornwall; (2) Launcelot du Lac; (3) Owain son of Urien prince of Rheged, i.e. Cumberland and some of the adjacent lands. These three would never retreat from battle, neither for spear, nor sword, nor arrow; and Arthur knew no shame in fight when they were present.—Welsh Triads.

Three Beautiful Women (The) of the court of king Arthur: (1) Gwenhwyvar or Guenever wife of king Arthur; (2) Enid, who dressed in "azure robes," wife of Geraint; (3) Tegau or Tegau Euron.—Welsh Triads.

Three Blessed Rulers (The) of the island of Britain: (1) Bran or Vran, son of Llyr, and father of Caradawc (Caractacus). He was called "The Blessed" because he introduced Christianity into the nation of the Cymry from Rome; he learnt it during his seven years' detention in that city with his son. (2) Lleurig ab Coel ab Cyllyn Sant, surnamed "The Great Light." He built the cathedral of Llandaff, the first sanctuary of Britain. (3) Cadwaladyr, who gave refuge to all believers driven out by the Saxons from England.—Welsh Triads, xxxv.

Three Calenders (The), three sons of three kings, who assumed the disguise of begging dervishes. They had each lost one eye. The three met in the house of Zobeidê, and told their respective tales in the presence of Haroun-al-Raschid also in disguise. (See CALENDERS, p. 168.) —Arabian Nights ("The Three Calenders").

Three Chief Ladies (The) of the island of Britain: (1) Branwen daughter of king Llyr, "the fairest damsel in the world;" (2) Gwenhwyvar or Guenever wife of king Arthur; (3) Æthelfled the wife of Æthelred.

Three Closures (The) of the island of Britain: (1) The head of Vran son of Llyr, surnamed "The Blessed," which was buried under the White Tower of London, and so long as it remained there, no invader would enter the island. (2) The bones of Vortimer, surnamed "The Blessed," buried in the chief harbour of the island: so long as they remained there, no hostile ship would approach the coast. (3) The dragons buried by Lludd son of Beli in the city of Pharaon, in the Snowdon rocks. (See THREE FATAL DISCLOSURES.)—Welsh Triads, liii.

Three Counselling Knights (The) of the court of king Arthur: (1) Kynon or Cynon son of Clydno Eiddin; (2) Aron son of Kynfarch ap Meirchion Gul; (3) Llywarch Hên son of Elidir Lydanwyn. So long as Arthur followed the advice of these three, his success was invariable, but when he neglected to follow their counsel, his defeat was sure. —Welsh Triads.

Three Diademed Chiefs (The) of the island of Britain: (1) Kai son of Kyner, the sewer of king Arthur. He could transform himself into any shape he pleased. Always ready to fight, and always worsted. Half knight and half buffoon. (2) Trystan mab Tallwch, one of Arthur's three heralds, and one whom nothing could divert from his purpose; he is generally called sir Tristram. (3) Gwevyl mab Gwestad, the melancholy. "When sad, he would let one of his lips drop below his waist, while the other turned up like a cap upon his head."—The Mabinogion, 227.

Three Disloyal Tribes (The) of the island of Britain: (1) The tribe of Goronwy Pebyr, which refused to stand substitute for their lord, Llew Llaw Gyffes, when a poisoned dart was shot at him by Llech Goronwy; (2) the tribe of Gwrgi, which deserted their lord in Caer Greu, when he met Eda Glinmawr in battle (both were slain); (3) the tribe of Alan Vyrgan, which slunk away from their lord on his journey to Camlan, where he was slain.—Welsh Triads, xxxv.

Three Estates of the Realm: the Lords Spiritual, the Lords Temporal, and the Commonalty.

N.B.—The sovereign is not one of the three estates.

Three Fatal Disclosures (The) of the island of Britain: (1) That of the buried head of Vran "the Blessed" by king Arthur, because he refused to hold the sovereignty of the land except by his own strength; (2) that of the bones of Vortimer by Vortigern, out of love for Ronwen (Rowena) daughter of Hengist the Saxon; (3) that of the dragons in Snowdon by Vortigern, in revenge of the Cymryan displeasure against him; having this done, he invited over the Saxons in his defence. (See THREE CLOSURES.)—Welsh Triads, liii.

Three-Fingered Jack, the nickname of a famous negro robber, who was the terror of Jamaica in 1780. He was at length hunted down and killed in 1781.

Three Fishers (The), a poem by Charles Kingsley, telling how three fishers went to sea, and when morning came "three corpses lay on the shining sands" (1859).

Three Golden-Tongued Knights (The) in the court of king Arthur; (1) Gwalchmai, called in French Gawain son of Gwyar; (2) Drudwas son of Tryffin; (3) Eliwlod son of Madog ab Uthur. They never made a request which was not at once granted.—Welsh Triads.

Three Great Astronomers (The) of the island of Britain: (1) Gwydion son of Don. From him the Milky Way is called "Caer Gwydion." He called the constellation Cassiopeia "The Court of Don" or Llys Don, after his father; and the Corona Borealis he called "Caer Arianrod," after his daughter. (2) Gwynn son of Nudd. (3) Idris.—Welsh Triads, ii. 325.

Three Holy Tribes (The) of the island of Britain: (1) That of Bran or Vran, who introduced Christianity into Wales; (2) that of Cunedda Wledig; and (3) that of Brychan Brycheiniog.—Welsh Triads, xxxv.

Three Kings. In our line of kings we never exceed three reigns without interruption or catastrophe. (See KINGS OF ENGLAND, p. 573.)

Three Kings of Cologne (The), the three "Wise Men" who followed the guiding star "from the East" to Jerusalem, and offered gifts to the babe Jesus. Their names were Jaspar or Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthazar; or Apellius, Amĕrus, and Damascus; or Magalath, Galgalath, and Sarasin; or Ator, Sator, and Peratŏras. Klopstock, in his Messiah, says the Wise Men were six in number, and gives their names as Hadad, Selfma, Zimri, Mirja, Beled, and Sunith.

 The toys shown in Cologne Cathedral as the "three kings" are called Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthazar.

Three Kings' Day, Twelfth Day or Epiphany, designed to commemorate the visit of the "three kings" or "Wise Men of the East" to the infant Jesus.

Three Learned Knights (The) of the island of Britain: (1) Gwalchmai ab Gwyar, called in French romances Gawain son of Lot; (2) Llecheu ab Arthur; (3) Rhiwallon with the broombush hair. There was nothing that man knew they did not know.—Welsh Triads.

Three-Leg Alley (London), now called Pemberton Row, Fetter Lane.

Three Letters (A Man of), a thief. A Roman phrase, from fur, "a thief."

> Tun' trium literarum homo
> Me vituperas? Fur!
> Plautus: Aululariæ, ii. 4.

Three Makers of Golden Shoes (The) of the island of Britain: (1) Caswallawn son of Beli, when he went to Gascony to obtain Flur. She had been abducted for Julius Cæsar, but was brought back by the prince. (2) Manawyddan son of Llyr, when he sojourned in Lloegyr (England). (3) Llew Llaw Gyffes, when seeking arms from his mother.—Welsh Triads, cxxiv.

> "What craft shall we take?" said Manawyddan. ... "Let us take to making shoes." ... So he bought the best cordwal ... and got the best goldsmith to make clasps ... and he was called one of the three makers of gold shoes.—The Mabinogion ("Manawyddan," twelfth century).

Three-Men Wine. Very bad wine is so called, because it requires one man to hold the victim, a second to pour the wine down his throat, and the third is the victim made to drink it.

Abraham Santa Clara, the preaching friar, calls the wine of Alsace "three-men wine."

Three per Cents. "The sweet simplicity of the three per cents." This was the saying of Dr. Scott (lord Stowell), brother of lord Eldon the great Admiralty judge.

Three Robbers (The). The three stars in Orion's belt are said to be "three robbers climbing up to rob the Ranee's silver bedstead."—Miss Frere: Old Deccan Days, 28.

Three Stayers of Slaughter (The): (1) Gwgawn Gleddyvrud; the name of his horse was Buchestom. (2) Morvran eil Tegid. (3) Gilbert mab Cadgyffro.—Welsh Triads, xxix.

Three Tailors of Tooley Street (The), three worthies, who held a meeting in Tooley Street for the redress of popular grievances, and addressed a petition to the House of Commons, while Canning was prime minister, beginning, "We, the people of England."

(Tooley Street is in Southwark, London.)

¶ The "deputies of Vaugirard" presented themselves before Charles VIII. of France. When the king asked how many there were, the usher replied, "Only one, an please your majesty."

Three Tragic Stories of Ancient Ireland. (See USNACH.)

Three Tribe Herdsmen of Britain (The): (1) Llawnrodded Varvawe, who tended the milch cows of Nudd Hael son of Senyllt; (2) Bennren, who kept the herd of Caradawc son of Brân, Glamorganshire; (3) Gwdion son of Don the enchanter, who kept the kine of Gwynedd above the Conway. All these herds consisted of 21,000 milch cows.—Welsh Triads, lxxxv.

Three Tyrants of Athens (The): Pisistrătos (B.C. 560-490), Hippias and Hipparchos (B.C. 527-490).

(The two brothers reigned conjointly from 527-514, when the latter was murdered.)

Three Unprofessional Bards (The) of the island of Britain: (1) Rhyawd son of Morgant; (2) king Arthur; (3) Cadwallawn son of Cadvan.—Welsh Triads, lxxxix. 113.

Three Warnings, a poem by Mrs. Piozzi, showing that the infirmities of age, such as the loss of physical strength, of hearing, and of sight, are three warnings of approaching decay (about 1800).

Three Weeks after Marriage, a comedy by A. Murphy (1776). Sir Charles Racket has married the daughter of a rich London tradesman, and three weeks of the honeymoon having expired, he comes on a visit to the lady's father, Mr. Drugget. Old Drugget plumes himself on his aristocratic son-in-law, so far removed from the vulgar brawls of meaner folk. On the night of their arrival, the bride and bridegroom quarrel about a game of whist; the lady maintained that sir Charles ought to have played a diamond instead of a club. So angry is sir Charles that he resolves to have a divorce; and although the quarrel is patched up, Mr. Drugget has seen enough of the beau monde to decline the alliance of Lovelace for his second daughter, whom he gives to a Mr. Woodley.

Pope and Gay wrote a farce called Three Hours after Marriage (1717).

Three Writers (The). (See SCRIPTORES TRES, p. 973.)

Thresher (Captain), the feigned leader of a body of lawless Irishmen, who attacked, in 1806, the collectors of tithes and their subordinates.

¶ Captain Right was a leader of the rebellious peasantry in the south of Ireland in the eighteenth century.

¶ Captain Rock was the assumed name of a leader of Irish insurgents in 1822.

Throgmorton Street (London). So named from sir Nicholas Throckmorton, banker (1513–1571).

(Sir Nicholas took part in Wyatt's rebellion.)

Thrummy-Cap, a sprite which figures in the fairy tales of Northumberland. He was a "queer-looking little auld man," whose scene of exploits generally lay in the vaults and cellars of old castles. John Skelton, in his Colyn Clout, calls him Tom-a-Thrum, and says that the clergy could neither write nor read, and were no wiser than this cellar sprite.

Thrush (Song of the).

White hat, white hat;
Cherry do, cherry do;
Pretty Joe, pretty Joe.

The Storm Thrush, calling for rain, says—

Bill Peters, Bill Peters,
Bill Peters, Bill Peters,
Kiss me quick.

Thu'le (2 syl.), the most remote northern portion of the world known to the ancient Greeks and Romans; but whether an island or part of a continent nobody knows. It is first mentioned by Pythĕas, the Greek navigator, who says it is "six days' sail from Britain," and that its climate is a "mixture of earth, air, and sea." Ptolemy, with more exactitude, tells us that the 63° of north latitude runs through the middle of Thulê, and adds that "the days there are at the equinoxes twenty-four hours long." Generally supposed to be the Faroe Islands. Perhaps it was Iceland.

(No place has a day of twenty-four hours long at either equinox; but anywhere beyond either polar circle the day is twenty-four hours long at one of the solstices.)

Suidas says it was so called from Thulus, its most ancient king.

(Antonius Diogenês, a Greek, wrote a romance on "The Incredible Things beyond Thulê" (Ta huper Thoulen Apista), which has furnished the basis of many subsequent tales. The work is not extant, but Photius gives an outline of its contents in his Bibliotheca.)

Thumb (Tom), a dwarf no bigger than a man's thumb. He lived in the reign of king Arthur, by whom he was knighted. He was the son of a common ploughman, and was killed by the poisonous breath of a spider in the reign of Thunstone, the successor of king Arthur.

Amongst his adventures may be mentioned the following:—He was lying one day asleep in a meadow, when a cow swallowed him as she cropped the grass. At another time, he rode in the ear of a horse. He crept up the sleeve of a giant, and so tickled him that he shook his sleeve, and Tom, falling into the sea, was swallowed by a fish. The fish being caught and carried to the palace, gave the little man his introduction to the king.

∴ The oldest version extant of this nursery tale is in rhyme, and bears the following title:—Tom Thumb, His Life and Death; wherein is declared many marvailous acts of manhood, full of wonder and strange merriments. Which little knight lived in king Arthur's time, and was famous in the court of Great Brittaine. London: printed for John Wright, 1630 (Bodleian Library). It begins thus—

In Arthur's court Tom Thumbe did live—
A man of mickle might,
The best of all the Table Round,
And eke a doughty knight.

His stature but an inch in height,
Or quarter of a span;
Then thinke you not this little knight
Was prou'd a valiant man?

N.B.—"Great Britain" was not a recognized term till 1701 (queen Anne), when the two parliaments of Scotland and England were united. Before that time, England was called "South Britain," Scotland "North Britain," and Brittany "Little Britain." The date 1630 would carry us back to the reign of Charles I.

Fielding, in 1730, wrote a burlesque opera called Tom Thumb, which was altered in 1778 by Kane O'Hara. Dr. Arne wrote the music to it, and his "daughter (afterwards Mrs. Cibber), then only 14, acted the part of 'Tom Thumb' at the Haymarket Theatre."—Davies: Life of Garrick.

N.B.—Here again the dates do not correctly fit in. Mrs. Cibber was born in 1710, and must have been 20 when Fielding produced his opera of Tom Thumb.

Thumb (General Tom), a dwarf exhibited in London in 1846. His real name was Charles S. Stratton. At the age of 25, his height was 25 inches, and his weight 25 lbs. He was born at Bridgeport, Connecticut, United States, in 1832, and died in January, 1879.

They rush by thousands to see Tom Thumb. They push, they fight, they scream, they faint, they cry, "Help!" and "Murder!" They see my bills and caravan, but do not read them. Their eyes are on them, but their sense is gone. . . . In one week 12,000 persons paid to see Tom Thumb, while only 133 paid to see my "Aristides."—Haydon (the artist); MS. Diary.

Thunder prognosticates evil according to the day of the week on which it occurs.

Sondayes thundre shoulde brynge the deathe of learned men, judges, and others; Mondayes thundre, the deathe of women; Tuesdayes thundre, plentie of graine; Wednesdayes thundre, the deathe of harlottes and other blodshede; Thursdayes thundre, plentie of shepe and corne; Fridayes thundre, the slaughter of a great man and other horrible murders; and Saturdayes thundre, a generall pestilent plague and great deathe. —Digges: A Prognostication Everlasting of Right Good Effects (1556).

Thunder (The Giant), a giant who fell into a river and was killed, because Jack cut the ropes which suspended a bridge that the giant was crossing.—Jack the Giant-Killer.

Thunder (The Sons of). James and John, the sons of Zebedee, were called "Boaner'gês."—Luke ix. 54; Mark iii. 17.

Thunder and Lightning. Stephen II. of Hungary was surnamed Tonnant (1100, 1114-1131).

Thunderbolt (The). Ptolemy king of Macedon, eldest son of Ptolemy Sotêr I., was so called from his great impetuosity (B.C. *, 285-279).

¶ Handel was called by Mozart "The Thunderbolt" (1684-1759).

Thunderbolt of Italy (The), Gaston de Foix, nephew of Louis XII. (1489-1512).

Thunderbolt of War (The). Roland is so called in Spanish ballads.

Tisaphernês is so called in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, xx. (1575).

Thunderer (The), the Times newspaper. This popular name was first given to the journal in allusion to a paragraph in one of the articles contributed by captain Edward Sterling, while Thomas Barnes was editor.

We thundered forth the other day an article on the subject of social and political reform.

Some of the contemporaries caught up the expression, and called the Times "The Thunderer." Captain Sterling used to sign himself "Vetus" before he was placed on the staff of the paper.

Thundering Legion (The), the twelfth legion of the Roman army under Marcus Aurêlius acting against the Quadi, A.D. 174. It was shut up in a defile, and reduced to great straits for want of water, when a body of Christians, enrolled in the legion, prayed for relief. Not only was rain sent, but the thunder and lightning so terrified the foe that a complete victory was obtained, and the legion was ever after called "The Thundering Legion."—Dion Cassius: Roman History, lxxi. 8; Eusebius: Ecclesiastical History, v. 5. (Probably fabulous.)

¶ The Theban legion, i.e. the legion raised in the Thebaïs of Egypt, and composed of Christian soldiers led by St. Maurice, was likewise called "The Thundering Legion."

¶ The term "Thundering Legion" existed before either of these two were so called.

Thunstone (2 syl.), the successor of king Arthur, in whose reign Tom Thumb was killed by a spider.—Tom Thumb.

Thu'rio, a foolish rival of Valentine for the love of Silvia daughter of the duke of Milan.—Shakespeare: The Two Gentlemen of Verona (1595).

Thursday is held unlucky by the Swedes; so is it with the Russians, especially in Esthonia. Friday is the unlucky day with Christians, because Jesus was crucified on a Friday.

Thursday (Black). February 6, 1851, is so called in the colony of Victoria, from a terrible bush fire which occurred on that day (see p. 124).

Thwacker (Quartermaster), in the dragoons.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Thwackum, in Fielding's novel, The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling (1749).

Thyamis, an Egyptian thief, native of Memphis. Theagĕnês and Chariclēa being taken by him prisoners, he fell in love with the lady, and shut her up in a cave for fear of losing her. Being closely beset by another gang stronger than his own, he ran his sword into the heart of Chariclea, that she might go with him into the land of shadows, and be his companion in the future life.—Heliodorus: Æthiopica.

> Like to the Egyptian thief, at point of death,
> Kill what I love.
> Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, act v. sc. 1 (1614).

Thyeste'an Banquet (in Latin, cæna Thyestæ), a cannibal feast. Thyestês was given his own two sons to eat in a banquet served up to him by his brother Atreus [At.truce].

¶ Procnê and Philomēna served up to Tereus (2 syl.) his own son Itys.

(Milton accents the word on the second syllable in Paradise Lost, x. 688, but then he calls Chalybe'an, (Samson Agonistes, 133) "Chalyb'ean," Ægе'an (Paradise Lost, i. 745) "Æ'gean," and Cambuscan' he calls "Cambus'can.")

Thyeste'an Revenge, blood for blood, tit for tat of bloody vengeance.

(1) Thyestês seduced the wife of his brother Atreus (2 syl.), for which he was banished. In his banishment he carried off his brother's son Plisthĕnês, whom he brought up as his own child. When the boy was grown to manhood, he sent him to assassinate Atreus, but Atreus slew Plisthenês, not knowing him to be his son. The corresponding vengeance was this: Thyestês had a son named Ægisthos, who was brought up by king Atreus as his own child. When Ægisthos was grown to manhood, the king sent him to assassinate Thyestês, but the young man slew Atreus instead.

(2) Atreus slew his own son Plisthenês, thinking him to be his brother's child. When he found out his mistake, he pretended to be reconciled to his brother, and asked him to a banquet. Thyestês went to the feast, and ate part of his own two sons, which had been cooked, and were set before him by his brother.

(3) Thyestês defiled the wife of his brother Atreus, and Atreus married Pelopia the unwedded wife of his brother Thyestês. It was the son of this woman by Thyestês who murdered Atreus (his uncle and father-in-law).

∴ The tale of Atreus and that of Œdĭpus are the two most lamentable stories of historic fiction, and in some points resemble each other: Thus Œdipus married his mother, not knowing who she was; Thyestês seduced his daughter, not knowing who she was. Œdipus slew his father, not knowing who he was; Atreus slew his son, not knowing who he was. Œdipus was driven from his throne by the sons born to him by his own mother; Atreus [At.truce] was killed by the natural son of his own wife.

Thymbræ'an God (The), Apollo; so called from a celebrated temple raised to his honour on a hill near the river Thymbrius.

> The Thymbræan god
> With Mars I saw and Pallas.
> Dante: Purgatory, xii. (1308).

Thyrsis, a herdsman introduced in the Idylls of Theocritos, and in Virgil's Eclogue, vii. Any shepherd or rustic is so called.

> Hard by, a cottage chimney smokes
> From betwixt two aged oaks,
> Where Corydon and Thyrsis, met,
> Are at their savoury dinner set.
> Milton: L'Allegro (1638).

Thyrsis, a monody on Arthur Hugh Clough, by Matthew Arnold.

Thyrsus, a long pole with an ornamental head of ivy, vine leaves, or a fir cone, carried by Bacchus and by his votaries at the celebration of his rites. It was emblematic of revelry and drunkenness.

> [I will] abash the frantic thyrsus with my song.
> Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads (1767).

Tibbs (Beau), a poor, clever, dashing young spark, who had the happy art of fancying he knew all the haut monde, and that all the monde knew him; that his garret was the choicest spot in London for its commanding view of the Thames; that his wife was a lady of distinguished airs; and that his infant daughter would marry a peer. He took off his hat to every man and woman of fashion, and made out that dukes, lords, duchesses, and ladies addressed him simply as Ned. His hat was pinched up with peculiar smartness; his looks were pale, thin, and sharp; round his neck he wore a broad black ribbon, and in his bosom a glass pin; his coat was trimmed with tarnished lace; and his stockings were silk. Beau Tibbs interlarded his rapid talk with fashionable oaths, such as, "Upon my soul! egad!"

"I was asked to dine yesterday," he says, "at the duchess of Piccadilly's. My lord Mudler was there. 'Ned,' said he, 'I'll hold gold to silver I can tell you where you were poaching last night . . . I hope, Ned, it will improve your fortune.' 'Fortune, my lord? five hundred a year at least—great secret—let it go no further.' My lord took me down in his chariot to his country seat yesterday, and we had a tête-à-tête dinner in the country." "I fancy you told us just now you dined yesterday at the duchess's in town." "Did I so?" replied he coolly. "To be sure, egad! now I do remember—yes, I had two dinners yesterday."—Letter liv.

Mrs. Tibbs, wife of the beau, a slattern and a coquette, much emaciated, but with the remains of a good-looking woman. She made twenty apologies for being in dishabille; but had been out all night with the countess. Then, turning to her husband, she added, "And his lordship, my dear, drank your health in a bumper." Ned then asked his wife if she had given orders for dinner. "You need make no great preparation—only we three. My lord cannot join us to-day—something small and elegant will do, such as a turbot, an ortolan, a——"

"Or," said Mrs. Tibbs, "what do you think, my dear, of a nice bit of ox-cheek, dressed with a little of my own sauce?" "The very thing," he replies; "it will eat well with a little beer. His grace was very fond of it, and I hate the vulgarity of a great load of dishes." The citizen of the world now thought it time to decamp, and took his leave, Mrs. Tibbs assuring him that dinner would certainly be quite ready in two or three hours.—Letter lv.

Mrs. Tibbs's lady's-maid, a vulgar, brawny Scotchwoman. "Where's my lady?" said Tibbs, when he brought to his garret his excellency the ambassador of China. "She's a-washing your twa shirts at the next door, because they won't lend us the tub any longer."—Goldsmith: A Citizen of the World (1759).

Tibert (Sir), the name of the cat, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498).

Tibet Talkapace, a prating handmaid of Custance the gay and rich widow vainly sought by Ralph Roister Doister.—Nicholas Udall: Ralph Roister Doister (first English comedy, 1534).

The metre runs thus—

I hearde our nourse speake of an husbande to-day
Ready for our mistresse, a rich man and gay;
And we shall go in our French hoodes every day . . .
Then shall ye see Tibet, sires, treade the mosse so trimme . . .
Not lumperdes, clumperdes, like our Spanish Rig.

Tibs (Mr.), a most "useful hand." He will write you a receipt for the bite of a mad dog, tell you an Eastern tale to perfection, and understands the business part of an author so well that no publisher can humbug him. You may know him by his peculiar clumsiness of figure, and the coarseness of his coat; but he never forgets to inform you that his clothes are all paid for. (See TIBBS.)—Goldsmith: A Citizen of the World, xxix. (1759).

Tibs's Eve (St.), never. St. Tibs is a corruption of St. Ubes. There is no such saint in the calendar; and therefore St. Tibs's Eve falls on the Greek Kalends. (See NEVER, p. 750.)

Tibullus, a Roman poet, contemporary with Virgil and Horace. His Elegies are models of good taste, wholly devoid of affectation or striving after effect.

(English translations by John Granger, 1758; and by James Cranstoun, 1872.)

The French Tibullus, the chevalier Evariste de Parny (1753-1814).

Tiburce (2 or 3 syl.), brother of Valirian, converted by St. Cecile, his sister-in-law, and baptized by pope Urban. Being brought before the prefect Almachius, and commanded to worship the image of Jupiter, he refused to do so, and was decapitated.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("Second Nun's Tale," 1388).

 When "Tiburce" is followed by a vowel it is made 2 syl., when by a consonant it is 3 syl., as—

And after this, Tiburce in good entente (3 syl.)
With Valirian to pope Urban went.
At this thing scke unto Tiburce tolde (3 syl.).
Chaucer.

Tibur'zio, commander of the Pisans in their attack upon Florence, in the fifteenth century. The Pisans were thoroughly beaten by the Florentines, led by Lu'ria a Moor, and Tiburzio was taken captive. Tiburzio tells Luria that the men of Florence will cast him off after peace is established, and advises him to join Pisa. This Luria is far too noble to do, but he grants Tiburzio his liberty. Tiburzio, being examined by the council of Florence, under the hope of finding some cause of censure against the Moor, to lessen or cancel their obligation to him, "testifies to his unflinching probity," and the council could find no cause of blame; but Luria, by poison, relieves the ungrateful state of its obligation to him.—R. Browning: Luria.

Tichborne Dole (The). When lady Mabella was dying, she requested her husband to grant her the means of leaving a charitable bequest. It was to be a dole of bread, to be distributed annually on the Feast of the Annunciation, to any who chose to apply for it. Sir Roger, her husband, said he would give her as much land as she could walk over while a billet of wood remained burning. The old lady was taken into the park, and managed to crawl over twenty-three acres of land, which was accordingly set apart, and is called "The Crawls" to this hour. When the lady Mabella was taken back to her chamber, she said, "So long as this dole is continued, the family of Tichborne shall prosper; but immediately it is discontinued, the house shall fall, from the failure of an heir male. This," she added, "will be when a family of seven sons is succeeded by one of seven daughters. The custom began in the reign of Henry II., and continued till 1796, when, singularly enough, the baron had seven sons and his successor seven daughters, and Mr. Edward Tichborne, who inherited the Doughty estates, dropping the original name, called himself sir Edward Doughty.

Tickler (Timothy), an ideal portrait of Robert Sym, a lawyer of Edinburgh (1750–1844).—Wilson: Noctes Ambrosianæ (1822–36).

Tiddler. (See TOM TIDDLER'S GROUND.)

Tiddy-Doll, a nickname given to Richard Grenville lord Temple (1711–1770).

Tide-Waiters (Ecclesiastical). So the Rev. lord Osborne (S. G. O.) calls the clergy in convocation whose votes do not correspond with their real opinions.

Tider (Robin), one of the servants of the earl of Leicester.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Tiffany, Miss Alscrip's lady's-maid; pert, silly, bold, and a coquette.—Burgoyne: The Heiress (1781).

Tigernach, oldest of the Irish annalists. His annals were published in Dr. O'Connor's Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores Veteres, at the expense of the duke of Buckingham (1814–1826).

Tigg (Montague), a clever impostor, who lives by his wits. He starts a bubble insurance office—"the Anglo-Bengalee Company"—and makes considerable gain thereby. Having discovered the attempt of Jonas Chuzzlewit to murder his father, he compels him to put his money in the "new company," but Jonas finds means to murder him.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Tiglath-Pile'ser, son of Pul, second of the sixth dynasty of the new Assyrian empire. The word is Tiglath Pul Assur, "the great tiger of Assyria."

Tigra'nes (3 syl.), one of the heroes slain by the impetuous Dudon soon after the arrival of the Christian army before Jerusalem.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, iii. (1575).

Tigra'nes (3 syl.), king of Arme'nia.—Fletcher: A King or No King (1619).

Tigress Nurse (A). Tasso says that Clorinda was suckled by a tigress.—Jerusalem Delivered, xii.

¶ Roman story says Romulus and Remus were suckled by a she-wolf.

¶ Orson, the brother of Valentine, was suckled by a she-bear, and was brought up by an eagle.—Valentine and Orson.

Tilburi'na, the daughter of the governor of Tilbury Fort; in love with Whiskerandos. Her love-ravings are the crest unto the crest of burlesque tragedy (see act ii. 1).—Sheridan: The Critic (1779).

An oyster may be crossed in love," says the gentle Tilburina.—Sir W. Scott.

Tilbury Fort (The governor of), father of Tilburina; a plain, matter-of-fact man, with a gushing, romantic, and love-struck daughter. In Mr. Puff's tragedy The Spanish Armada.—Sheridan: The Critic (1779).

Tim (Tiny), the little son of Bob Cratchit (a clerk in Scrooge's office).—Dickens: Christmas Carol (1843).

Tim Syllabub, a droll creature, equally good at a rebus, a riddle, a bawdy song, or a tabernacle hymn. You may easily recognize him by his shabby finery, his frizzled hair, his dirty shirt, and his half-genteel, but more than half-shabby dress.—Goldsmith: A Citizen of the World, xxix. (1759).

Times (The), a newspaper founded by John Walter, in 1785. It was first called The London Daily Universal Register; in 1788 the words The Times or . . . were added. This long title was never tolerated by the public, which always spoke of the journal as The Register, till the original title was suppressed, and the present title, The Times, remained. In 1803 John Walter, son of the founder, became manager, and greatly improved the character of the paper, and in 1814 introduced a steam press. He died in 1847, and was succeeded by his son John Walter III. In the editorial department, John (afterwards "sir John") Stoddart (nicknamed "Dr. Slop"), who began to write political articles in The Times in 1810, was appointed editor in 1812, but in 1816 was dismissed for his rabid hatred of Napoleon. He tried to establish an opposition journal, The New Times, which proved an utter failure. Sir John Stoddart was succeeded by John Stebbing; then followed Thomas Barnes ("Mr. T. Bounce"), who remained editor till his death, in 1841. W. F. A. Delane came next, and continued till 1858, when his son, John Thaddeus Delane (who died in 1879), succeeded him.

⁂ Called "The Thunderer" from an article contributed by captain E. Sterling, beginning, "We thundered forth the other day an article on the subject of social and political reform;" and "The Turnabout," because its politics are guided by the times, and are not fossilized whig or tory.

Tim'ias, king Arthur's 'squire. He went after the "wicked foster," from whom Florimel fled, and the "foster" with his two brothers, falling on him, were all slain. Timias, overcome by fatigue, now fell from his horse in a swoon, and Belphœbê the huntress, happening to see him fall, ran to his succour, applied an ointment to his wounds, and bound them with her scarf. The 'squire, opening his eyes, exclaimed, "Angel or goddess; do I call thee right?" "Neither," replied the maid, "but only a wood-nymph." Then was he set upon his horse and taken to Belphœbê's pavilion, where he soon "recovered from his wounds, but lost his heart" (bk. iii. 6). In bk. iv. 7 Belphœbê subsequently found Timias in dalliance with Amoret, and said to him, "Is this thy faith?" She said no more, "but turned her face and fled." This is an allusion to sir Walter Raleigh's amour with Elizabeth Throgmorton (Amoret), one of the queen's maids of honour, which drew upon sir Walter (Timias) the passionate displeasure of his royal mistress (Belphœbê or queen Elizabeth).—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. (1590).

Timms (Corporal), a non-commissioned officer in Waverley's regiment.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Timo'leon, the Corinthian. He hated tyranny, and slew his own brother, whom he dearly loved, because he tried to make himself absolute in Corinth. "Timophânês he loved, but freedom more."

> The fair Corinthian boast
> Timoleon, happy temper, mild and firm,
> Who wept the brother while the tyrant bled.
> Thomson: The Seasons ("Winter," 1726)

Timon, in Pope's Moral Essays (epistle iv.), is meant for the first duke of Chandos, who had a great passion for splendid buildings. His seat, described in the poem, was called "Canons."

Timon of Athens, the Man-hater, who lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war. Shakespeare has a drama so called (1609). The drama begins with the joyous life of Timon, and his hospitable extravagance; then launches into his pecuniary embarrassment, and the discovery that his "professed friends" will not help him; and ends with his flight into the woods, his misanthropy, and his death.

> When he [Horace Walpole] talked misanthropy, he out-Timoned Timon.—Macaulay.

⁂ On one occasion, Timon said, "I have a fig tree in my garden which I once intended to cut down; but I shall let it stand, that any one who likes may go and hang himself on it."

Lord Lytton wrote a poem called The New Timon, (1845). Shadwell wrote a play called Timon of Athens, the Man-Hater (1678).

Timon's Banquet, nothing but cover and warm water. Being shunned by his friends in adversity, he pretended to have recovered his money, and invited his false friends to a banquet. The table was laden with covers, but when the contents were exposed, nothing was provided but lukewarm water. (See SCHACABAC, p. 967.)—Shakespeare: Timon of Athens, act iii. sc. 6 (1609).

Timoth'eos, a musician, who charged double fees to all pupils who had learned music before.—Quintilian: De Institutione Oratoria, ii. 3.

Ponocrates made him forget all that he [Gargantua] had learned under other masters, as Timothéus did to his disciples who had been taught music by others.—Rabelais: Gargantua, I. 23 (1533).

Timotheus, placed on high
Amid the tuneful quire,
With flying fingers touched the lyre.
Dryden: Alexander's Feast (1697).

Timothy (Old), ostler at John Mengs's inn at Kirchhoff.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Timothy Quaint, the whimsical but faithful steward of governor Heartall. Blunt, self-willed, but loving his master above all things, and true to his interests. —Cherry: The Soldier's Daughter (1804).

Ti'murkan the Tartar, and conqueror of China. After a usurpation of twenty years, he was slain in a rising of the people by Zaphimri "the orphan of China."

My mind's employed on other arts:
To sling the well-stored quiver
Over this arm, and wing the darts
At the first reindeer sweeping down the vale,
Or up the mountain straining every nerve;
To vault the neighing steed, and urge his course,
Swifter than whirlwinds, through the ranks of war;—
These are my passions, this my only science.
Raised from a soldier to imperial sway,
I still will reign in terror.
Murphy: The Orphan of China, iv. 2. (1759).

Tinacrio "the Sage," father of Micomico'na queen of Micom'icon, and husband of queen Zaramilla. He foretold that after his death his daughter would be dethroned by the giant Pandafilando, but that in Spain she would find a champion in don Quixote who would restore her to the throne. This never comes to pass, as don Quixote is taken home in a cage without entering on the adventure.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. 3 (1605).

Tinclarian Doctor (The Great), William Mitchell, a whitesmith and tinplate worker of Edinburgh, who published Tinkler's Testament, dedicated to queen Anne, and other similar works.

The reason why I call myself the Tinclarian doctor is because I am a tinklar, and cures old pans and lantruns. —Introduction to Tinkler's Testament.

 Uniformity of spelling must not be looked for in the "doctor's" book. We have "Tinklar," "Tinkler," and "Tinclar-ian."

Tinderbox (Miss Jenny), a lady with a moderate fortune, who once had some pretensions to beauty. Her elder sister happened to marry a man of quality, and Jenny ever after resolved not to disgrace herself by marrying a tradesman. Having rejected many of her equals, she became at last the governess of her sister's children, and had to undergo the drudgery of three servants without receiving the wages of one.—Goldsmith: A Citizen of the World, xxviii. (1759).

Tinker (The Immortal or The Inspired), John Bunyan (1628–1688).

¶ Elihu Burritt, United States, is called "The Learned Blacksmith" (1811–1879).

Tinsel (Lord), a type of that worst specimen of aristocracy, which ignores all merit but blue blood, and would rather patronize a horse-jockey than a curate, scholar, or poor gentleman. He would subscribe six guineas to the concerts of signor Cantata, because lady Dangle patronized him, but not one penny to "languages, arts, and sciences," as such. —Knowles: The Hunchback (1831).

Tintag'el or TINTAGIL, a strong and magnificent castle on the coast of Cornwall, said to have been the work of two giants. It was the birthplace of king Arthur, and subsequently the royal residence of king Mark. Dunlop asserts that vestiges of the castle still exist.

They found a naked child upon the sands
Of dark Tintagil by the Cornish sea,
And that was Arthur.
Tennyson: Guinevere (1858).

Tinto (Dick), a poor artist, son of a tailor in the village of Langdirdum. He is introduced as a lad in the Bride of Lammermoor, I. This was in the reign of William III. He is again introduced in St. Ronan's Well, i., as touching up the signboard of Meg Dods, in the reign of George III. As William III. died in 1702, and George III. began to reign in 1760, Master Dick must have been a patriarch when he worked for Mrs. Dods.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (1819); St. Ronan's Well (1823).

Meg Dods agreed with the celebrated Dick Tinto to repaint her father's sign, which had become rather undecipherable. Dick accordingly gilded the bishop's crook, and augmented the horrors of the devil's aspect, until it became a terror to all the younger fry of the school-house.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well, I. (1823).

Tintoretto, the historical painter, whose real name was Jacopo Robusti. He was called Il Furioso from the extreme rapidity with which he painted (1512–1594).

Tintoretto of England (The). W. Dobson was called "The Tintoret of England" by Charles I. (1610–1646).

Tintoretto of Switzerland (The), John Huber (eighteenth century).

Tiphany, the mother of the three kings of Cologne. The word is manifestly a corruption of St. Epiphany, as Tibs is of St. Ubes, Taudry of St. Audry, Tooley [Street] of St. Olaf, Telder of St. Ethelred, and so on.

Scores of the saints have similarly manufactured names.

Ti'phys, pilot of the Argonauts; hence any pilot.

Many a Tiphys ocean's depths explore,
To open wondrous ways untried before.
Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, viii. (Hoole).

 Another name for a pilot or guiding power is Palinūrus; so called from the steersman of Ænēas.

E'en Palinurus nodded at the helm.
Pope: The Dunciad, iv. 614 (1742).

Tippins (Lady), an old lady "with an immense obtuse, drab, oblong face, like a face in a tablespoon; and a dyed long walk' up the top of her head, as a convenient public approach to the bunch of false hair behind." She delights "to patronize Mrs. Veneering," and Mrs. Veneering is delighted to be patronized by her ladyship.

Lady Tippins is always attended by a lover or two, and she keeps a little list of her lovers, and is always booking a new lover or striking out an old lover, or putting a lover in her black list, or promoting a lover to her blue list, or adding up her lovers, or otherwise posting her book, which she calls her Cupidon.—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend, ii. (1864).

Tipple, in Dudley's Flitch of Bacon, first introduced John Edwin into notice (1750–1790).

Edwin's "Tipple," in the Flitch of Bacon, was an exquisite treat.—Boaden.

Tippoo Saib (Prince), son of Hyder Ali nawaub of Mysore.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Tips or "Examination Crams." Recognized stock pieces of what is called "book work" in university examinations used to be, before the reform: Fernat's theorem; the "Ludus Trojanus" in Virgil's Æneid (bk. vi.); Agnesi's "Witch;" the "Cissoid" of Diocles; and the famous fragment of Solon, generally said to be by Euripidēs.

In law examinations the stock pieces used to be: the Justinian of Sandars; the Digest of Evidence of sir James Stephen; and the Ancient Law of sir Henry Maine.

(The following were recognized primers: —Mill's Logic; Spencer's First Principles; Maine's Ancient Law; Lessing's Laocoon; Ritter and Preller's Fragmenta; Wheaton's International Law.)

Tiptoe, footman to Random and Scruple. He had seen better days, but, being found out in certain dishonest transactions, had lost grade, and "Tiptoe, who once stood above the world," came into a position in which "all the world stood on Tiptoe." He was a shrewd, lazy, knowing rascal, better adapted to dubious adventure, but always sighing for a snug berth in some wealthy, sober, old-fashioned, homely, county family, with good wages, liberal diet, and little work to do.—Colman: Ways and Means (1788).

Tiran'te the White, the hero and title of a romance of chivalry.

"Let me see that book," said the curé; "we shall find in it a fund of amusement. Here we shall find that famous knight don Kyrie Elyson of Montalban, and Thomas his brother, with the knight Fonseca, the battle which Detrianté fought with Alano, the stratagems of the Widow Tranquil, the amour of the empress with her 'squire, and the witticisms of lady Brillianta. This is one of the most amusing books ever written."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. i. 6 (1605).

Tiresias, a Theban soothsayer, blind from boyhood. It is said that Athēna deprived him of sight, but gave him the power of understanding the language of birds, and a staff as good as eyesight to direct his way. Another tale is that, seeing a male and female serpent in copulation, he killed the male, and was metamorphosed into a woman; seven years later he saw a similar phenomenon, and killed the female, whereupon he became a man again. Thus, when Jupiter and Juno wished to know whether man or woman had the greater enjoyment in married life, they referred the question to Tirēsias, who declared that the pleasure of the woman is tenfold greater than that of the man. (See CÆNEUS, p. 164.)

"In troth," said Jove (and as he spoke he laughed, While to his queen from nectar bowls he quaffed),
"The sense of pleasure in the male is far More dull and dead than what you females share."
Juno the truth of what he said denied;
Tirēsias therefore must the case decide,
For he the pleasure of each sex had tried.
Addison: The Transformation of Tiresias (1713).

There is an awkward thing, which much perplexes,
Unless, like wise Tirēsias, we had proved
By turns the difference of the several sexes.
Byron: Don Juan, xiv. 73 (1824).

 The name is generally pronounced Ti-re'-si-as, but Milton calls it Ti'-re-sias—

Blind Thamyris and blind Mæonidēs [Homer],
And Tir'ēs'as and Phineus [fit mates] prophets old.
Paradise Lost, iii. 36 (1665).

Tirlsneck (Jonnie), beadle of old St.

Ronan's.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Tirnanoge. (See LAND OF LIFE, p. 590.)

Tirso de Moli'na, the pseudonym of Gabriel Tellez, a Spanish monk and dramatist. His comedy called Convivando de Piedra (1626) was imitated by Molière in his Festin de Pierre (1665), and has given birth to the whole host of comedies and operas on the subject of "don Juan" (1570–1648).

Tiryns (The Gallery of), one of the old Cyclopean structures mentioned by Homer, and still extant in Argŏlis. The stones of this "gallery" are so enormous that two horses could not stir the smallest of them.

¶ Similar Cyclopean structures are the "treasury of Atreus," the "gate of Lions," the "tomb of Phorŏneus" (3 syl.), and the "tomb of Danaŏs," all in Mycēnæ.

Tiryn'thian Swain (The), Her'culēs, called in Latin Tirynthius Heros, because he generally resided at Tiryns, a town of Ar'golis, in Greece.

Upon his shield lay that Tirynthian swain
Swelt'ring in fiery gore and poisonous flame,
His wife's sad gift venomed with bloody stain. (See NESSUS, p. 749.)
P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, vii. (1633).

Tisapher'nes (4 syl.), "the thunderbolt of war." He was in the army of Egypt, and was slain by Rinaldo.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, xx. (1575).

N.B.—This son of Mars must not be mistaken for Tissaphernēs the Persian satrap, who sided with the Spartans in the Peloponnesian war, and who treacherously volunteered to guide "the ten thousand" back to Greece.

Tisbi'na, wife of Iroldo. (For the tale, see PRASILDO, p. 868.)—Bojardo: Orlando Innamorato (1495). (See DIANORA, p. 278; and DORIGEN, p. 294.)

Tisellin, the raven, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498).

Tisiph'one (4 syl.), one of the three Furies. Covered with a bloody robe, she sits day and night at hell-gate, armed with a whip. Tibullus says her head was coifed with serpents in lieu of hair.

¶ The same is said of the three Gorgons in Greek mythology.

The Desert Fairy, with her head covered with snakes, like Tisiphone, mounted on a winged griffin.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Raiery Tales ("The Yellow Dwarf," 1682).

Ti'tan, the sun or Hēlios, the child of Hyperi'on and Basil'ea, and grandson of Cœlum or heaven. Virgil calls the sun "Titan," and so does Ovid.

. . . primos crastinus ortus
Extulerit Titan, radiisque retexerit orbem.
Æneid, iv. 118, 119.

A maiden queen that shone as Titan's ray.
Spenser: Fairie Queene, I. 4 (1590).

Titans, six giants, sons of Heaven and Earth. Their names were Oceānos, Kœos, Krios, Hyperion, Iapĕtos, and Kronos.

The Titanĭdēs were Theia [Thi-a], Rhea, Themis, Mnemosÿnē, Phœbē, and Tethys.

Titan'ia, queen of the fairies, and wife of Oberon. Oberon wanted her to give him for a page a little changeling, but Titania refused to part with him, and this led to a fairy quarrel. Oberon, in revenge, anointed the eyes of Titania during sleep with an extract of "Love in Idleness," the effect of which was to make her fall in love with the first object she saw on waking. The first object Titania set eyes on happened to be a country bumpkin, whom Puck had dressed up with an ass's head. When Titania was fondling this "unamiable creature," Oberon came upon her, sprinkled on her an antidote, and Titania, thoroughly ashamed of herself, gave up the boy to her husband; after which a reconciliation took place between the wilful fairies.—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

Tite Barnacle (Mr.), head of the Circumlocution Office, and a very great man in his own opinion. The family had intermarried with the Stiltstalkings, and the Barnacles and Stiltstalkings found berths pretty readily in the national workshop, where brains and conceit were in inverse ratio. The young gents in the office usually spoke with an eye-glass in one eye, in this sort of style: "Oh, I say; look here! Can't attend to you to-day, you know. But look here! I say; can't you call to-morrow?" "No." "Well, but I say; look here! Is this public business?—anything about—tonnage—or that sort of thing?" Having made his case understood, Mr. Clennam received the following instructions in these words—

You must find out all about it. Then you'll memorialize the department, according to the regular forms for leave to memorialize. If you get it, the memorial must be entered in that department, sent to be registered in this department, then sent back to that department, then sent to this department to be countersigned, and then it will be brought regularly before that department. You'll find out when the business passes through each of these stages by inquiring at both departments till they tell you.—Dickens: Little Dorrit, x. (1857).

Titho'nus, a son of Laomedon king of Troy. He was so handsome that Auro'ra became enamoured of him, and persuaded Jupiter to make him immortal. But as she forgot to ask for eternal youth also, he became decrepit and ugly, and Aurora changed him into a cicada or grasshopper. His name is a synonym for a very old man.

> Weary of aged Tithon's saffron bed.
> Spenser: Faërie Queene, I. ii. 7 (1590).
> . . . thinner than Tithōnus was > Before he faded into air.
> Lord Lytton: Tales of Militus, ii.

Titho'nus (The Consort of), the moon.

> Now the fair consort of Tithonus old,
> Arisen from her mate's beloved arms,
> Looked palely o'er the eastern cliff.
> Dante: Purgatory, ix. (1308).

Tithor'ea, one of the two chief summits of Parnassus. It was dedicated to Bacchus, the other (Lycorĕa) being dedicated to the Muses and Apollo.

Titian (Tisiano Vecellio), an Italian landscape painter, especially famous for his clouds (1477–1576).

The French Titian, Jacques Blanchard (1600–1638).

The Portuguese Titian, Alonzo Sanchez Coello (1515–1590).

Titles of Honour (A Treatise on), by Selden (1614).

Titmarsh (Michael Angelo), a pseudonym of Thackeray Called "Michael Angelo" from his massive body, broad shoulders, and large head (1811–1863).

Titmarsh (Samuel), The Great Hoggarty Diamond, a story by Thackeray (1841).

Titmouse (Mr. Tittlebat), a vulgar, ignorant coxcomb, suddenly raised from the degree of a linen-draper's shopman to a man of fortune, with an income of £10,000 a year.—Warren: Ten Thousand a Year.

Tito Mele'ma, a Greek, who marries Romola.—George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross): Romola (1863).

Titurel, the first king of Graal-burg. He has bought into subjection all his passions, has resisted all the seductions of the world and is modest, chaste, pious, and devout. His daughter Siguné is in love with Tschionatulander, who is slain.—Wolfram von Eschenbach: Titurel (thirteenth century).

N.B.—Wolfram's Titurel is a tedious expansion of a lay already in existence, and Albert of Scharfenberg produced a Young Titurel, at one time thought the best romance of chivalry in existence; but it is pompous, stilted, erudite, and wearisome.

Titus, the son of Lucius Junius Brutus. He joined the faction of Tarquin, and was condemned to death by his father, who, having been the chief instrument in banishing the king and all his race, was created the first consul.

(The subject has been often dramatized. In English, by N. Lee (1679) and John Howard Payne (1820). In French, by Arnault, in 1792; and by Ponsard, in 1843. In Italian, by Alfieri, Bruto; etc. It was in Payne's tragedy that Charles Kean made his début in Glasgow as "Titus," his father playing "Brutus.")

> The house was filled to overflowing . . . the stirring interest of the play, combined with the natural acting of the father and son, completely subdued the audience. They sat suffused in tears during the last pathetic interview, until Brutus, overwhelmed by his emotions, falls on the neck of Titus, exclaiming, in a burst of agony, "Embrace thy wretched father!" when the whole theatre broke forth in long peals of applause. Edmund Kean then whispered in his son's ear, "Charlie, my boy, we are doing the trick."—Cole: Life of Charles Kean.

Titus, "the delight of man," the Roman emperor, son of Vespasian (40, 79–81).

Titus, the penitent thief, according to Longfellow. Dumăchus and Titus were two of a band of robbers, who attacked Joseph in his flight into Egypt. Titus said, "Let these good people go in peace;" but Dumachus replied, "First let them pay their ransom." Whereupon Titus handed to his companion forty groats; and the infant Jesus said to him—

> When thirty years shall have gone by,
> I at Jerusalem shall die . . .
> On the accursèd tree.
> Then on My right and My left side,
> These thieves shall both be crucified,
> And Titus thenceforth shall abide
> In paradise with Me.
> Longfellow: The Golden Legend (1851).

Tityre Tus (long u), the name assumed in the seventeenth century by a clique of young blades of the better class, whose delight was to break windows, upset sedan-chairs, molest quiet citizens, and rudely caress pretty women in the streets at night-time. These brawlers took successively many titular names, as Muns, Hectors, Scourers, afterwards

Nickers, later still Hawcubites, and lastly Mohawks or Mohocks.

 "Tityre tu-s" is meant for the plural of "Tityre tu," in the first line of Virgil's first Eclogue: "Tityre, tu patulæ recubans sub tegmine fagi,"—and meant to imply that these blades were men of leisure and fortune, who "lay at ease under their patrimonial beech trees."

Tit'yrus, in the Shepheardes Calendar, by Spenser (ecl. ii. and vi.), is meant for Chaucer.

> The gentle shepherd sate beside a spring . . .
> That Colin hight, which well could pipe and sing,
> For he of Tityrus his song did learn.
> Spenser: The Shepheardes Calendar, xii. (1579).

Tityus, a giant, whose body covered nine acres of ground. In Tartărus, two vultures or serpents feed for ever on his liver, which grows as fast as it is gnawed away.

¶ Promētheus (3 syl.) is said to have been fastened to mount Caucasus where two eagles fed on his liver, which never wasted.

> Nor unobserved lay stretched upon the marle
> Tityus, earth-born, whose body long and large > Covered nine acres. There two vultures sat,
> Of appetite insatiate, and with beaks
> For ravine bent, unintermitting gored
> His liver. Powerless he to put to flight
> The fierce devourers. To this penance judged
> For rape intended on Latona fair.
> Fenton's Homer's Odyssey, xi. (1716).

Tiso'na, the Cid's sword. It was buried with him, as Joyeuse was buried with Charlemagne, and Durindāna with Orlando.

Tlal'ala, surnamed "The Tiger," one of the Aztĕcas. On one occasion, being taken captive, Madoc released him, but he continued the unrelenting foe of Madoc and his new colony, and was always foremost in working them evil. When at length the Aztecas, being overcome, migrated to Mexico, Tlalala refused to quit the spot of his father's tomb, and threw himself on his own javelin.—Southey: Madoc (1805).

To, an intensive particle, about equal to "wholly," "altogether."

> My parbes ben to broken.
> Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("Cook's Tale," 1388).
> Gamelyn cast the wrestler on his left syde that thre ribbes to brake.—Canterbury Tales (1825).

Toad with an R, worthlessness, mere dung. Anglo-Saxon, tord or toord, (now spelt with a w); hence in the Gospel of St. Luke xiii. 8, "He answeringe seide to him, Lord, suffer also this zeer, til the while I delue [delve] aboute it, and sende toordis . . ."—Gothic and Anglo-Saxon Gospels, Bosworth, p. 365; Wycliffe (1389).

> Forsooth he seide this lyknesse: Sum man hadde a fygtree planted in his vyner; and he cam sekynge fruyte in it, and fond not. Loth is he seide to the tiller of the vyner, Loo! thre zeeris ben and ishen I com sekynge fruyt in this fygtree, and fond not, there fore kitt it doun; whereso occupieth it, zhe, the erthe? And he ansurynge seide to him, Lord, suffer also this zeer, til the while I delue about it, and sende toordis, etc.

> Good husband his boon Or request hath afar;
> Ill husband as soon Hath a toad with an R.
> Tusser: Five Hundred Points, etc., lii. 26.

(A good husband has his wishes fulfilled readily, but a bad husband is served with a toa[r]d as soon as with the boon requested.)

Toad-Eater (Pulteney's). Henry Vane was so called, in 1742, by sir Robert Walpole. Two years later, Sarah Fielding, in David Simple, speaks of "toad-eater" as "quite a new word." (Spanish, todita, "a factotum," one who will do any sort of work for his employer.)

Tobacco, says Stow, in his Chronicle, was first brought to England by sir John Hawkins, in 1565 (7 Elizabeth).

> Before that Indian weed so strongly was embraced,
> Wherein such mighty sums we prodigally waste.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xvi. (1613).

Tobo'so (Dulcinĕa del), the lady chosen by don Quixote for his particular paragon. Sancho Panza says she was "a stout-built, sturdy wench, who could pitch the bar as well as any young fellow in the parish." The knight had been in love with her before he took to errantry. She was Aldonza Lorenzo, the daughter of Lorenzo Corchuelo and Aldonza Nogalēs; but when signior Quixāda assumed the dignity of knighthood, he changed the name and style of his lady into Dulcinea del Tobōso, which was more befitting his own rank.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. i. 1 (1605).

TOBY, waiter of the Spa hotel, St. Ronan's, kept by Sandie Lawson.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Toby (A), a brown Rockingham-ware beer-jug, with the likeness of Toby Filpot embossed on its sides, "a goodly jug of well-browned clay, fashioned into the form of an old gentleman, atop of whose bald head was a fine froth answering to his wig" (ch. iv.).

> Dear Friend, this brown jug which now foams with mild ale
> . . . was once Toby Filpot, a thirsty old soul
> As e'er cracked a bottle, or fathomed a bowl.
> O'Keefe: Poor Soldier

Gabriel lifted Toby to his mouth, and took a hearty draught.—Dickens: Master Humphrey's Clock ("Barnaby Rudge," xii., 1841).

Toby, Punch's dog, in the puppet-show exhibition of Punch and Judy.

In some versions of the great drama of Punch there is a small dog (a modern innovation), supposed to be the private property of that gentleman, and of the name of Toby—always Toby. This dog has been stolen in youth from another gentleman, and fraudulently sold to the confiding hero, who, having no guile himself, has no suspicion that it lurks in others; but Toby, entertaining a grateful recollection of his old master, and scorning to attach himself to any new patrons, not only refuses to smoke a pipe at the bidding of Punch, but (to mark his old fidelity more strongly) seizes him by the nose, and wrings the same with violence, at which instance of canine attachment the spectators are always deeply affected.—Dickens: Old Curiosity Shop, ch. xviii. (1840).

Toby, in the periodical called Punch, is represented as a grave, consequential, sullen, unsocial pug, perched on back volumes of the national Menippus, which he guards so stolidly that it would need a very bold heart to attempt to filch one. There is no reminiscence in this Toby, like that of his peep-show namesake, of any previous master, and no aversion to his present one. Punch himself is the very beau-idéal of good-natured satire and shrewdness.

N.B.—The first cover of immortal Punch was designed by A. S. Henning; the present one by Richard Doyle.

Toby, M.P., nom de plume of Mr. H. W. Lucy. He is the Baronite, and Baron de Bookworms, of Punch.

Toby (Uncle), a captain, who was wounded at the siege of Namur, and was obliged to retire from the service. He is the impersonation of kindness, benevolence, and simple-heartedness; his courage is undoubted, his gallantry delightful for its innocence and modesty. Nothing can exceed the grace of uncle Toby's love-passages with the Widow Wadman. It is said that lieutenant Sterne (father of the novelist) was the prototype of uncle Toby.—Sterne: Tristram Shandy (1759).

My uncle Toby is one of the finest compliments ever paid to human nature. He is the most unoffending of God's creatures, or, as the French would express it, un tel petit bonhomme. Of his bowling-green, his sieges, and his amours, who would say or think anything amiss?—Hazlitt.

Toby Veak, ticket-porter and jobman, nicknamed "Trotty" from his trotting pace. He was "a weak, small, spare man," who loved to earn his money; and he heard the chimes ring words in accordance with his fancy, hopes, and fears. After a dinner of tripe, he lived for a time in a sort of dream, and woke up on New Year's Day to dance at his daughter's wedding.—Dickens: The Chimes (1844).

Todd (Laurie), a poor Scotch nail-maker, who emigrates to America, and, after some reverses of fortune, begins life again as a backwoodsman, and greatly prospers.—Galt: Laurie Todd.

Tod'gers (Mrs.), proprietress of a "commercial boarding-house;" weighed down with the overwhelming cares of "sauces, gravy," and the wherewithal of providing for her lodgers. Mrs. Todgers had a "soft heart" for Mr. Pecksniff, widower, and being really kind-hearted, befriended poor Mercy Pecksniff in her miserable married life with her brutal husband Jonas Chuzzlewit.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Toffa'nia, of Palermo, a noted poisoner, who sold a tasteless, colourless poison, called the Manna of St. Nicola of Bari, but better known as Aqua Tofana. Above 600 persons fell victims to this fatal drug. She was at last convicted of murder, and was executed in 1719.

Tofana, properly Tuffania.

La Spara or Hieronyma Spara, about a century previously, sold an "elixir" equally fatal. The secret was ultimately revealed to her father confessor.

Tofts (Mistress), a famous singer towards the close of the eighteenth century. She was very fond of cats, and left a legacy to twenty of the tabby tribe.

Not Niobe mourned more for fourteen brats,
Nor Mistress Tofts, to leave her twenty cats.
Peter Pindar [Dr. Wolcot]: Old Simon (1809).

Togorma, the kingdom of Connal son of Colgar.—Ossian: Fingal.

Tohu va Bohu, at sixes and sevens, in the utmost confusion, topsy-turvy.

The earth was tohu va bohu, that is, void and in confusion . . . in short, a chaos. This may well be applied to a country desolated by war. [Note by Edit. Bohn's ed.]—Rabelais: Pantagruel, bv. 17 (1545).

Toinette, a confidential female servant of Argan the malade imaginaire. "Adroite, soigneuse, diligente, et surtout fidèle," but contradictious, and always calling into action her master's irritable temper. In order to cure him, she pretends to be a travelling physician of about 90 years of age, although she has not seen twenty-six summers; and in the capacity of a Galen, declares M. Argan is suffering from lungs, recommends that one arm should be cut off, and one eye taken out to strengthen the remaining one. She enters into a plot to open the eyes of Argan to the real affection of Angelique (his daughter), the false love of her step-mother, and to marry the former to Cléante the man of her choice, in all which schemes she is fully successful.—Molière: Le Malade Imaginaire (1673).

Toison d'Or, chief herald of Burgundy.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward and Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Toki, the Danish William Tell. Saxo Grammaticus, a Danish writer of the twelfth century, tells us that Töki once boasted, in the hearing of Harald Bluetooth, that he could hit an apple with his arrow off a pole; and the Danish Gessler set him to try his skill by placing an apple on the head of the archer's son (twelfth century).

Tolande of Anjou, a daughter of old king Réné of Provence, and sister of Margaret of Anjou (wife of Henry VI. of England).—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Tolbooth (The), the principal prison of Edinburgh.

> The Tolbooth felt defrauded of his charms
> If Jeffrey died, except within her arms.
> Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Lord Byron refers to the "duel" between Francis Jeffrey editor of the Edinburgh Review, and Thomas Moore the poet, at Chalk Farm, in 1806. The duel was interrupted, and it was then found that neither of the pistols contained a bullet.

> Can none remember that eventful day,
> That ever-glorious, almost fatal fray,
> When Little's [Thomas Moore] leadless pistol met his eye,
> And Bow Street myrmidons stood laughing by!
> Ditto.

Tole'do, famous for its sword-blades. Vienne, in the Lower Dauphiné, is also famous for its swords. Its martinets (i.e. the water-mills for an iron forge) are turned by a little river called Gere.

> Gargantua gave Touchfaucet an excellent sword of a Vienne blade with a golden scabbard.—Rabelais: Gargantua, l. 46 (1533).

Tolme'ides (3 syl.), Foolhardiness personified in The Purple Island, fully described in canto viii. His companions were Arrogance, Brag, Carelessness, and Fear. (Greek, tolmáō, "a foolhardy man.")

> Thus ran the rash Tolmetes, never viewing
> The fearful fiends that duly him attended . . .
> Much would he boldly do, but much more boldly vaunt.
> P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, viii. (1633).

Tom, "the Portugal dustman," who joined the allied army against France in the war of the Spanish Succession.—Dr. Arbuthnot: History of John Bull (1712).

Tom, one of the servants of Mr. Peregrine Lovel, "with a good deal of surly honesty about him." Tom is no sneak, and no tell-tale, but he refuses to abet Philip the butler in sponging on his master, and wasting his property in riotous living. When Lovel discovers the state of affairs, and clears out his household, he retains Tom, to whom he entrusts the cellar and the plate.—Townley: High Life Below Stairs (1759).

Tom (Uncle). (See UNCLE TOM.)

Tom Brown's School-days, a tale by Thomas Hughes (1856).

Tom Brown at Oxford, a sequel to the above, by Thomas Hughes (1861).

Tom Folio, Thomas Rawlinson, the bibliopolist (1681–1725).

Tom Jones (1 syl.), a model of generosity, openness, and manly spirit, mixed with dissipation. Lord Byron calls him "an accomplished blackguard" (Don Juan, xiii. 110, 1824).—Fielding: Tom Jones (1749).

> A hero with a flawed reputation, a hero sponging for a guinea, a hero who cannot pay his landlady, and is obliged to let his honour out to hire, is absurd, and the claim of Tom Jones to heroic rank is quite untenable.
> —Thackeray

Tom Long, the hero of an old tale, entitled The Merry Conceits of Tom Long, the Carrier, being many Pleasant Passages and Mad Pranks which he observed in his Travels. This tale was at one time amazingly popular.

Tom Scott, Daniel Quilp's boy, Tower Hill. Although Quilp was a demon incarnate, yet "between the boy and the dwarf there existed a strange kind of mutual liking." Tom was very fond of standing on his head, and on one occasion Quilp said to him, "Stand on your head again, and I'll cut one of your feet off."

> The boy made no answer, but directly Quilp had shut himself in, stood on his head before the door, then walked on his hands to the back, and stood on his head there, then to the opposite side and repeated the performance. . . . Quilp, knowing his disposition, was lying in wait at a little distance, armed with a large piece of wood, which, being rough and jagged, and studded with broken nails, might possibly have hurt him, if it had been thrown at him.—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop, v. (1840).

Tom Thumb, the name of a very diminutive little man in the court of king Arthur, killed by the poisonous breath of a spider in the reign of king Thunstone, the successor of Arthur. In the Bodleian Library there is a ballad about Tom Thumb, which was printed in 1630. Richard Johnson wrote in prose The History of Tom Thumbe, which was printed in 1621. In 1630 Charles Perrault published his tale called Le Petit Poucet. Tom Thum is introduced by Drayton in his Nymphidia (1563–1631).

("Tom" in this connection is the Swedish tomt ("a nix or dwarf"), as in Tomtgubbe ("a brownie or kobold"); the final t is silent, and the tale is of Scandinavian origin.)

Tom Thumb, a burlesque opera, altered by Kane O'Hara (author of Midas), in 1778, from a dramatic piece by Fielding the novelist (1730). Tom Thumb, having killed the giants, falls in love with Huncamunca daughter of king Arthur. Lord Grizzle wishes to marry the princess, and when he hears that the "pygmy giant-queller" is preferred before him, his lordship turns traitor, invests the palace "at the head of his rebellious rout," and is slain by Tom. Then follows the bitter end: A red cow swallows Tom, the queen Dollallolla kills Noodle, Frizaletta kills the queen, Huncamunca kills Frizaletta, Doodle kills Huncamunca, Plumanta kills Doodle, and the king being left alone, stabs himself. Merlin now enters, commands the red cow to return our England's Hannibal," after which, the wise wizard restores all the slain ones to life again, and thus "jar ending," each resolves to go home, "and make a night on't."

Soon after Liston had made his popular hit in Fielding's Tom Thumb, at the Haymarket Theatre, he was invited to dine in the City, and after the dessert the whole party rose, the tables and chairs were set back, and Mr. Liston was requested "to favour the company with lord Grizzle's dancing song before the children went to bed." As may be supposed, Liston took his hat and danced out of the house, never more to return. —C. Russell: Representative Actors.

Tom Tiddler's Ground, a nook in a rustic by-road, where Mr. Mopes the hermit lived, and had succeeded in laying it waste. In the middle of the plot was a ruined hovel, without one patch of glass in the windows, and with no plank or beam that had not rotted or fallen away. There was a slough of water, a leafless tree or two, and plenty of filth. Rumour said that Tom Mopes had murdered his beautiful wife from jealousy, and had abandoned the world. Mr. Traveller tried to reason with him, and bring him back to social life, but the tinker replied, "When iron is thoroughly rotten, you cannot botch it, do what you may."—Dickens: A Christmas Number (1861).

Tom Tiddler is "Tom Tidler."

Tom Tiler and His Wife, a transition play between a morality and a tragedy (1578).

Tom Tipple, a highwayman in captain Macheath's gang. Peachum calls him "a guzzling, soaking sot, always too drunk to stand himself or to make others stand. A cart," he says, "is absolutely necessary for him."—Gay: The Beggar's Opera, i. (1727).

Tom Tram, the hero of a novel entitled The Mad Pranks of Tom Tram, Son-in-Law to Mother Winter, whereunto is added his Merry Jests, Old Conceits, and Pleasant Tales (seventeenth century).

> All your wits that fleer and sham,
> Down from don Quixote to Tom Tram.
> Prior.

Tom-a-Thrum, a sprite which figures in the fairy tales of the Middle Ages; a "queer-looking little auld man," whose chief exploits were in the vaults and cellars of old castles. (See THRUMMY-CAP, p. 1105.) John Skelton, speaking of the clergy, says—

> Alas! for very shame, some cannot declyne their name;
> Some cannot scarsly rede, And yet will not drede
> For to kepe a cure. . . . As wyse as Tom-a-Thrum.
> Colyn Clout (time, Henry VIII.).

Tom o' Bedlam, a ticket-of-leave madman from Bethlehem Hospital; or one discharged as incurable.

Tom of Ten Thousand, Thomas Thynne; so called from his great wealth. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, but why, the then dean has not thought fit to leave on record.

Tom the Piper, one of the characters in the ancient morris-dance, represented with a tabour, tabour-stick, and pipe. He carried a sword and shield, to denote his rank as a "squire minstrel." His shoes were brown; his hose red and "gimp-thighed;" his hat or cap red, turned up with yellow, and adorned with a feather; his doublet blue, the sleeves being turned up with yellow; and he wore a yellow cape over his shoulders. (See MORRIS-DANCE, p. 729.)

Tom's, a noted coffee-house in Birchin Lane, the usual rendezvous of young merchants at 'Change time.

Tomahourich (Muhme Janet of), an old sibyl, aunt of Robin Oig M'Combich the Highland drover.—Sir W. Scott: The Two Drovers (time, George III.).

Tom'alin, a valiant fairy knight, kinsman of king Oběron. Tomălin is not the same as "Tom Thumb," as we are generally but erroneously told, for in the "mighty combat" Tomalin backed Pigwiggen, while Tom Thum or Thumb seconded king Oberon. This fairy battle was brought about by the jealousy of Oberon, who considered the attentions of Pigwiggen to queen Mab were "far too nice."—Drayton: Nymphidia (1563–1631).

Tomb (Knight of the), James earl of Douglas in disguise.

His armour was ingeniously painted so as to represent a skeleton; the ribs being constituted by the corselet and its back-piece. The shield represented an owl with its wings spread—a device which was repeated upon the helmet, which appeared to be completely covered by an image of the same bird of ill omen. But that which was particularly calculated to excite surprise in the spectator was the great height and thinness of the figure.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous, xiv. (time, Henry I.).

