¶ The tale about the Gothamites trying to hedge in a cuckoo by joining hands in a circle is told of several places. We are told that the inhabitants of Towednack, in Cornwall, raised a hedge round a cuckoo, which escaped, just clearing the top of the enclosure, when one of the labourers exclaimed, "What a pity we did not raise it a little higher!" Similar tales are told of the people of Coggeshall, in Essex. In fact, nearly every county has its Gotham, whose inhabitants are credited with actions equally wise. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 541.)

Goths (The last of the), Roderick, the thirty-fourth of the Visigothic line of kings in Spain. He was the son of Cordova, who had his eyes put out by Vitiza the king of the Visigoths, whereupon Roderick rose against Vitiza and dethroned him; but the sons and adherents of Vitiza applied to the Moors, who sent over Tarik with 90,000 men, and Roderick was slain at the battle of Xerres, A.D. 711.

∴ Southey has an historic poem called Roderick, the Last of the Goths. He makes "Rusilla" to be the mother of Roderick.

Gothland or Gottland, an island called "The eye of the Baltic." Geoffrey of Monmouth says that when king Arthur had added Ireland to his dominions, he sailed to Iceland, which he subdued, and then both "Doldavius king of Gothland and Gunfasius king of the Orkneys voluntarily became his tributaries."—British History, ix. 10 (1142).

To Gothland how again this conqueror maketh forth... Where Iceland first he won, and Orkney after got.
Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

Gottlieb [Got'-leeb], a cottage farmer, with whom prince Henry of Hoheneck went to live after he was struck with leprosy. The cottager's daughter Elsie volunteered to sacrifice her life for the cure of the prince, and was ultimately married to him.—Hartmann von der Aue: Poor Henry (twelfth century). (See Longfellow's Golden Legend.)

Gourlay (Ailshie), a privileged fool or jester.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Gourlay (Ailsie), an old sibyl at the death of Alice Gray.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Gourmas (Don), a national portrait of the Spanish nobility.—Corneille: The Cid (1636).

The character of don Gormaz, for its very excellence, drew down the censure of the French Academy.—Sir W. Scott: The Drama.

Gow (Old Neill), the fiddler.

Nathaniel Gow, son of the fiddler.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Gow (Henry) or HENRY SMITH, also called "Gow Chrom" and "Hal of the Wynd," the armourer. Suitor of Catharine Glover "the fair maid of Perth," whom he marries.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Gower (The Moral), an epithet bestowed by Chaucer on John Gower, the poet (1320–1402).

Gowk Storm, a short storm, such as occurs in spring, when the gowk or cuckoo comes.

He trusted the present [disturbance] would prove but a gowk storm.—Sir W. Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, i. 49.

Gowk-thrapple (Maister), a covenanting preacher.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

A man of coarse, mechanical, perhaps rather intrinsically feeble intellect, with the vehemence of some pulpit-drumming Gowk-thrapple.—Carlyle.

Gowry, the owner of Nightmare Abbey, who thinks it most comme il faut to be melancholy.

Scythrop Gowry, his son, in love with two young ladies at the same time (Miss Marionetta O'Carroll and Miss Celinda Toobad). This is a skit on Percy Bysshe Shelley, who courted at the same time Mary Godwin and Harriett Westbrook, and told his father he intended to commit suicide. Shelley saw the allusion and took it in good part.—Peacock's novel of Nightmare Abbey (1818).

Graaf (Count), a great speculator in corn. One year a sad famine prevailed, and he expected, like Pharaoh king of Egypt, to make an enormous fortune by his speculation, but an army of rats, pressed by hunger, invaded his barns, and then, swarming into the castle, fell on the old baron, worried him to death, and devoured him. (See HATTO.)

Graal (Saint) or ST. GREAL is generally said to be the chalice used by Christ at the last supper, in which Joseph of Arimathēa caught the blood of the crucified Christ. In all descriptions of the graal in Arthurian romances, it is simply the visible "presence" of Christ, into which the elements are converted after consecration. When sir Galahad "achieved the quest of the holy graal," all that is meant is that he saw with his bodily eyes the visible Saviour into which the holy wafer had been transmuted.

Then the bishop took a wafer, which was made in the likeness of bread, and at the lifting up [the elevation of the host] there came a figure in the likeness of a child, and the visage was as red and as bright as fire, and he smote himself into that bread: so they saw that the bread was formed of a fleshly man, and then he put it into the holy vessel again . . . then [the bishop] took the holy vessel and came to sir Galahad as he kneeled down, and there he received his Saviour.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, pt. iii. 101, rev.

¶ King Pelles and sir Launcelot caught a sight of the St. Graal; but did not "achieve it," like Galahad.

When they went into the castle to take their repast . . . there came a dove to the window, and in its bill was a little censer of gold, and there withall was such a savor as if all the spicery of the world had been there . . . and a damsel, passing fair, bare a vessel of gold between her hands, and thereto the king kneeled devoutly and said his prayers. . . . "Oh mercy!" said sir Launcelot, "what may this mean?" . . . "This," said the king, "is the holy Sancgreall which ye have seen."—Pt. iii. 2

¶ When sir Bors de Ganis went to Corbin, and saw Galahad the son of sir Launcelot, he prayed that the boy might prove as good a knight as his father, and instantly the white dove came with the golden censer, and the damsel bearing the sancgraal, and told sir Bors that Galahad would prove a better knight than his father, and would "achieve the Sancgreall;" then both dove and damsel vanished.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, pt. iii. 4.

¶ Sir Percival, the son of sir Pellinore king of Wales, after his combat with sir Ector de Maris (brother of sir Launcelot), caught sight of the holy graal, and both sir Percival and sir Ector were cured of their wounds thereby. Like sir Bors, he (sir Percival) was with sir Galahad when the quest was achieved (pt. iii. 14). Sir Launcelot was also miraculously cured in the same way.—Sir T. Malory, pt. iii. 18.

¶ King Arthur, the queen, and all the 150 knights saw the holy graal as they sat at supper when Galahad was received into the fellowship of the Round Table—

First they heard a crackling and crying of thunder . . and in the midst of the hall entered a sun-beam more clear by seven times than ever they saw day, and all were lighted of the grace of the Holy Ghost . . . then there entered the hall the holy graal [covered with brand), covered with white samite; but none might see it, nor who bare it . . . and when the holy greal had been borne thro' the hall, the vessel suddenly departed. —Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 35 (1490).

(The chief romances of the St. Graal are: The Holy Graal, in verse (1100), by the old German minnesingers. Titurel or the Guardian of the Holy Graal, by Wolfram a minnesinger. The Romance of Parsival, by Wolfram, translated into French by Chrêtien de Troyes, in verse (1170); it contains 4018 eight-syllable lines. Roman des diverses Quêtes des St. Graal, by Walter Mapes, in prose; this is a continuation of the Roman de Tristan.  We find, in the churchwardens' account of Wing (Bucks.), 1527, "Three Graylls," i.e. three gradales, called by the Roman Catholics cantatoria. In the Athenæum (June 25, 1870) we read, "The Saxons called a graal a 'graduale' ad te levavi, from the first three words of the (introït First Sunday in Advent), with which the codex begins."

Graal-burg, a magnificent temple, surrounded with towers raised on brazen pillars, and containing the holy graal. It was founded by king Titurel, on mount Salvage, in Spain, and was a marvel of magnificence, glittering with gold and precious stones.—Wolfram of Eschenbach (minnesinger): Parsival (thirteenth century).

Grace (Lady), sister of lady Townly, and the engaged wife of Mr. Manly. The very opposite of a lady of fashion. She says—

"In summer I could pass my leisure hours in reading, walking, . . . or sitting under a green tree; in dressing, dining, chatting with an agreeable friend; perhaps hearing a little music, taking a dish of tea, or a game at cards, managing my family, looking into its accounts, playing with my children . . . or in a thousand other innocent amusements."—Vanbrugh and Cibber: The Provoked Husband, iii. (1728).

"No person," says George Colman, "has ever more successfully performed the elegant levities of 'lady Townley' upon the stage, or more happily practised the amiable virtues of 'lady Grace' in the circles of society, than Miss Farren (the countess of Derby, 1759–1829)."

Grace-be-here Humgudgeon, a corporal in Cromwell's troop.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Grace de Dieu. (See HARRY, the Great.)

Grace'church, London, means the græs or grass church. It was built on the site of the old grass-market.

Graceless Florins. (See GODLESS FLORINS, p. 432.)

Gracio'sa, a lovely princess, who is the object of a step-mother's most implacable hatred. The step-mother's name is Grognon, and the tale shows how all her malicious plots are thwarted by Percinet, a fairy prince, in love with Graciosa.—Percinet and Graciosa (a fairy tale).

Gracio'so, the licensed fool of Spanish drama. He has his coxcomb and truncheon, and mingles with the actors without aiding or abetting the plot. Sometimes he transfers his gibes from the actors to the audience, like our circus clowns.

Gradas'so, king of Serica'na, "bravest of the pagan knights." He went against Charlemagne, with 100,000 vassals in his train, "all discrowned kings," who never addressed him but on their knees.—Bojardo: Orlando Innamorato (1495); Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Grad'grind (Thomas), a man of facts and realities. Everything about him is square; his forehead is square, and so is his fore-finger, with which he emphasizes all he says. Formerly he was in the wholesale hardware line. In his greatness he becomes M.P. for Coketown, and he lives at Stone Lodge, a mile or so from town. He prides himself on being eminently practical; and, though not a bad man at heart, he blights his children by his hard, practical way of bringing them up.

Mrs. Gradgrind, wife of Thomas Gradgrind. A little thin woman, always taking physic, without receiving from it any benefit. She looks like an indifferently executed transparency without light enough behind the figure. She is always complaining, always peevish, and dies soon after the marriage of her daughter Louisa.

Tom Gradgrind, son of the above, a sullen young man, much loved by his sister, and holding an office in the bank of his brother-in-law, Josiah Bounderby. Tom robs the bank, and throws suspicion on Stephen Blackpool, one of the hands in Bounderby's factory. When found out, Tom takes refuge in the circus of the town, disguised as a black servant, till he effects his escape from England.

clēa painted grapes so admirably that birds flew to them and tried to eat them. (See HORSE PAINTED.)

Therefore the bee did suck the painted flower,
And birds of grapes the cunning semblance pecked.
Sir J. Davies: Immortality of the Soul, ii. (1622).

Grass (Cronos), a grass which gives those who taste it an irresistible desire for the sea. (See under GLAUCUS.)

Grass (To give), to acknowledge yourself vanquished. A Latin phrase, Herbam dare aut porrigĕre.—Pliny: Nat. Hist., xxii. 4.

Grasshopper (A). What animal is that which avoids every one, is a compound of seven animals, and lives in desolate places?

Damaké answered, "It is a grasshopper, which has the head of a horse, the neck of an ox, the wings of a dragon, the feet of a camel, the tail of a serpent, the horns of a stag, and the body of a scorpion."—Count Caylus: Oriental Tales ("The Four Talismans," 1743).

Grasshopper. (See GRESHAM, p. 449.)

Grass-market (Edinburgh), at one time the place of public executions.

Mitchel, being asked why he had made so wicked an attempt on the person of the archbishop [Sharpe], replied that he did it "for the glory of God." . . . The duke said then, "Let Mitchel glorify God in the Grass-market."—Higgins: Remarks on Burnet, ii. 231.

Gra'tian (Father), the begging friar at John Mengs's inn at Kirchhoff.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Gratia'no, one of Anthonio's friends. He "talked an infinite deal of nothing, more than any man in all Venice." Gratiano married Nerissa, the waiting-gentlewoman of Portia.—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice (1598).

Gratia'no, brother of Brabantio, and uncle of Desdemona. — Shakespeare: Othello (1611).

Graunde Amoure (Sir), walking in a meadow, was told by Fame of a beautiful lady named La belle Pucell, who resided in the Tower of Musyke. He was then conducted by Gouvernance and Grace to the Tower of Doctrine, where he received instruction from the seven Sciences:—Gramer, Logyke, Retborike, Arismetricke, Musyke, Geometry, and Astronomy. In the Tower of Musyke he met La belle Pucell, with whom he fell in love, but they parted for a time. Graunde Amoure went to the Tower of Chivalry to perfect himself in the arts of knighthood, and there he received his degree from king Melyz'yus. He then started on his adventures, and soon encountered False Report, who joined him and told him many a lying tale; but lady Correction, coming up, had False Report soundly beaten, and the knight was entertained at her castle. Next day he left, and came to a wall where hung a shield and horn. On blowing the horn, a three-headed monster came forth, with whom he fought, and cut off the three heads, called Falsehood, Imagination, and Perjury. He passed the night in the house of lady Comfort, who attended to his wounds; and next day he slew a giant fifteen feet high and with seven heads. Lastly, he slew the monster Malyce, made by enchantment of seven metals. His achievements over, he married La belle Pucell, and lived happily till he was arrested by Age, having for companions Policye and Avarice. Death came at last to carry him off, and Remembrance wrote his epitaph. — S. Hawes: The Passe-tyme of Plesure (1515).

Graunde Amoure's Steed, Galantyse, the gift of king Melyz'yus when he conferred on him the degree of knighthood.

I myselfe shall give you a worthy stede,
Called Galantyse, to helpe you in your nede.

Grave (The), a poem in blank verse by Blair (1743). It runs to 767 lines.

The grave, dread thing,
Men shiver when thou'rt named. Nature, appalled,
Shakes off her wonted firmness.

 Mrs. Clive, in 1872, published nine poems, one of which was entitled The Grave.

Grave'airs (Lady), a lady of very dubious virtue, in The Careless Husband, by Colley Cibber (1704).

Mrs. Hamilton (1730–1788), upon her entrance, was saluted with a storm of hisses, and advancing to the footlights said, "Gemmen and ladies, I s'pose as how you hiss me because I wouldn't play 'lady Graveairs' last night at Mrs. Bellamy's benefit. I would have done so, but she said as how my audience stunk, and were all tripe people." The pit roared with laughter, and the whole house shouted, "Well said, Mrs. Tripe!" a title which the fair speechifier retained ever after.—Memoir of Mrs. Hamilton (1803).

GRAY, the hero of J. Fenimore Cooper's novel called The Pilot (1823).

Gray (Old Alice), a former tenant of the Ravenswood family.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Gray (Dr. Gideon), the surgeon at Middlemas.

Mrs. Gray, the surgeon's wife.

Menie Gray, the "surgeon's daughter," taken to India and given to Tippoo Saib as an addition to his harem; but, being rescued by Hyder Ali, she was restored to Hartley, and returned to her country.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Gray (Duncan) wooed a young lass called Maggie, but she "coost her head fu' high, looked asklent" (away), and bade him behave himself. "Duncan fleeched, and Duncan prayed," but Meg was deaf to his pleadings; so Duncan took himself off in dudgeon. This was more than Maggie meant, so she fell sick and like to die. As Duncan "could na be her death," he came forward manfully again, and then "they were crouse [merry] and canty bath. Ha, ha! the wooing o't!"—Burns: Duncan Gray (1792).

Gray (Mary), daughter of a country gentleman of Perth. When the plague broke out in 1666, Mary Gray and her friend Bessy Bell retired to an unfrequented spot called Burn Braes, where they lived in a secluded cottage, and saw no one. A young gentleman brought them food, but he caught the plague, communicated it to the two ladies, and all three died.—Allan Ramsay: Bessy Bell and Mary Gray.

Gray (Auld Robin). Jennie, a Scotch lass, was loved by young Jamie; "but saving a crown, he had naething else besides." To make that crown a pound, young Jamie went to sea, and both were to be for Jennie. He had not been gone many days when Jennie's mother fell sick, her father broke his arm, and their cow was stolen; then auld Robin came forward and maintained them both. Auld Robin loved the lass, and "wi' tears in his ee," said, "Jennie, for their sakes, oh, marry me!" Jennie's heart said "nay," for she looked for Jamie back; but her father urged her, and the mother pleaded with her eye, and so she consented. They had not been married above a month when Jamie returned. They met; she gave him one kiss, and, though she "gang like a ghaist," she made up her mind, like a brave, good lassie, to be a gude wife, for auld Robin was very kind to her (1772).

 This ballad was composed by lady Anne Lindsay, daughter of the earl of Balcarres (afterwards lady Barnard). It was written to an old Scotch tune called The Bridegroom Grat when the Sun went Down. Auld Robin Gray was her father's herdsman. When lady Anne was writing the ballad, and was piling distress on Jennie, she told her sister that she had sent Jamie to sea, made the mother sick, and broken the father's arm, but wanted a fourth calamity. "Steal the cow, sister Anne," said the little Elizabeth; and so "the cow was stolen awa';" and the song completed.

Gray's Monument, in Westminster Abbey, was by Bacon.

Graysteel, the sword of Kol, fatal to its owner. It passed into several hands, and always brought ill-luck with it.—Icelandic Edda.

Great Captain (The), Gonsalvo de Cor'dova, el Gran Capitan (1453-1515).

Manuel I. [Comnēnus] emperor of Trebizond, is so called also (1120, 1143-1180).

Great Cham of Literature, Dr. Samuel Johnson (1709-1784).

Great Commoner (The), William Pitt (1759-1806).

Great Dauphin (The), Louis the son of Louis XIV. (1661-1711).

(The "Little Dauphin" was the duke of Bourgogne, son of the Great or Grand Dauphin. Both died before Louis XIV.)

Great Duke (The), the duke of Wellington (1769-1852).

> Bury the Great Duke
> With an empire's lamentation;
> Let us bury the Great Duke
> To the noise of the mourning of a great nation.
> Tennyson.

Great Expectations, the autobiography of "Pip," a novel in three series, by Dickens (1860). Pip was the nephew of Joe Gargery, a village blacksmith, by whom he was brought up. When only seven years old he was encountered in the village churchyard by Magwitch, a runaway convict, who frightened the child into bringing him a file (to file off one of his fetters) and some food to eat. These Pip purloined from home, and carried to the convict very early next morning. Miss Havisham, the daughter of a very rich brewer, living in Satis House, being in want of a little boy to play with Estella, a child she had adopted, was persuaded to take Pip for the purpose. The boy lived at home, but went backwards and forwards to play with Estella. After a time, Miss Havisham bound Pip apprentice to his uncle Gargery; but when about half his time had expired, Mr. Jaggers, an Old Bailey lawyer, informed him that a person (whose name he was forbidden to reveal) had provided money for his education, and that he was to be brought up as a gentleman of "great expectations." His indentures were accordingly cancelled, and he was sent as a private pupil to Mr. Matthew Pocket (of Harrow and Cambridge). Pip supposed that his "unknowed patron" was Miss Havisham, but it was Magwitch the convict, who had gone to New South Wales, where he had acquired great wealth as a sheep-farmer. When Pip was twenty-three years old, Magwitch clandestinely returned to England to see Pip, and give him a large fortune; but he was arrested as a returned convict, condemned to death, and all his property confiscated. He died at Newgate, and Pip was left penniless. He now entered the service of Cleriker and Co. as a clerk, and in eleven years he was taken into the firm as a junior partner. His love affair was a similar "great expectation." He fell in love with Estella, the adopted daughter of the rich Miss Havisham, but in reality the child of Magwitch. But Estella married Bentley Drummle, who ill-treated her, spent all her money, and left her a penniless widow. She and Pip met again after this, apparently on most friendly terms, but the novel breaks off here, and leaves the sequel to the reader's imagination. (See JOE GARGERY.)

Great Harry (The). (See HARRY.)

Great-Head or CANMORE, Malcolm III. of Scotland (*, 1057-1093).

Great-heart (Mr.), the guide of Christiana and her family to the Celestial City.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progess, ii. (1684).

Great Magician (The) or The Great Magician of the North, sir Walter Scott. So called first by professor John Wilson (1771-1832).

Great Marquis (The), James Graham, marquis of Montrose (1612-1650).

> I've told thee how we swept Dundee,
> And tamed the Lindsays' pride;
> But never have I told thee yet
> How the Great Marquis died.

The Great Marquis, dom Sebastiano Jose de Carvalho, marquis de Pombal, greatest of all the Portuguese statesmen (1699-1782).

Great Moralist (The), Dr. Samuel Johnson (1709-1784).

Great Sea (The). The Mediterranean Sea was so called by the ancients.

Great Unknown (The), sir Walter Scott, who published his Waverley Novels anonymously (1771-1832).

Great Unwashed (The). The artisan class were first so called by Burke, but sir W. Scott popularized the phrase.

Greaves (Sir Launcelot), a well-bred young English squire of the George II. period; handsome, virtuous, and enlightened, but crack-brained. He sets out, attended by an old sea-captain, to detect fraud and treason, abase insolence, mortify pride, discourage slander, disgrace immodesty, and punish ingratitude. Sir Launcelot, in fact, is a modern don Quixote, and captain Crow is his Sancho Panza.—Smollett: The Adventures of Sir Launcelot Greaves (1760).

Smollett became editor of the Critical Review, and an attack in that journal on admiral Knowles led to a trial for libel. The author was sentenced to pay a fine of £100, and suffer three months' imprisonment. He consoled himself in prison by writing his novel of Launcelot Greaves.—Chambers: English Literature, ii. 65.

Grecian Daughter (The), Euphrasia, daughter of Evander a Greek, who dethroned Dionysius the Elder, and became king of Syracuse. In his old age he was himself dethroned by Dionysius the Younger, and confined in a dungeon in a rock, where he was saved from starvation by his daughter, who fed him with "the milk designed for her own babe." Timoleon having made himself master of Syracuse, Dionysius accidentally encountered Evander his prisoner, and was about to kill him, when Euphrasia rushed forwards and stabbed the tyrant to the heart.—Murphy: The Grecian Daughter (1772).

N.B.—As an historical drama this plot is much the same as if the writer had said that James I. (of England) abdicated and retired to St. Germain, and when his son James II. succeeded to the crown, he was beheaded at White Hall; for Murphy makes Dionysius the Elder to have been dethroned, and going to Corinth to live (act I.), and Dionysius the Younger to have been slain by the dagger of Euphrasia; whereas Dionysius the Elder never was dethroned, but died in Syracuse at the age of 63; and Dionysius the Younger was not slain in Syracuse, but, being dethroned, went to Corinth, where he lived and died in exile. (See ROMAN DAUGHTER.)

∴ The same story is told of Xantippê (a xyl.) daughter of Cimonos.

This, of course, is not Xantippe the wife of Socratês (See Childe Harold, v. 148; and Little Dorrit, xix.)

Greece (The two eyes of), Athens and Sparta.

Greedy (Justice), thin as a thread-paper, always eating and always hungry. He says to sir Giles Overreach (act iii. 1), "Oh, I do much honour a chine of beef! Oh, I do reverence a loin of veal!" As a justice, he is most venial—the promise of a turkey will buy him, but the promise of a haunch of venison will out-buy him. —Massinger: A New Way to Pay Old Debts (1628).

Greek (A), a pander; a merry Greek, a foolish Greek, a Corinthian, etc., all mean either pander or harlot. Frequently used by Shakespeare in Timon of Athens (1678) and in Henry IV. (1597-9).

Greek Church (Fathers of the) Eusebius, Athana'sius, Basil "the Great," Gregory Nazianze'nus, Gregory of Nyssa, Cyril of Jerusalem, Chrys'ostom, Epipha'nius, Cyril of Alexandria, and Ephraim deacon of Edessa.

Greek Kalends, never. There were no kalends in the Greek system of reckoning the months. Hence Suetonius says it shall be transferred ad Græcas calendas, or, in parliamentary phrase, "to this day six months."

> They and their bills . . . are left
> To the Greek Kalends.
> Byron: Don Juan, xiii. 45 (1824).

Greeks (Last of the), Philopœ'men of Megalop'olis, whose great object was to infuse into the Achæans a military spirit, and establish their independence (B.C. 252-183).

When Greeks joined Greeks. Clytus said to Alexander that Philip was the greater warrior—

> I have seen him march,
> And fought beneath his dreadful banner, where
> The boldest at this table would have trembled.
> Nay, frown not, sir, you cannot look me dead;
> When Greeks joined Greeks, then was the tug of war.
> Lee: Alexander the Great, iv. 2 (1678).

(Slightly altered into When Greek joins Greek, then is the tug of war, this line has become a household phrase.)

To play the Greek, to act like a harlot. When Cressid says of Helen, "Then she's a merry Greek indeed," she means that Helen is no better than a fille publique. Probably Shakespeare had his eye upon "fair Hiren," in Peel's play called The Turkish Mahomet and Hyren the Fair Greek. "A fair Greek" was at one time a euphemism for a courtezan.