Tomboy (Priscilla), a self-willed, hoydenish, ill-educated romp, of strong animal spirits, and wholly unconventional. She is a West Indian, left under the guardianship of Barnacle, and sent to London for her education. Miss Priscilla Tomboy lives with Barnacle's brother, old [Nicholas] Cockney, a grocer, where she plays boy-and-girl love with young Walter Cockney, which consists chiefly in pettish quarrels and personal insolence. Subsequently she runs off with captain Sightly, but the captain behaves well by presenting himself next day to the guardian, and obtaining his consent to marriage.—The Romp (altered from Bickerstaff's Love in the City).

Tomès [Tō-may], one of the five physicians called in by Sganarelle to consult on the malady of his daughter Lucinde (a syl.). Being told that a coachman he was attending was dead and buried, the doctor asserted it to be quite impossible, as the coachman had been ill only six days, and Hippocrătês had positively stated that the disorder would not come to its height till the fourteenth day. The five doctors meet in consultation, talk of the town gossip, their medical experience, their visits, anything, in short, except the patient. At length the father enters to inquire what decision they had come to. One says Lucinde must have an emetic, M. Tomès says she must be blooded; one says an emetic will be her death, the other that bleeding will infallibly kill her.

M. Tomès. Si vous ne faites saigner tout à l'heure votre fille, c'est une personne morte.
M. Desfonandrès. Si vous la faites saigner, elle ne sera pas en vie dans un quart-d'-heure.

And they quit the house in great anger (act ii. 4).—Molière: L'Amour Médecin (1665).

M. Tomès liked correctness in medical practice.—Macaulay.

Tomkins (Joseph), secret emissary of Cromwell. He was formerly Philip Hazeldine, alias Master Fibbet, secretary to colonel Desborough (one of the parliamentary commissioners).—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Tommy Atkins, a British soldier, as Jack Tar is a British sailor. Explained in Phrase and Fable, p. 1235.

Tom'yris, queen of the Massagětæ. She defeated Cyrus, who had invaded her kingdom; and, having slain him, threw his head into a vessel filled with human blood, saying, "It was blood you thirsted for—now take your fill."

Great bronze valves embossed with Tomyris.
Tennyson: The Princess, v.

[I] was shown the scath and cruel mangling made
By Tomyris on Cyrus, when she cried,
"Blood thou didst thirst for; take thy fill of blood!"
Dante: Purgatory, xii. (1308).

Ton-Iosal was so heavy and unwieldy that when he sat down it took the whole force of a hundred men to set him upright on his feet again.—The Fiona.

If Fion was remarkable for his stature, . . . in weight all yielded to the celebrated Ton-Iosal.—M'ugherson: Dissertation on Ossian.

Ton-Thena ["fire of the wave"], a remarkable star which guided Larthon to Ireland, as mentioned in Ossian's Tem'ora, vii., and called in Cathlin of Clutha "the red traveller of the clouds."

Tonio, a young Tyrolese, who saved Maria, the suttler-girl, when on the point of falling down a precipice. The two, of course, fall in love with each other, and the regiment, which had adopted the suttler-girl, consents to their marriage, provided Tonio will enlist under its flag. No sooner is this done than the marchioness of Berkenfield lays claim to Maria as her daughter, and removes her to the castle. In time the castle is besieged and taken by the very regiment into which Tonio had enlisted, and, as Tonio had risen to the rank of a French officer, the marchioness consents to his marriage with her daughter.— Donizetti: La Figlia del Reggimento (an opera, 1840).

Tonna (Mrs.), Charlotte Elizabeth (1792–1846).

Tonto (Don Cherubin), canon of Toledo, the weakest mortal in the world, though, by his smirking air, you would fancy him a wit. When he hears a delicate performance read, he listens with such attention as seems full of intelligence, but all the while he understands nothing of the matter.—Lesage: Gil Blas, v. 12 (1724).

Tonton, the smallest dog that ever existed. When the three princes of a certain king were sent to procure the tiniest dog they could find as a present to their aged father, the White Cat gave the youngest of them a dog so small that it was packed in wadding in a common acorn shell.

> As soon as the acorn was opened, they all saw a little dog laid in cotton, and so small it might jump through a finger-ring without touching it. . . . It was a mixture of several colours; its ears and long hair reached to the ground. The prince set it on the ground, and forthwith the tiny creature began to dance a sarabande with castanets.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1682).

Tony Lumpkin, a young booby, fond of practical jokes and low company. He was the son of Mrs. Hardcastle by her first husband.—Goldsmith: She Stoops to Conquer (1773).

Toodle, engine-fireman, an honest fellow, very proud of his wife Polly and her family.

Polly Toodle, known by the name of Richards, wife of the stoker. Polly was an apple-faced woman, and was mother of a large apple-faced family. This jolly, homely, kind-hearted matron was selected as the nurse of Paul Dombey, and soon became devotedly attached to Paul and his sister Florence.

Robin Toodle, known as "The Biler" or "Rob the Grinder," eldest son of Mrs. Toodle wet-nurse of Paul Dombey. Mr. Dombey gets Robin into an institution called "The Charitable Grinders," where the worst part of the boy's character is freely developed. Robin becomes a sneak, and enters the service of James Carker, manager of the firm of Dombey and Son. On the death of Carker, Robin enters the service of Miss Lucretia Tox. —Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Tooley Street, London; a corruption of St. Olaf. Similarly, Taudry is a corruption of St. Audry, St. Tibs of St. Ubes, and St. Telders of Ethelred.

Toom Tabard ["empty jacket"], a nickname given to John Balliol, because his appointment to the sovereignty of Scotland was an empty name. He had the royal robe or jacket, but nothing else (1259, 1292–1314).

Tooth (A Wolf's). At one time a wolf's tooth was worn as an amulet by children to charm away fear.

Tooth of Knowledge (Finn's). (See KNOWLEDGE, p. 582.)

Tooth Worshipped (A.) The people of Ceylon worship the tooth of an elephant; those of Malabar the tooth of a monkey. The Siamese once offered a Portuguese 700,000 ducats for the redemption of a monkey's tooth.

Tooth-picks. The Romans used tooth-picks made of mastic wood in preference to quills; hence Rabelais says that prince Gargantua "picked his teeth with mastic tooth-pickers" (s'escuroit les dents avecques ung trou de lentisce), bk. i. 23.

> Lentiscum mellus; sed si tibi frondea cuspis
> Defuerit dentes, penna, levare potes.
> Martial: Epigrams, xiv. 24.

Toots (Mr.), an innocent, warm-hearted young man, just burst from the bonds of Dr. Blimber's school, and deeply in love with Florence Dombey. He is famous for blushing, refusing what he longs to accept, and for saying, "Oh, it is of no consequence." Being very nervous, he never appears to advantage, but in the main "there are few better fellows in the world."

> "I assure you," said Mr. Toots, "really I am dreadfully sorry, but it's of no consequence." —Dickens: Dombey and Son, xxviii. (1846).

Topas (Sir), a native of Poperyng, in Flanders; a capital sportsman, archer, wrestler, and runner. Chaucer calls him "sir Thopas" (q.v.).

Topas (Sir). Sir Charles Dilke was so called by the Army and Navy Gazette, November 25, 1871 (1810–1869).

Topham (Master Charles), usher of the black rod.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Tophas (Sir), an affected, blustering, talkative, cowardly pretender.—Lyly: Endymion (1591).

To'phet, "the place of drums," from toph ("a drum"). So called in allusion to the drums and timbrels sounded in the valley of Hinnom to drown the cries of children sacrificed to this idol. Solomon introduced the worship, and built a temple to Moloch on the Mount of Olives, "that opprobrious hill" (1 Kings xi. 7). The valley of Hinnom is called Gehenna, and is made in the New Testament a "type of hell."

. . . the wisest heart
Of Solomon he led by fraud to build
His temple right against the temple of God
On that opprobrious hill; and made his grove
The pleasant valley of Hinnom, Tophet thence
And black Gehenna called, the type of hell.
Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 400, etc. (1665).

Topsy, a young slave-girl, who never knew whether she had either father or mother: and being asked by Miss Ophelia St. Clair how she supposed she came into the world, replied, "I 'spects I growed." —Mrs. B. Stowe: Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852).

Tor (Sir), the natural son of king Pellinore and the wife of Aries the cowherd. He was the first of the knights of the Round Table.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 24 (1470).

Toralva (The licentiate), mounted on a cane, was conveyed through the air with his eyes shut; in twelve hours he arrived at Rome, and the following morning returned to Madrid. During his flight he opened his eyes once, and found himself so near the moon that he could have touched it with his finger.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iii. 5 (1615). (See TORRALBA.)

Torch-Race. On the eve of the Panathenæa, there was a torch-race in ancient Greece, in which the runners were expected in succession to carry a lighted torch without allowing the flame to become extinguished. Each passed it in turn, and each received it. Plato (Leg., vi.) compares the transmission of life to a torch-race, and Lucretius has the same idea: "Et quasi cursores vitai lampada tradunt" (De Rerum Natura, ii. 77). Thomas Moore says the nations of Europe caught up the love of liberty from England, as the runners in a torch-race handed the lighted brand from one to another. (See Lemprière, art. "Prometheus.")

As at old games a runner snatched the torch
From runner.
R. Browning: Parmenides, ii.

'Twas like a torch-race, such as they
Of Greece performed in ages gone,
When the fleet youths, in long array,
Passed the bright torch triumphant on.
I saw the expectant nations stand
To catch the coming flame in turn,
I saw from ready hand to hand,
The clear but struggling glory burn.
Moore: The Torch of Liberty (1824).

Tordenskiol [Tor'-den-skole] or the "Thunder-shield." So Peder Wessel vice-admiral of Denmark (in the reign of Christian V.) was called. He was brought up as a tailor, and died in a duel.

From Denmark thunders Tordenskiol:
Let each to heaven commend his soul,
And fly.
Longfellow: King Christian [V.].

Torfe (Mr. George), provost of Orkney.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Tormes (Lazarillo de), by Diego Hurtado de Mendoza (sixteenth century); a kind of Gil Blas, whose adventures and roguish tricks are the first of a very popular sort of novel called the Gusto Picaresco. Lesage has imitated it in his Gil Blas, and we have numberless imitations in our own language. (See TYLL OWLYGLASS.)

The ideal Yankee, in whom European prejudice has combined the attractive traits of a Gines de Passamonte, a Joseph Surface, a Lazarillo de Tormes, a Scapin, a Thersites, and an Autolycus.—Hurlbut.

("Gines de Passamonte," in Don Quixote, by Cervantes; "Joseph Surface," in The School for Scandal, by Sheridan; "Scapin," in Les Fourberies de Scapin, by Molière; "Thersites," in Homer's Iliad, i.; "Autolycus," in the Winter's Tale, by Shakespeare.)

Tormot, youngest son of Torquil of the Oak (foster-father of Eachin M'Ian). —Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Torne'a, a lake or rather a river of Sweden, which runs into the Gulf of Bothnia.

Still pressing on beyond Tornea's lake.
Thomson: The Seasons ("Winter," 1726).

Tor'neo, a town in Finland. Often visited by travellers, who can there witness the phenomenon of the sun remaining above the horizon both day and night at the summer solstice. It belongs now to Russia.

Cold as the rocks on Torneo's hoary brow.
Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, ii. (1799).

We find our author [A. F. Shioldebrand] pursuing his journey northwards, . . . and his description of the entrance into Westrobothnia gives us a high idea of the richness of the country in the neighbourhood of Torneo.—Quarterly Review, April, 1814.

Torquato, that is, Torquato Tasso, the Italian poet, author of Jerusalem Delivered (1544–1595). After the publication of his great epic, Tasso lived in the court of Ferrara, and conceived a violent passion for Leonora, one of the duke's sisters, but fled, in 1577, to Naples.

> Torquato's tongue
> Was tuned for slavish pæans at the throne
> Of tinsel pomp.
> Akenside: Pleasures of Imagination, ii. (1744).

Torquil of the Oak, foster-father of Eachin M'Ian. He was chief of the clan Quhele, and had eight sons, the finest men in the clan. Torquil was a seer, who was supposed to have communication with the invisible world, and he declared a demon had told him that Eachin or Hector M'Ian was the only man in the two hostile clans of Chattan and Quhele who would come off scathless in the approaching combat (ch. xxvi.). —Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

¶ A parallel combat is described in The Cid. When Sancho of Castile was stabbed by Bellido of Zamora, Diego Ordoñez, of the house of Lara, challenged five of the knights of Zamora to single combat. Don Arias Gonzalo and his four sons accepted the challenge. Pedro Arias was first slain, then his brother Diego. Next came Herman, who received a mortal wound, but struck the charger of Diego Ordoñez. The charger, furious with pain, carried its rider beyond the lists, and the combat was declared to be drawn. (See HORATIUS (Publius), p. 503.)

Torralba (Dr.), carried by the spirit Cequiel from Valladolid to Rome and back again in an hour and a half. He was tried by the Inquisition for sorcery (time, Charles V.).—J. de Ossau Pellicer (seventeenth century). (See TORALVA, p. 1121.)

Torre (Sir), son of sir Bernard, baron of Astolat. His brother was sir Lavaine, and his sister Elaine "the lily maid of Astolat." He was blunt-mannered, but not without kindness of heart.—Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("Elaine").

(The word "Torre" is a blunder for Tirre. Sir Torre or Tor, according to Arthurian legend, was the natural son of Pellinore king of Wales, "begotten on Aries' wife, the cowherd" (pt. ii. 108). It was sir Tirre who was the brother of Elaine (pt. iii. 122).—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, 1470.)

Tor'rismond, general of the forces of Aragon. He falls in love with Leonora the usurping queen, promised in marriage to Bertran prince of the blood-royal, but she falls in love with Torrismond, who turns out to be the son of Sancho the deposed king. Ultimately, Sancho is restored, and Leonora is married to Torrismond.—Dryden: Spanish Fryar (1680).

Torso Farna'se (3 syl.), Dircé and her sons, the work of Appollonius and Tauriscus of Rhodes.

Toshach Beg, the "second" of M'Gillie Chattanach chief of the clan Chattan in the great combat.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Tothill or Tuttle, Westminster, said to be a corruption of Teut's Hill, i.e. the Saxon god Mercury, called Teut. "Hermit's Hill" or "Ermin's Hill," in the vicinity, is said to be the same word under the corrupted classic form of Hermês, which also means Mercury.

Tottenham in Boots, a popular toast in Ireland in 1731. Mr. Tottenham gave the casting vote which threw out a Government bill very obnoxious to the Irish, on the subject of the Irish parliament. He had come from the country, and rushed into the House, without changing his boots, just in time to give his vote, which prevented the bill from passing by a majority of one.

Totterly (Lord), an Adonis of 60, and a ci-devant Jeune Homme.—Selby: The Unfinished Gentleman.

Tottipottymoy, a "Hoghan Moghan," or mock mightiness, like the mayor of Garratt, or the king of the Cannibal Islands.

> The mighty Tottipottymoy
> Sent to our elders an envoy,
> Complaining sorely of the breach
> Of league.
> S. Butler: Hudibras, ii. 2 (1664).

Touch, quality. "Of noble touch," of noble quality. The reference is to the touchstone by which gold is tried. Gold articles made according to the rules of alloy are called of "a true touch." The "touch of Paris" is spoken of in 1300: "Laquelle touche passe tous les ors dont l'on œuvre en tous pays." In 1597 two goldsmiths were sentenced to the pillory for making false plate and counterfeiting "her majesty's touch."

N.B.—The lapis Lydius or touchstone is touched by the gold, and leaves a mark behind, the colour of which indicates its purity.

> Gold is tried by the touchstone, and men by gold.—Bacon.

Touchet [Too-shay]. When Charles IX. introduced Henri of Navarre to Marie Touchet, the witty Navarrese made this anagram on her name, Je charme tout.

Touchfaucet (Captain), in Picrochole's army, taken captive by friar John. Being presented to Grangousier and asked the cause of his king's invasion, he replied, "To avenge the injury done to the cake-bakers of Lernê" (ch. 25, 26). Grangousier commanded his treasurer to give the friar 62,000 saluts (£15,500) in reward, and to Touchfaucet he gave "an excellent sword of a Vienne blade, with a gold scabbard, and a collar of gold weighing 702,000 merks (576,000 ounces), garnished with precious stones, and valued at £16,000 sterling, by way of present." Returning to king Picrochole, he advised him to capitulate, whereupon Rashcalf cried aloud, "Unhappy the prince who has traitors for his counsellors!" and Touchfaucet, drawing "his new sword," ran him through the body. The king demanded who gave him the sword, and being told the truth, ordered his guards "to hew him in pieces."—Rabelais: Gargantua, i. 45-47 (1533).

Touching for the King's Evil. It is said that scrofulous diseases were at one time very prevalent in the island, and that Edward the Confessor, in answer to earnest prayer, was told it would be cured by the royal touch. Edward, being gifted with this miraculous power, transmitted it as an heir-loom to his successors Henry VII. presented each person touched with a small coin, called a touch-piece or touch-penny.

Charles II. of England, during his reign, touched as many as 92,107 persons; the smallest number (2983) being in the year 1669, and the largest number in 1684, when many were trampled to death (see Macaulay's History of England, xiv.). In these "touchings," John Brown, a royal surgeon, superintended the ceremony. (See Macbeth, act iv. sc. 3.)

Prince Charles Edward, who claimed to be prince of Wales, touched a female child for the disease in 1745.

The French kings claimed the same divine power from Anne of Clovis, A.D. 481. And on Easter Sunday, 1686, Louis XIV. touched 1600, using these words, Le roy te touche, Dieu te guerisse.

 Dr. Johnson was the last person touched by an English king. The touch-piece given to him has on one side this legend, Soli Deo gloria, and on the other side, Anna. D : G. M. BR. F: et H. REG. ("Anne, by the grace of God of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, queen").

> Our good Edward he, the Confessor and king . . .
> That cancred evil cured, bred 'twixt the throat and jaws,
> When physic could not find the remedy nor cause . . .
> He of Almighty God obtained by earnest prayer,
> This tumour by a king might cured be alone,
> Which he an heir-loom left unto the English throne.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xi. (1613).

Touching Glasses in drinking healths.

> When prince Charles passed over into France, after the failure of the expedition in 1715, his supporters were beset with spies on every hand. It so happened that occasionally in society they were necessitated to drink the king's health, but it was tacitly understood that "the king" was not king George, but "the king over the water." To express this symbolically, one glass was passed over another, and later down, the foot of one glass was touched against the rim of another.—Notes and Queries of New York, October, 1859.

Touchstone, a clown filled with "quips and cranks and wanton wiles." The original of this character was Tarlton, the favourite court jester of queen Elizabeth.—Shakespeare: As You Like It (1598).

N.B.—His famous speech is "the seven degrees of affront:" (1) the retort courteous, (2) the quip modest, (3) the reply churlish, (4) the reproof valiant, (5) the counter-check quarrelsome, (6) the lie circumstantial, and (7) the lie direct (act v. sc. 4).

> Tarleton [1550-1588] was inimitable in such parts as "Launcelot" in the Merchant of Venice [Shakespeare] and "Touchstone." For these clowns' parts he never had an equal, and never will have.—Baker: Chronicles.

TOUCHWOOD (Colonel), "the most passionate, impatient, unreasonable, good-natured man in Christendom." Uncle of major and Clarissa Touchwood.

Sophia Touchwood, the colonel's daughter, in love with her cousin, major Touchwood. Her father wants her to marry colonel Clifford, but the colonel has fixed his heart on Clarissa, the major's sister.

Major Touchwood, nephew of colonel Touchwood, and in love with his cousin Sophia, the colonel's daughter. He fancied that colonel Clifford was his rival, but Clifford was in love with Clarissa, the major's sister. This error forms the plot of the farce, and the mistakes which arise when the major dresses up to pass himself off for his uncle constitute its fun and entanglement.

Clarissa Touchwood, the major's sister, in love with colonel Clifford. They first met at Brighton, and the colonel thought her Christian name was Sophia; hence the major looked on him as a rival.—Dibdin: What Next?

Touchwood (Lord), uncle of Melle'font (2 syl.).

Lady Touchwood, his wife, sister of sir Paul Pliant. She entertains a criminal passion for her nephew Mellefont, and, because he repels her advances, vows to ruin him. Accordingly, she tells her husband that the young man has sought to dishonour her, and when his lordship fancies that the statement of his wife must be greatly overstated, he finds Mellefont with lady Touchwood in her own private chamber. This seems to corroborate the accusation laid to his charge, but it was an artful trick of Maskwell's to make mischief, and in a short time a conversation which he overhears between lady Touchwood and Maskwell reveals the infamous scheme most fully to him.—Congreve: The Double Dealer (1700).

(Lord and lady Touchwood must not be mistaken for sir George and lady Frances Touchwood, which are very different characters. See below.)

Their Wildairs, sir John Brutes, lady Touchwoods, and Mrs. Frails are conventional reproductions of those wild gallants and demireps which figure in the licentious dramas of Dryden and Shadwell.—Sir W. Scott: The Drama.

("Wildair," in The Constant Couple, by Farquhar; "Brute," in The Provoked Wife, by Vanbrugh; "Mrs. Frail," in Love for Love, by Congreve.)

Touchwood (Sir George), the loving husband of lady Frances, desperately jealous of her, and wishing to keep her out of all society, that she may not lose her native simplicity and purity of mind. Sir George is a true gentleman of most honourable feelings.

Lady Frances Touchwood, the sweet, innocent wife of sir George. Before her marriage she was brought up in seclusion in the country, and sir George tries to keep her fresh and pure in London.—Mrs. Cowley: The Belle's Stratagem (1780).

The calm and lovely innocence of lady Touchwood could by nobody be so happily represented as by this actress (Mrs. Hartley, 1751-1824).—T. Davies.

Touchwood (Peregrine), a touchy old East Indian, a relation of the Mowbray family.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Tough (Mr.), an old barrister.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Touran. The death of the children of Touran forms one of the three tragic stories of the ancient Irish. The other two are The Death of the Children of Lir, and The Death of the Children of Usnach.

Tournemine (3 syl.), a Jesuit of the eighteenth century, fond of the marvellous. "Il aimait le merveilleux et ne renonçait qu' avec peine à y croire."

Il ressemble à Tournemine,
Il croit ce qu'il imagine.
French Proverb.

Tours, in France, according to fable, is so called from Turonês, a nephew of Brute the mythical king of Britain.

In the party of Brutus was one Turones, his nephew, inferior to none in courage and strength, from whom Tours derived its name, being the place of his sepulture.—Geoffrey: British History (1142).

Touthope (Mr.), a Scotch attorney and clerk of the peace.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Towel (An Oaken), a cudgel. "To be rubbed down with an oaken towel" is to be well beaten.

She ordered the fellow to be drawn through a horse-pond, and then to be well rubbed down with an oaken towel.—The Adventure of my Aunt.

Tower of Hunger (The), Gualandi, the tower in which Ugolino with his two sons and two grandsons were starved to death in 1288.—Dante: Inferno (1300).

Tower of London (The) was really built by Gundulphus bishop of Rochester, in the reign of William I., but tradition ascribes it to Julius Cæsar.

Ye towers of Julius, London's lasting shame.
Gray: The Bard (1757).

Tower of Vathek, built with the intention of reaching heaven, that Vathek might pry into the secrets seen by Mahomet. The staircase contained 11,000 stairs, and when the top was gained men looked no bigger than pismires, and cities seemed mere bee-hives.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Towlinson (Mr.), manservant in the Dombey family, and a leading light below stairs. He has a great antipathy to foreigners, whom he regards as all Frenchmen. On one occasion—

Mr. Towlinson returns thanks in a speech replete with feeling, of which the peroration turns on foreigners, regarding whom he says they may find favour sometimes with weak and inconstant intellects that can be led away by hair; but all he hopes is, he may never hear of no foreigner never boning nothing out of no travelling chariot.—Dickens: Dombey and Son, ch. xxxi. (1848).

Town (The), literary and historic gossip about London, by Leigh Hunt (1848).

Town and Country Mouse (The), a fable by Henryson (1621).

A town mouse invited a country mouse to come and see how much more grandly he lived. When the country mouse had been shown the sundry dishes laid on the table, in comes the cat, and was well-nigh the death of both of them. As the country mouse left, he said, "I prefer my more modest fare with liberty."

The same answer is recorded of a Bedouin Arab to a city friend, when told of the delights and luxury, the insecurity and anxiety, of town life.

(Prior's Country and City Mouse (q.v.) is quite a different fable.)

Town Eclogues, satires after the manner of Pope, by lady M. Wortley Montagu (1716).

Townley Mysteries, certain religious dramas; so called because the MS. containing them belonged to P. Townley. These dramas are supposed to have been acted at Widkirk Abbey, in Yorkshire. In 1831 they were printed for the Surtees Society, under the editorship of the Rev. Joseph Hunter and J. Stevenson. (See COVENTRY MYSTERIES, p. 240.)

Townly (Colonel), attached to Berinthia, a handsome young widow, but in order to win her he determines to excite her jealousy, and therefore pretends love to Amanda, her cousin. Amanda, however, repels his attentions with disdain; and the colonel, seeing his folly, attaches himself to Berinthia.—Sheridan: A Trip to Scarborough (1777).

Townly (Lord), a nobleman of generous mind and high principle, liberal and manly. Though very fond of his wife, he insists on a separation, because she is so extravagant and self-willed. Lady Townly sees, at length, the folly of her ways, and promises amendment; whereupon the husband relents, and receives her into favour again.

The London critics acknowledged that J. G. Holman's "lord Townley" was the perfection of the nobleman of the days of Chesterfield. He was not the actor, but the dignified lord himself.—Donaldson.

Lady Townly, the gay but not unfaithful young wife of lord Townly, who thinks that the pleasure of life consists in gambling; she "cares nothing for her husband," but "loves almost everything he hates." Ultimately she amends her ways. Lady Townly says—

I dote upon assemblies; my heart bounds at a ball; and at an opera I expire. Then I love play to distraction; cards enchant me; and dice put me out of my little wits.—Vanbrugh and Cibber: The Provoked Husband, iii. 1 (1728).

The part which at once established her [Miss Farren's] fame as an actress was "lady Townly . . . the whole house was enraptured.—Memoir of Elizabeth Countess of Derby (1806).

(Mrs. Pritchard, Margaret Woffington, Miss Brunton, Miss M. Tree, and Miss E. Tree were all excellent in this favourite part.)

Tox (Miss Lucretia), the bosom friend of Mr. Dombey's married sister (Mrs. Chick). Miss Lucretia was a faded lady, "as if she had not been made in fast colours," and was washed out. She "ambled through life without any opinions, and never abandoned herself to unavailing regrets." Miss Tox greatly admired Mr. Dombey, and entertained a forlorn hope that she might be selected by him to supply the place of his deceased wife. She lived in Princess's Place, and maintained a weak flirtation with major Bagstock.—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Tozer, one of the ten young gentlemen in the school of Dr. Blimber when Paul Dombey was there. A very solemn lad, whose "shirt-collar curled up the lobes of his ears."—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Trabb, a prosperous old bachelor, a tailor by trade.

He was having his breakfast in the parlour behind the shop. . . . He had sliced his hot roll into three feather-beds, and was slipping butter in between the blankets. . . . He was a prosperous old bachelor, and his open window looked into a prosperous little garden and orchard, and there was a prosperous iron safe let into the wall at the side of the fireplace, and without doubt heaps of his prosperity were put away in it in bags.—Dickens: Great Expectations, xix. (1860).

Tracy, one of the gentlemen in the earl of Sussex's train.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Traddles, a simple, honest young man, who believes in everybody and everything. Though constantly failing, he is never depressed by his want of success. He had the habit of brushing his hair up on end, which gave him a look of surprise. Tom Traddles marries one of the "ten daughters of a poor curate."

At the Creakle's school, when I was miserable, he (Traddles) would lay his head on the desk for a little while, and then, cheering up, would draw skeletons all over his slate.—Dickens: David Copperfield, vii. (1849).

Tradelove (Mr.), a broker on 'Change, one of the four guardians of Anne Lovely the heiress. He was "a fellow that would out-lie the devil for the advantage of stock, and cheat his own father in a bargain. He was a great stickler for trade, and hated every one that wore a sword" (act i. 1). Colonel Feignwell passed himself off as a Dutch merchant named Jan van Timtamtirelereletta herr van Feignwell, and made a bet with Tradelove. Tradelove lost, and cancelled the debt by giving his consent to the marriage of his ward to the supposed Dutchman.—Mrs. Centlivre: A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717).

Trafford (F. G.), the pseudonym of Mrs. C. E. Riddell, before the publication of George Geith (1871).

Tragedy (Father of Greek), Thespis, the Richardson of Athens. Æschylos is also called "The Father of Greek Tragedy" (B.C. 525-426).

The Father of French Tragedy, Garnier (1534-1590).

The First English Tragedy, Gorbodue, by Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville (1569). The first comedy was Ralph Roister Doister, by Nicholas Udall (1564).

∴ Thorpbury says the coadjutor of Norton was lord Buckhurst, and Charles Lamb maintains that lord Buckhurst "supplied the more vital parts;" but professor Craik says Sackville was the worker together with Norton.

Trained Band, the volunteer artillery, whose ground for practice was in Moorfields. John Gilpin was "captain of the trained band."

> A Trained Band captain eke was he,
> Of famous London town.
> Cowper: John Gilpin (1782).

Trajan (The Second), Marcus Aurelius Claudius, surnamed Gothicus, noted for his valour, justice, and goodness (215, 268-270).

Trajan and St. Gregory. It is said that Trajan, although unbaptized, was delivered from hell in answer to the prayers of St. Gregory.

> There was storied on the rock
> The exalted glory of the Roman prince,
> Whose mighty worth moved Gregory to earn
> His mighty conquest—Trajan the emperor.
> Dante: Purgatory, xi. (1308).

Trajan and the Importunate Widow. One day, a mother appeared before the emperor Trajan, and cried, "Grant vengeance, sire! My son is murdered." The emperor replied, "I cannot stop now; wait till I return." "But, sire," pleaded the widow, "if you do not return, who will grant me justice?" "My successor," said Trajan. "And can Trajan leave to another the duty that he himself is appointed to perform?" On hearing this, the emperor stopped his cavalcade, heard the woman's cause, and granted her suit. Dante tells this tale in his Purgatory, xi.—John of Salisbury: Polycraticus de Curialium Nugis, v. 8 (twelfth century).

¶ Dion Cassius (Roman Historia, lxix.) tells a similar story of Hadrian. When a woman appeared before him with a suit as he was starting on a journey, the emperor put her off, saying, "I have no leisure now." She replied, "If Hadrian has no leisure to perform his duties, let him cease to reign!" On hearing this reproof, he dismounted from his horse, and gave ear to the woman's cause.

¶ A woman once made her appeal to Philip of Macedon, who, being busy at the time, petulantly exclaimed, "Woman, I have no time now for such matters." "If Philip has no time to render justice,' said the woman, "then is it high time for Philip to resign!" The king felt the rebuke, heard the cause patiently, and decided it justly.

¶ Another tale is told of the Macedonian. A woman asked him to do her justice, but the testy monarch refused to hear her. "I shall appeal," said the woman. "Appeal!" thundered Philip. "And to whom will you appeal, woman?" "To Philip sober," was her reply, and her cause was heard patiently.

Tramecksan and Slamecksan, the High-heels and Low-heels, two great political factions of Lilliput. The animosity of the Guelphs and Ghibellines of punydom ran so high "that no High-heel would eat or drink with a Low-heel, and no Low-heel would salute or speak to a High-heel." The king of Lilliput was a High-heel, but the heir-apparent a Low-heel.—Swift: Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Lilliput," iv., 1726).

(Of course, the allusion is to the High-church party and the Low-church party.)

Tramp (Gaffer), a peasant at the execution of old Meg Murdochson.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Tramtrist (Sir), the name assumed by sir Tristram when he went to Ireland to be cured of his wounds after his combat with sir Marhaus. Here La Belle Isold (or Isold "the Fair") was his leech, and the young knight fell in love with her. When the queen discovered that sir Tramtrist was sir Tristram, who had killed her brother, sir Marhaus, in combat, she plotted to take his life, and he was obliged to leave the island. La Belle Isold subsequently married king Mark of Cornwall, but her heart was ever fixed on her brave young patient.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 9–12 (1470).

Tranchera, Agricane's sword, which afterwards belonged to Brandimart.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Tra'nio, one of the servants of Lucentio the gentleman who marries Bianca (the sister of Kathari'na "the Paduan shrew").—Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew (1594).

Transfer, a usurer, who is willing to advance sir George Wealthy a sum of money on these easy terms: (1) 5 per cent. interest; (2) 10 per cent. premium; (3) 5 per cent. for insuring the young man's life; (4) a handsome present to himself as broker; (5) the borrower to pay all expenses; and (6) the loan not to be in cash but goods, which are to be taken at a valuation and sold at auction at the borrower's sole hazard. These terms are accepted, and sir George promises besides a handsome douceur to Loader for having found a usurer so reasonable.—Foote: The Minor (1760).

Transfiguration (The Mount of). Conder in his Tentwork in Palestine (1850), says there can be little doubt that it was some part of Mount Hermon, and not Mount Tabor (see Ps. xlii. 8).

Transformations. In the art of transformation, one of the most important things was a ready wit to adopt in an instant some form which would give you an advantage over your adversary: thus, if your adversary appeared as a mouse, you must change into an owl; then your adversary would become an arrow to shoot the owl, and you would assume the form of fire to burn the arrow; whereupon your adversary would become water to quench the fire; and he who could outwit the other would come off victorious. The two best examples I know of this sort of contest are to be found, one in the Arabian Nights, and the other in the Mabinogion.

(1) The former is the contest between the Queen of Beauty and the son of the daughter of Eblis. He appeared as a scorpion, she in a moment became a serpent; whereupon he changed into an eagle, she into a more powerful black eagle; he became a cat, she a wolf; she instantly changed into a worm and crept into a pomegranate, which in time burst, whereupon he assumed the form of a cock to devour the seed, but it became a fish; the cock then became a pike, but the princess became a blazing fire, and consumed her adversary before he had time to change.—"The Second Calender."

(2) The other is the contest between Caridwen and Gwion Bach. Bach fled as a hare, she changed into a greyhound; whereupon he became a fish, she an otter-bitch; he instantly became a bird, she a hawk; but he became as quick as thought a grain of wheat. Caridwen now became a hen, and made for the wheat-corn and devoured him.—Taliesin.

Translator-General. Philemon Holland is so called by Fuller, in his Worthies of England. Mr. Holland translated Livy, Pliny, Plutarch, Suetonius, Xenophon, and several other classic authors (1551–1636).

Transome (Mrs.), secretly married to Matthew Jermyn, the lawyer. Their son is Harold [Transome], who proposes to Esther Lyon, and is refused.—George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross): Felix Holt (1860).

Trap to Catch a Sunbeam, by Matilda Anne Planché (afterwards Mrs. Mackarness).

Trapbois (Old), a miser in Alsatia. Even in his extreme age, "he was believed to understand the plucking of a pigeon better than any man in Alsatia."

Martha Trapbois, the miser's daughter, a cold, decisive, masculine woman, who marries Richie Moniplies.—Sir W. Scott: The Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Trap'oban (The Island of), ruled over by Alifanfaron. It is in the Utopian Ocean, 92° N. lat., 180° 2′ W. long.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iii. 4 (1605).

Trapper (The). Natty Bumppo is so called in The Prairie. He is introduced in four other of Cooper's novels as "The Deerslayer," "The Pathfinder," "The Hawk-eye" in The Last of the Mohicans, and "Natty Bumppo" in The Pioneers.

Traveller (The). The scheme of this poem is very simple: The poet supposes himself seated among Alpine solitudes, looking down upon a hundred kingdoms. He would fain find some spot where happiness can be attained, but the natives of each realm think their own the best; yet the amount of happiness in each is pretty well equal. To illustrate this, the poet describes the manners and government of Italy, Switzerland, France, Holland, and England. — Goldsmith (1764).

Traveller (Mr.), the stranger who tried to reason with Mr. Mopes and bring him back to society, but found the truth of the tinker's remark, "When iron is thoroughly rotten, you cannot botch it." —Dickens: A Christmas Number (1861).

Traveller's Refuge, the valley of Fakreddin.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Travellers' Tales. (1) Marco Polo says, "Certain islands lie so far north in the Northern Ocean, that one going thither actually leaves the pole-star a trifle behind to the south."

(2) A Dutch skipper told Master Moxon, the hydrographer of Charles II., that he had himself sailed two degrees beyond the pole.

(3) Maundeville says, in Prester John's country is a sea of sand which ebbs and flows in great waves without one drop of water. This sea, says the knight of St. Alban's, men find full of right good fish of most delicious eating.

(2) At the time of the discovery of America by Columbus, many marvellous tales were rife in Spain. It was said that in one part of the coast of El Nombre de Dios, the natives had such long ears that one ear served for bed and the other for counterpane. This reminds one of Gwevyl mab Gwestad, one of whose lips hung down to his waist, and the other covered his head like a cowl. Another tale was that one of the crew of Columbus had come across a people who lived on sweet scents alone, and were killed by foul smells. This invention was hardly original, inasmuch as both Plutarch and Pliny tell us of an Indian people who lived on sweet odours, and Democritos lived for several days on the mere effluvia of hot bread. Another tale was that the noses of these smell-feeders were so huge that their heads were all nose. We are also told of one-eyed men; of men who carried their head under one of their arms; of others whose head was in their breast; of others who were conquered, not by arms, but by the priests holding up before them a little ivory crucifix—a sort of Christian version of the taking of Jericho by the blast of the rams'-horn trumpets of the Levites in the time of Joshua. (See THREE DIADEMED CHIEFS, p. 1103; ODOURS FOR FOOD, p. 769.)

Travels in . . . Remote Nations, by "Lemuel Gulliver." He is first shipwrecked and cast on the coast of Lilliput, a country of pygmies. Subsequently he is thrown among the people of Brobdingnag, giants of tremendous size. In his third expedition he is driven to Laputa, an empire of quack pretenders to science and knavish projectors. And in his fourth voyage he visits the Houyhnhnms [Whin'-n'ms], where horses were the dominant powers.—Swift (1726).

Travers, a retainer of the earl of Northumberland.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. (1598).

Travers (Sir Edmund), an old bachelor, the guardian and uncle of lady Davenant. He is a tedious gossip, fond of meddling, prosy, and wise in his own conceit. "It is surprising," he says, "how unwilling people are to hear my stories. When in parliament I make a speech, there is nothing but coughing, hemming, and shuffling of feet—no desire of information." By his instigation the match was broken off between his niece and captain Dormer, and she was given in marriage to lord Davenant; but it turned out that his lordship was already married, and his wife living.—Cumberland: The Mysterious Husband (1783).

Travia'ta, an opera, representing the progress of a courtezan. Music by Verdi, and libretto from La Dame aux Camélias, a novel by Alexandre Dumas fils (1856).

Treachery of the Long-Knives (The). Hengist invited the chief British nobles to a conference at Ambresbury, but arranged that a Saxon should be seated beside each Briton. At a given signal, each Saxon was to slay his neighbour with his long knife, and as many as 460 British nobles fell. Eidiol earl of Gloucester escaped, after killing seventy (some say 600) of the Saxons.—Welsh Triads.

Stonehenge was erected by Merlin, at the command of Ambrosius, in memory of the plot of the "Long-Knives." . . . He built it on the site of a former circle. It deviates from older bardic circles, as may be seen by comparing it with Avebury, Stanton-Drew, Keswick, etc.—Cambrian Biography, art. "Merddin."

Treasury of Peru (The), the Andes.

Treasury of Sciences (The), Bokhara, which has 103 colleges, besides schools and 360 mosques.

Trecentisti, the Italian worthies of the "Trecento" (thirteenth and fourteenth centuries). They were Dante (1265–1321),

Petrarch (1304-1374); Boccaccio, who wrote the Decameron. Others of less note were Giotto, Giovanna da Pisa, and Andrea Orcagna. (See CINQUECENTO, p. 210; SEICENTO, p. 978.)

In Italy he'd ape the Trecentisti.
Byron: Don Juan, iii. 86 (1820).

Tree (The Bleeding). One of the indictments laid to the charge of the marquis of Argyll, so hated by the royalists for the part he took in the execution of Montrose, was this: "That a tree on which thirty-six of his enemies were hanged was immediately blasted, and, when hewn down, a copious stream of blood ran from it, saturating the earth, and that blood for several years was emitted from the roots."—Laing: History of Scotland, ii. 11 (1800); State Trials, ii. 422.

The Largest Tree. The largest tree in the world is said to be one discovered, in 1874, near Tule River, in California. Though the top has been broken off, it is 240 feet high, and the diameter of the tree where it has been broken is 12 feet. This giant of the forest is called "Old Moses," from a mountain in the neighbourhood, and is calculated to be 4840 years old! The hollow of its trunk, which is 111 feet, will hold 150 persons, and is hung with scenes of California, is carpeted, and fitted up like a drawing-room, with table, chairs, sofa, and pianoforte. A section of this tree, 74 feet round and 25 feet across, was exhibited in New York, in 1879. (See New York Herald.)

(Australia claims to have still larger trees.)

The Poets' Tree, a tree which grows over the tomb of Tan-Sein, a musician at the court of [Mohammed] Akbar. Whoever chews a leaf of this tree will be inspired with a divine melody of voice.—W. Hunter.

His voice was as sweet as if he had chewed the leaves of that enchanted tree which grows over the tomb of the musician Tan-Sein.—Moore: Lalla Rookh (1817).

The Singing Tree, a tree each leaf of which was musical, and all the leaves joined together in delightful harmony.—Arabian Nights ("The Story of the Sisters who envied their Younger Sister").

¶ In the Fairy Tales of the comtesse D'Aulnoy, there is a tree called "the singing apple," of precisely the same character, but the apple tree gave the possessor the inspiration of poetry also.—"Chery and Fairstar."

Tree of Knowledge (The), a tree in the garden of paradise, the fruit of which Adam and Eve were forbidden to eat, lest they should die.—Gen. ii. 9; iii. 3.

Next to [the tree of] Life,
. . . the Tree of Knowledge grew fast by,
Knowledge of good, bought dear by knowing ill.
Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 221 (1665).

Tree of Liberty (The), a tree or pole crowned with a cap of liberty, and decorated with flags, ribbons, and other devices of a republican character. The idea was given by the Americans in their War of Independence; it was adopted by the Jacobins in Paris in 1790, and by the Italians in 1848.

Tree of Life (The), a tree in the "midst of the garden" of paradise, which, if Adam had plucked and eaten of, he would have "lived for ever."—Gen. ii. 9; iii. 22.

Out of the fertile ground [God] caused to grow
All trees of noblest kind for sight, smell, taste;
And all amid them stood the Tree of Life,
High eminent, blooming ambrosial fruit
Of vegetable gold.
Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 215, etc. (1665).

Trees noted for Specific Virtues and Uses.

Those articles marked B. P. are from William Browne's Britannia's Pastorals (1613).

(1) ALDER, good for water-pipes and piles, capital for the foundations of buildings situated upon bogs; it becomes black as jet and almost imperishable when used for piles in swamps or under water. The Ria to of Venice is founded on alder—a wood excellent for clogs, shoe-heels, wooden shoes, the cogs of mill-wheels, turnery, chairs, poles, and garden props.

It is said that fleas dislike it.

Alder nourishes whatever plant grows under its shadow.—B. P.

(2) ASH, the Venus of the forest.—Gilpin: Forest Scenery (1791).

Used for all tools employed in husbandry—carts, waggons, wheels, pulleys, and oars. It bursts into leaf between May 13 and June 14.

Grass will grow beneath it.

At Donirey, near Clare, is the hollow trunk of an ash tree 42 feet in circumference, in which a little school used to be kept.—Young: Irish Tour (1775-6).

In Woburn Park is an ash tree 90 feet high, 15 feet in girth (3 feet from the ground), and containing a grand total of 872 cubic feet of timber.—Strutt: Sylva Britannica.

The ash tree at Carnock, planted in 1596, supposed to be the largest in Scotland, is 90 feet high and 19 feet in girth (5 feet from the ground).—Ditto.

Dr. Walker says he measured an ash tree in Lochaber churchyard, Scotland, 58 feet in girth (5 feet from the ground).

(3) ASPEN TREE. No grass will grow in its vicinity. The legend is that the cross of Jesus was made of this wood, and hence its leaves were doomed to tremble till the day of doom.

Ah! tremble, tremble, aspen tree!
We need not ask thee why thou shakest;
For if, as holy legend saith,
On thee the Saviour bled to death,
No wonder, aspen, that thou quakest!
And, till in judgment all assemble,
Thy leaves accursed shall wail and tremble.
E. C. B.

(4) BEECH TREE, employed for clogs, tool-handles, planes, mallets, turnery, large wooden screws, sounding-boards of musical instruments, scabbards, band-boxes, book-covers, coffins, chairs, and bedsteads; but for chairs and bedsteads it is not fit, as it is a favourite resort of the ptinus pectinicornis, whose eggs are deposited on the surface of the wood, and the young worms eat their way in. Floats for nets are made of the bark. It is excellent for wood fires, and is called in France bois d'Andelle. The beech bursts into leaf between April 19 and May 7.

"The Twelve Apostles." On an island of the lake Wetter, were twelve majestic beech trees, now reduced to eleven, for a zealous peasant cut down one of them, declaring "that the traitor Judas should have no part nor lot with the faithful." On these beeches are cut the names of Charles XI., Charles XII., queen Eleonora, and other distinguished visitors. Other famous beeches are the Frankley Beeches, in Worcestershire.

Virgil's bowl, divini opus Alcimedontis, was made of beech wood, and Pliny tells us that vessels used in the temples were made sometimes of the same wood.

The beech, like the fir and chestnut, is very destructive of vegetation beneath.

(5) BIRCH, used by the ancients for papyrus. The wood is used for the heels of shoes, cradles, packing-boxes, sabots, drinking-cups, brooms or besoms, rods, torches, and charcoal.

"It supplies the northern peasant with his house, his bread, his wine, and the vessels to put it in, part of his clothing, and the furniture of his bed."—Sylvan Sketches.

Birch loves the coldest places.—B. P.

(6) BLACKTHORN is formed into teeth for rakes and into walking-sticks. Letters written on linen or woollen with sloe-juice will not wash out.

It is said that Joseph of Arimathea planted his staff on the south ridge of Weary-all Hill (now Werrall), where it grew and put forth blossoms every Christmas Day afterwards. The original tree was destroyed in the reign of Charles I. by a puritan soldier, who lost his life by a splinter which wounded him while so employed. The variety which blossoms twice a year is now pretty common.

The Holy Thorn has been introduced into many parts, and is now grown in several gardens about Glastonbury and its vicinity. Pilgrimages continued to be made to this tree even in Mr. Eyston's time, who died 1721.—Warner: Evening Post, January 1753.

(7) BOX, used for turnery, combs, mathematical instruments, knife-handles, tops, screws, button-moulds, wood engravings, etc. Box wood will sink in water.

A decoction of box wood promotes the growth of hair, and an oil distilled from its shavings is a cure for hemorrhoids, tooth-ache, epilepsy, and stomach-worms. So, at least, we are told.

(8) CEDAR, used for cigar-boxes. It is hateful to moths and fleas; hence it is used for lining wardrobes and drawers.

(9) CHERRY TREE, used by the turner, formed into chairs and hoops. It is stained to imitate mahogany, to which wood, both in grain and colour, it approaches nearer than any other of this country. It is stained black for picture-frames. The cherry tree was first introduced from Flanders into Kent, in the reign of Henry VIII.

More than a hundred men, during a siege, were kept alive for nearly two months, without any other sustenance than a little of this gum taken into the mouth and suffered gradually to dissolve.—Hasselquist: Iter Palæstinum (1757).

(10) CHESTNUT TREE, the tree introduced into the pictures of Salvator Rosa. The wood is used by coopers and for water-pipes, because it neither shrinks nor changes the colour of any liquor it contains. It is, however, bad for posts; and grass will not grow beneath its shade.

Staves that nor shrink nor swell,
The cooper's close-wrought cask to chestnut owes.
Dodsley.

The roof of Westminster Abbey, and that of the "Parliament House," Edinburgh, are made of chestnut wood.

In Cobham Park, Kent, is a chestnut tree 40 feet in girth (5 feet from the ground).—Strutt: Sylva Britannica.

At Tortworth, in Gloucestershire, is a chestnut tree 52 feet in girth. Even in 1150 it was called "the great chestnut tree of Tortworth." Mr. Marsham says it was 540 years old when king John came to the throne, which would carry us back to the heptarchy. If so, this tree has rallied the whole history of England from the Roman period to our own.

The horse chestnut bursts into leaf between March 17 and April 19. The Spanish chestnut fully a month later.

(11) CYPRESS hurts the least of all trees by its droppings.—B. P.

(12) DOG ROSE. So called by the Greeks (kunorodon), because the root was deemed a cure for the bite of a mad dog.

(13) ELDER TREE, used for skewers, tops of angling-rods, needles for netting, turnery. The pith is used for electrometers and in electrical experiments.

An infusion of elder leaves will destroy insects on delicate plants better than tobacco-juice; and if turnips, cabbages, fruit trees, etc., are brushed with a branch of elder leaves, no insect will infest the plants.—Philosophical Transactions, v. 62, p. 348.

(14) ELM is used for axle-trees, mill-wheels, keels of boats, gunwales chairs, coffins, rails, gates, under-ground pipes, pumps, millwork, pattens.

Grass will grow beneath its shade.

The elm is pre-eminent for the tenacity of its wood, which never splinters. It is the first of forest trees to burst into leaf.

Toads and frogs are often embedded in elm trees. They crept into some hollow place or crack, and became imprisoned by the glutinous fluid of the new inner bark (liber and alburnum). Some have been found alive when the tree is cut down, but they need not have been embedded long.

At Hampstead there was once a famous hollow elm, which had a staircase within and seats at the top.—Park: Topography.

At Blythfield, in Staffordshire, was an elm which, Ray tells us, furnished 8660 feet of planks, weighing 97 tons.

The elm at Chequers, Buckinghamshire, was planted in the reign of Stephen; the shell is now 31 feet in girth. The Chepstead Elm, Kent, contains 268 feet of timber, and is 15 feet in girth; it is said to have had an annual fair beneath its shade in the reign of Henry V. The elm at Crawley, in Sussex, is 70 feet high and 35 feet in girth.—Strutt: Sylva Britannica.

(15) FIG TREE. The leaves of this tree have the property of maturing game and meat hung amongst them.

(16) FIR TREE. In Ireland the bog firs, beaten into string, are manufactured into rope, capable of resisting the weather much longer than hempen ropes. The bark can be used for tan. Tar and pitch are obtained from the trunk and branches. The thinnings of fir forests will do for hop-poles, scantlings, and rafters, and its timber is used by builders.

Grass will not grow beneath fir trees.

(17) GUELDER ROSE. From the bark of the root birdlime is made. The shoots make excellent bands for faggots.

Evelyn says a decoction of the leaves will dye the hair black and strengthen it.

(18) HAZEL TREE. The wood makes excellent charcoal for forges. Fishing-rods, walking-sticks, crates, hoops for barrels, shoots for springles to fasten down thatch, hurdles, etc., are made of this wood. Hazel chips will clear turbid wine in twenty-four hours, and twigs of hazel twisted together will serve for yeast in brewing.

Hazel wands were used in divination, for detecting minerals, water-springs, and hid treasures. (See DOUSTERSWIVEL, p. 298.)

> By whatsoever occult virtue the forked hazel stick discovers not only subterraneous treasure, but criminals guilty of murder and other crimes, made out so solemnly by the attestation of magistrates and divers other learned and credible persons who have critically examined matters of fact, is certainly next to a miracle, and requires a strong faith.—Evelyn: Sylva (1664).

The small hole bored through the shell of hazel nuts is not the work of squirrels, but of field-mice; squirrels always split the shells.

(19) HOLLY TREE. Birdlime is made from it. The wood is used for veneering, handles of knives, the cogs of mill-wheels, hones for whetting knives and razors, coachmen's whips, Tunbridge ware.

(20) IVY. The roots are used by leather-cutters for whetting their knives; and when the roots are large, boxes and slabs are made from them.

It is said that apricots and peaches protected in winter by ivy fencing become remarkably productive.

(21) JUNIPER is never attacked by worms.—B. P.

The wood is used for veneering; and alcohol or spirits of wine, impregnated with the essential oil of juniper berries, is gin (or juniper water); for the French genevre means "a juniper berry." Ordinarily, gin is a malt liquor, distilled a second time, with the addition of juniper berries, or more frequently with the oil of turpentine.

(22) LARCH, very apt to warp, but it resists decay. It bursts into leaf between March 21 and April 14.

Le bois du mélèze l'emporte en bonté et en durée sur celui des pins et des sapins. On en fait des gouttières des conduits d'eaux souterraines, de bonnes charpentes; il entre dans la construction des petits bâtiments de mer. Les peintres s'en servent pour faire les cadres de leurs tableaux.—Boutillet: Dict. Univ. des Sciences.

(23) LIME or LINDEN TREE. Grinling Gibbons, the great wood-carver, used no other wood but that of the lime tree, which is soft, light, smooth, close-grained, and not subject to the worm. For the same reason, it is the chief material of Tunbridge ware. Bellonius states that the Greeks used the wood for making bottles.

Lime wood makes excellent charcoal for gunpowder, and is employed for buttons and leather-cutters' boards. The flowers afford the best honey for bees, and the famous Kowno honey is made exclusively from the linden blossoms.

It was one of the trees from which papyrus was made, and in the library of Vienna is a work of Cicero written on the inner bark of the linden.

One other thing is worth mentioning. Hares and rabbits will never injure the bark of this tree.

The lime is the first of all trees to shed its leaves in autumn. It bursts into leaf between April 6 and May 2.

At Deopham, in Norfolk, was a lime tree which, Evelyn tells us, was 36 feet in girth and 90 feet in height. Strutt tells us of one in Moor Park, Hertfordshire, 17 feet in girth (3 feet above the ground) and 100 feet high; it contained 875 feet of timber. He also mentions one in Cobham Park, 28 feet in girth and 90 feet in height.

The lime tree in the Grisons is upwards of 590 years old.

(24) MAPLE TREE, employed for cabinet-work, gunstocks, screws for cider-presses, and turnery. The Tigrin and Pantherine tables were made of maple. The maple tables of Cicero, Asinius Gallus, king Juba, and the Mauritanian Ptolemy, "are worth their weight in gold."

At Knowle, in Kent, there is a maple tree which is 14 feet in girth.—Strutt: Sylva Britannica,

(25) MOUNTAIN ASH or ROWAN TREE, used for hoops, and for bows, comes next to the yew. It forms good and lasting posts, and is made into hurdles, tables, spokes of wheels, shafts, chairs, and so on. The roots are made into spoons and knife-handles. The bark makes excellent tan.

Twigs of rowan used to be carried about as a charm against witches. Scotch dairy-maids drive their cattle with rowan rods; and at Strathspey, in Scotland, at one time, sheep and lambs were made to pass through hoops of rowan wood on May-day. (See QUICKEN TREES, p. 891.)

In Wales, the rowan used to be considered sacred; it was planted in churchyards, and crosses made of the wood were commonly worn.

> Their spells were vain. The hags returned
> To the queen in sorrowful mood,
> Crying that witches have no power
> Where there is rown tree wood.
> The Laidley Worm of Spindleston Heughs.

(26) MYRTLE. Some Northern nations use it instead of hops. The catkins, boiled in water, throw up a waxy scum, of which candles were made by Dutch boers. Hottentots (according to Thunberg) make a cheese of it. Myrtle tan is good for tanning calf-skins.

Laid under a bed, it keeps off fleas and moths.

(27) OAK TREE, the king of the forest and patriarch of trees, wholly unrivalled in stature, strength, and longevity. The timber is used for ship-building, the bark for tanning leather, and the gall for making ink. Oak timber is used for every work where durability and strength are required.

Oak trees best resist the thunderstroke.—B. P. (William Browne is responsible for this statement).

It bursts into leaf between April 10 and May 26.

In 1757 there was an oak in earl Powis's park, near Ludlow, 16 feet in girth (5 feet from the ground) and 60 feet high (Marsham). Panshanger Oak, in Kent, is 19 feet in girth, and contains 1000 feet of timber, though not yet in its prime (Marsham). Salcey Forest Oak, in Northamptonshire, is 24 feet in girth (Marsham). Gog, in Yardley Forest, is 28 feet in girth, and contains 1658 cubic feet of timber. The king of Wynnstay Park, North Wales, is 30 feet in girth. The Queen's Oak, Huntingfield, Suffolk, from which queen Elizabeth shot a buck, is 35 feet in girth (Marsham). Shelton Oak, near Shrewsbury, called the "Grette Oake" in 1543, which served the great Glendower for a post of observation in the battle of Shrewsbury (1403), is 37 feet in girth (Marsham). Green Dale Oak, near Welbeck, is 38 feet in girth, 11 feet from the ground (Evelyn). Cowthorpe Oak, near Wetherby, is 48 feet in girth (Evelyn). The great oak in Broomfield Wood, near Ludlow, was, in 1764, 68 feet in girth, 23 feet high, and contained 1455 feet of timber (Lightfoot).

Beggar's Oak, in Blithfield Park, Staffordshire, contains 827 cubic feet of timber, and, in 1812, was valued at £200 (Marsham). Fredville Oak, Kent, contains 1400 feet of timber (Marsham). But the most stupendous oak ever grown in England was that dug out of Hatfield Bog: it was 12 feet in girth at the larger end, 6 feet at the smaller end, and 120 feet in length; so that it exceeded the famous larch tree brought to Rome in the reign of Tiberius, as Pliny states in his Natural History.

(These are all from Marsham's Bath Soc., i.; the Sylva Caledonia; Evelyn's Sylva; The Journal of a Naturalist; or from Strutt's three works—Sylva Britannica, Deliciæ Sylvarum, and Mag. Nat. Hist.)

Swilcar Oak, in Needham Forest, is 600 years old (Strutt). The Oak of the Partizans, in the forest of Parey, St. Ouen, is above 650 years old. Wallace's Oak, which stood on the spot where the "patriot hero" was born (Elderslie, near Paisley), was probably 700 years old when it was blown down in 1859. Salcey Forest Oak, in Northamptonshire, is above 1000 years old. William the Conqueror's Oak, Windsor Great Park, is at least 1200 years old. Winfarthing Oak, Norfolk, and Bentley Oak, were 700 years old at the Conquest. Cowthorpe Oak, near Wetherby, is 1600 years old (professor Burnet). The great oak of Saintes, in the Charente Inférieur, is reckoned from 1800 to 2000 years old. The Damorey Oak, Dorsetshire, was 2000 years old when it was blown down in 1703. In the Commonwealth, it was inhabited by an old man, and used as an ale-house; its cavity was 15 feet in diameter and 17 feet in height.

In the Water Walk of Magdalen College, Oxford, was an oak supposed to have existed before the Conquest; it was a notable tree when the college was founded in 1448, and was blown down in 1789. On Abbot's Oak, Woburn, the vicar of Puddington, near Chester, and Roger Hobbs abbot of Woburn were hung, in 1537, by order of Henry VIII., for refusing to surrender their sacerdotal rights (Marsham). The Bull Oak, Wedgenock Park, and the Plestor Oak, Colborne, were both in existence at the Conquest. The Shellard's Lane Oak, Gloucestershire, is one of the oldest in the island (Journal of a Naturalist, i.).

The Cadenham Oak, near Lyndhurst, in the New Forest, buds "on old Christmas Day," and has done so for at least two centuries; it is covered with foliage at the usual time of other oak trees. The same is said of the tree against which the arrow of Tyrrel glanced when Rufus was killed (Camden).

In the forest near Thoresby Park is a fine oak, called "The Major Oak," 35 feet in girth, 5 feet from the ground. Fourteen full-grown persons can stand within its hollow trunk. There is another in the same park, 30 feet in girth. In another part of the forest, nearer Welbeck, is the ruin of Robin Hood's Larder, held together by strong iron bands. At Clipstone is the tree called "King John's Oak." (See OAK, p. 765.)

(28) OLIVE, used in wainscot, because it never gapes, cracks, or cleaves.—B. P.

The eight olive trees on the Mount of Olives were flourishing 800 years ago, when the Turks took Jerusalem.

(29) OSIER, used for puncheons, wheels for catching eels, bird-cages, baskets, hampers, hurdles, edders, stakes, rake-handles, and poles.

(30) PEAR TREE, used for turnery, joiners' tools, chairs, and picture-frames.

It is worth knowing that pear-grafts on a quince stock produce the most abundant and luscious fruit.

(31) PINE TREE. The "Old Guardsman," in Vancouver's Island, is the largest Douglas pine. It is 16 feet in diameter, 51 feet in girth, and 150 feet in height. At one time it was 50 feet higher, but its top was broken off in a storm.

Le pin est employé en charpente, en planches, en tuyaux pour la conduite des eaux, en bordages pour les ponts des vaisseaux. Il fournit aussi la résine.—Boutillet: Dict. Univ. des Sciences.

(32) PLANE TREE. Grass delights to grow in its shade.—B. P.

(33) POPLAR TREE, sacred to Hercules. No wood is so little liable to take fire. The wood is excellent for wood-carvings and wainscoting, floors, laths, packing-boxes, and turnery.

Black Poplar. The bark is used by fishermen for buoying their nets; brooms are made of its twigs. In Flanders, clogs are made of the wood.

The poplar bursts into leaf between March 6 and April 19.

(34) ROSE TREE. The rose is called the "queen of flowers." It is the emblem of England, as the thistle is of Scotland, the shamrock of Ireland, and the lily of France.

It has ever been a favourite on graves as a memorial of affection; hence, Propertius says, "Et tenera poneret ossa rosa." In Rome, the day when the pope blesses the golden rose is called Dominica in Rosa. The long intestine strife between the rival houses of York and Lancaster is called in history the "War of the White and Red Roses," because the badge of the Yorkists was a white rose and that of the Lancastrians a red one (see p. 934). The marriage of Henry VII. with Elizabeth of York is called the "Union of the Two Roses."

The rose was anciently considered a token of secrecy, and hence, to whisper a thing sub rosa means it is not to be repeated.

In Persian fable, the rose is the nightingale's bride. "His queen, his garden queen, the rose." (See ROSE, p. 933.)

(35) SALLOW, excellent for hurdles, handles of hatchets, and shoemakers' boards. The honey of the catkins is good for bees, and the Highlanders use the bark for tanning leather.

(36) SPRUCE TREE (The) will reach to the age of 1000 years and more. Spruce is despised by English carpenters, "as a sorry sort of wood."

Il fournit une bière dite sapinette, en Anglais spruce beer, qu'on prétend être éminement anti-scorbutique. —Bouillet: Dict. Univ. des Sciences.

(37) SYCAMORE TREE used by turners for bowls and trenchers. It bursts into leaf between March 28 and April 23.

St. Hierom, who lived in the fourth century A.D., asserts that he himself had seen the sycamore tree into which Zacchæus climbed to see Jesus in His passage from Jericho to Jerusalem.—Luke xix. 4.

Strutt tells us of a sycamore tree in Cobham Park, Kent, 26 feet in girth and 90 feet high. Another in Bishopton, Renfrewshire, 20 feet in girth and 60 feet high.—Sylva Britannica.

Grass will flourish beneath this tree, and the tree will thrive by the sea-side.

(38) TAMARISK TREE does not dislike the sea-spray, and therefore thrives in the neighbourhood of the sea.

The Romans used to wreathe the heads of criminals with tamarisk withes. The Tartars and Russians make whip-handles of the wood.

The tamarisk is excellent for besoms. —B. P.

(39) UPAS TREE, said to poison everything in its vicinity. This is only fit for poetry and romance.

(40) WALNUT, best wood for gun-stocks; cabinet-makers used it largely.

This tree thrives best in valleys, and is most fertile when most beaten.—B. P.

A woman, a spaniel, and walnut tree,
The more you beat them, the better they be.
Taylor, the "water-poet" (1630).

Uneasy seated by funereal Yeugh,
Or Walnut, whose malignant touch impairs
All generous fruits.
Philips: Cyder, i. (1706).

(41) WHITETHORN, used for axle-trees, the handles of tools, and turnery.

The identical whitethorn planted by queen Mary of Scotland in the garden-court of the regent Murray, is still alive, and is about 5 feet in girth near the base. —Jones: Edinburgh Illustrated.

The Troglodytes adorned the graves of their parents with branches of whitethorn. It formed the nuptial chaplet of Athenian brides, and the fasces nuptiarum of the Roman maidens.

Every shepherd tells his tale
Under the hawthorn in the dale.
Milton: L'Allegro (1638).

(42) WILLOW, used for clogs, ladders, trenchers, pill-boxes, milk-pails, butter-firkins, bonnets, cricket-bats, hop-poles, cradles, crates, baskets, etc. It makes excellent charcoal, and a willow board will sharpen knives and other tools like a hone.

Willows to panting shepherds shade dispense,
To bees their honey, and to corn defence.
Googe: Virgil's Georgics, ii.

It is said that victims were enclosed in wicker-work made of willow wood, and consumed in fires by the druids. Martial tells us that the old Britons were very skilful in weaving willows into baskets and boats (Epigrams, xiv. 99). The shields which so long resisted the Roman legions were willow wood covered with leather.

(43) WYCH ELM, once in repute for arrows and long-bows. It affords excellent wood for the wheeler and millwright. The young bark is used for securing thatch and bindings, and is made into rope.

The wych elm at Polloc, Renfrewshire, is 88 feet high, 12 feet in girth, and contains 669 feet of timber. One at Tutbury is 16 feet in girth.—Strutt: Sylva Britannica.

At Field, in Staffordshire, is a wych elm 120 feet high and 25 feet in girth about the middle.—Plot.

(44) YEW TREE. The wood is converted into bows, axle-trees, spoons, cups, cogs for mill-wheels, flood-gates for fish-ponds (because the wood does not soon decay), bedsteads (because bugs and fleas will not come near it). Gate-posts of yew are more durable than iron; the steps of ladders should be made of this wood; and no material is equal to it for market-stools. Cabinet-makers and inlayers prize it.

In Aberystwith churchyard is a yew tree 24 feet in girth, and another in Selborn churchyard of the same circumference. One of the yews at Fountain Abbey, Yorkshire, is 26 feet in girth; one at Aldworth, in Berkshire, is 27 feet in girth; one in Totteridge churchyard 32 feet; and one in Fortingal churchyard, in Perthshire (according to Pennant), is 52 feet in circumference (4 feet from the ground).

The yew tree in East Lavant churchyard is 31 feet in girth, just below the spring of the branches. There are five huge branches each as big as a tree, with a girth varying from 6 to 14 feet. The tree covers an area of 51 feet in every direction, and above 150 feet in circuit. It is above 1000 years old.

The yew tree at Martley, Worcester, is 346 years old, being planted three days before the birth of queen Elizabeth. That in Harlington churchyard is above 850 years old. That at Ankerwyke, near Staines, is said to be the same under which king John signed Magna Charta, and to have been the trysting-tree of Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyne. Three yew trees at Fountain Abbey, we are told, were full-grown trees in 1128, when the founders of the abbey held council there in the reign of William Rufus. The yew tree of Braburn, in Kent (according to De Candolle), is 3000 years old!! It may be so, if it is true that the yew trees of Kingley Bottom, near Chichester, were standing when the sea-kings landed on the Sussex coast, and those in Norbury Park are the very same which were standing in the time of the ancient druids.

NOTABILIA—

Grass will grow beneath alder, ash, cypress, elm, plane, and sycamore; but not beneath aspen, beech, chestnut, and fir.

Sea-spray does not injure sycamore or tamarisk.

Chestnut and olive never warp; larch is most apt to warp.

For posts the best woods are yew, oak, and larch; one of the worst is chestnut.

For picture-frames, maple, pear, oak, and cherry are excellent.

Fleas dislike alder, cedar, myrtle, and yew; hares and rabbits never injure lime bark; moths and spiders avoid cedar; worms never attack juniper. Beech and ash are very subject to attacks of insects. Beech is the favourite tree of dormice, acacia of nightingales.

For binding faggots, the best woods are guelder rose, hazel, osier, willow, and mountain ash.

Knives and all sorts of instruments may be sharpened on ivy roots, willow, and holly wood, as well as on a hone.

Birdlime is made from holly and the guelder rose.

Baskets are made of osier, willow, and other wicker and withy shoots; besoms, of birch, tamarisk, heath, etc.; hurdles, of hazel; barrels and tubs, of chestnut and oak; cricket-bats, of willow; fishing-rods, of ash, hazel, and blackthorn; gun-stocks, of maple and walnut; skewers, of elder and skewer wood; the teeth of rakes, of blackthorn, ash, and the twigs called withy.

The best woods for turnery are box, alder, beech, sycamore, and pear; for Tunbridge ware, lime; for wood-carving, box, lime, and poplar; for clogs, willow, alder, and beech; for oars, ash.

Beech is called the cabinet-makers' wood; oak and elm, the ship-builders'; ash, the wheel-wrights'.

N.B.—There are several beautiful lists of trees given by poets. For example, in Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered, iii., at the end, where men are sent to cut down trees for the funeral pile of Dudon. In Statius, The Thebaid, vi., where the felling of trees for the pile of the infant Archemōrus is described. In Spenser, Faërie Queene, I. i. 8, 9, where the Red Cross Knight and the lady seek shelter during a storm, and much admire the forest trees.

Trees of the Sun and Moon, oracular trees growing "at the extremity of India," mentioned in the Italian romance of Guerino Meschinot.

Tregeagle, the giant of Dosmary Pool, on Bodmin Downs (Cornwall). When the wintry winds blare over the downs, it is said to be the giant howling.

Trelawny Ballad (The) is by the Rev. R. S. Hawker of Morwenstow.—Notes and Queries, 441 (June, 1876).

Tremaine or "The Man of Refinement," by R. P. Ward (1825).

Tremor (Sir Luke), a desperate coward, living in India, who made it a rule never to fight either in his own house, his neighbour's house, or in the street. This lily-livered desperado is everlastingly snubbing his wife. (See TRIPPET, p. 1139.)

Lady Tremor, daughter of a grocer, and grandchild of a wig-maker. Very sensitive on the subject of her plebeian birth, and wanting to be thought a lady of high family.—Inchbald: Such Things Are (1786).

Tremydd ap Tremhidydd, the man with the keenest sight of all mortals. He could discern "a mote in the sunbeam in any of the four quarters of the world." Clustfein ap Clustfeinydd was no less celebrated for his acuteness of hearing, "his ear being distressed by the movement of dew in June over a blade of grass." The meaning of these names is, "Sight the son of Seer," and "Ear the son of Hearer."—The Mabinogion ("Notes to Geraint," etc., twelfth century).

Trenmor, great-grandfather of Fingal, and king of Morven (north-west of Scotland). His wife was Inibaca, daughter of the king of Lochlin or Denmark.—Ossian: Fingal, vi.

In Temora, ii., he is called the first king of Ireland, and father of Conar.

Trent, says Drayton, is the third in size of the rivers of England, the two larger being the Thames and the Severn. Arden being asked which of her rills she intended to be the chief, the wizard answered, the Trent, for trent means "thirty," and thirty rivers should contribute to its stream, thirty different sorts of fish should live in it, and thirty abbeys be built on its banks.

> . . . my name I take
> That thirty doth import; thus thirty rivers make > My greatness . . . thirty abbeys great
> Upon my fruitful banks times formerly did seat;
> And thirty kinds of fish within my streams do live.
> To me this name of Trent did from that number give.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xii. (1613), and xxvi. (1622).

Trent (Fred), the scapegrace brother of little Nell. "He was a young man of one and twenty; well-made, and certainly handsome, but dissipated, and insolent in air and bearing." The mystery of Fred Trent and little Nell is cleared up in ch. lxix.—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop (1840).

Tres (Scriptores). (See SCRIPTORES, p. 973.)

Tresham (Mr.), senior partner of Mr. Osbaldistone, senior.—Sir W. Scott's Rob Roy (time, George II.).

Tresham (Richard), same as general Witherington, who first appears as Matthew Middlemas.

Richard Tresham, the son of general Witherington. He is also called Richard Middlemas.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Tresham (Thorold lord), head of a noble race, whose boast was that "no blot had ever stained their 'scutcheon," though the family ran back into pre-historic times. He was a young, unmarried man, with a sister Mildred, a girl of 14, living with him. His near neighbour, Henry earl of Mertoun, asked permission to pay his addresses to Mildred, and Thorold accepted the proposal with much pleasure. The old warrener next day told Thorold he had observed for several weeks that a young man climbed into Mildred's chamber at night-time, and he would have spoken before, but did not like to bring his young mistress into trouble. Thorold wrung from his sister an acknowledgment of the fact, but she refused to give up the name, yet said she was quite willing to marry the earl. This Thorold thought would be dishonourable, and resolved to lie in wait for the unknown visitor. On his approach, Thorold discovered it was the earl of Mertoun, and slew him, then poisoned himself, and Mildred died of a broken heart.—R. Browning: A Blot on the 'Scutcheon.

Tressilian (Edmund), the betrothed of Amy Robsart. Amy marries the earl of Leicester, and is killed by falling into a deep pit, to which she had been scandalously inveigled.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Tre'visan (Sir), a knight to whom Despair gave a hempen rope, that he might go and hang himself.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. (1590).

Triads (The Welsh), groups of history, bardism, theology, ethics, and jurisprudence, arranged into threes. From the tenth to the fifteenth century. (See THREE . . . , pp. 1102-4.)

Triamond, son of Agape (3 syl.), a fairy. He had Canace (3 syl.) to wife.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, bk. iv. (1596).

Triboulet, a nickname given to Francis Hotman, court fool of Louis XII. This worthy is introduced by Rabelais, is his History of Gargantua and Panta'gruel (1533), and by Victor Hugo in his tragedy Le Roi s'amuse.

Tribulation [WHOLESOME], a pastor of Amsterdam, who thinks "the end will sanctify the means," and uses "the children of perdition" to promote his own object, which he calls the "work of God." He is one of the dupes of Subtle "the alchemist" and his factotum Face. — Ben Jonson: The Alchemist (1610).

Tribune of the People (The), John Bright (1811–1889).

Tricolour, the national badge of France since 1789. It consists of the Bourbon white cockade, and the blue and red cockade of the city of Paris combined. It was Lafayette who devised this symbolical union of king and people, and when he presented it to the nation, "Gentlemen," said he, "I bring you a cockade that shall make the tour of the world." (See STORNELLO VERSES, p. 1048.)

If you will wear a livery, let it at least be that of the city of Paris, blue and red, my friends.—Dumas: Six Years Afterwards, xv. (1846).

Tricoteuses de Robespierre (Les), femmes qui assistaient en tricotant aux séances de la Convention, des clubs populaires, et du tribunal révolutionnaire. Encouragées par la commune, elles se portèrent à de tels excés qu'on les surnomma les Furies de la guillotine. Elles disparurent avec la société des Jacobins.—Bouillet: Dict. Universel.

Triermain (The Bridal of), a poem by sir Walter Scott, in four cantos, with introduction and conclusion (1813). In the introduction, Arthur is represented as the person who tells the tale to Lucy, his bride.

The tale is as follows: Gyneth, a natural daughter of king Arthur and Guendölen, was promised in marriage to the bravest knight in a tournament; but she suffered so many combatants to fall without dropping the warder, that Merlin threw her into an enchanted sleep, from which she was not to wake till a knight as brave as those who had fallen claimed her in marriage. After the lapse of 500 years, sir Roland de Vaux, baron of Triermain, undertook to break the spell, but had first to overcome four temptations, viz. fear, avarice, pleasure, and ambition. Having come off more than conqueror, Gyneth awoke, and became his bride.

Trifal'di (The countess), called "The Afflicted Duenna" of the princess Antonomasia (heiress to the throne of Candaya). She was called Trifaldi from her robe, which was divided into three triangles, each of which was supported by a page. The face of this duenna was, by the enchantment of the giant Malambru'no, covered with a large, rough beard, but when don Quixote mounted Clavilẽno the Winged, "the enchantment was dissolved."

The renowned knight don Quixote de la Mancha hath achieved the adventure merely by attempting it. Malambruno is appeased, and the chin of the Dolorida dueña is again beardless.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iii. 4, 5 (1615).

Trifal'din of the "Bushy Beard" (white as snow), the gigantic squire of "The Afflicted Duenna" the countess Trifaldi.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iii. 4 (1615).

Trifle (Miss Penelopê), an old maiden sister of sir Penurious Trifle. Stiff as a ramrod, prim as fine airs and graces could make her, fond of long words, and delighting in phrases modelled in true Johnsonian ponderosity.

Miss Sukey Trifle, daughter of sir Penurious, tricked into marriage with Mr. Hartop, a young spendthrift, who fell in love with her fortune.

∴ Sir Penurious Trifle is not introduced, but Hartop assumes his character, and makes him fond of telling stale and pointless stories. He addresses sir Gregory as "you knight." — Foote: The Knights (1754).

Trilby, a novel by Du Maurier, in eight parts (1895). The heroine is Trilby O'Ferrall, and the hero "Little Billee," that is William Bagot, son of a widow in Devonshire. Trilby was the daughter of Mr. O'Ferrall, who had been a clergyman and Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, but by indulgence in drink he lost his living, went to Paris, and married a barmaid, the natural daughter of the Hon. col. Desmond, a near relative of the duchess of Tower. When the novel opens, Trilby was about 17, and earned her living as an artist's model. She became intimate with three "English" art-students in Paris, whose influence over her for good was unbounded. They were called Taffy, the laird of Cockpen, and Little Billee. The first was Talbot Wynne, of Yorkshire, a man of magnificent physique, most affectionate disposition, and unbounded spirits; the second was the son of a solicitor; and the third was William Bagot, the greatest artist of the age. They all fell in love with Trilby, but Little Billee proposed marriage, and, after nineteen refusals, Trilby accepted his proposal. His mother now speeded from Devonshire, and induced Trilby to break off the match, and she gave her word never to marry her son. Little Billee fell dangerously ill, went to Devonshire to be nursed, and the Paris clique was broken up. For a time Trilby earned her living as a getter-up of fine linen, and then fell into the bands of an Hungarian musician, who assumed the name of Svengali. He taught her singing, under mesmeric influence, and when under this influence she was the best vocalist that ever lived. Emperors and kings, princes and dukes, bowed down before her, and the Hungarian grew rich. But when she appeared before the British public, Svengali, who was sitting in the stage-box, died suddenly of heart-disease, and Trilby entirely lost her voice. She now languished, and soon died of atrophy, beloved by every one. Taffy married Little Billee's sister; Little Billee died; and the laird of Cockpen married a countrywoman. Trilby is represented as beautiful exceedingly, with model feet, a perfect figure, a loving disposition, ready to turn her hand to anything, and a perfect siren of angelic nature. Every one loved her, and she had not an enemy in the world.

Charles Nodier, in 1822, published a novelette of the same name, but this Trilby was a male spirit who attached itself to a fisherman, fell in love with his wife, and performed for her all kinds of household services.

Trim (Corporal), uncle Toby's orderly. Faithful, simple-minded, and most affectionate. Voluble in speech, but most respectful. Half companion, but never forgetting he is his master's servant. Trim is the duplicate of uncle Toby in delf. The latter at all times shows himself the officer and the gentleman, born to command and used to obedience, while the former always carries traces of the drill-yard, and shows that he has been accustomed to receive orders with deference, and to execute them with military precision. It is a great compliment to say that the corporal was worthy such a noble master.—Sterne: Tristram Shandy (1759).

Trim, instead of being the opposite, is . . . the duplicate of uncle Toby . . . yet . . . is the character of the common soldier nicely discriminated from that of the officer. His whole carriage bears traces of the drill-yard, which are wanting in the superior. Under the name of a servant, he is in reality a companion, and a delightful mixture of familiarity . . . and respect. . . . It is enough to say that Trim was worthy to walk behind his master.—Elwin, editor of the Quarterly Review (1853-60).

Trimalchi, a celebrated cook in the reign of Nero, mentioned by Petronius. He had the art of giving to the most common fish the flavour and appearance of the most highly esteemed. Like Ude, he said that "sauces are the soul of cookery, and cookery the soul of festivity," or, as the cat's-meat man observed, "'tis the seasonin' as does it."

Trinacria. Sicily is so called from its three promontories (Greek, tria akra): (1) Pelo'rus (Capo di Faro), in the north, called Faro from the pharos; (2) Pachy'nus (Capo di Passaro), in the south; (3) Lilyba'um (Capo di Marsella or Capo di Boco), in the west.

Our ship
Had left behind Trinacria's burning isle,
And visited the margin of the Nile.
Falconer: The Shipwreck, I. (1762)

Trin'culo, a jester.—Shakespeare: The Tempest (1609).

A miscarriage . . . would (like the loss of Trinculo's bottle in the horse-pond) be attended not only with dishonour but with infinite loss.—Sir W. Scott.

Trin'ket (Lord), a man of fashion and a libertine.

He is just polite enough to be able to be very unmannerly, with a great deal of good breeding; is just handsome enough to make him excessively vain of his person; and has just reflection enough to finish him for a coxcomb; qualifications . . . very common among . . . men of quality.—Colman: The Jealous Wife, ii. 3 (1761).

Tri'nobants, people of Trinoban'tium, that is, Middlesex and Essex. Their chief town was Tri'novant, now London.

So east ward where by Thames the Trinobants were set,
To Trinovant their town . . . That London now we term . . .
The Saxons . . . their east kingdom called [Essex].
Drayton: Polyolbion, xvi. (1613).

Tri'novant, London, the chief town of the Trinobantes; called in fable, "Troja Nova." (See TROYNOVANT.)

Trinquet, one of the seven attendants of Fortunio. His gift was that he could drink a river and be dry again. "Are you always thirsty?" asked Fortunio. "No," said the man, "only after eating salt meat, or upon a wager."—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Fortunio," 1682).

Trip to Scarborough (A), a comedy by Sheridan (1777), based on The Relapse, by Vanbrugh (1697). (For the tale, see FOPPINGTON, p. 381.)—A Trip to Scarborough.

Tripe (1 syl.), the nickname of Mrs. Hamilton, of Covent Garden Theatre (1730-1788).

Mrs. Hamilton, being hissed, came forward and said, "Gemmen and ladies, I s'pose as how you hiss me because I wouldn't play at Mrs. Bellamy's benefit. I would have done so, but she said as how my audience were all tripe people." When the fair speechifier got thus far, the pit roared out, "Well said, Mrs. Tripe!" a title she retained till she quitted the theatre.—Memoir of Mrs. Hamilton (1803).

Triple Alliance (The).

(1) A treaty between Great Britain, Sweden, and the United Provinces, in 1668, for the purpose of checking the ambition of Louis XIV.

(2) A treaty between George I. of England, Philip duke of Orleans regent of France, and the United Provinces, for the purpose of counteracting the plans of Alberoni the Spanish minister, 1717.

(3) Between Great Britain, Holland, and Prussia, against Katharine of Russia, in defence of Turkey, 1789.

Of course, there have been many other Triple Alliances, but the above mentioned are noted.

Trippet (Beau), who "pawned his honour to Mrs. Trippet never to draw sword in any cause," whatever might be the provocation. (See TREMOR, p. 1135.)

Mrs. Trippet, the beau's wife, who "would dance for four and twenty hours together," and play cards for twice that length of time.—Garrick: The Lying Valet (1740).

Tripping as an Omen.

When Julius Cæsar landed at Adrumētum, in Africa, he happened to trip and fall on his face. This would have been considered a fatal omen by his army, but, with admirable presence of mind, he exclaimed, "Thus take I seisin of thee, O Africa!"

¶ A similar story is told of Scipio. Upon his arrival in Africa, he also happened to trip; and, observing that his soldiers looked upon this as a bad omen, he clutched the earth with his two hands, and cried aloud, "Now, Africa, I hold thee in my grasp!"—Don Quixote, II. iv. 6.

¶ When William the Conqueror leaped on shore at Bulverhythe, he fell on his face, and a great cry went forth that the omen was unlucky; but the duke exclaimed, "I take seisin of this land with both my hands!"

¶ Similar stories are told of Napoleon in Egypt; of king Olaf, son of Harald, in Norway; of Junius Brutus, who, returning from the oracle, fell on the earth, and cried, "'Tis thus I kiss thee, mother Earth!"

¶ When captain Jean Cœurpreux tripped in dancing at the Tuileries, Napoleon III. held out his hand to help him up, and said, "Captain, this is the second time I have seen you fall. The first was by my side in the field of Magenta." Then turning to the lady he added, "Madam, captain Cœurpreux is henceforth commandant of my Guides, and will never fall in duty or allegiance, I am persuaded."

Trismegistus ["thrice greatest"], Hermês the Egyptian philosopher, or Thoth councillor of Osiris. He invented the art of writing in hieroglyphics, harmony, astrology, magic, the lute and lyre, and many other things.

Tris'sotin, a bel esprit. Philaminte (3 syl.), a femme savante, wishes him to marry her daughter Henriette, but Henriette is in love with Clitandre. The difficulty is soon solved by the announcement that Henriette's father is on the verge of bankruptcy, whereupon Trissotin makes his bow and retires.—Molière: Les Femmes Savantes (1672).

(Trissotin is meant for the abbé Crotin, who affected to be poet, gallant, and preacher. His dramatic name was "Tricotin.")

Tristram (Sir), son of sir Meliŏdas king of Li'onês and Elizabeth his wife (daughter of sir Mark king of Cornwall). He was called Tristram ("sorrowful"), because his mother died in giving him birth. His father also died when Tristram was a mere lad (pt. ii. 1). He was knighted by his uncle Mark (pt. ii. 5), and married Isond le Blanch Mains, daughter of Howell king of Britain (Brittany); but he never loved her, nor would he live with her. His whole love was centred on his aunt, La Belle Isond, wife of king Mark, and this unhappy attachment was the cause of numberless troubles, and ultimately of his death. La Belle Isond, however, was quite as culpable as the knight, for she herself told him, "My measure of hate for Mark is as the measure of my love for thee;" and when she found that her husband would not allow sir Tristram to remain at Tintag'el Castle, she eloped with him, and lived three years at Joyous Guard, near Carlisle. At length she returned home, and sir Tristram followed her. His death is variously related. Thus the History of Prince Arthur says—

When by means of a treaty sir Tristram brought again La Beale Isond unto king Mark from Joyous Guard, the false traitor king Mark slew the noble knight as he sat harping before his lady, La Beale Isond, with a sharp-ground glaive, which he thrust into him from behind his back.—Pt. iii. 147 (1470).

N.B.—Tennyson gives the tale thus:

He says that sir Tristram, dallying with his aunt, hung a ruby carcanet round her throat; and, as he kissed her neck—

Out of the dark, just as the lips had touched,
Behind him rose a shadow and a shriek—
"Mark's way!" said Mark, and clove him thro' the brain.
Tennyson: Idylls ("The Last Tournament").

 Another tale is this: Sir Tristram was severely wounded in Brittany, and sent a dying request to his aunt to come and see him. If she consented, a white flag was to be hoisted on the mast-head of her ship; if not, a black one. His wife told him the ship was in sight, displaying a black flag, at which words the strong man bowed his head and died. When his aunt came ashore and heard of his death, she flung herself on the body, and died also. The two were buried in one grave, and Mark planted over it a rose and a vine, which became so interwoven it was not possible to separate them.

(Sir Launcelot, sir Tristram, and sir Lamorake were the three bravest and best of the 150 knights of the Round Table, but were all equally guilty in their amours: sir Launcelot with the queen; sir Tristram with his aunt, king Mark's wife; and sir Lamorake with his aunt, king Lot's wife.)

¶ The story of the white and black flags is borrowed from the tale of Theseus (q.v.). After he had slain the minotaur, and was returning to Athens, the pilot neglected to hoist the white flag as the signal of success, in place of the black flag, usually carried by the ship which bore the melancholy tribute to Crete (consisting of seven youths and seven maidens) every nine years, to be devoured by the minotaur. Ægeus was king of Athens at the time, and anxiously looked out for the sign, for his own son was one of the victims. Thinking his beloved boy was devoured by the monster, he threw himself into the sea which bears his name, and perished there.

Tristram and Iseult, an idyll in three parts. Part i., a dialogue between Tristram and a page. Part ii., "Iseult in Ireland," a dialogue between Tristram and Iseult. Part iii., "Iseult in Brittany," is when Iseult is a widow, and tells her three children the tale of Merlin and Vivian.

Tristram's Book (Sir). Any book of venery, hunting, or hawking is so called.

Tristram began good measures of blowing good blasts of venery, and of chace, and of all manner of vermin. All these terms have we still of hawking and hunting, and therefore a book of venery . . . is called The Book of Sir Tristram.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 3 (1470).

Sir Tristram's Horse, Passetreûl or Passe Brewell. It is called both, but one seems to be a clerical error.

(Passe Brewell is in sir T. Malory's History of Prince Arthur, ii. 68.)

History of Sir Tristram or Tristan. The oldest story is by Gotfrit of Strasbourg, a minnesinger (twelfth century), entitled Tristan and Isolde. It was continued by Ulrich of Turheim, by Heinrich of Freyburg, and others, to the extent of many thousand verses. The tale of sir Tristram, derived from Welsh traditions, was versified by Thomas the Rhymer of Erceldoune.

The second part of the History of Prince Arthur, compiled by sir T. Malory, is almost exclusively confined to the adventures of sir Tristram, as the third part is to the adventures of sir Launcelot and the quest of the holy graal (1470).

(Matthew Arnold has a poem entitled Tristram; and R. Wagner, in 1865, produced his opera of Tristan and Isolde.)

Triumvirate (The) in English history: The duke of Marlborough controlling foreign affairs; lord Godolphin controlling council and parliament; and the duchess of Marlborough controlling the court and queen.

Triumvirate of England (The): Gower, Chaucer, and Lydgate, poets.

Triumvirate of Italian Poets (The): Dantê, Boccaccio, and Petrarch.

N.B.—Boccaccio wrote poetry, without doubt, but is best known as "The Father of Italian Prose." These three are more correctly called the "Trecentisti" (q.v.).

Triv'ia, Diana; so called because she had three faces, Luna in heaven, Diana on earth, and Hecate in hell.

The noble Brutus went wise Trivia to inquire,
To show them where the stock of ancient Troy to place.
Drayton: Polyolbion, I. (1612).

Triv'ia, or The Art of Walking the Streets of London, a poem in three books, by Gay. Bk. i. describes the "implements for walking and the signs of the weather." Bk. ii. describes the difficulties, etc., of "walking by day;" and bk. iii. the dangers of "walking by night" (1712–1715).

N.B.—"Trivium" has quite another meaning, being an old theological term for the three elementary subjects of education, viz. grammar, rhetoric, and logic. The "quadrivium" embraced music, arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy, and the two together were called the seven arts or sciences.

Trog'lodytes (3 or 4 syl.). According to Pliny (Nat. Hist., v. 8), the Troglodytes lived in caves under ground, and fed on serpents. In modern parlance we call those who live so secluded as not to be informed of the current events of the day, troglodytes. Longfellow calls ants by the same name.

[Those the] nomadic tribes of ants
Dost persecute and overwhelm
These hapless troglodytes of thy realm.
Longfellow: To a Child.

Troglody'tes (4 syl.), one of the mouse heroes in the battle of the frogs and mice. He slew Pelion, and was slain by Lymnoc'haris.

The strong Lymnocharis, who viewed with ire
A victor triumph and a friend expire;
With heavy arms a rocky fragment caught,
And fiercely flung where Troglodytes fought . . .
Full on his sinewy neck the fragment fell,
And o'er his eyelids clouds eternal dwell.
Parnell: Battle of the Frogs and Mice (about 1712).

Troil (Magnus), the old udaller of Zetland.

Brenda Troil, the udaller's younger daughter, who marries Mordaunt Mertoun.

Minna Troil, the udaller's eldest daughter. In love with the pirate.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

A udaller is one who holds his lands by allodial tenure.

Tro'ilus (3 syl.), a son of Priam king of Troy. In the picture described by Virgil (Æneid, i. 474–478) he is represented as having thrown down his arms and fleeing in his chariot "impar congressus Achilli." Troilus is pierced with a lance, and, having fallen backwards, still holding the reins, the lance with which he is transfixed "scratches the sand over which it trails."

N.B.—Chaucer in his Troilus and Creseide, and Shakespeare in his drama of Troilus and Cressida, follow Lollius, an old Lombard romancer, historiographer of Urbi'no, in Italy. Lollius's tale, wholly unknown in classic fiction, is that Troilus falls in love with Cressid daughter of the priest Chalchas, and Pandărus is employed as a go-between. After Troilus has obtained a promise of marriage from the priest's daughter, an exchange of prisoners is arranged, and Cressid, falling to the lot of Diomed, prefers her new master to her Trojan lover.

(Chaucer's Troilus and Creseide is not one of the Canterbury Tales, but quite an independent one, in five books. It contains 8246 lines, nearly 3000 of which are borrowed from the Filostrato of Boccaccio.)

Trois Chapitres (Les) or THE THREE CHAPTERS, three theological works on the "Incarnation of Christ and His dual nature." The authors of these "chapters" are Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyrrhus, and Ibas of Edessa. The work was condemned in 553 as heretical.

Trois Echelles, executioner.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward and Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Trois Eveches (Les) or THE THREE BISHOPRICS, Metz, Toul, and Verdun. They for a long time belonged to Germany, but in 1552 were united to France. Metz was restored to the German empire in 1871.

Trojan, a good boon companion, a plucky fellow or man of spirit. Gadshill says, "There are other Trojans [men of spirit] that . . . for sport sake are content to do the profession [of thieving] some grace." So in Love's Labour's Lost,

"Unless you play the honest Trojan, the poor wench is cast away" (unless you are a man of sufficient spirit to act honestly, the girl is ruined).

"He's a regular Trojan" means he is un brave homme, a capital fellow.

Trompart, a lazy but wily-witted knave, grown old in cunning. He accompanies Braggadoccio as his 'squire (bk. ii. 3), but took to his heels when Talus shaved the master, "reft his shield," blotted out his arms, and broke his sword in twain. Being overtaken, Talus gave him a sound drubbing (bk. v. 3).—Spenser: Faërie Queene (1590–6).

Trondjem's Cattle (Remember the bishop of), i.e. look sharp after your property; take heed, or you will suffer for it. The story is, a certain bishop af Trondjem [Tron'-yem] lost his cattle by the herdsman taking his eye off them to look at an elk. Now, this elk was a spirit, and when the herdsman looked at the cattle again they were no bigger than mice; again he turned towards the elk, in order to understand the mystery, and, while he did so, the cattle all vanished through a crevice into the earth.—Miss Martineau: Feats on the Fiord (1839).

Tropho'nios, the architect of the temple of Apollo, at Delphi. After death, he was worshipped, and had a famous cave near Lebadia, called "The Oracle of Trophonios."

The mouth of this cave was three yards high and two wide. Those who consulted the oracle had to fast several days, and then to descend a steep ladder till they reached a narrow gullet. They were then seized by the feet, and dragged violently to the bottom of the cave, where they were assailed by the most unearthly noises, howlings, shrieks, bellowings, with lurid lights and sudden glares, in the midst of which uproar and phantasmagoria the oracle was pronounced. The votaries were then seized unexpectedly by the feet, and thrust out of the cave without ceremony. If any resisted, or attempted to enter in any other way, he was instantly murdered.—Plutarch: Lives.

Trotley (Sir John), an old-fashioned country gentleman, who actually prefers the obsolete English notions of domestic life, fidelity to wives and husbands, modesty in maids, and constancy in lovers, to the foreign free-and-easy manners which allow married people unlimited freedom, and consider licentiousness bon ton.—Garrick: Bon Ton (1776). (See PRIORY, p. 873.)

Trotter (Job), servant to Alfred Jingle. A sly, canting rascal, who has at least the virtue of fidelity to his master. Mr. Pickwick's generosity touches his heart, and he shows a sincere gratitude to his benefactor.—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Trotter (Nelly), fishwoman at old St. Ronan's.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Trotters, a Punch and Judy showman; good-natured and unsuspicious. He is described as small in stature, very unlike his misanthropic companion, Thomas Codlin, who played the panpipes and collected the money.

His real name was Harris, but it had gradually merged into Trotters, with the prefatory adjective "Short," by reason of the small size of his legs. Short Trotters, however, being a compound name, inconvenient in friendly dialogue, he was called either Trotters or Short, and never Short Trotters, except on occasions of ceremony.—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop, xvii. (1840).

Trotty, the sobriquet of Toby Veck, ticket-porter and jobman.

They called him Trotty from his pace, which meant speed, if it didn't make it. He could have walked faster, perhaps; most likely; but rob him of his trot, and Toby would have taken to his bed and died. It bespattered him with mud in dirty weather; it cost him a world of trouble; he could have walked with infinitely greater ease; but that was one reason for his clinging to his trot so tenaciously. A weak, small, spare old man; he was a very Hercules, this Toby, in his good intentions.—Dickens: The Chimes, i. (1844).

Trotwood (Betsey), usually called "Miss Betsey," great-aunt of David Copperfield. Her bête noir was donkeys. A dozen times a day would she rush on the green before her house to drive off the donkeys and donkey-boys. She was a most kind-hearted, worthy woman, who concealed her tenderness of heart under a snappish austerity of manner. Miss Betsey was the true friend of David Copperfield. She married in her young days a handsome man, who ill-used her and ran away, but sponged on her for money till he died.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Trouil'logan, a philosopher, whose advice was, "Do as you like." Panurge asked the sage if he advised him to marry. "Yes," said Trouillogan. "What say you?" asked the prince. "Let it alone," replied the sage. "Which would you advise?" inquired the prince. "Neither," said the sage. "Neither?" cried Panurge; "that cannot be." "Then both," replied Trouillogan. Panurge then consulted several others, and at last the oracle of the Holy Bottle.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, iii. 36 (1545).

¶ Molière has introduced this joke in his Mariage Forcé (1664). Sganarelle asks his friend Géronimo if he would advise him to marry, and he answers, "No." "But," says the old man, "I like the young woman." "Then marry her by all means." "That is your advice?" says Sganarelle. "My advice is do as you like," says the friend. Sganarelle next consults two philosophers, then some gipsies, then declines to marry, and is at last compelled to do so, nolens volens.

Trovato're (4 syl.) or "The Troubadour" is Manri'co, the supposed son of Azuce'na the gipsy, but in reality the son of Garzia (brother of the conte di Luna). The princess Leono'ra falls in love with the troubadour, but the count, entertaining a base passion for her, is about to put Manrico to death, when Leonora intercedes on his behalf, and promises to give herself to him if he will spare her lover. The count consents; but while he goes to release his captive, Leonora kills herself by sucking poison from a ring. When Manrico discovers this sad calamity, he dies also.—Verdi: Il Trovatore (1853).

(This opera is based on the drama of Gargia Guttieres, a fifteenth-century story.)

Troxartas (3 syl.), king of the mice and father of Psycarpax who was drowned. The word means "bread-eater."

> Fix their counsel . . .
> Where great Troxartas crowned in glory reigns . . .
> Psycarpax' father, father now no more!
> Parnell: Battle of the Frogs and Mice, l. (about 1713).

Troy's Six Gates were (according to Theobald) Dardan, Thymbria, Ilia, Scæa, Trojan, and Antenoridês.

> Priam's six-gated city:
> Dardan, and Tymbria, Helias, Chetas, Troien,
> And Antenoridês.
> Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida (prol., 1600).

> His cyte compassed enuyrowne
> Hadde gates VI. to entre into the towne.
> The firste of all . . . was . . . called Dardanydês;
> . . . Tymbria was named the seconde;
> And the thyrde called Helyas;
> The fourthe gate hyghte also Cetheas;
> The fyfthe Trojana; syxth Anthonydês.
> Lydgate: Troy Boke (1513).

Troy'novant or NEW TROY, London. This blunder arose from a confusion of the old British tri-noukant, meaning "new town," with Troy novant, "new Troy." This blunder gave rise to the historic fable about Brute, a descendant of Æné'as, colonizing the island.

> For noble Britons sprong from Trojans bold,
> And Troy-novant was built of old Troyes ashes cold.
> Spenser: Faëry Queene, III, 3 (1590).

Trudge, in Love in a Bottle, by Farquhar (1698).

True Love Requited. (See BAILIFF'S DAUGHTER OF ISLINGTON, p. 82.)

True Thomas, Thomas the Rhymer. So called from his prophecies, the most noted of which was his prediction of the death of Alexander III. of Scotland, made to the earl of March. It is recorded in the Scotichronicon of Fordun (1430).

Trueworth, brother of Lydia, and friend of sir William Fondlove.—Knowles: The Love-Chase (1837).

Trull (Dolly). Captain Macheath says of her, "She is always so taken up with stealing hearts, that she does not allow herself time to steal anything else" (act ii. 1).—Gay: The Beggar's Opera (1727).

Trulla, the daughter of James Spencer, a quaker. She was first dishonoured by her father, and then by Simeon Wait (or Magna'no) the tinker.

> He Trulla loved, Trulla more bright
> Than burnished armour of her knight;
> A bold virago, stout and tall
> As Joan of France or English Mall.
> S. Butler: Hudibras, I. 3 (1663).

Trulliber (Parson), a fat clergyman; ignorant, selfish, and slothful.—Fielding: The Adventures of Joseph Andrews (1742).

> Parson Barnabas, Parson Trulliber, sir Wilful Witwould, sir Francis Wronghead, squire Western, squire Sullen; such were the people who composed the main strength of the tory party for sixty years after the Revolution.—Macaulay.

("Sir Wilful Witwould," in The Way of the World, by Congreve; "sir Francis Wronghead," in The Provoked Husband, by C. Cibber; "squire Western," in Tom Jones, by Fielding; "squire Sullen," in The Beaux' Stratagem, by Farquhar.)

Trunnion (Commodore Hawser), a one-eyed naval veteran, who has retired from the service in consequence of injuries received in engagements; but he still keeps garrison in his own house, which is defended with drawbridge and ditch. He sleeps in a hammock, and makes his servants sleep in hammocks, as on board ship, takes his turn on watch, and indulges his naval tastes in various other ways. Lieutenant Jack Hatchway is his companion. When he went to be married, he rode on a hunter which he steered like a ship, according to the compass, tacking about, that he might not 'go right in the wind's eye.'—

Smollett: The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle (1750).

It is vain to criticise the manœuvre of Trunnion, tacking his way to church on his wedding day, in consequence of a head wind.—Encyc. Brit. (article "Romance").

¶ Dickens has imitated this in Wemmick's house, which had flag and drawbridge, fortress and gun in miniature; but the conceit is more suited to "a naval veteran" than to a lawyer's clerk. (See WEMMICK, p. 1202.)

Trusty (Mrs.), landlady of the Queen's Arms, Romford. Motherly, most kind-hearted, a capital caterer, whose ale was noted. Bess "the beggar's daughter" took refuge with her, and was most kindly treated. Mrs. Trusty wished her son Ralph to take Bess to wife, but Bess had given her heart to Wilford, the son of lord Woodville, her cousin.—Knowles: The Beggar of Bethnal Green (1834).

Truth in a Well. Cicero says, "Naturam accusa, quæ in profundo veritatem, ut ait Democritus, penitus abstruserit."—Academics, i. 10.

(Cleanthes is also credited with the phrase.)

Tryamour (Sir), the hero of an old metrical novel, and the model of all knightly virtues.

Try'anon, daughter of the fairy king who lived on the island of Ole'ron. "She was as white as a lily in May, or snow that snoweth on winter's day," and her "haire shone as goldê wire." This paragon of beauty married sir Launfal, king Arthur's steward, whom she carried off to "Oliroun, her jolif isle."—Chestre: Sir Launfal (fifteenth century).

Trygon, a poisonous fish. Ulysses was accidentally killed by his son Telegonos with an arrow pointed with trygon-bone.

The lord of Ithăca,
Struck by the poisonous trygon's bone, expired.
West: Triumphs of the Cost ("Lucian," 1758).

Tryphon, the sea-god's physician.

They send in haste for Tryphon, to apply
Salves to his wounds, and medicines of might;
For Tryphon of sea-gods the sovereign leech is hight.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 4 (1590).

Tubal, a wealthy Jew, the friend of Shylock.—Shakespeare: The Merchant of Venice (a drama, 1598).

Tuck, a long, narrow sword (Gaelic tuca, Welsh tuca, Italian stocco, French estoc). In Hamlet the word "tuck" is erroneously printed stuck in Malone' edition.

If he by chance escape your venomed tuck,
Our purpose may hold there.
Shakespeare: Hamlet, act iv. sc. 7 (1596).

Tuck (Friar), the "curtal friar of Fountain's Abbey," was the father confessor of Robin Hood. He is represented as a sleek-headed, pudgy, paunchy, pugnacious clerical Falstaff, very fat and self-indulgent, very humorous, and somewhat coarse. His dress was a russet habit of the Franciscan order, a red corded girdle with gold tassel, red stockings, and a wallet.

Sir Walter Scott, in his Ivanhoe, calls him the holy clerk of Copmanhurst, and describes him as a "large, strong-built man in a sackcloth gown and hood, girt with a rope of rushes." He had a round, bullet head, and his close-shaven crown was edged with thick, stiff, curly black hair. His countenance was bluff and jovial, eyebrows black and bushy, forehead well-turned, cheeks round and ruddy, beard long, curly, and black, form brawny (ch. xv.).

In the May-day morris-dance, the friar is introduced in full clerical tonsure, with the chaplet of white and red beads in his right hand, a corded girdle about his waist, and a russet robe of the Franciscan order. His stockings red, his girdle red ornamented with gold twist and a golden tassel. At his girdle hung a wallet for the reception of provisions, for "Walleteers" had no other food but what they received from begging. Friar Tuck was chaplain to Robin Hood the May-king. (See MORRIS-DANCE, p. 729.)

In this our spacious isle, I think there is not one
But he hath heard some talk of Hood and Little John;
Of Tuck, the merry friar, which many a sermon made
In praise of Robin Hood, his outlaws, and their trade.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxvi. (1622).

Tud (Morgan), chief physician of king Arthur.—The Mabinogion ("Geraint," twelfth century).

Tug (Tom), the waterman, a straightforward, honest young man, who loves Wilelmi'na the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Bundle, and when he won the waterman's badge in rowing, he won the consent of "the gardener's daughter" to become his loving and faithful wife.—Dibdin: The Waterman (1774).

Tulchan Bishops (The). Certain Scotch bishops appointed in the sixteenth century, with the understanding that they were to share their stipends with their patron. A tulchan (tulka, to entice) was a mock calf set beside a cow at milking-time to induce it to give forth its milk more freely. The "see" was the cow which the patron milked; the bishop the calf, without which the "cow would yield no milk." Earl Morton, in 1571, appointed John Douglas tulchan archbishop of St. Andrew's. (See Jamieson's Scottish Dictionary; Burton's Scottish History, liv.)

Tulk'inghorn (Mr.), attorney-at-law and legal adviser of the Dedlocks.—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Tulliver, the miller in The Mill on the Floss, by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross). The heroine of the tale is Maggie the miller's daughter. Both Maggie and her brother Tom are drowned by a tidal wave on the Floss (1860).

Tully, Marcus Tullius Cicero, the great Roman orator (B.C. 106–43). He was proscribed by Antony, one of the triumvirate, and his head and hands, being cut off, were nailed by the orders of Antony to the Rostra of Rome.

Ye fond adorers of departed fame,
Who warm at Scipio's worth or Tully's name.
Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, t. (1799).

 The Judas who betrayed Tully to the sicarii was a cobbler. The man who murdered him was named Herennius.

Tun (The Heidelberg) or THE TUN OF ERPACH, a large butt, which holds four score hogsheads.

Quid vetat Erpachium vas annumerare vetustis
Miraclis? Quo non vastius orbis habet;
Dixeris hoc recte Pelagus vinique paludem;
Nectare quæ Bacchi nocte dieque fluit.
Rhenanus.

Of all earth's wonders, Erpach's monstrous tun
I deem to be the most astounding one;
A sea of wine 'twill hold. You say aright,
A sea of nectar flows thence day and night.
E. C. B.

¶ The Cistertian tun, made by the order of St. Bernard, contained 300 hogsheads.—R. Cenault: De Vera Mensurarum Ponderumque Ratione (1547).

The tun of Clervaux contained as many hogsheads as there are days in a year.—Furetière (article "Tonne").

St. Benet's tun ("la sacre botte de St. Benoist"), still to be seen at the Benedictines of Bologna-on-the-Sea, is about the same size as that of Clervaux.—Menage (article "Couteille").

"I will drink," said the friar [John], "both to thee and to thy horse. . . . I have already supped, yet will I eat never a whit the less for that, for I have a paved stomach as hollow as . . . St. Benet's boot."—Rabelais: Gargantua, t. 39 (1533).

(St. Benet's "boot" means St. Benet's bottle or "butt," and to this Longfellow refers in The Golden Legend, when he speaks of "the rascal [friar John] who drank wine out of a boot.")

Tune the Old Cow died of (The).

There was an old man, and he had an old cow,
But no fodder had he to give her;
So he took up his fiddle and played her this tune—
"Consider, good cow, consider;
This isn't the time for grass to grow,
Consider, good cow, consider."

Tupman (Tracy), M.P.C., a sleek, fat young man, of very amorous disposition. He falls in love with every pretty girl he sees, and is consequently always getting into trouble.—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

M.P.C., that is, "Member of the Pickwick Club."

Tura, a castle of Ulster.—Ossian: Fingal.

Turbulent School of Fiction (The), a school of German romance-writers, who returned to the feudal ages, and wrote between 1780 and 1800 in the style of Mrs. Radcliffe. The best known are Cramer, Spiers, Schlenkert, and Veit Weber.

Turcaret, a comedy by Lesage (1708), in which the farmers-general of France are gibbeted unmercifully. He is a coarse, illiterate man, who has grown rich by his trade. Any one who has risen from nothing to great wealth, and has no merit beyond money-making, is called a Turcaret.

Turcos, native Algerian infantry officered by Frenchmen. The cavalry are called Spahis.

Turenn. (See TOURAN, p. 1124.)

Turk Gregory, Gregory VII. (Hildebrand); so called for his furious raid upon royal prerogatives, especially his contest with the emperor [of Germany] on the subject of investiture. In 1075 he summoned the emperor Heinrich IV. to Rome; the emperor refused to obey the summons, the pope excommunicated him, and absolved all his subjects from their allegiance; he next dethroned him and elected a new kaiser, and Heinrich, finding resistance in vain, begged to be reconciled to the pope. He was now commanded, in the midst of a severe winter, to present himself, with Bertha his wife, and their infant son, at the castle of Canossa, in Lombardy; and here they had to stand three days in the piercing cold before the pope would condescend to see him. At last, however, the proud prelate removed the excommunication, and Heinrich was restored to his throne.

Turkish Spy (The), Mahmut, who lived forty-five years undiscovered in Paris, unfolding the intrigues of the Christian courts, between 1637 and 1682. The author of this romance is Giovanni Paolo Mara'na, and he makes it the medium of an historical novel of the period (1684).

(Ned Ward (1698-1700) wrote an imitation called The London Spy. See Old and New London, vol. i. p. 423.)

Turkomans, a corruption of Turkimâns ("Turks of the true faith"). The first chief of the Turks who embraced Islam called his people so to distinguish them from the Turks who had not embraced that faith.

Turn the Tables, to rebut a charge by a counter-charge, so that the accused becomes in turn the accuser, and the blamed charges the blamer. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 1201.)

> It enables
> A matron, who her husband's foible knows,
> By a few timely words to turn the tables.
> Byron: Don Juan, i. 73 (1819).

Turnbull (Michael), the Douglas's dark huntsman.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Turnbull (Mr. Thomas), also called "Tom Turnpenny," a canting smuggler and schoolmaster.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Turnip-Hoer, George I. So called because, when he first came over to England, he proposed planting St. James's Park with turnips (1660, 1714-1727).

Turnpenny (Mr.), banker at Marchthorn.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Turnpenny (Tom), also called "Thomas Turnbull," a canting smuggler and schoolmaster.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Turntippit (Old lord), one of the privy council in the reign of William III.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (1819).

Turon, the son of Brute's sister, who slew 600 Aquitanians with his own hand in one single fight.

> Where Turon, . . . Brute's sister's valiant son, . . .
> Six hundred slew outright thro' his peculiar strength;
> By multitudes of men, yet overpressed at length,
> His noble uncle there, to his immortal name
> The city Turon [Tours] built, and well endowed the same.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, i. (1612).

Turpin, a churlish knight, who refuses hospitality to sir Calepine and Serēna, although solicited to do so by his wife Blanīda (bk. vi. 3). Serena told prince Arthur of this discourtesy, and the prince, after chastising Turpin, disknighted him, and prohibited him from bearing arms ever after (bk. vi. 7). The disgraced churl now vowed revenge; so off he starts, and seeing two knights, complains to them of the wrongs done to himself and his dame by "a recreant knight," whom he points out to them. The two champions instantly challenge the prince "as a foul woman-wronger," and defy him to combat. One of the two champions is soon slain, and the other overthrown, but is spared on craving his life. The survivor now returns to Turpin to relate his misadventure, and when they reach the dead body see Arthur asleep. Turpin proposes to kill him, but Arthur starts up and hangs the rascal on a tree (bk. vi. 7).—Spenser: Faërie Queene (1596).

Turpin, "archbishop of Rheims," the hypothetical author of a Chronicle, purporting to be a history of Charlemagne's Spanish adventures in 777, by a contemporary. This fiction was declared authentic and genuine by pope Calixtus II. in 1122; but it is now generally attributed to a canon of Barcelona in the eleventh century.

 The tale says that Charlemagne went to Spain in 777, to defend one of his allies from the aggressions of a neighbouring prince. Having conquered Navarre and Aragon, he returned to France. He then crossed the Pyrenees, and invested Pampeluna for three months, but without success. He tried the effect of prayer, and the walls, like those of Jericho, fell down of their own accord. Those Saracens who consented to be baptized, he spared, but the rest were put to the sword. Being master of Pampeluna, the hero visited the sarcophagus of James; and Turpin, who accompanied him, baptized most of the neighbourhood. Charlemagne then led back his army over the Pyrenees, the rear being under the command of Roland. The main army reached France in safety, but 50,000 Saracens fell on the rear, and none escaped.

Turpin (Dick) a noted highwayman, executed at York (1739).

(Ainsworth has introduced into Rookwood Turpin's famous ride to York on his steed Black Bess. It is said that Maginn really wrote this powerful description, 1834.)

The French Dick Turpin is Cartouche, an eighteenth-century highwayman.

Tur'quine (Sir) had sixty-four of king Arthur's knights in prison, all of whom he had vanquished by his own hand. He hated sir Launcelot, because he had slain his brother, sir Car'ados, at the Dolorous Tower. Sir Launcelot challenged sir Turquine to a trial of strength, and slew him, after which he liberated the captive knights.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 108–110 (1470).

Turquoise (2 syl.), a precious stone found in Persia. Sundry virtues are attached to it: (1) It indicates by its hue the state of the wearer's health; (2) it indicates by its change of lustre if any peril awaits the wearer; (3) it removes animosity between the giver and the receiver; (4) it rouses the sexual passion, and hence Leah gave a turquoise ring to Shylock "when he was a bachelor," in order to make him propose to her. (See Thomas Nicols, Lapidary.)

Tur'veydrop (Mr.), a selfish, self-indulgent, conceited dancing-master, who imposes on the world by his majestic appearance and elaborate toilette. He lives on the earnings of his son (named Prince, after the prince regent), who reveres him as a perfect model of "deportment."—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

> The proudest departed from the cover of their habitual reserve, and from the maintenance of that staid deportment which the Oriental Turveydrop considers the best proof of high state and regal dignity.—W. H. Russell: The Prince of Tours, etc. (1877).

Tuscan Poet (The), Ludovico Ariosto, born at Reggio, in Modena (1474–1533). Noted for his poem entitled Orlando Furioso (in French called Roland).

> The Tuscan poet doth advance
> The frantic paladin of France.
> Drayton: Nymphidia (1563–1631).

Tutivillus, the demon who collects all the fragments of words omitted, mutilated, or mispronounced by priests in the performance of religious services, and stores them up in that "bottomless" pit which is "paved with good intentions."—Langland: Visions of Piers Plowman, 547 (1362); and the Townley Mysteries, 310, 319, etc.

Tutsan, a corruption of la toute saine; the botanical name is Hypericon Androsæ'mum. The leaves applied to fresh wounds are sanative. St. John's wort is of the same family, and that called Perfora'tum used to be called Fuga dæmônum, from the supposition of its use in maniacal disorders, and a charm against evil spirits.

> The hermit gathers . . .
> The healing tutsan then, and plantane for a sore.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xii. (1613).

(The plantain or plantago is astringent, and very good for cuts and other sores.)

Twa Dogs (The), a dialogue between Cæsar (a gentleman's dog) and Luath (a ploughman's collie). Cæsar says his master's table is laden with luxuries; that he spends what he likes, and travels to see the world. Luath replies that poor men eat with an appetite, which is the best sauce; sleep soundly, because toil requires rest; and as for travelling, a faithful wife and healthy family make a happy home. Cæsar concludes by saying that without doubt want of employment is a weariness to the flesh, and drives the rich to cards, dice, races, and sometimes to immoral ways. So that after all, though the poor have not the wealth and luxuries of the rich, they are contented with their station, and a very little indulgence gives them untold pleasure.

Twain (Mark), S. L. Clemens.

Twangdillo, the fiddler, in Somerville's Hobbinol, a burlesque poem in three cantos. Twangdillo had lost one leg and one eye by a stroke of lightning on the banks of the Ister, but he was still merry-hearted.

> He tickles every string to every note;
> He bends his pliant neck, his single eye
> Twinkles with joy, his active stump beats time.
> Hobbinol or The Rural Games, i. (1740).

Tweed, a cloth woven diagonally; a mere blunder for "twill."

> It was the word "tweels" blotted and ill-written on an invoice, which gave rise to the now familiar name of "tweed." It was adopted by James Locke, of London, after the error was discovered, as especially suitable to these goods so largely manufactured on the banks of the Tweed.—The Border Advertiser.

Tweedledum and Tweedledee. The prince of Wales was the leader of the Handel party, supported by Pope and Dr. Arbuthnot; and the duke of Marlborough led the Bononcinists, and was supported by most of the nobility.

> Some say, compared to Bononcini,
> That mynheer Handel's but a ninny;
> Others aver that he to Handel
> Is scarcely fit to hold a candle;
> Strange all this difference should be
> 'Twixt Tweedledum and Tweedledee.
> J. Byrom (stenographist, 1691–1763).

Twelfth Night, a drama by Shakespeare. The story came originally from a novelletti by Bandello (who died 1555), reproduced by Belleforest in his Histoires Tragiques, from which Shakespeare obtained his story. The tale is this: Viola and Sebastian were twins, and exactly alike. When grown up, they were shipwrecked off the coast of Illyria, and both were saved. Viola, being separated from her brother, in order to obtain a livelihood, dressed like her brother and took the situation of page under the duke Orsino. The duke, at the time, happened to be in love with Olivia, and as the lady looked coldly on his suit, he sent Viola to advance it, but the wilful Olivia, instead of melting towards the duke, fell in love with his beautiful page. One day, Sebastian, the twin-brother of Viola, being attacked in a street brawl before Olivia's house, the lady, thinking him to be the page, invited him in, and they soon grew to such familiar terms that they agreed to become man and wife. About the same time, the duke discovered his page to be a most beautiful woman, and, as he could not marry his first love, he made Viola his wife and the duchess of Illyria.

Twelve (The), i.e. the twelve apostles. According to tradition—

(1) ANDREW brother of Peter, bar-Jona. He was tied to a cross like the letter χ, in Patras of Achaia, by order of Egæus the proconsul (first century). His day is November 30.

(2) BAR-THOLOMEW (i.e. Nathaniel bar-Tholomew). Flayed alive in Armenia, A.D. 71. His day is August 24.

(3) JAMES the Elder, brother of John, and son of Zebedee. Beheaded at Jerusalem, by Herod Agrippa, A.D. 44. His day is July 24.

(4) JAMES, the "brother" of Jesus, probably a cousin, son of Cleopas and Mary. He was thrown from the pinnacle of the temple, and then stoned to death, A.D. 65. His day is May 1.

(5) JOHN the Evangelist, brother of James the Elder. He died at an extreme old age at Ephesus, between A.D. 95 and 100. His day is December 27.

(6) JUDAS ISCARIOT. Hanged himself, A.D. 33.

(7) JUDE or Thaddeus, brother of James the Less. Shot to death by arrows in Armenia, A.D. 80. His day is October 28.

(8) MATTHEW the Evangelist Slain by a sword in Parthia (first century). His day is September 27.

(9) PETER, brother of Andrew, bar-Jona. Crucified with his head downwards, at Rome, A.D. 66. His day is June 29.

(10) PHILIP. Hanged on a pillar at Hierapolis, in Phrygia, A.D. 80. His day is May 1.

(11) SIMON Zelotes, brother of James and Jude. Crucified in Persia, A.D. 107, at the age of 129. His day is February 18.

(12) THOMAS, surnamed Didymus. Slain in India with a spear (first century). His day is December 21.

Supplementary Apostles—

MATTHIAS, chosen by the eleven to supply the place of Judas. Said to have been first stoned and then beheaded (first century). His day is February 24.

PAUL (Saul of Tarsus), son of Simon of Cyrene. Beheaded at Rome, A.D. 66. His days are June 29 (to commemorate his death), and January 25 (to commemorate his conversion).

N.B.—It is said that Jesus, Son of Mary, was crucified April 3, A.D. 33, at about the age of 40 (the Jews said to Him, "Thou art not yet fifty years old").—Astronomical Journal, 1892.

Twelve Apostles of Ireland (The), twelve Irish prelates of the sixth century, disciples of St. Finnian of Clonard.

(1) CIARAN or KEIRAN, bishop and abbot of Saighir (now Seir-Keiran, King's County).

(2) CIARAN or KEIRAN, abbot of Clonmacnois.

(3) COLUMCILLE of Hy (now Iona). This prelate is also called St. Columba.

(4) BRENDAN, bishop and abbot of Clonfert.

(5) BRENDAN, bishop and abbot of Birr (now Parsonstown, King's County).

(6) COLUMBA, abbot of Tirdaglas.

(7) MOLAISE or LAISRE, abbot of Damhiris (now Devenish Island, in lough Erne).

(8) CAINNECH, abbot of Aichadhbo, in Queen's County.

(9) RUADAN or RODAN, abbot of Lorrha, in Tipperary County.

(10) MOBI CLAIRENECH (i.e. "the flat-faced"), abbot of Glasnooidhan (now Glasnevin, near Dublin).

(11) SENELL, abbot of Cluain-inis, in lough Erne.

(12) NANNATH or NENNITH, bishop and abbot of Inismuige-Samh (now Inismac-Saint, in lough Erne).

Twelve Knights of the Round Table. Dryden says there were twelve paladins and twelve knights of the Round Table. The table was made for 150, but as twelve is the orthodox number, the following names hold the most conspicuous places :—(1) LAUNCELOT, (2) TRISTRAM, (3) LAMORACKE, the three bravest; (4) TOR, the first made; (5) GALAHAD, the chaste; (6) GAW'AIN, the courteous; (7) GARETH, the big-handed; (8) PALOMIDES, the Saracen or unbaptized; (9) KAY, the rude and boastful; (10) MARK, the dastard; (11) MORDRED, the traitor; and the twelfth, as in the case of the paladins, must be selected from one of the following names, all of which are seated with the prince in the frontispiece attached to the History of Prince Arthur, compiled by sir T. Malory in 1470: Sirs Acolon, Ballamore, Beleobus, Belvoure, Bersunt, Bors, Ector de Maris, Ewain, Floll, Gaheris, Galohalt, Grislet, Lionell, Marhaus, Paginet, Pelleas, Percival, Sagris, Superabilis, and Turquine.

Or we may take from the Mabinogion the three "battle knights" Cadwr, Launcelot, and Owain; the three "counselling knights," Kynon, Aron, and Llywarch Hên; the three "diademed knights," Kai, Trystan, and Gwevyl; and the three "golden-tongued," Gwalchmai, Drudwas, and Eliwlod, many of which are unknown in modern story.

Sir Walter Scott names sixteen of renown, seated round the king—

> There Galaad sat with manly grace,
> Yet maiden meekness in his face;
> There Merolt of the iron mace;
> And lovelorn Tristrem there;
> And Dinadam, with lively glance;
> And Lanval, with the fairy lance;
> And Mordred, with his looks askance;
> Brunor and Belvidere.
> Why should I tell of numbers more?
> Sir Cay, sir Banier, and sir Bors,
> Sir Caradoc the keen,
> And gentle Gawain's courteous lore,
> Hector de Mares, and Pellinore,
> And Lancelet, that evermore
> Looked stol'n-wise on the queen.
> Scott: Bridal of Triermain, ii. 13 (1813).

Twelve Paladins (The), twelve famous warriors in Charlemagne's court.

(1) ASTOLPHO, cousin of Roland, descended from Charles Martel. A great boaster, fool-hardy, and singularly handsome. It was Astolpho who went to the moon to fetch back Orlando's (Roland's) brains when mad.

(2) FERUMBRAS or FIERABRAS, a Saracen, afterwards converted and baptized.

(3) FLORISMART, the fidus Achātes of Roland or Orlando.

(4) GANELON, the traitor, count of Mayence. Placed by Dantê in the Inferno.

(5) MAUGRIS, in Italian MALAGIGI, cousin to Rinaldo, and son of Beuves of Aygremont. He was brought up by Oriande the fairy, and became a great enchanter.

(6) NAMO or NAYME de Bavière.

(7) OGIER the DANE, thought to be Holger the hero of Denmark, but some affirm that "Dane" is a corruption of Damné; so called because he was not baptized.

(8) OLIVER, son of Regnier comte de Gennes, the rival of Roland in all feats of arms.

(9) OTUEL, a Saracen, nephew to Ferragus or Ferracute. He was converted, and married a daughter of king Charlemagne.

(10) RINALDO, son of duke Aymon, and cousin to Roland. Angelica fell in love with him, but he requited not her affection.

(11) ROLAND, called ORLANDO in Italian, comte de Cenouta. He was Charlemagne's nephew, his mother being Berthe the king's sister, and his father Millon.

(12) One of the following names, all of which are called paradins, and probably supplied vacancies caused by death: Basin de Genevois, Geoffrey de Frises, Guerin duc de Lorraine, Guillaume de l'Estoc, Guy de Bourgogne, Hoël comte de Nantes, Lambert prince of Bruxelles, Richard duc de Normandy, Riol du Mans, Samson duc de Bourgogne, and Thiery.

 There is considerable resemblance between the twelve selected paladins and the twelve selected Table knights. In each case there were three pre-eminent for bravery: Oliver, Roland, and Rinaldo (paladins); Launcelot, Tristram, and Lamoracke (Table knights). In each was a Saracen: Ferumbras (the paladin); Palomides (the Table knight). In each was a traitor: Ganelon (the paladin); Mordred (the Table knight), like Judas Iscariot in the apostolic twelve.

> Who bear the bows were knights in Arthur's reign,
> Twelve they, and twelve the peers of Charlemain.
> Dryden: The Flower and the Leaf.

Twelve Wise Masters (The), the original corporation of the mastersingers. Hans Sachs, the cobbler of Nürnberg, was the most renowned and the most voluminous of the mastersingers, but he was not one of the original twelve. He lived 1494–1576, and left behind him thirty-four folio vols. of MS., containing 208 plays, 1700 comic tales, and about 450 lyric poems.

Here Hans Sachs, the cobbler-poet, laureate of the gentle craft, Wisest of the Twelve Wise Masters, in huge folios sang and laughed.
Longfellow: Nuremberg.

'.' The original corporation consisted of Heinrik von Mueglen, Konrad Harder, Master Altschwert, Master Barthel Regenbogen (blacksmith), Master Muscablüt (tailor), Hans Blotz (barber), Hans Rosenblüt (armorial painter), Sebastian Brandt (jurist), Thomas Murner, Hans Folz (surgeon), Wilhelm Weber, and Hans Sachs (cobbler). This last, though not one of the founders, was so superior to them all that he is always reckoned among the wise mastersingers.

Twemlow (Mr.), first cousin to lord Snigsworth; "an innocent piece of dinner-furniture," in frequent requisition by Mr. and Mrs. Veneering. He is described as "grey, dry, polite, and susceptible to east wind;" he wears "first-gentleman-in-Europe collar and cravat;" "his cheeks are drawn in as if he had made a great effort to retire into himself some years ago, and had got so far, but never any further." His great mystery is who is Mr. Veneering's oldest friend; is he himself his oldest or his newest acquaintance? He couldn't tell.—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1864).

Twickenham (The Bard of), Alexander Pope, who lived for thirty years at Twickenham (1688-1744).

Twigtythe (The Rev. Mr.), clergyman at Fasthwaite Farm, held by Farmer Williams.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Twin Brethren (The Great), Castor and Pollux.

Back comes the chief in triumph
Who, in the hour of fight,
Hath seen the Great Twin Brethren
In harness on his right.
Safe comes the ship to haven,
Thro' billows and thro' gales,
If once the Great Twin Brethren
Sit shining on the sails.
Macaulay: Lays of Ancient Rome ("Battle of the Lake Regillus," xl., 1842).

Twin Diamonds (The), two Cape diamonds, one of which is of a clear cinnamon colour, and was found in the river-bed of the Vaal. These, with the Dudley and Stewart diamonds, have all been discovered in Africa since 1870.

Twineall (The Hon. Mr.), a young man who goes to India, intending to work himself into place by flattery; but, wholly mistaking character, he gets thrown into prison for treason. Twineall talks to sir Luke Tremor (who ran away from the field of battle) of his glorious deeds of fight; to lady Tremor (a grocer's daughter) of high birth, supposing her to be a descendant of the kings of Scotland; to lord Flint (the sultan's chief minister) of the sultan's dubious right to the throne, and so on.—Inchbald: Such Things Are (1786).

"Twinkle, twinkle, little star," etc., in sequipedalian bombast thus—

Coruscate, coruscate thy small scintillation,
Whose rationale exceeds explanation;
Exalted above this location infernal,
A Braganza to shine in the regions supernal.
E. C. B.

Twist (Oliver), the son of Mr. Brownlow's oldest friend and Agnes Fleming; half-brother to "Monks." He was born and brought up in a workhouse, starved, and ill-treated; but was always gentle, amiable, and pure-minded. His asking for more gruel at the workhouse because he was so hungry, and the astonishment of the officials at such daring impudence, is capitally told.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Twitcher (Harry). Henry lord Brougham [Broom] was so called from his habit of twitching his neck (1778-1868).

Don't you recollect, North, some years ago that Murray's name was on our title-page; and that, being alarmed for Subscription Jamie [sir James Mackintosh] and Harry Twitcher, he . . . scratched his name out?—Wilson: Noctes Ambrosianæ (1822-36).

Twitcher (Jemmy), a cunning and treacherous highwayman in Macheath's gang.—Gay: The Beggar's Opera (1727).

Twitcher (Jemmy), the nickname of John lord Sandwich, noted for his liaison with Miss Ray (1718-1792).

When sly Jemmy Twitcher had smugged up his face
With a lick of court whitewash and pious grimace,
A-vowing he went where three sisters of old,
In harmless society, guttle and scold.
Gray (1716-1771).

Two Drovers (The), a tale in two chapters, by sir Walter Scott (1827), laid in the reign of George III. It is one of the "Chronicles of the Canongate" (see p. 207), supposed to be told by Mr. Croftangry. Robin Oig M'Combich, a Highland drover, revengeful and proud, meets with Harry Wakefield, a jovial English drover, and quarrels with him about a pasture-field. They fight in Heskett's ale-house, but are separated. Oig goes on his way and gets a dagger, with which he returns to the ale-house, and stabs Harry, who is three parts drunk. Being tried for murder, he is condemned and executed.

Two Eyes of Greece (The), Athens and Sparta.

> Athens, the eye of Greece, mother of arts
> And eloquence.
> Milton.

Two Gentlemen of Verona, a drama by Shakespeare, the story of which is taken from the Diana of Montemayor (sixteenth century). The tale is this: Protheus and Valentine were two friends, and Protheus was in love with a lady of Verōna, named Julia. Valentine went to sojourn in Milan, and there fell in love with Silvia, the duke's daughter, who was promised in marriage to Thurio. Protheus, being sent by his father to Milan, forgot Julia, fell in love with Silvia, and, in order to carry his point, induced the duke to banish Valentine, who became the captain of a bandit, into whose hands Silvia fell. Julia, unable to bear the absence of her lover, dressed in boy's clothes, and, going to Milan, hired herself as a page to Protheus; and when Silvia was lost, the duke, with Thurio, Protheus and his page, went in quest of her. She was soon discovered, but when Thurio attempted to take possession of her, Valentine said to him, "I dare you to touch her;" and Thurio replied, "None but a fool would fight for a girl." The duke, disgusted, gave Silvia to Valentine; and Protheus, ashamed of his conduct, begged pardon of Valentine, discovered his page to be Julia, and married her (1595).

Two Kings of Brentford (The). In the duke of Buckingham's farce called The Rehearsal (1671), the two kings enter hand-in-hand, dance together, sing together, walk arm-in-arm, and, to heighten the absurdity, they are made to smell of the same nosegay (act ii. 2).

Two-Legged Mare (The), a gallows. Vice says to Tyburn—

> I will help to bridle the two-legged mare.
> Like Will to Like, etc. (1587).

Two Poets of Croisic, a poem by Browning (1878). The two poets are: (1) René Gentilhomme (born 1610), page to the prince of Condé. He received the title of "Royal Poet." (2) Paul Desforges Maillard (born nearly a century later). Maillard's story forms the subject of a famous play, Piron's Métromanie.

Two-Shoes (Goody), a nursery tale by Oliver Goldsmith (1765). Goody Two-shoes was a very poor child, whose delight at having a pair of shoes was so unbounded that she could not forbear telling every one she met that she had "two shoes;" whence her name. She acquired knowledge and became wealthy. The title-page states that the tale is for the benefit of those—

> Who from a state of rags and care,
> And having shoes but half a pair,
> Their fortune and their fame should fix
> And gallop in a coach and six.

Two Strings to Your Bow, a farce by Jephson (1792). Lazarillo, wanting a master, enters the service of don Felix and also of Octavio at the same time. He makes perpetual blunders, such as giving letters and money to the wrong master; but it turns out that don Felix is donna Clara, the betrothed of Octavio. The lovers meet at the Eagle hotel, recognize each other, and become man and wife.

Two Unlucky. In our dynasties two has been an unlucky number; thus: Ethelred II. was forced to abdicate; Harold II. was slain at Hastings; William II. was shot in the New Forest; Henry II. had to fight for his crown, which was usurped by Stephen; Edward II. was murdered at Berkeley Castle; Richard II. was deposed; Charles II. was driven into exile; James II. was obliged to abdicate; George II. was worsted at Fontenoy and Lawfeld, was disgraced by general Braddock and admiral Byng, and was troubled by Charles Edward the Young Pretender.

Two or Three Berries. "Yet gleaning grapes shall be left in it, as the shaking of an olive tree, two or three berries in the top of the uppermost bough."—Isa. xvii. 6.

> The tree of life has been shaken,
> And but few of us linger now,
> Like the prophet's two or three berries
> On the top of the uppermost bough.
> Longfellow: The Meeting.

Twopenny Post-bag (The). (See INTERCEPTED LETTERS, p. 525.)

Tyb'alt, a fiery young nobleman of Verona, lady Capulet's nephew, and Juliet's cousin. He is slain in combat by Romeo.—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet (1595).

The name is given to the cat in the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox. Hence Mercutio calls him "rat-catcher" (act iii. sc. 1), and when Tybalt demands of him, "What wouldst thou have with me?" Mercutio replies, "Good king of cats, nothing but one of your nine lives" (act iii. sc. 1).

Tybalt, a Lombard officer, in love with Laura niece of duke Gondibert.

The story of Gondibert being unfinished, no sequel of this attachment is given.—Davenant: Gondibert (died 1668).

Tybalt or Tibert, the cat, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498).

Tyburn (Kings of), hangmen.

Tyburn Tree (The), a gallows; so called because criminals were at one time hung on the elm trees which grew on the banks of the Tyburn. The "Holy Maid of Kent," Mrs. Turner the poisoner, Felton the assassin of the duke of Buckingham, Jack Sheppard, Jonathan Wild, lord Ferrers who murdered his steward, Dr. Dodd, and Mother Brownrigg, "all died in their shoes" on the Tyburn tree.

> Since laws were made for every degree,
> To curb vice in others as well as in me [Macheath],
> I wonder we ha'nt better company
> 'Neath Tyburn tree.
> Gay: The Beggar's Opera (1727).

Tyburnia, the district round about the Marble Arch, London. So called from the little bourne or stream named Tyburn. At one time, elm trees grew on the brook-side, and Roger de Mortimer, the paramour of queen Eleanor, was hung thereon.

Tycho, a vassal of the bishop of Traves, in the reign of kaiser Henry IV. He promised to avenge his lord and master, who had been plundered by count Adalbert, the leader of a bandit. So, going to the count's castle, he craved a draught of water. The porter brought him a cup of wine, and Tycho said, "Thank thy lord for his charity, and tell him he shall meet with his reward." Then, returning home, he procured thirty large wine-barrels, in each of which he concealed an armed retainer and weapons for two others. Each cask was then carried by two men to the count's castle, and when the door was opened, Tycho said to the porter, "I am come to recompense thy lord and master," and the sixty men carried in the thirty barrels. When count Adalbert went to look at the present, at a signal given by Tycho the tops of the casks flew off, and the ninety armed men slew the count and his brigands, and then burnt the castle to the ground.

¶ Of course, the reader will instantly see the resemblance of this tale to that of "Ali Baba, or the Forty Thieves" (Arabian Nights' Entertainments).

Tyler (Wat), a frugal, honest, industrious, skilful blacksmith of Essex; with one daughter, Alice, pretty, joyous, innocent, and modest. With all his frugality and industry, Wat found it very hard to earn enough for daily bread, and the tax-collectors came for the poll-tax, three groats a head, for a war to maintain our conquests in France. Wat had saved up the money, and proffered six groats for himself and wife. The collectors demanded three groats for Alice also, but Tyler said she was under 15 years of age, whereupon, one of the collectors having "insulted her virgin modesty," Wat felled him to the ground with his sledge-hammer. The people gathered round the smith, and a general uprising ensued. Richard II. sent a herald to Tyler to request a parley, pledging his royal word for his safe conduct. The sturdy smith appointed Smithfield for the rendezvous, and there Tyler told the king the people's grievances. While he was speaking, William Walworth, the lord mayor, stabbed him from behind, and killed him (1381). The king, to pacify the people, promised the poll-tax should be taken off, and their grievances redressed; but no sooner had the mob dispersed than the rebels were cut down wholesale, and many, being subjected to a mockery trial, were infamously executed.—Southey: Wat Tyler (1794, published 1817).