Green (Mr. Paddington), a clerk at Somerset House.

Mrs. Paddington Green, his wife.—Morton: If I had a Thousand a Year.

Green (Verdant), a young man of infinite simplicity, who goes to college, and is played upon by all the practical jokers of alma mater. After he has bought his knowledge by experience, the butt becomes the "butter" of juveniles greener than himself. Verdant Green wore spectacles, which won for him the nickname of "Gig-lamps."—Cuthbert Bede [Rev. Edw. Bradley]: Verdant Green (1860).

Green (Widow), a rich, buxom dame of 40, who married first for money, and intended to choose her second husband "to please her vanity." She fancied Waller loved her, and meant to make her his wife, but sir William Fondlove was her adorer. When the politic widow discovered that Waller had fixed his love on another, she gave her hand to the old beau, sir William; for if the news got wind of her love for Waller, she would become the laughing-stock of all her friends. —Knowles: The Love-Chase (1837).

Green-Bag Inquiry (The). A green bag full of documents, said to be seditious, was laid before parliament by lord Sidmouth, in 1817. An "inquiry" was made into these documents, and it was deemed advisable to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, and forbid all sorts of political meetings likely to be of a seditious character.

Green Bird. Martyrs, after death, partake of the delights of bliss in the crops of green birds, which feed on the fruits of paradise.—Jalallo'ddin.

Green Bird (The), a bird that told one everything it was asked. An oracular bird, obtained by Fairstar after the failure of Chery and her two brothers. It was this bird who revealed to the king that Fairstar was his daughter and Chery his nephew.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Fairstar and Prince Chery," 1682).

Green Flag Army (The), a Chinese militia, scattered through various provinces, and containing a million men. (See Nineteenth Century, March, 1894, p. 389.)

Green Horse (The), the 5th Dragoon Guards (not the 5th Dragoons). So called from their green velvet facings.

Green Howards (The), the 19th Foot. So called from the Hon. Charles Howard, their colonel from 1738 to 1748.

Green Isle (The) or THE EMERALD ISLE, Ireland.

A pugnacity characteristic of the Green Isle.—Sir W. Scott.

Green Knight (The), sir Pertolope (3 syl.), called by Tennyson "Evening Star" or "Hesperus." He was one of the four brothers who kept the passages of Castle Perilous, and was overthrown by sir Gareth.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 127 (1470); Tennyson: Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette").

N.B.—It is evidently a blunder of Tennyson to call the Green Knight "Evening Star," and the Blue Knight "Morning Star." In the old romance the combat with the "Green Knight" was at dawn, and with the "Blue Knight" at sunset. (See Notes and Queries, February 16, 1878.)

Green Knight (The), a pagan knight, who demanded Fezon in marriage, but, being overcome by Orson, was obliged to resign his claim.—Valentine and Orson (fifteenth century).

Green Lettuce Lane [St. Lawrence, Poultney], a corruption of "Green Lattice;" so called from the green lattice gate which used to open into Cannon Street.

Green Linnets, the 39th Foot, now the Dorsetshire Regiment. In point of fact, the line battalions have white facings and scarlet uniforms; the volunteer battalion has a green uniform with scarlet facings; and the Cadet Corps (Sherborne School) has the same uniform and facings as the line battalions, scarlet and white.

Green Man (The). The man who used to let off fireworks was so called in the reign of James I.

Have you any squibs, any green man in your shows?—John Kirke [R. Johnson]: The Seven Champions of Christendom (1617).

Green Man (The), a gentleman's gamekeeper, at one time clad in green.

But the green man shall I pass by unsung? . . .
A squire's attendant clad in keeper's green.
Crabbe: Borough (1810).

Greenhalgh, messenger of the earl of Derby.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Greenhorn (Mr. Gilbert), an attorney, in partnership with Mr. Gabriel Grinderson.

Mr. Gervase Greenhorn, father of Mr. Gilbert.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Greenland, a poem in heroic verse, in rhymes, by James Montgomery (1819). It contains four cantos.

Greenleaf (Gilbert), the old archer at Douglas Castle.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Gregory, a faggot-maker of good education, first at a charity school, then as waiter on an Oxford student, and then as the fag of a travelling physician. When compelled to act the doctor, he says the disease of his patient arises from "propria quæ maribus tribuuntur mascula dicas, ut sunt divorum, Mars, Bacchus, Apollo, virorum." And when sir Jasper says, "I always thought till now that the heart is on the left side, and the liver on the right," he replies, "Ay, sir, so they were formerly, but we have changed all that." In Molière's comedy, Le Médecin Malgré Lui, Gregory is called "Sganarelle," and all these jokes are in act ii. sc. 6.—Fielding: The Mock Doctor.

Gregory, father and son, hangmen in the seventeenth century. In the time of the Gregorys, hangmen were termed "esquires." In France, executioners were termed "monsieur," even to the breaking out of the Revolution.

Gregory's Day (St.), March 12.

Sow runcivals timely, and all that is gray;
But sow not the white [peas, etc.] till St. Gregory's Day.
Tusser: Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, xxxv. 3 (1557).

Gregson (Widow), Darsie Latimer's landlady at Shepherd's Bush.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Gregson (Gilbert), the messenger of father Buonaventura.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Gre'mio, an old man who wishes to marry Bianca, but the lady prefers Lucentio, a young man.—Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew (1594).

Grendel, the monster from which Beowulf delivered Hrothgar king of Denmark. It was half monster, half man, whose haunt was the marshes among "a monster race." Night after night it crept stealthily into the palace called Heorot, and slew sometimes as many as thirty of the inmates. At length Beowulf, at the head of a mixed band of warriors, went against it and slew it.—Beowulf, an Anglo-Saxon epic (sixth century).

Grenville (Sir Richard), the commander of the Revenge, in the reign of queen Elizabeth. Out of his crew, ninety were sick on shore, and only a hundred able-bodied men remained on board. The Revenge was one of the six ships under the command of lord Thomas Howard. While cruising near the Azores, a Spanish fleet of fifty-three ships made towards the English, and lord Howard sheered off, saying, "My ships are out of gear, and how can six ships-of-the-line fight with fifty-three?" Sir Richard Grenville, however, resolved to stay and encounter the foe, and "ship after ship the whole night long drew back with her dead; some were sunk, more were shattered;" and the brave hundred still fought on. Sir Richard was wounded and his ship riddled, but his cry was still "Fight on!" When resistance was no longer possible, he cried, "Sink the ship, master gunner! sink her! Split her in twain, nor let her fall into the hands of the foe!" But the Spaniards boarded her, and praised sir Richard for his heroic daring. "I have done my duty for my queen and faith," he said, and died. The Spaniards sent the prize home, but a tempest came on, and the Revenge, shot-shattered, "went down, to be lost evermore in the main." — Tennyson: The Revenge, a ballad of the fleet (1878).

(Froude has an essay on the subject. Canon Kingsley, in Westward Ho! has drawn sir Richard Grenville, and alludes to the fight. Lord Bacon says the fight "was memorable even beyond credit [credibility], and to the height of heroic fable." Arber published three small volumes on sir Richard's noble exploit. Gervase Markham has a long poem on the subject. Sir Walter Raleigh says, "If lord Howard had stood to his guns, the Spanish fleet would have been annihilated." Browning's Hervé Riel (q.v.) forms a splendid contrast to Tennyson's poem The Revenge.)

Gresham and the Pearl. When queen Elizabeth visited the Exchange, sir Thomas Gresham pledged her health in a cup of wine containing a precious stone crushed to atoms, and worth £15,000.

> Here £15,000 at one clap goes
> Instead of sugar: Gresham drinks the pearl
> Unto his queen and mistress. Pledge it, lords.
> Heywood: If You Know not Me, You Know Nobody.

 It is devoutly to be hoped that sir Thomas was above such absurd vanity, very well for queen Cleopatra, but more than ridiculous in such an imitation.

Gresham and the Grasshopper. There is a vulgar tradition that sir Thomas Gresham was a foundling, and that the old beldame who brought him up was attracted to the spot where she found him, by the loud chirping of a grasshopper.

(This tale arose from the grasshopper, which forms the crest of sir Thomas.)

To sup with sir Thomas Gresham, to have no supper. Similarly, "to dine with duke Humphrey" is to have nowhere to dine. The Royal Exchange was at one time a common lounging-place for idlers. (See DINE, p. 281.)

> Tho' little coin thy purseless pockets line,
> Yet with great company thou'rt taken up;
> For often with duke Humphrey thou dost dine,
> And often with sir Thomas Gresham sup.
> Hayman: Quodlibet (Epigram on a Loafer, 1628).

Gretchen, a German diminutive of Margaret; the heroine of Goethe's Faust. Faust meets her on her return from church, falls in love with her, and at last seduces her. Overcome with shame, Gretchen destroys the infant to which she gives birth, and is condemned to death. Faust attempts to save her; and, gaining admission to the dungeon, finds her huddled on a bed of straw, singing wild snatches of ballads, quite insane. He tries to induce her to flee with him, but in vain. At daybreak Faust is taken away, and Gretchen, who dies, joins the heavenly choir of penitents.

 Gretchen is a perfect union of homeliness and simplicity; though her love is strong as death, yet she is a human woman throughout, and never a mere abstraction. No character ever drawn takes so strong a hold on the heart, and, with all her faults, who does not love and pity her?

Greth'el (Gammer), the hypothetical narrator of the tales edited by the brothers Grimm.

(Said to be Frau Viehmänin, wife of a peasant in the suburbs of Hessê Cassel, from whose mouth the brothers transcribed the tales.)

Gretna Green Marriages. Gretna Green is in Dumfriesshire, on the border of England and Scotland. According to Scotch law, any man and woman taking each other for husband and wife before witnesses are legally married, and ordination is not needful in the celebrant, but as a rule one individual assumed the monopoly, married the couples in his own house, using a form of service, and keeping a register of the names

The first known officiating person was named Scott, in the middle of the eighteenth century; and Harry Smith, a Berwick billiard-maker, still officiates, succeeding William Laing (1897), in whose family the "priesthood" had long been. The average number of marriages used to be above seven hundred a year, but since lord Brougham's Act of 1856, which requires the residence of one of the parties for twenty-one days, Gretna Green marriages have well-nigh died out. Robert Elliott between, 1811 and 1855, celebrated 3782 marriages at Gretna Green.

Grey (Lady Jane), a tragedy by N. Rowe (1715). Another by Ross Neil; and one by Tennyson (1876).

(In French, Laplace (1745), Mde. de Staël (1800), Ch. Brifaut (1812), and Alexandre Soumet (1844), produced tragedies on the same subject. Paul Delaroche has a fine picture called "Le Supplice de Jane Grey," 1835.)

Grey (Vivian), a novel by Disraeli (lord Beaconsfield), said to be meant for the author himself, and Mr. Grey for the author's father (1826–7). This was the author's first novel.

Gribouille, the wiseacre who threw himself into a river that his clothes might not get wetted by the rain.—A French Proverbial Saying.

Gride (Arthur), a mean old usurer, who wished to marry Madeline Bray; but Madeline loved Nicholas Nickleby, and married him. Gride was murdered. —Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Grieux (Le chevalier des), the hero of a French novel by the abbé Prévost, called Manon Lescaut, translated into English by Charlotte Smith. A discreditable connection existed between des Grieux and Manon, and they lived together a disreputable life. After many vicissitudes, Manon was transported to New Orleans, and des Grieux accompanied her in the transport. She fled the colony to escape the governor's son, who made love to her and died of privation in the wilderness. The chevalier returned to France (1697–1763).

Grieve (Jockie), landlord of an alehouse near Charlie's Hope.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Griffin (Allan), landlord of the Griffin inn, at Perth.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Griffin-feet, the mark by which the Desert Fairy was known in all her metamorphoses.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The Yellow Dwarf," 1682).

Griffiths (Old), steward of the earl of Derby.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Griffiths (Samuel), London agent of sir Arthur Darsie Redgauntlet.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Griflet (Sir), knighted by king Arthur at the request of Merlin, who told the king that sir Griflet would prove "one of the best knights of the world, and the strongest man of arms."—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 20 (1470).

Grildrig, a mannikin.

She gave me the name "Grildrig," which the family took up, and afterwards the whole kingdom. The word imports what the Latin calls nanunculus, the Italian homuncletion, and the English mannikin.—Dean Swift: Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Brobdingnag," 1726).

Grim. (See HAVELOCK.)

Grim (Giant), a huge giant, who tried to stop pilgrims on their way to the Celestial City. He was slain by Mr. Greatheart.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, ii. (1684)

Grimalkin, a cat, the spirit of a witch. Any witch was permitted to assume the body of a cat nine times. When the "first Witch" (in Macbeth) hears a cat mew, she says, "I come, Grimalkin" (act i. sc. 1).—Shakespeare.

Grimbard, the brock, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox, by Heinrich von Alkmann (1498).

Grime, the partner of Item the usurer. It is to Grime that Item appeals when he wants to fudge his clients. The question, "Can we do so, Mr. Grime?" always brings the stock answer, "Quite impossible, Mr. Item."—Holcroft: The Deserted Daughter (1784), altered into The Steward.

Grimes (Peter), the drunken, thievish son of a steady fisherman. He had a boy, whom he killed by ill usage, and two others he made away with; but escaped conviction through defect of evidence. As no one would live with him, he turned mad, was lodged in the parish poor-house, confessed his crimes in delirium, and died.—Crabbe: Borough, xxii. (1810).

Grimesby (Gaffer), an old farmer at Marlborough.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time Elizabeth).

Grimwig, an irascible old gentleman, who hid a very kind heart under a rough exterior. He was Mr. Brownlow's great friend, and was always declaring himself ready to "eat his head" if he was mistaken on any point on which he passed an opinion.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Grinderson (Mr. Gabriel), partner of Mr. Greenborn. They are the attorneys who press sir Arthur Wardour for the payment of debts.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Grip, the clever raven of Barnaby Rudge. During the Gordon riots it learnt the cry of "No Popery!" Other of its phrases were: "I'm a devil!" "Never say die!" "Polly, put the kettle on!" etc.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Gripe (1 syl.), a scrivener, husband of Clarissa, but with a tendre for Araminta the wife of his friend Moneytrap. He is a miserly, money-loving, pig-headed hunks, but is duped out of £250 by his foolish liking for his neighbour's wife. — Vanbrugh: The Confederacy (1695).

Gripe (1 syl.), the English name of Géronte, in Otway's version of Molière's comedy of Les Fourberies de Scapin (1671). His daughter, called in French Hyacinthe, is called "Clara," and his son Leandre is Anglicized into "Leander."—Otway: The Cheats of Scapin.

Gripe (Sir Francis), a man of 64, guardian of Miranda an heiress, and father of Charles. He wants to marry his ward for the sake of her money, and as she cannot obtain her property without his consent to her marriage, she pretends to be in love with him, and even fixes the day of espousals. "Gardy," quite secure that he is the man of her choice, gives his consent to her marriage, and she marries sir George Airy, a man of 24. The old man laughs at sir George, whom he fancies he is duping, but he is himself the dupe all through.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Busy Body (1709).

December 2, 1790. Mundon made his bow to the Covent Garden audience as "sir Francis Gripe."—Memoirs of J. S. Mundon (1892).

Gripus, a stupid, venal judge, uncle of Alcmena, and the betrothed of Phædra (Alcmena's waiting-maid), in Dryden's comedy of Amphitryon (1690). Neither Gripus nor Phædra is among the dramatis personæ of Molière's comedy of Amphitryon (1668).

Grisilda or Griselda, the model of patience and submission, meant to allegorize the submission of a holy mind to the will of God. Grisilda was the daughter of a charcoal-burner, but became the wife of Walter marquis of Saluzzo. Her husband tried her, as God tried Job, and with the same result: (1) He took away her infant daughter, and secretly conveyed it to the queen of Pa'via to be brought up, while the mother was made to believe that it was murdered. (2) Four years later she had a son, which was also taken from her, and was sent to be brought up with his sister. (3) Eight years later, Grisilda was divorced, and sent back to her native cottage, because her husband, as she was told, intended to marry another. When, however, lord Walter saw no indication of murmuring or jealousy, he told Grisilda that the supposed rival was her own daughter, and her patience and submission met with their full reward.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Clerk's Tale," 1388).

 The tale of Grisilda is the last in Boccaccio's Decameron. Petrarch rendered it into a Latin romance, entitled De Obedentia et Fide Uxoria Mythologia. In the middle of the sixteenth century appeared a ballad and also a prose version of Patient Grissel. Miss Edgeworth has a domestic novel entitled The Modern Griselda (1804). The tale of Grisilda is an allegory on the text, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the Name of the Lord."

Dryden says, "The tale of Grizild was the invention of Petrarch, and was sent by him to Boccace, from whom it came to Chaucer."—Preface to Fables.

Griskinis'sa, wife of Artaxaminous king of Utopia. The king felt in doubt, and asked his minister of state this knotty question—

> Shall I my Griskinissa's charms forego,
> Compel her to give up the royal chair,
> And place the rosy Distaffina there?

The minister reminds the king that Distaffina is betrothed to his general.

> And would a king his general supplant?
> I can't advise, upon my soul I can't.
> Rhodes: Bombastes Furioso (1790).

Grissel or Grisel. Octavia, the wife of Mark Antony, and sister of Augustus, is called the "patient Grisel of Roman story."

> For patience she will prove a second Grissel.
> Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew, act ii. sc. 1 (1594).

Griz'el Dal'mahoy (Miss), the seamstress.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Griz'zie, maidservant to Mrs. Saddletree.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Griz'zie, one of the servants of the Rev. Josiah Cargill.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Griz'zle, chambermaid at the Golden Arms inn, at Kippletringan.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Grizzle (Lord), the first peer of the realm in the court of king Arthur. He is in love with the princess Huncamunca, and as the lady is promised in marriage to the valiant Tom Thumb, he turns traitor, and "leads his rebel rout to the palace gate." Here Tom Thumb encounters the rebels, and Glumdalca, the giantess, thrusts at the traitor, but misses him. Then the "pigmy giant-killer" runs him through the body. The black cart comes up to drag him off, but the dead man tells the carter he need not trouble himself, as he intends "to bear himself off," and so he does.—Tom Thumb, by Fielding the novelist (1730), altered by Kane O'Hara (1778).

Miss Maddie Groatsettar, also niece of the old lady Glowrowrum, and one of the guests at Burgh Westra.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Groffar'ius, king of Aquitania, who resisted Brute the mythical great-grandson of Ænēas, who landed there on his way to Britain.—Drayton: Polyolbion, i. (1612).

Grongar Hill, a descriptive poem in eight-syllable verse, containing pictures of scenes on the banks of the Wye (1726).

Gronovius, father and son, critics and humanists (father, 1611–1671; son, 1645–1716).

I have more satisfaction in beholding you than I should have in conversing with Grævius and Gronovius. I had rather possess your approbation than that of the elder Scaliger.—Mrs. Cowley: Who's the Dupe? i. 3.

(Scaliger, father (1484–1558), son (1540–1609), critics and humanists.)

Groom (Squire), "a downright, English, Newmarket, stable-bred gentleman-jockey, who, having ruined his finances by dogs, grooms, cocks, and horses, . . . thinks to retrieve his affairs by a matrimonial alliance with a City fortune" (canto i. 1). He is one of the suitors of Charlotte Goodchild; but, supposing the report to be true that she has lost her money, he says to her guardian—

"Hark ye! sir Theodore; I always make my match according to the weight my thing can carry. When I offered to take her into my stable, she was sound and in good case; but I hear her wind is touched. If so, I would not back her for a shilling. Matrimony is a long course, . . . and it won't do."—Macklin: Love à la Mode, ii. 1 (1779).

This was Lee Lewes's great part (1740–1803). One morning at rehearsal, Lewes said something not in the play. "Hoy, hoy!" cried Macklin; "what's that? what's that?" "Oh," replied Lewes, "'tis only a bit of my nonsense." "But," said Macklin, gravely, "I like my nonsense, Mr. Lewes, better than yours."—O'Keefe.

Grosvenor [Grove'-nr] Square, London. So called because it is built on the property of sir Richard Grosvenor, who died 1732.

Grotto of Eph'esus. Near Ephesus was a grotto containing a statue of Diana attached to a reed presented by Pan. If a young woman, charged with dishonour, entered this grotto, and the reed gave forth musical sounds, she was declared to be a pure virgin; but if it gave forth hideous noises, she was denounced and never seen more. Corinna put the grotto to the test, at the desire of Glaucon of Lesbos, and was never seen again by the eye of man.—Lord Lytton: Tales of Milētus, iii. (See CHASTITY, p. 198, for other tests.)

Grouse's Day (Saint), the 12th of August.

They were collected with guns and dogs to do honour to . . . St. Grouse's day.—London Society ("Patty's Revenge").

Groveby (Old), of Gloomstock Hall, aged 65. He is the uncle of sir Harry Groveby. Brusque, hasty, self-willed, but kind-hearted.

Sir Harry Groveby, nephew of old Groveby, engaged to Maria "the maid of the Oaks."—Burgoyne: The Maid of the Oaks.

Groves (Jem), landlord of the Valiant Soldier, to which was attached "a good dry skittle-ground."—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop, xxix. (1840).

Grub (Jonathan), a stock-broker, weighted with the three plagues of life—a wife, a handsome marriageable daughter, and £100,000 in the Funds, "any one of which is enough to drive a man mad; but all three to be attended to at once is too much."

Mrs. Grub, a wealthy City woman, who has moved from the east to the fashionable west quarter of London, and has abandoned merchants and tradespeople for the gentry.

Emily Grub, called Milly, the handsome daughter of Jonathan. She marries captain Bevil of the Guards.—O'Brien: Cross Purposes (1842).

Grub Street, near Moorfields, London, once famous for literary hacks and inferior literary publications. It is now called Milton Street—no compliment to our great epic poet. (See Dunciad, i. 38.)

> I'd sooner ballads write and Grub Street lays.
> Gay.

N.B.—The connection between Grub Street literature and Milton is not apparent. However, as Pindar, Hesiod, Plutarch, etc., were Bœo'tians, so Foxe the martyrologist, and Speed the historian, resided in Grub Street.

Grub'binol, a shepherd who sings with Bumkinet a dirge on the death of Blouzelinda.

> Thus wailed the louts in melancholy strain,
> Till bonny Susan sped across the plain;
> They seized the lass, in apron clean arrayed,
> And to the ale-house forced the willing maid;
> In ale and kisses they forgot their cares,
> And Susan Blouzelinda's loss repairs.
> Gay Pastoral, v. (1714).

(An imitation of Virgil's Eclogue, v., "Daphnis.")

Gru'dar and Bras'solis. Cairbar and Grudar both strove for a spotted bull "that lowed on Golbun Heath," in Ulster. Each claimed it as his own, and at length fought, when Grudar fell. Cairbar took the shield of Grudar to Brassolis, and said to her, "Fix it on high within my hall; 'tis the armour of my foe;" but the maiden, "distracted, flew to the spot, where she found the youth in his blood," and died.

> Fair was Brassolis on the plain. Stately was Grudar on the hill.—Ossian: Fingal, i.

Grudden (Mrs.), of the Portsmouth Theatre. She took the money, dressed the ladies, acted any part on an emergency, and made herself generally useful.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Gruoby (John), servant to lord George Gordon. An honest fellow, who remained faithful to his master to the bitter end. He twice saved Haredale's life; and, although living under lord Gordon and loving him, detested the crimes into which his master was betrayed by bad advice and false zeal.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Grugeon, one of Fortunio's seven attendants. His gift was that he could eat any amount of food without satiety. When Fortunio first saw him, he was eating 60,000 loaves for his breakfast.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Fortunio," 1682).

Grum'ball (The Rev. Dr.), from Oxford, a papist conspirator with Redgauntlet.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Grumbo, a giant in the tale of Tom Thumb. A raven, having picked up Tom Thumb, dropped him on the flat roof of the giant's castle. When old Grumbo went there to sniff the air, Tom crept up his sleeve; the giant, feeling tickled, shook his sleeve, and Tom fell into the sea below. Here he was swallowed by a fish, and the fish, being caught, was sold for king Arthur's table. It was thus that Tom got introduced to the great king, by whom he was knighted.

Grumio, one of the servants of Petruchio.—Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew (1594).