¶ Wat Tyler's story greatly resembles that of Sicily, about a century previously (March 30, 1282). The people of Palermo went as usual in procession on Easter Monday to vespers in a church a short distance from the city. The French government, suspecting rebellion, had ordered that no Sicilian (male or female) should carry any weapon, and as a certain lady of great beauty, a bride, and the daughter of a gentleman of fortune, was on her way to the church, a French soldier, named Drochet, seized her, and under pretence of searching for weapons hidden under her dress, offered her brutal and licentious violence. Her screams soon collected a crowd, and, led by the husband of the bride, the people fell on the whole French garrison. St. Remi, the French governor, fell in the massacre, and the father of the bride was set up in his place.

¶ April 4, 1282, at Catania, a young Frenchman named Jean Vigiemada, attempted to take a similar liberty with Julia Villamelli, when her husband came up unexpectedly and killed the insulter. The lady rushed through the streets, demanding vengeance, and the people put 8000 of the French to death.

Tyll Owlyglass or THYL OWLEGLASS, by Thomas Murner, a Franciscan monk of Strasbourg (1475-1536); the English name of the German "Tyll Eulenspiegel." Tyll is a mechanic of Brunswick, who runs from pillar to post as charlatan, physician, lansquenet, fool, valet, artist, and Jack-of-all-trades. He undertakes anything and everything, but invariably "spoils the Egyptians" who trust in him. He produces popular proverbs, is brimful of merry mischief, droll as Sam Slick, indifferent honest as Gil Blas, light-hearted as Andrew Boyde, as full of tricks as Scapin, and as popular as Robin Hood. The book is crammed with observations, anecdotes, fables, bon mots, and facetiæ.

(There are two good English versions of this popular picaresco romance—one printed by William Copland, and entitled The Merrye Jeste of a Man called Howlëglass, and the many Marvellous Thinges and Jestes which he did in his Lyfe in Eastland; and the other published in 1860, translated by K. R. H. Mackenzie, and illustrated by Alfred Crowquill. In 1720 was brought out a modified and abridged edition of the German story.)

To few mortals has it been granted to earn such a place in universal history as Tyll Eulenspiegel (Ulen-spee'-g'l). Now, after five centuries, Tyll's native village is pointed out with pride to the traveller, and his tombstone . . . still stands . . . at Mölln, near Lubeck, where, since 1350 [sic], his once nimble bones have been at rest.—Carlyle.

Tylwyth Teg, or the "Family of Beauty"—elves who "dance in the moonlight on the velvet sward," in their airy and flowing robes of blue and green, white and scarlet. These beautiful fays delight in showering benefits on the human race.—The Mabinogion (note, p. 263).

Tyneman (a syl.), Archibald IV. earl of Douglas. So called because he was always on the losing side.

Tyre, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, means Holland. "Egypt," in the same satire, means France.

I mourn, my countrymen, your lost estate . . .
Now all your liberties a spoil are made,
Egypt and Tyrus intercept your trade.
Pt. i. 699-707 (1681).

Tyre (Archbishop of), with the crusaders.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Tyrian Cy'nosure (3 syl.), Ursa Minor. Ursa Major is called by Milton "The Star of Arcady," from Calisto, daughter of Lyca'on the first king of Arcadia, who was changed into this constellation. Her son Arcas or Cynosūra was made the Lesser Bear.—Pausanias: Itinerary of Greece, viii. 4.

And thou shalt be our star of Arcady,
Or Tyrian Cynosure.
Milton: Comus, 343 (1634).

Tyrie, one of the archers in the Scottish guard of Louis XI.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Tyrie (The Rev. Michael), minister of Glenorquhy.—Sir W. Scott: The Highland Widow (time, George II.).

Tyrog'lyphus [the "cheese-scooper"], one of the mouse princes slain in the battle of the frogs and mice by Lymnisius ("the laker").

Lymnisius good Tyroglyphus assails,
Prince of the mice that haunt the flowery vales
Lost to the milky fares and rural seat,
He came to perish on the bank of fate.
Parnell: Battle of the Frogs and Mice, iii. (about 1721).

Tyrrel (Francis), the nephew of Mr. Mortimer. He loves Miss Aubrey "with an ardent, firm, disinterested love." On one occasion, Miss Aubrey was insulted by lord Courtland, with whom Tyrrel fought a duel, and was for a time in hiding; but when Courtland recovered from his wounds, Tyrrel reappeared, and ultimately married the lady of his affection.—Cumberland: The Fashionable Lover (1780).

Tyrrel (Frank) or Martigny earl of Etherington, son of the late earl and la comtesse de Martigny his wife. He is supposed to be illegitimate. Frank is in love with Clara Mowbray, daughter of Mr. Mowbray of St. Ronan's.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Tyrtæos, selected by the Spartans as their leader, because his lays inspired the soldiers to deeds of daring. The following is a translation of one of his martial songs :—

Oh, how joyous to fall in the face of the foe,
For country and altar to die!
But a lot more ignoble no mortal can know,
Than with children and parents, heart-broken with woe,
From home as an exile to fly.

Unrecompensed labour, starvation, and scorn,
The feet of the captive attend;
Dishonoured his race, by rude foes overborne;
From altar, from country, from kith and kin torn;
No brother, no sister, no friend.

To the field, then! Be strong, and acquit ye like men
Who shall fear for his country to fall?
Ye younger, in ranks firmly serried remain;
Ye elders, though weak, look on flight with disdain,
And honour your fatherland's call!

The Spanish Tyrtæos, Manuel José Quintana, whose odes stimulated the Spaniards to vindicate their liberty at the outbreak of the War of Independence (1772–1857).

 We can tell the marvellous influence a song which takes hold of the popular fancy has on the spirit of the people. The Marseillaise acted like magic on the French at the Great Revolution. Lilliburlero had a more powerful effect than the Philippics of Demosthenes, in 1688. Some of the Jacobite songs drove the Scotch almost mad with enthusiasm for the Young Pretender. And the music-hall doggerel, We don't want to fight, but by Jingo if we do, was very popular in the Russian war of 1878.

For "Lilli-burlēro," see Percy's Reliques, ser. iii. bk. iii. sg.

Tyson (Kate), a romantic young lady, who marries Frank Cheeney.—Wybert Reeve: Parted.

U.

Ubaldo, one of the crusaders, mature in age. He had visited many regions, "from polar cold to Libya's burning soil." He and Charles the Dane went to bring back Rinaldo from the enchanted castle.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Ubaldo and Ricardo, two men sent by Honoria queen of Hungary, to tempt the fidelity of Sophia, because the queen was in love with her husband Mathias. Immediately Sophia understood the object of their visit, she had the two men confined in separate rooms, where they were made to earn their food by spinning.—Massinger: The Picture (1629).

Ube'da (Orbaneia of), a painter who drew a cock so preposterously that he was obliged to write under it, "This is a cock," in order that the spectator might know what was intended to be represented.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. i. 3 (1615).

Uberti (Farinata Degli), a noble Florentine, leader of the Ghibelline faction. Dante represents him, in his Inferno, as lying in a fiery tomb not to be closed till the last judgment.

Uberto, count d'Este, etc.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Udaller, one who holds land by allodial tenure. Magnus Troil was a udaller, in sir W. Scott's Pirate (time, William IV.).

Ude, the most learned of cooks, author of La Science de Gueule. He says, "Coquus nascitur non fit." That "music, dancing, fencing, painting, and mechanics possess professors under 20 years of age, but pre-eminence in cooking is never attained under 30." He was premier artiste to Louis XVI., then to lord Sefton, then to the duke of York, then chef de cuisine at Crockford's. It is said that he quitted the earl of Sefton because one of his lordship's guests added pepper to his soup. He was succeeded by Francatelli.

 Vatel, we are told, committed suicide (1671) during a banquet given by the prince de Condé, because the lobsters for the turbot sauce did not arrive in time.

Udolpho (The Mysteries of), a romance by Mrs. Radcliffe (1790).

Ugo, natural son of Niccolo III. of Ferrara. His father had for his second wife Parisi'na Malatesta, between whom and Ugo a criminal attachment arose. When Niccolo was informed thereof, he had both brought to open trial, and both were condemned to suffer death by the common headsman.—Frizzi: History of Ferrara.

Ugoli'no, count of Gherardesca, a leader of the Guelphi in Pisa. He was raised to the highest honours, but the archbishop Ruggie'ri incited the Pisans against him, his castle was attacked, two of his grandsons fell in the assault, and the count himself, with his two sons and two surviving grandsons, were imprisoned in the tower of the Gualandi, on the Piazza of the Anziani. Being locked in, the dungeon key was flung into the Arno, and all food was withheld from them. On the fourth day, his son Gaddo died, and by the sixth day little Anselm with the two grandchildren "fell one by one." Last of all the count died also (1288), and the dungeon was ever after called "The Tower of Famine."

Dante has introduced this story in his Inferno, and represents Ugolino as devouring most voraciously the head of Ruggieri, while frozen in the lake of ice.

Chaucer, in his Canterbury Tales, makes the monk briefly tell this sad story, and calls the count "Hugeline of Pise."

> Oh thou Pisa, shame! . . . What if fame
> Reported that thy castles were betrayed
> By Ugolino, yet no right hadst thou
> To stretch his children on the rack . . .
> Their tender years . . . uncapable of guilt.
> Dante: Inferno, xxxiii. (1300).

> Remember Ugolino condescends
> To eat the head of his arch-enemy
> The moment after he politely ends
> His tale.
> Byron: Don Juan, ii. 83 (1823).

Ulad, Ulster.

> When Ulad's three champions lay sleeping in gore.
> Moore: Irish Melodies, iv. ("Avenging and Bright . . ." 1814).

Ula'nia, queen of Islanda. She sent a golden shield to Charlemagne, to be given as a prize to his bravest knight, and whoever won it might claim the donor in marriage.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, xv. (1516).

Ul-Erin, the guiding star of Ireland.

> When night came down, I struck at times the warning boss. I struck and looked on high for fiery-haired Ul-Erin; nor absent was the star of heaven; it travelled red between the clouds.—Ossian: Temora, iv.

Ulfin, the page of Gondibert's grandsire, and the faithful Achātes of Gondibert's father. He cured Gondibert by a cordial kept in his sword-hilt.—Sir W. Davenant: Gondibert (died 1668).

Ulien's Son, Rodomont.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Ulin, an enchantress who had no power over those who remained faithful to Allah and their duty; but if any fell into error or sin, she had full power to do as she liked. Thus, when Misnar (sultan of India) mistrusted the protection of Allah, she transformed him into a toad. When the vizier Horeb believed a false report, obviously untrue, she transformed him also into a toad. And when the princess Hemjunah, to avoid a marriage projected by her father, ran away with a stranger, her indiscretion placed her in the power of the enchantress, who transformed her likewise into a toad. Ulin was ultimately killed by Misnar sultan of Delhi, who felled her to the ground with a blow.—Sir C. Morell [J. Ridley]: Tales of the Genii, vi., viii. (1751).

Ullin, Fingal's aged bard, called "the sweet voice of resounding Cona."

Ullin, the Irish name for Ulster.

> He pursued the chase on Ullin, on the moss-covered tip of Drumardo.—Ossian: Temora, ii.

Ullin's Daughter (Lord), a young lady who eloped with the chief of Ulva's Isle, and induced a boatman to row them over Lochgyle during a storm. The boat was capsized just as lord Ullin and his retinue reached the shore. He saw the peril, he cried in agony, "Come back, come back! and I'll forgive your Highland chief;" but it was too late,—the "waters wild rolled o'er his child, and he was left lamenting."—Campbell: Lord Ullin's Daughter (a ballad, 1803).

Ul-Lochlin, the guiding star of Lochlin or Scandinavia.—Ossian: Cath-Loda, ii.

Ulric, son of Werner (i.e. count of Siegendorf). With the help of Gabor, he saved the count of Stral'enheim from the Oder; but murdered him afterwards for the wrongs he had done his father and himself, especially in seeking to oust them of the princely inheritance of Siegendorf.—Byron: Werner (1822).

ULRI'CA, in Charles XII., by J. R. Planché (1826).

Ulri'ca, a girl of great beauty and noble determination of character, natural daughter of Ernest de Fridberg. Dressed in the clothes of Herman (the deaf-and-dumb jailer-lad), she gets access to the dungeon where her father is confined as a "prisoner of State," and contrives his escape, but he is recaptured. Whereupon Christine (a young woman in the service of the countess Marie) goes direct to Frederick II. and obtains his pardon.—Stirling: The Prisoner of State (1847).

Ulri'ca, alias MARTHA, mother of Bertha the betrothed of Hereward (3 syl.).—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Ulri'ca, daughter of the late thane of Torquilstone; alias Dame Urfried, an old sibyl at Torquilstone Castle.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Ulster (The kings of). The kings of Ulster were called O'Neil; those of Munster, O'Brien; of Connaught, O'Connor; of Leinster, MacMorrough; and of Meath, O'Melaghlin.

Ul'tima Thule (2 syl.), the extremity of the world; the most northern point known to the ancient Romans. Pliny and others say it is Iceland; Camden says it is one of the Shetland Islands. It is the Gothic tiule ("the most remote land").

> Tibi serviat ultima Thulê.
> Virgil: Georgics, i. 30.

Ultimus Romano'rum, Horace Walpole (1717–1797).

Ulvfagre, the fierce Dane, who massacred the Culdees of Io'na, and having bound Aodh in iron, carried him to the church, demanding of him where he had concealed the church treasures. At that moment a mysterious gigantic figure in white appeared, and, taking Ulvfagre by the arm, led him to the statue of St. Columb, which instantly fell on him and killed him.

> The tottering image was dashed
> Down from its lofty pedestal;
> On Ulvfagre's helm it crashed.
> Helmet, and skull, and flesh, and brain,
> It crushed as millstones crush the grain.
> Campbell: Reullura (1812).

Ulysses, a corrupt form of Odusseus [O-dus'-suce], the king of Ithăca. He is one of the chief heroes in Homer's Iliad, and the chief hero of the Odyssey. Homer represents him as being craftily wise and full of devices. Virgil ascribes to him the invention of the Wooden Horse.

N.B.—Ulysses was very unwilling to join the expedition to Troy, and pretended to be mad. Thus, when Palamēdēs came to summon him to the war, he was sowing salt instead of barley.

Ulysses's Bow. Only Ulysses could draw this bow, and he could shoot an arrow from it through twelve rings.

¶ William the Conqueror had a bow which no arm but his own could bend.

¶ Robin Hood's bow could be bent by no hand but his own.

¶ Statius says that no one but Kapăneus [Kap'-a-nuce] could poise his spear—

> His cypress spear with steel encircled shone,
> Not to be poised but by his hand alone.
> Thebaid, v.

Ulysses's Dog, Argus, which recognized his master after an absence of twenty years. (See THERON, king Roderick's dog, p. 1094.)

(Rowe wrote, in 1706, the tragedy of Ulysses, founded on the old mythic story. And Tennyson wrote his poem of Ulysses in 1842.)

Ulysses and Polyphemos.

Ulysses and his crew, having reached the island of Sicily, strayed into the cave of Polyphēmos, the giant Cyclops. Soon as the monster returned and saw the strangers, he seized two of them, and, having dashed out their brains, made his supper off them, "nor entrails left, nor yet their marrowy bones;" then stretched he his huge carcase on the floor, and went to sleep. Next morning, he caught up two others, devoured them for his breakfast, then stalked forth into the open air, driving his flocks before him. At sundown he returned, seized other two for his supper, and, after quaffing three bowls of wine, fell asleep. Then it was that Ulysses bored out the giant's eye with a green olive stake heated in the fire. The monster roared with pain, and after searching in vain to seize some of his tormentors, removed the rock from the mouth of the cave to let out his goats and sheep. Ulysses and his companions escaped at the same time by attaching themselves to the bellies of the sheep, and made for their ship. Polyphemos hurled rocks at the vessel, and nearly succeeded in sinking it, but the fugitives made good their flight, and the blinded monster was left to lament his loss of sight.—Homer: Odyssey, ix.

¶ An extraordinary parallel to this tale is told in the third voyage of Sinbad the sailor. Sinbad's vessel was driven by a tempest to an island of pygmies, and, advancing into the interior, the crew came to a "high palace," into which they entered. At sundown came home the giant, "tall as a palm tree; and in the middle of his forehead was one eye, red and fiery as a burning coal." Soon as he saw the intruders, he caught up the fattest of them and roasted him for his supper, then lay down to sleep, and "snored louder than thunder." At daybreak he left the palace, but at night returned, and made his meal off another of the crew. This was repeated a third night; but while the monster slept, Sinbad, with a red-hot spit, scooped out his eye. "The pain he suffered made him groan hideously," and he fumbled about the place to catch some of his tormentors "on whom to glut his rage;" but not succeeding in this, he left the palace, "bellowing with pain." Sinbad and the rest lost no time in making for the sea; but scarcely had they pushed off their rafts when the giant approached with many others, and hurled huge stones at the fugitives. Some of them even ventured into the sea up to their waists, and every raft was sunk except the one on which Sinbad and two of his companions made their escape.—Arabian Nights ("Sinbad the Sailor," third voyage).

¶ Another similar tale occurs in the Basque legends, in which the giant's name is Tartaro, and his eye was bored out with spits made red hot. As in the previous instances, some seamen had inadvertently wandered into the giant's dwelling, and Tartaro had banqueted on three of them, when his eye was scooped out by the leader. This man, like Ulysses, made his escape by means of a ram, but, instead of clinging to the ram's belly, he fastened round his neck the ram's bell, and threw over his back a sheep-skin. When Tartaro laid his hand on the skin, the man left it behind and made good his escape.

 That all these tales are borrowed from one source none can doubt. The Iliad of Homer had been translated into Syriac by Theophilus Edessenes, a Christian Maronite monk of mount Libănus, during the caliphate of Hárun-ur-Ráshid (A.D. 786–809). (See Notes and Queries, April 19, 1879.)

The Ulysses of Brandenburg, Albert III. elector of Brandenburg, also called "The German Achillês" (1414–1486).

The Ulysses of the Highlands, sir Evan Cameron, lord of Lochiel [Lok.keel'], and surnamed "The Black" (died 1719).

 It was the son of sir Evan who was called "The Gentle Lochiel."

Umbra, in Pope's Moral Essays (Epist. i.), is intended for Bubb Doddington.

Umbra (Obsequious), in Garth's Dispensary, is meant for Dr. Gould (1699).

Umbriel' (a syl.), the tutelar angel of Thomas the apostle, once a Sadducee, and always hard of conviction.—Klopstock: The Messiah, iii. (1748).

Umbriel [Um-breel'], a sprite whom Spleen supplies with a bagful of "sighs, sobs, and cross words," and a vialful of "soft sorrows, melting grief, and flowing tears." When the baron cuts off Belinda's lock of hair, Umbriel breaks the vial over her, and Belinda instantly begins sighing and sobbing, chiding, weeping, and pouting.—Pope: Rape of the Lock (1712).

> Umbriel, a dusky, melancholy sprite
> As ever sullied the fair face of light,
> Down to the central earth, his proper scene,
> Repaired, to search the gloomy cave of Spleen.
> Rape of the Lock, canto iv. 13, etc.

U'na, truth personified. Truth is so called because it is one, whereas Error is multiform. Una goes, leading a lamb and riding on a white ass, to the court of Gloriana, to crave that one of her knights might undertake to slay the dragon which kept her father and mother prisoners. The adventure is accorded to the Red Cross Knight, and the two start forth together. A storm compels them to seek shelter in a forest, and when the storm abates they get into Wandering Wood, where they are induced by Archimago to sleep in his cell. A vision is sent to the knight, which causes him to quit the cell; and Una, not a little surprised at this discourtesy, goes in seach of him. In her wanderings she is caressed by a lion, who becomes her attendant. After many adventures, she finds St. George "the Red Cross Knight;" he had slain the dragon, though not without many a fell wound; so Una takes him to the house of Holiness, where he is carefully nursed; and then leads him to Eden, where they are united in marriage.—Spenser: Fairie Queene, i. (1590).

Una, one of Flora M'Ivor's attendants.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Unborn Doctor (The), of Moorfields. Not being born a doctor, he called himself "The Un-born Doctor."

Uncas, son of Chingachcook, surnamed "Deer-foot."—Fenimore Cooper: Last of the Mohicans; The Pathfinder; and The Pioneer.

Uncle Remus, the hero and title of a book by Joel C. Harris. Uncle Remus is represented as an old plantation darkey with great store of tales and songs illustrative of negro folklore, dealing chiefly with "Brer [i.e. Brother] Rabbit," "Brer Fox," and other animal characters—great favourites with the children of both England and America.

Uncle Sam, the United States

Government; so called from Samuel Wilson, one of the inspectors of provisions in the American War of Independence. Samuel Wilson was called by his workmen and others "Uncle Sam," and the goods which bore the contractor's initials, E·A. U·S. (meaning "Elbert Anderson, United States"), were read "Elbert Anderson," and "Uncle Sam." The joke was too good to die, and Uncle Sam became synonymous with U.S. (United States).

Uncle Toby. (See TOBY, p. 1116.)

Uncle Tom, a negro slave of unaffected piety, and most faithful in the discharge of all his duties. His master, a humane man, becomes embarrassed in his affairs, and sells him to a slave-dealer. After passing through various hands, and suffering intolerable cruelties, he dies.—Mrs. B. Stowe: Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852).

 The original of this character was the negro slave subsequently ordained and called "the Rev. J. Henson." He was in London 1876, 1877, took part in several religious services, and was even presented to her majesty queen Victoria.

Uncommercial Traveller (The), twenty-eight miscellaneous papers published by Dickens in All the Year Round, and reproduced in 1860.

Uncumber (St.), another name for St. Wilgeforte. Sir Thomas More says—

> The women hathe changed her name . . . because they reken that for a pecke of otes she will not falle to vncumber them of their housbondes.—Works, p. 195.

Underground Railroad (The), a term used in the United States as the embodiment of the various ways by which slaves from the southern states made their escape either to the north or to Canada.

Undine [Oon-deen], a water-sylph, who was in early childhood changed for the young child of a fisherman living on a peninsula near an enchanted forest. One day, sir Huldbrand took shelter in the fisherman's hut, fell in love with Undine, and married her. Being thus united to a man, the sylph received a soul. Not long after the wedding, sir Huldbrand returned homeward; but stopped awhile in the city which lay on the other side of the forest, and met there Bertalda, a haughty beauty. Sir Huldbrand and his bride invited Bertalda to go with them to their home, the Castle Ringstettin. For a time the knight was troubled with visions, but Undine had the mouth of a well closed up, and thus prevented the water-sprites from getting into the castle. In time, the knight neglected his wife and became attached to Bertalda, who was in reality the changeling. One day, sailing on the Danube, Huldbrand rebuked Undine in his anger, and immediately she was snatched away by sister sylphs to her water home. Not long after, the knight proposed to Bertalda, and the wedding day arrived. Bertalda requested her maid to bring her some water from the well; so the cover was removed, Undine rose from the upheaving water, went to the chamber of sir Huldbrand, kissed him, and he died. They buried him, and a silver stream bubbled round his grave; it was Undine who thus embraced him, true in life and faithful in death.—De la Motte Fouqué: Undine (1807).

 This romance is founded on a tale by Theophrastus Paracelsus, in his Treatise on Elemental Sprites.

Unfortunate Lady (Elegy to the Memory of an), by Pope (1717). The lady meant is supposed to be Mrs. Weston, who was separated from her husband.

Ungrateful Bird (The). The pewit or green plover is so called in Scotland.

> The green plover or pewit . . . is called 'the ungrateful bird,' for that it comes to Scotland to breed, and then returns to England with its young to feed the enemy.—Captain Burt: Letters from the North of Scotland (1726).

Ungrateful Guest (The), a soldier in the army of Philip of Macedon, who had been hospitably entertained by a villager. Being asked by the king what he could give him in reward for his services, the fellow requested he might have the farm and cottage of his late host. Philip, disgusted at such baseness, had him branded with the words, THE UNGRATEFUL GUEST.

U'nicorn. The unicorn and lion are always like cat and dog, and as soon as a lion sees his enemy he betakes him to a tree. The unicorn, in his blind fury running pell-mell at his foe, darts his horn fast into the tree, and then the lion falls upon him and devours him.—Gesner: Historiæ Animalium (1551–87).

> Wert thou the unicorn, pride and wrath would confound thee, and make thine own self the conquest of thy fury.—Shakespeare: Timon of Athens, iv. 3 (1605).

Unigenitus, the name given to the famous bull issued by pope Clement XI., in 1713, against the French translation of the New Testament with notes, by Pasquier Quesnel. It began with the words, "Unigenitus Dei Filius."

Unique (The), Jean Paul Richter, whose romances are quite unique and belong to no school (1763-1825).

Universal Doctor, Alain de Lille (1114-1203).

 Sometimes Thomas Aquinas is also called Doctor Universālis (1224-1274).

Universal Passion (The), or "The Love of Fame," by Young, 1725 (1827-8). It brought the author £3000 (worth above £5000 at the present time).

Universal Prayer (The), a paraphrase of the Lord's Prayer, by Pope (1738).

Unknown (The Great), sir Walter Scott, who published the Waverley novels anonymously (1771-1832).

Unlearned Parliament (The). The parliament convened by Henry IV. at Coventry, in Warwickshire (1404), was so called because lawyers were excluded from it.

Unlicked Bear, a lout, a cub. It used to be thought that the bear brought forth only a shapeless mass of flesh, which she licked into shape and life after birth.

> Like to a chaos, or an unlicked bear-whelp,
> That carries no impression like the dam.
> Shakespeare: 3 Henry VI. act iii. sc. 2 (1595).

Unlucky. (See M, p. 644; THIRTEEN, p. 1097; THURSDAY, p. 1106; etc.)

Unlucky Possessions, the gold of Nibelungen and the gold of Tolosa (p. 434), Graysteel (p. 445), Harmonia's necklace (p. 470), Sherborne, in Dorsetshire (p. 997), etc.

The Koh-i-noor diamond, called in India "The Accursed Stone," was supposed by the Hindus to bring ill luck to its possessor. Every owner after the sixteenth experienced misfortune. The sixteenth was assassinated; then the East India Company (after the war in the Punjaub) carried it off, but soon afterwards ceased to exist. It was then presented to the queen, and immediately afterwards lord Dalhousie (governor-general of India) died; then followed the duke of Wellington, who gave the first cutting of it; then the prince consort; and then followed the Indian Mutiny. (See p. 582.)

Unready (The), Ethelred II. (*, 978-1016).

 "Unready" does not mean "never ready or prepared," but lacking rede, i.e. "wisdom, judgment, or kingcraft."

Unreason (The abbot of), or FATHER HOWLEGLAS, one of the masquers at Kennaquhair.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Unwashed (The Great), the common people. It was Burke who first applied this term to the artisan class.

Upholsterer (The), a farce by Murphy (1758). Abraham Quidnunc, upholsterer, in St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, being crazed with politics, so neglects his business for the affairs of Europe, that he becomes a bankrupt; but at this crisis his son John, who had married the widow of a rich planter, returns from the West Indies, pays off his father's debts, and places him in a position where he may indulge his love for politics without hampering himself with business.

Ura'nia, sister of Astrophel (sir Philip Sidney), is the countess of Pembroke.

> Urania, sister unto Astrophel,
> In whose brave mind, as in a golden coffer,
> All heavenly gifts and riches lockèd are,
> More rich than pearls of Ind.
> Spenser: Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1595).

Ura'nia, daughter of the king of Sicily, who fell in love with sir Guy (eldest son of St. George, the patron saint of England). —R. Johnson: The Seven Champions, etc., iii. 2 (1617).

Ura'nian Venus, i.e. "Celestial Venus," the patroness of chaste and pure love.

Venus pandēmos or popularis is the Venus of the animal passion called "love."

Venus etaira or amica is the Venus of criminal sensuality.

Urim, in Garth's Dispensary, is designed for Dr. Atterbury.

Urim was civil and not void of sense,
Had humour and courteous confidence, . . .
Constant at feasts, and each decorum knew,
And soon as the dessert appeared, withdrew.
The Dispensary, i. (1699).

Urim and Thummim was the "stone" which gave light in the ark. Our version says that God commanded Noah to make a window, but the translation should be "to make a light." (See Paracelsus: Urim and Thumnim.)

Urim and Thummim, the spectacles given by an angel to Joseph Smith (1805–1844), founder of the Mormon sect, to enable him to read the revelation written in "reformed Egyptian" on the plates hidden at the foot of a mountain in Ontario. These spectacles are described as "two transparent stones set in the rim on a bow fastened to a breastplate." Smith deciphered the plates, and Oliver Cowdery took down the words, "because Smith was no scholar."

Urra'ca, sister of Sancho II. of Castile, and queen of Zamôra.—Poema del Cid Campeador (1128).

Urre (Sir), one of the knights of the Round Table. Being wounded, the king and his chief knights tried on him the effect of "handling the wounds" (i.e. touching them to heal them), but failed. At last, sir Launcelot was invited to try, and as he touched the wounds they severally healed.—Arthurian Romance.

¶ In the old Celtic romances a similar gift is ascribed to Finn (Fingal). Thus, in The Pursuit of Grania, Finn refuses, through love-jealousy, to convey water in the closed palms of his two hands to the dying Dermat O'Dyna, wounded in the chase, though urged thereto by the assembled heroes.

Urrie (Sir John), a parliamentary leader.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Ursa Major, Calisto, daughter of Lycâon, violated by Jupiter, and converted by Juno into a bear; whereupon the king of gods and men placed her in the Zodiac as a constellation. The Great Bear is also called "Hellicé" (see p. 99).

Ursa Major. Dr. Johnson was so called by Boswell's father (1709–1784).

My father's opinion of Dr. Johnson may be conjectured from the name he afterwards gave him, which was "Ursa Major;" but it is not true, as has been reported, that it was in consequence of my saying that he was a constellation of genius and literature.—Boswell (1791).

Ursa Minor, also called Cynosûra ("the dog's tail"), from its circular sweep. The pole-star is a in the tail.

"Why, Tom, your wife's a perfect star;
In truth, no woman's finer."
Says Tom, "Your simile is just,
My wife's an Ursa Minor."
S. C. B. (1807).

Ursel (Zedekias), the imprisoned rival of the emperor Alexius Comnênus of Greece.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

UR'SULA, mother of Elsie, and wife of Gottlieb [Got-leeb], a cottage farmer of Bavaria.—Hartmann von der Aue: Poor Henry (twelfth century); Longfellow: Golden Legend (1851).

Ur'sula, a gentlewoman attending on Hero.—Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing (1600).

Ur'sula, a silly old duenna, vain of her saraband dancing; though not fair, yet fat and fully forty. Don Diego leaves Leonora under her charge; but Leander soon finds that a little flattery and a few gold pieces will put the dragon to sleep, and leave him free of the garden of his Hesperidês.—Bickerstaff: The Padlock (1768).

Ur'sula (Sister), a disguise assumed at St. Bride's by the lady Margaret de Hautlieu.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Richard I.).

Ur'sula (Saint), daughter of Dianotus king of Cornwall (brother and successor of Caradoc king of Cornwall). She was asked in marriage by Conan [Meriadoc] of Armorica or Little Britain. Going to France with her maidens, the princess was driven by adverse winds to Cologne, where she and "her 11,000 virgins" were martyred by the Huns and Picts (October 21, 237). Visitors to Cologne are still shown piles of skulls and bones heaped in the wall, faced with glass, which the verger asserts to be the relics of the martyred virgins; but, like Iphis, they must have changed their sex since death, for most undoubtedly many of the bones are those of men and boys.—See Geoffrey: British History, v. 15, 16 (1142).

N.B.—A calendar in the Freisingen Codex notices them as "SS. XI. M. VIRGINUM," i.e. "eleven holy virgin martyrs;" but, by making the "M" into a Roman figure equal 1000, we have XIM = 11,000; so iiic = 300.

N.B.—Ursula is the Swabian ursul or hörsel ("the moon"), like Hulda in Scandinavian mythology. If this solution is accepted, then the "virgins who bore her company" are the stars. Ursul is the Scandinavian Hulda.

 Those who assert the legend to be based on a fact, have supplied the following names as the most noted of the virgins, and, as there are but eleven given, it favours the Freisingen Codex: (1) Ursula, (2) Sencia or Sentia, (3) Gregoria, (4) Pinnosa, (5) Mardia, (6) Saula, (7) Brittola, (8) Saturnina, (9) Rabacia, Sabatia, or Sambatia, (10) Saturia or Saturnia, and (11) Palladia.

N.B.—In 1837 was celebrated with great splendour the sixteenth centenary "jubilee of their passion."

Bright Ursula the third, who undertook to guide
The eleven thousand maids to Little Britain seat,
By seas and bloody men devoured as they went;
Of which we find these four have been for saints preferred,
And with their leader still do live encalendered:
St. Agnes, Cor'dula, Odillia, Florence, which
With wondrous sumptuous shrines those ages did enrich At Cullen.

Drayton: Polyolbion, XXIV. (1622).

Use of Pests. David once said he could not imagine why a wise deity should have created such things as spiders, idiots, and mosquitos; but his life showed they were all useful to him, at any rate. Thus, when he fled from Saul, a spider spun its web at the mouth of the cave, and Saul, feeling assured that the fugitive could not have entered the cave without breaking the web, passed on without further search. Again, when he was taken captive before the king of Gath, he feigned idiocy, and the king dismissed him, for he could not believe such a driveller could be the great champion who had slain Goliath. Once more, when he entered into the tent of Saul, as he was crawling along, Abner, in his sleep, tossed his legs over him. David could not stir, but a mosquito happened to bite the leg of the sleeper, and, Abner shifting it, enabled David to effect his escape.—The Talmud. (See VIRGIL'S GNAT, p. 1179.)

Used Up, an English version of L'Homme Blasé, of Felix Auguste Duvert, in conjunction with Auguste Théodore de Lauzanne. Charles Mathews made this dramatic trifle popular in England.—Boucicault: Used Up (1845).

Useless Parliament (The), the first parliament held in the reign of Charles I. (June 18, 1625). It was adjourned to Oxford in August, and dissolved twelve days afterwards.

Usnach or Usna. Conor king of Ulster put to death by treachery the three sons of Usnach. This led to the desolating war against Ulster, which terminated in the total destruction of Eman. This is one of the three tragic stories of the ancient Irish. The other two are The Death of the Children of Touran, and The Death of the Children of Lir.

Avenging and bright falls the swift sword of Erin
On him who the brave sons of Usna betrayed! . . .
By the red cloud that hung over Conor's dark dwelling
When Ulad's three champions lay sleeping in gore . . .
We swear to avenge them.
Moore: Irish Melodies, lv. ("Avenging and Bright . . ." (1814).

Uta, queen of Burgundy, mother of Kriemhild and Günther.—The Nibelungen Lied (twelfth century).

Utha, the "white-bosomed daughter of Herman." She dwelt by "Thano's stream," and was beloved by Frothal. When Fingal was about to slay Frothal, she interposed and saved his life.—Ossian: Carric-Thura.

Uthal, son of Larthmor petty king of Berrathon (a Scandinavian island). He dethroned his father, and, being very handsome, was beloved by Nina-Tho'ma (daughter of a neighbouring prince), who eloped with him. Uthal proved inconstant, and, confining Nina-Thoma in a desert island, fixed his affections on another. In the mean time, Ossian and Toscar arrived at Berrathon. A fight ensued, in which Uthal was slain in single combat, and Larthmor restored to his throne. Nina-Thoma was also released, but all her ill treatment could not lessen her deep love, and when she heard of the death of Uthal she languished and died.—Ossian: Berrathon.

Uthal or Cuthal, one of the Orkneys.—Ossian: Oithona.

"The dark chief of Cuthal" (the same as "Dunrommath lord of Uthal").

Uther or UTER, pendragon or warchief of the Britons. He married Igerna widow of Gorlois, and was by her the father of Arthur and Anne. This Arthur was the famous hero who instituted the knights of the Round Table.—Geoffrey: History of Britain, viii. 20 (1142).

Uthorno, a bay of Denmark, into which Fingal was driven by stress of weather. It was near the residence of Starno king of Lochlin (Denmark).—Ossian: Cath-Loda, i.

Uto'pia, a political romance by sir Thomas More.

The word means "nowhere" (Greek, ou-topos). It is an imaginary island, where everything is perfect—the laws, the politics, the morals, the institutions, etc. The author, by contrast, shows the evils of existing laws. Carlyle, in his Sartor Resartus, has a place called "Weissnichtwo" ["I know not where"]. The Scotch "Kennaquhair" means the same thing (1524).

N.B.—Adoam describes to Telemachus the country of Bétique (in Spain) as a Utópia.—Fénelon: Télémaque, viii.

Utopia, the kingdom of Grangousier. "Parting from Me'damoth, Pantag'ruel sailed with a northerly wind and passed Me'dam, Gel'asem, and the Fairy Isles; then, keeping Uti to the left and Uden to the right, he ran into the port of Utopia, distant about 3½ leagues from the city of the Amaurots."

(Parting from Medamoth ("no place"), he passed Medam ("nowhere"), Gelasem ("hidden land"), etc.; keeping to the left Uti ("nothing at all") and to the right Uden ("nothing"), he entered the port of Utopia ("no place"), distant 3½ leagues from Amauros ("the vanishing point") (See Maps for the Blind, published by Nemo and Co., of Weissnichtwo.)

(These maps were engraved by Outis and Son. They are very rare, and worth untold gold.)

Uzziel [Uz'-seel], the next in command to Gabriel. The word means "God's strength."—Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 782 (1665).

V.

Vadius, a grave and heavy pedant.—Molière: Les Femmes Savantes (1672).

(The model of this character was Ménage, an ecclesiastic noted for his wit and learning.)

Vafri'no, Tancred's 'squire, practised in all disguises, and learned in all the Eastern languages. He was sent as a spy to the Egyptian camp.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Vain'love, a gay young man about town.—Congreve: The Old Bachelor (1693).

Valantia (Count), betrothed to the marchioness Merida, whom he "loved to distraction till he found that she doted on him, and this discovery cloyed his passion." He is light, inconsiderate, unprincipled, and vain. For a time he intrigues with Amantis "the child of Nature," but when Amantis marries the marquis Almanza, the count says to Merida she shall be his wife if she will promise not to love him.—Mrs. Inchbald: Child of Nature. (See THENOT, p. 1092.)

Valclusa, the famous retreat of Petrarch (father of Italian poetry) and his mistress Laura, a lady of Avignon.

At last the Muses rose . . . from fair Valclusa's bowers.
Akenside: Pleasures of Imagination, ii. (1744).

Valdarno or Val d'Arno, the valley of the Arno, in which Florence is situated.

. . . from the top of Fesolê [in Tuscany],
Or in Valdarno.
Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 293, etc. (1665).

Valdes (2 syl.) and Cornelius, friends of Dr. Faustus, who instruct him in magic, and induce him to sell his soul that he may have a "spirit" to wait on him for twenty-four years.—Marlowe: Dr. Faustus (1589).

Vale of the White Horse. (See POLYOLBION, p. 861.)

Valence (Sir Aymer de), lieutenant of sir John de Walton governor of Douglas Castle.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Valentia. The southern part of Scotland was so called in compliment to Valens the Roman emperor.

Valenti'na, daughter of the conte di San Bris governor of the Louvre. She was betrothed to the conte di Nevers, but loved Raoul [di Nangis], a huguenot, by whom she was beloved in return. When Raoul was offered her hand by the princess Margheri'ta di Valois, the bride of Henri le Bernais (Henri IV.), he rejected it, out of jealousy; and Valentina, out of pique, married Nevers. In the Bartholomew slaughter which ensued, Nevers fell, and Valentina married her first love Raoul; but both were shot by a party of musketeers under the command of her father the conte di San Bris.—Meyerbeer: Les Huguenots (1836).

VALENTINE (3 syl.), one of the "two gentlemen of Verōna;" the other "gentleman" was Protheus. Their two serving-men were Speed and Launce. Valentine married Silvia daughter of the duke of Milan, and Protheus married Julia. The rival of Valentine was Thurio.—Shakespeare: The Two Gentlemen of Verona (1595).

Valentine (3 syl.), a gentleman in attendance on the duke of Illyria.—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night (1602).

Valentine (3 syl.), a gentleman just returned from his travels. In love with Cellide (2 syl.), but Cellide is in love with Francisco (Valentine's son).—Fletcher: Mons. Thomas (a comedy, before 1620).

Valentine (3 syl.), a gallant that will not be persuaded to keep his estate.—Fletcher: Wit without Money (1639).

Valentine, brother of Margaret. Maddened by the seduction of his sister, he attacks Faust during a serenade, and is stabbed by Mephistophelês. Valentine dies reproaching his sister Margaret.—Goethe: Faust (1798).

Valentine [LEGEND], eldest son of sir Sampson Legend. He has a tendre for Angelica, an heiress whom he eventually marries. To prevent the signing away of his real property for the advance of £4000 in cash to clear his debts, he feigns to be mad for a time. Angelica gets the bond, and tears it before it is duly signed.—Congreve: Love for Love (1695).

(This was Betterton's great part.)

Valentine (Saint), a Romish priest, who befriended the martyrs in the persecution of Claudius II., and was in consequence arrested, beaten with clubs, and finally beheaded (February 14, 270). Pope Julius built a church in his honour, near Pontê Molê, which gave its name to the gate Porta St. Valentini, now called "Porta del Popolo," and by the ancient Romans "Porta Flaminia."

(The 15th February was the festival of Februta Juno (Juno the fructifyer), and the Roman Church substituted St. Valentine for the heathen goddess.)

Valentine and Orson, twin sons of Bellisant and Alexander (emperor of Constantinople). They were born in a forest near Orleans. While the mother was gone to hunt for Orson, who had been carried off by a bear, Valentine was carried off by king Pepin (his uncle). In due time, Valentine married Clerimond, the Green Knight's sister.—Valentine and Orson (fifteenth century).

Valentine de Grey (Sir), an Englishman and knight of France. He had "an ample span of forehead, full and liquid eyes, free nostrils, crimson lips, well-bearded chin, and yet his wishes were innocent as thought of babes." Sir Valentine loved Hero, niece of sir William Sutton, and in the end married her.—Knowles: Woman's Wit, etc. (1838).

Valentin'ian [III.], emperor of Rome (419, 425-455). During his reign, the empire was exposed to the invasions of the barbarians, and was saved from ruin only by the military talents of Aët'ius, whom the faithless emperor murdered. In the year following, Valentinian was himself "poisoned" by [Petrŏnius] Maxĭmus, whose wife he had violated. He was a feeble and contemptible prince, without even the merit of brute courage. His wife's name was Eudoxia.—Beaumont (?) and Fletcher: Valentinian (1617).

(Beaumont died 1616.)

Valenti'no, Margheri'ta's brother, in the opera of Faust e Margherita, by Gounod 1859).

Valère (2 syl.), son of Anselme (2 syl.) who turns out to be don Thomas d'Alburci, a nobleman of Naples. During an insurrection, the family was exiled and suffered shipwreck. Valère, being at the time only seven years old, was picked up by a Spanish captain, who adopted him, and with whom he lived for sixteen years, when he went to Paris and fell in love with Elsie the daughter of Har'pagon the miser. Here also Anselme, after wandering about the world for ten years, had settled down, and Harpagon wished him to marry Elise; but the truth being made clear to him that Valère was his own son, and Elise in love with him, matters were soon adjusted.—Molière: L'Avare (1667).

Valère (2 syl.), the "gamester." Angelica gives him a picture, and enjoins him not to lose it on pain of forfeiting her hand. He loses the picture in play, and Angelica, in disguise, is the winner of it. After a time, Valère is cured of his vice and happily united to Angelica.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Gamester (1709).

Vale'ria, sister of Valerius, and friend of Horatia.—Whitehead: The Roman Father (1741).

Vale'ria (4 syl.), a blue-stocking, who delights in vivisection, entomology, women's rights, and natural philosophy.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Basset Table (1706).

Vale'rian [valĕrĕ, "to be hale"], a plant of which cats are especially fond. It is good in nervous complaints, and a sovereign remedy for cramps. "Valerian bath beene had in such veneration that no brothes, pottage, or physicall meates are woorth anything if this be not at one end." (See VALIRIAN.)

Valerian then he crops, and purposely doth stamp,
To apply unto the place that's haled with the cramp.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Vale'rio, a noble young Neapolitan lord, husband of Evanthe. (See EVANTHE, p. 347.)—Fletcher: A Wife for a Month (1624).

Valerius, the hero and title of a novel by J. G. Lockhart (1821). Valerius is the son of a Roman commander settled in Britain. After the death of his father, he is summoned to Rome, to take possession of an estate to which he is the heir. At the villa of Capito he meets with Athanasia, a lady who unites the Roman grace with the elevation of the Christian. Valerius becomes a Christian also, and brings Athanasia to Britain. The display at the Flavian amphitheatre is admirably described. A Christian prisoner is brought forward, either to renounce his faith or die in the arena; of course, the latter is his lot.

(This is one of the best Roman stories in the language.)

Vale'rius (4 syl.), the brother of Valeria. He was in love with Horatia, but Horatia was betrothed to Caius Curiatius. — Whitehead: The Roman Father (1741).

Valiant (The), Jean IV. of Brittany (1338, 1364-1399).

Valiant-for-Truth, a brave Christian, who fought three foes at once. His sword was "a right Jerusalem blade," so he prevailed, but was wounded in the encounter. He joined Christiana's party in their journey to the Celestial City.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, ii. (1684).

Valirian, husband of St. Cecilia. Cecilia told him she was beloved by an angel, who constantly visited her; and Valirian requested to see this visitant. Cecilia replied that he should do so, if he went to pope Urban to be baptized. This he did, and on returning home the angel gave him a crown of lilies, and to Cecilia a crown of roses, both from the garden of paradise. Valirian, being brought before the prefect Almachius for heresy, was executed.—Chaucer; Canterbury Tales ("The Second Nun's Tale," 1388). (See VALERIAN.)

Valjean (Jean), the hero of Les Misérables (1862) by Victor Hugo. He is an ex-convict of great strength and courage, converted through the kindness of an ecclesiastic who gave him food and lodging and then discovered him in the act of stealing the plate. He afterwards rises to a good position as a manufacturer, and becomes a municipal officer; but his enemies discover his past history and bitterly persecute him in consequence. He bears it all, together with some severe reverses, with great heroism and patience, and finally dies in peace.

Val'ladolid' (The doctor of), Sangrado, who applied depletion for every disease, and thought the best diet consisted of roast apples and warm water.

I condemned a variety of dishes, and argued like the doctor of Valladolid, "Unhappy are those who require to be always on the watch, for fear of overloading their stomachs!"—Lesage: Gil Blas, vii. 5 (1735).

Valley of Humiliation, the place where Christian encountered Apollyon and put him to flight.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, i. (1678).

Valley of Waters (The), the Mediterranean Sea.

The valley of waters, widest next to that
Which doth the earth engarland, shapes its course
Between discordant shores [Europe and Africa].
Dante: Paradise, ix. (1321).

Valley of the Shadow of Death, a "wilderness, a land of deserts and of pits, a land of drought, and of the shadow of death" (Jer. ii. 6). "The light there is darkness, and the way full of traps . . . to catch the unwary." Christian had to pass through it after his encounter with Apollyon. — Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, i. (1678).

Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me.—Ps. xxiii. 4.

Valunder, the Vulcan of Scandinavian mythology, noted for a golden arm-ring, on which was wrought all the heathen deities with their attributes. It was once stolen by Sotê, but being recovered by Thorsten, became an heirloom, and of course descended to Frithjof as one of his three inheritances, the other two being the sword Angurva'del and the self-acting ship Ellida.—Tegnér: Frithjof Saga, iii. (1825).

Farewell, and take in memory of our love
My arm-ring here, Valunder's beauteous work,
With heavenly wonders graven on the gold.

Valver'de (3 syl.), a Spaniard, in love with Elvi'ra. He is the secretary of Pizarro, and preserves at the end the life of Elvira.—Sheridan: Pizarro (altered from Kotzebue, 1799).

Va'men, a dwarf, who asked Baly, the giant monarch of India, to permit him to measure out three paces to build a hut upon. The kind monarch smiled at the request, and bade the dwarf measure out what he required. The first pace compassed the whole earth, the second the whole heavens, and the third all pandalon or hell. Baly now saw that the dwarf was no other than Vishnû, and he adored the present deity.—Hindû Mythology.

¶ There is a Basque tale the exact counterpart of this.

(See BURSA, in Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 190, for several similar tales.)

Vamp, bookseller and publisher. His opinion of books was that the get-up and binding were of more value than the matter. "Books were like women; to strike, they must be well dressed. Fine feathers make fine birds. A good paper, an elegant type, a handsome motto, and a catching title, have driven many a dull treatise through three editions."—Foote: The Author (1757).

Van (The Spirit of the), the fairy spirit of the Van Pools, in Carmarthen. She married a young Welsh farmer, but told him that if he struck her thrice, she would quit him for ever. They went to a christening, and she burst into tears, whereupon her husband struck her as a mar-joy; but she said, "I weep to see a child brought into this vale of tears." They next went to the child's funeral, and she laughed, whereupon her husband struck her again; but she said, "I truly laugh to think what a joy it is to change this vale of tears for that better land, where there is no more sorrow, but pleasures for evermore." Their next visit was to a wedding, where the bride was young and the man old, and she said aloud, "It is the devil's compact. The bride has sold herself for gold." The farmer again struck her, and bade her hold her peace; but she vanished away, and never again returned.—Welsh Mythology.

Van Tromp. The van preceding this proper name is a blunder.

"Van" before Tromp . . . is a gross mistake, . . . as ludicrous as Van Cromwell or Van Monk.—Notes and Queries, November 17, 1877.

Vanbeest Brown (Captain), alias Dawson, alias Dudley, alias Harry Bertram, son of Mr. Godfrey Bertram laird of Ellangowan.

Vanbeest Brown, lieutenant of Dirk

Hatteraick.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Vanberg (Major), in Charles XII., by J. R. Planché (1826).

Vanda, wife of Baldric. She is the spirit with the red hand, who appears in the haunted chamber to the lady Eveline Berenger "the betrothed."—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Vanderdecken, in Fitzbald's Flying Dutchman, a melodrama revived by sir Henry Irving in 1830.

Van'dunke (2 syl.), burgomaster of Bruges, a drunken merchant, friendly to Gerrard king of the beggars, and falsely considered to be the father of Bertha. His wife's name is Margaret. (Bertha is in reality the daughter of the duke of Brabant.) —Fletcher: The Beggar's Bush (1622).

Vandyck in Little, Samuel Cooper. In his epitaph in old St. Pancras Church, he is called "the Apellês of his age" (1609-1672).

The English Vandyck, W. Dobson, artist (1610-1647).

The Vandyck of France, Hyacinth Rigaud y Ros (1659-1743).

The Vandyck of Sculpture, Antoine Coysevox (1640-1720).

Vanessa, Miss Esther Vanhomrigh, a young lady who proposed marriage to dean Swift. The dean declined the proposal in a poetical trifle called Cadenus and Vanessa.

(Essa, i.e. Esther, and Van, the pet form of Vanhomrigh; hence Van-essa.)

Vanity, the usher of queen Lucifĕra. —Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. 4 (1590).

Vanity, a town through which Christian and Faithful had to pass on their way to the Celestial City.

> Almost five thousand years agone, there were pilgrims walking to the Celestial City . . . and Beëlzebub, Apollyon, and Legion . . . perceived, by the path that the pilgrims made, that their way to the city lay through this town of Vanity.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, i. (1678).

VANITY FAIR, a fair established by Beëlzebub, Apollyon, and Legion, for the sale of earthly "vanities," creature comforts, honours, decorations, and carnal delights. It was held in Vanity town, and lasted all the year round. Christian and Faithful had to pass through the fair, which they denounced, and were consequently arrested, beaten, and put into a cage. Next day, being taken before justice Hate-good, Faithful was condemned to be burnt alive.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, i. (1678).

Vanity Fair, a looking-glass.

Vanity Fair, the name of a periodical started by Mr. Thomas Gibson Bowles, aided by colonel Fred Burnaby. Shortly after its first appearance Carlo Pellegrini commenced his long series of caricatures in it; his pseudonym was "Ape."

Vanity Fair, a novel by Thackeray (1848). Becky (Rebecca) Sharp, the daughter of a poor painter, dashing, selfish, unprincipled, and very clever, contrives to marry Rawdon Crawley, afterwards his excellency colonel Crawley, C.B., governor of Coventry Island. Rawdon expected to have a large fortune left him by his aunt, Miss Crawley, but was disinherited on account of his marriage with Becky, then a poor governess. Becky contrives to live in splendour on "nothing a year," gets introduced at court, and is patronized by lord Steyne earl of Gaunt; but this intimacy giving birth to a great scandal, Becky breaks up her establishment, and is reduced to the lowest Bohemian life. Afterwards she becomes the "female companion" of Joseph Sedley, a wealthy "collector," of Boggley Wollah, in India. Having insured his life and lost his money, he dies suddenly under very suspicious circumstances, and Becky lives for a time in splendour on the Continent. Subsequently she retires to Bath, where she assumes the character of a pious lady Bountiful, given to all good works.

The other part of the story is connected with Amelia Sedley, daughter of a wealthy London stock-broker, who fails, and is reduced to indigence. Captain George Osborne, the son of a London merchant, marries Amelia, and old Osborne disinherits him. The young people live for a time together, when George is killed in the battle of Waterloo. Amelia is reduced to great poverty, but is befriended by captain Dobbin, who loves her to idolatry, and after many years of patience and great devotion, she consents to marry him.

Becky Sharp rises from nothing to splendour, and then falls; Amelia falls from wealth to indigence, and then rises.

Vanity of Human Wishes (The), a poem by Dr. Johnson, in imitation of Juvenal's Satires (1749, good).

Vanoc, son of Merlin, one of the knights of the Round Table.

> Young Vanoc of the beardless face
> (Fame spoke the youth of Merlin's race),
> O'erpowered, at Gyneth's footstool bled,
> His heart's blood dyed her sandals red.
> Sir W. Scott: Bridal of Triermain, ii. 25 (1813).

Vantom (Mr.). Sir John Sinclair tells us that Mr. Vantom drank in twenty-three years, 36,688 bottles (i.e. 59 pipes) of wine.—Code of Health and Longevity (1807).

(This would give between four and five bottles a day.)

Vanwelt (Jan), the supposed suitor of Rose Flammock.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Vapians (The), a people from Utopia, who passed the equinoctial of Queubus, "a torrid zone lying somewhere beyond three o'clock in the morning."

> In sooth, thou wast in very gracious fooling last night, when thou spokest . . . of the Vapians passing the equinoctial of Queubus.—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, act ii. sc. 3 (1602).

Vapid, the chief character in The Dramatist, by F. Reynolds, and said to be meant for the author himself. He goes to Bath "to pick up characters."

Varbel, "the lowly but faithful 'squire" of Floreski a Polish count He is a quaint fellow, always hungry.—J. P. Kemble: Lodoiska (1791).

Varden (Gabriel), locksmith, Clerkenwell; a round, red-faced, sturdy yeoman, with a double chin, and a voice husky with good living, good sleeping, good humour, and good health. He was past the prime of life, but his heart and spirits were in full vigour. During the Gordon riots, Gabriel refused to pick the lock of Newgate prison, though at the imminent risk of his life.

Mrs. Varden [Martha], the locksmith's wife, and mother of Dolly, a woman of "uncertain temper" and a self-martyr. When too ill-disposed to rise, especially from that domestic sickness ill temper, Mrs. Varden would order up "the little black teapot of strong mixed tea, a couple of rounds of hot buttered toast, a dish of beef and ham cut thin without skin, and the Protestant Manual in two octavo volumes. Whenever Mrs. Varden was most devout, she was always the most ill-tempered." When others were merry, Mrs. Varden was dull; and when others were sad, Mrs. Varden was cheerful. She was, however, plump and buxom, her handmaiden and "comforter" being Miss Miggs. Mrs. Varden was cured of her folly by the Gordon riots, dismissed Miggs, and lived more happily and cheerfully ever after.

Dolly Varden, the locksmith's daughter; a pretty, laughing girl, with a roguish face, lighted up by the loveliest pair of sparkling eyes, the very impersonation of good humour and blooming beauty. She married Joe Willet, and conducted with him the Maypole inn, as never country inn was conducted before. They greatly prospered, and had a large and happy family. Dolly dressed in the Watteau style; and modern Watteau costume and hats were, in 1875–6, called "Dolly Vardens."—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Vari'na, Miss Jane Waryng, to whom dean Swift had a penchant when he was a young man. Varina is a Latinized form of "Waryng."

Varney (Richard, afterwards sir Richard), master of the horse to the earl of Leicester.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Varro (The British). Thomas Tusser, of Essex, is so called by Warton (1515–1580).

Vasa (Gustavus), a drama, by H. Brooke (1730). Gustavus, having effected his escape from Denmark, worked for a time as a common labourer in the coppermines of Dalecarlia [Dah'-le-karl'-ya]; but the tyranny of Christian II. of Denmark having driven the Dalecarlians into revolt, Gustavus was chosen their leader. The revolters made themselves masters of Stockholm; Christian abdicated; and Sweden became an independent kingdom (sixteenth century).

Vashti. When the heart of the king [Ahasuerus] was merry with wine, he commanded his chamberlains to bring Vashti, the queen, into the banquet-hall, to show the guests her beauty; but she refused to obey the insulting order, and the king, being wroth, divorced her.—Esth. i. 10, 19.

> O Vashti, noble Vashti! Summoned out,
> She kept her state, and left the drunken king
> To brawl at Shushan underneath the palms.
> Tennyson: The Princess, iii. (1850).

Vatel, the cook who killed himself because the lobster for his turbot sauce did not arrive in time to be served up at the banquet at Chantilly, given by the prince de Condé to the king.

Vath'ek, the ninth caliph of the race of the Abassides, son of Motassem, and grandson of Haroun-al-Raschid. When angry, "one of his eyes became so terrible that whoever looked at it either swooned or died." Vathek was induced by a malignant genius to commit all sorts of crimes. He abjured his faith, and bound himself to Eblis, under the hope of obtaining the throne of the pre-Adamite sultans. This throne eventually turned out to be a vast chamber in the abyss of Eblis, where Vathek found himself a prisoner without hope. His wife was Nouron'ihar, daughter of the emir Fakreddin, and his mother's name was Catharis.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Vathek's Daughter, a red-and-yellow mixture given him by an emissary of Eblis, which instantaneously restored the exhausted body, and filled it with delight. —Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Vato, the wind-spirit.

Even Zoroaster imagined there was an evil spirit, called Vato, that could excite violent storms of wind. —T. Row [i.e. Dr. Pegge]: Gentleman's Magazine, January, 1763.

Vaudeville (Father of the), Oliver Basselin (fifteenth century).

Vaughan, the bogie of Bromyard, exorcised by nine priests. Nine candles were lighted in the ceremony, and all but one burnt out. The priests consigned Nicholas Vaughan to the Red Sea; and, casting the remaining candle into the river Frome, threw a huge stone over it, and forbade the bogie to leave the Red Sea till that candle reappeared to human sight. The stone is still called "Vaughan's Stone."

Vaugirard (The Deputies of). The usher announced to Charles VIII. of France, "The deputies of Vaugirard." "How many?" asked the king. "Only one, may it please your highness."

¶ Canning says that three tailors of Tooley Street, Southwark, addressed a petition of grievances to the House, beginning, "We, the people of England."

Vauxhall. The premises in the manor of Vauxhall were the property of Jane Vaux in 1615, and the house was then called "Stockdens." From her it passed through various hands, till it became the property of Mr. Tyers in 1752. "The Spring Gardens at Vauxhall" are mentioned in the Spectator as a place of great resort in 1711; but it is generally thought that what we call "Vauxhall Gardens" were opened for public amusement in 1730.

The tradition that Vauxhall was the property of Guy Fawkes (hence the name of "Fauxeshall") is erroneous.—Lord W. Lennox: Celebrities, etc., I. 242.

Vauxhall Slice (A), a slice of meat, especially ham, as thin as it is possible to cut it.

Slices of pale coloured, stale, dry ham cut so thin that a "Vauxhall slice" became proverbial.—Lord W. Lennox: Celebrities, etc., I. vii.

V. D. M. I. E., Verbum Dei manet in æternum ("the Word of God endureth for ever"). This was the inscription of the Lutheran bishops in the diet of Spires. Philip of Hessen said the initials stood for Verbum diaboli manet in episcopis ("the word of the devil abideth in the [Lutheran] bishops").

Veal (Mrs.), an imaginary person, whom Defoe feigned to have appeared, the day after her death, to Mrs. Bargrave of Canterbury, on September 8, 1705.

Defoe's conduct in regard to the well-known imposture, Mrs. Veal's ghost, would justify us in believing him to be, like Gil Blas, "tant soit peu fripon."—Encyclopædia Britannica (article "Romance").

Mrs. Veal's Apparition. It is said that Mrs. Veal, the day after her death, appeared to Mrs. Bargrave, at Canterbury, September 8, 1705. This cock-and-bull story was affixed by Daniel Defoe to Drelincourt's book of Consolations against the Fears of Death, and such is the matter-of-fact style of the narrative that most readers thought the fiction was a fact.

Vec'chio (Peter), a teacher of music and Latin; reputed to be a wizard.—Fletcher: The Chances (1620).

Veck (Toby), nicknamed "Trotty;" a ticket-porter, who ran on errands. One New Year's Eve he ate tripe for dinner, and had a nightmare, in which he fancied he had mounted up to the steeple of a neighbouring church, and that goblins issued out of the bells, giving reality to his hopes and fears. He was roused from his sleep by the sound of the bells ringing in the new year. (See MEG, p. 692.)—Dickens: The Chimes (1844).

Vectis, or Vecta, a Latin form of the "Isle of Wight." Pliny (Nat. Hist., iv. 30) calls it Vectis. This island was called Wyth, or Gwyth, or Guith (a channel) by the Britons, the channel being the Solent.

Of Thames, or Medway's vale, or the green banks
Of Vecta, she her thundering navy leads.
Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads, 141, 142 (1767).

Veglíantino [Val-yan-tee-no], Orlando's horse.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516). Also called Veillantif.

Vehmgericht or THE HOLY VEHME, a secret tribunal of Westphalia, the principal seat of which was in Dortmund. The members were called "Free Judges." It took cognizance of all crimes in the lawless period of the Middle Ages, and those condemned by the tribunal were made away with by some secret means, but no one knew by what hand. Being despatched, the dead body was hung on a tree to advertise the fact and deter others. The tribunal existed at the time of Charlemagne, but was at its zenith of power in the twelfth century. Scott has introduced it in his Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Was Rebecca guilty or not? The Vehmgericht of the servants' hall pronounced against her.—Thackeray: Vanity Fair, xliv. (1848).

Vehmique Tribunal (The), or the Secret Tribunal, or the court of the Holy Vehme, said to have been founded by Charlemagne.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Veil of St. Agatha, a miraculous veil belonging to St. Agatha, and deposited in the church of the city of Catania, in Sicily, where the saint suffered martyrdom. "It is a sure defence against the eruptions of mount Etna." It is very true that the church itself was overwhelmed with lava in 1693, and some 20,000 of the inhabitants perished; but that was no fault of the veil, which would have prevented it if it could. Happily, the veil was recovered, and is still believed in by the people.

Veilchen (Annette), attendant of Anne of Geierstein.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Veiled Prophet of Khorassan (The), Hakim ben Allah, surnamed Mokanna or "The Veiled," founder of an Arabic sect in the eighth century. He wore a veil to conceal his face, which had been greatly disfigured in battle. He gave out that he had been Adam, Noah, Abraham, and Moses. When the sultan Mahadi marched against him, he poisoned all his followers at a banquet, and then threw himself into a cask containing a burning acid, which entirely destroyed him.

 Thomas Moore has made this the subject of a poetical tale in his Lalla Rookh ("The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan," 1817).

There, on that throne, . . . sat the prophet-chief,
The great Mokanna. O'er his features hung
The veil, the silver veil, which he had flung
In mercy there, to hide from mortal sight
His dazzling brow, till man could bear its light.

* * * * *

"'Tis time these features were uncurtained [now].
This brow, whose light—oh, rare celestial light!—
Hath been reserved to bless thy favoured sight . . .
Turn now and look; then wonder, if thou wilt,
That I should hate, should take revenge, by guilt,
Upon the hand whose mischief or whose mirth
Sent me thus maimed and monstrous upon earth . . .
Here—judge if hell, with all its power to damn,
Can add one curse to the foul thing I am!"
He raised the veil; the maid turned slowly round,
Looked at him, shrieked, and sunk upon the ground.
Moore: The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan.

Veipsey, an intermittent spring in Yorkshire, called "prophetic" because, when unusually high, it foretells a coming dearth.

Then my prophetic spring at Veipsey I may show,
That some years is dried up, some years again doth flow;
But when it breaketh out with an immoderate birth,
It tells the following year of a penurious dearth.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxviii. (1622).

Velasquez, the Spanish governor of Portugal in 1640, when the people, led by don Juan duke of Braganza, rose in rebellion, shook off the Spanish yoke, and established the duke on the throne, under the name and title of Juan or John IV. The same dynasty still continues. Velasquez was torn to pieces by the mob. The duchess calls him a

Discerning villain,
Subtle, insidious, false, and plausible;
He can with ease assume all outward forms . . .
While with the lynx's beam he penetrates
The deep reserve of every other breast.
Jephson: Braganza, ii. 2 (1785).

Velinspeck, a country manager, to whom Matthew Stuffy makes application for the post of prompter.—Charles Mathews: At Home (1818).

Vellum, in Addison's comedy The Drummer (1715).

Velvet (The Rev. Morphine), a popular preacher, who feeds his flock on eau sucrée and wild honey. He assures his hearers that the way to heaven might once be thorny and steep, but now "every hill is brought low, every valley is filled up, the crooked ways are made straight, and even in the valley of the shadow of death they need fear no evil, for One will be with them to comfort them."

Venedo'tia, Wales.

The Venedotian floods, that ancient Britons were,
The mountains kept them back.
Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1613).

Veneering (Mr.), a new man, "forty, wavy-haired, dark, tending to corpulence, sly, mysterious, filmy; a kind of well-looking veiled prophet, not prophesying." He was a drug merchant of the firm of Chicksey, Stobbles, and Veneering. The two former were his quondam masters, but their names had "become absorbed in Veneering, once their traveller or commission agent."

Mrs. Veneering, a new woman, "fair, aquiline-nosed and fingered, not so much light hair as she might have, gorgeous in raiment and jewels, enthusiastic, propitiatory, conscious that a corner of her husband's veil is over herself."

Mr. and Mrs. Veneering were bran-new people, in a bran-new house, in a bran-new quarter of London. Everything about the Veneerings was spick and span new. All their furniture was new, all their friends were new, all their servants were new, their plate was new, their carriage was new, their harness was new, their horses were new, their pictures were new, they themselves were new, they were as newly married as was lawfully compatible with their having a bran-new baby.

In the Veneering establishment, from the hall chairs with the new coat of arms, to the grand pianoforte with the new action, and upstairs again to the new fire-escape, all things were in a state of high varnish and polish.—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend, ii. (1864).

The Veneerings of society, flashy, rich merchants, who delight to overpower their guests with the splendour of their furniture, the provisions of their tables, and the jewels of their wives and daughters.

Venerable Bede (The). Two accounts are given respecting the word venerable attached to the name of this "wise Saxon." One is this: On one occasion he preached to a heap of stones, thinking himself in a church; and the stones were so affected by his eloquence that they exclaimed, "Amen, venerable Bede!" This, of course, is based on the verse Luke xix. 40.

The other is that his scholars, wishing to honour his name, wrote for epitaph—

Hæc sunt in fossa,
Bedæ presbyteri ossa;

but an angel changed the second line into "Bedæ venerabilis ossa" (672–735).

(The chair in which he sat is still preserved at Jarrow. Some years ago a sailor used to show it, and always called it the chair of the "great admiral Bede.")

Venerable Doctor (The), William de Champeaux (*–1121).

Venerable Initiator (The), William of Occam (1276–1347).

Venery. Sir Tristram was the inventor of the laws and terms of venery. Hence a book of venery was called A Book of Tristram.

Of sir Tristram came all the good terms of venery and of hunting; and the sizes and measures of blowing of an horn. And of him we had first all the terms of hawking; and which were beasts of chase and beasts of venery, and which were vermin; and all the blasts that belong to all manner of games. First to the uncoupling, to the seeking, to the rechase, to the fight, to the death, and to the strake; and many other blasts and terms shall all manner of gentlemen have cause to the world's end to praise sir Tristram, and to pray for his soul.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 158 (1470).

Vengeur (Le). (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 1269.)

Venice (The Stones of), by Ruskin (1851).

Venice Glass. The drinking-glasses of the Middle Ages made of Venice glass were said to possess the peculiar property of breaking into shivers if poison were put into them.

'Tis said that our Venetian crystal has Such pure antipathy to poison, as
To burst, if aught of venom touches it.
Byron: The Two Foscari, v. 1 (1820).

Venice Preserved, a tragedy by T. Otway (1682). A conspiracy was formed by Renault a Frenchman, Elliot an Englishman, Bedamar, Pierre, and others, to murder the Venetian senate. Jaffier was induced by his friend Pierre to join the conspirators, and gave his wife as hostage of his good faith. As Renault most grossly insulted the lady, Jaffier took her away, when she persuaded her husband to reveal the plot to her father Priuli, under the promise of a general amnesty. The senate violated the promise made by Priuli, and commanded all the conspirators except Jaffier to be broken on the wheel. Jaffier, to save his friend Pierre from the torture, stabbed him, and then himself. Belvidera went mad and died.

Venice of the East, Bangkok, capital of Burmah.

Venice of the North, Stockholm (Sweden). Sometimes Amsterdam is so called, from its numerous water-courses and the opulence of its citizens. It has 290 bridges.

They went to the city of Amsterdam, the Venice of the North.—The Dragonades, I.

Venice of the West, Glasgow.

Another element in the blazon of the Venice of the West is a fish laid across the stem of the tree.—Burton.

(See FISH AND THE RING, p. 370.)

Venison (The Haunch of), a poetical epistle to lord Clare, by Goldsmith (1765).

Ventid'ius, an Athenian imprisoned for debt. Timon paid his debt, and set him free. Not long after, the father of Ventidius died, leaving a large fortune, and the young man offered to refund the loan; but Timon declined the offer, saying the loan was a free gift. When Timon got into difficulties, he applied to Ventidius for aid; but Ventidius, like the rest, was "found base metal," and "denied him."—Shakespeare: Timon of Athens (1609).

Ventid'ius, the general of Marc Antony.

 The master scene between Ventidius and Antony in this tragedy is copied from The Maid's Tragedy (by Beaumont and Fletcher), Ventidius being the "Melantius" of Beaumont and Fletcher's drama.—Dryden: All for Love or the World Well Lost (1678).

Ventriloquist. The best that ever lived was Brabant, the engastrimisth of François I. of France.

VENUS (Paintings of). VENUS ANADYOM'ENÊ or Venus rising from the sea and wringing her golden tresses, by Apellês. Apellês also put his name to a "Sleeping Venus." Tradition says that Campaspê (afterwards his wife) was the model of his Venus.

THE RHODIAN VENUS, referred to by Campbell, in his Pleasures of Hope, ii., is the Venus spoken of by Pliny, xxxv. 10, from which Shakespeare has drawn his picture of Cleopatra in her barge (Antony and Cleopatra, act ii. sc. 2). The Rhodian was Protog'enês.

> When first the Rhodian's mimic art arrayed
> The queen of Beauty in her Cyprian shade,
> The happy master mingled in his piece
> Each look that charmed him in the fair of Greece . . .
> Love on the picture smiled. Expression poured
> Her mingling spirit there, and Greece adored.
> Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, ii. (1799).

Statues of Venus. (1) THE CNIDIAN VENUS, a nude statue, by Praxitêlês, bought by the Cnidians.

(2) THE COAN VENUS, a draped statue, by Praxitêlês, bought by the Coans.

(3) THE VENUS DE' MEDICI, a statue dug up in several pieces at Hadrian's villa, near Tiv'oli (seventeenth century), and placed for a time in the Medici palace at Rome, whence its name. It was the work of Cleom'enês the Athenian. All one arm and part of the other were restored by Bandinelli. In 1680 this statue was removed to the Uffizi gallery at Florence. It was removed to Paris by Napoleon, but was afterwards restored.

(4) THE VENUS OF ARLES, with a mirror in the right hand and an apple in the left. This statue is ancient, but the mirror and apple are by Girardin.

(5) THE VENUS OF MILO. The "Venus Victorious" is called the "Venus of Milo," because it was brought from the island of Milo, in the Ægêan Sea, by admiral Dumont d'Urville in 1820. It is one of the chefs d'œuvre of antiquity, and is now in the Louvre of Paris.

(6) THE PAULINE VENUS, by Canôva. Modelled from Pauline Bonaparte, princess Borghese.

> I went by chance into the room of the Pauline Venus; my mouth will taste bitter all day. How venial! how gaudy and vile she is with her gilded upholstery! It is the most hateful thing that ever wasted marble.—Ouida: Ariadné, i. 1.

(7) THE VENUS PANDĒMOS, the sensual and vulgar Venus (Greek, pan-dêmos, for the vulgar or populace generally); as opposed to the "Uranian Venus," the beau-ideal of beauty and loveliness.

> Amongst the deities from the upper chamber a mortal came, the light, lewd woman, who had bared her charms to live for ever here in marble, in counterfeit of the Venus Pandêmos.—Ouida: Ariadné, i. 2.

The Venus of Praxitêlês. (See above.)

(8) GIBSON'S VENUS, slightly tinted, was shown in the International Exhibition of 1862.

Venus, the highest throw with the four tali or three tesseræ. The best cast of the tali (or four-sided dice) was four different numbers; but the best cast of the tesseræ (or ordinary dice) was three sixes. The worst throw was called canis —three aces in tesseræ and four aces in tali.

Venus (The Isle of), a paradise created by "Divine Love" for the Lusian heroes. Here Uranian Venus gave Vasco da Gama the empire of the sea. This isle is not far from the mountains of Imâus, whence the Ganges and Indus derive their source. —Camoëns: Lusiad, ix. (1572).

(Similar descriptions of paradise are: "the gardens of Alcinôus" (Odyssey, vii.); "the island of Circê" (Odyssey, x.); Virgil's "Elysium" (Æneid, vi.); "the island and palace of Alci'na" (Orlando Furioso, vi., vii.); "the country of Logistilla" (Orlando Furioso, x.); "Paradise," visited by Astolpho (Orlando Furioso, xxxiv.); "the island of Armi'da" (Jerusalem Delivered); "the bower of Acrasia" (Faërie Queene); "the palace with its forty doors" (Arabian Nights, "Third Calender," etc.).

Venus (Ura'nian), the impersonation of divine love; the presiding deity of the Lusians.—Camoëns: Lusiad (1572).

Venus and Adonis. Adônis, a most beautiful boy, was greatly beloved by Venus and Proserpine. Jupiter decided that he should live four months with one and four months with the other goddess, and the rest of the year he might do what he liked. One day he was killed by a wild boar during a chase, and Venus was so inconsolable at the loss that the infernal gods allowed the boy to spend six months of the year with Venus on the earth, but the other six he was to spend in hell. Of course, this is an allegory of the sun, which is six months above and six months below the equator.

(Shakespeare has a poem called Venus and Adonis (1593), in which Adonis is made cold and passionless, but Venus ardent and sensual.)

Venus of Cleom'enes (4 syl.), now called the "Venus de' Medici" or "Venus de Medicis."

Venus of the Forest (The). The ash tree is so called by Gilpin.

Venusberg, the mountain of fatal delights. Here Tannhäuser tarried, and when pope Urban refused to grant him absolution, he returned thither, to be never more seen.—German Legend.

Verdant Green. (See GREEN, p. 447.)

Ver'done (2 syl.), nephew to Champernal the husband of Lami'ra.—Fletcher: The Little French Lawyer (1647).

Verdugo, captain under the governor of Segovia.—Fletcher: The Pilgrim (1621).

Vere (Mr. Richard), laird of Elliestaw, a Jacobite conspirator.

Miss Isabella Vere, the laird's daughter. She marries young Patrick Earnscliffe laird of Earnscliffe.—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Vere (Sir Arthur de), son of the earl of Oxford. He first appears under the assumed name of Arthur Philipson.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Verges (2 syl.), an old-fashioned constable and night-watch, noted for his blundering simplicity. — Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing (1600).

Vergiv'ian Sea, that part of St. George's Channel where tides out of the north and south seas meet. The Irish Sea is sometimes so called.

> . . . bears his boisterous waves into the narrower mouth
> Of the Vergivian Sea; where meeting, from the south,
> Great Neptune's surlier tides, with their robustious shocks
> Each other shoulder up against the grisely rocks.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, x. (1612).

Vergob'retus, a dictator selected by the druids, and possessed of unlimited power both in war and state during times of great danger.

> This temporary king or vergobretus laid down his office at the end of the war.—Dissertation on the Era of Ossian.

Verisopht (Lord Frederick), weak and silly, but far less vicious than his bear-leader, sir Mulberry Hawk. He drawled in his speech, and was altogether "very soft." Ralph Nickleby introduced his niece Kate to the young nobleman at a bachelors' dinner-party, hoping to make of the introduction a profitable investment, but Kate was far too modest and virtuous to aid him in his scheme.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Vermilion Sea (The), the gulf of California.

Vernon (Diana), niece of sir Hildebrand Osbaldistone. She has great beauty, sparkling talents, an excellent disposition, high birth, and is an enthusiastic adherent of an exiled king. She marries Frank Osbaldistone.

Sir Frederick Vernon, father of Diana, a political intriguer, called "his excellency the earl of Beauchamp." He first appears as father Vaughan [Vawn].—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Ver'olame (3 syl.) or VERULAM, "a stately nymph" of Isis. Seeing her stream besmeared with the blood of St. Alban, she prayed that it might be diverted into another channel, and her prayer was granted. The place where St. Alban was executed was at that time called Holmhurst.—Robert of Gloucester: Chronicle (in verse), 57 (thirteenth century).

(A poetical account of this legend is also given by W. Browne, in his Britannia's Pastorals, iv., 1613.)

Veron'ica, the maiden who handed her handkerchief to Jesus on His way to Calvary. The "Man of sorrows" wiped His face with it, returned it to the maiden, and it ever after had a perfect likeness of the Saviour photographed on it. The handkerchief and the maiden were both called Veronica (i.e. vera iconica, "the true likeness").

(One of these handkerchiefs is preserved in St. Peter's of Rome, and another in Milan Cathedral.)

Verrina, the republican who murders Fiesco.—Schiller: Fiesco (1783).

Versailles, a town near Paris, noted for its park and palace built by Louis XVI., now used as a museum.

The German Versailles, Cassel; so called from its gardens, conservatories, fountains, and colossal statue of Hercules.

The Versailles of Poland, the palace, etc., of the counts of Braniski, which now belong to the municipality of Bialystok.

Versatile (Sir George), a scholar, pleasing in manners, warm-hearted, generous, with the seeds of virtue and the soul of honour; but being deficient in stability, he takes his colour, like the chamelion, from the objects at hand. Thus, with Maria Delaval he is manly, frank, affectionate, and noble; with lord Vibrate, hesitating, undecided, and tossed with doubts; with lady Vibrate, boisterously gay, extravagant, and light-hearted. Sir George is betrothed to Maria Delaval, but the death of his father delays the marriage. He travels, and gives a fling to youthful indulgences. After a time, he meets Maria Delaval by accident, his better nature prevails, and he offers her his hand, his title, and his fortune.—Holcroft: He's Much to Blame (1790).

Vertaigne (2 or 3 syl.), a nobleman and judge, father of Lamira and Beaupré. —Fletcher: The Little French Lawyer (1647).

Verulam, a Roman town in Herts, a part of whose walls still remain. Its modern name is St. Albans. Lord Bacon was baron Verulam and viscount St. Albans (1561–1626).

The sites are not identical, but contiguous.

Vervain or VERBE'NA, i.e. herba bona, used by the Greeks and Romans in their sacrifices and sacred rites, and by the druids in their incantations. It was for ages a reputed deobstruent,—especially efficacious in scrofulous complaints, the bite of rabid animals, antipathies, and megrims.

Drayton says "a wreath of vervain heralds wear" as a badge of truce. Ambassadors also wore a chaplet of vervain on denouncing war.

The hermit . . . the holy vervain finds,
Which he about his head that hath the megrim binds.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Vesey (Sir John), a worldly-wise baronet, who, being poor, gives himself the nickname of "Stingy Jack," that he might be thought rich. Forthwith his £10,000 was exaggerated into £40,000. Sir John wanted his daughter to marry Alfred Evelyn, but, feeling uncertain about the stability of the young man's fortune, he shilly-shallied, and in the mean time she married sir Frederick Blount. By this means Evelyn was free to marry Clara Douglas, whom he greatly loved.—Lord Lytton: Money (1840).

Vestibule of Holland, Rosendaal. Vestibule of Germany, Cleves.

Vestris, called "The God of Dancing." He used to say, "Europe contains only three truly great men—myself, Voltaire, and Frederick of Prussia" (1729–1808).

Veto (Monsieur and Madame), Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette. The king had the power of putting his veto on any decree of the National Assembly (1791), in consequence of which he was nicknamed "Capet Veto."

(The name occurs in the celebrated song called La Carmagnole, which was sung to a dance of the same name.)

Vetus, in the Times newspaper, is the pseudonym of Edward Sterling (1773–1847), "The Thunderer" (1812–13).

Vexhelia, wife of Osmond an old Varangian guard.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Vholes (1 syl.), a lawyer who draws Richard Carstone into his toils. He is always closely buttoned up, and speaks in a lifeless manner, but is pre-eminently a "most respectable man."—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Vibrate (Lord), a man who can never make up his mind to anything, and, "like a man on double business bent, he stands in pause which he shall first begin, and both neglects." Thus he would say to his valet, "Order the coachman at eleven. No; order him at one. Come back! order him in ten minutes. Stay! don't order him at all. Why don't you go and do as I bid you?" or, "Tell Harry to admit the doctor. No, not just yet; in five minutes. I don't know when. Was ever man so tormented?" So with everything.

Lady Vibrate, wife of the above. Extravagant, contradictious, fond of gaiety, hurry, noise, embarrassment, confusion, disorder, uproar, and a whirl of excitement. She says to his lordship—

I am all gaiety and good humour; you are all turmoil and lamentation. I sing, laugh, and welcome pleasure wherever I find it; you take your lantern to look for misery, which the sun itself cannot discover. You may think proper to be as miserable as Job; but don't expect me to be a Job's wife.—Act ii. 1.

Lady Jane Vibrate, daughter of the above. An amiable young lady, attached to Delaval, whom she marries.—Holcroft: He's Much to Blame (1790).

Vicar of Bray (The). (1) Mr. Brome says the noted vicar was Simon Alleyn, vicar of Bray, in Berkshire, for fifty years. In the reign of Henry VIII. he was catholic till the Reformation; in the reign of Edward VI. he was calvinist; in the reign of Mary he was papist; in the reign of Elizabeth he was protestant. No matter who was king, he resolved to die the vicar of Bray.—D'Israeli: Curiosities of Literature.

(2) Another statement gives the name of Pendleton as the true vicar. He was afterwards rector of St. Stephen's, Walbrook (Edward VI. to Elizabeth).

(3) Haydn says the vicar referred to in the song was Simon Symonds, who lived in the Commonwealth, and continued vicar till the reign of William and Mary. He was independent in the protectorate, episcopalian under Charles II., papist under James II., moderate protestant under William and Mary.

N.B.—The song called The Vicar of Bray was written in the reign of George I., by colonel Fuller or an officer in Fuller's regiment, and does not refer to Alleyn, Pendleton, or Symonds, but to some real or imaginary person who was vicar of Bray from Charles II. to George I. The first verse begins: "In good king Charles's golden days," I was a zealous high-churchman. Ver. 2: "When royal James obtained the crown," I found the Church of Rome would fit my constitution. Ver. 3: "When William was our king declared," I swore to him allegiance. Ver. 4: "When gracious Anne became our queen," I became a tory. Ver. 5: "When George, in pudding-time came o'er," I became a whig. And "George my lawful king shall be—until the times do alter."

I have had a long chase after the vicar of Bray, on whom the proverb. . . . Mr. Fuller, in his Worthies, . . . takes no notice of him. . . . I am informed it is Simon Alleyn or Allen, who was vicar of Bray, about 1540, and died 1588.—Brome to Rawlins, June 14, 1735. (See Letters from the Bodleian, II. l. 100.)

Vicar of Wakefield (The), Dr. Primrose, a simple-minded, pious clergyman, with six children, begins life with a good fortune, a handsome house, and wealthy friends; but is reduced to utter poverty without any fault of his own, and, being reduced like Job, like Job he is restored. First, he loses his fortune through the rascality of the merchant who held it. His next great sorrow was the elopement of his eldest daughter, Olivia, with squire Thornhill. His third was the entire destruction by fire of his house, furniture, and books, together with the savings which he had laid by for his daughters' marriage portions. His fourth was being incarcerated in the county jail by squire Thornhill for rent, his wife and family being driven out of house and home. His fifth was the announcement that his daughter Olivia "was dead," and that his daughter Sophia had been abducted. His sixth was the imprisonment of his eldest son, George, for sending a challenge to squire Thornhill. His cup of sorrow was now full, and comfort was at hand: (1) Olivia was not really dead, but was said to be so in order to get the vicar to submit to the squire, and thus obtain his release. (2) His daughter Sophia had been rescued by Mr. Burchell (sir William Thornhill), who asked her hand in marriage. (3) His son George was liberated from prison, and married Miss Wilmot, an heiress. (4) Olivia's marriage to the squire, which was said to have been informal, was shown to be legal and binding. (5) The old vicar was released, re-established in his vicarage, and recovered a part of his fortune.—Goldsmith: The Vicar of Wakefield (1766).

(This novel has been dramatized several times: In 1819 it was performed in the Surrey Theatre; in 1823 it was turned into an opera; in 1850 Tom Taylor dramatized it; in 1878 W. G. Wills converted it into a drama of four acts, entitled Olivia.)

The real interest of the story lies in the development of the character of the amiable vicar, so rich in heavenly, so poor in earthly wisdom; possessing little for himself, yet ready to make that little less, whenever misery appeals to his compassion. With enough of worldly vanity about him to show that he shares the weakness of our nature; ready to be imposed upon by cosmogonies and fictitious bills of exchange, and yet commanding, by the simple and serene dignity of goodness, the respect even of the profligate.—Encyclopædia Britannica (article "Romance").

Vicar of Wrexhill (The), a novel by Mrs. Trollope (1837, her best).

Victor Amade'us (4 syl.), king of Sardinia (1665, 1675–1732), noted for his tortuous policy. He was fierce, audacious, unscrupulous, and selfish, profound in dissimulation, prolific in resources, and a "breaker of vows both to God and man." In 1730 he abdicated, but a few months later wanted to regain the throne, which his son, Charles Emmanuel, refused to resign. On again plotting to recover the crown, he was arrested by D'Ormea the prime minister, and died.—R. Browning: King Victor and King Charles Emmanuel.

Victor's Library (St.), a library of trashy books, especially controversial divinity. (See LIBRARY, p. 611.)—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, ii. 7 (1533).

Victoria (Donna), the young wife of don Carlos (q.v.).—Mrs. Cowley: A Bold Stroke for a Husband (1782).

Victoria Tower (The). The tower of the palace of Westminster. It is called "The Monarchy in Stone," because it contains, in chiselled kings and heraldic designs, the sculptured history of the British sovereigns.

Victorious (The). Almanzor means "victorious." The caliph Almanzor was the founder of Bagdad.

> Thou, too, art fallen, Bagdad, city of peace!
> Thou, too, hast had thy day! . . .
> Thy founder The Victorious.
> Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, v. 6 (1797).

Victory (The), Nelson's ship.

> At the head of the line goes the Victory,
> With Nelson on the deck,
> And on his breast the orders shine
> Like the stars on a shattered wreck.
> Lord Lytton: Ode, iii. 9 (1852).

Vidar, the god of wisdom, noted for his thick shoes, and not unfrequently called "The god with the thick shoes."—Scandinavian Mythology.

Vienne, like Toledo, was at one time noted for its sword-blades.

> Gargantua gave Touchfaucet an excellent sword of a Vienne blade with a golden scabbard.—Rabelais: Gargantua, i. 46 (1533).

Vienne (The archbishop of), chancellor of Burgundy.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Vifell, father of Viking, famous for being the possessor of Angurva'del, the celebrated sword made in the East by dwarfs. Vifell won it from Björn Blœtand, and killed with it the giant Iernhös, whom he cleft from head to waist with a single stroke. Vifell left it to Viking, Viking to Thorsten, and Thorsten to his son Frithjof. The hilt of the sword was gold, and the blade written with runes, which were dull in times of peace; but in war glittered "red as the crest of a cock when he fighteth."—Tegnér: Frithjof Saga, iii. (1825).

Village (Our), a series of rural sketches, by Mary Russell Mitford. Vol. i. in 1824, vol. ii. in 1825, vol. iii. in 1828, vol. iv. in 1830, and vol. v. in 1832.

Village (The), a poem by Crabbe, of country life and character (1783).

Village Blacksmith (The), a poem by Longfellow (1842).

Villalpando (Gaspar Cardillos de), a Spanish theologian, controversialist, and commentator (1505–1570).

> "Truly," replied the canon, "I am better acquainted with books of chivalry than with Villalpando's divinity."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. 17 (1605).

Ville Sonnante (La). Avignon is so called by Rabelais, from its numerous bell-towers.

Ville'rius, in Davenant's Siege of Rhodes (1656).

> . . . pale with envy, Singleton forswore
> The lute and sword, which he in triumph bore,
> And vowed he ne'er would act Villerius more.
> Dryden: MacFlecknoe (1682).

(This was a favourite part of Singleton.)

Villers (Mr.), a gentleman who professed a supreme contempt for women, and declared, if he ever married, he should prefer Widow Racket to his executioner.—Mrs. Cowley: The Belle's Stratagem (1780).

Villiard, a villain, from whose hands Charles Belmont rescued Fidelia.—E. Moore: The Foundling (1748).

Vincent (Jenkin) or "Jin Vin," one of old Ramsay's apprentices, in love with Margaret Ramsay.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Vincent de la Rosa, a boastful, vain, heartless adventurer, son of a poor labourer; who had served in the Italian wars. Coming to the village in which Leandra lived, he induced her to elope with him; and, having spoiled her of her jewels, money, and other valuables, deserted her, and she was sent to a convent till the affair had blown over.

> He wore a gay uniform, bedecked with glass buttons and steel ornaments; to-day he dressed himself in one piece of finery, and to-morrow in another. He would seat himself upon a bench under a large poplar, and entertain the villagers with his travels and exploits, assuring them there was not a country in the whole world he had not seen, nor a battle in which he had not taken part. He had slain more Moors than ever Tunis or Morocco produced; and as to duels, he had fought more than ever Gante had, or Luna, Diego Garcia de Paredez, or any other champion, always coming off victorious, and without losing one drop of blood.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. 20 ("The Goat-herd's Story," 1605).

VINCEN'TIO, duke of Vienna. He delegates his office to Angelo, and leaves Vienna for a time, under the pretence of going on a distant journey; but, by assuming a monk's hood, he observes incognito the conduct of his different officers. Angelo tries to dishonour Isabella, but the duke reappears in due time and rescues her, while Angelo is made to marry Mariana, to whom he is already betrothed. —Shakespeare: Measure for Measure (1603).

 Mariana was Angelo's wife by civil contract, or, as the duke says to her, "He is thy husband by pre-contract," though the Church had not yet sanctified the union and blessed it. Still, the duke says that it would be "no sin" in her to account herself his wife, and to perform towards him the duties of a wife. Angelo's neglect of her was "a civil divorce," which would have been a "sin" if the Church had sanctified the union, but which, till then, was only a moral or civil offence. Mariana also considered herself Angelo's "wife," and calls him "her husband." This is an interesting illustration of the "civil contract" of matrimony long before "The Marriage Registration Act" in 1837.

Vincen'tio, an old gentleman of Pisa, in Shakespeare's comedy called The Taming of the Shrew (1593).

Vincen'tio, the troth-plight of Evadne sister of the marquis of Colonna. Being himself without guile, he is unsuspicious, and when Ludovico, the traitor, tells him that Evadne is the king's wanton, he believes it and casts her off. This brings about a duel between him and Evadne's brother, in which Vincentio falls. He is not, however, killed; and when the villainy of Ludovico is brought to light, he reappears and marries Evadne.—Sheil: Evadne or The Statue (1820).

Vincentio (Don), a young man who was music mad, and said that the summun bonum of life is to get talked about. Like queen Elizabeth, he loved a "crash" in music, plenty of noise and fury. Olivia de Zuniga disgusted him by maintaining the jew's-harp to be the prince of musical instruments.—Mrs. Cowley: A Bold Stroke for a Husband (1782).

Vingolf, the paradise of Scandinavian mythology.

> Ah, Ingeborg, how fair, how near doth stand
> Each earthly joy to two fond loving hearts!
> If boldly grasped whene'er the time is ripe,
> It follows willingly, and builds for them
> A vingolf even here on earth below.
> Tegnér: Frithjof Saga, viii. (1825).

Vinland. According to Snorro Sturleson (q.v.), this name was given by ancient Scandinavian voyagers to a portion of the coast of North America visited by them about the end of the tenth century —well-wooded and very productive. It is thought to have been the coast of Massachusetts or Rhode Island.

Vi'ola, sister of Sebastian; a young lady of Messaline. They were twins, and so much alike that they could be distinguished only by their dress. Viola and her brother were shipwrecked off the coast of Illyria. Viola was brought to shore by the captain, but her brother was left to shift for himself. Being a stranger in a strange land, Viola dressed as a page, and, under the name of Cesario, entered the service of Orsino duke of Illyria. The duke greatly liked his beautiful page, and, when he discovered her true sex, married her.—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night (1602).

Vi'ola and Hono'ra, daughters of general Archas "the loyal subject" of the great-duke of Muscovia.—Fletcher: The Loyal Subject (1618).

VIOLAN'TE (4 syl.), the supposed wife of don Henrique (2 syl.) an uxorious Spanish nobleman.—Fletcher: The Spanish Curate (1622).

Violante, the betrothed of don Alonzo of Alcazar, but given in marriage by king Sebastian to Henri'quez. This caused Alonzo to desert and join the emperor of Barbary. As renegade he took the name of Dorax, and assumed the Moorish costume. In the war which followed, he saved Sebastian's life, was told that Henriquez had died in battle, and that Violante, being a young widow, was free and willing to be his wife.—Dryden: Don Sebastian (1690).

Violante, an attendant on the princess Anna Comnēna the historian.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Violante (4 syl.), one of the chief characters in My Novel, by lord Lytton (1853).

Violante (4 syl.), wife of Pietro (2 syl.), and putative mother of Pompilia. Violanté provided this supposititious child partly to please old Pietro, and partly to cheat the rightful heirs.—R. Browning: The Ring and the Book, ii.

Violan'te (Donna), daughter of don Pedro, a Portuguese nobleman, who intends to make her a nun; but she falls in love with don Felix, the son of don Lopez. Isabella (sister of don Felix), in order to escape a hateful marriage, takes refuge with donna Violantê (4 syl.), who "keeps the secret" close, even at the risk of losing her sweetheart, for Felix discovers that a colonel Briton calls at the house, and supposes Violantê to be the object of his visits. Ultimately, the mystery is cleared up, and a double marriage takes place.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Wonder (1714).

Mrs. Yates (in the last act), with Garrick as "don Felix," was admirable. Felix, thinking he has gone too far, applies himself to soothe his Violante. She turns from him and draws away her chair; he follows, and she draws further away. At length, by his winning, entreating, and cajoling, she is gradually induced to melt, and finally makes it up with him. Her condescension . . . was admirable; her dignity was great and lofty, . . . and when by degrees she laid aside her frown, and her lips relaxed into a smile, . . . nothing could be more lovely and irresistible. . . . It laid the whole audience, as well as her lover, at her feet.—William Goodwin.

Violen'ta, any young lady nonentity; one who contributes nothing to the amusement or conversation of a party. Violenta is one of the dramatis personæ of Shakespeare's All's Well that Ends Well, but she only enters once, and then she neither speaks nor is spoken to (1598). (See ROGERO, p. 927, third art.)

Violen'ta, the fairy mother who brought up the young princess who was metamorphosed into a white cat for refusing to marry Migonnet (a hideously misshapen fairy).—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1682).

Violet, the ward of lady Arundel. She is in love with Norman the "sea-captain," who turns out to be the son of lady Arundel by her first husband, and heir to the title and estates.—Lord Lytton: The Sea-Captain (1839).

Violet (Father), a sobriquet of Napoleon I.; also called "Corporal Violet" (1769, 1804–1815, died 1821).

∴ Violets were the flowers of the empire, and when, in 1879, the ex-empress Eugénie was visited at Chislehurst by those who sympathized with her in the death of her son, "the prince imperial," they were worn as symbols of attachment to the imperial family of France. The name was given to Napoleon on his banishment to Elba (1815), and implied that "he would return to France with the violets."

Violet-Crowned City (The), Athens is so called by Aristophanês (ἰοστέφανος) (see Equites, 1323 and 1329; and Acharnians, 637). Macaulay refers to Athens as "the violet-crowned city." Ion (a violet) was a representative king of Athens, whose four sons gave names to the four Athenian classes; and Greece, in Asia Minor, was called Ionia. Athens was the city of "Ion crowned its king," and hence was "the Ion crowned," or king Ion's city. Translating the word Ion into English, Athens was the "Violet-crowned," or king Violet's city. Of course, the pun is the chief point, and was quite legitimate in comedy.

¶ Similarly, Paris is called the "city of lilies," by a pun between Louis and lys (the flower-de-luce), and France is l'empire des lys or l'empire des Louis.

¶ By a similar pun, London might be called "the noisy town," from hlud, "noisy."

Violetta, a Portuguese, married to Belfield the elder brother, but deserted by him. The faithless husband gets betrothed to Sophia (daughter of sir Benjamin Dove), who loves the younger brother. Both Violetta and the younger brother are shipwrecked and cast on the coast of Cornwall, in the vicinity of squire Belfield's estate; and Sophia is informed that her "betrothed" is a married man. She is therefore free from her betrothal, and marries the younger brother, the man of her choice; while the elder brother takes back his wife, to whom he becomes reconciled.—Cumberland: The Brothers (1769).

Violin (Motto on a).

In silvis viva silui; canora jam mortua cano.
Mute when alive, I heard the feathered throng;
Vocal now dead, I emulate their song.

Violin (The Angel with the). Rubens's "Harmony" is an angel of the male sex playing a bass-viol.

The angel with the violin,
Painted by Raphael (?), he seemed.
Longfellow: The Wayside Inn (1863).

Violin-Makers (The best): Gasparo di Salo (1560–1610); Nicholas Amati (1596–1684); Antonio Stradivari (1670–1728); Joseph A. Guarneri (1683–1745).

(Of these, Stradivari was the best, and Nicholas Amati the next best.)

N.B.—The following are eminent, but not equal to the names given above: Joseph Steiner (1620–1667); Matthias Klotz (1650–1606). (See Otto, On the Violin.)

Vipers. According to Greek and Roman superstition, the female viper, after copulation, bites off the head of the male. Another notion was that young vipers came into the world by gnawing their way through the mother, and killing her.

> Else, viper-like, their parents they devour,
> For all Power's children easily covet power.
> Brooke: Treatie on Human Learning (1554-1628).

Vipont (Sir Ralph de), a knight of St. John. He is one of the knights challengers.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Virgil, a Roman poet, author of Eclogues, Georgics, and the Æneid, the best Latin epic poem, in twelve books. English translations of the Æneid: by Connington, 1866; Dryden, 1697; Gawin Douglas, 1513; Kennedy, in 1849; W. Morris, in 1876; by Ogilby, in 1649; by Phaer and Twyne, in 1558-73; by Pitt and Warton, in 1740; by Singleton, in rhythm, 1855-59; by Stonihurst, in 1580; by lord Surrey, in 1553; by Dr. Trapp, in 1731. Literal English prose versions by Davidson, in 1743; by Wheeler, in 1852, etc. (See EPIC POETS, p. 326.)

Virgil Travestie. Book i., by C. Cotton (1664). It has passed through fifteen editions.

Virgil, in the Gesta Romanorum, is represented as a mighty but benevolent enchanter, and this is the character that Italian romances give him.

(Similarly, sir Walter Scott is called "The Great Wizard of the North.")

Virgil the Enchanter. When a young man, Virgil discovered an imp in a hole in a mountain, who promised to teach the enchanter the black art if he would release him. Virgil released the imp, but after having learned all he wanted, he expressed his surprise how one of such surprising stature could have been squeezed into so small a cavity. The imp, to show Virgil how it was done, wriggled into it, and Virgil dexterously closed up the hole.—Een Schone Historie van Virgilius (1552).

¶ This tale is almost identical with that of "the Fisherman and the Genius" in the Arabian Nights: The fisherman enclosed in his net a small copper vase, and when he opened it a huge giant came forth, who told the fisherman he had vowed to kill any one who released him, but to leave his victim the choice of his death. The fisherman asked the genius if it was really true that he came out of the vase. "Doubtless," said the genius. "I cannot believe it," rejoined the fisherman, "for it is not large enough to hold one of your feet." The genius, to convince the gainsayer, converted himself into smoke and entered the vase; whereupon the fisherman clapped down the lid, and threw the vase back into the sea.

¶ The same tale is told of Theophrastos, who liberated a demon from the rift of a tree. The tale is told by Görres: Folksbucher, p. 226 (and several others). (See PATRICK, St., and the Serpent, p. 813.)

Virgil, in Dantê, is the personification of human wisdom, Beatrice of the wisdom which comes of faith, and St. Bernard of spiritual wisdom. Virgil conducts Dantê through the Inferno and through Purgatory too, till the seven P's (peccata, "sins") are obliterated from his brow, when Beatrice becomes his guide. St. Bernard is his guide through a part of Paradise. Virgil says to Dantê—

> What reason here discovers, I have power
> To show thee; that which lies beyond, expect
> From Beatrice—faith's not reason's task.
> Dante: Purgatory, xviii. (1308).

Virgil's Epitaph. The inscription on his tomb (said to have been written by himself) was—

> Mantua me genuit; Calabri rapuere; tenet nunc
> Parthenope; cecini pascua, rura, duces.
> In Mantua was I born; Calabria saw me die;
> Of sheep, fields, wars, I sung; and now in Naples lie.
> E. C. B.

The Christian Virgil, Giacomo Sannazaro (1458-1530).

Marco Girolamo Vida, author of Christias (in six books), is also called "The Christian Virgil" (1490-1566).

 Aurelius Clemens Prudentius of Spain is called by Bentley, "The Virgil and Horace of Christians" (348-*).

The Virgil of our Dramatic Authors. Ben Jonson is so called by Dryden (1574-1637).

> Shakespeare was the Homer or father of our dramatic poets; Jonson was the Virgil, and pattern of elaborate writing. I admire rare Ben, but I love Shakespeare.—Dryden.

The Virgil of the French Drama. Jean Racine is so called by sir Walter Scott (1639-1699).

Virgil's Courtship. Godfrey Gobilyve told Graunde Amoure that Virgil the poet once made proposals to a lady of high rank in the Roman court, who resolved to punish him for his presumption. She told him that if he would appear on a given night before her window, he should be drawn up in a basket. Accordingly he kept his appointment, got into the basket, and, being drawn some twenty feet from the ground, was left there dangling till noon next day, the laugh and butt of the court and city. —Stephen Hawes: The Passe-tyme of Plesure, xxix. (1515).

Virgil's Gnat (the Culex, ascribed to Virgil). A shepherd, having fallen asleep in the open air, was on the point of becoming the prey of a serpent, when a gnat stung him on the eyelid. The shepherd crushed the gnat, but at the same time alarmed the serpent, which the shepherd beat to death. Next night, the gnat appeared to the shepherd in a dream, and reproached him for ingratitude, whereupon he raised a monument in honour of his deliverer. Spenser has a free translation of this story, which he calls Virgil's Gnat (1580). (See USE OF PESTS, p. 1161.)

Virgile au Rabot (Le), "The Virgil of the Plane," Adam Bellaut, the joiner-poet, who died 1662. He was pensioned by Richelieu, patronized by the "Great Condé," and praised by Pierre Corneille.

Virgil'ia is made by Shakespeare the wife of Coriolanus, and Volumnia his mother; but historically Volumnia was his wife and Vetu'ria his mother.—Coriolanus (1610).

The old man's merriment in Menenius; the lofty lady's dignity in Volumnia; the bridal modesty in Virgilia; the patrician and military haughtiness in Coriolanus; the plebeian malignity and tribunitian insolence in Brutus and Sicinius, make a very pleasing and interesting variety.—Dr. Johnson: On Coriolanus.

Virgil'ius, Feargil bishop of Saltzburg, an Irishman. He was denounced as a heretic for asserting the existence of antipodes (*–784). (See HERETICS (SCIENTIFIC), p. 486.)

Virgin Fort (The). Widin, in European Turkey, is so called by the Turks, because it has never been taken by assault.

Metz, in France, was also so called in the Franco-Prussian war (1870–1).

Virgin Knot, maidenly chastity; the allusion being to the zones worn by marriageable young women. Girls did not wear a zone, and were therefore called "Ungirded" (dis-cinctæ).

If thou dost break her virgin knot before
All sanctimonious ceremonies may
With full and holy rite be ministered,
No sweet aspersion shall the heaven let fall
To make this contract grow.
Shakespeare: The Tempest, act iv. sc. 1 (1609).

Virgin Martyr (The), a tragedy by Philip Massinger (1622). A fine play.

Virgin Mary (The) is addressed by the following titles:—"Empress and Queen of Heaven;" "Empress and Queen of Angels;" "Empress and Queen of the Earth;" "Lady of the Universe or of the World;" "Mistress of the World;" "Patroness of all Men;" "Advocate for Sinners;" "Mediatrix;" "Gate of Paradise;" "Mother of God;" "Mother of Mercies and of Divine Grace;" "Goddess;" "The only Hope of Sinners," etc., etc.

(It is said that Peter Fullo, in 480, was the first to introduce invocations to the Virgin.)

Virgin Modesty. John Wilmot, earl of Rochester, was so called by Charles II., because of his propensity to blushing (1647–1680).

Virgin Queen (The), Elizabeth (1533, 1558–1603).

Virgin Unmasked (The), a farce by H. Fielding. Goodwill had acquired by trade £10,000, and resolved to give his daughter Lucy to one of his relations, in order to keep the money in the family. He sent for her bachelor relations, and told them his intention; they were Blister (the apothecary), Coupee (the dancing-master), and Quaver (the singing-master). They all preferred their professions to the young lady, and while they were quarrelling about the superiority of their respective callings, Lucy married Thomas the footman. Old Goodwill says, "I don't know but that my daughter has made a better choice than if she had married one of these booby relations."

Virgins (The Eleven Thousand). (See URSULA, p. 1161.)

Virginia, a young Roman plebeian of great beauty, decoyed by Appius Claudius, one of the decemvirs, and claimed as his slave. Her father, Virginius, being told of it, hastened to the forum, and arrived at the moment when Virginia was about to be delivered up to Appius. He seized a butcher's knife, stabbed his daughter to the heart, rushed from the forum, and raised a revolt.

(This has been the subject of a host of tragedies. In French, by Mairet (1628), by Leclerc (1645), by Campistron (1683), by La Beaumelle (1760), by Chabanon (1769), by Laharpe (1786), by Leblanc du Guillet (1786), by Guiraud (1827), by Latour St. Ybars (1845), etc. In Italian, by Alfieri (1783). In German, by Gotthold Lessing (eighteenth century). In English, by John Webster, entitled Appius and Virginia (1654); by Miss Brooke (1760); J. S. Knowles (1820), Virginius. It is one of lord Macaulay's lays (1842), supposed to be sung in the forum on the day when Sextus and Licinus were elected tribunes for the fifth time.)

Virginia, the daughter of Mme. de la Tour. Madame was of a good family in Normandy, but, having married beneath her social position, was tabooed by her family. Her husband died before the birth of his first child, and the widow went to live at Port Louis, in the Mauritius, where Virginia was born. Their only neighbour was Margaret, with her love-child Paul, an infant. The two children grew up together, and became strongly attached; but when Virginia was 15 years old, her wealthy great-aunt adopted her, and requested that she might be sent immediately to France, to finish her education. The "aunt" wanted her to marry a French count, and, as Virginia refused to do so, disinherited her and sent her back to the Mauritius. When within a cable's length of the island, a hurricane dashed the ship to pieces, and the corpse of Virginia was cast on the shore. Paul drooped, and died within two months.—Bernardin de St. Pierre: Paul et Virgine (1788).

N.B.—In Cobb's dramatic version of this story, Virginia's mother is of Spanish origin, and dies committing Virginia to the charge of Dominique, a faithful old negro servant. The aunt is donna Leonora de Guzman, who sends don Antonio de Guardes to bring Virginia to Spain, and there to make her his bride. She is carried to the ship by force; but scarcely is she set on board when a hurricane dashes the vessel to pieces. Antonio is drowned, but Virginia is rescued by Alhambra, a runaway slave whom she has befriended. The drama ends with the marriage between Virginia and Paul (1756–1818).

Virginians (The), a novel by Thackeray (1857).

Virginius, father of the Roman Virginia, the title of a tragedy by S. Knowles (1820). (For the tale, see VIRGINIA.)

(Macready (1793–1873) made the part of "Virginius" in Knowles's drama; but the first to act it was John Cooper, in Glasgow, 1820.)

Virgivian Sea. (See VERGIVIAN, p. 1172.)

Vir'olam, St. Alban's. (See VERULAM, p. 1173.)

> Brave Voadicia made . . . to Virolam.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (16rs).

Virolet, the hero of Fletcher's play called The Double Marriage. He was married to Juliana and to Martia (1647).

Virtues (The Seven): (1) Faith, (2) hope, (3) charity, (4) prudence, (5) justice, (6) fortitude, and (7) temperance. The first three are called "the holy virtues."

> I [Virgil] with those abide
> Who the three holy virtues put not on,
> But understood the rest, and without blame
> Followed them all.
> Dante: Purgatory, vii. (1308).

Visin, a Russian who had the power of blunting weapons by a look. Starchat'erus, the Swede, when he went against him, covered his sword with thin leather, and by this means obtained an easy victory.

Vision of Judgment (The), a poem in twelve parts, by Southey, written in hexameter verse (1820). The laureate supposes that he has a vision of George III., just dead, tried at the bar of heaven. Wilkes is his chief accuser, and Washington his chief defender. Judgment is given by acclamation in favour of the king, and in heaven he is welcomed by Alfred, Richard Cœur de Lion, Edward III., queen Elizabeth, Charles I., and William III., Bede, friar Bacon, Chaucer, Spenser, the duke of Marlborough, and Berkeley the sceptic, Hogarth, Burke the infidel, Chatterton who made away with himself, Canning, Nelson, and all the royal family who were then dead.

 Of all the literary productions ever issued from the press, never was one printed of worse taste than this. Byron wrote a quiz on it, called The Vision of Judgment, in 106 stanzas of eight lines each (1820).

Vision of Mirza (The). (See MIRZA, p. 711.)

Vita'lis, the pseudonym of Eric Sjöberg, a Swedish poet. (Latin, vita lis, "life is a strife.")

Viti'za or Witi'za, king of the Visigoths, who put out the eyes of Córdova the father of Roderick. He was himself dethroned and blinded by Roderick.—Southey: Roderick, the Last of the Goths (1814).

Vitruvius, author of a treatise on architecture, in ten books, Latin. He lived under Julius Cæsar and Augustus.

The English Vitruvius, Inigo Jones (1572–1652).

Vivian, brother of Maugis d'Agremont, and son of duke Bevis of Agremont. He was stolen in infancy by Tapinel, and sold to the wife of Sorgalant.—Roman de Maugis d'Agremont et de Vivian son Frère.

Vivian, son of Buovo 2 syl.), of the house of Clarmont, and brother of Aldiger and Malagigi.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Vivian Grey, a novel by Disraeli [lord Beaconsfield] (1826–7). Vivian Grey is supposed to be the author himself.

Viviane (3 syl.), daughter of Dyonas a vavasour of high lineage, and generally called the "Lady of the Lake." Merlin, in his dotage, fell in love with her, and she imprisoned him in the forest of Bréchéliande, in Brittany. Viviane induced Merlin to show her how a person could be imprisoned by enchantment without walls, towers, or chains, and after he had done so, she fondled him into a sleep under a whitethorn laden with flowers. While thus he slept, she made a ring with her wimple round the bush, and performed the other needful ceremonies; whereupon he found himself enclosed in a prison stronger than the strongest tower, and from that imprisonment was never again released.—Merlin (a romance).

(See the next article.)

Viv'ien or Vivian, the personification of shameless harlotry, or the crowning result to be expected from the infidelity of queen Guin'evere. This wily wanton in Arthur's court hated all the knights, and tried without success to seduce "the blameless king." With Merlin she succeeded better; for, being pestered with her importunity, he told her the secret of his power, as Samson told Delilah the secret of his strength. Having learnt this, Vivien enclosed the magician in a hollow oak, where he was confined as one dead, "lost to life, and use, and name, and fame."—Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("Vivien," 1858–9). (See VIVIANE.)

N.B.—In Malory's History of Prince Arthur, i. 60, Nimue (? Ninive) is the fée who inveigled Merlin out of his secret—

> And so upon a time it happened that Merlin shewed to her [Nimue] in a rock, whereas was a great wonder, and wrought by enchantment, which went under a stone. So by her subtle craft and working, she made Merlin to go under that stone, to let her wit of the marvels there; but she wrought so there for him that he came never out, for all his craft. And so she departed and left him there.

Voadic'ia or Boadice'a, queen of the British Icēni. Enraged against the Romans, who had defiled her two daughters, she excited an insurrection against them; and while Suetonius Paulinus, the Roman governor, was in Mona (Anglesea), she took Colchester and London, and slew 70,000 Romans. Being at length defeated by Suetonius Paulinus, she put an end to her life by poison (A.D. 61).

(Cowper has an ode on Boadicea, 1790.)

> Brave Voadicia made with her resolvedest men
> To Virolam [St. Albans], whose siege with fire and sword she plyed
> Tillievelled with the earth . . . etc.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1622).

Voadine (2 syl.), bishop of London, who reproved Vortiger[n] for loving another man's wife and neglecting his own queen, for which reproof the good bishop was murdered.

> . . . good Voadine, who reproved
> Proud Vortiger, his king, unlawfully that loved
> Another's wanton wife, and wronged his nuptial bed,
> For which by that stern prince unjustly murderèd.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1622).

¶ This is very like the story of John the Baptist and Herod.

Voices of the Night, a poem by Longfellow, including A Hymn to Night, A Psalm of Life, Flowers, etc. (1841).

Voiture (2 syl.), a French poet, idolized by his contemporaries in the reign of Louis XIV., but now only known by name (1598–1648).

> E'en rival wits did Voiture's death deplore,
> And the gay mourned, who never mourned before:
> The truest hearts for Voiture heaved with sighs;
> Voiture was wept by all the brightest eyes.
> Pope: Epistle to Miss Blount (1715).

Voland (Squire), the devil. (German, Junker Voland.)

Volan'te (3 syl.), one of the three daughters of Balthazar. Lively, witty, sharp as a needle, and high-spirited. She loves the count Montalban; but when the count disguises himself as a father confessor, in order to sound her love for him, she sees the trick in a moment, and says to him, "Come, count, pull off your lion's hide, and confess yourself an ass." Subsequently, all ends happily and well. —Tobin: The Honeymoon (1804).

Volet'ta, Free-will personified.

Voletta,
Whom neither man, nor fiend, nor God constrains.
P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, vi. (1633).

Volksmährchen ["popular tales"], in German, the best exponents being Ludwig Tieck (1773–1853), Musäus (1735–1787), De la Motte Fouqué (see UNDINE, p. 1158), Chamisso (see SCHLEMIHL, PETER, p. 968), Heinrich Steffens (1773–1845), Achim von Arnim (1781–1831), Clemens Bentano ( ), Zschokke (1771–1848), Hoffmann (1776–1822), Gustav Freytag "The German Dickens" (1816–), and the brothers Grimm.

Vol'pone (2 syl.), or THE FOX, a comedy by Ben Jonson (1605). Volpone, a rich Venetian nobleman, without children, feigns to be dying, in order to draw gifts from those who pay court to him under the expectation of becoming his heirs. Mosca, his knavish confederate, persuades each in turn that he is named for the inheritance, and by this means exacts many a costly present. At the end, Volpone is betrayed, his property forfeited, and he is sentenced to lie in the worst hospital in all Venice.

Jonson has three great comedies: Volpone or the Fox, Epicene or the Silent Woman, and The Alchemist.—R. Chambers: English Literature, i. 192.

Volscius (Prince), a military hero, who falls in love with the fair Parthenŏpê, and disputes with prince Prettyman upon the superiority of his sweetheart to Cloris, whom prince Prettyman sighs for.—Duke of Buckingham: The Rehearsal (1671).

Why, this is worse than prince Volscius in love!—Sir W. Scott.

Oh, be merry, by all means. Prince Volscius in love! Ha, ha, ha!—Congreve: The Double Dealer (1694).

Volsunga Saga (The), a collection of tales in verse about the early Teutonic heroes, compiled by Sæmund Sigfusson in the eleventh century. A prose version was made some 200 years later by Snorro Sturleson. This saga forms a part of the Rhythmical or Elder Edda and of the Prose or Younger Edda.

Voltaire, French poet, philosopher, and litterateur (1694–1778).

The German Voltaire, Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749–1838).

Christoph Martin Wieland is also called "The German Voltaire" (1733–1813).

The Polish Voltaire, Ignatius Krasicki (1774–1801).

The Russian Voltaire, Alex. P. Sumorokof (1727–1777).

Voltaire and Bad Luck—

Beaumarchais, the first editor of Voltaire's complete works, lost 1,000,000 francs by the speculation; and died suddenly in 1798.

Desser, who published an edition in 10 vols., 8vo, died soon afterwards of phthisis, and his friend Migeon, who provided the funds, died of the same disease, a pauper.

Cérioux and the widow Perroneau, who published an edition in 60 vols. 12mo, were completely ruined thereby.

Dalibon, who produced the brilliant edition, is now a workman at 2½ francs a day with a colour-man.

Touquet, who introduced an edition, died suddenly at Ostend, in 1831.

Garnery, his partner in the edition of 75 vols. 12mo, was ruined and died.

Deterville, a wealthy publisher, has since become blind.

Daubrée was assassinated by a woman whom he accused of having stolen a book worth 10 sous.

René, Brussels, edited an edition in 18mo, fell into distress, and is now a simple workman. — Van der Hoegen: La Revue hebdomadaire.

Vol'timand, a courtier in the court of Claudius king of Denmark.—Shakespeare: Hamlet (1596).

Volumnia was the wife of Coriolanus, and Vetu'ria his mother; but Shakespeare makes Virgilia the wife, and Volumnia the mother.—Coriolanus (1610).

The old man's merriment in Menenius; the lofty lady's dignity in Volumnia; the bridal modesty in Virgilia; the patrician and military haughtiness in Coriolanus; the plebeian malignity and tribunitian insolence in Brutus and Sicinius, make a very pleasing and interesting variety.—Dr. Johnson: On Coriolanus.

Volund. (See WIELAND.)

Voluspa Saga (The), the prophecy of Völa. It contains between 200 and 300 verses, and resembles the Sibylline books of ancient Rome. The Voluspa Saga gives, in verse, a description of chaos, the formation of the world, the creation of all animals (including dwarfs and giants, genii and devils, fairies and goblins), the final conflagration of the world, and its renewal, when it will appear in celestial beauty, like the new Jerusalem described in the Book of the Revelation.

Vorst (Peterkin), the sleeping sentinel at Powys Castle.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Vortigern, consul of the Gewisseans, who crowned Constans king of Britain, although he was a monk; but treacherously contrived to get him assassinated, and then usurped the crown. He married Rowen'a daughter of Hengist, and was burnt to death in a tower set on fire during a siege by Ambrosius.—Geoffrey: British History, vi. 6; viii. 1 (1142).

Vortigern, a drama put forward by Henry W. Ireland (1796) as a newly discovered play by Shakespeare. It was brought out at Drury Lane Theatre by John Kemble. Dr. Parr thought it was genuine. (See FORGERS, p. 384.)

Mrs. Siddons, writing to Mrs. Piozzi, says, "All sensible persons are convinced that Vortigern is a most audacious imposture. If not, I can only say that Shakespeare's writings are more unequal than those of any other man" (April 2, 1796).—Fitzgerald: Lives of the Kembles, i. 338.

Vortigern and Hengist. The account of the massacre of the Long-Knives, given by Geoffrey, in his British History, vi. 15, differs greatly from that of the Welsh Triads (see STONEHENGE A TROPHY, p. 1047). Geoffrey says that Hengist came over with a large army, at which king Vortigern was alarmed. To allay this suspicion, Hengist promised to send back all the men that the king did not require, and begged Vortigern to meet him in conference at Ambrius (Ambresbury), on May Day. Hengist, in the mean time, secretly armed a number of his soldiers with "long knives," and told them to fall on the Britons during the conference, when he uttered the words, "Nemet oure Saxas." This they did, and 460 "barons and consuls" fell. It does not appear from this narrative that the slaughter was due "to the treachery of Vortigern," but was wholly the work of Hengist. Geoffrey calls the earl of Gloucester "Eldol," and not "Eidiol."

Vor'tigern's Tower, like Penel'opē's web, is a work ever beginning and never ending. Vortigern was told by his magicians to build a strong tower for his own security; so he commanded his workmen to build one on mount Erir, but whatever they built one day was wholly swallowed up by the earth during the night.—Geoffrey: British History, vi. 17 (1142). (See PENELOPE'S WEB, p. 822.)

Vos non Vobis. The tale is that Virgil wrote an epigram on Augustus Cæsar, which so much pleased the emperor that he desired to know who was the author. As Virgil did not claim the lines, one Bathyllus declared they were his. This displeased Virgil, and he wrote these four words, Sic vos non vobis . . . four times as the commencement of four lines, and Bathyllus was requested to finish them. This he could not do, but Virgil completed the lines thus—

Sic vos non vobis nidificatis aves;
Sic vos non vobis vellera fertis oves;
Sic vos non vobis mellificatis apes;
Sic vos non vobis fertis aratra boves.

Not for yourselves warm nests ye song-birds build;
Not for yourselves ye sheep your fleeces bear;
Not for yourselves store hives ye bees have filled;
Not for yourselves ye oxen draw the share.
E. C. B.

Vox Clamantis, the second part of Gower's poem, written in Latin; it runs to seven books in alternate hexameter and pentameter verses. The subject is Wat Tyler's Rebellion. The meaning of the title is, "The voice of the complainants." Never published.

Vox et præterea Nihil. A Spartan, pulling a nightingale, and finding only a very small body, exclaimed, Φωνὰ τύ τις ἐστι καὶ οὐδὲν ἄλλο ("Voice art thou, and nothing more").—Plutarch: Apophthegmata Laconica.

Vran (Bendigeid, i.e. "Blessed"), king of Britain and father of Caradcaw (Caractacus). He was called "Blessed" because he introduced Christianity into this island. Vran had shared the captivity of his son, and had learned the Christian faith during his seven years' detention in Rome.

Vran or Bran the Blessed, son of Llyr, first brought the faith of Christ to the nation of the Cymry from Rome, where he was seven years a hostage for his son Caradawc, whom the Romans made prisoner through craft and the treachery of Arcgwedd Fôeddawg (Cartismandua).—Welsh Triads, xxxv.

Vran's Caldron restored to life whoever was put therein, but the revivified never recovered speech. (See MEDEA'S KETTLE, p. 691.)

"I will give thee," said Bendigeid Vran, "a caldron, the property of which is that if one of thy men be slain to-day, and be cast therein to-morrow, he will be as well as he was at the best, except that he will not regain his speech."—The Mabinogion ("Branwen," etc., twelfth century).

Vrience (King), one of the knights of the Round Table. He married Morgan le Fay, half-sister of king Arthur.—Malory: History of Prince Arthur (1470).

Vulcan's Badge, the badge of cuckoldom. Vulcan was the husband of Venus, with whom Mars intrigued.

We know
Better than he have worn Vulcan's badge.
(†) Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus, act ii. sc. 1 (1593).

Vulnerable Parts.

(1) ACHILLES was vulnerable only in but the mother died. Her last request was that Outalissi would carry her child to Albert of Wy'oming, her friend, and beg him to take charge of it.

Henry Waldegrave, the boy brought by Outalissi to Albert. After staying at Wyoming for three years, his English friends sent for him (he was then 12 years old). When grown to manhood, he returned to Wyoming, and was married to Gertrude; but three months afterwards Outalissi appeared, and told them that Brandt was coming with his English soldiers to destroy the village. Both Albert and Gertrude were shot in the attack; and Henry joined the army of Washington. — Campbell: Gertrude of Wyoming (1809).

(Campbell accents Wyoming on the first syllable, but the accent is generally thrown on the second.)

Waldemar Fitzurse (Lord), a baron following prince John of Anjou (brother of Richard Cœur de Lion).—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Waldstetten (The countess of), a relative of the baron. He is one of the characters in Donnerhugel's narrative.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Wales. Geoffrey says, after the famine and pestilence which drove Cadwallader into Armorica (Bretagne), the people were no longer called Britons, but Gualenses, a word derived either from Gualo their leader, or Guales their queen, or from their barbarism.—British History, xii. 19 (1142).

 Milner says the Welsh are those driven west by the Teutonic invaders and called Wilisc-men ("strangers or foreigners"); Corn-wall was called "West Wales," and subsequently the Corn (Latin, cornu) or horn held by the Walls.—Geography.

(The Saxon wealh, plu. wealhas or wealas, "foreigners," meaning "not of Saxon origin," and also "slaves or subjugated men," is the correct origin of the word.)

Wales (South). At one time the whole eastern division of South Wales was called Gwent, but in its present restricted sense the word Gwent is applied to the county of Monmouth only.

Walk, Knave, Walk, colonel Hewson. So called from a tract written by Edmund Gayton, to satirize the party, and entitled Walk, Knaves, Walk.—S. Butler: Hudibras (1663–78).

Walker (Dr.), one of the three great quacks of the eighteenth century, the others being Dr. Rock and Dr. Timothy Franks. Goldsmith, in his Citizen of the World, has a letter (lxviii.) wholly upon these three worthies (1759).

Walker (Helen), the prototype of Jeanie Deans. Sir W. Scott caused a tombstone to be erected over her grave in Irongray churchyard, Kirkcudbright [Ke-koo'-bry].

Walker (Hookey), John Walker, outdoor clerk to Longman, Clementi, and Co., Cheapside. He was noted for his hooked nose, and disliked for his official duties, which were to see that the men came and left at the proper hour, and that they worked during the hours of work. Of course, the men conspired to throw discredit on his reports; and hence when any one draws the "long-bow," the hearer exclaims, "Hookey Walker!" as much as to say, "I don't believe it."

Walking Gentleman (A). Thomas Colley Grattan published his Highways and Byways under this signature (1825).

Walking Library (A), Ambulans Bibliotheca. John Hales is so called by Wotton (1584–1656).

Walking Stewart, John Stewart, an English traveller, who walked through Hindûstan, Persia, Nubia, Abyssinia, the Arabian Desert, Europe, and the North American states; "crazy beyond the reach of hellebore, yet sublime and divinely benignant. . . . He had seen more of the earth's surface, and had communicated more with the children of the earth than any man before or since."—De Quincey (1856).

Walking-Stick (Henry VIII.'s), the great Danish club shown in the armoury of the Tower.

Walkingshaw (Miss), mistress of the chevalier Charles Edward the Young Pretender.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Wallace (Sir William), a poetical chronicle, in ten-syllable couplets, by "Blind Harry" (about 1400).

Wallace's Larder, the dungeon of Ardrossan, in Ayrshire, where Wallace had the dead bodies thrown when the garrison was surprised by him in the reign of Edward I.

¶ The "Douglas Larder" (q.v.) is a similar phrase, meaning that horrible compound of dead bodies, barrels of flour, meal, wheat, malt, wine, ale, and beer, all mixed together in Douglas Castle by the order of lord James Douglas, when, in 1306, the garrison was surprised by him.

Wallenrode (The earl of), an Hungarian crusader.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Waller, in love with Lydia lady's-maid to Widow Green. His love at first was not honourable, because his aristocratic pride revolted at the inferior social position of Lydia; but when he knew her real worth, he loved her, proposed marriage, and found that she was the sister of Trueworth, and had taken service to avoid an obnoxious marriage. —Knowles: The Love-Chase (1837).

Waller's Plot, a plot organized, in 1643, by Waller the poet, against the parliamentary party. Its objects were to secure the king's children, to seize the most eminent of the parliamentarians, to capture the Tower, and resist all taxes imposed for the support of the parliamentary army.

Walley (Richard), the regicide, whose story is told by major Bridgenorth (a roundhead) at the dinner-table.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Wallflowers, young ladies in a ball-room, who have no partners, and who sit or stand near the walls of the ball-room.

Walnut Tree. Fuller says, "A walnut tree must be manured by beating, or else it will not bear fruit." Falstaff makes a similar remark on the camomile plant, "The more it is trodden on, the faster it grows." The almond and some other plants are said to thrive by being bruised.

> A woman, a spaniel, and walnut tree,
> The more you beat them, the better they be.
> Taylor, the "water-poet" (1630).

Walnut Web. When the three princes of a certain king were sent to find out "a web of cloth which would pass through the eye of a fine needle," the White Cat furnished the youngest of the three with one spun by the cats of her palace.

> The prince . . . took out of his box a walnut, which he cracked . . . and saw a small hazel nut, which he cracked also . . . and found therein a kernel of wax. . . . In this kernel of wax was hidden a single grain of wheat, and in the grain a small millet seed. . . . On opening the millet, he drew out a web of cloth 400 yards long, and in it was woven all sorts of birds, beasts, and fishes; fruits and flowers; the sun, moon, and stars; the portraits of kings and queens, and many other wonderful designs.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1682).

Walpurgis Night, the evening of May Day, believed in German superstition to be the occasion for a witches' sabbath on the Brocken, a peak of the Harz mountains.

(Walpurgis is a legendary female saint, who is reputed to have converted the Saxons to Christianity.)

Walsingham, the affianced of Helen Mowbray. Deceived by appearances, he believed that Helen was the mistress of lord Athunree, and abandoned her; but when he discovered his mistake, he married her.—Knowles: Woman's Wit, etc. (1838).

Walsingham (Lord), of queen Elizabeth's court.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Walter, marquis of Saluzzo, in Italy, and husband of Grisilda, the peasant's daughter (q.v.).—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Clerk's Tale," 1388).

(This tale, of course, is allegorical; lord Walter takes the place of deity, and Grisilda typifies the true Christian. In all her privations, in all her sorrows, in all her trials, she says to her lord and master, "Thy will be done.")

Walter (Master), "the hunchback," guardian of Julia. A worthy man, liberal and charitable, frank and honest, who turns out to be the earl of Rochdale and father of Julia.—Knowles: The Hunchback (1831).

Walter [Furst], father-in-law of Tell.—Rossini: Guglielmo Tell (opera, 1829).

Walter the Penniless. (See PENNILESS, p. 823.)

Waltham's Calf (As wise as), a thorough fool. This calf, it is said, ran nine miles when it was hungry to get suckled by a bull.

> Doctor Daupa'tus, Bachler bachelera'tus,
> Dronken as a mouse At the ale-house . . .
> Under a notaries signe Was made a diuine;
> As wise as Waltom's calf.
> Skelton: Colyn Clout (time, Henry VIII.).

Waltheof (The abbot), abbot of St. Withold's Priory.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Waltheof (Father), a grey friar, confessor to the duchess of Rothesay.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Walton (Lord), father of Elvi'ra, who promised his daughter in marriage to sir Richard Forth, a puritan officer. But Elvira had already plighted her love to lord Arthur Talbot, a cavalier. The betrothal was set aside, and Elvira married Arthur Talbot at last.—Bellini: Il Puritani (opera, 1834).

Walton (Sir John de), governor of Douglas Castle.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Wamba, "the son of Witless," the jester of Cedric the Saxon of Rotherwood.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Wampum, a string or belt of whelk-shells, current with the North American Indians as a medium of exchange, and always sent as a present to those with whom an alliance or treaty is made.

Peace be to thee! my words this belt approve.
Campbell: Gertrude of Wyoming, i. 14 (1809).
Our wampum league thy brethren did embrace.
Ditto, i. 15.

Wanderer of Switzerland (The), a poem by Montgomery (1806).

Wanderers. It is said that gipsies are doomed to be wanderers on the face of the earth, because they refused hospitality to the Virgin and Child when the holy family fled into Egypt. (See WILD HUNTSMAN.)—Aventinus: Annalium Boiorum, libri septem (1554).

Wandering Jew (The). (See JEW, p. 546.)

Wandering Knight (The). El Donzel del Febo ("the Knight of the Sun") is so called in the Spanish romance entitled The Mirror of Knighthood.

(Eumen'edês is so called in Peele's Old Wives' Tale, 1590.)

Wandering Willie, the blind fiddler, who tells the tale about sir Robert Redgauntlet and his son sir John.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Wandering Wood, which contained the den of Error. Error was a monster, like a woman upwards, but ending in a huge dragon's tail with a venomous sting. The first encounter of the Red Cross Knight was with this monster, whom he slew.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. 1 (1590).

 When piety (the Red Cross Knight) once forsakes the oneness of truth (Una), it is sure to get into "Wandering Wood," where it will be attacked by "Error."

Wang means "king." Common in China and the Corea.

Wantley (Dragon of), a monster slain by More of More Hall, who procured a suit of armour studded with spikes; and, proceeding to the lair, kicked the dragon in its mouth, where alone it was vulnerable.—Percy: Reliques.

(One of Carey's farces is entitled The Dragon of Wantley.)

Wapping of Denmark (The), Elsinore (3 syl.).

War. The Seven Weeks' War was between Prussia and Austria (1866).

The Seven Months' War was between Prussia and France (1870–71).

The Seven Years' War was between Austria and Prussia (1756–1763).

The Thirty Years' War was between the protestants and papists of Germany (1618–1648).

The Hundred Years' War was between England and France (1340–1453).

War-Cries.

(1) At Senlac the English had two, "God Almighty!" and "Holy Cross!" The latter was probably the cry of Harold's men, and referred to Waltham Cross, which he held in special reverence.

(2) At Naseby the mot of the royalists was, "God and queen Mary!" of the parliamentarians it was "God our Strength!"

(3) The Norman shout was "God help us!"

(4) The Welsh war-cry was "Alleluia!"

Loud, sharp shrieks of "Alleluia!" blended with those of "Out! Out! Holy Crosse!"—Lord Lytton: Harold.

(5) "Ouct! Ouct!" was the cry in full flight, meaning that the standards were to be defended with closed shields.

(6) The Bohemian war-cry was "Prague!" that of the Germans was "Christ!" The leader of the Bohemians was Ottokar; Rudolf of the Germans.

(7) The old Spanish war-cry was "St. Iago! and close, Spain!"

Mount, chivalrous hidalgo; not in vain
Revive the cry, "St. Iago! and close, Spain!"
Byron: Age of Bronze, vii. (1821).

 Cervantes says the cry was "St. Iago! charge, Spain!"

Mr. Bachelor, there is a time to retreat as well as to advance. The cry must always be, "St. Iago! charge Spain!"—Don Quixote, II. i. 4 (1615).

(8) In the battle of Pharsalia, the warery of Pompey's army was "Herculês Invictus!" and of Cæsar's army, "Venus Victrix!"

War of Wartburg, a poetic contest at Wartburg Castle, in which Vogelweid triumphed over Heinrich von Ofterdingen.

They renewed the war of Wartburg,
Which the bard had fought before.
Longfellow: Walter von der Vogelweid (or Bird Meadow).

Warbeck (Perkin) assumed himself to be Richard duke of York, the younger son of Edward IV., supposed to be murdered by order of Richard III. in the Tower.

Parallel Instances. (1) The youngest son of Ivan IV. of Russia was named Dimitri, i.e. Demetrius. He was born in 1581, and was mysteriously assassinated in 1591, some say by Godounov the successor to the throne. Several impostors assumed to be Dimitri, the most remarkable appeared in Poland in 1603, who was recognized as czar in 1605, but perished the year following.

(2) Martin Guerre, in the sixteenth century, left his wife, to whom he had been married ten years, to join the army in Spain. In the eighth year of his absence, one Arnaud du Tilh assumed to be Martin Guerre, and was received by the wife as her husband. For three years he lived with her, recognized by all her friends and relations, but the return of Martin himself dispelled the illusion, and Arnaud was put to death.

(3) The great Tichborne case was a similar imposition. One Orton assumed to be sir Roger Tichborne, and was even acknowledged to be so by sir Roger's mother; but after a long trial it was proved that the claimant of the Tichborne estates was no other than one Orton of Wapping.

(4) In German history, Jakob Rehback, a miller's man, assumed, in 1345, to be Waldemar, an Ascanier margraf. Jakob was a menial in the service of the margraf.

(5) (See JOHN OF LEYDEN, p. 553; and COMEDY OF ERRORS, p. 227.)

Ward (Artemus), Charles F. Browne of America, author of His Book of Goaks (1865). He died in London in 1867.

Ward (Dr.), a footman, famous for his "friars' balsam." He was called to proscribe for George II., and died 1761. Dr. Ward had a claret stain on his left cheek, and in Hogarth's famous picture ("The Undertakers' Arms") the cheek is marked gules. He forms one of the three figures at the top, and occupies the right-hand side of the spectator. The other two figures are Mrs. Mapp and Dr. Taylor.