Grundy (Mrs.). Dame Ashfield, a farmer's wife, is jealous of a neighbouring farmer named Grundy. She tells her husband that Farmer Grundy got five shillings a quarter more for his wheat than they did; that the sun seemed to shine on purpose for Farmer Grundy; that Dame Grundy's butter was the crack butter of the market. She then goes into her day-dreams, and says, "If our Nelly were to marry a great baronet, I wonder what Mrs. Grundy would say?" Her husband makes answer—

> "Why dan't thee letten Mrs. Grundy alone? I do verily think when thee goest to t'other world, the vurst question thee'll ax 'ill be, if Mrs. Grundy's there?"—Morton: Speed the Plough, i. 1 (1798).

N.B.—The original Mrs. Grundy was the wife of the Hon. Felix Grundy, of Tennessee, who ruled aristocratic society in Washington with a rod of iron. Her edicts were law, her presence was essential to the success of a fashionable gathering, and such an authority she became on social topics that the phrase, "Mrs. Grundy says [or said] so-and-so," long outlived her.

Gryll, one of those changed by Acrasia into a hog. He abused sir Guyon for disenchanting him; whereupon the palmer said to the knight, "Let Gryll be Gryll, and have his hoggish mind."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 12 (1590).

Only a target light upon his arm
He careless bore, on which old Gryll was drawn,
Transformed into a hog.
[P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, vii. (1633).

Gryphon, a fabulous monster, having the upper part like a vulture or eagle, and the lower part like a lion. Gryphons were the supposed guardians of gold-mines, and were in perpetual strife with the Arimas'pians, a people of Scythia, who rifled the mines for the adornment of their hair.

As when a gryphon thro' the wilderness,
With winged course, o'er hill or moory dale,
Pursues the Arimaspian, who, by stealth,
Had from his wakeful custody purloined
The guarded gold.
Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 943, etc. (1665).

The Gryphon, symbolic of the divine and human union of Jesus Christ. The fore part of the gryphon is an eagle, and the hinder part a lion. Thus Dantê saw in purgatory the car of the Church drawn by a gryphon.—Dante: Purgatory, xxix. (1308).

Guadia'na, the 'squire of Durandartê, changed into a river of the same name. He was so grieved at leaving his master that he plunged instantaneously under ground, and when obliged to appear "where he might be seen, he glided in sullen state to Portugal."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. ii. 6 (1615).

Gualber'to (St.), heir of Valdespe'sa, and brought up with the feudal notion that he was to be the avenger of blood. Anselmo was the murderer he was to lie in wait for, and he was to make it the duty of his life to have blood for blood. One day as he was lying in ambush for Anselmo, the vesper bell rang, and Gualberto (3 syl.) fell in prayer, but somehow could not pray. The thought struck him that if Christ died to forgive sin, it could not be right in man to hold it beyond forgiveness. At this moment Anselmo came up, was attacked, and cried for mercy. Gualberto cast away his dagger, ran to the neighbouring convent, thanked God he had been saved from blood-guiltiness, and became a hermit noted for his holiness of life.—Southey: St. Gualberto.

Guards of the Pole, the two stars β and γ of the Great Bear, and not the star Arctoph'ylax, which, Steevens says, "literally signifies the guard of the Bear," i.e. Bootês (not the Polar Guards). Shakespeare refers to these two "guards" in Othello, act ii. sc. 1, where he says the surge seems to "quench the guards of the ever-fixed pole." Hood says they are so called "from the Spanish word guardare, which is 'to behold,' because they are diligently to be looked unto in regard of the singular use which they have in navigation."—Use of the Celestial Globe (1590).

How to knowe the houre of the night by the [Polar] Gards, by knowing on what point of the compass they shall be at midnight every fifteenth day throughout the whole year.—Norman: Safegard of Sailers (1587).

Gua'rini (Philip), the 'squire of sir Hugo de Lacy.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Guari'nos (Admiral), one of Charlemagne's paladins, taken captive at Roncesvallês. He fell to the lot of Marlo'tês, a Moslem, who offered him his daughter in marriage if he would become a disciple of the Arabian prophet. Guarinos refused, and was kept in a dungeon for seven years, when he was liberated, that he might take part in a joust. The admiral then stabbed the Moor to his heart, and, vaulting on his grey horse Treb'ozond, escaped to France.

Gu'drun, a lady married to Sigurd by the magical arts of her mother; and on the death of Sigurd to Atli (Attila), whom she hated for his fierce cruelty, and murdered. She then cast herself into the sea, and the waves bore her to the castle of king Jonakun, who became her third husband.—Edda of Sæmund Sigfusson (1130).

Gu'drun, a model of heroic fortitude and pious resignation. She was the daughter of king Hettel (Attila), and the betrothed of Herwig king of Heligoland, but was carried off by Harmuth king of Norway, who killed Hettel. As she refused to marry Harmuth, he put her to all sorts of menial work. One day, Herwig appeared with an army, and having gained a decisive victory, married Gudrun, and at her intercession pardoned Harmuth the cause of her great misery.—A North-Saxon Poem (thirteenth century).

Gud'yill (Old John), butler to lady Bellenden.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Guel'pho (3 syl.), son of Actius IV. marquis d'Este and of Cunigunda (a German). Guelpho was the uncle of Rinaldo, and next in command to Godfrey. He led an army of 5000 men from Carynthia, in Germany, to the siege of Jerusalem, but most of them were cut off by the Persians. Guelpho was noted for his broad shoulders and ample chest. —Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, iii. (1575).

Guen'dolen (3 syl.), a fairy whose mother was a human being. King Arthur fell in love with her, and she became the mother of Gyneth. When Arthur deserted the frail fair one, she offered him a parting cup; but as he took it in his hand, a drop of the liquor fell on his horse and burnt it so severely that it "leapt twenty feet high," ran mad, and died. Arthur dashed the cup on the ground, whereupon it set fire to the grass and consumed the fairy palace. As for Guendolen, she was never seen afterwards.—Sir W. Scott: The Bridal of Triermain, i. 2 ("Lyulph's Tale," 1813).

Guendolœ'na, wife of Locrin (eldest son of Brute, whom he succeeded), and daughter of Cori'neus (3 syl.). Being divorced, she retired to Cornwall, and collected an army, which marched against Locrin, who "was killed by the shot of an arrow." Guendolœna now assumed the reins of government, and her first act was to throw Estrildis (her rival) and her daughter Sabre into the Severn, which was called Sabri'na or Sabren from that day.—Geoffrey: British History, ii. 4, 5 (1142).

Guenever or Guinever, a corrupt form of Guanhuma'ra (4 syl.), daughter of king Leodegrance of the land of Camelyard. She was the most beautiful of women, was the wife of king Arthur, but entertained a criminal attachment to sir Launcelot du Lac. Respecting the latter part of the queen's history, the greatest diversity occurs. Thus Geoffrey says—

> King Arthur was on his way to Rome . . . when news was brought him that his nephew Modred, to whose care he had entrusted Britain, had . . . set the crown upon his own head; and that the queen Guanhumara . . . had wickedly married him. . . . When king Arthur returned and put Modred and his army to flight . . . the queen fled from York to the City of Legions [Newport, in South Wales], where she received to lead a chaste life among the nuns of Julius the martyr.—British History, xi. 1 (1142).

 Another version is that Arthur, being informed of the adulterous conduct of Launcelot, went with an army to Berwick (Brittany), to punish him. That Mordred (his son by his own sister), left as regent, usurped the crown, proclaimed that Arthur was dead, and tried to marry Guenever the queen; but she shut herself up in the Tower of London, resolved to die rather than marry the usurper. When she heard of the death of Arthur, she "stole away" to Almesbury, "and there she let make herself a nun, and wore white cloaths and black." And there lived she "in fasting, prayers, and almsdeeds, that all marvelled at her virtuous life."—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 161–170 (1470).

Guene'vra (3 syl.), wife of Nectaba'nus the dwarf, at the cell of the hermit of Engaddi.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Guer'in or Gueri'no, son of Millon king of Alba'nia. On the day of his birth his father was dethroned, but the child was rescued by a Greek slave, who brought it up and surnamed it Meschi'no, or "The Wretched." When grown to man's estate, Guerin fell in love with the princess Elizēna, sister of the Greek emperor, who held his court at Constantinople.—An Italian Romance.

Guesclin's Dust a Talisman. Guesclin, or rather Du Guesclin, constable of France, laid siege to Châteauneuf-de-Randan, in Auvergne. After several assaults, the town promised to surrender if not relieved within fifteen days. Du Guesclin died in this interval, but the governor of the town came and laid the keys of the city on the dead man's body, saying he resigned the place to the hero's ashes (1380).

> France . . . demands his bones [Napoleon's]
> To carry onward, in the battle's van,
> To form, like Guesclin's dust, her talisman.
> Byron: Age of Bronze, iv. (1823).

Gugner, Odin's spear, which never failed to hit. It was made by the dwarf Eitri.—The Eddas.

Guide'rius, elder son of Cym'beline (3 syl.) king of Britain, and brother of Arvir'agus. They were kidnapped in infancy by Belarius, out of revenge for being unjustly banished, and were brought up by him in a cave. When grown to manhood, Belarius introduced them to the king, and told their story; whereupon Cymbeline received them as his sons, and Guiderius succeeded him on the throne.—Shakespeare: Cymbeline (1605).

 Geoffrey calls Cymbeline "Kymbelinus son of Tenuantius;" says that he was brought up by Augustus Cæsar, and adds, "In his days was born our Lord Jesus Christ." Kymbeline reigned ten years, when he was succeeded by Guiderius. The historian says that Kymbeline paid the tribute to the Romans, and that it was Guiderius who refused to do so, "for which reason Claudius the emperor marched against him, and he was killed by Hamo."—British History, iv. 11, 12, 13 (1142).

Guido "the Savage," son of Amon and Constantia. He was the younger brother of Rinaldo. Being wrecked on the coast of the Am'azons, he was compelled to fight their ten male companions, and, having slain them all, to marry ten of the Amazons. From this thraldom Guido made his escape, and joined the army of Charlemagne.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Guido [FRANCESCHINI], a reduced nobleman, who tried to repair his fortune by marrying Pompilia, the putative child of Pietro and Violante. When the marriage was consummated, and the money secure, Guido ill-treated the putative parents; and Violante, in revenge, declared that Pompilia was not their child at all, but the offspring of a Roman wanton. Having made this declaration, she next applied to the law-courts for the recovery of the money. When Guido heard this tale, he was furious, and so ill-treated his child-wife that she ran away, under the protection of a young canon. Guido pursued the fugitives, overtook them, and had them arrested; whereupon the canon was suspended for three years, and Pompilia sent to a convent. Here her health gave way, and as the birth of a child was expected, she was permitted to leave the convent and live with her putative parents. Guido, having gained admission, murdered all three, and was himself executed for the crime.—R. Browning: The Ring and the Book.

Guil'denstern, one of Hamlet's companions, employed by the king and queen to divert him, if possible, from his strange and wayward ways.—Shakespeare: Hamlet (1596).

Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are favourite samples of the thorough-paced time-serving court knave . . . ticketed and to be hired for any hard or dirty work.—Crowden Clarke.

Guillotière (4 syl.), the scum of Lyons. La Guillotière is the low quarter, where the bouches inutiles find refuge.

Guillotine (3 syl.). So named from Joseph Ignace Guillotin, a French physician, who proposed its adoption, to prevent unnecessary pain. Dr. Guillotin did not invent the guillotine, but he improved the Italian machine (1791). In 1792 Antoine Louis introduced further improvements, and hence the instrument is sometimes called Louisette or Louison. The original Italian machine was called mannaja; it was a clumsy affair, first employed to decapitate Beatrice Cenci in Rome, A.D. 1600.

It was the popular theme for jests. It was [called La mère Guillotine] the "sharp female," the "best cure for headache." It "infallibly prevented the hair from turning grey." It "imparted a peculiar delicacy to the complexion." It was the "national razor" which shaved close. Those "who kissed the guillotine, looked through the little window and sneezed into the sack." It was the sign of "the regeneration of the human race." It "superseded the cross." Models were worn [as ornaments].—Dickens: A Tale of Two Cities, iii. 4 (1859).

Guinart (Roque), whose true name was Pedro Rocha Guinarda, chief of a band of robbers who levied black-mail in the mountainous districts of Catalonia. He is introduced by Cervantes in his tale of Don Quixote.

Guinea (Adventures of a), a novel by Charles Johnstone (1761). A guinea, as it passes into different hands, is the historian of the follies and vices of its master for the time being; and thus a series of scenes and personages are made to pass before the reader, somewhat in the same manner as in The Devil upon Two Sticks and in The Chinese Tales.

Guinea-hen, a fille de joie, a word of contempt and indignity for a woman.

Ere I would . . . drown myself for the love of a guinea-hen, I would change my humanity with a baboon.—Shakespeare: Othello, act i. sc. 3 (1611).

Guinea-pig (A), a gentleman of sufficient name to form a bait, who allows himself to be put on a directors' list for the guinea and lunch which the board provides.—City Slang.

Guin'evere (3 syl.). So Tennyson spells the name of Arthur's queen in his Idylls. He tells us of the liaison between her and "sir Lancelot," and says that Modred, having discovered this familiarity, "brought his creatures to the basement of the tower for testimony." Sir Lancelot flung the fellow to the ground, and instantly took to horse; while Guinevere fled to the nunnery at Almesbury. Here the king took leave of her; and when the abbess died, the queen was appointed her successor, and remained head of the establishment for three years, when she also died.

⁂ It will be seen that Tennyson departs from the British History by Geoffrey, and the History of Prince Arthur as edited by sir T. Malory. (See GUENEVER.)

Tennyson accents the name Guin-ē'-ver—

> Leodogran . . .
> Had one fair daughter, and none other child, . . .
> Guinēvere, and in her his one delight.
> Coming of Arthur.

Guiomar, mother of the vain-glorious Duar'te.—Fletcher: The Custom of the Country (1647).

Guiscardo, the 'squire, but previously the page, of Tancred king of Salerno. Sigismunda, the king's daughter, loved him, and clandestinely married him. When Tancred discovered it, he ordered the young man to be waylaid and strangled. He then went to his daughter's chamber, and reproved her for loving a base-born "slave." Sigismunda boldly defended her choice, but next day received a human heart in a golden casket. It needed no prophet to tell her what had happened, and she drank a draught of poison. Her father entered just in time to hear her dying request that she and Guiscardo might be buried in the same tomb. The royal father

> Too late repented of his cruel deed,
> One common sepulchre for both decreed;
> Intombed the wretched pair in royal state,
> And on their monument inscribed their fate.
> Dryden: Sigismunda and Guiscardo (from Boccaccio).

Guise (Henri de Lorraine, duc de) commenced the Massacre of Bartholomew by the assassination of admiral Coligny [Co-leen'-e]. Being forbidden to enter Paris by order of Henri III., he disobeyed the injunction, and was murdered (1550–1588).

(Henri de Guise has furnished the subject of several tragedies. In English we have Guise or the Massacre of France, by John Webster (1620); The Duke of Guise, by Dryden and Lee. In French we have Etats de Blois (the Death of Guise), by François Raynouard, 1814.)

Guisla (2 syl.), sister of Pelayo, in love with Numac'ian a renegade. "She inherited her mother's leprous taint." Brought back to her brother's house by Adosinda, she returned to the Moor, "cursing the meddling spirit that interfered with her most shameless love."—Southey: Roderick, Last of the Goths (1814).

Gui'sor (2 syl.), groom of the Saracen Pollenté. His "scalp was bare, betraying his state of bondage." His office was to keep the bridge on Pollenté's territory, and to allow no one to pass without paying "the passage-penny." This bridge was full of trap-doors, through which travellers were apt to fall into the river below. When Guizor demanded toll of sir Artēgal, the knight gave him a "stunning blow, saying, 'Lo! there's my hire;'" and the villain dropped down dead.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 2 (1596).

 Upon conjectures that "Guizor" is intended for the duc de Guise, and his master "Pollenté" for Charles IX. of France, notorious both for the St. Bartholomew Massacre.

Gulbey'az, the sultana. Having seen Juan amongst Lambro's captives, "passing on his way to sale," she caused him to be purchased, and introduced into the harem in female attire. On discovering that he preferred Dudù, one of the attendant beauties, to herself, she commanded both to be stitched up in a sack, and cast into the Bosphorus. They contrived, however, to make their escape.—Byron: Don Juan, vi. (1824).

Gul'chenraz, surnamed "Gundogdi" ("morning"), daughter of Malek-al-salem king of Georgia, to whom Fum-Hoam the mandarin relates his numerous and extraordinary transformations or rather metempsychoses.—Guevlette: Chinese Tales (1723).

Gul'chenrous, son of Ali Hassan (brother of the emir' Fakreddin); the "most delicate and lovely youth in the whole world." He could "write with precision, paint on vellum, sing to the lute, write poetry, and dance to perfection; but could neither hurl the lance nor curb the steed." Gulchenrous was betrothed to his cousin Nouron'ihar, who loved "even his faults;" but they never married, for Nouronihar became the wife of the caliph Vathek.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Gulistan' ["the rose garden"], a collection of tales and apophthegms in prose and verse by Saadi, a native of Shiraz, Persia (thirteenth century). It has been translated into English by Gladwin.

> Even beggars, in soliciting alms, will give utterance to some appropriate passage from the Gulistan.—J. J. Grandville.

Gul'liver (Lemuel), first a surgeon, then a sea-captain of several ships. He gets wrecked on the coast of Lilliput, a country of pygmies. Subsequently he is thrown among the people of Brobdingnag, giants of tremendous size. In his next voyage he is driven to Lapu'ta, an empire of quack pretenders to science and knavish projectors. And in his fourth voyage he visits the Houyhnhnms [Whin'-nms], where horses were the dominant powers. —Dean Swift: Travels in Several Remote Nations . . . by Lemuel Gulliver (1726).

Gulna'rê (3 syl.), daughter of Faras'chê (3 syl.) whose husband was king of an under-sea empire. A usurper drove the king her father from his throne, and Gulnarê sought safety in the Island of the Moon. Here she was captured, made a slave, sold to the king of Persia, and became his favourite, but preserved a most obstinate and speechless silence for twelve months. Then the king made her his wife, and she told him her history. In due time a son was born, whom they called Beder ("the full moon").

⁂ Gulnarê says that the under-sea folk are never wetted by the water, that they can see as well as we can, that they speak the language "of Solomon's seal," and can transport themselves instantaneously from place to place.—Arabian Nights ("Beder and Giauharê").

Gulnare (2 syl.), queen of the harem, and the most beautiful of all the slaves of Seyd [Seed]. She was rescued by Conrad the corsair from the flames of the palace; and, when Conrad was imprisoned, she went to his dungeon, confessed her love, and proposed that he should murder the sultan and flee. As Conrad refused to assassinate Seyd, she herself did it, and then fled with Conrad to the "Pirate's Isle." The rest of the tale is continued in Lara, in which Gulnare assumes the name of Kaled, and appears as a page.—Byron: The Corsair (1814).

Gulvi'gar ["weigher of gold"], the Plutus of Scandinavian mythology. He introduced among men the love of gain.

Gum'midge (Mrs.), the widow of Dan'el Peggotty's partner. She kept house for Dan'el, who was a bachelor. Old Mrs. Gummidge had a craze that she was neglected and uncared for, a waif in the wide world, of no use to any one. She was always talking of herself as the "lone lorn cre'tur." When about to sail for Australia, one of the sailors asked her to marry him, when "she ups with a pail of water and flings it at his head."—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Gundofo'rus, an Indian king for whom the apostle Thomas built a palace of sethym wood, the roof of which was ebony. He made the gates of the horn of the "horned snake," that no one with poison might be able to pass through.

Gunpowder. The composition of gunpowder is expressly mentioned by Roger Bacon, in his treatise De Nullitate Magiæ, published 1216.

> . . . earth and air were sadly shaken
> By thy humane discovery, friar Bacon.
> Byron: Don Juan, viii. 33 (1823).

Günther, king of Burgundy and brother of Kriemhild (2 syl.). He resolved to wed Brunhild, the martial queen of Issland, and won her by the aid of Siegfried; but the bride behaved so obstreperously that the bridegroom had again to apply to his friend for assistance. Siegfried contrived to get possession of her ring and girdle, after which she became a submissive wife. Günther, with base ingratitude, was privy to the murder of his friend, and was himself slain in the dungeon of Etzel by his sister Kriemhild.—The Nibelungen Lied.

(In history, Günther is called "Güntacher," and Etzel "Attila.")

Gup'py (Mr.), clerk in the office of Kenge and Carboy. A weak, commonplace youth, who has the conceit to propose to Esther Summerson, the ward in Chancery.—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Gurgus'tus, according to Drayton, son of Belinus. This is a mistake, as Gurgustus, or rather Gurgustius, was son of Rivallo; and the son of Belinus was Gurgiunt Brabtruc. The names given by Geoffrey, in his British History, run thus: Leir (Lear), Cunedag his grandson, Rivallo his son, Gurgustius his son, Sisillius his son, Jago nephew of Gurgustius, Kinmarc son of Sisillius, then Gorbogud. Here the line is broken, and the new dynasty begins with Molmutius of Cornwall, then his son Belinus, who was succeeded by his son Gurgiunt Brabtruc, whose son and successor was Guithelin, called by Drayton "Guynteline."—Geoffrey: British History, ii., iii. (1142).

> In greatness next succeeds Belinus' worthy son
> Gurgustus, who soon left what his great father won
> To Guynteline his heir.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1612).

Gurney (Gilbert), the hero and title of a novel by Theodore Hook. This novel is a spiced autobiography of the author himself (1835).

Gurney (Thomas), shorthand writer, and author of a work on the subject, called Brachygraphy (1705–1770).

> If you would like to see the whole proceedings . . .
> The best is that in shorthand ta'en by Gurney,
> Who to Madrid on purpose made a journey.
> Byron: Don Juan, i. 189 (1819).

Gurth, the swine-herd and thrall of Cedric of Rotherwood.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Gurton (Gammer), the heroine of an old English comedy. The plot turns upon the loss of a needle by Gammer Gurton, and its subsequent discovery sticking in the breeches of her man Hodge.—Mr. J. S. Master of Arts (1561).

Gushington (Angelina), the pseudonym of lady Dufferin.

Gustavus III. used to say there were two things he held in equal abhorrence—the German language and tobacco.

Gusta'vus Vasa (1496–1560), having made his escape from Denmark, where he had been treacherously carried captive, worked as a common labourer for a time in the copper-mines of Dalecarlia [Da'-lekarl'-ya]; but the tyranny of Christian II. of Denmark induced the Dalecarlians to revolt, and Gustavus was chosen their leader. The rebels made themselves masters of Stockholm; Christian abdicated, and Sweden henceforth became an independent kingdom.—Brooke: Gustavus Vasa (1730).

Gus'ter, the Snagsbys' maid-of-all-work. A poor, overworked drudge, subject to fits.—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Gusto Picaresco ["the love of roguery"]. In romances of this class the Spaniards especially excel, as don Diego de Mondo'za's Lasarillo de Tormes (1553); Mateo Aleman's Guzman d'Alfarachè (1599); Quevedo's Gran Tacano; etc.

Guthrie (John), one of the archers of the Scottish guard in the employ of Louis XI.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Gutter Lane, London, a corruption of Guthurun Lane; so called from a Mr. Guthurun or Guthrum, who "possessed the chief property therein."—Stow: Survey of London (1598).

Guy (Thomas), the miser and philanthropist. He amassed an immense fortune in 1720 by speculations in South Sea stock, and, besides devoting large sums of money to other charitable objects, gave £238,292 to found and endow Guy's Hospital (1644–1724).

Guy earl of Warwick, an English knight. He proposed marriage to Phelis, or Phillis, or Felice, who refused to listen to his suit till he had distinguished himself by knightly deeds. He first rescued Blanch daughter of the emperor of Germany, then fought against the Saracens, and slew the doughty Coldran, Elmage king of Tyre, and the Soldan himself. Then, returning to England, he was accepted by Phelis and married her. In forty days he returned to the Holy Land, when he redeemed earl Jonas out of prison, slew the giant Am'erant, and performed many other noble exploits. Again he returned to England, just in time to encounter the Danish giant Colebrond (a syl.) or Colbrand, which combat is minutely described by Drayton, in his Polyolbion, xii. At Windsor he slew a boar "of passing might." On Dunsmore Heath he slew the dun cow of Dunsmore, a wild and cruel monster. In Northumberland he slew a winged dragon, "black as any cole," with the paws of a lion, and a hide which no sword could pierce (Polyolbion, xiii.). After this he turned hermit, and went daily to crave bread of his wife Phelis, who knew him not. On his death-bed he sent her a ring, and she closed his dying eyes (890–958).—Drayton: Polyolbion.