Warden (Henry), alias HENRY WELLWOOD, the protestant preacher. In the Abbot he is chaplain of the lady Mary at Avenel Castle.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Warden (Michael), a young man of about 30, well-made and good-looking, light-hearted, capricious, and without ballast. He had been so wild and extravagant that Snitchey and Craggs told him it would take six years to nurse his property into a healthy state. Michael Warden told them he was in love with Marion Jeddler, and her he married.—Dickens: The Battle of Life (1846).

Warden Pie (A), a pie made of Warden pears.

Myself with denial I mortify
With a dainty bit of a warden pie.
The Friar of Orders Gray.

Wardlaw, land-steward at Osbaldistone Hall.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Wardlaw (Henry of), archbishop of St. Andrew's.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Wardle (Mr.), an old country gentleman, who had attended some of the meetings of "The Pickwick Club," and felt a liking for Mr. Pickwick and his three friends, whom he occasionally entertained at his house.

Miss [Isabella] Wardle, daughter of Mr. Wardle. She marries Augustus Snodgrass, M.P.C.

Miss Emily Wardle, daughter of Mr. Wardle. She marries Mr. Trundle.—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Wardour (Sir Arthur), of Knockwinnock Castle.

Isabella Wardour, daughter of sir Arthur. She marries lord Geraldin.

Captain Reginald Wardour, son of sir Arthur. He is in the army.

Sir Richard Wardour or "Richard with the Red Hand," an ancestor of sir Arthur.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Ware (Bed of). (See BED OF WARE, p. 101.)

A mighty large bed [the bed of honour], bigger by half than the great bed of Ware; ten thousand people may lie in it together and never feel one another.—Farquhar: The Recruiting Officer (1705).

The bed of Og king of Bashan, which was fourteen feet long, and a little more than six feet wide, was considerably smaller than the great bed of Ware.

His bedstead was a bedstead of iron . . . nine cubits was the length thereof, and four cubits the breadth of it, after the cubit of a man.—Deut. iii. 11.

Waring (Sir Walter), a justice of the peace, whose knowledge of the law was derived from Matthew Medley. His sentences were justices' justice, influenced by prejudice and personal feeling. An ugly old hag would have found from him but scant mercy, while a pretty girl could hardly do wrong in sir Walter's code of law.—Dudley: The Woodman (1771).

Waring, a poem by Robert Browning. Waring was Mr. Alfred Domett, C.M.G., son of captain Nathaniel Domett, born at Camberwell, May 20, 1811. He was a great traveller, and in 1842 settled in New Zealand, and became secretary of that country (1851). He was elected to the House of Representatives, and in 1862 he formed a government. His chief literary work is Ranolf and Amohia, full of descriptions of New Zealand scenery. His volume of poems was published in 1833, before he went to America.

What's become of Waring,
Since he gave us all the slip?
Browning: Waring.

Browning, vol. xvii. p. 285, Biographical Notes.

Warman, steward of Robin Hood while earl of Huntingdon. He betrayed his master into the hands of Gilbert Hoode (or Hood), a prior, Robin's uncle. King John rewarded Warman for this treachery by appointing him high sheriff of Nottingham.

The ill-fac t miser, bribed on either hand,
Is Warman. one the steward of his house,
Who, Judas-like, betraies his liberall lord
Into the hands of that relentlesse prior Calde Gilbert Hoode, uncle of Huntington.
Skelton: Downfall of Robert Earl of Huntington.
(Henry VIII.)

Warming-Pan Hero (The), James Francis Edward Stuart, son of James II. by Mary Beatrice of Modena. Mary d'Este, the wife of James II., never had a living child, but this natural child of James II. was conveyed to her in a warming-pan, with the intention of her passing it off as her own. The Warming-Pan Hero was the first Pretender.—See Macaulay: History of England, ii. 308 (1861); Agnes Strickland: Queens of England, vi. 213, 243 (1849).

Warner, the old steward of sir Charles Cropland, who grieves to see the timber of the estate cut down to supply the extravagance of his young master.—Colman: The Poor Gentleman (1802).

Warning-Givers. (See pp. 1055-1062.)

(1) ALASNAM'S MIRROR. This mirror remained unsullied when it reflected a chaste and pure-minded woman, but became dim when the woman reflected by it was faithless, wanton, and light.—Arabian Nights ("Prince Zeyn Alasnam").

(2) ANTS. Alexander Ross says that the "cruel battle between the Venetians and Insubrians, and also that between the Liegeois and the Burgundians in which 30,000 men were slain, were both presignified by combats between two swarms of ants."—Arcana Microcosmi (appendix, 219).

(3) BAHMAN'S KNIFE (Prince). When prince Bahman started on his exploits, he gave his sister Parizâdê a knife which, he told her, would remain bright and clean so long as he was safe and well, but, immediately he was in danger or dead, would become dull or drop gouts of blood.—Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters").

(4) BAY TREES. The withering of bay trees prognosticates a death.

'Tis thought the king is dead . . .
The bay trees in our country are all withered.
Shakespeare: Richard II. (1597).

(The bay was called by the Romans "the plant of the good angel," because "neyther falling sicknes, neyther devyll, wyll infest or hurt one in that place whercas a bay tree is."—Lupton: Syxt Book of Notable Thinges, 1660.)

(5) BEE. The buzzing of a bee in a room indicates that a stranger is about to pay the house a visit.

(6) BIRTHA'S EMERALD RING. The duke Gondibert gave Birtha an emerald ring which, he said, would preserve its lustre so long as he remained faithful; but would become dull and pale if he proved false to her.—Davenant: Gondibert.

(7) BRAWN'S HEAD (The). A boy brought to king Arthur's court a brawn's head, over which he drew his wand thrice, and said, "There's never a traitor or a cuckold who can carve that head of brawn."—Percy: Reliques ("The Boy and the Mantle").

(8) CANACE'S MIRROR indicated, by its lustre, if the person whom the inspector loved was true or false.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Squire's Tale").

(9) CANDLES. A film of tallow called a winding-sheet, shot from the top of a lighted candle, gives warning to the house of an approaching death; but a bright spark upon the burning wick is the promise of a letter.

(10) CATS on the deck of a ship are said to "carry a gale of wind in their tail," or to presage a coming storm. When cats are very assiduous in cleaning their ears and head, it prognosticates rain.

(11) CATTLE give warning of an earthquake by their uneasiness.

(12) CHILDREN PLAYING SOLDIERS on a road is said to forebode approaching war.

(13) COALS. A cinder bounding from the fire is either a purse or a coffin. Those which rattle when held to the ear are tokens of wealth; those which are mute and solid indicate sickness or death.

(14) CORPSE CANDLES. The ignis fatuus, called by the Welsh canhwyll cyrph or "corpse candle," prognosticates death. If small and of a pale blue colour, it denotes the death of an infant; if large and yellow, the death of one of full age.

Captain Leather, chief magistrate of Belfast, in 1690, being shipwrecked on the Isle of Man, was told that thirteen of his crew were lost, for thirteen corpse candles had been seen moving towards the churchyard. It is a fact that thirteen of the men were drowned in this wreck.—Sacheverell: Isle of Man, 15.

(15) CRADLE. If any one rocks a cradle when it is empty, it forebodes evil to the child.—American Superstition.

(16) CRICKETS. Crickets in a house are a sign of good luck; but if they suddenly leave, it is a warning of death.

(17) CROW (A). A crow appearing to one on the left-hand side indicates some impending evil to the person; and flying over a house, foretells evil at hand to some of the inmates. (See below, "Raven.")

Sæpe sinistra cava prædixit ab ilice cornix.
Virgil: Eclogue, i. 28.

(18) CROWING OF A COCK. Themistocles was assured of his victory over Xerxes by the crowing of a cock, on his way to Artemisium the day before the battle.—Lloyd: Stratagems of Jerusalem, 285.

(19) CROWING OF A HEN indicates approaching disaster.

(20) DEATH-WARNINGS IN PRIVATE FAMILIES—

(a) In Germany. Several princes of Germany have their special warning-givers of death. In some it is the roaring of a lion, in others the howling of a dog. In some it is the tolling of a bell or striking of a clock at an unusual time, in others it is a bustling noise about the castle.—The Living Library, 284 (1621).

(b) In Berlin. A White Lady appears to some one of the household or guard, to announce the death of a prince of Hohenzollern. She was duly seen on the eve of prince Waldemar's death in 1879.

(c) In Bohemia. "Spectrum fœminium vestitu lugubri apparere solet in arce quadam illustris familiæ, antequam una ex conjugibus dominorum illorum e vita decebat."—Debrio: Disquisitiones Magicæ, 592.

(d) In Great Britain. In Wales the corpse candle appears to warn a family of impending death. In Carmarthen scarcely any person dies but some one sees his light or candle.

In Northumberland the warning light is called the person's waff, in Cumberland a swarth, in Ross a task, in some parts of Scotland a fye-token.

King James tells us that the wraith of a person newly dead, or about to die, appears to his friends.—Demonology, 125.

Edgewell Oak indicates the coming death of an inmate of Castle Dalhousie by the fall of one of its branches.

(e) In Scotland. The family of Rothmurchas have the Bodachau Dun or the Ghost of the Hill.

The Kinchardines have the Spectre of the Bloody Hand.

Gartinbeg House used to be haunted by Bodach Gartin.

The house of Tulloch Gorms used to be haunted by Maug Monlach or the Girl with the Hairy Left Hand.

(21) DEATH-WATCH (The). The tapping made by a small beetle called the death-watch is said to be a warning of death.

The chambermaids christen this worm a "Death-watch,"
Because, like a watch, it always cries "click;"
Then woe be to those in the house who are sick,
For sure as a gun they will give up the ghost,
If the maggot cries "click" when it scratches a post.
Swift.

(22) DIVINING-ROD (The). A forked hazel rod, suspended between the balls of the thumbs, was at one time supposed to indicate the presence of water-springs and precious metals by inclining towards the earth beneath which these things might be found. Dousterswivel obtained money by professing to indicate the spot of buried wealth by a divining-rod.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (1816).

(23) DOGS. The howling of a dog at night forebodes death.

A cane prævisa funere disce mori.
R. Kouchen: Crepundia, 113 (1662).

Capitolinus tells us that the death of Maximinus was presaged by the howling of dogs. Pausanias (in his Messenta) says the dogs brake into a fierce howl just before the overthrow of the Messenians. Fincelius says the dogs in Mysinia flocked together and howled just before the overthrow of the Saxons in 1553. Virgil says the same thing occurred just previous to the battle of Pharsalia.

Dogs give warning of death by scratching on the floor of a house.

(24) DOTTERELS.

When dotterels do first appear,
It shows that frost is very near;
But when that dotterels do go,
Then you may look for heavy snow.
Salisbury Saying.

(25) DREAMS. It will be remembered that Joseph, the husband of Mary, was warned by a dream to flee from Judæa; and when Herod was dead he was again warned by a dream to "turn aside into the parts of Galilee."—Matt. ii. 13, 19, 22.

In the Old Testament, Pharaoh had a warning dream of a famine which he was enabled to provide against.—Gen. xli. 15–36.

Pharaoh's butler and baker had warning dreams, one being prevised thereby of his restoration to favour, and the other warned of his execution.—Gen. xl. 5–23.

Nebuchadnezzar had an historic dream, which Daniel explained.—Dan. ii. 1, 31–45.

Abimelech king of Gerar was warned by a dream that Sarah was Abraham's wife and not his sister.—Gen. xx. 3–16.

Jacob had an historic dream on his way to Haran.—Gen. xxviii. 12–15.

Joseph, son of Jacob, had an historic dream, revealing to him his future greatness.—Gen. xxxvii. 5–10.

Daniel had an historic dream about four beasts which indicated four kingdoms (Dan. vii.). Whether his "visions" were also dreams is uncertain (see chs. viii., x.).

It would require many pages to do justice to this subject. Bland, in his Popular Antiquities, iii. 134, gives "A Dictionary of Dreams" in alphabetic order, extracted from The Royal Dream-Book.

(26) DRINKING-HORNS. King Arthur had a horn from which no one could drink who was either unchaste or unfaithful. The cuckold's horn, brought to king Arthur's court by a mysterious boy, gave warning of infidelity, inasmuch as no one unfaithful in love or unleal to his liege lord could drink therefrom without spilling the liquor. The coupe enchantée possessed a similar property.

(27) EAGLE. Tarquinius Priscus was assured that he would be king of Rome, by an eagle, which swooped upon him, took off his cap, rose in the air, and let the cap fall again upon his head.

Aristander assured Alexander of his victory over Darius at the battle of Arbēla, by the flight of an eagle.—Lloyd: Stratagems of Jerusalem, 290.

(28) EAR (The). If the left ear tingles or burns, it indicates that some one is talking evil of you; if the right ear, some one is praising you. The foreboded evil may be averted by biting the little finger of the left hand.

Laudor et adverso, sonat auris, lædor ab ore;
Dextra bono tinnit murmure, læva malo.
R. Kouchen: Crepundia, 113 (1662).

(29) EPITAPHS (Reading). If you would preserve your memory, be warned against reading epitaphs. In this instance the American superstition is the warning-giver, and not the act referred to.

(30) FIR TREES. "If a firr tree be touched, withered, or burned with lightning, it is a warning to the house that the master or mistress thereof shall shortly dye."—Thomas Lupton: Syxt Book of Notable Thinges, iii. (1660).

(31) FIRE. The noise occasioned when the enclosed gas in a piece of burning coal catches fire, is a sure indication of a quarrel between the inmates of the house.

(32) FLORIMEL'S GIRDLE would loosen or tear asunder if any woman unfaithful or unchaste attempted to put it on.—Spenser: Faërie Queene.

(33) GATES OF GUNDOF'ORUS (The). No one carrying poison could pass these gates. They were made of the horn of the horned snake, by the apostle Thomas, who built a palace of sethym wood for this Indian king, and set up the gates.

(34) GROTTO OF EPHESUS (The) contained a reed, which gave forth musical sounds when the chaste and faithful entered it, but denounced others by giving forth harsh and discordant noises.—Lytton: Tales of Miletus, iii.

(35) HARE CROSSING THE ROAD (A). It was thought by the ancient Romans that if a hare ran across the road on which a person was travelling, it was a certain omen of ill luck.

Lepus quoque occurrens in via, infortunatum iter præsagit et ominosum.—Alexander ab Alexandro: Genialium Dierum, libri VI. v. 13, p. 685.

Nor did we meet, with nimble feet,
One little fearful lepus,
That certain sign, as some divine,
Of fortune bad to keep us.
Ellison: Trip to Benwell, lx.

(36) HOOPOE (The). The country people of Sweden consider the appearance of the hoopoe as the presage of war.—Pennant: Zoology, i. 258.

(37) LIZARDS warn men of the approach of a serpent.

(38) LOOKING-GLASSES. If a looking-glass is broken, it is a warning that some one in the house will ere long lose a friend. Grose says it "betokens a mortality in the family, commonly the master."

To break a looking-glass is prophetic that a person will never get married; or, if married, will lose the person wedded.

(39) MAGPIES are prophetic birds. A common Lincolnshire proverb is, "One for sorrow, two for mirth, three for a wedding, four for death;" or thus: "One for sorrow, two for mirth, three a wedding, four a birth."

Augurs and understood relations have,
By magot-pies and choughs and rooks, brought forth
The secret'st man of blood.
Shakespeare: Macbeth (1606).

Alexander Ross tells us that the battle between the British and French, in which the former were overthrown, in the reign of Charles VIII., was foretold by a skirmish between magpies and jackdaws. —Arcana Microcosmi (appendix, 219).

(40) MANTLE (The Test). A boy brought to king Arthur's court a mantle, which no one could wear who was unfaithful in love, false in domestic life, or traitorous to the king. If any such attempted to put it on, it puckered up, or hung slouchingly, or tumbled to pieces.—Percy: Reliques ("The Boy and the Mantle").

(41) METEORS. Falling stars, eclipses, comets, and other signs in the heavens, portend the death or fall of princes.

Meteors fright the fixed stars of heaven;
The pale-faced moon looks bloody on the earth . . .
These signs forerun the death or fall of kings.
Shakespeare: Richard II. act ii. sc. 4 (1597).

Consult Matt. xxiv. 29; Luke xxi. 25.

(42) MICE AND RATS. If a rat or mouse, during the night, gnaw our clothes, it is indicative of some impending evil, perhaps even death.

Nos autem in leves, atque inconsiderati sumus, ut si mures corroserint aliquid querum est opus hoc enum, monstrum putemus? Ante vero Marsicum bellum quod Clypeos Lanuvii—mures roserant, maximum id portentum haruspices esse dixerunt. Quasi vero quicquam intersit, mures diem noctem aliquid rodentes, scuta an cribra corroserint . . . cum vestis a soricibus roditur, plus timere suspicionem futuri mali, quam præsens damnum dolere. Une illud eleganter dictum est Catonis, qui cum esset consultus a quodam, qui sibi erosas esse Caligas diceret a soricibus, respondit; non esset illud monstrum; sed vere monstrum habendum fuisse, si sorices a Caligis roderentur.—Cicero: Divinatio, ii. 27.

(44) MOON (The). When the "mone lies sair on her back, or when her horns are pointed towards the zenith, be warned in time, for foul weather is nigh at hand." —Dr. Jamieson.

Foul weather may also be expected "when the new moon appears with the old one in her arms."

Late, late yestreen I saw the new moone,
Wi' the auld moone in her arme,
And I feir, I feir, my deir master,
That we will coome to harme.
The Ballat of Sir Patrick Spence.

To see a new moon for the first time on the right hand, and direct before you, is lucky; but to see it on the left hand, or to turn round and see it behind you, is the contrary.

If you first see a new moon through glass, your wish will come to pass.

(45) NAILS. A white spot on the thumb-nail promises a present; on the index finger it denotes a friend; on the long finger, a foe; on the third finger, a letter or sweetheart; on the little finger, a journey to go.

In America, white spots on the nails are considered lucky.

In East Anglia spots on the thumbnail are more certain of fulfilment than the others, according to the local doggerel—

> Spots on the finger are sure to linger;
> Spots on the thumb are sure to come.

(46) NOURGEHAN'S BRACELET gave warning of poison by a tremulous motion of the stones, which increased as the poison approached nearer and nearer.—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("The Four Talismans").

(47) OPAL turns pale at the approach of poison.

(48) OWLS. The screeching of an owl forebodes calamity, sickness, or death. On one occasion an owl strayed into the Capitol, and the Romans, to avert the evil, underwent a formal lustration.

> The Roman senate, when within
> The city walls an owl was seen,
> Did cause their clergy with lustrations . . .
> The round-faced prodigy t' avert.
> S. Butler: Hudibras, II. iii. 707 (1664).

The death of Augustus was presaged by an owl singing [screeching] upon the top of the Curia.—Xiphilinus: Abridgment of Dion Cassius.

The death of Commŏdus Antonius, the emperor, was foreboded by an owl sitting on the top of his chamber at Lanuvium.—Julius Obsequens: Prodigies, 85.

The murder of Julius Cæsar was presaged by the screeching of owls.

> The bird of night did sit,
> E'en at noonday, upon the market-place,
> Hooting and shrieking.
> Shakespeare: Julius Cæsar, act i. sc. 3 (1607).

The death of Valentinian was presaged by an owl, which perched on the top of a house where he used to bathe.—Al. Ross: Arcana Microcosmi (appendix, 218).

Antony was warned of his defeat in the battle of Actium by an owl flying into the temple of Concord.—Xiphilinus: Abridgment of Dion Cassius.

The great plague of Würtzburg, in Franconia, in 1542, was foreboded by the screeching of an owl.

Alexander Ross says, "About twenty years ago I did observe that, in the house where I lodged, an owl groaning in the window presaged the death of two eminent persons, who died there shortly after."—Arcana Microcosmi.

(49) PEACOCKS give warning of poison by ruffling their feathers.

(50) PERVIZ'S STRING OF PEARLS (Prince). When prince Perviz went on his exploit, he gave his sister Parizâdê a string of pearls, saying, "So long as these pearls move readily on the string, you may feel assured that I am alive and well; but if they stick fast, they will indicate to you that I am dead."—Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters").

(51) PIGEONS. It is considered by many a sure sign of death in a house if a white pigeon perches on the chimney.

(52) PIGS running about with straws in their mouths give warning of approaching rain.

(53) RATS forsaking a ship forebodes its wreck; and if they forsake a house it indicates that it is on the point of falling down. (See "Mice.")

(54) RAVENS. The raven is said to be the most prophetic of "inspired birds." It bodes both private and public calamities. "To have the foresight of a raven" is a proverbial expression.

The great battle fought between Beneventum and Apicium was portended by a skirmish between ravens and kites on the same spot.—Jovianus Pontanus.

An irruption of the Scythians into Thrace was presaged by a skirmish between crows and ravens.—Nicetas.

Cicero was warned of his approaching death by some ravens fluttering about him just before he was murdered by Popilius Cænas.—Macaulay: History of St. Kilda, 176.

Alexander Ross says, "Mr. Draper, a young gentleman, and my intimate friend, about four or five years ago had one or two ravens, which had been quarrelling on the chimney, fly into his chamber, and he died shortly after."—Arcana Microcosmi.

(55) RHINOCEROS'S HORNS. Cups made of this material will give warning of poison in a liquid by causing it to effervesce.

(56) SALT spilt towards a person indicates contention, but the evil may be averted by throwing a part of the spilt salt over the left shoulder.

> Prodige, subverso casu leviore salino,
> Si mal venturum conjicis omen; adest.
> R. Keuchen: Crepundia, 115 (1666).

(57) SHEARS AND SIEVE (The), ordeals by fire, water, etc., single combats, the cosned or cursed morsel, the Urim and Thummim, the casting of lots,—were all employed as tests of innocence or guilt in olden times, under the notion that God would direct the lot aright, according to Dan. vi. 22.

(58) SHOES. It was thought by the Romans a bad omen to put a shoe on the wrong foot.

> Augustus, having b' overnight,
> Put on his left shoe for his right,

Had like to have been slain that day
By soldiers mutin'ing for pay.
S. Butler: Hudibras.

Auguste . . . restoit immobile et consterné lorsqu'il lui arrivoit par mégarde de mettre le soulier droit au pied gauche.—St. Foix: Essais sur Paris, v. 145.

(59) SHOOTING PAINS. All sudden pains are warnings of evil at hand.

Timeo quod rerum gesserim hic, ita dorsus totus prurit.—Plautus: Miles Gloriosus.

By the pricking of my thumbs,
Something evil this way comes.
Shakespeare: Macbeth (1606).

(60) SNEEZING. Once a wish, twice a kiss, thrice a letter, and oftener than thrice something better.

Sneezing before breakfast is a forecast that a stranger or a present is coming.

Sneezing at night-time. To sneeze twice for three successive nights denotes a death, a loss, or a great gain.

Si dum sternutationes fiant omni nocte ab aliquo, et illud continuitur per tres noctes, signo est quod aliquis vel aliqua de domo morietur vel aliud damnum domui continget, vel maximum lucrum.—Hornmanibus: De Miraculis Mortuorum, 163.

Eustathius says that sneezing to the left is unlucky, but to the right lucky. Hence, when Themistoclês was offering sacrifice before his engagement with Xerxes, and one of the soldiers on his right hand sneezed, Euphrantidês the soothsayer declared the Greeks would surely gain the victory.—Plutarch: Lives ("Themistoclês").

(61) SOOT ON BARS. Flakes of sheeted soot hanging from the bars of a grate foretell the introduction of a stranger.

Nor less amused have I quiescent watched
The sooty films that play upon the bars
Pendulous, and foreboding . . . some stranger's near approach.
Cowper. Winter Evening.

(62) SOPHIA'S PICTURE, given to Mathias, turned yellow if the giver was in danger or in temptation; and black if she could not escape from the danger, or if she yielded to the temptation.—Massinger: The Picture (1629).

(63) SPIDERS indicate to gold-searchers where it is to be found. (See SPIDERS INDICATORS OF GOLD, p. 1036.)

(64) STAG'S HORN is considered in Spain to give warning of an evil eye, and to be a safeguard against its malignant influences.

(65) STONE. To find a perforated stone is a presage of good luck.

(66) SWALLOWS forecast bad weather by flying low, and fine weather by flying high.

(67) TEETH WIDE APART warn a person to seek his fortune away from his native place.

(68) THUNDER. Thunder on Sunday portends the death of some learned man, judge, or author; on Monday, the death of women; on Tuesday, plenty of grain; on Wednesday, the death of harlots, or bloodshed; on Thursday, plenty of sheep, cattle, and corn; on Friday, the death of some great man, murder, or battle; on Saturday, it forebodes pestilence or sickness.—Leonard Digges: A Prognostication Everlasting of Ryght Good Effecte (1556).

(69) TOLLING BELL. You will be sure of tooth-ache if you eat while a funeral bell is tolling. Be warned in time by this American superstition, or take the consequences.

(70) VEIPSEY, a spring in Yorkshire, called "prophetic," gives due warning of a dearth by rising to an unusual height.

(71) VENETIAN GLASS. If poison is put into liquor contained in a vessel made of Venetian glass, the vessel will crack and fall to pieces.

(72) WARNING STONES. Bakers in Wiltshire and in some other counties used to put a certain kind of pebble in their ovens, to give notice when the oven was hot enough for baking. When the stone turned white, the oven was fit for use.

(73) WATER OF JEALOUSY (The). This was a beverage which the Jews used to assert no adulteress could drink without bursting.—Five Philosophical Questions Answered (1653).

(74) WHITE ROSE (The). A white rose gave assurance to a twin-brother of the safety or danger of his brother during his absence. So long as it flourished and remained in its pride of beauty, it indicated that all went well; but if it drooped, faded, or died, it was a warning of danger, sickness, or death.—The Twin-Brothers.

(75) WITCH HAZEL. A forked twig of witch hazel, made into a divining-rod, was supposed, in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, to give warning of witches, and to be efficacious in discovering them.

(76) WORMS. If, on your way to a sick person, you pick up a stone and find no living thing under it, it tells you that the sick person will die, but if you find there an ant or worm, it presages the patient's recovery.

Si visitans ægrum, lapidem inventum per viam attollat, et sub lapide inveniatur vermis se movens, aut formica vivens, faustum omen est, et indicium fore ut æger convalescat, si nihil inveniatur res est conclamata et certa mors.—Buchardus: Decretorum, lib. xix.

(See also SUPERSTITIONS, pp. 1055-1061.)

Warren (Widow), "twice married and twice a widow." A coquette of 40, aping the airs of a girl; vain, weak, and detestable. Harry Dornton, the banker's son, is in love with her daughter, Sophia Freelove; but the widow tries to win the young man for herself, by advancing money to pay off his friend's debts. When the father hears of this, he comes to the rescue, returns the money advanced, and enables the son to follow his natural inclinations by marrying the daughter instead of the designing mother.

A girlish, old coquette, who would rob her daughter, and leave her husband's son to rot in a dungeon, that she might marry the first fool she could find.—Holcroft: The Road to Ruin, v. 2 (1792).

Warren Hastings (Charges against), by John Logan. Hastings was governor-general of India, and no doubt greatly increased the power of England in India, but on his return home he was charged with aggression, bribery, and other offences. Burke (in a speech which lasted four days) charged him with oppression and injustice; Sheridan charged him for defrauding the princess of Oude; and Fox charged him for his exactions on Cheyte Sing; but he was acquitted, and lived 24 years afterwards in retirement. He died 1818, aged 86.

Wart (Thomas), a poor, feeble, ragged creature, one of the recruits in the army of sir John Falstaff. — Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. act iii. sc. 2 (1598).

Warwick (The earl of), a tragedy by Dr. T. Franklin. It is the last days and death of the "king-maker" (1767).

Warwick (The House of). Of this house it is said, "All the men are without fear, and all the women without stain." This brag has been made by many of our noble families, and it is about as complimentary as that paraded of queen Victoria, that she is a faithful wife, a good mother, and a virtuous woman. It is to be hoped that the same may be said of most of her subjects also.

Warwick Lane (City), the site of the house belonging to the Beauchamps, earls of Warwick.

Washington of Africa (The). William Wilberforce is so called by lord Byron. As Washington was the chief instrument in liberating America, so Wilberforce was the chief instigator of slave emancipation.

Thou moral Washington of Africa.
Byron: Don Juan, xiv. 8s (1824).

Washington of Columbia, Simon Bolivar (1785-1831).

Wasky, sir Iring's sword.

Right through the head-piece straight
The knight sir Hagan paid,
With his resistless Wasky,
That sharp and peerless blade.
Nibelungen Lied, 35 (1210).

Wasp, in the drama called Bartholomew Fair, by Ben Jonson (1614).

Benjamin Johnson (1665-1742), commonly called Ben Johnson . . . seemed to be proud to wear the poet's double name, being particularly great in all that author's plays that were usually performed, viz. "Wasp," "Corbaccio," "Morose," and "Ananias."—Chetwood: History of the Stage.

("Corbaccio," in The Fox; "Morose," in The Silent Woman; and "Ananias," in The Alchemist.)

Waste Time Utilised.

(1) BAXTER wrote his Saint's Everlasting Rest on a bed of sickness (1615-1691).

(2) BLOOMFIELD composed The Farmer's Boy in the intervals of shoemaking (1766-1823).

(3) BRAMAH (Joseph), a peasant's son, occupied his spare time when a mere boy in making musical instruments, aided by the village blacksmith. At the age of 16, he hurt his ankle while ploughing, and employed his time while confined to the house in carving and making woodwares. In another forced leisure from a severe fall, he employed his time in contriving and making useful inventions, which ultimately led him to fame and fortune (1749-1814).

(4) BUNYAN wrote Pilgrim's Progress while confined in Bedford jail (1628-1688). (See PRISON LITERATURE, p. 874.)

(5) BURRITT (Elihu) made himself acquainted with ten languages while plying his trade as a village blacksmith (Hebrew, Greek, Syriac, Spanish, Bohemian, Polish, Danish, Persian, Turkish, and Ethiopic). His father was a village cobbler, and Elihu had only six months' education, and that at the school of his brother (1811-1879).

(6) CAREY, the missionary and Oriental translator, learnt the rudiments of Eastern languages while employed in making and mending shoes (1761-1834).

(7) CLEMENT (Joseph), son of a poor weaver, was brought up as a thatcher, but, by utilizing his waste moments in self-education and works of skill, he raised himself to a position of great note, giving employment to thirty workmen (1779–1844).

(8) COBBETT learnt grammar in the waste time of his service as a common soldier (1762–1835).

(9) D'AGUESSEAU, the great French chancellor, observing that Mme. D'Aguesseau always delayed ten or twelve minutes before she came down to dinner, began and completed a learned book of three volumes (large quarto), solely during these "waste minutes." This work went through several editions (1668–1751).

(10) ETTY utilized indefatigably every spare moment he could pick up when a journeyman printer (1787–1849).

(11) FERGUSON taught himself astronomy while tending sheep in the service of a Scotch farmer (1710–1776).

(12) FRANKLIN (Benjamin), while working as a journeyman printer produced his Dissertation on Liberty and Necessity, Pleasure and Pain (1706–1790).

(13) MILLER (Hugh) taught himself geology while working as a mason (1802–1856).

(14) PAUL worked as a tentmaker in intervals of travel and preaching.

∴ This brief list must be considered only as a hint and heading for enlargement. Of course, Henry Cort, William Fairbairn, Fox of Derby, H. Maudslay, David Mushet, Murray of Leeds, J. Nasmyth, J. B. Neilson, Roberts of Manchester, Whitworth, and scores of others will occur to every reader. Indeed, genius for the most part owes its success to the utilization of waste time.

Wastle (William), pseudonym of John Gibson Lockhart, in Blackwood's Magazine (1794–1854).

Wat Dreary, alias BROWN WILL, a highwayman in captain Macheath's gang. Peachum says "he has an underhand way of disposing of the goods he stole," and therefore he should allow him to remain a little longer "upon his good behaviour."—Gay: The Beggar's Opera, i. (1727).

Wat Tyler. (See TYLER, p. 1152.)

Wat's Dyke, a dyke which runs from Flintshire to Beachley, at the mouth of the Wye. The space between Wat's Dyke and Offa's Dyke was accounted neutral ground, where Danes and Saxons might traffic with the British without molestation. The two dykes are in some places as much as three miles asunder, but in others they approach within 500 yards of each other.

Archdeacon Williams says that Offa's Dyke was never a line of defence, and that it is certainly older than Offa, as five Roman roads cross it.

> There is a famous thing
> Called Offa's Dyke, that reacheth far in length.
> All kinds of ware the Danes might thither bring:
> It was free ground, and called the Britons' strength.
> Wat's Dyke, likewise, about the same was set,
> Between which two both Danes and Britons met
> In traffic.
> Churchyard: Worthiness of Wales (1587).

Water (The Dancing), a magic spring of water, which ensured perpetual youth and beauty.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Chery and Fairstar," 1682).

Water (The Yellow), a magic spring of water, which had this peculiarity: If only a few drops of it were placed in a basin, no matter how large, they would fill the basin without overflowing, and form a fountain.—Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters").

Water-Poet (The), John Taylor, the Thames waterman (1580–1654).

Water Standard, Cornhill (The). The spot from which miles were measured. It stood at the east end of the street, at the parting of four ways. In 1582 Peter Morris erected there a water standard for the purpose of supplying water to Thames Street, Gracechurch Street, and Leadenhall; and also for cleansing the channels of the streets towards Bishopsgate, Aldgate, the Bridge, and Stocks' Market.—Stow: Survey of London, 459 (1598).

(There was another water standard near Oldbourne.)

N.B.—Any substantial building for the supply of water was called a standard; hence the Standard in Cheap, made in 1430 by John Wills, mayor, "with a small stone cistern." Our more modern drinking-fountains are "standards."

Water-Wraith, the evil spirit of the waters.

> By this the storm grew loud apace,
> The water-wraith was shrieking.
> Campbell: Lord Ullin's Daughter.

Water from the Fountain of Lions, a sovereign remedy for fevers of every kind.—Arabian Nights ("Ahmed and Pari-Banou").

Water made Wine. Alluding to the first miracle of Christ, Richard Crashaw says (1643)—

Lympha pudica Deum vidit et erubuit.
(The modest water saw its God, and blushed.)

Water of Jealousy (The). This was a beverage which the Jews used to affirm no adulteress could drink without bursting.—Five Philosophical Questions Answered (1653).

Water of Life. This water has the property of changing the nature of poison, and of making those salutary which were most deadly. A fairy gave some in a phial to Florina, and assured her that however often she used it, the bottle would always remain full.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Florina," 1682).

Water of Youth. In the Basque legends we are told of a "water," one drop of which will restore youth to the person on whom it is sprinkled. It will also restore the dead to life, and the enchanted to their original form. It is called "the dancing water" in the tale called The Princess Fairstar, by the comtesse D'Aulnoy (1682). (See OLD AGE RESTORED, p. 772.)

Waters (Father of), Irawaddy in Burham. The Mississippi in North America.

Waters (young, i.e. young), a ballad. At yule-tide many a "well-favoured man" came to the king's court, and the king asked his queen which she thought the fairest of all. She replied, "young Waters." This excited the king's jealousy, who ordered Waters to be imprisoned in Stirling Castle, and subsequently to be beheaded.—Percy: Reliques, ser. ii. bk. ii. 18.

Waterloo (The Field of), a poem by sir W. Scott (1815).

On Waterloo's ensanguined plain
Full many a gallant man was slain;
But none, by bullet or by shot,
Fell half so flat as Walter Scott.
Anon.

Waterman (The), Tom Tug. The title of a ballad opera by T. Dibdin (1774). (For the plot, see WILELMINA BUNDLE.)

Watkins (William), the English attendant on the prince of Scotland.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Watkin's Pudding (Sir), a famous Welsh dish; so named from sir Watkin Lewis, a London alderman, who was very fond of it.

Watling Street and the Foss. The vast Roman road called Watling Street starts from Richborough, in Kent, and, after passing the Severn, divides into two branches, one of which runs to Anglesey, and the other to Holy Head.

The Foss runs north and south from Michael's Mount, in Cornwall, to Caithness, the northern extremity of Scotland.

Those two mighty ways, the Watling and the Foss . . .
. . . the first doth hold her way
From Dover to the farth'st of fruitful Anglesey;
The second, south and north, from Michael's utmost mount
To Caithness, which the farth'st of Scotland we account.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Secunda via principalis dicitur "Watelingstreate," tendens ab euro-austro in zephyrum septentrionalem. Incipit enim a Dovaria, tendens per medium Cantiæ, juxta London, per S. Albanum, Dunstaplum, Stratfordiam, Towcestriam, Litleburne, per montem Gilberti juxta Salopiam, deinde per Stratton et per medium Walliæ, usque Cardigan.—Leland: Itinerary of England (1712).

Watling Street of the Sky (The), the Milky Way.

Watts (Dr. Isaac). It is said that Isaac Watts, being beaten by his father for wasting his time in writing verses, exclaimed—

O father, pity on me take,
And I will no more verses make.

¶ Ovid, the Latin poet, is credited with a similar anecdote—

Parce, precor, genitor, posthac non versificabo.

Wauch (Mansie), fictitious name of D. M. Moir, author of The Life of Mansie Wauch, Tailor in Dalkeith, written by himself (1828).

Waverley, the first of Scott's historical novels, published in 1814. The materials are Highland feudalism, military bravery, and description of natural scenery. There is a fine vein of humour, and a union of fiction with history. The chief characters are Charles Edward the Chevalier, the noble old baron of Bradwardine, the simple faithful clansman Evan Dhu, and the poor fool Davie Gellatley with his fragments of song and scattered gleams of fancy.

Scott did not prefix his name to Waverley, being afraid that it might compromise his poetical reputation.—Chambers: English Literature, ii. 586.

Waverley (Captain Edward) of Waverley Honour, and hero of the novel called by his name. Being gored by a stag, he resigned his commission, and proposed marriage to Flora M'Ivor, but was not accepted. Fergus M'Ivor (Flora's brother) introduced him to prince Charles Edward. He entered the service of the Young Chevalier, and in the battle of Preston Pans saved the life of colonel Talbot. The colonel, out of gratitude, obtained the pardon of young Waverley, who then married Rose Bradwardine, and settled down quietly in Waverley Honour.

Mr. Richard Waverley, the captain's father, of Waverley Honour.

Sir Everard Waverley, the captain's uncle.

Mistress Rachel Waverley, sister of sir Everard.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Waverley Novels (The). All the novels of sir Walter Scott are included under this term; but not the three tales called Aunt Margaret's Mirror, The Laird's Jock, and The Tapestried Chamber.

Wax (A lad o'), a spruce young man, like a model in wax. Lucretius speaks of persona cerea, and Horace of the waxen arms of Telephus, meaning beautiful in shape and colour.

> A man, young lady! Lady, such a man
> As all the world—— Why, he's a man o' wax.
> Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet (1595).

Way of the World (The), a comedy by W. Congreve (1700). The "way of the world" is to tie up settlements to wives, to prevent their husbands squandering their wives' fortunes. Thus, Fainall wanted to get into his power the fortune of his wife, whom he hated, but found it was "in trust to Edward Mirabell," and consequently could not be tampered with.

Way to Keep Him (The), a comedy by Murphy (1760). The object of this drama is to show that women, after marriage, should not wholly neglect their husbands, but should try to please them, and make home agreeable and attractive. The chief persons are Mr. and Mrs. Lovemore. Mr. Lovemore has a virtuous and excellent wife, whom he esteems and loves; but, finding his home insufferably dull, he seeks amusement abroad; and those passions which have no play at home lead him to intrigue and card-playing, routs and dubious society. The under-plot is this: Sir Bashful Constant is a mere imitator of Mr. Lovemore, and lady Constant suffers neglect from her husband and insult from his friends, because he foolishly thinks it is not comme il faut to love after he has married the woman of his choice.

Ways and Means, a comedy by Colman the younger (1788). Random and Scruple meet at Calais two young ladies, Harriet and Kitty, daughters of sir David Dunder, and fall in love with them. They come to Dover, and accidentally meet sir David, who invites them over to Dunder Hall, where they are introduced to the two young ladies. Harriet is to be married next day, against her will, to lord Snolts, a stumpy, "gummy" nobleman of five and forty; and, to avoid this hateful match, she and her sister agree to elope at night with the two young guests. It so happens that a series of blunders in the dark occur, and sir David himself becomes privy to the whole plot, but, to prevent scandal, he agrees to the two marriages, and discovers that the young men, both in family and fortune, are quite suitable to be his sons-in-law.

Wayland (Launcelot) or WAYLAND SMITH, farrier in the vale of Whitehorse. Afterwards disguised as the pedlar at Cumnor Place.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Wayland Wood (Norfolk), said to be the site where "the babes in the wood" were left to perish. According to this tradition, "Wayland Wood" is a corruption of Wailing Wood.

Wayside Inn (Tales of a), poems in various metres by Longfellow (1863). The tales are—

> The Landlord's Tale, the Student's Tale, The Spanish Jew's Tale, The Sicilian Tale, The Musician's Tale, The Theologian's Tale, and the Poet's Tale. There is also a Prelude and a Finale.

Wealth makes Worth.

> A man of wealth is dubbed a man of worth.
> Pope: Imitations of Horace, vi. 81 (1734).
> Et genus, et formam, regina Pecunia donat,
> Ac bene nummatum decorat Suadela Venusque.
> Horace: Epist., vi.
> Beauty and wisdom money can bestow,
> Venus and wit to wealth their honours throw.
> E. C.

Wealth of Nations (The), an enquiry into the nature and causes of national wealth by Adam Smith (1776).

Wealtheow (2 syl.), wife of Hrothgar king of Denmark.

> Wealtheow went forth; mindful of their races, she . . . greeted the men in the hall. The freeborn lady first handed the cup to the prince of the East Danes. . . . The lady of the Helmings then went about every part . . she gave treasure-vessels, until the opportunity occurred that she (a queen hung round with rings) . . bore forth the mead-cup to Beowulf, . . and thanked God that her will was accomplished, that an earl of Denmark was a guarantee against crime.—Beowulf (Anglo-Saxon epic, sixth century).

Wealthy (Sir William), a retired City merchant, with one son of prodigal propensities. In order to save the young man from ruin, the father pretends to be dead, disguises himself as a German baron, and, with the aid of coadjutors, becomes the chief creditor of the young scapegrace.

Sir George Wealthy, the son of sir William. After having run out his money, Lucy is brought to him as a courtezan; but the young man is so moved with her manifest innocence and tale of sorrow that he places her in an asylum where her distresses would be sacred, "and her indigent beauty would be guarded from temptation."

Mr. Richard Wealthy, merchant, the brother of sir William; choleric, straightforward, and tyrannical. He thinks obedience is both law and gospel.

Lucy Wealthy, daughter of Richard. Her father wants her to marry a rich tradesman, and, as she refuses to do so, turns her out of doors. She is brought to sir George Wealthy as a fille de joie; but the young man, discerning her innocence and modesty, places her in safe keeping. He ultimately finds out that she is his cousin, and the two parents rejoice in consummating a union so entirely in accordance with both their wishes.—Foote: The Minor (1760).

Weary-all Hill, above Glastonbury, to the left of Tor Hill. This spot is the traditional landing-place of Joseph of Arimathæa; and here is the site (marked by a stone bearing the letters A. I. A.D. XXXI.) of the holy thorn.

When the saint arrived at Glastonbury, weary with his long journey, he stuck his staff into the ground, and the staff became the famous thorn, the site being called "Weary-all Hill."

Weatherport (Captain), a naval officer.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Weaver-Poet of Inverurie (The), William Thom (1799–1850).

Wea'zel (Timothy), attorney-at-law at Lestwithiel, employed as the agent of Penruddock.—Cumberland: The Wheel of Fortune (1778).

Web in a Millet Seed (The). This was a web wrapped in a millet seed. It was 400 yards long, and on it were painted all sorts of birds, beasts, and fishes; fruits, trees, and plants; rocks and shells; the sun, moon, and stars; the likenesses of all the kings and queens of the earth, and many other curious devices.

The prince took out of a ruby box a walnut, which he cracked, . . . and saw inside it a small hazel nut, which he cracked also, and found inside a kernel of wax. He peeled the kernel, and discovered a corn of wheat, and in the wheat a grain of millet, which contained the web.—Comtesse D'Aulney: Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1682).

Wedding. The fifth anniversary is the Wooden Wedding, because on that occasion the suitable offerings to the wife are knick-knacks made of wood.

The fifteenth is the Copper Wedding, and all gifts are to be of copper.

The twenty-fifth anniversary is called the Silver Wedding, because the woman on this occasion should be presented with a silver wreath.

The fiftieth anniversary is called the Golden Wedding, because the wreath or flowers presented should be made of gold. In Germany, the marriage ceremony was repeated on the fiftieth anniversary. In 1879 William, king of Prussia and German emperor, celebrated his "golden wedding."

The seventy-fifth anniversary is called the Diamond Wedding, because the correct present to the wife of such a standing would be a diamond. This period is shortened into the sixtieth anniversary.

Mr. T. Morgan Owen, of Bronwylfa, Rhyl, says there are in Llanrhydd churchyard, near Denbigh, the two following inscriptions:—

(1) John and Elin Owen, married 1579, died 1659. Announced thus—

Whom one nuptial bed did containe for 80 years do here remaine. Here lieth the body of Elin, wife of John Owen, who died the 25 day of March, 1659. Here lieth the body of John Owen, who died the 23 day of August, 1659.

(2) Katherine and Edward Iones, married 1638, died 1708. Announced thus—

They lived amicably together in matrimony 70 years. Here lyeth the body of Katherine Davies, the wife of Edward Iones, who was buried the 27 day of May, 1708, aged 91 years. Here the body of Edward Iones, son of John-ap-David, Gent., lyeth, who was buried the 24 day of May, 1708, aged 91 years.—Times, July 4, 1879 (weekly edition).

Wedding (The), a poem by sir John Suckling, noted for the lines—

Her feet beneath her petticoat,
Like little mice, stole in and out,
As if they feared the light.

(1659.)

Wedding Day (The), a comedy by Mrs. Inchbald (1790). The plot is this: Sir Adam Contest lost his first wife by shipwreck, and "twelve or fourteen years" afterwards he led to the altar a young girl of 18, to whom he was always singing the praises of his first wife—a phœnix, a paragon, the ne plus ultra of wives and women. She did everything to make him happy. She loved him, obeyed him; ah! "he would never look upon her like again." On the wedding day, this pink of wives and women made her appearance, told how she had been rescued, and sir Adam was dumbfounded. "He was happy to bewail her loss," but to rejoice in her restoration was quite another matter.

(Fielding had written a comedy so called in 1740.)

Weeping Philosopher (The), Heraclitos, who looked at the folly of man with grief (fl. B.C. 500). (See JEDDLER, p. 542.)

Weir (Major), the favourite baboon of sir Robert Redgauntlet. In the tale of "Wandering Willie," sir Robert's piper went to the infernal regions to obtain the knight's receipt of rent, which had been paid; but no receipt could be found, because the monkey had carried it to the castle turret.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Compare with this the Jackdaw of Rheims (see p. 911.)

Weissnichtwo, nowhere. The word is German for "I know not where," and was coined by Carlyle (Sartor Resartus, 1833). Sir W. Scott has a similar Scotch compound, "Kennaquhair" ("I know not where"). Cervantes has the "island of Trapoban" (i.e. of "dish-clouts," from trapos, the Spanish for a "dish-clout"). Sir Thomas More has "Utopia" (Greek, ou topos, "no place"). We might add the "island of Medăma" (Greek, "nowhere"), the "peninsula of Udamogês" (Greek, "nowhere on earth"), the country of "Kennahtwhar," etc., and place them in the great "Nullibian" ocean ("nowhere"), in any degree beyond 180° long. and 90° lat.

Wel'ford, one of the suitors of "the Scornful Lady" (no name is given to the lady).—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Scornful Lady (1616).

(Beaumont died 1616.)

Well. Three of the most prominent Bible characters met their wives for the first time by wells of water, viz. Isaac, Jacob, and Moses.

Eliezer met Rebekah by a well, and arranged with Bethuel for her to become Isaac's wife.—Gen. xxiv.

Jacob met Rachel by the well of Haran.—Gen. xxix.

When Moses fled from Egypt into the land of Midian, he "sat down by a well," and the seven daughters of Jethro came there to draw water, one of whom, named Zipporah, became his wife.—Exod. ii. 15–21.

¶ The princess Nausicăa, daughter of Alcinŏos king of the Phæacians, was with her maidens washing their dirty linen in a rivulet, when she first encountered Ulysses.—Homer: Odyssey, vi.

Well (A). "A well and a green vine running over it," emblem of the patriarch Joseph. In the church at Totnes is a stone pulpit divided into compartments, containing shields decorated with the several emblems of the Jewish tribes. On one of the shields is "a well and a green vine running over it."

> Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by well; whose branches run over the wall.—Gen. xlix. 22.

Well of English Undefiled. So Chaucer is called by Spenser.

> Dan Chaucer, well of English undefiled,
> On Fame's eternal bead-roll worthy to be filed.
> Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 2 (1596).

Welland, a river of England, which passes by Stamford, etc., and empties itself into the Wash. Drayton speaks of an ancient prophecy which brought to this river great reverence—

> That she alone should drown all Holland, and should see
> Her Stamford . . . as renowned for liberal arts . . .
> As they in Cambridge are, or Oxford ever were.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1622).

(The "Holland" here referred to is not the Netherlands, but a district of Lincolnshire so called. See HOLLAND, p. 496.)

Well-Beloved (The), Charles VI. of France, Le Bien-Aimé (1368, 1380–1422).

Louis XV. of France, Le Bien-Aimé (1710, 1715–1774).

Well-Founded Doctor (The), Ægidius de Colonna; also called "The Most Profound Doctor" (Doctor Fundatissimus et Theologorum Princeps); sometimes surnamed "Romănus," because he was born in the Campagna di Roma, but more generally "Colonna," from a town in the Campagna (1257–1316).

Wellborn (Francis, usually called Frank), nephew of sir Giles Overreach, and son of sir John Wellborn, who "bore the whole sway" of Northamptonshire, kept a large estate, and was highly honoured. Frank squandered away the property, and got greatly into debt, but induced lady Allworth to give him her countenance, out of gratitude and respect to his father. Sir Giles fancies that the rich dowager is about to marry his nephew, and, in order to bring about this desirable consummation, not only pays all his debts, but supplies him liberally with ready money. Being thus freed from debt, and having sown his wild oats, young Wellborn reforms, and lord Lovell gives him a "company."—Massinger: A New Way to Pay Old Debts (1625).

Weller (Samuel), boots at the White Hart, and afterwards servant to Mr. Pickwick, to whom he becomes devotedly attached. Rather than leave his master when he is sent to the Fleet, Sam Weller gets his father to arrest him for debt. His fun, his shrewdness, his comparisons, his archness, and his cunning on behalf of his master, are unparalleled.

Tony Weller, father of Sam; a coachman of the old school, who drives a coach between London and Dorking. Naturally portly in size, he becomes far more so in his great-coat of many capes. Tony wears top-boots, and his hat has a low crown and broad brim. On the stage-box he is a king, elsewhere he is a mere greenhorn. He marries a widow, landlady of the Marquis of Granby, and his constant advice to his son is, "Sam, beware of the widders."—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Wellington of Gamblers (The). Lord Rivers was called in Paris Le Wellington des Joueurs.

Wellington's Horse, Copenhagen. It died at the age of 27.

Wemmick, the cashier of Mr. Jaggers the lawyer. He lived at Walworth. Wemmick was a dry man, rather short in stature, with square, wooden face. "There were some marks in the face which might have been dimples if the material had been softer." His linen was frayed; he wore four mourning rings, and a brooch representing a lady, a weeping willow, and a cinerary urn. His eyes were small and glittering; his lips small, thin, and mottled; his age was between 40 and 50 years. Mr. Wemmick wore his hat on the back of his head, and looked straight before him, as if nothing was worth looking at. Mr. Wemmick at home and Mr. Wemmick in his office were two distinct beings. At home, he was his "own engineer, his own carpenter, his own plumber, his own gardener, his own Jack-of-all-trades," and had fortified his little wooden house like commodore Trunnion (q.v.) and he called it his "castle." His father (82 years of age) lived with him, and he called him "The Aged." The old man was very deaf, but heated the poker with delight to fire off the nine-o'clock signal, and chuckled with joy because he could hear the bang. The house had a "real flagstaff," and a plank which crossed a ditch some four feet wide and two feet deep was the drawbridge. At nine o'clock p.m. Greenwich time the gun (called "The Stinger") was fired.

> The piece of ordnance was mounted in a separate fortress, constructed of lattice-work. It was protected from the weather by an ingenious little tarpaulin contrivance in the nature of an umbrella.—Dickens: Great Expectations, xxv. (1860).

(This is a bad imitation of Smollett. In commodore Trunnion such a conceit is characteristic, but in a lawyer's clerk not so. Still, it might have passed as a good whim if it had been original.)

Wenlock (Wild Wenlock), kinsman of sir Hugo de Lacy constable of Chester. His head is cut off by the insurgents.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Weno'nah, mother of Hiawatha and daughter of Noko'mis. Nokomis was swinging in the moon, when some of her companions, out of jealousy, cut the ropes, and she fell to earth "like a falling star." That night was born her first child, a daughter, whom she named Wenonah. In due time Wenonah was wooed and won by Mudjekee'wis (the west wind), and became the mother of Hiawatha. The false West Wind deserted her, and the young mother died.

> Fair Nokomis bore a daughter,
> And she called her name Wenonah.
> Longfellow: Hiawatha, iii. 1855).

Wentworth (Eva), the beau-ideal of female purity. She was educated in strict seclusion. De Courcy fell in love with her, but deceived her; whereupon she died calmly and tranquilly, elevated by religious hope. (See ZAIRA.)—Maturin: Women (a romance, 1822).

Werburg (St.), born a princess. By her prayers she drove the wild geese from Weedon.

> She falleth in her way with Weedon, where, 'tis said,
> St. Werburg, princely born—a most religious maid—
> From those peculiar fields, by prayer the wild geese drove.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiii. 1622).

Were-Wolf, or Wehr-Wolf (a tyl.), a man-wolf, a man transformed into a wolf temporarily or otherwise. (See LOUP-GAROU, p. 629; SOLOGNE, p. 1085.) This creature played a prominent part in German Christmas tales of the Middle Ages.

Oft through the forest dark
Followed the were-wolf's bark.
Longfellow: The Skeleton in Armour.

Werner, the boy said to have been crucified at Bacharach, on the Rhine, by the Jews. (See HUGH OF LINCOLN, p. 516.)

The innocent boy, who, some years back,
Was taken and crucified by the Jews,
In that ancient town of Bacharach!
Longfellow: The Golden Legend (1851).

Werner or Kruitzner (count of Siegendorf), father of Ulric. Being driven from the dominions of his father, he wandered about for twelve years as a beggar, hunted from place to place by count Stral'enheim. At length, Stralenheim, travelling through Silesia, was rescued from the Oder by Gabor (alias Ulric), and was lodged in an old tumble-down palace, where Werner had been lodging for some few days. Here Werner robbed the count of a rouleau of gold, and next day the count was murdered by Ulric (without the connivance or even knowledge of Werner). When Werner succeeded to the rank and wealth of count Siegendorf, he became aware that his son Ulric was the murderer, and denounced him. Ulric departed, and Werner said, "The race of Siegendorf is past."—Byron: Werner (1821).

(This drama is borrowed from "Kruitzner, or The German's Tale," in Miss H. Lee's Canterbury Tales, 1797–1805.)

Werther, a young German student, of poetic fancy and very sensitive disposition, who falls in love with Lotte (2 syl.) the betrothed and afterwards the wife of Albert. Werther becomes acquainted with Lotte's husband, who invites him to stay with him as a guest. In this visit he renews his love, which Lotte returns. So the young man mewls and pules after forbidden fruit with sickly sentimentality, and at last puts an end to his life and the tale at the same time.—Goethe: Sorrows of Werther (1774).

The sort of thing to turn a young man's head,
Or make a Werther of him in the end.
Byron: Don Juan, xiv. 64 (1824).

 "Werther" is meant for Goethe himself, and "Albert" for his friend Kestner, who married Charlotte Buff, with whom Goethe was in love, and whom he calls "Lotte" (the heroine of the novel).

(In 1817 George Duval produced a parody on this novel, in the form of a three-act farce entitled Werther ou les Egarements d'un Cœur Sensible.)

Thackeray wrote a satirical poem called The Sorrows of Werther.

The Werther of Politics. The marquis of Londonderry is so called by lord Byron. Werther, the personification of maudling sentimentality, is the hero of Goethe's romance entitled The Sorrows of Werther (1774).

It is the first time since the Normans, that England has been insulted by a minister who could not speak English, and that parliament permitted itself to be dictated to in the language of Mrs. Malaprop. . . . Let us hear no more of this man, and let Ireland remove the ashes of her Grattan from the sanctuary of Westminster. Shall the Patriot of Humanity repose by the Werther of Politics?—Byron: Don Juan (preface to canto vi., etc., 1824).

Wer'therism (th = t), spleen, megrims from morbid sentimentality, a settled melancholy and disgust of life. The word is derived from the romance called The Sorrows of Werther, by Goethe (1774), the gist of which is to prove "Whatever is is wrong."

Wessel (Peder), a tailor's apprentice, who rose to the rank of vice-admiral of Denmark, in the reign of Christian V. He was called Tor'denskiold (3 syl.), corrupted into Tordenskiol (the "Thunder Shield"), and was killed in a duel.

North Sea! a glimpse of Wessel rent
Thy murky sky. . . .
From Denmark thunders Tordenskiol;
Let each to heaven commend his soul,
And fly.
Longfellow: King Christian [V.].

Wessex, Devonshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, and their adjacents. Ivor son of Cadwallader, and Ini or Hiner his nephew, were sent to England by Cadwallader when he was in Rome, to "govern the remnant of the Britons."

As the generals, [Ac]
His nephew Ivor chose, and Hiner for his pheer;
Two most undaunted sp'rits these valiant Britons were,
The first who Wessex won.
Drayton: Polyolbion, ix. (1612).

(The kingdom of Wessex was founded in 495 by Cerdic and Cynric, and Ini was king of Wessex from 688 to 726. Instead of being a British king who ousted the Saxons, he was of the royal line of Cerdic, and came regularly to the succession.)

West Indian (The), a comedy by R. Cumberland (1771). Mr. Belcour, the adopted son of a wealthy Jamaica merchant, on the death of his adopted father came to London, to the house of Mr. Stockwell, once the clerk of Belcour, senior. This clerk had secretly married Belcour's daughter, and when her boy was born it was "laid as a foundling at her father's door." Old Belcour brought the child up as his own son, and at death "bequeathed to him his whole estate." The young man then came to London as the guest of Mr. Stockwell, the rich merchant, and accidentally encountered in the street Miss Louisa Dudley, with whom he fell in love. Louisa, with her father captain Dudley, and her brother Charles, all in the greatest poverty, were lodging with a Mr. Fulmer, a small bookseller. Belcour gets introduced, and, after the usual mistakes and hairbreadth escapes, makes her his wife.

Western (Squire), a jovial, fox-hunting country gentleman, supremely ignorant of book-learning, very prejudiced, selfish, irascible, and countrified; but shrewd, good-natured, and very fond of his daughter Sophia.

Philip, earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, was in character a squire Western, choleric, boisterous, illiterate, selfish, absurd, and cowardly.—Osborne: Secret History, I. 218.

Squire Western stands alone; imitated from no prototype, and in himself an inimitable picture of ignorance, prejudice, irascibility, and rusticity, united with natural shrewdness, constitutional good humour, and an instinctive affection for his daughter.—Encyclopædia Britannica (article "Fielding").

Sophia Western, daughter of squire Western. She becomes engaged to Tom Jones the foundling.—Fielding: Tom Jones (1749).

There now are no squire Westerns, as of old;
And our Sophias are not so emphatic,
But fair as them [sic] or fairer to behold.
Byron: Don Juan, xiii. 110 (1824).

Westlock (John), a quondam pupil of Mr. Pecksniff ("architect and land surveyor"). John Westlock marries Ruth, the sister of Tom Pinch.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1843).

Westminster Abbey of Denmark (The), the cathedral of Roeskilde, some sixteen miles west of Copenhagen.

N.B.—The tradition is that St. Peter himself dedicated the church, and announced to a fisherman that he (Peter), patron of fishermen, had done so. Sibert had asked Militus (the first bishop of London) to perform the ceremony, but St. Peter anticipated him. Edward the Confesssor, who rebuilt the abbey, testifies the truth of legend.

I am Peter, keeper of the keys of heaven. When Militus arrives to-morrow, tell him what you have seen, and shew him the token that I have consecrated my own church of St. Peter, Westminster.—Recited by Edward the Confessor in his new charter. (See Notes and Queries, January 29, 1856, p. 65.)

Westmoreland, according to fable, is West-Mar-land. Mar or Marius, son of Arvirăgus, was king of the British, and overthrew Rodric the Scythian in the north-west of England, where he set up a stone with an inscription of this victory, "both of which remain to this day."—Geoffrey: British History, iv. 17 (1142).

Westward Hoe, a comedy by Thomas Dekker (1607). The Rev. Charles Kingsley published a novel in 1854 entitled Westward Ho! or The Voyages and Adventures of Sir Amyas Leigh in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. (See EASTWARD HOE, p. 311.)

Wetheral (Stephen), surnamed "Stephen Steelheart," in the troop of lord Waldemar Fitzurse (a baron following prince John).—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Wetherell (Elisabeth), Miss Susan Warner, authoress of The Wide Wide World (1852), Queechy (1853), etc.

Wetzweiler (Tid) or Le Glorieux, the court jester of Charles "the Bold" duke of Burgundy.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Whachum, journeyman to Sidrophel. He was Richard Green, who published a pamphlet of base ribaldry, called Hudibras in a Snare (1667).

A paltry wretch he had, half-starved,
That him in place of zany served,
Hight Whachum.
S. Butler: Hudibras, ii. 3 (1664).

Whally Eyes, i.e. Whale-like eyes. Spenser says that "Whally eyes are a sign of jealousy."—Faërie Queene, I. iv. 24 (1590).

Whang, an avaricious Chinese miller, who, by great thrift, was pretty well off. But one day, being told that a neighbour had found a pot of money which he had dreamt of, he began to be dissatisfied with his slow gains and longed for a dream also. At length the dream came. He dreamt there was a huge pot of gold concealed under his mill, and set to work to find it. The first omen of success was a broken mug, then a house-tile, and at length, after much digging, he came to a stone so large that he could not lift it. He ran to tell his luck to his wife, and the two tugged at the stone; but as they removed it, down fell the mill in utter ruins.—Goldsmith: A Citizen of the World, lxx. (1759).

What Next? a farce by T. Dibdin. Colonel Clifford meets at Brighton two cousins, Sophia and Clarissa Touchwood, and falls in love with the latter, who is the sister of major Touchwood. He imagines that her Christian name is Sophia, and so is accepted by colonel Touchwood, Sophia's father. Now, it so happens that major Touchwood is in love with his cousin Sophia, and looks on colonel Clifford as his rival. The major tries to outwit his supposed rival, but finds they are both in error—that it is Clarissa whom the colonel wishes to marry, and that Sophia is free to marry the major.

What will he do with it? a novel by lord Lytton (1858).

Wheel of Fortune (The), a comedy by R. Cumberland (1779).

(For the plot and tale, see PENRUDDOCK, p. 823.)

Where art thou, Beam of Light? (See LUMON, p. 640.)

Whetstone Cut by a Razor (A). Accius Navius, the augur, cut a whetstone with a razor in the presence of Tarquin the elder.

In short, 'twas his fate, unemployed or in place, sir,
To eat mutton cold, and cut blocks with a razor.
Goldsmith: Retaliation ("Burke" is referred to, 1774).

Whiffers (Mr.), a footman in the "swarry," related in chap. xxxvii. of the Pickwick Papers by Dickens (1836).

Whiffle (Captain), a loathsome fop, "radiant in silk lace and diamond buckles."—Smollett: Roderick Random (1748).

Whimple (Mrs.), in Great Expectations, a novel by Dickens (1861).

Whims (Queen), the monarch of Whimdom, or country of whims, fancies, and literary speculations. Her subjects were alchemists, astrologers, fortune-tellers, rhymers, projectors, schoolmen, and so forth. The best way of reaching this empire is "to trust to the whirlwind and the current." When Pantagruel's ship ran aground, it was towed off by 7,000,000 drums quite easily. These drums are the vain imaginings of whimsyists. Whenever a person is perplexed at any knotty point of science or doctrine, some drum will serve for a nostrum to pull him through.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, v. 18, etc. (1545).

Whim'sey, a whimsical, kind-hearted old man, father to Charlotte and "young" Whimsey.

As suspicious of everybody above him, as if he had been bred a rogue himself.—Act i. 1.

Charlotte Whimsey, the pretty daughter of old Whimsey; in love with Monford. —J. Cobb: The First Floor.

Whip with Six Lashes, the "Six Articles" of Henry VIII. (1539).

Whipping Boy, a boy kept to be whipped when a prince deserved chastisement.

(1) BARNABY FITZPATRICK stood for Edward VI.

(2) D'OSSAT and DU PERRON, afterwards cardinals, were whipped by Clement VIII. for Henri IV. of France.—Fuller: Church History, ii. 342 (1655).

(3) MUNGO MURRAY stood for Charles I.

(4) RAPHAEL was flogged for the son of the marquis de Leganez; but, not seeing the justice of this arrangement, he ran away.—Lesage: Gil Blas, v. 1 (1724).

Whisker, the pony of Mr. Garland, Abel Cottage, Finchley.

There approached towards him a little, clattering, jingling, four-wheeled chaise, drawn by a little, obstinate-looking, rough-coated pony, and driven by a little, fat, placid-faced old gentleman. Beside the little old gentleman sat a little old lady, plump and placid like himself, and the pony was coming along at his own pace, and doing exactly as he pleased with the whole concern. If the old gentleman remonstrated by shaking the reins, the pony replied by shaking his head. It was plain that the utmost the pony would consent to do was to go in his own way, . . . after his own fashion, or not at all.—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop, xiv. (1840).

Whiskerandos (Don Fero'lo), the sentimental lover of Tilburina.—Sheridan: The Critic, ii. 1 (1779).

Whisky Insurrection (The), a popular name given, in the United States, to an outbreak in Western Pennsylvania, in 1794, resulting from an attempt to enforce an excise law passed in 1791, imposing duties on domestic distilled liquors. It spread into the border counties, but was finally suppressed by general Henry Lee, governor of Virginia, with an armed force.

Whist (Father of the game of), Edmond Hoyle (1672–1769).

Whistle (The). In the train of Anne of Denmark, when she went to Scotland with James VI., was a gigantic Dane of matchless drinking capacity. He had an ebony whistle which, at the beginning of a drinking bout, he would lay on the table, and whoever was last able to blow it, was to be considered the "Champion of the Whistle." In Scotland the Dane was defeated by sir Robert Laurie of Maxwelton, who, after three days' and three nights' hard drinking, left the Dane under the table, and "blew on the whistle his requiem shrill." The whistle remained in the family several years, when it was won by sir Walter Laurie, son of sir Robert; and then by Walter Riddel of Glenriddel, brother-in-law of sir Walter Laurie. The last person who carried it off was Alexander Ferguson of Craigdarroch, son of "Annie Laurie," so well known.

(Burns has a ballad on the subject, called The Whistle.)

Whistle. The blackbird, says Drayton, is the only bird that whistles.

Upon his dulcet pipe the merle doth only play.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Paying too dear for one's whistle. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 1294.)

Whistler (The), a young thief, natural son of sir G. Staunton, whom he shot after his marriage with Effie Deans. —Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Whistling. Mr. Townley, of Hull, says, in Notes and Queries, August 2, 1879, that a Roman Catholic checked his wife, who was whistling for a dog: "If you please, ma'am, don't whistle. Every time a woman whistles, the heart of the blessed Virgin bleeds."

Une poule qui chante le coq et une fille qui siffle portent malheur dans la maison.
La poule ne doit point chanter devant le coq.
A whistling woman and a crowing hen
Are neither good for God or men.

Whitaker (Richard), the old steward of sir Geoffery Peveril.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Whitchurch, in Middlesex (or Little Stanmore), is the parish, and William Powell was the blacksmith, made celebrated by Handel's Harmonious Blacksmith. Powell died 1780.

White Birds. Some Mohammedans believe that the spirits of the faithful (if neither prophets nor martyrs) abide under the throne of God, in the form of white birds. Martyrs are green birds, and prophets are taken to paradise direct in propria persona.

White Cat (The). A certain queen, desirous of obtaining some fairy fruit, was told she might gather as much as she would if she would give to them the child about to be born. The queen agreed, and the new-born child was carried to the fairies. When of marriageable age, the fairies wanted her to marry Migonnet a fairy-dwarf, and, as she refused to do so, changed her into a white cat. Now comes the second part. An old king had three sons, and promised to resign the kingdom to that son who brought him the smallest dog. The youngest son wandered to a palace, where he saw a white cat endowed with human speech, who gave him a dog so tiny that the prince carried it in an acorn shell. The father then said he would resign his crown to that son who brought him home a web, 400 yards long, which would pass through the eye of a needle. The White Cat gave the prince a toil 400 yards long packed in the shale of a millet grain. The king then told his sons he would resign his throne to that son who brought home the handsomest bride. The White Cat told the prince to cut off its head and tail. On doing so, the creature resumed her human form, and was acknowledged to be the most beautiful woman on the earth.

Her eyes committed theft upon all hearts, and her sweetness kept them captive. Her shape was majestic, her air noble and modest, her wit flowing, her manners engaging. In a word, she was beyond everything that was lovely.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1682).

White Clergy (The), the parish priests, in contradistinction to The Black Clergy or monks, in Russia.

White-Cotton Night-Cap Country. (See RED-COTTON NIGHT-CAP COUNTRY, p. 902.)

White Cross Knights, the Knights Hospitallers. The Knights Templars wore a red cross.

Robert Browning: The Return of the Druses, i.

White Devil of Wallachia. George Castriota, known as "Scanderbeg," was called by the Turks "The White Devil of Wallachia" (1404-1467).

White Elephant (King of the), a title of the kings of Ava and Siam.

White Fast (The), the day of atonement in the Jewish synagogues.

White Friars (The), the Carmelites, who dress in white.

(There is a novel by Miss Emma Robinson called White Friars.)

White Hoods (or Chaperons Blancs), the insurgents of Ghent, led by Jean Lyons, noted for their fight at Minnewater to prevent the digging of a canal which they fancied would be injurious to trade.

Saw the fight at Minnewater, saw the "White Hoods" moving west.
Longfellow: The Belfry of Bruges.

White Horse (A), the Saxon banner, still preserved in the royal shield of the house of Hanover.

A burly, genial race has raised
The White Horse standard.
Woolner: My Beautiful Lady.

White Horse (Lords of the), the old Saxon chiefs, whose standard was a white horse.

And tampered with the lords of the White Horse.
Tennyson: Guinevere.

White Horse of the Peppers, a sprat to catch a mackerel. After the battle of the Boyne, the estates of many of the Jacobites were confiscated, and given to the adherents of William III. Amongst others, the estate of the Peppers was forfeited, and the Orangeman to whom it was awarded went to take possession. "Where was it, and what was its extent?" These were all-important questions; and the Orangeman was led up and down, hither and thither, for several days, under pretence of showing them to him. He had to join the army by a certain day, but was led so far afield that he agreed to forego his claim if supplied with the means of reaching his regiment within the given time. Accordingly, the "white horse," the pride of the family, and the fastest animal in the land, was placed at his disposal, the king's grant was revoked, and the estate remained in the possession of the original owner.—Lover: Stories and Legends of Ireland (1832–34).

White Horse of Wantage (Berkshire), cut in the chalk hills. The horse is 374 feet long, and may be seen at the distance of fifteen miles. It commemorates a great victory obtained by Alfred over the Danes, called the battle of Æscesdun (Ashdown), during the reign of his brother Ethelred in 871. (See RED HORSE, p. 903.)

In this battle all the flower of the barbarian youth was there slain, so that neither before nor since was ever such a destruction known since the Saxons first gained Britain by their arms.—Ethelwerd: Chronicle, ii. A. 871. (See also Asser, Life of Alfred, year 871.)

White King, the title of the emperor of Muscovy, from the white robes which these kings were accustomed to use.

Sunt qui principem Moscovia Album Regem nuncupant. Ego quidem causam diligenter quærebam, cur regio ille nomine appellaretur cum nemo principum Moscovia eo titulo antea [Basilius Possewitch] esset usus. . . . Credo autem ut Persam nunc propter rubea tegumenta capitis "Kisilpassa" (i.e. rubeum cuput) vocant; ita reges Moscoviæ propter alba tegumenta "Albos Reges" appellari.—Sigismund.

(Perhaps it may be explained thus: Muscovy is always called "Russia Alba," as Poland is called "Black Russia.")

White King (The). Charles I. is so called by Herbert. His robe of state was white instead of purple. At his funeral the snow fell so thick upon the pall that it was quite white.—Herbert: Memoirs (1764).

White Lady (The), "La Dame d'Aprigny," a Norman fée, who used to occupy the site of the present Rue de St. Quentin, at Bayeux.

La Dame Abonde, also a Norman fée.

Vocant dominam Abundiam pro eo quod domibus, quas frequentant, abundantiam bonorum temporalium præstare putantur non aliter tibi sentiendum est neque aliter quam quemadmodum de illis audivisti.—William of Auvergne (1248).

White Lady (The), a ghost seen in different castles and palaces belonging to the royal family of Prussia, and supposed to forebode the death of some of the royal family, especially one of the children. The last appearance was in 1879, just prior to the death of prince Waldemar. Twice she has been heard to speak, e.g.: In December, 1628, she appeared in the palace at Berlin, and said in Latin, "I wait for judgment;" and once at the castle of Neuhaus, in Bohemia, when she said to the princess, in German, "It is ten o'clock;" and the lady addressed died in a few weeks.

∴ There are, in fact, two white ladies: one the countess Agnes of Orlamunde; and the other the princess Bertha von Rosenberg, who lived in the fifteenth century. The former was buried alive in a vault in the palace. She was the mistress of a margrave of Brandenburgh, by whom she had two sons. When the prince became a widower, Agnes thought he would marry her, but he made the sons an objection, and she poisoned them, for which crime she was buried alive. Another version is that she fell in love with the prince of Parma, and made away with her two daughters, who were an obstacle to her marriage, for which crime she was doomed to "walk the earth" as an apparition.

The princess Bertha is troubled because an annual gift, which she left to the poor, has been discontinued. She appears dressed in white, and carrying at her side a bunch of keys.

It may interest those who happen to be learned in Berlin legends, to know that the White Lady, whose visits always precede the death of some member of the royal family, was seen on the eve of prince Waldemar's death. A soldier on guard at the old castle was the witness of the apparition, and in his fright fled to the guard-room, where he was at once arrested for deserting his post.—Brief, April 4, 1879.

White Lady of Avenel (2 syl.), a tutelary spirit.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Aping in fantastic fashion
Every change of human passion.

White Lady of Ireland (The), the benshee or domestic spirit of a family, who takes an interest in its condition, and intimates approaching death by wailings or shrieks.

White Man's Grave (The), Sierra Leonê, in Africa.

White Merle (The). Among the old Basque legends is one of a "white merle," which, by its singing, restores sight to the blind.—Rev. W. Webster: Basque Legends, 182 (1877).

¶ The French have a similar story, called Le Merle Blanc.

White Moon (Knight of the), Samson Carrasco. He assumed this cognizance when he went as a knight-errant to encounter don Quixote. His object was to overthrow the don in combat, and then impose on him the condition of returning home, and abandoning the profession of chivalry for twelve months. By this means he hoped to cure the don of his craze. It all happened as the barber expected: the don was overthrown, and returned to his home, but soon died. —Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iv. 12, etc. (1615).

White Mount in London (The), the Tower, which the Welsh bards insist was built by the Celts. Others ascribe "the Towers of Julius" to the Romans; but without doubt they are Norman.

Take my head and bear it unto the White Mount, in London, and bury it there, with the face towards France.—The Mabinogion ("Branwen," etc., twelfth century).

White Queen (The), Mary queen of Scots (La Reine Blanche). So called by the French, because she dressed in white in mourning for her husband.

White Rose (The), the house of York, whose badge it was. That of the house of Lancaster was the Red Rose.

(Richard de la Pole is often called "The White Rose.")

White Rose of England (The). Perkin Warbeck was so called by Margaret of Burgundy sister of Edward IV. (*–1499).

White Rose of Raby (The), Cecily, wife of Richard duke of York, and mother of Edward IV. and Richard III. She was the youngest of twenty-one children.

(A novel entitled The White Rose of Raby was published in 1794.)

White Rose of Scotland (The), lady Katherine Gordon, the [? fifth] daughter of George second earl of Huntly by his second wife [princess Annabella Stuart, youngest daughter of James I. of Scotland]. She married Richard of England, styled "duke of York," but better known as "Perkin Warbeck." She had three husbands after the death of "Richard of England." Probably lady Katherine was called the "White Rose" from the badge assumed by her first husband "the White Rose of York," and "Scotland" was added from the country of her birth. Margaret of Burgundy always addressed Perkin Warbeck as "The White Rose of England."

White Rose of York (The), Edward Courtney earl of Devon, son of the marquis of Exeter. He died at Padua, in queen Mary's reign (1553).

White Surrey, the favourite charger of Richard III.

Saddle White Surrey for the field to-morrow.
Shakespeare: Richard III. act v. sc. 3 (1597).

White Tsar of His People. The emperor of Russia is so called, and claims the empire of seventeen crowns.

White Widow (The), the duchess of Tyrconnel, wife of Richard Talbot lord deputy of Ireland under James II. After the death of her husband, she supported herself by her needle. She wore a white mask, and dressed in white.—Pennant: Account of London, 147 (1790).

White Witch (A), a "witch" who employs her power and skill for the benefit and not the harm of her fellow-mortals.

Whites (The), an Italian faction of the fourteenth century. The Guelphs of Florence were divided into the Blacks who wished to open their gates to Charles de Valois, and the Whites who opposed him. The poet Dante was a "White," and when the "Blacks" in 1302 got the upper hand, he was exiled. During his exile he composed his immortal epic, the Divina Commedia.

Whitecraft (John), innkeeper and miller at Altringham.

Dame Whitecraft, the pretty wife of the above.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Whitfield of the Stage (The). Quin was so called by Garrick (1716–1779). Garrick himself is sometimes so denominated also.

Whitney (James), the Claude Duval of English highwaymen. He prided himself on being "the glass of fashion and the mould of form." Executed at Porter's Block, near Smithfield (1660–1694).

Whit-Sunday. One of the etymologies of this word is Wit or Wisdom Sunday; the day on which the Spirit of Wisdom fell upon the apostles.

> This day Whitsonday is cald
> For wisdom and wit serene fald,
> Was zonen to the apostles as this day.
> Camb. Univ. MSS. Pd., i. f. p. 234.

Whittington (Dick), a poor orphan country lad, who heard that London was "paved with gold," and went there to get a living. When reduced to starving point, a kind merchant gave him employment in his family, to help the cook, but the cook so ill treated him that he ran away. Sitting to rest himself on the roadside, he heard Bow bells, and they seemed to him to say, "Turn again, Whittington, thrice lord mayor of London;" so he returned to his master. By-and-by the master allowed him, with the other servants, to put in an adventure in a ship bound for Morocco. Richard had nothing but a cat, which, however, he sent. Now it happened that the king of Morocco was troubled by mice, which Whittington's cat destroyed; and this so pleased his highness that he bought the mouser at a fabulous price. Dick commenced business with this money, soon rose to great wealth, married his master's daughter, was knighted, and thrice elected lord mayor of London—in 1398, 1406, and 1419.

(Such is the tale. Some persons assert that Whittington's "cat" was a brig built on the Norwegian model, with narrow stern, projecting quarters, and deep waist. Others think the word achat, "barter," furnishes the right solution.)

¶ KEIS, the son of a poor widow of Siraf, embarked for India with his sole property, a cat. He arrived at a time when the palace was so infested by mice and rats that they actually invaded the king's food. This cat cleared the palace of its vermin, and was purchased for a large sum of money, which enriched the widow's son.—Sir William Ouseley (a Persian story).

¶ ALPHONSO, a Portuguese, being wrecked on the coast of Guinea, had a cat, which the king bought for its weight in gold. With this money Alphonso traded, and in five years made £6000, returned to Portugal, and became in fifteen years the third magnate of the kingdom.—Description of Guinea.

(See Keightley, Tales and Popular Fictions, 241–266.)

Whittle (Thomas), an old man of 63, who wants to marry the Widow Brady, only 23 years of age. To this end he assumes the airs, the dress, the manners, and the walk of a beau. For his thick flannels, he puts on a cambric shirt, open waistcoat, and ruffles; for his Welsh wig, he wears a pigtail and chapeau bras; for his thick cork soles, he trips like a dandy in pumps. He smirks, he titters, he tries to be quite killing. He discards history and solid reading for the Amorous Repository, Cupid's Revels, Hymen's Delight, and Ovid's Art of Love. In order to get rid of him, the gay young widow assumes to be a boisterous, rollicking, extravagant, low Irishwoman, deeply in debt, and utterly reckless. (See BRADY, p. 143.)—Garrick: The Irish Widow (1757).

Who's the Dupe? Abraham Dolley, a retired slop-seller, with £80,000 or more. Being himself wholly uneducated, he is a great admirer of "larning," and resolves that his daughter Elizabeth shall marry a great scholar. Elizabeth is in love with captain Granger, but the old slop-seller has fixed his heart on a Mr. Gradus, an Oxford pedant. The question is how to bring the old man round. (For the rest, see GRANGER, p. 443.)—Mrs. Cowley: Who's the Dupe?

Whole Duty of Man (The). Sir James Wellwood Moncrieff, bart., was so called by Jeffrey (1776–1851).

Wicked Bible (The), 1631. It leaves out the word "not" in the seventh commandment, which thus reads, "Thou shalt commit adultery."

Wicket Gate (The), the entrance to the road which leads to the Celestial City. Over the door is written, "KNOCK, AND

IT SHALL BE OPENED UNTO YOU."—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, i. (1678).

Wickfield (Mr.), a lawyer, father of Agnes. The "'umble" Uriah Heep was his clerk.

Agnes Wickfield, daughter of Mr. Wickfield; a young lady of sound sense and domestic habits, lady-like and affectionate. She is the second wife of David Copperfield.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Wickham (Mrs.), a waiter's wife. Mrs. Wickham was a meek, drooping woman, always ready to pity herself or to be pitied; and with a depressing habit of prognosticating evil. She succeeded Polly Toodles as nurse to Paul Dombey.—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Wiclevista, Wicliffism.

Some of them barke, Clatter and carpe, Of that heresy art
Called Wicleuista, The deuelishe dogmatista.
Skelton: Colyn Clout (time, Henry VIII.).

Wicliffe, called "The Morning Star of the Reformation" (1324–1384).

Widdrington (Roger), a gallant squire, mentioned in the ballad of Chevy Chase. He fought "upon his stumps," after his legs were smitten off. (See BENBOW, p. 110.

Widenostrils (in French, Bringuenarilles), a huge giant, who "had swallowed every pan, skillet, kettle, frying-pan, dripping-pan, saucepan, and caldron in the land, for want of windmills, his usual food." He was ultimately killed by "eating a lump of fresh butter at the mouth of a hot oven, by the advice of his physician."—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, iv. 17 (1545).

Widerolf, bishop of Strasbourg (997), was devoured by mice in the seventeenth year of his episcopate, because he suppressed the convent of Seltzen on the Rhine. (See HATTO, p. 474.)

Widow (Goldsmith's), in the Deserted Village, par. 9.

All but yon widowed, solitary thing,
That feebly bends beside the plashy spring;
She, wretched matron, forced in age, for bread,
To strip the brook, with mantling cresses spread,
To pick her wintry faggot from the thorn,
To seek her nightly shed, and weep till morn;
She only left of all the harmless train,
The sad historian of the pensive plain.

Her name was Catherine GERAGHTY.

Widow (The), courted by sir Hudibras, was the relict of Amminadab Willmer or Willmot, an independent, slain at Edgehill. She was left with a fortune of £200 a year. The knight's "Epistle to the Lady" and the "Lady's Reply," in which she declines his offer, are usually appended to the poem entitled Hudibras.

Widow Blackacre, a perverse, bustling, masculine, pettifogging, litigious woman.—Wycherly: The Plain Dealer (1677).

Widow Flockhart, landlady at Waverley's lodgings in the Canongate.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Widow's Curl (A), a small refractory lock of hair that will not grow long enough to be bound up with the tresses, but insists on falling down in a curl upon the forehead. It is said that this curl indicates widowhood.

Widow's Peak (A), a point made in some foreheads by the hair projecting towards the nose like a peak. It is said to indicate widowhood.

Wieland or Volund, the wonderful blacksmith of the Scandinavian deities, corresponding to the Latin Vulcan. He made Siegfried's famous sword Balmung. King Nidung cut the sinews of his feet and confined him in his forge, but he violated the king's daughter and escaped in a feather boat. His adventures are related in the "Song of Völund" in the Elder Edda.

Wieland's Sword, Balmung (q.v.), made by him for Siegfried.—Scandinavian Mythology.

Wiever (Old), a preacher and old conspirator.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Wife (The), a drama by S. Knowles (1833). Mariana, daughter of a Swiss burgher, nursed Leonardo in a dangerous sickness—an avalanche had fallen on him, and his life was despaired of, but he recovered, and fell in love with his young and beautiful nurse. Leonardo intended to return to Mantua, but was kept a prisoner by a gang of thieves, and Mariana followed him, for she found life intolerable without him. Here count Florio fell in love with her, and obtained her guardian's consent to marry her; but Mariana refused to do so, and was arraigned before the duke (Ferrardo), who gave judgment against her. Leonardo was at the trial, disguised, but, throwing off his mask, was found to be the real duke, supposed to be dead. He assumed his rank, and married Mariana; but, being called to the wars, left Ferrardo regent. Ferrardo, being a villain, hatched up a plot against the bride of infidelity to her lord, but Leonardo would give no credit to it, and the whole scheme of villainy was fully exposed.

(The tale of Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream hinges on a similar "law of marriage.")

Wife for a Month (A), a drama by John Fletcher (1624). (For the plot, see EVANTHE, p. 347.)

Wife of Bath, one of the pilgrims to the shrine of Thomas à Becket.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (1388).

(Gay wrote a comedy called The Wife of Bath, in 1713.)

Wife of Bath's Tale. One of king Arthur's knights was condemned to death for ill-using a lady; but Guinever interceded for him, and the king gave him over to her to do what she liked. The queen said she would spare his life, if, by that day twelve months, he would tell her "What is that which woman loves best?" The knight made inquiry far and near for a solution; but at length was told by an old woman, that if he would grant her a request, she would tell him the right answer to the queen's question. The knight agreed. The answer suggested was that what a woman likes best is to have her own sweet will,—and the request made was that he would marry her. The knight at first revolted because she was poor, old, and ugly. The woman then asked him which he preferred, to have her as she was and a faithful wife, or to have her young and fair. He replied he would leave the decision with her. Whereupon she threw off her mask, and appeared before him young, beautiful, and rich.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (1388).

(This tale is borrowed from Gower's Confessio Amantis, i., where Florent promises to marry a deformed old hag, who taught him the solution of a riddle.)

Wig. In the middle of the eighteenth century, there were thirty-four different sorts of wigs in use: the artichoke, bag, barrister's, bishop's, busby, brush, bush, buckle chain, chancellor's, corded wolf's paw, count Saxe's mode, the crutch, the cut bob, the detached buckle, the drop, Dutch, full, half natural, Jansenist bob, judge's, ladder, long bob, Louis, periwig, pigeon's wing, rhinoceros, rose, scratch, she-dragon, small back, spinage seed, staircase, Welsh, and wild boar's back.

His periwig was large enough to have loaded a camel, and he bestowed upon it at least a bushel of powder.—Brown: Letters (time, Charles II.).

Wigged Prince in Christendom (The Best). So the guardian, uncle-in-law, and first cousin of the duke of Brunswick was called.

Wight (The Isle of). So called from Wihtgar, great-grandson of king Cedric, who conquered the island.—The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle.

(Of course, this etymology is not philologically correct. Probably guyth, "the channel" (the channel island), is the real derivation.)

Wigmore Street (London). So called from Harley earl of Oxford and Mortimer, created baron Harley of Wigmore, in Herefordshire (1711).

Wild (Jonathan), a cool, calculating, heartless villain, with the voice of a Stentor. He was born at Wolverhampton, in Staffordshire, and, like Jack Sheppard, was the son of a carpenter.

He had ten maxims: (1) Never do more mischief than is absolutely necessary for success; (2) Know no distinction, but let self-interest be the one principle of action; (3) Let not your shirt know the thoughts of your heart; (4) Never forgive an enemy; (5) Shun poverty and distress; (6) Foment jealousies in your gang; (7) A good man, like money, must be risked in speculation; (8) Counterfeit virtues are as good as real ones, for few know paste from diamonds; (9) Be your own trumpeter, and don't be afraid of blowing loud; (10) Keep hatred concealed in the heart, but wear the face of a friend.

Jonathan Wild married six wives. Being employed for a time as a detective, he brought to the gallows thirty-five highwaymen, twenty-two burglars, and ten returned convicts. He was himself executed at last at Tyburn for housebreaking (1682–1725).

(Daniel Defoe made Jonathan Wild the hero of a romance (1725). Fielding did the same in 1743. In these romances he is a coward, traitor, hypocrite, and tyrant, unrelieved by human feeling, and never betrayed into a kind or good action. The character is historic, but the adventures are in a measure fictitious.)

Wild Boar of Ardennes, William de la Marck.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

(The count de la Marck was third son of John count de la Marck and Aremberg. He was arrested at Utrecht, and beheaded by order of Maximilian emperor of Austria, in 1485.)

Wild Boy of Hameln, a human being found in the forest of Hertswold, in Hanover. He walked on all fours, climbed trees like a monkey, fed on grass and leaves, and could never be taught to articulate a single word. He was discovered in 1725, was called "Peter the Wild Boy," and efforts were made to reclaim him, but without success. He died at Broadway Farm, near Berkhampstead, in 1785.

¶ Mlle. Lablanc was a wild girl found by the villagers of Soigny, near Chalons, in 1731. She died in Paris in 1780.

Wild-Goose Chase (The), a comedy by John Fletcher (1652). The "wild goose" is Mirabel, who is "chased" and caught by Oriana, whom he once despised.

Wild Horses (Death by). The hands and feet of the victim were fastened to two or four wild horses, and the horses, being urged forward, ran in different directions, tearing the victim limb from limb. The following are examples:—

(1) METTIUS SUFFETIUS was fastened to two chariots, which were driven in opposite directions. This was for deserting the Roman standard (B.C. 669).—Livy: Annals, i. 28.

(2) SALCÈDE, a Spaniard, employed by Henri III. to assassinate Henri de Guise, failed in his attempt, and was torn limb from limb by four wild horses.

(3) NICHOLAS DE SALVADO was torn to pieces by wild horses for attempting the life of William prince of Orange.

(4) BALTHAZAR DE GERRARD was similarly punished for assassinating the same prince (1584).

(5) JOHN CHASTEL was torn to pieces by wild horses for attempting the life of Henri IV. of France (1594).

(6) FRANÇOIS RAVAILLAC suffered a similar death for assassinating the same prince (1610).

Wild Huntsman (The), a spectral hunter with dogs, who frequents the Black Forest to chase wild animals.—Sir W. Scott: Wild Huntsman (from Bürger's ballad).

(The legend is that this huntsman was a Jew, who would not suffer Jesus to drink from a horse-trough, but pointed to some water collected in a hoof-print, and bade Him go there and drink.—Kuhn von Schwars: Nordd. Sagen, 499.)

¶ The French story of Le Grand Veneur is laid in Fontainebleau Forest, and is supposed to refer to St. Hubert.—Father Matthieu.

¶ The English name is "Herne the Hunter," once a keeper in Windsor Forest.—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, act iv. ch. 4.

¶ The Scotch poem called Albania contains a full description of the wild huntsman.

(The subject has been made into a ballad by Bürger, entitled Der Wilde Jäger.)

Wild Man of the Forest, Orson, brother of Valentine, and nephew of king Pepin.—Valentine and Orson (fifteenth century).

Wild Wenlock, kinsman of sir Hugo de Lacy, besieged by insurgents, who cut off his head.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Wildair (Sir Harry), the hero of a comedy so called by Farquhar (1701). The same character had been introduced in the Constant Couple (1700), by the same author. Sir Harry is a gay profligate, not altogether selfish and abandoned, but very free and of easy morals. This was Wilks's and Peg Woffington's great part.

Their Wildairs, sir John Brutes, lady Touchwoods, and Mrs. Frails are conventional reproductions of those wild gallants and demireps which figure in the licentious dramas of Dryden and Shadwell.—Sir W. Scott.

("Sir John Brute," in The Provoked Wife (Vanbrugh); "lady Touchwood," in The Belle's Stratagem (Mrs. Cowley); "Mrs. Frail," in Congreve's Love for Love.)

Wildblood of the Vale (Young Dick), a friend of sir Geoffrey Peveril.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Wilde (Johnny), a small farmer of Rodenkirchen, in the isle of Rügen. One day, he found a little glass slipper belonging to one of the hill-folk. Next day, a little brownie, in the character of a merchant, came to redeem it, and Johnny Wilde demanded as the price "that he should find a gold ducat in every furrow he ploughed." The bargain was concluded, but before the year was over he had worked himself to death, looking for ducats in the furrows which he ploughed. —Rügen Tradition.

Wildenhaim (Baron), father of Amelia. In his youth he seduced Agatha Friburg, whom he deserted. Agatha bore a son, Frederick, who in due time became a soldier. Coming home on furlough, he found his mother on the point of starvation, and, going to beg alms, met the baron with his gun, asked alms of him, and received a shilling. He demanded more money, and, being refused, collared the baron, but was soon seized by the keepers, and shut up in the castle dungeon. Here he was visited by the chaplain, and it came out that the baron was his father. As the baron was a widower, he married Agatha, and Frederick became his heir.

Amelia Wildenhaim, daughter of the baron. A proposal was made to marry her to count Cassel, but as the count was a conceited puppy, without "brains in his head or a heart in his bosom," she would have nothing to say to him; but she showed her love to Anhalt, a young clergyman, and her father consented to the match.—Mrs. Inchbald: Lovers' Vows (altered from Kotzebue, 1800).

Wildfire (Madge), the insane daughter of old Meg Murdochson the gipsy thief. Madge had been seduced when a girl, and this, with the murder of her infant, had turned her brain.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Wilding (Jack), a young gentleman fresh from Oxford, who fabricates the most ridiculous tales, which he tries to pass off for facts; speaks of his adventures in America, which he has never seen, and of being entrapped into marriage with a Miss Sibthorpe, a pure invention. Accidentally meeting a Miss Grantam, he sends his man to learn her name, and is told it is Miss Godfrey, an heiress. On this blunder the "fun" of the drama hinges. When Miss Godfrey is presented to him, he does not know her, and a person rushes in who declares she is his wife, and that her maiden name was Sibthorpe. It is now Wilding's turn to be dumfounded, and, wholly unable to unravel the mystery, he rushes forth, believing the world is a Bedlam let loose. —Foote: The Liar (1761).

Wilding (Sir Jasper), an ignorant but wealthy country gentleman, fond of fox-hunting. He dresses in London like a fox-hunter, and speaks with a "Hoic! tally-ho!"

Young Wilding, son of sir Jasper, about to marry the daughter of old Philpot for the dot she will bring him.

Maria Wilding, the lively, witty, high-spirited daughter of sir Jasper, in love with Charles Beaufort. Her father wants her to marry George Philpot, but she frightens the booby out of his wits by her knowledge of books and assumed eccentricities.—Murphy: The Citizen (1757 or 1761).

Wildrake, a country squire, delighting in horses, dogs, and field sports. He was in love with "neighbour Constance," daughter of sir William Fondlove, with whom he used to romp and quarrel in childhood. He learnt to love Constance; and Constance loved the squire, but knew it not till she feared he was going to marry another. When they each discovered the state of their hearts, they agreed to become man and wife.—Knowles: The Love-Chase (1837).

Wildrake (Roger), a dissipated royalist.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Wilelmi'na [BUNDLE], daughter of Bundle the gardener. Tom Tug the waterman and Robin the gardener sought her in marriage. The father preferred honest Tom Tug, but the mother liked better the sentimental and fine-phrased Robin. Wilelmina said he who first did any act to deserve her love should have it, and Tom Tug, by winning the waterman's badge, carried off the prize.—Dibdin: The Waterman (1774). (See SKEGGS, p. 1013.)

Wilfer (Reginald), called by his wife R. W., and by his fellow-clerks Rumty. He was clerk in the drug-house of Chicksey, Stobbles, and Veneering. In person Mr. Wilfer resembled an overgrown cherub; in manner he was shy and retiring.

Mr. Reginald Wilfer was a poor clerk, so poor indeed that he had never yet attained the modest object of his ambition, which was to wear a complete new suit of clothes, hat and boots included, at one time. His black hat was brown before he could afford a coat; his pantaloons were white at the seams and knees before he could buy a pair of boots; his boots had worn out before he could treat himself to new pantaloons; and by the time he worked round to the hat again, that shining modern article roofed in an ancient ruin of various periods.—Ch. iv.

Mrs. Wilfer, wife of Mr. Reginald. A most majestic woman, tall and angular. She wore gloves, and a pocket-handkerchief tied under her chin. A patronizing, condescending woman was Mrs. Wilfer, with a mighty idea of her own importance. "Viper!" "Ingrate!" and such-like epithets were household words with her.

Bella Wilfer, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Wilfer. A wayward, playful, affectionate, spoilt beauty, "giddy from the want of some sustaining purpose, and capricious because she was always fluttering among little things." Bella was so pretty, so womanly, and yet so childish that she was always captivating. She spoke of herself as "the lovely woman," and delighted in "doing the hair of the family." Bella Wilfer married John Harmon (John Rokesmith), the secretary of Mr. Boffin "the golden dustman."

Lavinia Wilfer, youngest sister of Bella, and called "The Irrepressible." Lavinia was a tart, pert girl, but succeeded in catching George Sampson in the toils of wedlock.—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1864).

WILFORD, in love with Emily, the companion of his sister Miss Wilford. This attachment coming to the knowledge of Wilford's uncle and guardian, was disapproved of by him; so he sent the young man to the Continent, and dismissed the young lady. Emily went to live with Goodman Fairlop, the woodman, and there Wilford discovered her in an archery match. The engagement was renewed, and ended in marriage.—Sir H. B. Dudley: The Woodman (1771).

Wilford, secretary of sir Edward Mortimer, and the suitor of Barbara Rawbold (daughter of a poacher). Curious to know what weighed on his master's mind, he pried into an iron chest in sir Edward's library; but while so engaged, sir Edward entered, and threatened to shoot him. He relented, however, and having sworn Wilford to secrecy, told him how and why he had committed murder. Wilford, unable to endure the watchful and jealous eye of his master, ran away; but sir Edward dogged him from place to place, and at length arrested him on the charge of theft. Of course, the charge broke down, Wilford was acquitted, and sir Edward, having confessed his crime, died.—Colman: The Iron Chest (1796).

(This is a dramatic version of Godwin's novel called Caleb Williams (1794). Wilford is "Caleb Williams," and sir Edward Mortimer is "Falkland.")

Wilford, supposed to be earl of Rochdale. Three things he had a passion for: "the finest hound, the finest horse, and the finest wife in the three kingdoms." It turned out that Master Walter "the hunchback" was the earl of Rochdale, and Wilford was no one.—Knowles: The Hunchback (1831).

Wilford (Lord), the truant son of lord Woodville, who fell in love with Bess, the daughter of the "blind beggar of Bethnal Green." He saw her by accident in London, lost sight of her, but resolved not to rest night or day till he found her; and, said he, "If I find her not, I'm tenant of the house the sexton builds." Bess was discovered in the Queen's Arms inn, Romford, and turned out to be his cousin.—Knowles: The Beggar of Bethnal Green (1834).

Wilfred, "the fool," one of the sons of sir Hildebrand Osbaldistone of Osbaldistone Hall.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Wilfrid, son of Oswald Wycliffe; in love with Matilda, heiress of Rokeby's knight. After various villainies, Oswald forced from Matilda a promise to marry Wilfrid. Wilfrid thanked her for the promise, and fell dead at her feet.—Sir W. Scott: Rokeby (1813).

Wilfrid or Wilfrith (St.). In 681 the bishop Wilfrith, who had been bishop of York, being deprived of his see, came to Sussex, and did much to civilize the people. He taught them how to catch fish generally, for before they only knew how to catch eels. He founded the bishopric of the South Saxons at Selsey, afterwards removed to Chichester, founded the monastery of Ripon, built several ecclesiastical edifices, and died in 709.

St. Wilfrid, sent from York into this realm received (Whom the Northumbrian folk had of his see bereaved),
And on the south of Thames a seat did him afford,
By whom the people first received the saving word.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xi. (1613).

Wilhelm Meister [Mice-ter], the hero and title of a philosophic novel by Goethe. This is considered to be the first true German novel. It consists of two parts published under two titles, viz. The Apprenticeship of Wilhelm Meister (1794–96), and The Travels of Wilhelm Meister (1821).

Wilkins (Peter), a tale by Robert Pultock of Clement's Inn (1750).

The tale is this: Peter Wilkins is a mariner, thrown on a desert shore. In time, he furnishes himself from the wreck with many necessaries, and discovers that the country is frequented by a beautiful winged race called glumms and gawreys, whose wings, when folded, serve them for dress, and when spread, are used for flight. Peter marries a gawrey, by name Youwarkee, and accompanies her to Nosmnbdsgrsutt, a land of semi-darkness, where he remains many years.

Peter Wilkins is a work of uncommon beauty.—Coleridge: Table Talk (1835).

Wilkinson (James), servant to Mr. Fairford the lawyer.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Will (Belted), William lord Howard, warden of the western marches (1563–1640).

> His Bilboa blade, by Marchmen felt,
> Hung in a broad and studded belt;
> Hence, in rude phrase, the Borderers still > Called noble Howard "Belted Will."
> Sir W. Scott. Lay of the Last Minstrel (1805).

Will Laud, a smuggler, with whom Margaret Catchpole (q.v.) falls in love. He persuades her to escape from Ipswich jail, and supplies her with a seaman's dress. The two are overtaken, and Laud is shot in attempting to prevent the recapture of Margaret.—Rev. R. Cobbold: Margaret Catchpole (1845).

Will and Jean, a poetic story by Hector Macneill (1789). Willie Gairlace was once the glory of the town, and he married Jeanie Miller. Just about this time Maggie Howe opened a spirit-shop in the village, and Willie fell to drinking. Having reduced himself to beggary, he enlisted as a soldier, and Jeanie had "to beg her bread." Willie, having lost his leg in battle, was put on the Chelsea "bounty list;" and Jeanie was placed, by the duchess of Buccleuch, in an almscottage. Willie contrived to reach the cottage, and

> Jean once mair, a fond affection,
> Clasped her Willie to her breast.

Will-o'-Wisp or Will-with-a-wisp. Here Will is no proper name, but a Scandinavian word equivalent to "misleading" or "errant." Icelandic villa ("a-going astray"), villr ("wandering"). "I am will what to do" (i.e. "at a loss"). German, irrwisch.

Willet (John), landlord of the Maypole inn. A burly man, large-headed, with a flat face, betokening profound obstinacy and slowness of apprehension, combined with a strong reliance on his own merits. John Willet was one of the most dogged and positive fellows in existence, always sure that he was right, and that every one who differed from him was wrong. He ultimately resigned the Maypole to his son Joe, and retired to a cottage in Chigwell, with a small garden, in which Joe had a maypole erected for the delectation of his aged father. Here at dayfall assembled his old chums, to smoke, and prose, and doze, and drink the evenings away; and here the old man played the landlord, scoring up huge debits in chalk to his heart's delight. He lived in the cottage a sleepy life for seven years, and then slept the sleep which knows no waking.

Joe Willet, son of the landlord, a broad-shouldered, strapping young fellow of 20. Being bullied and brow-beaten by his father, he ran away and enlisted for a soldier, lost his right arm in America, and was dismissed the service. He returned to England, married Dolly Varden, and became landlord of the Maypole, where he prospered and had a large family.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841).

WILLIAM, archbishop of Orange, an ecclesiastic who besought pope Urban to permit him to join the crusaders; and, having obtained permission, he led 400 men to the siege of Jerusalem.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

William, youngest son of William Rufus. He was the leader of a large army of British bowmen and Irish volunteers in the crusading army.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, iii. (1575).

(William Rufus was never married.)

William, footman to Lovemore, sweet upon Muslin the lady's-maid. He is fond of cards, and is a below-stairs imitation of the high-life vices of the latter half of the eighteenth century.—Murphy: The Way to Keep Him (1760).

William, a serving-lad at Arnheim Castle.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

William (Lord), master of Erlingford. His elder brother, at death, committed to his charge Edmund the rightful heir, a mere child; but William cast the child into the Severn, and seized the inheritance. One anniversary, the Severn, having overflowed its banks, surrounded the castle; a boat came by, and lord William entered it. The boatman thought he heard the voice of a child—nay, he felt sure he saw a child in the water, and bade lord William stretch out his hand to take it in. Lord William seized the child's hand, and the boat was drawn under water. Lord William was drowned, but no one heard his piercing cry of agony.—Southey: Lord William (a ballad, 1804).

William and Margaret, a ballad by Mallet (1727). William promised marriage to Margaret, deserted her, and she died "consumed in early prime." Her ghost reproved the faithless swain, who "quaked in every limb," and, raving, hied him to Margaret's grave. There

> Thrice he called on Margaret's name,
> And thrice he wept full sore:
> Then laid his cheek to her cold grave,
> And word spake never more.

William king of Scotland, introduced by sir W. Scott in The Talisman (1825).

William of Cloudesley (3 syl.), a north-country outlaw, associated with Adam Bell and Clym of the Clough (Clement of the Cliff). He lived in Englewood Forest, near Carlisle. Adam Bell and Clym of the Clough were single men, but William had a wife named Alyce, and "children three" living at Carlisle. The three outlaws went to London to ask pardon of the king, and the king, at the queen's intercession, granted it. He then took them to a field to see them shoot. William first cleft in two a hazel wand at a distance of 200 feet; after this he bound his eldest son to a stake, put an apple on his head, and, at a distance of "six score paces," cleft the apple in two without touching the boy. The king was so delighted that he made William "a gentleman of fe," made his son a royal butler, the queen took Alyce for her "chief gentlewoman," and the two companions were appointed yeomen of the bed-chamber.—Percy: Reliques "Adam Bell," etc.), I. ii. 1.

William of Goldsbrough, one of the companions of Robin Hood, mentioned in Grafton's Olde and Auncient Pamphlet (sixteenth century).

William of Norwich (Saint), a child said to have been crucified by the Jews in 1137. (See HUGH OF LINCOLN, p. 510; WERNER, p. 1203.)

> Two boys of tender age, those saints ensue,
> Of Norwich William was, of Lincoln Hugh,
> Whom th' unbelieving Jews (rebellious shot abide),
> In mockery of our Christ, as Easter crucified.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1622).

William-with-the-Long-Sword, the earl of Salisbury. He was the natural brother of Richard Cœur de Lion.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Williams (Caleb), a lad in the service of Falkland. Falkland, irritated by cruelty and insult, commits a murder, which is attributed to another. Williams, by accident, obtains a clue to the real facts; and Falkland, knowing it, extorts from him an oath of secrecy, and then tells him the whole story. The lad, finding life in Falkland's house insupportable from the ceaseless suspicion to which he is exposed, makes his escape, and is pursued by Falkland with relentless persecution. At last Williams is accused by Falkland of robbery, and the facts of the case being disclosed, Falkland dies of shame and a broken spirit. (See WILFORD, p. 1214.)—W. Godwin: Caleb Williams (1794).

(The novel was dramatized by G. Colman, under the title of The Iron Chest (1796). Caleb Williams is called "Wilford," and Falkland is "sir Edward Mortimer.")

Williams (Ned), the sweetheart of Cicely Jopson, farmer, near Clifton.

Farmer Williams, Ned's father.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Willie, clerk to Andrew Skurliewhitter the scrivener.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Willieson (William), a brig-owner, one of the Jacobite conspirators under the laird of Ellieslaw.—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Williewald of Geierstein (Count) father of count Arnold of Geierstein alias Arnold Biederman (landamman of Unterwalden).—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Willmore, the hero of Mrs. Behn's play, in two parts, called The Rover (1677, 1681).

Will-o'-the-Flat, one of the huntsmen near Charlie's Hope farm.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Willoughby (Lord), of queen Elizabeth's court.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Willoughby (Sir Clement), insolent but polished. His passion for Evelina is bold, perfidious, and impertinent.—Mme. D'Arblay: Evelina (1778).

Willy, a shepherd to whom Thomalin tells the tale of his battle with Cupid (ecl. iii.). (See THOMALIN, p. 1098.) In ecl. viii. he is introduced again, contending with Perigot for the prize of poetry, Cuddy being chosen umpire. Cuddy declares himself quite unable to decide the contest, for both deserve the prize.—Spenser: The Shepheardes Calendar (1579).

(Of course Virgil's Bucolic iii. will readily recur to the mind. Palemon, the umpire, says—

Non nostrum inter vos tantas componêre lites,
Et vitula tu dignus, ethic,

Lines 108, 109.

Wilmot. There are three of the name in Fatal Curiosity (1736), by George Lillo, viz. old Wilmot, his wife Agnes, and their son young Wilmot supposed to have perished at sea. The young man, however, is not drowned, but goes to India, makes his fortune, and returns, unknown to any one of his friends. He goes in disguise to his parents, and deposits with them a casket. Curiosity induces Agnes to open it, and when she sees that it contains jewels, she and her husband resolve to murder the owner, and appropriate the contents of the casket. No sooner have they committed the fatal deed than they discover it is their own son whom they have killed; whereupon the old man stabs first his wife and then himself.

The harrowing details of this tragedy are powerfully depicted; and the agonies of old Wilmot constitute one of the most appalling and affecting incidents in the drama.—R. Chambers: English Literature, i. 592.

Old Wilmot's character, as the needy man who had known better days, exhibits a mind naturally good, but prepared for acting evil.—Sir W. Scott: The Drama.

Wilmot (Miss Arabella), a clergyman's daughter, beloved by George Primrose, eldest son of the vicar of Wakefield, whom ultimately she marries.—Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield (1766).

Wilmot (Lord), earl of Rochester, of the court of Charles II.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Wilsa, the mulatto girl of Dame Ursley Suddlechop the barber's wife.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

WILSON (Alison), the old housekeeper of colonel Silas Morton of Milnwood.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality time, Charles II.).

Wilson (Andrew), smuggler; the comrade of Geordie Robertson. He was hanged.—Sir W Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Wilson (Bob), groom of sir William Ashton the lord keeper of Scotland.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Wilson (Christie), a character in the introduction of the Black Dwarf, by sir W. Scott.

Wilson (John), groom of Mr. Godfrey Bertram laird of Ellangowan.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Wilton (Ralph de), the accepted suitor of lady Clare daughter of the earl of Gloucester. When lord Marmion overcame Ralph de Wilton in the ordeal of battle, and left him for dead on the field, lady Clare took refuge in Whitby Convent. By Marmion's desire she was removed from the convent to Tantallon Hall, where she met Ralph, who had been cured of his wounds. Ralph, being knighted by Douglas, married the lady Clare.—Sir W. Scott: Marmion (1808).

Wimble (Will), a character in Addison's Spectator, simple, good-natured, and officious.

N.B.—Will Wimble in the flesh was Thomas Morecroft of Dublin (*-1741).

Wimbledon (The Philosopher of), John Horne Tooke, who lived at Wimbledon, near London (1736–1812).

Winchester, in Arthurian romance, is called Camelot.

It swam down the stream to the city of Camelot, i.e. in English, Winchester.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 44 (1470).

Winchester (The bishop of), Lancelot Andrews. The name is not given in the novel, but the date of the novel is 1620, and Dr. Andrews was translated from Ely to Winchester in February, 1618–19; and died in 1626.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Wind Sold. At one time, the Finlanders and Laplanders drove a profitable trade by the sale of winds. After being paid, they knitted three knots, and told the buyer that when he untied the first he would have a good gale; when the second, a strong wind; and when the third, a severe tempest.—Olaus Magnus: History of the Goths, etc., 47 (1658).

¶ King Eric of Sweden was a potent-tate of the winds, and could change them at pleasure by merely shifting his cap.

¶ Bessie Millie, of Pomo'na, in the Orkney Islands, helped to eke out her living (even so late as 1814) by selling favourable winds to mariners, for the small sum of sixpence per vessel.

¶ Winds were also at one time sold at mont St. Michel, in Normandy, by nine druidesses, who likewise sold arrows to charm away storms. These arrows were to be shot off by a young man 25 years of age.

¶ Witches generally were supposed to sell wind.

'Oons! I'll marry a Lapland witch as soon, and live upon selling contrary winds and wrecked vessels.—Congreve Love for Love, iii. (1695).

In Ireland and in Denmark both,
Witches for gold will sell a man a wind,
Which, in the corner of a napkin wrapped,
Shall blow him safe unto what coast he will.
Summer: Last Will and Test. (1600).

∴ See note to the Pirate "Sale of Winds" (Waverley Novels, xxiv. 136).

Winds (The), according to Hesiod, were the sons of Astræus and Aurora.

You nymphs, the winged offspring which of old
Aurora to divine Astræus bore.
Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads (1767).

Winds and Tides. Nicholas of Lyn, an Oxford scholar and friar, was a great navigator. He "took the height of mountains with his astrolobe," and taught that there were four whirlpools like the Maelström of Norway — one in each quarter of the globe, from which the four winds issue, and which are the cause of the tides.

One Nicholas of Lyn
The whirlpools of the seas did come to understand, ...
For such immeasured pools, philosophers agree,
I' the four parts of the world undoubtedly there be,
From which they have supposed nature the winds doth raise,
And from them too proceed the flowing of the seas.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xix. (1622).

Windmill with a Weathercock Atop (The). Goodwyn, a puritan divine of St. Margaret's, London, was so called (1593–1651).

Windmills. Don Quixote, seeing some thirty or forty windmills, insisted that they were giants, and, running a tilt at one of them, thrust his spear into the sails; whereupon the sails raised both man and horse into the air, and shivered the knight's lance into splinters. When don Quixote was thrown to the ground, he persisted in saying that his enemy Freston had transformed the giants into windmills merely to rob him of his honour, but notwithstanding, the windmills were in reality giants in disguise. This is the first adventure of the knight.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. i. 8 (1605).

Windmills for Food. The giant Widenostrils lived on windmills. (See WIDENOSTRILS, p. 1210.) — Rabelais: Pantagruel, iv. 17 (1545).

Windsor (The Rev. Mr.), a friend of Master George Heriot the king's goldsmith.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Windsor Beauties (The), Anne Hyde duchess of York, and her twelve ladies in the court of Charles II., painted by sir Peter Lely at the request of Anne Hyde. Conspicuous in her train of Hebês was Frances Jennings, eldest daughter of Richard Jennings of Standridge, near St. Alban's.

Windsor Forest, a descriptive poem by Pope (1713).

Windsor Sentinel (The), who heard St. Paul's clock strike thirteen, was John Hatfield, who died at his house in Glasshouse Yard, Aldersgate, June 18, 1770, aged 102.

Windsor of Denmark (The), the castle of Cronborg, in Elsinore.

Windy-Cap, Eric king of Sweden.

[Told] of Erick's cap and Elmo's light.
Sir W. Scott: Rokeby, ii. xx (1813).

Wine. If it makes one stupid it is vin d'âne; if maudlin, it is vin de cerf (from the notion that deer weep); if quarrelsome, it is vin de lion; if talkative, it is vin de pie; if sick, it is vin de porc; if crafty, it is vin de renard; if rude, it is vin de singe. To these might be added, vin de chèvre, when an amorous effect is produced; vin de coucou, if it makes one egotistical; and vin de crapaud, when its effect is inspiring.

Wine (1814). In 1858 a sale took place in Paris of the effects of the late duchesse de Raguse, including a pipe of Madeira. This wine was captured from the carcase of a ship wrecked at the mouth of the Scheldt in 1778, and had lain there till 1814, when Louis XVIII. bought it. Part of it was presented to the French consul, and thus it came into the cellar of the duc de Raguse. At the sale, forty-four bottles were sold, and the late baron Rothschild bought them for their weight in gold.

Wine (Three-Men). (See under THREE, p. 1104.)

Wingate (Master Jasper), the steward at Avenel Castle.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Winged Horse (A), the standard and emblem of ancient Corinth, in consequence of the fountain of Pire'nê, near that city, and Peg'asus the winged horse of Apollo and the Muses.

Winged Lion (The), the heraldic device of the republic of Venice.

They'll plant the winged lion in these halls.
R. Browning: The Return of the Druses, v.

Wingfield, a citizen of Perth, whose trade was feather-dressing.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Wingfield (Ambrose), employed at Osbaldistone Hall.

Lancie Wingfield, one of the men employed at Osbaldistone Hall.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Wing-the-Wind (Michael), a servant at Holyrood Palace, and the friend of Adam Woodcock.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Winifrid (St.), patron saint of virgins; beheaded by Caradoc for refusing to marry him. The tears she shed became the fountain called "St. Winifrid's Well," the waters of which not only cure all sorts of diseases, but are so buoyant that nothing sinks to the bottom. St. Winifrid's blood stained the gravel in the neighbourhood red, and her hair became moss. Drayton has given this legend in verse in his Polyolbion, x. (1612).

(The name is more generally spelt Winifred.)

Winkle (Nathaniel), M.P.C., a young cockney sportsman, considered by his companions to be a dead shot, a hunter, skater, etc. All these acquirements are, however, wholly imaginary. He marries Arabella Allen.—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

M.P.C., that is, Member of the Pickwick Club.

Winkle (Rip van), a Dutch colonist of New York, who met a strange man in a ravine of the Kaatskill Mountains. Rip helped the stranger to carry a keg to a wild retreat among rocks, where he saw a host of strange personages playing skittles in mysterious silence. Rip took the first opportunity of tasting the keg, fell into a stupor, and slept for twenty years. On waking, he found that his wife was dead and buried, his daughter married, his village remodelled, and America had become independent.—W. Irving: Sketch-Book (1820).

¶ The tales of Epimenidês, of Peter Klaus, of the Sleeping Beauty, the Seven Sleepers, etc., are somewhat similar. (See SLEEPER, p. 1015.)

Winklebred or Winklebrand (Louis), lieutenant of sir Maurice de Bracy a follower of prince John.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Winnie (Annie), an old sibyl, who makes her appearance at the death of Alice Gray.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Winter, the head servant of general Witherington alias Richard Tresham.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Winter. (See SEASONS, p. 976.)

Winter Bird (The), the woodcock.

How nobler to the winter bird to say,
"Poor stranger, welcome from thy stormy way . . .
The food and shelter of my valleys share."
Peter Pindar [Dr. Wolcot]: Island of Innocence (1809).

Winter King (The), Frederick V., the rival of Ferdinand II. of Germany. He married Elizabeth daughter of James I. of England, and was king of Bohemia for just one winter, the end of 1619 and the beginning of 1620 (1596–1632). (See SNOW KING, p. 1023.)

Winter Queen (The), Elizabeth, daughter of James I. of England, and wife of Frederick V. "The Winter King." (See SNOW QUEEN, p. 1023.)

Winter's Tale (The), by Shakespeare (1604). Leontês king of Sicily invites his friend Polixenês to visit him. During this visit the king becomes jealous of him, and commands Camillo to poison him; but Camillo only warns Polixenês of the danger, and flees with him to Bohemia. When Leontês hears thereof, his rage is unbounded; and he casts his queen Hermi'onê into prison, where she gives birth to a daughter, which Leontês gave direction should be placed on a desert shore to perish. In the mean time, he is told that Hermionê, the queen, is dead. The vessel containing the infant daughter being storm-driven to Bohemia, the child is left there, and is brought up by a shepherd, who calls it Perdita. One day, in a hunt, prince Florizel sees Perdita and falls in love with her; but Polixenês, his father, tells her that she and the shepherd shall be put to death if she encourages the foolish suit. Florizel and Perdita now flee to Sicily, and being introduced to Leontês, it is soon discovered that Perdita is his lost daughter. Polixenês tracks his son to Sicily, and being told of the discovery, gladly consents to the union he had before forbidden. Pauli'na now invites the royal party to inspect a statue of Hermionê in her house, and the statue turns out to be the living queen.

(The plot of this drama is borrowed from the tale of Pandosto or The Triumph of Time, by Robert Greene, 1583.)

We should have him back
Who told the Winter's Tale to do it for us.
Tennyson: Prologue of The Princess.

Winterblossom (Mr. Philip), "the man of taste," on the managing committee at the Spa.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Wintersen (The count), brother of baron Steinfort, lord of the place, and greatly beloved.

The countess Wintersen, wife of the above. She is a kind friend to Mrs. Haller, and the confidante of her brother the baron Steinfort.—B. Thompson: The Stranger (1797).

Winterton (Adam), the garrulous old steward of sir Edward Mortimer, in whose service he had been for forty-nine years. He was fond of his little jokes, and not less so of his little nips; but he loved his master and almost idolized him. —Colman: The Iron Chest (1796).

Win-the-Fight (Master Joachin), the attorney employed by major Bridgenorth the roundhead.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Wirral (The), the long, square-ended peninsula between the Mersey and the Dee.

Here there are few that either God or man with good heart love.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight.

Wisdom (Honour paid to).

(1) ANACHARSIS went from Scythia to Athens to see Solon.—Ælian: De Varia Historia, v.

(2) APOLLONIOS TYANÆUS (Cappadocia) travelled through Scythia and into India as far as the river Phison to see Hiarchus.—Philostratos: Life of Apollonios, ii. last chapter.

(3) ALEXANDER having taken amongst the spoils a casket of Darius king of Persia of inestimable value, placed therein his copy of Homer's Iliad, edited by Aristotle, saying that it alone was worthy of such an honour.

(4) DIONYSIUS king of Syracuse, wishing to see Plato, sent the finest galley in his kingdom, most royally equipped, and stored with every luxury, to fetch him. On landing, the philosopher found the royal state carriage waiting to conduct him to the king's palace.

(5) BEN JONSON, in 1619, travelled on foot from London to Scotland merely to see W. Drummond, the Scotch poet, whose genius he admired.

(6) LIVY went from the confines of Spain to Rome to hold converse with the learned men of that city.—Pliny the Younger: Epistle, iii. 2.

(7) PLATO travelled from Athens to Egypt to see the wise men or magi; and to visit Archytas or Tarentum the mechanician. He invented several automatons, as the flying pigeon—and numerous mechanical instruments, as the screw and crane.

(8) PYTHAGORAS went from Italy to Egypt to visit the vaticinators of Memphis. —Porphyry: Life of Pythagoras, 9 (Kuster's edition).

(9) SHEBA (The queen of) went from "the uttermost parts of the earth" to hear and see Solomon, whose wisdom and greatness had reached her ear.

Wisdom Persecuted.

(1) ANAXAGORAS of Clazomenæ held opinions in natural science so far in advance of his age that he was accused of impiety, cast into prison, and condemned to death. It was with great difficulty that Pericles got the sentence commuted to fine and banishment.

(2) AVERROÏS, the Arabian philosopher, was denounced as a heretic, and degraded, in the twelfth Christian century (died 1226).

(3) BACON (Friar) was excommunicated and imprisoned for diabolical knowledge, chiefly on account of his chemical researches (1214–1294).

(4) BRUNO (Giordano) was burnt alive for maintaining that matter is the mother of all things (1550–1600).

(5) CROSSE (Andrew), electrician, was shunned as a profane man, for asserting that certain minute animals of the genus Acarus had been developed by him out of inorganic elements (1784–1855).

(6) DEE (Dr. John) had his house broken into by a mob, and all his valuable library, museum, and mathematical instruments destroyed, because he was so wise that "he must have been allied with the devil" (1527–1608).

(7) FEARGIL. (See "Virgilius.")

(8) GALILEO was imprisoned by the Inquisition for daring to believe that the earth moved round the sun and not the sun round the earth. In order to get his liberty, he was obliged to "abjure the heresy," but as the door closed he muttered, E pur si muove ("But it does move, though") (1564–1642).

(9) GERBERT, who introduced algebra into Christendom, was accused of dealing in the black arts, and was shunned as a "son of Belial."

(10) GROSTED or GROSSETESTE bishop of Lincoln, author of some two hundred works, was accused of dealing in the black arts, and the pope wrote a letter to Henry III., enjoining him to disinter the bones of the too-wise bishop, as they polluted the very dust of God's acre (died 1253).

(11) FAUST (Dr.), the German philosopher, was accused of diabolism for his wisdom so far in advance of the age.

(12) PEYRERE was imprisoned in Brussels for attempting to prove that man existed before Adam (seventeenth century).

(13) PROTAGORAS, the philosopher, was banished from Athens, for his book On the Gods.

(14) SOCRATES was condemned to death as an atheist, because he was the wisest of men, and his wisdom was not in accordance with the age.

(15) VIRGILIUS bishop of Saltzburg was compelled by pope Zachary to retract his assertion that there are other "worlds" besides our earth, and other suns and moons besides those which belong to our system (died 784).

(16) Geologists had the same battle to fight; so had Colenso bishop of Natal; and later still Agnosticism has been most absurdly branded as atheism—a gross contradiction of terms.

Wise (The).

Albert II. duke of Austria, "The Lame and Wise" (1289, 1330–1358).

Alfonso X. of Leon and Castile (1203, 1252–1284).

Charles V. of France, Le Sage (1337, 1364–1380).

Che-Tsou of China (*, 1278–1295).

Comte de las Cases, Le Sage (1766–1842).

Frederick elector of Saxony (1463, 1544–1554).

James I., "Solomon," of England (1566, 1603–1625).

John V. duke of Brittany, "The Good and Wise" (1389, 1399–1442).

Wise Men (The Seven): (1) Solon of Athens, (2) Chilo of Sparta, (3) Thalês of Milêtos, (4) Bias of Priênê, (5) Cleobûlos of Lindos, (6) Pittâcos of Mitylênê, (7) Periander of Corinth, or, according to Plato, Myson of Chenæ. All flourished in the sixth century B.C.

> First SOLON, who made the Athenian laws;
> While CHILO, in Sparta, was famed for his saws;
> In Milêtos did THALES astronomy teach;
> BIAS used in Priênê his morals to preach;
> CLEOBULOS, of Lindos, was handsome and wise;
> Mitylênê 'gainst thraldom saw PITTACOS rise;
> PERIANDER is said to have gained, thro' his court,
> The title that MYSON, the Chenian, ought.
> E. C. B.

N.B.—One of Plutarch's brochures in the Moralia is entitled, "The Banquet of the Seven Wise Men," in which Periander is made to give an account of a contest at Chalcis between Homer and Hesiod. The latter won the prize, and caused this inscription to be engraved on the tripod presented to him—

> This Hesiod vows to the Heliconian nine,
> In Chalcis won from Homer the divine.

Wise Men of the East (The). Klopstock, in The Messiah, v., says there were six "Wise Men of the East," who, guided by the star, brought their gifts to Jesus, "the heavenly babe," viz. Ha'dad, Sel'ima, Zimri, Mirja, Be'led, and Sun'ith. (See COLOGNE (Three Kings of), p. 226.)

Wisest Man. So the Delphic oracle pronounced Soc'ratês to be. Socratês modestly made answer, 'Twas because he alone had learnt the first element of truth, that he knew nothing.

> Not those seven sages might him parallel;
> Nor he whom Pythian maid did whilome tell
> To be the wisest man that then on earth did dwell.
> P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, vi. (1633).

N.B.—Among the Romans, Nasica was called Corculum (the sage) for his pregnant wit.

Among the Greeks, Democritos the Abderite, was called (not wise) but Wisdom itself.

Among the Britons, Gildas was called The Sage.

Among the Jews, Aben Ezra was called Heshachan. They said, if Wisdom had put out her candle, it might be lighted again at the brain of Aben Ezra, the very lamp of wisdom.—Spencer: Things New and Old.

Wish. (See STAR FALLING, p. 1041.

Wisheart (The Rev. Dr.), chaplain to the earl of Montrose.—Sir W. Scott Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Wishfort (Lady), widow of a

Jonathan Wishfort; an irritable, impatient, decayed beauty, who painted and enamelled her face to make herself look blooming, and was afraid to frown lest the enamel might crack. She pretended to be coy, and assumed, at the age of 60, the airs of a girl of 16. A trick was played upon her by Edward Mirabell, who induced his lackey Waitwell to personate sir Rowland, and make love to her; but the deceit was discovered before much mischief was done. Her pet expression was, "As I'm a person." —Congreve: The Way of the World (1700).

Wishing-Cap (The), a cap given to Fortunatus. He had only to put the cap on and wish, and whatever he wished he instantly obtained.—Straparola: Fortunatus.

Wishing-Rod (The), a rod of pure gold, belonging to the Nibelungs. Whoever possessed it could have anything he desired to have, and hold the whole world in subjection.—The Nibelungen Lied, 1160 (1210).

Wishing-Sack (The), a sack given by our Lord to a man named "Fourteen," because he was as strong as fourteen men. Whatever he wished to have he had only to say, "Artchila murtchila!" ("Come into my sack"), and it came in; or "Artchila murtchila!" ("Go into my sack"), and it went it.

(This is a Basque legend. In Gascoigne it is called "Ramée's Sack" (Le Sac de la Ramée). "Fourteen" is sometimes called "Twenty-four," sometimes a Tartaro or Polypheme, and is very similar to Christoph'eros.)

Wisp of Straw, given to a scold as a rebuke.

> A wisp of straw were worth a thousand crowns,
> To make this shameless callet know herself.
> Shakespeare: Henry VI. act ii. sc. 2 (1595).

Wit—Simplicity. It was said of John Gay that he was

> In wit a man, simplicity a child.

(The line is often applied to Oliver Goldsmith, who "wrote like an angel, and talked like poor poll.")

Witch. The last person prosecuted before the lords of justiciary (in Scotland) for witchcraft was Elspeth Rule. She was tried May 3, 1709, before lord Anstruther, and condemned to be burned on the cheek, and banished from Scotland for life.—Arnot: History of Edinburgh, 366, 367.

Witch-Finder, Matthew Hopkins (seventeenth century). In 1645 he hanged sixty witches in his own county (Essex) alone, and received 20*s.* a head for every witch he could discover.

> Has not the present parliament
> Mat Hopkins to the devil sent,
> Fully empowered to treat about,
> Finding revolted witches out?
> And has not he within a year
> Hanged three score of them in one shire?
> S. Butler: Hudibras, ii. 3 (1664).

Witch of Atlas, the title and heroine of one of Shelley's poems.

Witch of Balwer'y, Margaret Aiken, a Scotchwoman (sixteenth century).

Witch of Edmonton (The), called "Mother Sawyer." This is the true traditional witch; no mystic hag, no weird sister, but only a poor, deformed old woman, the terror of villagers, and amenable to justice.

> Why should the envious world
> Throw all their scandalous malice upon me?
> Because I'm poor, deformed, and ignorant,
> And, like a bow, buckled and bent together
> By some more strong in mischiefs than myself.
> The Witch of Edmonton (by Rowley, Dekker, and Ford, 1658).

Witch's Blood. Whoever was successful in drawing blood from a witch, was free from her malignant power. Hence Talbot, when he sees La Pucelle, exclaims, "Blood will I draw from thee; thou art a witch!"—Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act i. sc. 5 (1592).

Witherington (General), alias Richard Tresham, who first appears as Mr. Matthew Middlemas.

Mrs. Witherington, wife of the general, alias Mrs. Middlemas (born Zelia de Monçada). She appears first as Mrs. Middlemas.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Wititterly (Mr. Henry), an important gentleman, 38 years of age; of rather plebeian countenance, and with very light hair. He boasts everlastingly of his grand friends. To shake hands with a lord was a thing to talk of, but to entertain one was the seventh heaven to his heart.

Mrs. Wititterly [Julia], wife of Mr. Wititterly of Cadogan Place, Sloane Street, London; a faded lady living in a faded house. She calls her page Alphonse (a syl.), "although he has the face and figure of Bill." Mrs. Wititterly toadies the aristocracy, and, like her husband, boasts of her grand connections and friends.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838). (See TIBBS, p. 1107.)

Witi'za. (See VITIZA, p. 1180.)

Witling of Terror, Bertrand Barère; also called "The Anacreon of the Guillotine" (1755-1841).

Wits. "Great wits to madness nearly are allied."—Pope.

. The idea is found in Seneca: Nullum magnun ingenium absque mixtura dementiæ est. Festus said to Paul, "Much learning doth make thee mad" (Acts xxvi. 24).

Wits (Your five). Stephen Hawes explains this expression in his poem of Graunde Amoure, xxiv., from which we gather that the five wits are: Common wit, imagination, fantasy, estimation, and memory (1515).

Alas, sir, how fell you besides your five wits?
Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, act iv. sc. 2 (1600).

Wittenbold, a Dutch commandant, in the service of Charles II.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Wittol (Sir Joseph), an ignorant, foolish simpleton, who says that Bully Buff "is as brave a fellow as Cannibal."—Congreve: The Old Bachelor (1693).

Witwould (Sir Jerry) in Thomas Brown's comedy called Stage Beaux tossed in a Blanket (1704), is meant for Jeremy Collier.

A pert, talkative, half-witted coxcomb; vain of a very little learning, he always swims with the stream of popular opinion; he is a great censurer of men and books, always positive, seldom in the right—a noisy pretender of virtue, and an impudent pretender of modesty. . . . He sets up for a reformer of the stage . . . finding out smut and obscenity which escape every other eye. He was once a divine, but for reasons best known to himself, he cast away his surplice and gown for a sword and blue wig.

Witwould (Sir Wilful), of Shropshire, half-brother of Anthony Witwould, and nephew of lady Wishfort. A mixture of bashfulness and obstinacy, but when in his cups as loving as the monster in the Tempest. He is "a superannuated old bachelor," who is willing to marry Millamant; but as the young lady prefers Edward Mirabell, he is equally willing to resign her to him. His favourite phrase is, "Wilful will do it."

Anthony Witwould, half-brother to sir Wilful. "He has good nature and does not want wit." Having a good memory, he has a store of other folks' wit, which he brings out in conversation with good effect.—Congreve: The Way of the World (1700).

Wives as they Were and Maids as they Are, a comedy by Mrs. Inchbald (1797). Lady Priory is the type of the former, and Miss Dorrillon of the latter. Lady Priory is discreet, domestic, and submissive to her husband; but Miss Dorrillon is gay, flighty, and fond of pleasure. Lady Priory, under false pretences, is allured from home by a Mr. Bronzely, a man of no principle and a rake but her quiet, innocent conduct quite disarms him, and he takes her back to her husband, ashamed of himself, and resolves to amend. Miss Dorrillon is so involved in debt that she is arrested, but her father from the Indies pays her debts. She also repents, and becomes the wife of sir George Evelyn.

Wives of Literary Men.

Agnes [Frei] wife of Albert Durer, was a veritable Xantippe.

Both the wives of Schlegel were so uncongenial, that he could not live with either.

The wife of Sadi, the great Persian poet, was a detestable shrew.

The wife of Salmasius or Saumaise was also a terrible shrew.

Terentia, the wife of Cicero, was divorced for her overbearing temper.

The wife of Jean Jacques Rousseau was a Xantippe, who domineered with a rod of iron.

Jan van Haysum, the great flower-painter of Amsterdam (1682-1749), was equally unhappy with his wife.

John Wesley's wife ran away from him.

Wilkes, editor of the North Briton, was separated from his wife.

The wives of both the Pretenders were most uncongenial.

(See MARRIED MEN OF GENIUS, p. 679.)

Wizard of the North, sir Walter Scott (1771-1832).

Wobbler (Mr.), of the Circumlocution Office. When Mr. Clennam, by the direction of Mr. Barnacle, in another department of the office, called on this gentleman, he was telling a brother clerk about a rat-hunt, and kept Clennam waiting a considerable time. When at length Mr. Wobbler chose to attend, he politely said "Hallo, there! What's the matter?" Mr. Clennam briefly stated his question; and Mr Wobbler replied, "Can't inform you. Never heard of it. Nothing at all to do with it. Try Mr. Clive." When Clennam left, Mr. Wobbler called out, "Mister! Hallo, there! Shut the door after you. There's a devil of a draught!"—Dickens: Little Dorrit, x. (1857).

Woeful Countenance (Knight of the). Don Quixote was so called by Sancho Panza; but after his adventure with the lions he called himself "The Knight of the Lions."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iii. 5; II. i. 17 (1605-15).

WOLF. (1) The NEURI, according to Herodotos, had the power of assuming the shape of wolves once a year.—iv. 105.

(2) One of the family of ANTÆUS, according to Pliny, was chosen annually, by lot, to be transformed into a wolf, in which shape he continued for nine years.

(3) LYCA'ON, king of Arcădia, was turned into a wolf because he attempted to test the divinity of Jupiter by serving up to him a "hash of human flesh."—Ovid.

(4) VERET'ICUS, king of Wales, was converted by St. Patrick into a wolf.

Giraldus Cambrensis tells us that Irishmen "can be changed into wolves.' —Opera, vol. v. p. 119.

Nennius says "the descendants of the wolf are in Ossory. They transform themselves into wolves, and go forth in the form of wolves."—The Wonders of Erin, xiv.

He furthermore says that these persons are "of the race of Fœlaidh, in Ossory." (See also WERE-WOLF, p. 1202.)

Wolf (A), emblem of the tribe of Benjemin.

Benjamin shall ravin as a wolf: in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil.—Gen. xlix. 27.

Wolf. The last wolf in Scotland was killed in 1680, by Cameron of Lochiel [Lok.keel'].

The last wolf in Ireland was killed in Cork, 1710.

Wolf. The she-wolf is made by Dantè to symbolize avarice. When the poet began the ascent of fame, he was first met by a panther (pleasure), then by a lion (ambition), then by a she-wolf, which tried to stop his further progress.

A she-wolf, . . . who in her leanness seemed Full of all wants, . . . with such fear
O'erwhelmed me . . . that of the height all hope I lost.
Dante. Inferno, i. (1300).