Guy Fawkes, the conspirator, went under the name of John Johnstone, and pretended to be the servant of Mr. Percy (1577–1606).

Guy Mannering, the second of Scott's historical novels, published in 1815, just seven months after Waverley. The interest of the tale is well sustained; but the love-scenes, female characters, and Guy Mannering himself are quite worthless. Not so the character of Dandy Dinmont, the shrewd and witty counsellor Pleydell, the desperate sea-beaten villainy of Hatteraick, the uncouth devotion of that gentlest of all pedants poor Dominie Sampson, and the savage crazed superstition of the gipsy-dweller in Derncleugh (time, George II.).

> Guy Mannering was the work of six weeks about Christmas-time, and marks of haste are visible both in the plot and in its development.—Chambers: English Literature, ii. 586.

The tale of Guy Mannering is as follows: The hero is Harry Bertram; and the other main characters are his sister Lucy, with Guy Mannering and his daughter Julia. Bertram's father (laird of Ellangowan) is made a magistrate, and tries relentlessly to drive away the gipsies, who, in consequence, vow vengeance. Soon after this his wife dies in child-birth, the laird himself dies of paralysis, and their young son Harry is kidnapped by Glossin, a lawyer, who purchases the estate. Lucy Bertram is obliged to leave her home, and goes first to live with her guardian, but afterwards is hospitably entertained by Guy Mannering and his daughter Julia. She takes with her Dominie Sampson, who is delighted to be employed in arranging the colonel's library. Meg Merrilies, a gipsy, befriends Harry Bertram, aids his escape, and afterwards tells him he is the rightful heir of the Ellangowan estate. Glossin is sent to prison, enters the cell of Dirk Hatteraick, a Dutch smuggler, and is strangled by him. Harry Bertram marries Julia (Guy Mannering's daughter), and Lucy Bertram marries Charles Hazlewood (son of sir Robert Hazlewood of Hazlewood).

Guyn'teline or Guith'elin, according to Geoffrey, was son of Gurgiunt Brabtruc (British History, iii. 11, 12, 13); but, according to Drayton, he was the son of Gurgustus an early British king. (See GURGUSTUS.) His queen was Martia, who codified what are called the Martian Laws, translated into Anglo-Saxon by king Alfred. (See MARTIAN LAWS.)

> Gurgustus . . . left what his great father won
> To Guynteline his heir, whose queen . . .
> To wise Mulmutius' laws her Martian first did frame.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1612).

Guyon (Sir), the personification of "temperance." The victory of temperance over intemperance is the subject of bk. ii. of the Faërie Queene. Sir Guyon first lights on Amavia (intemperance of grief), a woman who kills herself out of grief for her husband; and he takes her infant boy and commits it to the care of Medi'na. He next meets Braggadoccio (intemperance of the tongue), who is stripped bare of everything. He then encounters Furor (intemperance of anger), and delivers Phaon from his hands. Intemperance of desire is discomfited in the persons of Pyr'oclês and Cym'oclês; then intemperance of pleasure, or wantonness, in the person of Phædria. After his victory over wantonness, he sees Mammon (intemperance of worldly wealth and honour); but he rejects all his offers, and Mammon is foiled. His last and great achievement is the destruction of the "Bower of Bliss," and the binding in chains of adamant the enchantress Acrasia (or intemperance generally). This enchantress was fearless against Force; but Wisdom and Temperance prevailed against her.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 12 (1590).

Guyot (Bertrand), one of the archers in the Scottish guard attached to Louis XI.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Guzman d'Alfara'chê (4 syl.), hero of a Spanish romance of roguery. He begins by being a dupe, but soon becomes a knave in the character of stable-boy, beggar, swindler, pander, student, merchant, and so on.—Mateo Aleman (1599).

(Probably The Life of Guzman Alfarachê suggested to Lesage The Life of Gil Blas. It is certain that Lesage borrowed from it the incident of the parasite who obtained a capital supper out of the greenhorn by terming him the eighth wonder, q.v.)

Gwenhid'wy, a mermaid. The white foamy waves are called her sheep, and the ninth wave her ram.

> Take shelter when you see Gwenhidwy driving her flock ashore.—Welsh Proverb
> . . . they watched the great sea fall,
> Wave after wave, each mightier than the last;
> Till last, a ninth one, gathering half the deep,
> And full of voices, slowly rose and plunged,
> Roaring, and all the wave was in a flame.
> Tennyson: The Holy Grail.

Gwent, Monmouthshire.

> Not a brook of Morgany [Glamorganshire] nor Gwent.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612)

Gwineth'ia (4 syl.), North Wales.

> Which thro' Gwinethia be so famous everywhere.
> Drayton Polyolbion, ix. (1612).

Gwynedd or GWYNETH, North Wales. Rhodri Mawr, in 873, moved to Aber'frow the seat of government, previously fixed at Dyganwy.

> Among the hills of Gwyneth, and its wilds
> And mountain glens.
> Southey: Madoc, i. 22 (1805).

Gwynne (Nell), one of the favourites of Charles II. She was an actress, but in her palmy days was noted for her many works of benevolence and kindness of heart. The last words of king Charles were, "Don't let poor Nelly starve!"—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

N. B.—The real name of Nell (Eleanor) Gwynne was Margaret Lymcott. The dukes of St. Albans are the descendants of this mistress of Charles II.

Gyas and Cloan'thus, two companions of Æne'as, generally mentioned together as "fortis Gyas fortisque Cloanthus." The phrase has become proverbial for two very similar characters.—Virgil: Æneid.

The "strong Gyas" and the "strong Cloanthus" are less distinguished by the poet than the strong Percival and the strong Osbaldistones were by outward appearance.—Sir W. Scott.

Gyges (2 syl.), one of the Titans. He had fifty heads and a hundred hands.

Gyges, a king of Lydia, of whom Apollo said he deemed the poor Arcadian Ag'laos more happy than the king Gyges, who was proverbial for his wealth.

Gyges (2 syl.), who dethroned Candaulês (3 syl.) king of Lydia, and married Nyssia the young widow. Herodotos says that Candaulês showed Gyges the queen in her bath, and the queen, indignant at this impropriety, induced Gyges to kill the king and marry her (bk. i. 8). He reigned B.C. 716–678.

Gyges's Ring rendered the wearer invisible. Plato says that Gyges found the ring in the flanks of a brazen horse, and was enabled by this talisman to enter the king's chamber unseen, and murder him.

Why did you think that you had Gyges' ring,
Or the herb [fern seed] that gives invisibility?
Fletcher: Fair Maid of the Inn, i. 1 (1647).

Gynec'ium, the apartment in which the Anglo-Saxon women lived.—Fosbroke: Antiquities, ii. 570 (1824).

Gyneth, natural daughter of Guendolen and king Arthur. The king promised to give her in marriage to the bravest knight in a tournament in which the warder was given to her to drop when she pleased. The haughty beauty saw twenty knights fall, among whom was Vanoc, son of Merlin. Immediately Vanoc fell, Merlin rose, put an end to the jousts, and caused Gyneth to fall into a trance, from which she was never to wake till her hand was claimed in marriage by some knight as brave as those who had fallen in the tournament. After the lapse of 500 years, De Vaux undertook to break the spell, and had to overcome four temptations, viz. fear, avarice, pleasure, and ambition. Having succeeded in these encounters, Gyneth awoke and became his bride.—Sir W. Scott: Bridal of Triermain (1813).

Gyp, the college servant of Blushington, who stole his tea and sugar, candles, and so on. After Blushington came into his fortune, he made Gyp his chief domestic and private secretary.—Moncrieff: The Bashful Man.

Gyptian (Saint), a vagrant.

Percase [perchance] sometimes St. Gyptian's pil grymage
Did cane me a month (yea, sometimes more)
To brake the bowres [to reject the food provided],
Bicause they had no better cheere in store.
Gascoigne: The Fruites of Warre, 100 (died 1559).

H.

H. B., the initials adopted by Mr. Doyle, father of Richard Doyle, in his Reform Caricatures (1830).

H. U. (hard up), an H. U. member of society.

Hackburn (Simon of), a friend of Hobbie Elliot, farmer at the Heugh-foot.—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Hackum (Captain), a thick-headed bully of Alsatia, once a sergeant in Flanders. He deserted his colours, fled to England, took refuge in Alsatia, and assumed the title of captain.—Shadwell: Squire of Alsatia (1688).

Hadad, one of the six Wise Men of the East led by the guiding star to Jesus. He left his beloved consort, fairest of the daughters of Bethu'rim. At his decease she shed no tear, yet was her love exceeding that of mortals.—Klopstock: The Messiah, v. (1771).

Had'away (Jack), a former neighbour of Nanty Ewart the smuggler-captain.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Ha'des (2 syl.), the god of the unseen world; also applied to the grave, or the abode of departed spirits.

N.B.—In the Apostles' Creed, the phrase "descended into hell" is equivalent to "descended into hadês."

Hadgi (Abdallah el), the soldan's envoy.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Hadoway (Mrs.), Lovel's landlady at Fairport.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Hadramaut, a province containing the pit where the souls of infidels dwell after death. The word means "Chambers of death."—Al Korân.

Hæ'mony, a most potent counter-charm, more powerful even than mō'ly (q.v.). So called from Hæmonia, i.e. Thessaly, the land of magic.

> . . . a small, unsightly root,
> But of divine effect . . .
> The leaf was darkish and had prickles on it;
> But in another country
> Bore a bright golden flower; but not in this soil.
> Unknown and like esteemed, and the dull swain
> Treads on it daily with his clouted shoon;
> And yet more med'cinal is it than Mōly
> That Hermes once to wise Ulysses gave.
> He [the shepherd] called it Hæmony, and gave it me,
> And bade me keep it, as of sovereign use
> 'Gainst all enchantments, mildew, blast, or damp,
> Or ghastly furies' apparition.
> Milton. Comus (1634).

Hæmos, in Latin HÆMUS, a chain of mountains forming the northern boundary of Thrace. Very celebrated by poets as "the cool Hæmus."

> And Hæmus' hills with snows eternal crowned.
> Pope: Iliad, ii. 49 (1715).

Hafed, a gheber, or fire-worshipper, in love with Hinda the emir's daughter. He was the leader of a band sworn to free their country or die in the attempt. His rendezvous was betrayed, but when the Moslem came to arrest him, he threw himself into the sacred fire and was burnt to death.—Moore: Lalla Rookh ("The Fire-Worshippers," 1817).

Hafiz, the pseudonym of Mr. Stott in the Morning Press. Byron calls him "grovelling Stott," and adds, "What would be the sentiment of the Persian Anacreon . . . if he could behold his name assumed by one Stott of Dormore, the most impudent and execrable of literary poachers?"—English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Hafod. As big a fool as Jack Hafod. Jack Hafod was a retainer of Mr. Bartlett of Castlemorton, Worcestershire, and the ultimus scurrarum of Great Britain. He died at the close of the eighteenth century.

Hagan, son of a mortal and a sea-goblin, the Achillês of German romance. He stabbed Siegfried while drinking from a brook, and laid the body at the door of Kriemhild, that she might suppose he had been killed by assassins. Hagan, having killed Siegfried, then seized the "Nibelung hoard," and buried it in the Rhine, intending to appropriate it. Kriemhild, after her marriage with Etzel king of the Huns, invited him to the court of her husband, and cut off his head. He is described as "well grown, strongly built, with long sinewy legs, deep broad chest, hair slightly grey, of terrible visage, and of lordly gait" (stanza 1789). — The Nibelungen Lied (1210).

Ha'garenes (3 syl.), the descendants of Hagar. The Arabs and the Spanish Moors are so called.

> Often he [St. James] hath been seen conquering and destroying the Hagarenes.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iv. 6 (1615).

Hagenbach (Sir Archibald von), governor of La Ferette.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geiersteen (time, Edward IV.).

Hague (1 syl.). This word means "meadow," and is called in the Dutch, S' Gravenhagen ("the count's hague or meadow").

Haiatal'nefous (5 syl.), daughter and only child of Ar'manos king of the "Isle of Ebony." She and Badoura were the two wives of prince Camaral'zaman, and gave birth at the same time to two princes. Badoura called her son Amgiad ("the most glorious") and Haiatalnefous called hers Assad ("the most happy").—Arabian Nights ("Camaralzaman and Badoura").

Haidee', "the beauty of the Cyclades," was the daughter of Lambro a Greek pirate, living in one of the Cycladês. Her mother was a Moorish maiden of Fez, who died when Haidee was a mere child. Being brought up in utter loneliness, she was wholly Nature's child. One day, don Juan was cast on the shore, the only one saved from a shipwrecked crew, tossed about for many days in the long-boat. Haidee lighted on the lad, and, having nursed him in a cave, fell in love with him. A report being heard that Lambro was dead, don Juan gave a banquet, but in the midst of the revelry, the old pirate returned, and ordered don Juan to be seized and sold as a slave. Haidee broke a blood-vessel from grief and fright, and, refusing to take any nourishment, died.—Byron: Don Juan, ii. 118; iii., iv. (1819, 1821).

> Lord Byron appears to have worked up no part of his poem with so much beauty and life of description as that which narrates the loves of Juan and Haidee.—Sir Egerton Brydges.

> Don Juan is dashed on the shore of the Cycladês, where he is found by a beautiful and innocent girl, the daughter of an old Greek pirate. There is a very superior kind of poetry in the conception of this incident: the desolate isle—the utter loneliness of the maiden, who is ignorant as she is innocent—the helpless condition of the youth,—everything conspires to render it a true romance.—Blackwood's Magazine.

Haimon (The Four Sons of), the title of a minnesong in the degeneracy of that poetic school which rose in Germany with the house of Hohenstaufen, and went out in the middle of the thirteenth century.

Hair. Every three days, when Cor'sina combed the hair of Fairstar and her two brothers, "a great many valuable jewels were combed out, which she sold at the nearest town."—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Princess Fairstar," 1682).

"I suspected," said Corsina, "that Chery is not the brother of Fairstar, for he has neither a star nor collar of gold as Fairstar and her brothers have." "That's true," rejoined her husband; "but jewels fall out of his hair, as well as out of the others'."—Princess Fairstar.

Hair (Long). Mrs. Astley, an actress of the last century, wife of "Old Astley," could stand up and cover her feet with her flaxen hair.

She had such luxuriant hair that she could stand upright and it covered her to her feet like a veil. She was very proud of these flaxen locks; and a slight accident by fire having befallen them, she resolved ever after to play in a wig. She used, therefore, to wind this immense quantity of hair round her head, and put over it a capacious caxon, the consequence of which was that her head bore about the same proportion to the rest of her figure that a whale's skull does to its body.—Philip Astley (1742–1814).

Mdlle. Bois de Chêne, exhibited in London in 1852–3, had a most profuse head of hair, and also a strong black beard, large whiskers, and thick hair on her arms and legs.

Charles XII. had in his army a woman whose beard was a yard and a half long. She was taken prisoner at the battle of Pultowa, and presented to the czar in 1724.

Johann Mayo, the German painter, had a beard which touched the ground when he stood up.

Master George Killingworthe, in the court of Ivan "the Terrible" of Russia, had a beard five feet two inches long. It was thick, broad, and of a yellowish hue. —Hakluyt (1589).

Hair Cut Off. It was said by the Greeks and Romans that life would not quit the body of a devoted victim till a lock of hair had first been cut from the head of the victim and given to Proserpine. Thus, when Alcestis was about to die as a voluntary sacrifice for the life of her husband, Than'atos first cut off a lock of her hair for the queen of the infernals. When Dido slew herself, she could not die till Iris had cut off one of her yellow locks for the same purpose.—Virgil: Æneid, iv. 693–705.

Iris cut the yellow hair of unhappy Dido, and broke the charm.—Holmes: Autocrat of the Breakfast Table.

Hair Sign of Rank.

The Parthians and ancient Persians of high rank wore long flowing hair.

Homer speaks of "the long-haired Greeks" by way of honourable distinction. Subsequently the Athenian cavalry wore long hair, and all Lacedæmonian soldiers did the same.

The Gauls considered long hair a notable honour, for which reason Julius Cæsar obliged them to cut off their hair in token of submission.

The Franks and ancient Germans considered long hair a mark of noble birth. Hence Clodion the Frank was called "The Long-Haired," and his successors are spoken of as les rois chevelures.

The Goths looked on long hair as a mark of honour, and short hair as a mark of thraldom.

For many centuries long hair was in France the distinctive mark of kings and nobles.

Haïz'um (3 syl.), the horse on which the archangel Gabriel rode when he led a squadron of 3000 angels against the Koreishites (3 syl.) in the famous battle of Bedr.

Hakem' or Hakeem, chief of the Druses, who resides at Deir-el-Kamar. The first hakem was the third Fatimite caliph, called B'amr-ellah, who professed to be incarnate deity and the last prophet who had personal communication between God and man. He was slain on mount Mokattam, near Cario (Egypt).

Hakem the khalif vanished erst,
In what seemed death to uninstructed eyes,
On red Mokattam's verge.
R. Browning: The Return of the Druses, I.

Hakim (Adonbec el), Saladin in the disguise of a physician. He visited Richard Cœur de Lion in sickness; gave him a medicine in which the "talisman" had been dipped, and the sick king recovered from his fever.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Hakluyt Society (The), "for the publication of rare and valuable voyages, travels, and geographical records." Instituted in 1846.

Halcro (Claud), the old bard of Magnus Troil the udaller of Zetland.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

(A udaller is one who holds his land by allodial tenure.)

Halcyon a Weathercock. It is said that if the kingfisher or halcyon is hung, it will show which way the wind blows by veering about.

> How now stands the wind?
> Into what corner peers my halcyon's bill?
> Marlowe: Jew of Malta (1586).

Or as a halcyon with her turning brest,
Demonstrates wind from wind and east from west.
Shoar: Life and Death of Thom. Wolsey, Card. (1599).

Halden or Halfdene (2 syl.), a Danish king, who with Basrig or Bagseeg, another Scandinavian king, made (in 871) a descent upon Wessex, and in that one year nine pitched battles were fought with the islanders. The first was Englefield, in Berkshire, in which the Danes were beaten; the second was Reading, in which the Danes were victorious; the third was the famous battle of Æscesdun or Ashdune, in which the Danes were defeated with great loss, and king Bagseeg was slain. In 909 Halfdene was slain in the battle of Wodnesfield (Staffordshire).

Reading ye regained . . .
Where Basrig ye outbraved, and Halden sword to sword.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xii. (1613).

Hal'dimund (Sir Ewes), a friend of lord Dalgarno.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Halifax is halig-fax, i.e. "holy-hair." It was previously called Horton. The tradition is that a certain clerk of Horton, having been jilted, murdered his quondam sweetheart and cut off her head, which he hung on a tree. The head was looked on with reverence, and came to be regarded as a holy relic. In time it rotted away, leaving little filaments spread out between the bark and body of the tree, like fine threads, and regarded as the fax or hair of the holy relic.

Halkit (Mr.), a young lawyer in the introduction of sir W. Scott's Heart of Midlothian (1818).

Hall (Sir Christopher), an officer in the army of Montrose.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Hallam's Greek. Henry Hallam reviewed, in The Edinburgh, Payne Knight's book entitled An Analytical Inquiry into the Principles of Taste, and lashed most unmercifully some Greek verses therein. It was not discovered that the lines were PINDAR'S till it was too late to cancel the critique.—Crabb Robinson: Diary, i. 277.

Classic Hallam, much renowned for Greek.
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Hallelujah Lass (A), a young woman member of the "Salvation Army" organized by "General" Booth.

One of the best of these short feuilletons is called La Petite Lieutenante. It is an account of a young girl, a "Hallelujah Lass" of the Swiss Salvation Army.—Notes and Queries, September 1, 1894, p. 181, col. 2.

Hallelujah Psalms, the last five psalms, each of which begins with the words, "Praise ye the Lord."

Haller (Mrs.). At the age of 16 Adelaide [Mrs. Haller] married the count Waldbourg, from whom she eloped. The count then led a roving life, and was known as "the stranger." The countess, repenting of her folly, assumed (for three years) the name of Mrs. Haller, and took service under the countess of Wintersen, whose affection she won by her amiability and sweetness of temper. Baron Steinfort fell in love with her, but, hearing her tale, interested himself in bringing about a reconciliation between Mrs. Haller and "the stranger," who happened, at the time, to be living in the same neighbourhood. They met and bade adieu, but when their children were brought forth they relented, and rushed into each other's arms.—B. Thompson: The Stranger (1797), adapted from Kotzebue.

In "Mrs. Haller," the powers of Miss O'Neill, aided by her beauty, shone forth in the highest perfection, and when she appeared in that character, with John Kemble as "The Stranger," a spectacle was exhibited such as no one ever saw before, or will ever see again.—Sir A. Alison.

Halliday (Tom), a private in the royal army.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Hamako, an inspired madman. Theodorick, the hermit of Engaddi, is so called in the Talisman, a novel by sir W. Scott (time, Richard I.).

Hamako, fool, unloose me . . . or I will use my dagger!—Chap. iii.

Hamarti'a, Sin personified, offspring of the red dragon and Eve. "A foul, deformed" monster, "more foul, deformed, the sun yet never saw." "A woman seemed she in the upper part," but "the rest was in serpent form," though out of sight. Fully described in canto xii. of The Purple Island (1633), by Phineas Fletcher. (Greek, hamartia, "sin.")

Hamet, son of Mandâné and Zamti (a Chinese mandarin). When the infant prince Zaphimri, called "the orphan of China," was committed to the care of Zamti, Hamet was sent to Corea, and placed under the charge of Morat; but when grown to manhood, he led a band of insurgents against Ti'murkan' the Tartar, who had usurped the throne of China. He was seized and condemned to death, under the conviction that he was Zaphimri the prince. Etan (who was the real Zaphimri) now came forward to acknowledge his rank, and Timurkan, unable to ascertain which was the true prince, ordered them both to execution. At this juncture a party of insurgents arrived, Hamet and Zaphimri were set at liberty, Timurkan was slain, and Zaphimri was raised to the throne of his forefathers.—Murphy: The Orphan of China (1759).

Hamet, one of the black slaves of sir Brian de Bois Guilbert preceptor of the Knights Templars.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Hamet (The Cid) or THE CID HAMET BENENGEL'I, the hypothetical Moorish chronicler who is fabled by Cervantes to have written the adventures of "don Quixote."

O Nature's noblest gift, my gray goose quill! . . .
Our task complete, like Hamet's, shall be free.
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

The shrewd Cid Hamet, addressing himself to his pen, says, "And now, my slender quill, whether skilfully cut or otherwise, here from this rack, suspended by a wire, shalt thou peacefully live to distant times, unless the hand of some rash historian disturb thy repose by taking thee down and profaning thee."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, last chap. (1615).

Hamet, the ox, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox, by Heinrich von Alkmann (1498).

Hamilton (Lady Emily), sister of lord Evandale.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Hamiltrude (3 syl.), a poor Frenchwoman, the first of Charlemagne's nine wives. She bore him several children.

Her neck was tinged with a delicate rose. . . . Her locks were bound about her temples with gold and purple bands. Her dress was looped up with ruby clasps. Her coronet and her purple robes gave her an air of surpassing majesty.—L'Epine: Croquemitaine, iii.

Hamlet, prince of Denmark, a man of mind but not of action; nephew of Claudius the reigning king, who had married the widowed queen. Hamlet loved Ophelia, daughter of Polo'nius the lord chamberlain; but feeling it to be his duty to revenge his father's murder, he abandoned the idea of marriage, and treated Ophelia so strangely, that she went mad, and, gathering flowers from a brook, fell into the water and was drowned. While wasting his energy in speculation, Hamlet accepted a challenge from Laertês of a friendly contest with foils; but Laertês used a poisoned rapier, with which he stabbed the young prince. A scuffle ensued, in which the combatants changed weapons, and Laertês being stabbed, both died.—Shakespeare: Hamlet (1596).

"The whole play," says Schlegel, "is intended to show that calculating consideration exhausts . . . the power of action." Goethe is of the same opinion, and says that "Hamlet is a noble nature, without the strength of nerve which forms a hero. He sinks beneath a burden which he cannot bear, and cannot [make up his mind to] cast aside."

∴ The best actors of "Hamlet" have been Thomas Betterton (1635–1710), Robert Wilks (1670–1732), Garrick (1716–1779), John Henderson (1747–1785), J. P. Kemble (1757–1823), and W. H. Betty (1792–1874). Next to these, C. Kemble (1775–1854), C. M. Young (1777–1856), Edmund Kean (1787–1833), Henry Irving (1840–), etc.