To cry Wolf, to give a false alarm. The reference is the fable of the shepherd lad crying "Wolf!" but the following is said to be historical:—

YÖW-WÂNG, emperor of China, was greatly enamoured of a courtezan named Pao-tse, whom he tried by sundry expedients to make laugh. At length he hit upon the following plan: He caused the tocsins to be rung, the drums to be beaten, and the signal-fires to be lighted, as if some invader was at the gates. Pao-tse was delighted, and laughed immoderately to see the vassals and feudatory princes pouring into the city, and all the people in consternation. The emperor, pleased with the success of his trick, amused his favourite over and over again by repeating it. At length an enemy really did come, but when the alarm was given, no one heeded it, and the emperor was slain (B.C. 770).

Wolf duke of Gascony, one of Charlemagne's paladins. He was the originator of the plan of tying wetted ropes round the temples of his prisoners to make their eye-balls start from their sockets. It was he also who had men sewn up in freshly stripped bulls' hides, and exposed to the sun till the hides, in shrinking, crushed their bones.—L'Epine: Croquemitaine, iii.

Wolf of France (She-). (See SHE-WOLF, p. 994.)

Wolf's Head. An outlaw was said to carry on his shoulders a "wolf's head," because he was hunted down like a wolf, and to kill him was deemed as meritorious as killing a wolf.

Item foris facit, omnia que dacis sunt, quia a tempore quo utlagatus est CAPUT GERIT LUPINUM, ita ut impune ab omnibus interfici possit.—Bracton, ii. 35.

Wolves. The Greeks used to say that "wolves bring forth their young only twelve days in the year." These are the twelve days occupied in conveying Leto from the Hyperboreans to Delos.—Aristotle: Hist. Animal., vii. 35.

Wol'fort, usurper of the earldom of Flanders.—Fletcher: The Beggars' Bush (1622).

Wolfsbane, a herb so called, because meat saturated with its juice was at one time supposed to be a poison for wolves.

Wolsey (Cardinal), introduced by Shakespeare in his historic play of Henry VIII (1601).

West Digges [1720–1786] is the nearest resemblance of "Cardinal Wolsey" I have ever seen represented.—Davies: Dramatic Miscellanies.

Edmund Kean [1787–1833] in "Macbeth," "Hamlet," "Wolsey," "Coriolanus," etc., never approached within any measurable distance of the learned, philosophical, and majestic Kemble [1757–1823].—Life of C. M. Young.

Had I but served my God, etc. (See SERVED MY GOD, p. 984.)

(In the Comic History of England attributed to Cromwell.)

Woman changed to a Man.

(1) IPHIS, daughter of Lygdus and Telethusa of Crete. The story is that the father gave orders if the child about to be born proved to be a girl, it was to be put to death; and that the mother, unwilling to lose her infant, brought it up as a boy. In due time, the father betrothed his child to Ianthè, and the mother, in terror, prayed for help; and Isis, on the day of marriage, changed Iphis to a man.—Ovid: Metamorphoses, bk. ix; xiv. 699.

(2) CÆNEUS [Se-nuce] was born of the female sex, but Neptune changed her into a man. Ænēas, however, found her in the infernal regions restored to her original sex.

(3) TIRE'SIAS was converted into a woman for killing a female snake in copulation, and was restored to his original sex by killing a male snake in the same act.

(4) D'EON DE BEAUMONT was an epicene creature, whose sex was unknown during life. After death (1810) he was found to be male.

(5) HERMAPHRODITOS was of both sexes.

Woman-Hater (The), a tragedy by Beaumont and Fletcher (1607).

(Charles Reade published a novel called A Woman-Hater, in 1877.)

Woman killed with Kindness (A), a tragedy by Thos. Heywood (1600). The "woman" was Mrs. Frankford, who was unfaithful to her marriage vow. Her husband sent her to live on one of his estates, and made her a liberal allowance; she died, but on her death-bed her husband came to see her, and forgave her.

Woman made of Flowers. Gwydion son of Don "formed a woman out of flowers," according to the bard Taliesin. Arianrod had said that Llew Llaw Gyffes (i.e. "The Lion with the Steady Hand") should never have a wife of the human race. So Math and Gwydion, two enchanters, > Took blossoms of oak, and blossoms of broom, and blossoms of meadow-sweet, and produced therefrom a maiden, the fairest and most graceful ever seen, and baptized her Blodeuwedd, and she became his bride. —The Mabinogion ("Math, etc., twelfth century).

Woman reconciled to her Sex. Lady Wortley Montague said, "It goes far to reconcile me to being a woman, when I reflect that I am thus in no danger of ever marrying one."

Woman's Wit or Love's Disguises, a drama by S. Knowles (1838). Hero Sutton loved sir Valentine de Grey, but offended him by waltzing with lord Athunree. To win him back, she assumed the disguise of a quakeress, called herself Ruth, and pretended to be Hero's cousin. Sir Valentine fell in love with Ruth, and then found out that Ruth and Hero were one and the same person. The contemporaneous plot is that of Helen and Walsingham, lovers. Walsingham thought Helen had played the wanton with lord Athunree, and he abandoned her. Whereupon Helen assumed the garb of a young man named Eustace, became friends with Walsingham, said she was Helen's brother; but in the brother he discovered Helen herself, and learnt that he was wholly mistaken by appearances.

Women (The Four Perfect): (1) Khadijah, the first wife of Mahomet; (2) Miriam, the sister of Moses; (3) Mary, the mother of Jesus; and (4) Fatima, the beloved daughter of Mahomet.

Women (The Nine Worthy): (1) Minerva; (2) Semiramis; (3) Tomyris; (4) Jael; (5) Debŏrah; (6) Judith; (7) Britomart; (8) Elizabeth or Isabella of Aragon; (9) Johanna of Naples.

> By'r lady, maist story-man, I am well afraid thou hast done with thy talke. I had rather have hard something sayd of gentle and meeke women, for it is euill examples to let them understand of such sturdye manlye women as those have been which erewhile thou hast tolde of. They are quicke enow, I warrant you, nowadays, to take hart-a-grace, and dare make warre with their husbandes. I would not vor the price o' my coate, that Jone my wyfe had herd this yeare; she would haue carried away your tales of the nine worthy women a dele zoner than our minister's tales anent Sarah, Rebekah, Ruth, and the ministering women, I warrant you.—John Ferne: Dialogue on Heraldry ("Columel's reply to Torquatus").

("Hart-a-grace," i.e. a hart permitted by royal proclamation to run free and unharmed for ever, because it has been hunted by a king or queen.)

Women of Abandoned Morals.

(1) AGRIPPINA, daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina. The mother of Nero.

(2) BARBARA of Cilley, second wife of the emperor Sigismund, called "The Messalina of Germany."

(3) BERRY (Madame de), wife of the duc de Berry (youngest grandson of Louis XIV).

(4) CATHERINE II. of Russia, called "The Modern Messalina" (1729–1796).

(5) GIOVANNA or JEAN of Naples. Her first love was James count of March, who was beheaded. Her second was Camecioli, whom she put to death. Her next was Alfonso of Aragon. Her fourth was Louis d'Anjou, who died. Her fifth was René, the brother of Louis.

(6) ISABELLE of Bavaria, wife of Charles VI., and mistress of the duke of Burgundy.

(7) ISABELLE of France, wife of Edward II., and mistress of Mortimer.

(8) JULIA, daughter of the emperor Augustus.

(9) MAROZIA, the daughter of Theodora, and mother of pope John XI. The infamous daughter of an infamous mother (ninth century).

(10) MESSALI'NA, wife of Claudius the Roman emperor.

Wonder (The), a comedy by Mrs. Centlivre; the second title being A Woman Keeps a Secret (1714). The woman referred to is Violanté, and the secret she keeps is that donna Isabella, the sister of don Felix, has taken refuge under her roof. The danger she undergoes in keeping the secret is this: Her lover, Felix, who knows that colonel Briton calls at the house, is jealous, and fancies that he calls to see Violanté. The reason why donna Isabella has sought refuge with Violanté is to escape a marriage with a Dutch gentleman whom she dislikes. After a great deal of trouble and distress, the secret is unravelled, and the comedy ends with a double marriage, that of Violanté with don Felix, and that of Isabella with colonel Briton.

Wonder of the World (The).

GERBERT, a man of prodigious learning. When he was made pope, he took the name of Sylvester II. (930, 999–1003).

OTTO III. of Germany, a pupil of Gerbert. What he did deserving to be called Mirabilia Mundi nobody knows (980, 983–1002).

FREDERICK II. of Germany (1194, 1215–1250).

Wonders of Wales (The Seven): (1) The mountains of Snowdon (2) Overton churchyard, (3) the bells of Gresford Church, (4) Llangollen bridge, (5) Wrexham steeple (? tower), (6) Pystyl Rhaiadr waterfall, (7) St. Winifrid's well.

Wonders of the World (The Seven).

The pyramids first, which in Egypt were laid;
Next Babylon's garden, for Amytis made
Then Mausolus's tomb of affection and guilt;
Fourth, the temple of Diana, in Ephesus built;
The colossos of Rhodes, cast in brass, to the sun;
Sixth, Jupiter's statue, by Phidias done;
The pharos of Egypt, last wonder of old,
Or the palace of Cyrus, cemented with gold.

Wonderful Doctor, Roger Bacon (1214–1292).

Wood (Babes in the). (See CHILDREN IN THE WOOD, p. 203.)

Wood (The Maria), a civic pleasure-barge, once the property of the lord mayors. It was built in 1816 by sir Matthew Wood, and was called after his eldest daughter. In 1859 it was sold to alderman Humphrey for £410.

Wood Street (London) is so called from Thomas Wood, sheriff, in 1491, who dwelt there.

Wood'cock (Adam), falconer of the lady Mary at Avenel Castle. In the revels he takes the character of the "abbot of Unreason."—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Woodcock (Justice), a gouty, rheumatic, crusty, old country gentleman, who invariably differed with his sister Deb'orah in everything. He was a bit of a Lothario in his young days, and still retained a somewhat licorous tooth. Justice Woodcock had one child, named Lucinda, a merry girl, full of fun.

Deborah Woodcock, sister of the justice; a starch, prudish old maid, who kept the house of her brother, and disagreed with him in everything.—Bickerstaff: Love in a Village (1762).

Woodcocks live on Suction. These birds feed chiefly by night, and, like ducks, seem to live on suction; but in reality they feed on the worms, snails, slugs, and the little animals which swarm in muddy water.

One cannot live, like woodcocks, upon suction.
Byron: Don Juan, ii. 67 (1819).

Woodcourt (Allan), a medical man, who married Esther Summerson. His mother was a Welsh woman, apt to prose on the subject of Morgan-ap-Kerrig.—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Wooden Gospels (The), card-tables.

After supper were brought in the wooden gospels, and the books of the four kings [cards].—Rabelais: Gargantua, i. 22 (1533).

Wooden Horse (The). Virgil tells us that Ulysses had a monster wooden horse made by Epēos after the death of Hector. He gave out that it was an offering to the gods to secure a prosperous voyage back to Greece. By the advice of Sinon, the Trojans dragged the horse into Troy for a palladium; but at night the Grecian soldiers concealed therein were released by Sinon from their concealment, slew the Trojan guards, opened the city gates, and set fire to the city.

Arctinos of Miletus, in his poem called The Destruction of Troy, furnished Virgil with the tale of "the Wooden Horse" and "the burning of Troy" (fl. B.C. 776).

¶ A remarkable parallel occurred in Saracenic history. Arrestan, in Syria, was taken in the seventh century by Abu Obeidah by a similar stratagem. He obtained leave of the governor to deposit in the citadel some old lumber which impeded his march. Twenty large boxes filled with men were carried into the castle. Abu marched off; and while the Christians were returning thanks for the departure of the enemy, the soldiers removed the sliding bottoms of the boxes and made their way out, overpowered the sentries, surprised the great church, opened the city gates, and Abu, entering with his army, took the city without further opposition.—Ockley: History of the Saracens, i. 187 (1718).

¶ The capture of Sark affords another parallel. Sark was in the hands of the French. A Netherlander, with one ship, asked permission to bury one of his crew in the chapel. The French consented, provided the crew came on shore wholly unarmed. This was agreed to, but the coffin was full of arms; and the crew soon equipped themselves, overpowered the French, and took the island.—Percy: Anecdotes, 249. (See HORSE, p. 505.)

Swoln with hate and ire, their huge unwieldly force
Came clustering like the Greeks out of the wooden horse.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xii. (1613).

Wooden Horse (The), Clavilēno, the wooden horse on which don Quixote and Sancho Panza got astride to disenchant Antonomas'ia and her husband, who were shut up in the tomb of queen Maguncia of Candaya.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iii. 4, 5 (1615).

¶ Another wooden horse was the one given by an Indian to the shah of Persia as a New Year's gift. It had two pegs. By turning one it rose into the air, and by turning the other it descended wherever the rider wished. Prince Firouz mounted the horse, and it carried him instantaneously to Bengal.—Arabian Nights ("The Enchanted Horse").

¶ Reynard says that king Crampart made for the daughter of king Marcadigês a wooden horse which would go a hundred miles an hour. His son Clamadês mounted it, and it flew out of the window of the king's hall, to the terror of the young prince.—Alkman: Reynard the Fox (1498). (See CAMBUSCAN, p. 172.)

Wooden Spoon. The last of the honour men in the mathematical tripos at the examination for degrees in the University of Cambridge.

Sure my invention must be down at zero,
And I grown one of many "wooden spoons"
Of verse (the name with which we Cantabs please
To dub the last of honours in degrees).
Byron: Don Juan, iii. 110 (1820).

Wooden Sword (He wears a), Said of a person who rejects an offer at the early part of the day, and sells the article at a lower price later on. A euphemism for a fool; the fools or jesters were furnished with wooden swords.

Wooden Walls, ships made of wood. When Xerxes invaded Greece, the Greeks sent to ask the Delphic oracle for advice, and received the following answer (B.C. 480):—

Pallas hath urged, and Zeus, the sire of all,
Hath safety promised in a wooden wall;
Seed-time and harvest, sires shall, weeping, tell
How thousands fought at Salamis and fell.
E. C. B.

Wooden Wedding, the fifth anniversary of a wedding. It used, in Germany, to be etiquette to present gifts made of wood to the lady on this occasion. The custom is not wholly abandoned even now. (See WEDDING, p. 1200.)

Woodman (The), an opera by sir H. Bate Dudley (1771). (For the plot, see WILFORD, p. 1214.)

Woodstal (Henry), in the guard of Richard Cœur de Lion.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Woodstock, a novel by sir W. Scott (1826). It was hastily put together, but is not unworthy of the name it bears (1826) (time, the Commonwealth).

 The novel is concerned with the disguises and escapes of Charles II. during the Commonwealth; and ends with the death of Cromwell and the triumphant entry of the king into London.

It is called Woodstock from the Lee family, the head of which (sir Henry Lee) was head-ranger of Woodstock. His daughter Alice marries Everard a Cromwellite; and his servant Phœbe Mayflower marries Joceline Joliffe, under-keeper of Woodstock forest.

Amongst the subsidiary characters are Shakespeare, Milton, Ben Jonson, Davenant the poet, "Fair Rosamond," prince Rupert, general Monk, Cromwell's daughter, and many other persons of historic interest.

Woodville (Harry), the treacherous friend of Penruddock, who ousted him of the wife to whom he was betrothed. He was wealthy, but reduced himself to destitution by gambling.

Mrs. Woodville (whose Christian name was Arabella), wife of Harry Woodville, but previously betrothed to Roderick Penruddock. When reduced to destitution, Penruddock restored to her the settlement which her husband had lost in play.

Captain Henry Woodville, son of the above; a noble soldier, brave and high-minded, in love with Emily Tempest, but, in the ruined condition of the family, unable to marry her. Penruddock makes over to him all the deeds, bonds, and obligations which his father had lost in gambling.—Cumberland: The Wheel of Fortune (1779).

Woodville (Lord), a friend of general Brown. It was lord Woodville's house that was haunted by the "lady in the Sacque."—Sir W. Scott: The Tapestried Chamber (time, George III.).

Woollen. It was Mrs. Oldfield, the actress, who revolted at the idea of being shrouded in woollen. She insisted on being arrayed in chintz trimmed with Brussels lace, and on being well rouged to hide the pallor of death. Pope calls her "Narcissa."

> "Odious! In woollen? 'Twould a saint provoke!"
> Were the last words that poor Narcissa spoke.
> "No, let a charming chintz and Brussels lace
> Wrap my cold limbs and shade my lifeless face;
> One would not, sure, be frightful when one's dead!
> And Betty, give this cheek a little red."
> Pope: Moral Essays, i. (1731).

Wopsle (Mr.), parish clerk. He had a Roman nose, a large, shining, bald forehead, and a deep voice, of which he was very proud. "If the Church had been thrown open," i.e. free to competition, Mr. Wopsle would have chosen the pulpit. As it was, he only punished the "Amens" and gave out the psalms; but his face always indicated the inward thought of "Look at this and look at that," meaning the gent at the reading-desk. He turned actor in a small metropolitan theatre.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

Work (Endless), Penelopé's web (p. 822); Vortigern's Tower (p. 1183); washing the blackamoor white; etc.

World (The End of the). This ought to have occurred, according to cardinal Nicolas de Cusa, in 1704. He demonstrates it thus: The Deluge happened in the thirty-fourth jubilee of fifty years from the Creation (A.M. 1700), and therefore the end of the world should properly occur on the thirty-fourth jubilee of the Christian era, or A.D. 1704. The four grace years are added to compensate for the blunder of chronologists respecting the first year of grace.

¶ The most popular dates of modern times for the end of the world, or what is practically the same thing, the Millennium, are the following: 1836, Johann Albrecht Bengel, Erklärte Offenbarung; 1843, William Miller, of America; 1866, Dr. John Cumming; 1881, Mother Shipton.

¶ It was very generally believed in France, Germany, etc., that the end of the world would happen in the thousandth year after Christ; and therefore much of the land was left uncultivated, and a general famine ensued. Luckily, it was not agreed whether the thousand years should date from the birth or the death of Christ, or the desolation would have been much greater. Many charters begin with these words, As the world is now drawing to its close. Kings and nobles gave up their state: Robert of France, son of Hugh Capet, entered the monastery of St. Denis; and at Limoges, princes, nobles, and knights proclaimed "God's Truce," and solemnly bound themselves to abstain from feuds, to keep the peace towards each other, and to help the oppressed.—Hallam: The Middle Ages (1818).

¶ Another hypothesis is this: As one day with God equals a thousand years (Ps. xc. 4), and God laboured in creation six days, therefore the world is to labour 6000 years, and then to rest. According to this theory, the end of the world ought to occur A.M. 6000, or A.D. 1996 (supposing the world to have been created 4004 years before the birth of Christ). This hypothesis, which is widely accepted, is quite safe for close on to another century.

World before the Flood (The), a poem in heroic couplets by Montgomery (1813). It is divided into ten cantos. It describes the antediluvian patriarchs in the Happy Valley; the valley is invaded by the descendants of Cain; and the deliverance of the patriarchs from the hands of the giants. The episodes are the loves of Javan and Zillah, and the translation of Enoch.

World without a Sun.

> And say, without our hopes, without our fears,
> Without the home that plighted love endears,
> Without the smile from partial beauty won,
> Oh! what were man?—a world without a sun.
> Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, ii. (1799)

Worldly Wiseman (Mr.), one who tries to persuade Christian that it is very bad policy to continue his journey towards the Celestial City.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, i. (1678).

Worm (Man is a).

> The learn'd themselves we Book-worms name;
> The blockhead is a Slow-worm;
> Thy nymph whose tail is all on flame
> Is aptly termed a Glow-worm;
> The flatterer an Earwig grows;
> Thus worms suit all conditions;—
> Misers are Muck-worms; Silk-worms beaus;
> And Death-watches physicians.
> Pope: To Mr. John Moore (1728).

Worms (Language of). Melampos the prophet was acquainted with the language of worms; and when thrown into a dungeon, heard the worms communicating to each other that the roof overhead would fall in, for the beams were eaten through. He imparted this intelligence to his jailers, and was removed to another dungeon. At night the roof did fall, and the king, amazed at this foreknowledge, released Melampos, and gave him the oxen of Iphiklos.

Worse than a Crime. Talleyrand said, respecting the murder of the duc d'Enghien by Napoleon I., "It was worse than a crime, it was a blunder."

Worthies (The Nine). Three Gentiles: Hector, Alexander, Julius Cæsar; three Jews: Joshua, David, Judas Maceabæus; three Christians: Arthur, Charlemagne, Godfrey of Bouillon.

Worthies of London (The Nine).

(1) Sir William Walworth, fishmonger, who stabbed Wat Tyler the rebel. For this service king Richard II. gave him the "cap of maintenance" and a "dagger" for the arms of London (lord mayor 1374, 1380).

(2) Sir Henry Pritchard or Picard, vintner, who feasted Edward III., the Black Prince, John king of Austria, the king of Cyprus, and David of Scotland, with 5000 guests, in 1356, the year of his mayoralty.

(3) Sir William Sevenoke, grocer. "A foundling, found under seven oaks." He fought with the dauphin, and built twenty almshouses, etc. (lord mayor 1418).

(4) Sir Thomas White, merchant tailor, who, during his mayoralty in 1553, kept London faithful to queen Mary during Wyatt's rebellion. Sir Thomas White was the son of a poor clothier, and began trade as a tailor with £100. He was the founder of St. John's College, Oxford, on the spot where two elms grew from one root.

(5) Sir John Bonham, mercer, commander of the army which overcame Solyman the Great, who knighted him on the field after the victory, and gave him chains of gold, etc.

(6) Sir Christopher Croker, vintner, the first to enter Bordeaux when it was besieged. Companion of the Black Prince. He married Doll Stodie.

(7) Sir John Hawkwood, tailor, knighted by the Black Prince. He is immortalized in Italian history as Giovanni Acuti Cavaliero. He died in Padua.

(8) Sir Hugh Caverley, silk-weaver, famous for ridding Poland of a monstrous bear. He died in France.

(9) Sir Henry Maleverer, grocer, generally called "Henry of Cornhill," a crusader in the reign of Henry IV., and guardian of "Jacob's Well."—R. Johnson: The Nine Worthies of London (1592).

Worthington (Lieutenant), "the poor gentleman;" a disabled officer and a widower, very poor, "but more proud than poor, and more honest than proud." He was for thirty years in the king's army, but was discharged on half-pay, being disabled at Gibraltar by a shell which crushed his arm. His wife was shot in his arms when his daughter was but three years old. The lieutenant put his name to a bill for £500; but his friend dying before he had effected his insurance, Worthington became responsible for the entire sum, and if sir Robert Bramble had not most generously paid the bill, the poor lieutenant would have been thrown into jail.

Emily Worthington, the lieutenant's daughter; a lovely, artless, affectionate girl, with sympathy for every one, and a most amiable disposition. Sir Charles Cropland tried to buy her, but she rejected his proposals with scorn, and fell in love with Frederick Bramble, to whom she was given in marriage.—Colman: The Poor Gentleman (1802).

Worthy, in love with Melinda, who coquets with him for twelve months, and then marries him.—Farquhar: The Recruiting Officer (1705).

Worthy (Lord), the suitor of lady Reveller, who was fond of play. She became weary of gambling, and was united in marriage to lord Worthy.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Basset Table (1706).

Wouvermans, a Dutch painter, famous for crowded little pictures of marauders, battle-pieces, and pictures of roadsides (1620–1668).

The English Wouvermans, Abraham Cooper. One of his best pieces is "The Battle of Bosworth Field."

Richard Cooper is called "The British Poussin."

Wozenham (Miss), the lodging-house keeper in Mrs. Lirriper's Lodgings (1863) and Mrs. Lirriper's Legacy (1864), by Dickens.

Wrangle (Mr. Caleb), a hen-pecked young husband, of oily tongue and plausible manners, but smarting under the nagging tongue and wilful ways of his fashionable wife.

Mrs. Wrangle, his wife, the daughter of sir Miles Mowbray. She was for ever snubbing her young husband, wrangling with him, morning, noon, and night, and telling him most provokingly "to keep his temper." This couple led a cat-and-dog life: he was sullen, she quick-tempered; he jealous, she open and incautious. — Cumberland: First Love (1796).

Wrath's Hole (The), Cornwall. Bolster, a gigantic wrath, wanted St. Agnes to be his mistress. She told him she would comply when he filled a small hole, which she pointed out to him, with his blood. The wrath agreed, not knowing that the hole opened into the sea; and thus the saint cunningly bled the wrath to death, and then pushed him over the cliff. The hole is called "The Wrath's Hole" to this day, and the stones about it are coloured with blood-red streaks all over.—Polwhele: History of Cornwall, i. 176 (1813).

Wray (Enoch), "the village patriarch," blind, poor, and 100 years old; but reverenced for his meekness, resignation, wisdom, piety, and experience.—Crabbe: The Village Patriarch (1783).

Wrayburn (Eugene), barrister-at-law; an indolent, idle, moody, whimsical young man, who loves Lizzie Hexham. After he is nearly killed by Bradley Headstone, he reforms, and marries Lizzie, who saved his life.—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1864).

Wren, who built St. Paul's Cathedral. His epitaph is—

Si monumentum requiris, circumspice.

Wren (Jenny), whose real name was Fanny Cleaver, a dolls' dressmaker, and the friend of Lizzie Hexham, who at one time lodged with her. Jenny was a little, deformed girl, with a sharp, shrewd face, and beautiful golden hair. She supported herself and her drunken father, whom she reproved as a mother might reprove a child. "Oh," she cried to him, pointing her little finger, "you bad old boy! Oh, you naughty, wicked creature! What do you mean by it?"—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1864).

Writing on the Wall (The), a secret but mysterious warning of coming danger. The reference is to Belshazzar's feast (Dan. v. 5, 25–28).

Wrong (All in the), a comedy by Murphy (1761). The principal characters are sir John and lady Restless, sir William Bellmont and his son George, Beverley and his sister Clarissa, Blandford and his daughter Belinda. Sir John and lady Restless were wrong in suspecting each other of infidelity, but this misunderstanding made their lives wretched. Beverley was deeply in love with Belinda, and was wrong in his jealousy of her, but Belinda was also wrong in not vindicating herself. She knew that she was innocent, and felt that Beverley ought to trust her, but she gave herself and him needless torment by permitting a misconception to remain which she might have most easily removed. The old men were also wrong: Blandford, in promising his daughter in marriage to sir William Bellmont's son, seeing she loved Beverley; and sir William, in accepting the promise, seeing his son was plighted to Clarissa. A still further complication of wrong occurs: sir John wrongs Beverley in believing him to be intriguing with his wife; and lady Restless wrongs Belinda in supposing that she coquets with her husband; both were pure mistakes, all were in the wrong, but all in the end were set right.

Wronghead (Sir Francis), of Bumper Hall, and M.P. for Guzzledown; a country squire, who comes to town for the season with his wife, son, and eldest daughter. Sir Francis attends the House, but gives his vote on the wrong side; and he spends his money in the hope of obtaining a place under Government. His wife spends about £100 a day on objects of no use. His son is on the point of marrying the "cast mistress" of a swindler, and his daughter of marrying a forger; but Manly interferes to prevent these fatal steps, and sir Francis returns home to prevent utter ruin.

Lady Wronghead, wife of sir Francis; a country dame, who comes to London, where she squanders money on worthless objects, and expects to get into "society." Happily, she is persuaded by Manly to return home before the affairs of her husband are wholly desperate.

Squire Richard [Wronghead], eldest son of sir Francis, a country bumpkin.

Miss Jenny [Wronghead], eldest daughter of sir Francis; a silly girl, who thinks it would be a fine thing to be called a "countess," and therefore becomes the dupe of one Basset, a swindler, who calls himself a "count."—Vanbrugh and Cibber: The Provoked Husband (1726).

Würzburg on the Stein, Hochheim on the Main, and Bacharach on the Rhine grow the three best wines of Germany. The first is called Steinwine, the second hock, and the third muscadine.

Wuthering Heights, a novel by Emily Brontë (1847).

Wyat. Henry Wyat was imprisoned by Richard III., and when almost starved, a cat appeared at the window-grating, and dropped a dove into his hand. This occurred day after day, and Wyat induced the warder to cook for him the doves thus wonderfully obtained.

¶ Elijah the Tishbite, while he lay hidden at the brook Cherith, was fed by ravens, who brought "bread and flesh" every morning and evening.—1 Kings xvii. 6.

In my Dictionary of Miracles, twenty-one similar examples are recorded, pp. 126–129.

Wylie (Andrew), ex-clerk of bailie Nicol Jarvie.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Wynebgwrthucher, the shield of king Arthur.—The Mabinogion ("Kilhwch and Olwen," twelfth century).

Wynkyn de Worde, the second printer in London (from 1491–1534). The first was Caxton (from 1476–1491). Wynkyn de Worde assisted Caxton in the new art of printing.

Wyo'ming, in Pennsylvania, purchased by an American company from the Delaware Indians. It was settled by an American colony, but being subject to constant attacks from the savages, the colony armed in self-defence. In 1778 most of the able-bodied men were called to join the army of Washington, and in the summer of that year an army of British and Indian allies, led by colonel Butler, attacked the settlement, massacred the inhabitants, and burnt their houses to the ground.

∴ Campbell has made this the subject of a poem entitled Gertrude of Wyoming, but he miscalls the place Wy'oming, and makes Brandt, instead of Butler, the leader of the attack.

> On Susquehana's side fair Wy'oming,
> . . . once the loveliest land of all
> That see the Atlantic wave their morn restore.
> Campbell: Gertrude of Wyoming, i. (1809).

Wyvill (William de), a steward of the field at the tournament.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

X.

Xan'adu, a city mentioned by Coleridge in his Kubla Khan. The idea of this poem is borrowed from the Pilgrimage by Purchas (1613), where Xanadu is called "Xaindu." It is said to have occurred to Coleridge in a dream, but the dream was that of memory only.

Xanthos, the horse of Achillês. He spoke with a human voice, like Balaam's ass, Adrastos's horse (Arion), Fortunio's horse (Comrade), Mahomet's "horse" (Al Borak), Sâleh's camel, the dog of the seven sleepers (Katmîr), the black pigeons of Dodona and Ammon, the king of serpents (Temliha), the serpent which was cursed for tempting Eve, the talking bird called bulbul-hêzar, the little green bird of princess Fairstar, the White Cat, cum quibusdam aliis.

> The mournful Xanthus (says the bard of old)
> Of Peleus' warlike son the fortune told.
> Peter Pindar [Dr. Wolcot]: The Lousiad, v. (1809).

Xantippê (3 syl.), wife of Socrătês; proverbial for a scolding, nagging, peevish wife. One day, after storming at the philosopher, she emptied a vessel of dirty water on his head, whereupon Socratês simply remarked, "Ay, ay, we always look for rain after thunder."

Xantippé (3 syl.), daughter of Cimo'nos. She preserved the life of her old father in prison by suckling him. The guard marvelled that the old man held out so long, and, watching for the solution, discovered the fact.

¶ Euphra'sia, daughter of Evander, preserved her aged father while in prison in a similar manner. (See GRECIAN DAUGHTER, p. 446.)

Xavier de Belsunce (H. François), immortalized by his self-devotion in administering to the plague-stricken at Marseilles (1720–22).

¶ Other similar examples are Charles

Borro'meo, cardinal and archbishop of Milan (1538–1584). St. Roche, who died in 1327 from the plague caught by him in his indefatigable labours in ministering to the plague-stricken at Piacenza. Mompesson was equally devoted to the people of Eyam. Our own sir John Lawrence, lord mayor of London, is less known, but ought to be held in equal honour, for supporting 40,000 dismissed servants in the great plague.

Xenoc'rates (4 syl.), a Greek philosopher. The courtezan Laïs made a heavy bet that she would allure him from his "prudery;" but after she had tried all her arts on him without success, she exclaimed, 'I thought he had been a living man, and not a mere stone."

Do you think I am Xenocrates, or like the sultan with marble legs? There you leave me tête-à-tête with Mrs. Hallet, as if my heart were a mere flint.—Benjamin Thompson: The Stranger, iv. 2 (1797).

Xerxes denounced (See Plutarch, Life of Themistoclês, article "Sea-Fights of Artemisium and Salamis.")

Minerva on the bounding prow
Of Athens stood, and with the thunder's voice
Denounced her terrors on their impious heads [the Persians].
And shook her burning ægis. Xerxes saw,
From Heracle'um on the mountain's height,
Throned in her golden car; he knew the sign
Celestial, felt unrighteous hope forsake
His faltering heart, and turned his face with shame.
Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads (1767).

Xime'na, daughter of count de Gormez. The count was slain by the Cid for insulting his father. Four times Ximēna demanded vengeance of the king; but the king, perceiving that the Cid was in love with her, delayed vengeance, and ultimately she married him.

Xit, the royal dwarf of Edward VI.

Xury, a Moresco boy, servant to Robinson Crusoe.—Defoe: Adventures of Robinson Crusoe (1719).

Y.

Y, called the "Samian letter." It was used by Pythagoras of Samos as a symbol of the path of virtue, which is one, like the stem of the letter; but once divergent, the further the two lines are drawn the greater becomes the divergence.

Ya'hoo, one of the human brutes subject to the Houyhnhnms [Whin-hims] or horses possessed of human intelligence. In this tale the horses and men change places, the horses are the chief and ruling race, and man the subject one.—Swift: Gulliver's Travels (1726).

Yajûj and Majûj, the Arabian form of Gog and Magog. Gog is a tribe of Turks, and Magog of the Gilân (the Geli or Gelæ of Ptolemy and Strabo). Al Beidâwi says they were man-eaters. Dhu'lkarnein made a rampart of red-hot metal to keep out their incursions.

He said to the workmen, "Bring me iron in large pieces till it fill up the space between these two mountains . . . [then] blow with your bellows till it make the iron red hot." And he said further, "Bring me molten brass that I may pour upon it." When this wall was finished, Gog and Magog could not scale it, neither could they dig through it.—Sale: Al Korân, xviii.

Yakutsk, in Siberia, affords an exact parallel to the story about Carthage. Dido, having purchased in Africa as much land as could be covered with a bull's hide, ordered the hide to be cut into thin slips, and thus enclosed land enough to build Byrsa upon. This Byrsa ("bull's hide") was the citadel of Carthage, round which the city grew.

So with Yakutsk. The strangers bought as much land as they could encompass with a cow-hide, but, by cutting the hide into slips, they encompassed enough land to build a city on.

Yama, a Hindû deity, represented by a man with four arms riding on a bull.

Thy great birth, O horse, is to be glorified, whether first springing from the firmament or from the water, inasmuch as thou hast neighed, thou hast the wings of the falcon, thou hast the limbs of the deer. Trita harnessed the horse which was given by Yama; Indra first mounted him; Gandharba seized his reins. Vasus, you fabricated the horse from the sun. Thou, O horse, art Yama; thou art Aditya; thou art Trita; thou art Soma.—The Rig Veda, li.

Ya'men, lord and potentate of Pandâlon (hell).—Hindû Mythology.

What worse than this hath Yamen's hell in store?
Southey: Curse of Kehama, ii. (1809).

Yar'ico, a young Indian maiden with whom Thomas Inkle fell in love. After living with her as his wife, he despicably sold her in Barbados as a slave.

(The story is told by sir Richard Steele in The Spectator, 11; and has been dramatized by George Colman under the title of Inkle and Yarico, 1787.)

Yarrow or Achillea millefolium. Linnæus recommends the bruised leaves of common yarrow as a most excellent vulnerary and powerful styptic.

[The hermit gathers]
The yarrow, wherewithall he stops the wound-made gore.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xii. (1613).

Yarrow (The Flower of). Mary Scott was so called.

Yathreb, the ancient name of Medina.

When a party of them said, "O inhabitants of Yathreb, there is no place of security for you here, wherefore return home;" a part of them asked leave of the prophet to depart.—Sale: Al Koran, xxxiii.

Year of the Stars (The), 902; so called from a great shower of shooting stars, which appeared at the death of a Moorish king.

Yeast, a novel by the Rev. C. Kingsley (1848). Its object is to show the spiritual perplexities of thoughtful minds, and the ferment of the rural population.

Yellow Dwarf (The), a malignant, ugly imp, who claimed the princess All-fair as his bride; and carried her off to Steel Castle on his Spanish cat, the very day she was about to be married to the beautiful king of the Gold-Mines. The king of the Gold-Mines tried to rescue her, and was armed by a good siren with a diamond sword of magic power, by which he made his way through every difficulty to the princess. Delighted at seeing his betrothed, he ran to embrace her, and dropped his sword. Yellow Dwarf, picking it up, demanded if Gold-Mine would resign the lady, and on his refusing to do so, slew him with the magic sword. The princess, rushing forward to avert the blow, fell dead on the body of her dying lover.

Yellow Dwarf was so called from his complexion, and the orange tree he lived in. . . . He wore wooden shoes, a coarse, yellow stuff jacket, and had no hair to hide his large ears.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The Yellow Dwarf," 1682).

Yellow River (The), of China, so called from its colour. The Chinese have a proverb: Such and such a thing will occur when the Yellow River runs clear, i.e. never.

Yellow Water (The), a water which possessed this peculiar property: If only a few drops were put into a basin, no matter how large, it would produce a complete and beautiful fountain, which would always fill the basin and never overflow it.—Arabian Nights.

¶ In the fairy tale of Chery and Fair-star, by the comtesse D'Aulnoy, "the dancing water" did the same (1682).

Much of Bacon's life was passed in a visionary world . . . amidst buildings more sumptuous than the palace of Aladdin, and fountains more wonderful than the golden water of Parizade [q.v.].—Macaulay.

Yellowley (Mr. Triptolemus), the factor, an experimental agriculturist of Stourburgh or Harfra.

Mistress Baby or Barbary Yellowley, sister and housekeeper of Triptolemus.

Old Jasper Yellowley, father of Triptolemus and Barbary.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Yellowness, jealousy. Nym says (referring to Ford), "I will possess him with yellowness."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, act i. sc. 4 (1601).

Yellowplush (The Memoirs of Mr.), a series of humorous sketches by W. M. Thackeray. Mr. Yellowplush is a West-end footman, who is supposed to write the sketches.

Ye'men, Arabia Felix.

Beautiful are the maids that glide
On summer eves through Yemen's dales.
Moore: Lalla Rookh ("The Fire-Worshippers," 1817).

Yenadis'se, an idler, a gambler; also an Indian fop.

With my nets you never help me;
At the door my nets are hanging.
Go and wring them, yenadizze.
Longfellow: Hiawatha, vi. (1855).

Yendys (Sydney), the nom de plume of Sydney Dobell (1824–1874).

("Yendys" is merely the word Sydney reversed.)

Yeoman's Tale (The), the thirteenth of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. (See CHANOUNES YEMENES TALE, p. 194.)

Yeru'ti, son of Quiāra and Monnĕma. His father and mother were of the Guarāni race, and the only ones who escaped a small-pox plague which infested that part and the anniversary was kept by the Romans as a fête day.

of Ireland. When sir Tristram was wounded in fighting for his uncle Mark, he went to Ireland, and was cured by the Fair Ysolde. On his return to Cornwall, he gave his uncle such a glowing account of the young princess that he was sent to propose offers of marriage, and to conduct the lady to Cornwall. The brave young knight and the fair damsel fell in love with each other on their voyage, and, although Ysolde married king Mark, she retained to the end her love for sir Tristram. King Mark, jealous of his nephew, banished him from Cornwall, and he went to Wales, where he performed prodigies of valour. In time his uncle invited him back to Cornwall, but, the guilty intercourse being renewed, he was banished a second time. Sir Tristram now wandered over Spain, Ermonie, and Brittany, winning golden opinions by his exploits. In Brittany he married the king's daughter, Ysolde or Ysonde of the White Hand, but neither loved her nor lived with her. The rest of the tale is differently told by different authors. Some say he returned to Cornwall, renewed his love with Ysolde the Fair, and was treacherously stabbed by his uncle Mark. Others say he was severely wounded in Brittany, and sent for his aunt, but died before her arrival. When Ysolde the Fair heard of his death, she died of a broken heart; and king Mark buried them both in one grave, over which he planted a rose bush and a vine.

Ysolde or Ysonde or Yseult of the White Hand, daughter of the king of Brittany. Sir Tristram married her for her name's sake, but never loved her nor lived with her, because he loved his aunt Ysolde the Fair (the young wife of king Mark), and it was a point of chivalry for a knight to love only one woman, whether widow, wife, or maid.

Ysolt or Isold. The French form is Yseulte or Ysonde; and the Italian form is Isolte. Tennyson spells the word Isolt in The Last Tournament.

Ytene [E-teé-ne], New Forest, in Hampshire.

> So when two boars in wild Ytené bred,
> Or on Westphalia's fattening chestnuts fed,
> Gnash their sharp tusks, and roused with equal fire,
> Dispute the reign of some luxurious mire,
> In the black flood they wallow o'er and o'er,
> Till their armed jaws distill with foam and gore.
> Gay: Trivia, iii. 45 (1712).

Yuhid'thiton, chief of the Az'tecas, the mightiest in battle and wisest in council. He succeeded Co'anocot'zin (5 syl.) as king of the tribe, and led the people from the south of the Missouri to Mexico.—Southey: Madoc (1805).

Yves (St.), of whom it was written—

> Sanctus Ivo erat Brito,
> Advocátus, et non latro,
> Res miranda populo.
> St. Yves (1 syl.) was of the land of Bief,
> An advocate, yet not a thief,
> A stretch on popular belief.

Yvetot [Eve-toe], a town in Normandy; the lord of the town was called le roi d' Yvetot. The tale is that Clotaire son of Clovis, having slain the lord of Yvetot before the high altar of Soissons, made atonement to the heirs by conferring on them the title of king. Béranger says this potentate is little known in history, but his character and habits were not peculiar. "He rose late, went to bed early, slept without caring for glory, made four meals a day, lived in a thatched house, wore a cotton night-cap instead of a crown, rode on an ass, and his only law was 'charity begins at home.'"

> Il était un roi d'Yvetot
> Peu connu dans l'histoire;
> Se levant tard, se couchant tôt,
> Dormant fort bien sans gloire,
> Et couronné par Jeanneton
> D'un simple bonnet de coton.
> Dit on:
> Oh! oh! oh! ah! Ah! ah! ah! ah!
> Quel bon petit roi c'était; là! là! là!
> Béranger.
> A king there was, "rol d'Yvetot" clept,
> But little known in story,
> Went soon to bed, till daylight slept,
> And soundly without glory.
> His royal brow in cotton cap
> Would Jannet, when he took his nap, > Enwrap.
> Oh! oh! oh! oh! Ah! ah! ah! ah!
> What king more famous? La! la! la!

Ywaine and Gawin, the English version of "Owain and the Lady of the Fountain." The English version was taken from the French of Chrestien de Troyes, and was published by Ritson (twelfth century). The Welsh tale isi n the Mabinogion. There is also a German version by Hartmann von der Aue, a minnesinger (beginning of thirteenth century). There are also Bavarian and Danish versions.

Z.

Zabarell, a learned Italian commentator on works connected with the Aristotelian system of philosophy (1533-1589).

And still I held converse with Zabarell . . .
Stufft noting-books; and still my spaniel slept.
At length he waked and yawned; and by yon sky,
For aught I know, he knew as much as I.
Marston (died 1634).

Zabidius, the name in Martial for which "Dr. Fell" was substituted by Tom Brown, when set by the dean of Christ Church to translate the lines—

Non amo te, Zabidi, nec possum dicere quare;
Hoc tantum possum dicere, non amo te.

I love thee not, Zabidius—
Yet cannot tell thee why;
But this I may most truly say,
I love thee not, not I.
E. C. A.

Imitated thus—

I do not like thee, Dr Fell—
The reason why, I cannot tell;
But this I know, and know full well,
I do not like thee, Dr. Fell.
Tom Brown (author of Dialogues of the Dead).

Zabir (Al). So the Mohammedans call mount Sinai.

When Moses came at our appointed time, and his Lord spake unto him, he said, "O Lord, show me Thy glory, that I may behold Thee;" and God answered, "Thou shalt in no wise behold Me; but look towards this mountain (Al Zabir), and if it stand firm in its place, then shalt thou see me." But when the Lord appeared with glory, the mount was reduced to dust.—Al Korân, vii.

Zab'ulon, a Jew, the servant of Hippolyta a rich lady wantonly in love with Arnoldo. Arnoldo is contracted to the chaste Zeno'cia, who, in turn, is basely pursued by the governor count Clo'dio.—John Fletcher: The Custom of the Country (1647).

Zab'ulus, same as Diabolus.

Gay sport have we had to-night with Zabulus.
Lord Lytton: Harold, viii. (1850).

Zaccoo'ia, king of Mozambique, who received Vasco da Gama and his crew with great hospitality, believing them to be Mohammedans, but when he ascertained that they were Christians, he tried to destroy them.—Camoëns: Lusiad, i., ii. (1569).

Zacharia, one of the three anabaptists who induced John of Leyden to join the revolt of Westphalia and Holland. On the arrival of the emperor, they betrayed their dupe, but perished with him in the flames of the burning palace.—Meyerbeer: Le Prophète (1849).

Zadig, the hero and title of a novel by Voltaire. Zadig is a wealthy young Babylonian, and the object of the novel is to show that the events of life are beyond human control.

Method of Zadig, drawing inferences from close observation. A man who had lost his camel asked Zadig if he had seen it. Zadig replied, "You mean a camel with one eye, and defective teeth, I suppose? No, I have not seen it, but it has strayed towards the west." Being asked how he knew these things if he had not seen the beast, "Well enough," he replied. "I knew it had but one eye, because it cropped the grass only on one side of the road. I knew it had lost some of its teeth, because the grass was not bitten clean off. I knew it had strayed westward, by its footprints."

Zad'kiel (3 syl.), angel of the planet Jupiter.—Jewish Mythology.

Zad'kiel, the pseudonym of Mr. Alfred James Pearce.

Zadoc, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is Sancroft archbishop of Canterbury.

Zadoc the priest, whom shunning power and place,
His lowly mind advanced to David's grace.
Pt. i. 601, 602 (1681).

Zaide (2 syl.), a young slave, who pretends to have been ill-treated by Adraste (2 syl.), and runs to don Pèdre for protection. (For the rest, see ADRASTE, p. 10.)—Molière La Sicilien ou L'Amour Peintre (1667).

Zaira, the mother of Eva Wentworth. She is a brilliant Italian, courted by de Courcy. When deceived by him, she meditates suicide, but forbears, and sees Eva die tranquilly, and the faithless de Courcy perish of remorse.—Rev. C. R. Maturin Women (a novel, 1822).

Zakkum or Al Zakkûm, the tree of death, rooted in hell, as the tree of life was in Eden. It is called in the Korân "the cursed tree" (ch. xvii.). The fruit is extremely bitter, and any great evil or bitter draught is figuratively called al Zakkûm. The damned eat its bitter fruits and drink scalding hot water (ch. xxxvii.).

The unallayable bitterness
Of Zaccoum's fruit accurst.
Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, vii. 26 (1799).

Is this a better entertainment, or is it of the tree a Zakkûm?—Sale: Al Korân, xxxvii.

Zál, father of Roustam, or Rostam (q.v.). (See also RODHAVER, p. 925.)

Zambo, the issue of an Indian and a negro.

Zambullo (Don Cleophas Leandro Perez), the person carried through the air by Asmodëus to the steeple of St. Salvador, and shown, in a moment of time, the interior of every private dwelling around.—Lesage: The Devil on Two Sticks (1707).

Cleaving the air at a greater rate than don Cleophas Leandro Perez Zambullo and his familiar.—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop (1840).

Zam'harir' (Al), that extreme cold to which the wicked shall be exposed after they leave the flames of hell or have drunk of the boiling water there.—Sale: Al Korân, vi. (notes).

Zam'ora, youngest of the three daughters of Balthazar. She is in love with Rolando, a young soldier, who fancies himself a woman-hater. (See ROLANDO, p. 928.)—Tobin: The Honeymoon (1804).

Zamti, the Chinese mandarin. His wife was Mandanê (q.v.).—Murphy: The Orphan of China (1761).

Zanga, the revengeful Moor, the servant of don Alonzo. The Moor hates Alonzo for two reasons (1) because he killed his father, and (2) because he struck him on the cheek; and although Alonzo has used every endeavour to conciliate Zanga, the revengeful Moor nurses his hate and keeps it warm. The revenge he wreaks is (1) to poison the friendship which existed between Alonzo and don Carlos by accusations against the don, and (2) to embitter the love of Alonzo for Leonora his wife. Alonzo, out of jealousy, has his friend killed, and Leonora makes away with herself. Having thus lost his best beloved, Zanga tells his dupe he has been imposed upon, and Alonzo, mad with grief, stabs himself. Zanga, content with the mischief he has done, is taken away to execution.—Young: The Revenge (1721).

 "Zanga" was the great character of Henry Mossop (1729–1773). It was also a favourite part with J. Kemble (1757–1823).

Zangbar, a fabulous island near India; probably the same as Zanguebar (Zanzibar) on the east coast of Africa.

Zano'ni, hero and title of a novel by lord Lytton. Zanoni is supposed to possess the power of communicating with spirits, prolonging life, and producing gold, silver, and precious stones (1842).

Zany of Debate. George Canning was so called by Charles Lamb in a sonnet printed in The Champion newspaper. Posterity has not endorsed the judgment or wit of this calumny (1770–1827).

Zaphimri, the "orphan of China," brought up by Zamti, under the name of Etan.

Ere yet the foe burst in,
"Zamti," said he, "preserve my cradled infant;
Save him from ruffians; train his youth to virtue . . ."
He could no more; the cruel spoiler seized him,
And dragged my king, from yonder altar dragged him,
Here on the blood-stained pavement; while the queen
And her dear fondlings, in one mangled heap,
Died in each other's arms.
Murphy: The Orphan of China, iii. 1 (1761).

Zaphna, son of Alcânor chief of Mecca. He and his sister Palmira, being taken captives in infancy, were brought up by Mahomet, and Zaphna, not knowing Palmira was his sister, fell in love with her, and was in turn beloved. When Mahomet laid siege to Mecca, he employed Zaphna to assassinate Alcanor, and when he had committed the deed, discovered that it was his own father he had killed. Zaphna would have revenged the deed on Mahomet, but died of poison.—Miller: Mahomet the Impostor (1740).

Zapolites (3 syl.), in More's Utopia, means the Swiss. They are described as a half-savage race, hired by the Utopians as mercenary soldiers.

Zara, an African queen, intensely in love with Osmyn (q.v.).—Congreve: The Mourning Bride (1697).

 "Zara" was one of the great characters of Mrs. Siddons (1755–1831).

Zara (in French, Zaïre), the heroine and title of a tragedy by Voltaire (1733), adapted for the English stage by Aaron Hill (1735). Zara is the daughter of Lusignan d'Outremer king of Jerusalem and brother of Nerestan. Twenty years ago, Lusignan and his two children had been taken captives. Nerestan was four years old at the time; and Zara, a mere infant, was brought up in the seraglio. Osman the sultan fell in love with her, and promised to make her his sultana; and as Zara loved him for himself, her happiness seemed complete. Nerestan, having been sent to France to obtain ransoms, returned at this crisis, and Osman fancied that he observed a familiarity between Zara and Nerestan, which roused his suspicions. Several things occurred to confirm them, and at last a letter was intercepted, appointing a rendezvous between them in a "secret passage" of the seraglio. Osman met Zara in the passage, and stabbed her to the heart. Nerestan was soon seized, and being brought before the sultan, told him he had slain his sister, and the sole object of his interview was to inform her of her father's death, and to bring her his dying blessing. Osman now saw his error, commanded all the Christian captives to be set at liberty, and stabbed himself.

Zaramilla, wife of Tinacrio king of Micomicon, in Egypt. He was told that his daughter would succeed him, that she would be dethroned by the giant Pandafilando, but that she would find in Spain the gallant knight of La Mancha, who would redress her wrongs and restore her to her throne.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. 3 (1605).

Zaraph, the angel who loved Nama. It was Nama's desire to love intensely and to love holily; but as she fixed her love on an angel and not on God, she was doomed to abide on earth till the day of consummation. Then both Nama and Zaraph will be received into the realms of everlasting love.—Moore: Loves of the Angels (1822).

Zauberflöte (Die), a magic flute, which had the power of inspiring love. When bestowed by the powers of darkness, the love it inspired was sensual love; but when by the powers of light, it became subservient to the very highest and holiest purposes. It guided Tami'no and Pami'na through all worldly dangers to the knowledge of divine truth (or the mysteries of Isis).—Mozart: Die Zauberflöte (1791).

Zeal (Arabella), in Shadwell's comedy The Fair Quaker of Deal (1617).

(This comedy was altered by E. Thompson in 1720.)

Zedekiah, one of general Harrison's servants.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Ze'gris and the Abencerra'ges [A'-ven-ce-rah'-ke], an historic romance, professing to be history, and printed at Alca'la in 1604. It was extremely popular, and had a host of imitations.

Zeid, Mahomet's freedman. "The prophet" adopted him as his son, and gave him Zeinab (or Zenobia) for a wife; but falling in love with her himself, Zeid gave her up to the prophet. She was Mahomet's cousin, and within the prohibited degrees, according to the Kordn.

Zeinab or ZENOBIA, wife of Zeid Mahomet's freedman and adopted son. She was the daughter of Amima, Mahomet's aunt.

Zei'nab (2 syl.), wife of Hodei'rah (3 syl.) an Arab. She lost her husband and all her children, except one, a boy named Thal'aba. Weary of life, the angel of death took her while Thalaba was yet a youth.—Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer (1797).

Zeleu'cus or Zaleucus, a Locrensian lawgiver, who enacted that adulterers should be deprived of their eyes. His own son being proved guilty, Zeleucus pulled out one of his own eyes, and one of his son's eyes, that "two eyes might be paid to the law."—Valerius Maximus: De Factis Dictisque, v. 5, ecl. 3.

How many now will tread Zeleucus' steps
Gascoigne: The Steele Glas (died 1577

Zel'ica, the betrothed of Azim. When it was rumoured that he had been slain in battle, Zelica joined the haram of the Veiled Prophet as "one of the elect of paradise." Azim returned from the wars, discovered her retreat, and advised her to flee with him, but she told him that she was now the prophet's bride. After the death of the prophet, Zelica assumed his veil, and Azim, thinking the veiled figure to be the prophet, rushed on her and killed her.—Moore: Lalla Rookh ("The Veiled Prophet," etc., 1817).

Zelis, the daughter of a Persian officer. She was engaged to a man in the middle age of life, but just prior to the wedding he forsook her for a richer bride. The father of Zelis challenged him, but was killed. Zelis now took lodging with a courtezan, and went with her to Italy; but when she discovered the evil courses of her companion, she determined to become a nun, and started by water for Rome. She was taken captive by corsairs, and sold from master to master, till at length Hingpo rescued her, and made her his wife.—Goldsmith: A Citizen of the World (1759).

Zelma'ne (3 syl.), the assumed name of Pyr'oclês when he put on female attire.—Sir P. Sidney: Arcadia (1590).

Sir Philip has preserved such a matchless decorum that Pyroclês' manhood suffers no stain for the effeminacy of Zelmanê.—Lamb.

Zelu'co, the only son of a noble Sicilian family, accomplished and fascinating, but spoilt by maternal indulgence, and at length rioting in dissipation. In spite of his gaiety of manner, he is a standing testimony that misery accompanies vice.—Dr. John Moore: Zeluco (a novel, 1786).

Ze'mia, one of the four who, next in authority to U'riel, preside over our earth. —Klopstock: The Messiah, iii. (1748).

Zemzem, a fountain at Mecca. The Mohammedans say it is the very spring which God made to slake the thirst of Ishmael, when Hagar was driven into the wilderness by Abraham. A bottle of this water is considered a very valuable present, even by princes.

There were also a great many bottles of water from the fountain of Zemzem, at Mecca.—Arabian Nights "The Purveyor's Story").

Zemzem, a well where common believers abide who are not equal to prophets or martyrs. The prophets go direct to paradise, and the latter await the resurrection in the form of green birds.—Sale: Al Korân.

Zenel'ophon, the beggar-girl who married king Cophet'ua of Africa. She is more generally called Penel'ophon.—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, act iv. sc. 1 (1594).

Zenjebil, a stream in paradise, flowing from the fountain Salsabil (q.v.). The word means "ginger."

Their attendants [in paradise] shall go round with vessels of silver, . . . and there shall be given to them to drink cups of wine mixed with the water of Zenjebil.—Sale: Al Korân, lxxvi.

Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, who claimed the title of "Queen of the East." She was defeated by Aurelian and taken prisoner in A.D. 273.

Zeno'cia, daughter of Chari'no, and the chaste troth-plight wife of Arnoldo. While Arnoldo is wantonly loved by the rich Hippol'yta, Zenocia is dishonourably pursued by the governor count Clo'dio.—Fletcher: The Custom of the Country (1647).

Zephalinda, a young lady who has tasted the delights of a London season, taken back to her home in the country, to find enjoyment in needlework, dull aunts, and rooks.

She went from opera, park, assembly, play,
To morning walks, and prayers three hours a day;
To part her time 'twixt reading and Bohea,
To muse, and spill her solitary tea,
O'er her cold coffee trifle with her spoon,
Count the slow clock, and dine exact at noon.
Pope: Epistle to Miss Blount (1715).

Zeph'on, a cherub who detected Satan squatting in the garden, and brought him before Gabriel the archangel. The word means "searcher of secrets." Milton makes him "the guardian angel of paradise.'

Ithuriel and Zephon, with winged speed
Search thro' this garden, leave unsearched no nook;
But chiefly where those two fair creatures lodge,
Now laid perhaps asleep, secure of harm.
Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 788 (1665).

Zephyr. (See MORGANE, p. 726.)

Zerbinette (3 syl.), the daughter of Argante (2 syl.), stolen from her parents by gipsies when four years old, and brought up by them. (For the tale, see LÉANDRE, p. 602.)—Molière: Les Fourberies de Scapin (1671).

Zerbi'no, son of the king of Scotland, and intimate friend of Orlando.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Zerli'na, a rustic beauty, who was about to be married to Masetto, when don Giovanni allured her away under the promise of making her a fine lady.—Mozart: Don Giovanni (opera, 1787).

Zerli'na, in Auber's opera of Fra Diavolo (1830).

Zesbet, daughter of the sage Oucha of Jerusalem. She had four husbands at the same time, viz. Abdal Motallab (the sage), Yaarab (the judge), Abou'teleb (a doctor of law), and Temimdari (a soldier). Zesbet was the mother of the prophet Mahomet. Mahomet appeared to her before his birth in the form of a venerable old man, and said to her—

"You have found favour before Allah. Look upon me; I am Mahomet, the great friend of God, he who is to enlighten the earth. Thy virtues, Zesbet, and thy beauty have made me prefer thee to all the daughters of Mecca. Thou shalt for the future be named Aminta [sic]". Then, turning to the husbands, he said, "You have seen me; she is yours, and you are hers. Labour, then, with a holy zeal to bring me into the world to enlighten it. All men who shall follow the law which I shall preach, may have four wives; but Zesbet shall be the only woman who shall be lawfully the wife of four husbands at once. It is the least privilege I can grant the woman of whom I choose to be born."—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("History of the Birth of Mahomet," 1743).

(The mother of Mahomet is generally called Amina, not Aminta.)

Zeus (1 syl.), the Grecian Jupiter. The word was once applied to the blue firmament, the upper sky, the arch of light; but in Homeric mythology, Zeus is king of gods and men; the conscious embodiment of the central authority and administrative intelligence which holds states together; the supreme ruler; the sovereign source of law and order; the fountain of justice, and final arbiter of disputes.

Zeuxis and Parrhasios. In a contest of skill, Zeuxis painted some grapes so naturally that birds pecked at them. Confident of success, Zeuxis said to his rival, "Now let Parrhasios draw aside his curtain, and show us his production." "You behold it already," replied Parrhasios, "and have mistaken it for real drapery." Whereupon the prize was awarded to him, for Zeuxis had deceived the birds, but Parrhasios had deceived Zeuxis.

¶ MYRO'S painting of a cow was mistaken by a herd of bulls for a living animal; and Apellês's painting of the horse Bucephalos deceived several mares, who ran about it neighing.

¶ QUINTIN MATSYS, of Antwerp, fell in love with Lisa, daughter of Johann Mandyn; but Mandyn vowed his daughter should marry only an artist. Matsys studied painting, and brought his first picture to show Lisa. Mandyn was not at home, but had left a picture of his favourite pupil Frans Floris, representing the "fallen angels," on an easel. Quintin painted a bee on the outstretched limb; and when Mandyn returned he tried to brush it off, whereupon the deception was discovered. The old man's heart was moved, and he gave Quintin his daughter in marriage, saying, "You are a true artist, greater than Johann Mandyn."

¶ VELASQUEZ painted a Spanish admiral so true to life that king Felipe IV., entering the studio, thought the painting was the admiral, and spoke to it as such, reproving the supposed officer for being in the studio wasting his time, when he ought to have been with the fleet.

Zillah, beloved by Hamuel a brutish sot. Zillah rejected his suit, and Hamuel vowed vengeance. Accordingly, he gave out that Zillah had intercourse with the devil, and she was condemned to be burnt alive. God averted the flames, which consumed Hamuel, but Zillah stood unharmed; and the stake to which she was bound threw forth white roses, "the first ever seen on earth since paradise was lost."—Southey. (See ROSE, p. 933, col. 2, last art.)

Zimmerman (Adam), the old burgher of Soleure; one of the Swiss deputies to Charles "the Bold" of Burgundy.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Zim'ri, one of the six Wise Men of the East led by the guiding star to Jesus.

Zimri taught the people, but they treated him with contempt; yet, when dying, he prevailed on one of them, and then expired.—Klopstock: The Messiah, v. (1771).

Zimri, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is the second duke of Buckingham. As Zimri conspired against Asa king of Judah, so the duke of Buckingham "formed parties and joined factions."—1 Kings xvi. 9.

Some of the chiefs were princes in the land:
In the first rank of these did Zimri stand,—
A man so various that he seemed to be
Not one, but all mankind's epitomé;
Stiff in opinion, always in the wrong,
Was everything by turns, and nothing long.
Pt. I. 545-550 (1682).

Zine'bi (Mohammed), king of Syria, tributary to the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid; of very humane disposition.—Arabian Nights ("Ganem, the Slave of Love").

Zineu'ra, in Boccaccio's Decameron (day 11, Nov. 9), is the "Imogen" of Shakespeare's Cymbeline. She assumed male attire with the name of Sicurano da Finalê (Imogen assumed male attire and the name Fidelê); Zineura's husband was Bernard Lomellin, and the villain was Ambrose (Imogen's husband was Posthûmus Leonâtus, and the villain Iachimo). In Shakespeare, the British king Cymbeline takes the place assigned by Boccaccio to the sultan.

Ziska or Zizka, John of Trocznov, a Bohemian nobleman, leader of the Hussites. He fought under Henry V. at Agincourt. His sister had been seduced by a monk; and whenever he heard the shriek of a catholic at the stake, he called it "his sister's bridal song." The story goes that he ordered his skin at death to be made into drum-heads (1360-1424).

 Some say that John of Trocznov was called "Ziska" because he was "one-eyed;" but that is a mistake—Ziska was a family name, and does not mean "one-eyed," either in the Polish or the Bohemian language.

For every page of paper shall a hide
Of yours be stretched as parchment on a drum,
Like Ziska's skin, to beat alarm to all
Refractory vassals.
Byron: Werner, I. (1822).

But be it as it is, the time may come
His name [Napoleon's] shall beat th' alarm like Ziska's drum.
Byron: Age of Bronze, IV (1823).

Zobeide [Zo-bay'-de], half-sister of Aminê. She had two sisters, who were turned into little black dogs by way of punishment for casting Zobeidê and "the prince" from the petrified city into the sea. Zobeidê was rescued by the "fairy serpent," who had metamorphosed the two sisters, and Zobeidê was enjoined to give the two dogs a hundred lashes every day. Ultimately, the two dogs were restored to their proper forms, and married two calenders, "sons of kings;" Zobeidê married the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid; and Aminê was restored to Amin, the caliph's son, to whom she was already married.—Arabian Nights ("History of Zobeidê").

N.B.—While the caliph was absent from Bagdad, Zobeidê caused his favourite (named Fetnab) to be buried alive, for which she was divorced. — Arabian Nights ("Ganem, the Slave of Love").

Zodiac. The twelve signs of the Zodiac are associated with the twelve Roman deities, thus—

Spring.
The Ram is wise Minerva's sign.
The Bull to Venus we assign.
The Twins to Phœbus the divine.

Summer.
Mercury the Crab delights.
For Jupiter the Lion fights.
Ceres the Virgin's care invites.

Autumn.
Vulcan the equal Balance brings.
For warlike Mars the Scorpion stings.
To dawn Sagittarius clings.

Winter.
The Goat to Vesta we allot.
Juno prefers the Water-pot.
And Neptune has his Fishes got.

B. C. B.

Zohak, the giant who keeps the "mouth of hell." He was the fifth of the Pischdadian dynasty, and was a lineal descendant of Shedâd king of Ad. He murdered his predecessor, and invented both flaying men alive and killing them by crucifixion. The devil kissed him on the shoulders, and immediately two serpents grew out of his back and fed constantly upon him. He was dethroned by the famous blacksmith of Ispahan', and appointed by the devil to keep hell-gate.—D'Derbelot: Bibliothèque Orientale (1697).

Zohara, the queen of love, and mother of mischief. When Harût and Marût were selected by the host of heaven to be judges on earth, they judged righteous judgment till Zohara, in the shape of a lovely woman, appeared before them with her complaint. They then both fell in love with her and tried to corrupt her, but she flew from them to heaven; and the two angel-judges were shut out.

¶ The Persian Magi have a somewhat similar tradition of these two angels, but add that after their "fall," they were suspended by the feet, head downwards, in the territory of Babel.

¶ The Jews tell us that Shamhozai, "the judge of all the earth," debauched himself with women, repented, and by way of penance was suspended by the feet, head downwards, between heaven and earth.—Bereshit Rabbi (in Gen. vi. 2).

Zohauk, the Nubian slave; a disguise assumed by sir Kenneth.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Zoilos (in Latin, Zoïlus), a grammarian, witty, shrewd, and spiteful. He was nicknamed "Homer's Scourge" (Homêromastix), because he assailed the Iliad and Odyssey with merciless severity. He also flew at Plato, Isoc'ratês, and other high game.

The Sword of Zoïlos, the pen of a critic.

Zoilus. J. Dennis the critic; whose attack on Pope produced The Dunciad (1657-1733).

Zoleikha (3 syl.), Potiphar's wife.—Sale: Al Korân, xii. (note).

Zone. Tennyson refers to the zone or girdle of Ori'on in the lines—

Like those three stars of the airy giant's zone,
That glitter burnished by the frosty dark.
Tennyson: The Princess, v. (1850).

Zophiel [Zo-fel], "of cherubim the swiftest wing." The word means "God's spy." Zophiel brings word to the heavenly host that the rebel crew were preparing a second and fiercer attack.

Zophiel, of cherubim the swiftest wing,
Came flying, and in mid-air aloud thus cried:
'Arm, warriors, arm for fight.'
Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 535 (1665).

Zoraï'da (3 syl.), a Moorish lady, daughter of Agimora'to the richest man in Barbary. On being baptized, she had received the name of Maria; and, eloping with a Christian captive, came to Andalusi'a.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. 9-11 ("The Captive," 1605).

Zorphee (2 syl.), a fairy in the romance of Amadis de Gaul (thirteenth century).

Zosimus, the patriarch of the Greek Church.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Zounds, a corrupt contraction of "his wounds," as sooks is "his hooks," and s'death "his death." Of course, by "his" Jesus Christ is meant. "Odd splutter" is a contraction of Gots plut und hur nail ("God's blood and the nails"). Sir John Perrot, a natural son of Henry VIII., was the first to use the oath of "God's wounds," which queen Elizabeth adopted, but the ladies of her court minced it into sounds and souterkins.

Zulal, that soft, clear, and delicious water which the happy drink in paradise.

"Ravishing beauty, universal mistress of hearts," replied I; "thou art the water of Zulal. I burn with the thirst of love, and must die if you reject me."—Comte de Caylus. Oriental Tales ("The Basket," 1743).

Zuleika [Zu-lai'-ka], daughter of Giaffer [Dja'-fir] pacha of Aby'dos. Falling in love with Selim, her cousin, she flees with him, and promises to be his bride; but the father tracks the fugitives and shoots Selim, whereupon Zuleika dies of a broken heart.—Byron: Bride of Abydos (1813).

Never was a faultless character more delicately or more justly delineated than that of lord Byron's "Zuleika." Her piety, her intelligence, her strict sense of duty, and her undeviating love of truth appear to have been originally blended in her mind, rather than inculcated by education. She is always natural, always attractive, always affectionate; and it must be admitted that her affections are not unworthily bestowed.—G. Ellis.

Zuleika (3 syl.), Joseph's wife. The Times, in its report of the prince of Wales at the mosque of Hebron, and referring to Joseph's tomb, says—

It is less costly than the others; and it is remarkable that, although his wife's name was Zuleika (according to Mussulman tradition), and is so inscribed in the certificates given to pilgrims, yet no grave bearing that name is shown.

Zulichium (The enchanted princess of), in the story told by Agelastes the cynic, to count Robert.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Zulzul, the sage whose life was saved in the form of a rat by Gedy the youngest of the four sons of Corcud. Zulzul gave him, in gratitude, two poniards, by the help of which he could climb the highest tree or most inaccessible castle.—Gueulette: Chinese Tales ("Corcud and His Four Sons," 1723).