(In the History of Hamblet, Hamlet's father is called "Horvendille.")

Hammer (The), Judas Asamonæus, surnamed Maccabæus, "the hammer" (B.C. 166–136).

Charles Martel (689–741). (See MARTEL.)

On prétend qu'on lui donna le surnom de Martel parcequ'il avait écrasé comme avec un marteau les Sarrasins qui, sous la conduite d'Abdérame, avaient envahi la France.—Bouillet.

∴ "Asmodêus" (q.v.) is quite another person.

Hammer and Scourge of England, sir William Wallace (1270–1305).

Hammer of Heretics.

1. PIERRE D'AILLY, president of the council which condemned John Huss (1350–1425).

2. ST. AUGUSTINE, "the pillar of truth and hammer of heresies" (395–430).—Hakewill.

3. JOHN FABER. So called from the title of one of his works, Malleus Heresticorum (1470–1541).

Hammer of Scotland, Edward I. His son inscribed on his tomb: "Edwardus Longus Scotorum Malleus hic est" (1239, 1272–1307).

Hammerlein (Claus), the smith, one of the insurgents at Liège.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Hamond, captain of the guard of Rollo ("the bloody brother" of Otto, and duke of Normandy). He stabs the duke, and Rollo stabs the captain; so that they kill each other.—Fletcher: The Bloody Brother (1639).

Hampden (John) was born in London, but after his marriage lived as a country squire. He was imprisoned in the gate-house for refusing to pay a tax called ship-money, imposed without the authority of parliament. The case was tried in the Exchequer Chamber, in 1637, and given against him. He threw himself heart and soul into the business of the Long Parliament, and commanded a troop in the parliamentary army. In 1643 he fell in an encounter with prince Rupert; but he has ever been honoured as a patriot, and the defender of the rights of the people (1594–1643).

[Shall] Hampden no more, when suffering Freedom calls,
Encounter Fate, and triumph as he falls?
Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, I. (1799).

Some village Hampden, that with dauntless breast,
The little tyrant of his fields withstood.
Gray: Elegy (1749).

Hamzu-ben-Ahmud, who, on the death of hakeem B'amr-ellah (called the incarnate deity and last prophet), was the most zealous propagator of the new faith, out of which the semi-Mohammedan sect called Druses subsequently arose.

N.B.—They were not called "Druses" till the eleventh century, when one of their "apostles," called Durzi, led them from Egypt to Syria, and the sect was called by his name.

Han (Sons of), the Chinese; so called from Hân, the village in which Lieou-pang was chief. Lieou-pang conquered all who opposed him, seized the supreme power, assumed the name of Kao-hoâng-tee, and the dynasty, which lasted 422 years, was "the fifth imperial dynasty, or that of Hân." It gave thirty emperors, and the seat of government was Yn. With this dynasty the modern history of China begins (B.C. 202 to A.D. 220).

Hand over Fist, very fast.

He's making money hand over fist.—Boldrewood: Robbery under Arms, ch. xxviii.

Hands are said to be of five classes.

1. Idealistic, delicate, with long and pointed fingers.
2. Realistic, with short square fingers.
3. Energetic, with spatulated fingers.
4. Philosophic, with rough fingers, knotted at the points.
5. Mixed, with the characteristics mixed.

Both hands are inspected in cheiromancy.
The ball of the thumb is called the Mount of Venus.
The hollow of the palm is the Plain of Mars.

Hand-sale, shaking hands to bind a contract or bargain.

Handel's Monument, in Westminster Abbey, is by Roubiliac. It was the last work executed by this sculptor.

Handjar, a Turkish poniard.

Handsome Englishman (The). The French used to call John Churchill, duke of Marlborough, Le Bel Anglais (1650–1722).

Handsome Swordsman (The). Joachim Murat was popularly called Le Beau Sabreur (1767–1815).

Handy (Sir Abel), a great contriver of inventions which would not work, and of retrograde improvements. Thus "his infallible axletree" gave way when it was used, and the carriage was "smashed to pieces." His substitute for gunpowder exploded, endangered his life, and set fire to the castle. His "extinguishing powder" might have reduced the flames, but it was not mixed, nor were his patent fire-engines in workable order. He said to Farmer Ashfield—

"I have obtained patents for tweezers, tooth-picks, and tinder-boxes . . . and have now on hand two inventions, . . . one for converting saw-dust into deal boards, and the other for cleaning rooms by steam-engines."—Act I. sc. 2.

Lady Nelly Handy (his wife), formerly a servant in the house of Farmer Ashfield. She was full of affectations, overbearing, and dogmatical. Lady Nelly tried to "forget the dunghill whence she grew, and thought herself the Lord knows who." Her extravagance was so great that sir Abel said his "best coal-pit would not find her in white muslin, nor his India bonds in shawls and otto of roses." It turned out that her first husband Gerald, who had been absent twenty years, reappeared and claimed her. Sir Abel willingly resigned his claim, and gave Gerald £5000 to take her off his hands.

Robert Handy (always called Bob), son of sir Abel by his first wife. He fancied he could do everything better than any one else. He taught the post-boy to drive, but broke the horse's knees. He taught Farmer Ashfield how to box, but got knocked down by him at the first blow. He told Dame Ashfield he had learnt lace-making at Mechlin, and that she did not make it in the right way; but he spoilt her cushion in showing her how to do it. He told lady Handy (his father's bride) she did not know how to use the fan, and showed her; he told her she did not know how to curtsey, and showed her. Being pestered by this popinjay beyond endurance, she implored her husband to protect her from further insults. Though light-hearted, Bob was "warm, steady, and sincere." He married Susan, the daughter of Farmer Ashfield.—Morton: Speed the Plough (1798).

Handy Andy, a novel by S. Lover (1842).

Hang up his Fiddle (To), to give a thing up as hopeless or as a bad job; to decamp; to discontinue.

When a man loses his temper, and ain't cool, he might as well hang up his fiddle.—Sam Slick.

If a man at 40 is not in a fair way to get his share of the world's spoils, he might as well hang up his fiddle, and be content to dig his way through life as best he may.—Dow: Sermons, p. 78.

Hang up his Fiddle with his Hat (To), to lose all cheerfulness on return home; to be merry abroad and morose at home.

Mr. N. can be very agreeable when I am absent, and anywhere but at home. I always say, he hangs his fiddle up with his hat.—Theodore Hook: Gilbert Guerney.

The Provençals have a proverb, Gau de carriers, doulou d'oustan ("Joy abroad, grief at home"). (See Daudet's novel Numa Roumestan. The gist of the story turns on this proverb.)

Hanging Judge (The), sir Francis Page (1718–1741).

The earl of Norbury, chief justice of the Common Pleas in Ireland from 1820 to 1827, was also stigmatized with the same unenviable title.

Hank. I have him at a hank. Je le tiens dans mes filets. Here hank means the quantity of thread, etc., tied into one skein or hank.

Hank for Hank, on perfect equality, neither being able to outrun the other. In sea phrase it means the situation of two vessels which run the same road, and are par le travers l'un de l'autre.

The Dolphin and Cerberus turned up the river hank for hank, neither being able to get the windward of the other.

 Hanks are rings used instead of grommets to confine the staysails.

Hannah, housekeeper to Mr. Fairford the lawyer.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Hannah, the heroine of Mrs. Inchbald's story of Nature and Art (1796).

Hannibal ad Portas! or Attila ad portas! a cry of alarm at the near approach of a formidable enemy, especially an army of invaders. Attila and Hannibal were to the Romans the "scourges of the gods."

Hanno, a slave, chiefly famous for the description of his death.—Dr. John Moore: Zeluco (a novel, 1789).

Hanover Rat. The Jacobites used to affirm that the rat was brought over by the Hanoverians when they succeeded to the crown.

Curse me the British vermin, the rat,—
I know not whether he came in the Hanover ship.
Tennyson: Maud, II. v. 6.

Hans, a simple-minded boy of five and twenty, in love with Esther, but too shy to ask her in marriage. He is a "Modus" in a lower social grade; Esther is a "cousin Helen," who laughs at him, loves him, and teaches him how to make love to her and win her.—Knowles: The Maid of Mariendorpt (1838).

Hans, the pious ferryman on the banks of the Rhine.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Hans (Adrian), a Dutch merchant, killed at Boston.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Hans of Iceland, a novel by Victor Hugo (1824). Hans is a stern, savage, Northern monster, ghastly and fascinating.

Hans von Rippach [Rip-pak], i.e. Jack of Rippach. Rippach is a village near Leipsic. This Hans von Rippach is a "Mons. Nong-tong-pas," that is, a person asked for, who does not exist. The "joke" is to ring a house up at some unseasonable hour, and ask for Herr Hans von Rippach or Mons. Nong-tong-pas.

Hanson (Neil), a soldier in the castle of Garde Doloureuse.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Hanswurst, the "Jack Pudding" of old German comedy, but almost annihilated by Gottsched, in the middle of the eighteenth century. He was clumsy, huge in person, an immense gourmand, and fond of vulgar practical jokes.

N.B.—The French "Jean Potage," the Italian "Macaroni," and the Dutch "Pickel Herringe," were similar characters.

Hapmouche (2 syl.), i.e. "fly-catcher," the giant who first hit upon the plan of smoking pork and neats' tongues. —Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, ii. 1 (1533).

Happer or Hob, the miller who supplies St. Mary's Convent.

Mysie Happer, the miller's daughter. Afterwards, in disguise, she acts as the page of sir Piercie Shafton, whom she marries.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Happuck, a magician, brother of Ulin the enchantress. He was the instigator of rebellion, and intended to kill the sultan Misnar at a review, but Misnar had given orders to a body of archers to shoot the man who was left standing when the rest of the soldiers fell prostrate in adoration. Misner went to the review, and commanded the army to give thanks to Allah for their victory, when all fell prostrate except Rappuck, who was thus detected, and instantly despatched.—Sir C. Morell [James Ridley]: Tales of the Genii ("The Enchanter's Tale," vi., 1751).

Have we prevailed against Ulin and Happuck, Ollemand and Tasnar, Akabuck and Desra, and shall we fear the contrivance of a poor vizier?—Tales of the Genii, vii. (1751).

Happy Old Couple (The), a ballad which tells the tale of Darby and Joan (q.v.).

Happy Valley (The), in the kingdom of Amhara. It was here the royal princes and princesses of Abyssinia lived. It was surrounded by high mountains, and was accessible only by one spot under a cave. This spot was concealed by woods and closed by iron gates.—Dr. Johnson: Rasselas (1759).

Har'apha, a descendant of Anak the giant of Gath. He went to mock Samson in prison, but durst not venture within his reach.—Milton: Samson Agonistes (1632).

Har'bothel (Master Fabian), the squire of sir Aymer de Valence.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Hard Times, a novel by C. Dickens (1854), dramatized in 1867, and called Under the Earth, or The Sons of Toil. Bounderby, a street arab, raised himself to banker and cotton prince. When 55 years of age, he proposed marriage to Louisa, daughter of Thomas Gradgrind, Esq., J.P., and was accepted. One night the bank was robbed of £150, and Bounderby believed Stephen Blackpool to be the thief, because he had dismissed him, being obnoxious to the mill hands; but the culprit was Tom Gradgrind, the banker's brother-in-law, who lay perdu for a while, and then escaped out of the country. In the dramatized version, the bank was not robbed at all, but Tom merely removed the money to another drawer for safe custody.

Hardcastle (Squire), a jovial, prosy, but hospitable country gentleman of the old school. He loves to tell his long-winded stories about prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough. He says, "I love everything that's old—old friends, old times, old manners, old books, old wine" (act i. 1), and he might have added, "old stories."

Mrs. Hardcastle, a very "genteel" lady indeed. Mr. Hardcastle is her second husband, and Tony Lumpkin her son by her former husband. She is fond of "genteel" society, and the last fashions. Mrs. Hardcastle says, "There's nothing in the world I love to talk of so much as London and the fashions, though I was never there myself" (act ii. 1). Her mistaking her husband for a highwayman, and imploring him on her knees to take their watches, money, all they have got, but to spare their lives: "Here, good gentleman, whet your rage upon me, take my money, my life, but spare my child!" is infinitely comic (act iv. sc. 1).

The princess, like Mrs. Hardcastle, was jolted to a jelly.—Lord Lennox: Celebrities, i. 1.

Miss Hardcastle, the pretty, bright-eyed, lively daughter of squire Hardcastle. She is in love with young Marlow, and "stoops" to a pardonable deceit "to conquer" his bashfulness and win him.—Goldsmith: She Stoops to Conquer (1773).

Har'die (Mr.), a young lawyer, in the introduction of sir W. Scott's Heart of Midlothian (1818).

Hardouin (2 syl.). Jean Hardouin, the jesuit, was librarian to Louis XIV. He doubted the truth of all received history; denied that the Æne'id was the work of Virgil, or the Odes of Horace the production of that poet. He placed no credence in medals and coins; regarded all councils before that of Trent as chimerical; and looked on all Jansenists as infidels (1646–1729).

Hardy (Mr.), father of Letitia. A worthy little fellow enough, but with the unfortunate gift of "foreseeing" everything (act v. sc. 4).

Letitia Hardy, his daughter, the fiancée of Dor'icourt. A girl of great spirit and ingenuity, beautiful and clever. Dorlcourt dislikes her without knowing her, simply because he has been betrothed to her by his parents; but she wins him by stratagem. She first assumes the airs and manners of a raw country hoyden, and disgusts the fastidious man of fashion. She then appears at a masquerade, and wins him by her many attractions. The marriage is performed at midnight, and, till the ceremony is over, Doricourt has no suspicion that the fair masquerader is his affianced Miss Hardy. —Mrs. Cowley: The Belle's Stratagem (1780).

Hare's Bread, Pain de lièvre, supposed to be a bread-food with hares. This plant is the arum or cuckoo-pint, from which arrowroot is often made.

Harebell. The harebell of England is the wild hyacinth, but the Scottish harebell is a campanula, generally called the "bluebell of Scotland." Hare meaning "wild," or "heath," enters into several flower-names, as "hare's blossom," "hare's foot," "hare's tail" (a grass), "hare's bread," etc.; some of which are also called heath, as "heath bell," the bluebell of Scotland, etc.

Hare'dale (Geoffrey), brother of Reuben the uncle of Emma Haredale. He was a papist, and incurred the malignant hatred of Gashford (lord George Gordon's secretary) by exposing him in Westminster Hall. Geoffrey Haredale killed sir John Chester in a duel, but made good his escape, and ended his days in a monastery.

Reuben Haredale (2 syl.), brother of Geoffrey, and father of Emma Haredale. He was murdered.

Emma Haredale, daughter of Reuben, and niece of Geoffrey with whom she lived at "The Warren." Edward Chester loved Emma Haredale.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Harefoot (Harold). So Harold I. was called, because he was swift of foot as a hare (1035-1040).

Hargrave, a man of fashion. The hero and title of a novel by Mrs. Trollope (1843).

Harlequin. Menage derives the word from Achille de Harley, a comedian of Paris (1536-1616).

Sous le règne de Henri III., une troupe de comédiens Italiens vint donner des representations à Paris. L'un de ces comédiens, celui qui avait le talent de plaire le plus au public, fut très bien accueilli par la famille de Harlay, qui complait alors parmi ses membres le celèbre président de ce nom. Les camarades lui donnèrent, à cause de l'amitié que lui avait témoignée cette famille, le surnom d'Harlequino (petit Harlay); d'Harlequin les Parisiens firent Arlequin, et c'est ainsi que le nom de l'un de nos plus grands magistrats est devenu en francisant, celui du bouffon le plus trivial des théâtres de foire.—Revue de Deux Mondes.

Harley, "the man of feeling." A man of the finest sensibilities and unbounded benevolence, but bashful as a maiden.—Mackenzie: The Man of Feeling (1771).

The principal object of Mackenzie is . . . to reach and sustain a tone of moral pathos by representing the effect of incidents . . . upon the human mind . . . especially those which are just, honourable, and intelligent.—Sir W. Scott.

Harlot (The Infamous Northern), Elizabeth Petrowna empress of Russia (1709-1761).

Har'lowe (Clarissa), a young lady, who, to avoid a marriage to which her heart cannot consent, but to which she is urged by her parents, casts herself on the protection of a lover, who most scandalously abuses the confidence reposed in him. He afterwards proposes marriage; but she rejects his proposal, and retires to a solitary dwelling, where she pines to death with grief and shame. —Richardson: The History of Clarissa Harlowe (1749).

The dignity of Clarissa under her disgrace . . . reminds us of the saying of the ancient poet, that a good man struggling with the tide of adversity and surmounting it, is a sight upon which the immortal gods might look down with pleasure.—Sir W. Scott.

The moral elevation of this heroine, the saintly purity which she preserves amidst scenes of the deepest depravity and the most seductive gaiety, and the never-failing sweetness and benevolence of her temper, render Clarissa one of the brightest triumphs of the whole range of imaginative literature.—Chambers: English Literature, ii. 161.

Harl'weston Fountains, near St. Neot's, in Huntingdon. There are two, one salt and the other fresh. The salt fountain is said to cure dimness of sight, and the sweet fountain to cure the itch and leprosy. Drayton tells the legend of these two fountains at the beginning of song xxii. of his Polyolbion (1622).

Harm set, Harm get.

On est souvent près dans son propre piège. (See HOIST.)

In German—

Wer einem eine Grube gräbt
Fällt oft selbst hinein.

Har'machis (-kis), the hypothetical writer of Rider Haggard's Cleopatra. Harmachis is supposed to be a model of manly strength and beauty, and, being the direct descendant of the Pharaohs of Egypt, was crowned king by the revolters against the Macedonian Cleopatra. He entered the court with intent to kill Cleopatra, but fell in love with her, and Cleopatra, to serve her ends, encouraged his suit till Antony came on the scene.

Charmion, the favourite of Cleopatra, being in love with Harmachis, was jealous of the queen, and plotted with him to compass her death and the downfall of the triumvir. They succeed. Charmion kills herself, and Harmachis ends his life in captivity.—H. Rider Haggard: Cleopatra (1889).

Harmon (John), alias JOHN ROKESMITH, Mr. Boffin's secretary. He lodged with the Wilfers, and ultimately married Bella Wilfer. He is described as "a dark gentleman, 30 at the utmost, with an expressive, one might say, a handsome face."—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1864).

∴ For explanation of the mystery, see vol. I. ii. 13.

Harmo'nia's Necklace or Bracelet, an unlucky possession, something which brings evil to its possessor. Harmonia was the daughter of Mars and Venus. On the day of her marriage with king Cadmos, she received a necklace made by Vulcan for Venus. This unlucky ornament afterwards passed to Sem'elê, then to Jocasta, then to Argîa (wife of Polynices), then Eriphy'lê, but was equally fatal in every case. Finally it was hung in the temple of Apollo at Delphos. It was made by the Cyclops, of emeralds and cut diamonds. (See UNLUCKY.)—Ovid: Metaph., iv. 5; Statius: Thebaid, ii.

"Harmon'ia," also called Hermion'ea, is frequently confounded with Hermîonê (called in English Her-mī'-o-ne) daughter of Menelaos and Helen, quite another person; but many persons talk of "Hermionê's Necklace." (See HERMIONE; GOLD OF NIBELUNGEN; and GOLD OF TOLOSA.)

Harmonious Blacksmith (The). The tale is that one day, while Handel was walking through Edgware, he sought shelter from a shower in a smithy, where the blacksmith was singing, and accompanied himself with the strokes of his hammer on the anvil; and this furnished Handel with the score of his famous "Harmonious Blacksmith." In Whitchurch, Middlesex, there is a tombstone to William Powell, buried February 27, 1780, commemorating the event, erected by subscription in 1868. The blacksmith Powell was parish clerk at the time. (See Schoelcher: Life of Handel, 65.)

The truth of this very plausible tale is denied by a correspondent in Notes and Queries, March 21, 1868, p. 230. At any rate, the name of Powell seems to be incorrect.

¶ A similar tale is told of Pythagoras.

Intently considering whether it would be possible to devise a certain instrumental aid to the hearing, . . . he one day passed near a stithy, and was struck by the sound produced as the hammers beat out a piece of iron on an anvil. . . . He recognized in these sounds the diapason, the diapente, and the diatessaron harmony. . . . Going then into the stithy, he discovered that the difference of sound arose from the different sizes of the hammers, and not from the difference of force employed in giving the strokes, nor yet from any difference in the shape of the hammers. . . . From this hint he constructed his musical scale.—Iamblichus: Life of Pythagoras, xxvi.

¶ The same tale is also told of Tubalcain.

Tuball hadde greete lykynge to here the hamers sowne, and he fonde proporcions and acorde of melodye by weyght of the hamers; and so he used them moche in the acorde of melodye, but he was not fynder of the Instrumentes of musyke.—Higden: Polycronycon.

Harmony (Mr.), a general peacemaker. When he found persons at variance, he went to them separately, and told them how highly the other spoke and thought of him or her. If it were man and wife, he would tell the wife how highly her husband esteemed her, and would apply the "oiled feather" in a similar way to the husband. "We all have our faults," he would say, "and So-and-so knows it, and grieves at his infirmity of temper; but though he contends with you, he praised you to me this morning in the highest terms." By this means he succeeded in smoothing many a ruffled mind.—Inchbald: Every One has His Fault (1794).

Harness Prize, a prize competed for triennially, on some Shakespearian subject. The prize consists of three years' accumulated interest of £500. It was founded by the Rev. Mr. Harness, and accepted by the University of Cambridge. The first prize was awarded in 1874.

Harold "the Dauntless," son of Witikind the Dane. "He was rocked on a buckler, and fed from a blade." Harold married Eivir, a Danish maid, who had waited on him as a page.—Sir W. Scott: Harold the Dauntless (1817).

Harold (Childe), a man of good birth, lofty bearing, and peerless intellect, who has exhausted by dissipation the pleasures of youth, and travels. Sir Walter Scott calls him "lord Byron in a fancy dress." In canto i. the childe visits Portugal and Spain (1809); in canto ii., Turkey in Europe (1810); in canto iii., Belgium and Switzerland (1816); in canto iv., Venice, Rome, and Florence (1817).

(Lord Byron was only 21 when he began Childe Harold, and 28 when he finished it.)

Harold, an historical romance containing an account of the battle of Hastings, where this last of the Saxon kings was slain, and William the Norman succeeded to the crown of England.—Lord Lytton (1850).

Tennyson wrote a dramatic poem on the same subject (1876).

Harold Transome (2 syl.), son of Mrs. Transome and Matthew Jermyn the lawyer; he was in love with Esther Lyon, but his love was not reciprocated.—George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross): Felix Holt, the Radical (1866).

Haroun-al-Raschid, caliph, of the Abbasside race, contemporary with Charlemagne, and, like him, a patron of literature and the arts. The court of this caliph was most splendid, and under him the caliphate attained its greatest degree of prosperity (765–809).

 Many of the tales in the Arabian Nights are placed in the caliphate of Haroun-al-Raschid, as the histories of "Am'inê," "Sinbad the Sailor," "Aboulhasson and Sheinselnihar," "Noureddin," "Codadad and his Brothers," "Sleeper Awakened," and "Cogia Hassan." In the third of these the caliph is a principal actor.

Har'pagon, the miser, father of Cléante (2 syl.) and Elise (2 syl.). Both Harpagon and his son desire to marry Mariane (3 syl.); but the father, having lost a casket of money, is asked which he prefers—his casket or Mariane, and as the miser prefers the money, Cléante marries the lady. Harpagon imagines that every one is going to rob him, and when he loses his casket, seizes his own arm in the frenzy of passion. He proposes to give his daughter in marriage to an old man named Anselme, because no "dot" will be required; and when Valère (who is Elise's lover) urges reason after reason against the unnatural alliance, the miser makes but one reply, "sans dot." "Ah," says Valère, "il est vrai, cela ferme la bouche à tout, sans dot." Harpagon, at another time, solicits Jacques (1 syl.) to tell him what folks say of him; and when Jacques replies he cannot do so, as it would make him angry, the miser answers, "Point de tout, au contraire, c'est me faire plaisir." But when told that he is called a miser and a skinflint, he towers with rage, and beats Jacques in his uncontrolled passion.

"Le seigneur Harpagon est de tous les humains l'humain le moins humain, le mortel de tous les mortels le plus dur et le plus serré" (ii. 5). Jacques says to him, "Jamais on ne parle de vous que sous les noms d'avare, de ladre, de vilain, et de fesse-Matthieu" (iii. 5).—Molière: L'Avare (1667).

Har'palus, in Spenser's Colin Clout's Come Home Again, is said to be meant for the earl of Dorset (1595).

Harpax, centurion of the "Immortal Guard."—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Harpê (2 syl.), the cutlass with which Mercury killed Argus, and with which Perseus (2 syl.) subsequently cut off the head of Medusa.

Harpier, a familiar spirit of mediæval demonology.

Harpier cries, "'Tis time, 'tis time!"
Shakespeare: Macbeth, act iv. sc. 1 (1606).

Harpoc'rates (4 syl.), the god of silence. Cupid bribed him with a rose not to divulge the amours of Venus. Harpocratês is generally represented with his second finger on his mouth.

He also symbolized the sun at the end of winter, and is represented with a cornucopia in one hand and a lotus in the other. The lotus is dedicated to the sun, because it opens at sunrise and closes at sunset.

I assured my mistress she might make herself quite easy on that score [i.e. my making mention of what was told me], for I was the Harpocrates of trusty valets.—Lesage: Gil Blas, iv. 2 (1724).

Harriet, the elder daughter of sir David and lady Dunder, of Dunder Hall. She was in love with Scruple, whom she accidentally met at Calais; but her parents arranged that she should marry lord Snolts, a stumpy, "gummy" old nobleman of five and forty. To prevent this hateful marriage, Harriet consented to elope with Scruple; but the flight was intercepted by sir David, who, to prevent a scandal, consented to the marriage, and discovered that Scruple, both in family and fortune, was a suitable son-in-law.—Colman: Ways and Means (1788).

Harriet [Mowbray], the daughter of colonel Mowbray, an orphan without fortune, without friends, without a protector. She marries clandestinely Charles Eustace.—J. Poole: The Scapegoat.

Harrington, a novel by Maria Edgeworth (1811).

Harriot [Russet], the simple, unsophisticated daughter of Mr. Russet. She loves Mr. Oakly, and marries him, but becomes a "jealous wife," watching her husband like a lynx, to find out some proof of infidelity, and distorting every casual remark as evidence thereof. Her aunt, lady Freelove, tries to make her a woman of fashion, but without success. Ultimately, she is cured of her idiosyncrasy. — Colman: The Jealous Wife (1761).

Harris (Mrs.), a purely imaginary character, existing only in the brain of Mrs. Sarah Gamp, and brought forth on all occasions to corroborate the opinions and trumpet the praises of Mrs. Gamp the monthly nurse.

"'Mrs. Harris,' I says to her, . . . 'If I could afford to lay out all my fellow-creeturs for nothink, I would gladly do it; sich is the love I bears 'em.'" Again: "What!" said Mrs. Gamp, "you bage creetur! Have I know'd Mrs. Harris five and thirty year, to be told at last that there an't no sich a person livin'? Have I stood her friend in all her troubles, great and small, for it to come to sich a end as this, with her own sweet picter hanging up afore you all the time, to shame your Bragian words? Go along with you!"—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit, xlix. (1843).

Mrs. Harris is the "Mde. Benolton" of French comedy.—The Times.

 Mrs. Gamp and Mrs. Harris have Parisian sisters in Mde. Pochet and Mde. Gibou, by Henri Monnier (1805-1877).

Harris. (See SLAWKEN-BERGIUS.)

Harrison (Dr.), the model of benevolence, who nevertheless takes in execution the goods and person of his friend Booth, because Booth, while pleading poverty, was buying expensive and needless jewellery.—Fielding: Amelia (1751).

Harrison (Major-General), one of the parliamentary commissioners.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Harrison, the old steward of lady Bellenden, of the Tower of Tillietudlem. —Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Har'rowby (John), of Stocks Green, a homely, kind-hearted, honest Kentish farmer, with whom lieutenant Worthington and his daughter Emily take lodgings. Though most desirous of showing his lodger kindness, he is constantly wounding his susceptibilities from blunt honesty and want of tact.

Dame Harrowby, wife of Farmer Harrowby.

Stephen Harrowby, son of Farmer Harrowby, who has a mania for soldiering, and calls himself "a perspiring young hero."

Mary Harrowby, daughter of Farmer Harrowby.—Colman: The Poor Gentleman (1802).

HARRY (Sir), the servant of a baronet. He assumed the airs and title of his master, and was addressed as "Baronet," or "sir Harry." He even quotes a bit of Latin: "O tempora! O Moses!"—Rev. J. Townley: High Life Below Stairs (1759).

Harry (Blind), a British minstrel, who wrote in ten-syllable couplets the romance of Wallace (about 1400).

Harry (Blind), the minstrel, friend of Henry Smith.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Harry (The Great), a man-of-war built in the reign of Henry VII. It was destroyed by fire in 1553.

Towered the Great Harry, crank and tall.
Longfellow. The Building of the Ship.

N.B.—Henri Grâce de Dieu was quite another vessel. It was built by Henry VIII., and was 1000 tons burthen.

Harry Paddington, a highwayman in the gang of captain Macheath. Peachum calls him "a poor, petty-larceny rascal, without the least genius;" and says, "even if the fellow were to live six months, he would never come to the gallows with credit."—Gay: The Beggar's Opera (1727).

Hart Royal (A). A stag not less than six years old is a hart, and if it had been hunted by the king and escaped alive it was called a hart royal. If in the hunt a hart wandered out of the forest, the king issued a proclamation that no one should hurt it, and when it was brought back to the forest it was called a "hart royal proclaimed." Every hart royal has its antlers.

Hart'house (2 syl.), a young man who begins life as a cornet of dragoons, but, being bored with everything, coaches himself up in statistics, and comes to Coketown to study facts. He falls in love with Louisa [née Gradgrind], wife of Josiah Bounderby, banker and mill-owner, but, failing to induce the young wife to elope with him, he leaves the place.—Dickens: Hard Times (1854).

Hartley (Adam), afterwards Dr. Hartley. Apprentice to Dr. Gray.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Hartwell (Lady), a widow, courted by Fountain, Bellamore, and Harebrain. —Fletcher: Wit without Money (1639).

Harût and Marût, two angels sent by Allah to administer justice upon earth, because there was no righteous judgment among men. They acted well till Zoha'ra, a beautiful woman, applied to them, and then they both fell in love with her. She asked them to tell her the secret name of God, and immediately she uttered it, she was borne upwards into heaven, where she became the planet Venus. As for the two angels, they were imprisoned in a cave near Babylon.—Sale's Korân, ii.

Harvest Bells, the Gentiana pneumonthe, the flowers of which are bell-shaped, intensely blue, in pride about September.

HASSAN, caliph of the Ottoman empire, noted for his splendour and hospitality. In his seraglio was a beautiful young slave named Leila (2 syl.), who had formed an attachment to "the Giaour" (2 syl.). Leila is put to death by the emir, and Hassan is slain near mount Parnassus by the giaour [djow'-er].—Byron: The Giaour (1813).

Hassan, the story-teller, in the retinue of the Arabian physician.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Hassan (Al), the Arabian emir of Persia, father of Hinda. He won the battle of Cadessia, and thus became master of Persia.—Moore: Lalla Rookh ("The Fire-Worshippers," 1817).

Hassan, surnamed Al Habbal ("the ropemaker"), and subsequently Cogia ("merchant"); his full name was then Cogia Hassan Alhabbal. Two friends, named Saad and Saadi, tried an experiment on him. Saadi gave him 200 pieces of gold, in order to see if it would raise him from extreme poverty to affluence. Hassan took ten pieces for immediate use, and sewed the rest in his turban; but a kite pounced on his turban and carried it away. The two friends, after a time, visited Hassan again, but found him in the same state of poverty; and, having heard his tale, Saadi gave him another 200 pieces of gold. Again he took out ten pieces, and, wrapping the rest in a linen rag, hid it in a jar of bran. While Hassan was at work, his wife exchanged this jar of bran for fuller's earth, and again the condition of the man was not bettered by the gift. Saad now gave the ropemaker a small piece of lead, and this made his fortune thus: A fisherman wanted a piece of lead for his nets, and promised to give Hassan for Saad's piece whatever he caught in his first draught. This was a large fish, and in it the wife found a splendid diamond, which was sold for 100,000 pieces of gold. Hassan now became very rich, and when the two friends visited him again, they found him a man of consequence. He asked them to stay with him, and took them to his country house, when one of his sons showed him a curious nest, made out of a turban. This was the very turban which the kite had carried off, and the money was found in the lining. As they returned to the city, they stopped and purchased a jar of bran. This happened to be the very jar which the wife had given in exchange, and the money was discovered wrapped in linen at the bottom. Hassan was delighted, and gave the 380 pieces to the poor.—Arabian Nights ("Cogia Hassan Alhabbal").

Hassan (Abou), the son of a rich merchant of Bagdad, and the hero of the tale called "The Sleeper Awakened" (q.v.).—Arabian Nights.

Hassan Aga, an infamous renegade, who reigned in Algiers, and was the sovereign there when Cervantes (author of Don Quixote) was taken captive by a Barbary corsair in 1574. Subsequently, Hassan bought the captive for 500 ducats, and he remained a slave till he was redeemed by a friar for 1000 ducats.

> Every day this Hassan Aga was hanging one, impaling another, cutting off the ears or breaking the limbs of a third . . . out of mere wantonness.—Cervantes (1605).

Hassan ben Sabah, the old man of the mountain, founder of the sect called the Assassins.

Dr. Adam Clark has supplemented Rymer's Fœdera with two letters by this sheik. This is not the place to point out the want of judgment in these addenda.

Hastie (Robin), the smuggler and publican at Annan.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Hastings, the friend of young

Marlow, who entered with him the house of squire Hardcastle, which they mistook for an inn. Here the two young men met Miss Hardcastle and Miss Neville. Marlow became the husband of the former; and Hastings, by the aid of Tony Lumpkin, won the latter.—Goldsmith: She Stoops to Conquer (1773).

Hastings, one of the court of king Edward IV.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Haswell, the benevolent physician who visited the Indian prisons, and for his moderation, benevolence, and judgment, received the sultan's signet, which gave him unlimited power.—Mrs. Inchbald: Such Things Are (1786).

Hat (A White) used to be a mark of radical proclivities, because orator Hunt, the great demagogue, used to wear a white hat during the Wellington and Peel administration.

Hat worn in the Royal Presence. Lord Kingsale acquired the right of wearing his hat in the presence of royalty by a grant from king John. Lord Forester is possessed of the same right, from a grant confirmed by Henry VIII.

N.B.—All Spanish grandees had, at one time, the privilege of being covered in the presence of the monarch. Hence, when the duke of Alva presented himself before Margaret duchess of Parma, she bade him to remain covered.—Motley: The Dutch Republic, part iii.

Hats and Caps, two political factions of Sweden in the eighteenth century. The "Hats" were partisans in the French interest, and were so called because they wore French chapeaux. The "Caps" were partisans in the Russian interest, and were so called because they wore the Russian caps as a badge of their party.

Hatchet, a harlot. (See Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, bk. iv. prologue.)

Hatchway (Lieutenant Jack), a retired naval officer on half-pay, living with commodore Trunnion as a companion.—Smollett: The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle (1751).

Who can read the calamities of Trunnion and Hatchway, when run away with by their mettled steeds . . . without a good hearty burst of honest laughter!—Sir W. Scott.

Hatef [i.e. the deadly], one of Mahomet's swords, confiscated from the Jews when they were exiled from Medina.

Hater. Dr. Johnson said, "Sir, I like a good hater." This is not altogether out of character with the words, "Thou art neither cold nor hot: I would thou wert cold or hot" (Rev. iii. 15).

Rough Johnson, the great moralist, professed
Right honestly he "liked an honest hater."
Byron: Don Juan, xiii. 7 (1821).

Hatim (Generous as), an Arabian expression. Hatim was a Bedouin chief, famous for his warlike deeds and boundless generosity. His son was contemporary with Mahomet the prophet.

Hatter. Mad as a hatter, or mad as a viper. Atter is Anglo-Saxon for "adder" or "viper," so called from its venomous character; dter, "poison;" atter-drink or dttor-drink, "a poisonous drink;" dttor-like, "snake-like."

Hatteraick (Dirk), alias JANS JANSON, a Dutch smuggler-captain, and accomplice of lawyer Glossin in kidnapping Henry Bertrand. Meg Merrilies conducts young Hazlewood and others to the smuggler's cave, when Hatteraick shoots her, is seized, and imprisoned. Lawyer Glossin visits the villain in prison, when a quarrel ensues, in which Hatteraick strangles the lawyer, and then hangs himself.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time. George II.).

Hatto, archbishop of Mentz, was devoured by mice in the Mouse-tower, situate in a little green island in the midst of the Rhine, near the town of Bing'en. Some say he was eaten by rats, and Southey, in his ballad called God's Judgment on a Wicked Bishop, has adopted the latter tradition.

This Hatto, in the time of the great famine of 914, when he saw the poor exceedingly oppressed by famine, assembled a great company of them together into a barne at Kaub, and burnt them . . . because he thought the famine would sooner cease if those poor folks were despatched out of the world, for, like mice, they only devour food, and are of no good whatsoever. . . . But God . . . sent against him a plague of mice, . . . and the prelate retreated to a tower in the Rhine as a sanctuary; . . . but the mice chased him continually, . . . and at last he was most miserably devoured by those sillie creatures.—Coryat: Crudities, 571, 572.

(Giraldus Cambrensis, in his Itinerary, xi. 2, says, "the larger sort of mice are called rati." This may account for the substitution of rats for mice in the legend.)

¶ The legend of Hatto is very common, as the following stories will prove:—

(1) Widerolf, bishop of Strasburg (997), was devoured by mice in the seventeenth year of his episcopate, because he suppressed the convent of Seltzen on the Rhine.

(2) Bishop Adolf, of Cologne, was devoured by mice or rats in 1112.

(3) Freiherr von Güttingen collected the poor in a great barn, and burnt them to death, mocking their cries of agony. He, like Hatto, was invaded by mice, ran to his castle of Güttingen, in the lake of Constance, whither the vermin pursued him, and ate him alive. The Swiss legend says the castle sank in the lake, and may still be seen. Freiherr von Güttingen had three castles, one of which was Moosburg.

(4) Count Graaf, in order to enrich himself, bought up all the corn. One year a sad famine prevailed, and the count expected to reap a rich harvest by his speculation; but an army of rats, pressed by hunger, invaded his barns, and, swarming into his Rhine tower, fell on the old baron, worried him to death, and then devoured him.—Legends of the Rhine.

(5) A similar story is told by William of Malmesbury, History, ii. 313 (Bohn's edit.).

(Some of the legends state that the "mice" were in reality "the souls of the murdered people.")

Mauth, in German, means a toll or custom-house, and probably gave rise to these traditions, for a toll on corn was always unpopular. Mauth tower, Maus tower, and Moose tower are quite near enough to be interchangeable.

Hatton (Sir Christopher), "the dancing chancellor." He first attracted the attention of queen Elizabeth by his graceful dancing at a masque. He was made by her chancellor and knight of the Garter.

¶ M. De Lauzun, the favourite of Louis XIV., owed his fortune also to the manner in which he danced in the king's quadrille.

You'll know sir Christopher by his turning out his toes,—famous, you know, for his dancing.—Sheridan: The Critic, ii. 1 (1779).

Haud passibus æquis ("not with equal strides"), a rival, but not an equal. Impar congressus Achilli.

Haunted Man (The), Redlaw, in the Christmas tale so called by Dickens (1847).

Hautlieu (Sir Artevan de), in the introduction of sir W. Scott's Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Hautlieu (The lady Margaret de), first disguised as sister Ursula, and afterwards affianced to sir Malcolm Fleming.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Havelok (2 syl.) or Hablok, the orphan son of Birkabegn king of Denmark, was exposed at sea through the treachery of his guardians. The raft drifted to the coast of Lincolnshire, where it was discovered by Grim, a fisherman, who reared the young foundling as his own son. It happened that some twenty years later certain English nobles usurped the dominions of an English princess, and, to prevent her gaining any access of power by a noble alliance, resolved to marry her to a peasant. Young Havelok was selected as the bridegroom, but having discovered the story of his birth, he applied to his father Birkabegn for aid in recovering his wife's possessions. The king afforded him the aid required, and the young foundling became in due time both king of Denmark and king of that part of England which belonged to him in right of his wife.—Haveloc the Dane (by the trouveurs).

The ancient seal of the town of Grimsby contained the names of "Gryme and Havloc."

Havisham (Miss), an old spinster who lived in Satis House, the daughter of a rich brewer. She was engaged to be married to Compeyson, who threw her over on the wedding morn. From this moment she became fossilized, always wore her wedding-dress, with a lace veil from head to foot, white satin shoes, bridal flowers in her hair, jewels round her neck and on her fingers. She adopted a little girl, three years old, who married and left her. She somehow set fire to herself, and, though Pip succeeded in saving her, she died soon after from the shock; and Satis House was pulled down.

Estella Havisham, the adopted child of Miss Havisham, by whom she was brought up. She was proud, handsome, and self-possessed. Pip loved her, and probably she reciprocated his love, but she married Bentley Drummle, who ill-treated her, and died, leaving her a young widow. The tale ends with these words—

I [Pip] took her hand in mine, and we went out of the ruined place. As the morning mists had risen . . . when I first left the forge, so the evening were rising now; and . . . I saw no shadow of another parting from her.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

N.B.—Estella was the natural daughter of Magwitch (the convict) and Molly the housekeper of Mr. Jaggers the lawyer. It was Jaggers who introduced the child at the age of three to Miss Havisham to adopt.

Havre, in France, is a contraction of Le havre de notre dame de Grace.

Haw'cubite (3 syl.), a street bully. After the Restoration, we had a succession of these disturbers of the peace: first came the Muns, then followed the Tityre Tūs, the Hectors, the Scourers, the Nickers, the Hawcubites, and after them the Mohawks, the most dreaded of all.

Hawk (Sir Mulberry), the bear-leader of lord Frederick Verisopht. He is a most unprincipled roué, who sponges on his lordship, snubs him, and despises him. "Sir Mulberry was remarkable for his tact in ruining young gentlemen of fortune."

With all the boldness of an original genius, sir Mulberry had struck out an entirely new course of treatment, quite opposed to the usual method, his custom being . . . to keep down those he took in hand, and to give them their own way . . . Thus he made them his butts in a double sense, for he emptied them with good address, and made them the laughing-stocks of society. —Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby, xix. (1838).

Hawk. To know a hawk from a handsaw, a corruption of "from a hernshaw" (i.e. a heron), meaning that one is so ignorant that he does not know a hawk from a heron—the bird of prey from the game flown at. The Latin proverb is, Ignorat quid distent æra lupinis ("He does not know sterling money from counters"). Counters used in games were by the Romans called "lupins."

Hawkeye. So Deerslayer (Natty Bumppo) is called by the red man, or Mingo.—Fenimore Cooper: The Deerslayer, chap. vii. (1841).

Hawkins, boatswain of the pirate vessel.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Hawthorn, a jolly, generous old fellow, of jovial spirit, and ready to do any one a kindness; consequently, everybody loves him. He is one of those rare, unselfish beings, who "loves his neighbour better than himself."—Bickerstaff: Love in a Village (1762).

Dignum [1765-1827], in such parts as "Hawthorn," was superior to every actor since the days of Beard.—Dictionary of Musicians.

Hay (Colonel), in the king's army.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Hay (John), fisherman near Ellangowan.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Haydn could never compose a single bar of music unless he could see on his finger the diamond ring given him by Frederick II.

Haysel or Haysele, means the hay-time or season; as barksel is the season for stripping the oak bark for tanning. (Anglo-Saxon, sæl, "season," "time.") In East Anglia these terms are still in use—men give each other "the sæl of the day;" and speaking of a scapegrace's irregularities, he is said to come in "at all meals and sæls."

Hayston (Frank), laird of Bucklaw and afterwards of Girnington. In order to retrieve a broken fortune, a marriage was arranged between Hayston and Lucy Ashton. Lucy, being told that her plighted lover (Edgar master of Ravenswood) was unfaithful, assented to the family arrangement, but stabbed her husband on the wedding night, went mad, and died. Frank Hayston recovered from his wound and went abroad.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

(In Donizetti's opera, Hayston is called "Arturio.")

Hazlewood (Sir Robert), the old baronet of Hazlewood.

Charles Hazlewood, son of sir Robert. In love with Lucy Bertram, whom he marries.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Headed. Soft-headed. To have one's upper rooms unfurnished. In French, Avoir bien des chambres à louer dans sa tête.

Headings of a Chapter (The), a brief summary of the contents. The heads of a sermon are its main divisions; the heads of a speech, the items dwelt on.

Head'rigg (Cuddie), a ploughman in lady Bellenden's service. (Cuddie = Cuthbert.)—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Headstone (Bradley), a schoolmaster, of very determinate character and violent passion. He loves Lizzie Hexham with an irresistible mad love, and tries to kill Eugene Wrayburn out of jealousy. Grappling with Rogue Riderhood on Plashwood Bridge, Riderhood fell backwards into the smooth pit, and Headstone over him. Both of them perished in the grasp of a death-struggle. — Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1864).

Heart of England (The), Warwickshire, the middle county.

That shire which we "The Heart of England" call.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Heart of Midlothian, the old jail or tolbooth of Edinburgh, taken down in 1817.

Sir Walter Scott has a novel so called (1818), the plot of which is as follows:—Effie Deans, the daughter of a Scotch cow-feeder, is seduced by George Staunton, son of the rector of Willingham; and Jeanie is cited as a witness on the trial which ensues, by which Effie is sentenced to death for child-murder. Jeanie promises to go to London and ask the king to pardon her half-sister, and, after various perils, arrives at her destination. She lays her case before the duke of Argyll, who takes her in his carriage to Richmond, and obtains for her an interview with the queen, who promises to intercede with his majesty (George II.) on her sister's behalf. In due time the royal pardon is sent to Edinburgh, Effie is released, and marries her seducer, now sir George Staunton; but soon after the marriage sir George is shot by a gipsy boy, who is in reality his illegitimate son. On the death of her husband, lady Staunton retires to a convent on the Continent. Jeanie marries Reuben Butler the presbyterian minister. The novel opens with the Porteous riots.

Heartall (Governor), an old bachelor, peppery in temper, but with a generous heart and unbounded benevolence. He is as simple-minded as a child, and loves his young nephew almost to adoration.

Frank Heartall, the governor's nephew; impulsive, free-handed, and free-hearted, benevolent and frank. He falls in love with the Widow Cheerly, the daughter of colonel Woodley, whom he sees first at the opera. Ferret, a calumniating rascal, tries to do mischief, but is utterly foiled. —Cherry: The Soldier's Daughter (1804).

Heartfree (Jack), a railer against women and against marriage. He falls half in love with lady Fanciful, on whom he rails, and marries Belinda.—Vanbrugh: The Provoked Wife (1693).

Hearth Tax (The), 1662, a tax of two shillings for every stove and fire-hearth, payable on the feast of St. Michael and the feast of "the Blessed Virgin Mary" (13, 14 Car. II. cap. 20). Repealed in 1689 by William III.

Heartwell, Modely's friend. He falls in love with Flora, a niece of old Farmer Freehold. They marry, and are happy.—J. P. Kemble: The Farm-house.

Heathen Chinee (The), a humorous poem by Bret Harte, an American humourist. It begins thus—

Which I wish to remark,—
And my language is plain,—
That for ways that are dark,
And for tricks that are vain,
The heathen Chinee is peculiar.
Which the same I would rise to explain.
Bret Harte. The Heathen Chinee (1870).

Heatherblutter (John), gamekeeper of the baron of Bradwardine (3 syl.) at Tully Veolan.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Heaven, according to Dantê, begins from the top of mount Purgatory, and rises upwards through the seven planetary spheres, the sphere of the fixed stars, the primum mobilê, and terminates with the empyrêum, which is the seat of God. (See PARADISE.) Milton preserves the same divisions. He says, "they who to be sure of paradise, dying put on the garb of monks"—

. . . pass the planets seven, and pass the "rixt,
And that crystallin sphere whose balance weighs
The trepidation talked, and that first moved . . . and now
At foot of heaven's ascent they lift their feet, when lo! A violent cross wind . . . blows them . . . awry
Into the devious air.
Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 481, etc. (1665).

Heaven and Earth (A Mystery), a dramatic poem by lord Byron (1822), founded on the text—

And it came to pass . . . that the sons of God saw the daughters of men, that they were fair; and they took them wives of all whom they chose.—Gen. vi. 2.

Heaven-sent Minister (The), William Pitt (1759–1806).

Hebe (2 syl.), goddess of youth, and cup-bearer of the immortals before Ganymede superseded her. She was the wife of Herculês, and had the power of making the aged young again. (See PLOUSINA.)

Hebê are they to hand ambrosia, mix
The nectar.
Tennyson: The Princess, iii.

Hebreo'rum Contuber'nium, the Ghetto of Rome; so called because it was the quarter assigned to the Jews. It was guarded by Roman halberdiers, who opened the five massive gates at sunrise to let the Jews into the city, and closed them at sunset. In London the Jews' quarter was Jewry.

Hebrew Melodies, a series of twenty-three poems, by lord Byron: the last but one is that exquisite poem, The Destruction of [the army of] Sennacherib.

Heb'ron, in the first part of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden, stands for Holland; but in the second part, by Tate, it stands for Scotland. Hebronite similarly means in one case a Hollander, and in the other a Scotchman.

Hec'ate (2 syl.), called in classic mythology Hec'-a-te (3 syl.); a triple deity, being Luna in heaven, Dian'a on earth, and Proserpine (3 syl.) in hell. Hecate presided over magic and enchantments, and was generally represented as having the head of a horse, dog, or boar, though sometimes she is represented with three bodies, and three heads looking different ways. Shakespeare introduces her in his tragedy of Macbeth (act iii. sc. 5), as queen of the witches; but the witches of Macbeth have been largely borrowed from a drama called The Witch, by Thom. Middleton (died 1626). The following is a specimen of this indebtedness:—

Hecate. Black spirits and white, red spirits and grey,
Mingle, mingle, mingle, you that mingle may . . .
1st Witch. Here's the blood of a bat.
Hecate. Put in that, oh put in that.
2nd Witch. Here's libbard's bane.
Hecate. Put in again, etc., etc.
Middleton: The Witch.

And yonder pale-faced Hecate there, the moon,
Doth give consent to that is done in darkness.
Kyd: The Spanish Tragedy (1597).

Hector, one of the sons of Priam king of Troy. This bravest and ablest of all the Trojan chiefs was generalissimo of the allied armies, and was slain in the last year of the war by Achillês, who, with barbarous fury, dragged the dead body insultingly thrice round the tomb of Patroclos and the walls of the beleagured city.—Homer: Iliad.

Hector de Mares (1 syl.), or Marys, a knight of the Round Table, brother of sir Launcelot du Lac.

The gentle Gaw'ain's courteous love,
Hector de Mares, and Pellinore.
Sir W. Scott: Bridal of Triermain, ii. 13 (1813).

Hector of Germany, Joachim II. elector of Brandenburg (1514–1571).

Hector of the Mist, an outlaw, killed by Allan M'Aulay.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Hectors, street bullies. Since the Restoration, we have had a succession of street brawlers, as the Muns, the Tityre Tûs, the Hectors, the Scourers, the Nickers, the Hawcubites, and, lastly, the Mohawks, worst of them all.

Hedge-hog, i.e. the edge-hog—the "hog" with spines or sharp points.

Hedging, in the language of the turf, is so betting pro and con. that, whether the race is won or lost, the better is the gainer.

Heels (Out at). Out at heels. In French, Il a des bas troués, or Les bas ont des trous aux talons.

Heeltap (Crispin), a cobbler, and one of the corporation of Garratt, of which Jerry Sneak is chosen mayor.—Foote: The Mayor of Garratt (1763).

Heep (Uri'ah), a detestable sneak, who is everlastingly forcing on one's attention that he is so 'umble. Uriah is Mr. Wickfield's clerk, and, with all his ostentatious 'umility, is most designing, malignant, and intermeddling. His infamy is dragged to light by Mr. Micawber.

"I am well aware that I am the 'umblest person going, let the other be who he may. My mother is likewise a very 'umble person. We live in an 'umble abode, Master Copperfield, but have much to be thankful for. My father's former calling was 'umble—he was a sexton."—Dickens: David Copperfield, xvi. (1849).

Heidelberg (Mrs.), the widow of a wealthy Dutch merchant, who kept her brother's house (Mr. Sterling, a City merchant). She was very vulgar, and, "knowing the strength of her purse, domineered on the credit of it." Mrs. Heidelberg had most exalted notions "of the qualaty," and a "perfect contempt for everything that did not smack of high life." Her English was certainly faulty, as the following specimens will show:—farden, wulgar, spurrit, pertest, Swish, kivers, purliteness, etc. She spoke of a pictur by Raphael-Angelo, a po-shay, dish-abille, parfet naturals [idiots], most genteelest, and so on. When thwarted in her overbearing ways, she threatened to leave the house and go to Holland to live with her husband's cousin, Mr. Vanderspracken.—Colman and Garrick: The Clandestine Marriage (1766).

Heimdall (2 syl.), in Celtic mythology, was the son of nine virgin sisters. He dwelt in the celestial fort Himinsbiorg, under the extremity of the rainbow. His ear was so acute that he could hear "the wool grow on the sheep's back, and the grass in the meadows." Heimdall was the watch or sentinel of Asgard (Olympus), and even in his sleep was able to see everything that transpired. (See FINE-EAR, p. 367.)

Heimdall's Horn. At the end of the world, Heimdall will wake the gods with his horn, when they will be attacked by Muspell, Lok!, the wolf Fenris, and the serpent Jormungandar.

> And much he talked of . . .
> And Heimdal's horn and the day of doom.
> Longfellow: The Wayside Inn (interlude, 1863).

Heinrich (Poor) or "Poor Henry," the hero and title of a minnesong, by Hartmann von der Aue [Our]. Heinrich was a rich nobleman, struck with leprosy, and was told he would never recover till some virgin of spotless purity volunteered to die on his behalf. As Heinrich neither hoped nor even wished for such a sacrifice, he gave the main part of his possessions to the poor, and went to live with a poor tenant farmer, who was one of his vassals. The daughter of this farmer heard by accident on what the cure of the leper depended, and went to Salerno to offer herself as the victim. No sooner was the offer made than the lord was cured, and the damsel became his wife (twelfth century).

Heir-at-Law. Baron Duberly being dead, his "heir-at-law" was Henry Morland, supposed to be drowned at sea, and the next heir was Daniel Dowlas, a chandler of Gosport. Scarcely had Daniel been raised to his new dignity, when Henry Morland, who had been cast on Cape Breton, made his appearance, and the whole aspect of affairs was changed. That Dowlas might still live in comfort, suitable to his limited ambition, the heir of the barony settled on him a small life annuity.—Colman: Heir-at-Law (1797).

Heir of Linne (The), a ballad in two parts, date and author unknown. Having spent all his money in riotous living, he sold his estates to John o' the Scales for a third of their value, reserving for himself only "a poor and lanesome lodge, that stood far off in a lonely glen"—in accordance with his father's dying wish—

> For when all the world doth frown on thee,
> Thou there shalt find a faithful friend.

After he had spent this money also, he hied to the lodge, and hung himself with a rope he found hanging there; this rope broke, and in his fall he discovered three chests full of money. He now went and asked John o' the Scales to lend him forty pence, which he refused to do. One of the guests reproved him, saying he had made a capital bargain. "Bargain!" cried Scales; "why, he shall have it back for a hundred marks less than I gave for it." "Done!" said the heir of Linne, and, to John's mortification, laid the money on the table. Thus he recovered his estates, and made the guest who befriended him his forester and bailiff.

Heir of Redcliffe (The), a novel by Miss Young (1853).

Hel'a, queen of the dead. She is daughter of Loki and Angurbo'da (a giantess). Her abode, called Helheim, was a vast castle in Niflheim, in the midst of eternal snow and darkness.

> Down the yawning steep he rode,
> That leads to Hela's drear abode.
> Gray: Descent of Odin (1757).

HELEN, wife of Menelāos of Sparta. She eloped with Paris, a Trojan prince, while he was the guest of the Spartan king. Menelaos, to avenge this wrong, induced the allied armies of Greece to invest Troy; and, after a siege of ten years, the city was taken and burnt to the ground.

¶ A parallel incident occurred in Ireland. Dervorghal, wife of Tiernan O'Ruark, an Irish chief who held the county of Leitrim, eloped with Dermod M'Murchad prince of Leinster. Tiernan induced O'Connor king of Connaught to avenge this wrong. So O'Connor drove Dermod from his throne. Dermod applied to Henry II. of England, and this was the incident which brought about the conquest of Ireland (1172).—Leland: History of Ireland (1773). (See also FLORINDA, p. 377.)

Helen, the heroine of Miss Edgeworth's novel of the same name. This was her last and most popular tale (1834).

Helen, cousin of Modus the bookworm. She loved her cousin, and taught him there was a better "art of love" than that written by Ovid.—Knowles: The Hunchback (1831).

> Miss Taylor was the original "Helen," and her performance was universally pronounced to be exquisite and unsurpassable. On one occasion, Mr. Knowles admired a rose which Miss Taylor wore in the part, and after the play she sent it him. The poet, in reply, sent the lady a copy of verses.—Walter Lacy.

Helen (Lady), in love with sir Edward Mortimer. Her uncle insulted sir Edward in a county assembly, struck him down, and trampled on him. Sir Edward, returning home, encountered the drunken ruffian and murdered him. He was tried for the crime, and acquitted "without a stain upon his character;" but the knowledge of his deed preyed upon his mind, so that he could not marry the niece of the murdered man. After leading a life of utter wretchedness, sir Edward told Helen that he was the murderer of her uncle, and died.—Colman: The Iron Chest (1796).

Helen [HESKETH], the heroine of Lockhart's novel called Reginald Dalton (1823).

Helen [MOWBRAY], in love with Walsingham. "Of all grace the pattern—person, feature, mind, heart, everything, as nature had essayed to frame a work where none could find a flaw." Allured by lord Athunree to a house of ill-fame, under pretence of doing a work of charity, she was seen by Walsingham as she came out, and he abandoned her as a wanton. She then assumed male attire, with the name of Eustace. Walsingham became her friend, was told that Eustace was Helen's brother, and finally discovered that Eustace was Helen herself. The mystery being cleared up, they became man and wife.—Knowles: Woman's Wit, etc. (1838).

Helen of Kirconnell, a ballad. The story is that Helen, a Scotch lady, was the lady-love of Adam Flemming; and one day standing on the banks of a river, a rival suitor pointed his gun at Adam, when Helen threw herself before him and was shot dead. The two rivals then fought, and the murderer fell and was slain.

 Wordsworth embodies the same story in his Ellen Irwin; and John Mayne, a ballad, was published by sir Walter Scott in 1815.

Helen of One's Troy, the ambition of our heart, the object for which we live and die. The allusion, of course, is to that Helen who eloped with Paris, and thus brought about the siege and destruction of Troy.

> For which men all the life they here enjoy
> Still fight, as for the Helens of their Troy.
> Lord Brooke: Treatie of Humane Learning (1554–1628).

Helen's Fire (feu d'Hélène), a corposant, called "St. Helme's" or "St. Elmo's fire" by the Spaniards; the "fires of St. Peter and St. Nicholas" by the Italians; and "Castor and Pollux" by the ancient Romans. This electric light will sometimes play about the masts of ships. If only one appears, foul weather may be looked for; but if two or more flames appear, the worst of the storm is over.

> Whene'er the sons of Leda shed
> Their star-lamps on our vessel's head,
> The storm-winds cease, the troubled spray
> Falls from the rocks, clouds pass away,
> And on the bosom of the deep
> In peace the angry billows sleep.
> E. C. B.—Horace: Odes, xii. 25 32.

Hel'ena (St.), daughter of Coel duke of Colchester and afterwards king of Britain. She married Constantius (a Roman senator, who succeeded "Old king Cole"), and became the mother of Constantine the Great. Constantius died at York (A.D. 306). Helena is said to have discovered at Jerusalem the sepulchre and cross of Jesus Christ.—Geoffrey: British History, v. 6 (1142).

¶ This legend is told of the Colchester arms, which consist of a cross and three crowns (two atop and one at the foot of the cross).

> At a considerable depth beneath the surface of the earth were found three crosses, which were instantly recognized as those on which Christ and the two thieves had suffered death. To ascertain which was the true cross, a female corpse was placed on all three alternately: the two first tried produced no effect, but the third instantly reanimated the body.—Brady: Clavis Calendaria, 1812.
> Herself in person went to seek that holy cross
> Whereon our Saviour died, which found, as it was sought;
> From Salem unto Rome triumphantly she brought.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1612).

Hel'ena, only daughter of Gerard de Narbon the physician. She was left under the charge of the countess of Rousillon, whose son Bertram she fell in love with. The king sent for Bertram to the palace, and Helena, hearing the king was ill, obtained permission of the countess to give him a prescription left by her late father. The medicine cured the king, and the king, in gratitude, promised to make her the wife of any one of his courtiers that she chose. Helena selected Bertram, and they were married; but the haughty count, hating the alliance, left France, to join the army of the duke of Florence. Helena, in the mean time, started on a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Jacques le Grand, carrying with her a letter from her husband, stating that he would never see her more "till she could get the ring from off his finger." On her way to the shrine, she lodged at Florence with a widow, the mother of Diana, with whom Bertram was wantonly in love. Helena was permitted to pass herself off as Diana, and receive his visits, in one of which they exchanged rings. Both soon after this returned to the countess de Rousillon, where the king was, and the king, seeing on Bertram's finger the ring which he gave to Helena, had him arrested on suspicion of murder. Helena now explained the matter, and all was well, for all ended well.—Shakespeare: All's Well that Ends Well (1598).

Helena is a young woman seeking a man in marriage. The ordinary laws of courtship are reversed, the habitual feelings are violated; yet with such exquisite address this dangerous subject is handled, that Helena's forwardness loses her no honour. Delicacy dispenses with her laws in her favour.—Charles Lamb.

Hel'ena, a young Athenian lady, in love with Demĕtrius. She was the playmate of Her'mia, with whom she grew up, as "two cherries on one stalk." Egĕus (3 syl.), the father of Hermia, promised his daughter in marriage to Demetrius; but when Demetrius saw that Hermia loved Lysander, he turned to Helena, who loved him dearly, and married her.—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

Hel'ice (3 syl.), the Great Bear.

Night on the earth poured darkness; on the sea
The wakeful sailor to Orion's star
And Helicē turned heedful.
Apollōnius Rhodius: The Argonautic Expedition.

Hel'icon, a mountain of Bœo'tia, sacred to the Muses.

From Helicon's harmonious springs
A thousand rills their mazy progress take.
Gray: Progress of Poesy (1757).

Hel'inore (Dame), wife of Malbecco, who was jealous of her, and not without cause. When sir Paridel, sir Sat'yrane (3 syl.), and Britomart (as the Squire of Dames) took refuge in Malbecco's house, Dame Helinore and sir Paridel had many "false belgardes" at each other, and talked love with glances which needed no interpreter. Helinore, having set fire to the closet where Malbecco kept his treasures, eloped with Paridel, while the old miser stopped to put out the fire. Paridel soon tired of the dame, and cast her off, leaving her to roam whither she listed. She was taken up by the satyrs, who made her their dairy-woman, and crowned her queen of the May.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 9, 10 (1590).

Heliotrope renders the bearer of it invisible. Boccaccio calls it a stone, but Solinus says it is the herb so called. (See INVISIBILITY.)

Amid this dread exuberance of woe
Ran naked spirits, winged with horrid fear;
Nor hope had they of crevice where to hide,
Or heliotrope to charm them out of view.
Dante: Inferno, xxiv. (1306).

Heliotrope is a stone of such extraordinary virtue that the bearer of it is effectually concealed from the sight of all present.—Boccaccio: Decameron (day viii. 3).

Viridi colore est gemma heliotropion, non ita acuto sed nubilo magis et represso, stellis punicels superspersa. Causa nominis de effectu lapidis est et potestate. Dejecta in labris scutis radios solis mutat sanguineo repercussu, utraque aqua splendorem aëris abjicit et avertit. Etiam illud posse dicitur, ut herba ejusdem nominis mixta et præcantationibus legitimis consecrata eum, a quocunque gestabitur, subtrahat visibus oblatorum.—Solinus: Geog., xl.

Hel Keplein, a mantle of invisibility, belonging to the dwarf-king Laurin. (See INVISIBILITY.)—The Heldenbuch (thirteenth century).

Hell, according to Mohammedan belief, is divided into seven compartments: (1) for Mohammedans, (2) for Jews, (3) for Christians, (4) for Sabians, (5) for Magians, (6) for idolaters, (7) for hypocrites. All but idolaters and unbelievers will be in time released from torment.

Hell, Dante says, is a vast funnel, divided into eight circles, with ledges more or less rugged. Each circle, of course, is narrower than the one above, and the last goes down to the very centre of the earth. Before the circles begin, there is a neutral land and a limbo. In the neutral land wander those not bad enough for hell nor good enough for heaven; in the limbo, those who knew no sin but were not baptized Christians. Coming then to hell proper, circle 1, he says, is compassed by the river Achĕron, and in this division of inferno dwell the spirits of the heathen philosophers. Circle 2 is presided over by Minos, and here are the spirits of those guilty of carnal and sinful love. Circle 3 is guarded by Cerbĕrus, and this is the region set apart for gluttons. Circle 4, presided over by Plutus, is the realm of the avaricious. Circle 5 contains the Stygian Lake, and here flounder in deep mud those who in life put no restraint on their anger. Circle 6 (in the city of Dis) is for those who did violence to men by force or fraud. Circle 7 (in the city of Dis) is for suicides. Circle 8 (also in the city of Dis) is for blasphemers and heretics. After the eight circles come the ten pits or chasms of Malebolgē (4 syl.), the last of which is in the centre of the earth, and here, he says, is the frozen river of Cocy'tus. (See INFERNO.)

Hell Fire Clubs. Several clubs bearing this significant title existed in London during the early part of the eighteenth century. Little is known of their constitution and proceedings, but Robert Lloyd (1737–1764), author of The Actor and certain other fugitive poems, was a member of one of them. They were suppressed.

Hell Kettles, three deep pits, or ponds, filled with mineral water, between the River Tees and the River Skerne, near Darlington,

The Skern . . . spleth near her bank
Three black and horrid pits, which for their sulpherous [sic] sweat
"Hell Kettles" rightly called.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxix. (1622).

N.B.—One of the caverns is 19 feet 6 inches deep, another is 14 feet deep, and the third is 17 feet. These three communicate with each other. There is a fourth 5½ feet deep, which is quite separate from the other three.

Hell Paved with Good Intentions.—A Portuguese Proverb.

. . . saying "they meant well."
'Tis pity "that such meanings should pave hell."
Byron: Don Juan, viii. 25 (1822).

Hellebore (3 syl.), celebrated in maniacal cases.

And melancholy cures by sovereign hellebore.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Hellespont. Leander used to swim across the Hellespont to visit Hero, a priestess of Sestos. Lord Byron and lieutenant Ekenhead repeated the feat, accomplishing it in seventy minutes; the distance is four miles (allowing for drifting).

He could, perhaps, have passed the Hellespont,
As once (a feat on which ourselves we prided)
Leander, Mr. Ekenhead, and I did.
Byron: Don Juan, ii. 105 (1819).

Hellica'nus, the able and honest minister of Per'iclês, to whom he left the charge of Tyre during his absence. Being offered the crown, Hellicânus nobly declined the offer, and remained faithful to the prince throughout.—Shakespeare: Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

Helmet of Invisibility. The helmet of Perseus (2 syl.) rendered the wearer invisible. This was in reality the "Helmet of Ha'dês;" and after Perseus had slain Medu'sa he returned it, together with the winged sandals and magic wallet. The "gorgon's head" he presented to Minerva, who placed it in the middle of her ægis. (See INVISIBILITY.)

¶ Mambrino's helmet had the same magical power, though don Quixote, even in his midsummer madness, never thought himself invisible when he donned the barber's basin.

Heloise. La Nouvelle Héloïse, a romance by Jean Jacques Rousseau (1761).

Helvet'ia, Switzerland, modernized Latin for Ager Helvetiorum.

England's glory and Helvetia's charms.
Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, i. (1799).

The Helvetian Mountains, the Swiss Alps.

Twas sunset, and the ranz-des-vaches was sung,
And lights were o'er th' Helvetian Mountains flung,
That tinged the lakes like molten gold below.
Campbell: Theodoric (1824).

He'mera, sister of prince Memnon, mentioned by Dictys Cretensis. Milton, in his Il Penseroso, speaks of "prince Memnon's sister" (1638).

Hem'junah, princess of Cassimir', daughter of the sultan Zebene'zer; betrothed at the age of 13 to the prince of Georgia. As Hemjunah had never seen the prince, she ran away to avoid a forced marriage, and was changed by Ulin the enchanter into a toad. In this form she became acquainted with Misnar sultan of India, who had likewise been transformed into a toad by Ulin. Misnar was disenchanted by a dervise, and slew Ulin; whereupon the princess recovered her proper shape, and returned home. A rebellion broke out in Cassimir, but the "angel of death" destroyed the rebel army, and Zebenezer was restored to his throne. His surprise was unbounded when he found that the prince of Georgia and the sultan of India were one and the same person; and Hemjunah said, "Be assured, O sultan, that I shall not refuse the hand of the prince of Georgia, even if my father commands my obedience."—Sir C. Morell [J. Ridley]: Tales of the Genii ("Princess of Cassimir," viii., 1751).

Hemlock. Socratês the Wise and Phocion the Good were both by the Athenians condemned to death by hemlock juice, Socratês, at the age of 70 (B.C. 399) and Phocion at the age of 85 (B.C. 317).

Hemps'kirke (2 syl.), a captain serving under Wolfort the usurper of the earldom of Flanders.—Fletcher: The Beggars' Bush (1622).

Hen and Chickens (The), the Pleiades. Called in Basque Oiloa Chituekin (same meaning).—Miss Frere: Old Deccan Days, 27.

Henbane makes those who chance to eat of it "bray like asses or neigh like horses."

Hen'derson (Elias), chaplain at Lochleven Castle.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Henley (Orator), John Henley (1757-1788).

Henneberg (Count). One day a beggar-woman asked count Henneberg's wife for alms. The countess twitted her for carrying twins, whereupon the woman cursed her, with the assurance that "her ladyship should be the mother of 365 children." The legend says that the countess bore them at one birth, but none of them lived any length of time. All the girls were named Elizabeth, and all the boys John. They are buried, we are told, at the Hague.

Henriade (The), an historical poem in ten chants, by Voltaire (1724). The subject is the struggle of Henri IV. with the League. There are some well-drawn characters, some good descriptions, and the verse is harmonious; but Voltaire himself said, "Les Français n'ont pas la tête epique," and the Henriade is not an epic.

Henrietta Maria, widow of king Charles I., introduced in sir W. Scott's Peveril of the Peak (1823).

Henrietta Street, Cavendish Square, London, is so called in compliment to Henrietta Cavendish, daughter of John Holles duke of Newcastle, and wife of Edward second earl of Oxford and Mortimer. From these come "Edward Street," "Henrietta Street," "Cavendish Square," and "Holles Street." (See PORTLAND PLACE.)

Henriette (3 syl.), daughter of Chrysale (2 syl.) and Philaminte (3 syl.). She is in love with Clitandre, and ultimately becomes his wife. Philaminte, who is a blue-stocking, wants Henriette to marry Trissotin a bel esprit; and Armande the sister, also a bas bleu, thinks that Henriette ought to devote her life to science and philosophy; but Henriette loves woman's work far better, and thinks that her natural province is domestic life, with wifely and motherly duties. Her father Chrysale takes the same views of woman's life as his daughter Henriette, but he is quite under the thumb of his strong-minded wife. However, love at last prevails, and Henriette is given in marriage to the man of her choice. The French call Henriette "the type of a perfect woman," i.e. a thorough woman.—Molière: Les Femmes Savantes (1672).

Henrique (Don), an uxorious lord, cruel to his younger brother don Jamie. Don Henrique is the father of Asca'nio, and the supposed husband of Violan'te (4 syl.).—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Spanish Curate (1622).

HENRY, a soldier engaged to Louisa. Some rumours of gallantry to Henry's disadvantage having reached the village, he is told that Louisa is about to be married to another. In his despair he gives himself up as a deserter, and is condemned to death. Louisa now goes to the king, explains to him the whole matter, obtains her sweetheart's pardon, and reaches the jail just as the muffled drums begin to beat the death march.—Dibdin: The Deserter (1770).

Henry, son of sir Philip Blandford's brother. Both the brothers loved the same lady, but the younger married her; and sir Philip, in his rage, stabbed him, as it was thought, mortally. In due time, the young "widow" had a son (Henry), a very high-minded, chivalrous young man, greatly beloved by every one. After twenty years, his father reappeared under the name of Morrington, and Henry married his cousin Emma Blandford.—Morton: Speed the Plough (1798).

Henry (Poor), prince of Hoheneck, in Bavaria. Being struck with leprosy, he quitted his lordly castle, gave largely to the poor, and retired to live with a small cottage farmer named Gottlieb [Got.leeb], one of his vassals. He was told that he would never be cured till a virgin, chaste and spotless, offered to die on his behalf. Elsie, the farmer's daughter, offered herself, and after great resistance the prince accompanied her to Salerno to complete the sacrifice. When he arrived at the city, either the exercise, the excitement, or the charm of some relic, no matter what, had effected an entire cure, and when he took Elsie into the cathedral, the only sacrifice she had to make was that of her maiden name for lady Alicia, wife of prince Henry of Hoheneck.—Hartmann von der Aue (minnesinger): Poor Henry (twelfth century).

Henry II., king of England, introduced by sir W. Scott, both in The Betrothed and in The Talisman (1825).

Henry II. and Thomas à Becket. The story of Raymond and Pierre de Castelneau presents a marvellously exact parallel. Pierre de Castelneau, like Becket, was called "a martyr." Raymond comte de Toulouse said, in the hearing of others, "Que ce prêtre, à lui seul, l'empêchait de vivre en paix chezlin." On January 15, 1208, while Pierre was at Mass, two men drew near, and one of them thrust a lance into his side. Pierre fell, saying as he fell, "Seigneur, pardonnez-lui comme je lui pardonne."—Mgr.

Guérin: Les Petits Bollandistes, vol. i. p. 372.

Henry IV., in two parts. 1 Henry IV., from the deposition of Richard II. to the defeat and death of Henry Percy (Hotspur) at the battle of Shrewsbury, July 23, 1403. This part contains amongst the dramatis personæ the prince of Wales, sir John Falstaff, with Poins, Gadshill, Bardolph, Peto, and Mistress Quickly.—Shakespeare (1597).

2 Henry IV. continues the history from the battle of Shrewsbury to the death of the king. This part contains the same characters as those stated above (1598).

Henry V. continues the history of the two preceding plays, and contains an account of the battle of Agincourt, October 25, 1415. In act ii. sc. 3 Mrs. Quickly (now married to Pistol) relates the death of sir John Falstaff, and preparation for the marriage of Henry with princess Katherine, daughter of Charles VI. king of France. — Shakespeare ("Plaide by the Queenes Magesties players, 1598," and printed in 1600).

Henry VI., in three parts. Part 1, from the accession of Henry VI. to his marriage with Margaret of Anjou, a period of 23 years. It opens with the funeral procession of Henry V. This part contains the victories of Joan of Arc, the restitution of France to Charles the dauphin, nominally the viceroy of Henry VI., but really an independent king, and the loss of France to the English sceptre by right of conquest.—Shakespeare (1596).

2 Henry VI. begins with the marriage of the king to Margaret of Anjou, and terminates with the battle of St. Albans, in May, 1455, in which Richard duke of York took the king prisoner. This part contains the commencement of the wars of the White and Red Roses, the death of the good duke Humphrey, and the rebellion of Jack Cade.—Shakespeare (1597).

3 Henry VI. This part ends with the accession of Edward IV., who sends Margaret of Anjou, the queen consort of Henry VI., back to France.—Shakespeare. It first appeared in 1595.

The contentions of the two Roses continued till Henry VII. (a Lancastrian) married Elizabeth the daughter of Edward IV. (of York), and rightful heir to the throne. By this marriage the two factions of York and Lancaster were united.

Henry VIII. contains the divorce of Katharine, marriage of the king to Anne Boleyn, and birth of Elizabeth. It contains also the fall and death of cardinal Wolsey.—Shakespeare (1613, printed in folio 1623).

Henry [LEE], member for Virginia, on whose motion (July 4, 1776) the American congress published their declaration of independence, and erected the colonies into free and sovereign states.

Henry, the forest-born Demosthenês,
Whose thunder shook the Philip of the seas [Great Britain].
Byron: Age of Bronze, viii. (1821).

He'orot, the magnificent palace built by Hrothgar king of Denmark. Here "he distributed rings [treasure] at the feast."

Then was for the sons of the Geats a bench cleared in the beer hall; there the bold spirit, free from quarrel, went to sit. The thane observed his rank, and bore in his hand the twisted ale-cup . . . meanwhile the poet sang serene in Heorot; there was joy of heroes, no little pomp of Danes and Westerns.—Kemble's translation, Beowulf (Anglo-Saxon epic, sixth century).

Heos'phoros, the morning star.

O my light-bearer . . .
Ai, ai, Heosphoros!
Mrs. Browning: A Drama of Exile (1850).

He'par, the Liver personified, the arch-city in The Purple Island, by Phineas Fletcher. Fully described in canto iii. (1633).

Hephæs'tos, the Greek name for Vulcan. The Vulcanic period of geology is that unknown period before the creation of man, when the molten granite and buried metals were upheaved by internal heat, through overlying strata, sometimes even to the very surface of the earth.

The early dawn and dusk of Time,
The reign of dateless old Hephæstus.
Longfellow: The Golden Legend (1851).

Heraldic Supporters. Heraldi supporters do not appear to the arms of the kings of England before the time of Richard II., although a lion or and an eagle or falcon proper have been assigned to Edward III.

RICHARD II.—Two white harts collared and chained or; in Westminster Hall, they are represented as angels instead.
HENRY IV.—A white antelope and white swan.
HENRY V.—A lion and an antelope.
HENRY VI.—A lion and an antelope.
EDWARD IV.—A lion and black bull.
EDWARD V.—A yellow and a white lion.
RICHARD III.—A yellow lion and white boar.
HENRY VII.—A lion and a red dragon.
HENRY VIII.—A lion and a silver greyhound.
EDWARD VI.—Lion and dragon.
MARY.—A lion and a greyhound.
ELIZABETH.—A lion and a greyhound.
JAMES I. for the first time clearly defined the royal supporters, adopting the lion of England and unicorn of Scotland, as they have since been borne.
As a matter of fact, till the time of James I. the supporters varied a great deal.

Herbert (Sir William), friend of sir Hugo de Lacy.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Herbert [POCKET]. (See under POCKET.)

Her'culês shot Nessus for offering insult to his wife Di'-i-a-nī-ra, and the dying centaur told Diianira that if she dipped in his blood her husband's shirt, she would secure his love for ever. Herculês, being about to offer sacrifice, sent Lichas for the shirt; but no sooner was it warmed by the heat of his body than it caused such excruciating agony that the hero went mad, and, seizing Lichas, he flung him into the sea.

(Herculês Raving (Furens) is the subject of a Greek tragedy by Eurip'idês, and of a Latin one by Sen'eca.)

As when Alcidês . . . felt the envenomed robe, and tore,
Thro' pain, up by the roots Thessalian pines,
And Lichas from the top of Œta [a mount] threw
Into the Euboic Sea [the Archipelago].
Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 542, etc. (1665).

(Diodōrus says there were three Herculêses; Cicero recognizes six (three of which were Greeks, one Egyptian, one Cretan, and one Indian); Varro says there were forty-three.)

Herculês's Choice. When Herculês was a young man, he was accosted by two women, Pleasure and Virtue, and asked to choose which he would follow. Pleasure promised him all carnal delights, but Virtue promised him immortality. Herculês gave his hand to the latter, and hence led a life of great toil, but was ultimately received amongst the immortals.—Xenophon.

(Mrs. Barbauld has borrowed this allegory, but instead of Herculês has substituted Melissa, "a young girl," who is accosted by Dissipation and Housewifery. While somewhat in doubt which to follow Dissipation's mask falls off, and immedia ily Melissa beholds such a "wan and ghastly countenance," that she turns away in horror, and gives her hand to the more sober of the two ladies.—Evenings at Home, xix., 1795.)

Herculês's Horse, Arion, given him by Adrastos. It had the gift of human speech, and its feet on the right side were those of a man.

Herculês's Pillars, Calpê and Ab'yla, one at Gibraltar and the other at Ceuta (ku-tah). They were torn asunder by Alcidês on his route to Gadês (Cadis).

Herculês's Ports: (1) "Herculis Corsani Portus" (now called Porto-Ercolo, in Etruria); (2) "Herculis Liburni Portus" (now called Livorno, i.e. Leghorn); (3) "Herculis Monœci Portus" (now called Monaco, near Nice).

The Attic Herculês, Theseus (2 syl.), who went about, like Herculês, destroying robbers, and performing most wonderful exploits.

The Cretan Herculês. All the three Idæan Dactyls were so called: viz. Celmis ("the smelter"), Damnaměneus ("the hammer"), and Acmon ("the anvil").

The Egyptian Herculês, Sesostris (fl. B.C. 1500). Another was Som or Chon, called by Pausanias, Macĕris son of Amon.

The English Herculês, Guy earl of Warwick (890–958).

Warwick . . . thou English Herculês.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613)

The Farnesê Herculês, a statue, the work of Glykon, copied from one by Lysip'pos. Called Farne'sê (3 syl.) from its being placed in the Farnesê palace of Rome, where were at one time collected also the "Tori di Farnesê," the "Flora di Farnesê," and the "Gladiatorê di Farnesê." The "Herculês" and "Toro" are now at Naples. The "Farnesê Herculês" represents the hero exhausted by toil, leaning on his club; and in his left hand, which rests on his back, he holds one of the apples of the Hesperîdês.

∴ A copy of this famous statue stands in the Tuilleries gardens of Paris. An excellent description of the statue is given by Thomson, in his Liberty, iv.

The Indian Herculês, Dorsānês, who married Pandæa, and became the progenitor of the Indian kings. Belus is sometimes called "The Indian Herculês."

The Jewish Herculês, Samson (died B.C. 1152).

The Herculês of the North American Indians, Kwasind (q.v.).

The Russian Herculês, Rustum.

The Swedish Herculês, Starchatĕrus (first Christian century).

The Herculês of Music, Christoph von Glück (1714–1787).

Herculês Secundus. Commŏdus, the Roman emperor, gave himself this title. He was a gigantic idiot, who killed 100 lions, and overthrew 1000 gladiators in the amphitheatre (161, 180–192).

Heren-Suge (The), a seven-headed hydra of Basque mythology, like the Deccan cobras.

Herennius, the man who murdered Cicero.

Heretics (Hammer of), Pierre d'Ailly (1350–1425).

John Faber is also called "The Hammer of Heretics," from the title of one of his works (1470–1541). (See HAMMER.)

Heretics (Scientific.)

Feargal bishop of Saltzburg, an Irishman, was denounced as a heretic for asserting the existence of antipodês (*–784).

Galileo, the astronomer, was cast into prison for maintaining the "heretical opinion" that the earth moved round the sun (1564–1642).

Giordano Bruno was burnt alive for maintaining that matter is the mother of all things (1550–1600).

Her'eward (3 syl.), one of the Varangian guard of Alexius Comnênus, emperor of Greece.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Hereward the Wake (or Vigilant), lord of Born, in Lincolnshire. He plundered and burnt the abbey of Peterborough (1070); established his camp in the Isle of Ely, where he was joined by earl Morcar (1071); he was blockaded for three months by William I., but made his escape with some of his followers. This is the name and subject of one of Kingsley's novels.

Her'iot (Master George), goldsmith to James I.; guardian of lady Hermionê. —Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Herman, a deaf-and-dumb boy, jailer of the dungeon of the Giant's Mount. Meeting Ulrica, he tries to seize her, when a flash of lightning strikes the bridge on which he stands, and Herman is thrown into the torrent.—Stirling: The Prisoner of State (1847).

Herman (Sir), of Goodalricke, one of the preceptors of the Knights Templars.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Hermann, the hero of Goethe's poem Hermann und Dorothea. Goethe tells us that the object of this poem is to "show, as in a mirror, the great movements and changes of the world's stage."

Hermaph'rodite (4 syl.), son of Venus and Mercury. At the age of 15, he bathed in a fountain of Caria, when Sal'macis, the fountain nymph, fell in love with him, and prayed the gods to make the two one body. Her prayers being heard, the two became united into one, but still preserved the double sex.

> Not that bright spring where fair Hermaphrodite
> Grew into one with wanton Salmasis . . .
> . . . may dare compare with this.
> P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, v. (1633).

Hermegild or Hermyngyld, wife of the lord-constable of Northumberland. She was converted by Constance, but was murdered by a knight whose suit had been rejected by the young guest, in order to bring her into trouble. The villainy being discovered, the knight was executed, and Constance married the king, whose name was Alla. Hermegild, at the bidding of Constance, restored sight to a blind Briton.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("Man of Law's Tale," 1388).

(The word is spelt "Custaunce" 7 times, "Constance" 15 times, and "Constaunce" 17 times, in the tale.)

Hermegild, a friend of Oswald, in love with Gartha (Oswald's sister). He was a man in the middle age of life, of counsel sage, and great prudence. When Hubert (the brother of Oswald) and Gartha wished to stir up a civil war to avenge the death of Oswald, who had been slain in single combat with prince Gondibert, Hermegild wisely deterred them from the rash attempt, and diverted the anger of the camp by funeral obsequies of a most imposing character. The tale of Gondibert being unfinished, the sequel is not known.—Davenant: Gondibert (died 1688).

Her'mês (2 syl.), son of Maia; patron of commerce. Akenside makes Hermês say to the Thames, referring to the merchant-ships of England—

> By you [ships] my function and my honoured name
> Do I possess; while o'er the Bætic vale,
> Or thro' the towers of Memphis, or the palms
> By sacred Ganges watered, I conduct
> The English merchant.
> Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads (1767).

(The Bætis is the Guadalquivir; and the Bætic vale, Granâda and Andalucia.)

Hermês (2 syl.), the same as Mercury, and applied both to the god and to the metal. Milton calls quicksilver "volatil Hermês."

> So when we see the liquid metal fall,
> Which chemists by the name of Hermês call,
> Hoole's Ariosto, viii.

Hermês (St.), same as St. Elmo, Suerpo Santo, Castor and Pollux, etc. An electric light, seen occasionally on ships' masts.

> "They shall see the fire which saylors call St. Hermes, fly uppon their shippe, and alight upon the toppe of the mast."—De Loier: Treatise to Spectres, 67 (1605).

Hermês Trismegis'tus ["Hermês thrice-greatest"], the Egyptian Thoth, to whom is ascribed a host of inventions: as the art of writing in hieroglyphics, the first Egyptian code of laws, the art of harmony, the science of astrology, the invention of the lute and lyre, magic, etc. (twentieth century B.C.).

> The school of Hermês Trismegistus,
> Who uttered his oracles sublime
> Before the Olympiads.
> Longfellow: The Golden Legend (1851).

Her'mesind (3 syl.), daughter of Pelayo and Gaudio'sa. She was plighted to Alphonso, son of lord Pedro of Cantabria. Both Alphonso and Hermesind at death were buried in the cave of St. Antony, in Covadonga.

> Beauty and grace and innocence in her
> In heavenly union shone. One who had held
> The faith of elder Greece would sure have thought
> She was some glorious nymph of seed divine,
> Oread or Dryad . . . yea, she seemed
> Angel or soul beatified, from realms
> Of bliss . . . to earth re-sent.
> Southey: Roderick, etc., xvi. (1814).

Her'mia, daughter of Ege'us (3 syl.) of Athens, and promised by him in marriage to Demētrius. — Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

For the tale, see DEMETRIUS.

Herm'ion, the young wife of Damon "the Pythagore'an" and senator of Syracuse. — Banim: Damon and Pythias (1825).

HER'MIONÊ (4 syl.), only daughter of Menela'os and Helen. She became the wife of Pyrrhos or Neoptolĕmos, son of Achillês; but Orestês assassinated Pyrrhos and married Hermĭŏnê, who had been already betrothed to him.

 In English, generally called Hermi'one (4 syl.), accented on the i.

Hermi'one (4 syl.), or Harmon'ea, wife of Cadmus. Leaving Thebes, Cadmus and his wife went to Illyr'ia, and were both changed into serpents for having killed a serpent sacred to Mars.—Ovid: Metamorphoses, iv. 590, etc.

> Never since of serpent-kind
> Lovelier, not those that in Illyria [were] changed—
> Hermionê and Cadmus.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, ix. 505, etc. (1665).

Hermi'onê (4 syl.), wife of Leontês king of Sicily. The king, being jealous, sent her to prison, where she gave birth to a daughter, who, at the king's command, was to be placed on a desert shore and left to perish. The child was driven by a storm to the "coast" of Bohemia, and brought up by a shepherd who called her Per'dita. Florizel, the son of Polixenês king of Bohemia, fell in love with her, and they fled to Sicily to escape the vengeance of the angry king. Being introduced to Leontês, it was soon discovered that Perdita was his lost daughter, and Polixenês gladly consented to the union he had before objected to. Pauli'na (a lady about the court) now asked the royal party to her house to inspect a statue of Hermionê, which turned out to be the living queen herself. —Shakespeare: The Winter's Tale (1594).

Shakespeare and Scott, like Milton, always throw the accent on the second syllable, Her-mi'-o-ne.

Hermi'onê (4 syl.), only daughter of Helen and Menelā'os (4 syl.) king of Sparta. She was betrothed to Orestês, but, after the fall of Troy, was promised by her father in marriage to Pyrrhus king of Epirus. Orestês madly loved her, but Hermionê as madly loved Pyrrhus. When Pyrrhus fixed his affections on Androm'achê (widow of Hector, and his captive), the pride and jealousy of Hermionê were roused. At this crisis, an embassy led by Orestês arrived at the court of Pyrrhus, to demand the death of Asty'anax, the son of Andromachê and Hector, lest when he grew to manhood he might seek to avenge his father's death. Pyrrhus declined to give up the boy, and married Andromachê. The passion of Hermionê was now goaded to madness; and when she heard that the Greek ambassadors had fallen on Pyrrhus and murdered him, she stabbed herself and died.—Ambrose Philips: The Distressed Mother (1712).

(This was a famous part with Mrs. Porter (*-1762), and with Miss Young better known as Mrs. Pope, 1740-1797.)

Hermi'onê (4 syl.), daughter of Dannischemend the Persian sorcerer, mentioned in Donnerhugel's narrative.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Hermi'onê (The lady) or lady Ermin'ia Pauletti, privately married to lord Dalgarno.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Hermit, the pseudonym of the poet Hayley, the friend of Cowper.

Hermit (The), a ballad by Goldsmith (1766). It resembles The Friar of Orders Gray in Percy's Reliques, but was published before it. The hero and heroine are Edwin and Angelina (q.v.). It contains the well-known lines—

> Man wants but little here below,
> Nor wants that little long.

 Parnell wrote a poem called The Hermit (1710). It opens with these lines—

> Far in a wild, unknown to public view,
> From youth to age a reverend hermit grew;
> The moss his bed, the cave his humble cell,
> His food the fruits, his drink the crystal well:
> Remote from men, with God he passed his days,
> Prayer all his business, all his pleasure praise.

The English Hermit, Roger Crab, who subsisted on three farthings a week, his food being bran, herbs, roots, dock leaves, and mallows (*-1680).

Peter the Hermit, the instigator of the first crusade (1050-1115).

Hermit and the Youth (The). A hermit, desirous to study the ways of Providence, met with a youth, who became his companion. The first night, they were most hospitably entertained by a nobleman, but at parting the young man stole his entertainer's golden goblet. Next day, they obtained with difficulty of a miser shelter from a severe storm, and at parting the youth gave him the golden goblet. Next night, they were modestly but freely welcomed by one of the middle class, and at parting the youth "crept to the cradle where an infant slept, and wrung its neck;" it was the only child of their kind host. Leaving the hospitable roof, they lost their way, and were set right by a guide, whom the youth pushed into a river, and he was drowned. The hermit began to curse the youth, when lo! he turned into an angel, who thus explained his acts—

> "I stole the goblet from the rich lord to teach him not to trust in uncertain riches. I gave the goblet to the miser to teach him that kindness always meets its reward. I strangled the infant because the man loved it better than he loved God. I pushed the guide into the river because he intended at night-fall to commit a robbery." The hermit bent his head and cried, "The ways of the Lord are past finding out! but He doeth all things well. Teach me to say with faith, 'Thy will be done!'"—Parnell (1679-1717).

¶ In the Talmud is a similar and better allegory. Rabbi Jachanan accompanied Elijah on a journey, and they came to the house of a poor man, whose only treasure was a cow. The man and his wife ran to meet and welcome the strangers, but next morning the poor man's cow died. Next night, they were coldly received by a proud, rich man, who fed them only with bread and water; and next morning Elijah sent for a mason to repair a wall which was falling down, in return for the hospitality received. Next night, they entered a synagogue, and asked, "Who will give a night's lodging to two travellers?" but none offered to do so. At parting Elijah said, "I hope you will all be made presidents!" The following night they were lodged by the members of another synagogue in the best hotel of the place, and at parting Elijah said, "May the Lord appoint over you but one president!" The rabbi, unable to keep silence any longer, begged Elijah to explain the meaning of his dealings with men; and Elijah replied—

> "In regard to the poor man who received us so hospitably, it was decreed that his wife was to die that night, but in reward of his kindness, God took the cow instead of the wife. I repaired the wall of the rich miser because a chest of gold was concealed near the place, and if the miser had repaired the wall he would have discovered the treasure. I said to the inhospitable synagogue, 'May each member be president!' because no one can serve two masters. I said to the hospitable synagogue, 'May you have but one president!' because with one head there can be no divisions of counsel. Say not, therefore, to the Lord, 'What doest Thou?' but say in thy heart, 'Must not the Lord of all the earth do right?'"—The Talmud ("Trust in God"). (See Gesta Romanorum, lxxx.)

Hermite (Tristan l') or "Tristan of the Hospital," provost-marshal of France. He was the main instrument in carrying out the nefarious schemes of Louis XI., who used to call him his "gossip." Tristan was a stout, middle-sized man, with a hang-dog visage and most repulsive smile.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward and Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Hero, daughter of Leonato governor of Messina. She was of a quiet, serious disposition, and formed a good contrast to the gay, witty rattle-pate, called Beatrice, her cousin. Hero was about to be married to lord Claudio, when don John played on her a most infamous practical joke out of malice. He bribed Hero's waiting-woman to dress in Hero's clothes, and to talk with him by moonlight from the chamber balcony; he then induced Claudio to hide himself in the garden, to overhear what was said. Claudio, thinking the person to be Hero, was furious, and next day at the altar rejected the bride with scorn. The priest, convinced of Hero's innocence, gave out that she was dead, the servant confessed the trick, don John took to flight, and Hero married Claudio her betrothed. — Shakespeare: Much Ado About Nothing (1600).

Hero [Sutton], niece of sir William Sutton, and beloved by sir Valentine de Grey. Hero "was fair as no eye ever fairer saw, of noble stature, head of antique mould, magnificent as far as may consist with softness, features full of thought and moods, wishes and fancies, and limbs the paragon of symmetry." Having offended her lover by waltzing with lord Athunree, she assumed the garb of a quakeress, called herself "Ruth," and got introduced to sir Valentine, who proposed marriage to her, and then discovered that Hero was Ruth, and Ruth was Hero.—Knowles: Woman's Wit, etc. (1838).

Hero and Leander (3 syl.). Hero, a priestess of Venus, fell in love with Leander, who swam across the Hellespont every night to visit her. One night he was drowned in so doing, and Hero in grief threw herself into the same sea.—Musæus: Leander and Hero.

 A poem in six sestrads, by Marlow and Chapman (1596).

¶ Thomas Hood wrote a poem on the same subject (1827).

¶ Stapleton wrote a tragedy in 1669, Jackman an opera burletta (eighteenth century), and Marston a romance (1867), on the same subject.

Hero of Fable (The), the duc de Guise. Called by the French L'Hero de la Fable (1614-1664).

Hero of History (The), the duc d'Enghien [Darn-zjeah'n]. Called by the French L'Hero de l'Histoire. This was Le grand Condé (1621-1687).

Hero of Modern Italy, Garibaldi (1807-1882).

Hero Worship, etc., a series of lectures by Carlyle (1840).

Hero'dias, Herod, and John the Baptist. The Bible account is repeated in that of the duke of Gosbert of Würtzburg, Geilăna, and St. Kilian. Kilian reproved the duke for living with his brother's wife, and Geilana caused him to be put to death.

Herod'otos of Old London, J. Stow (1525-1605).

Hero'ides (4 syl.) or Epistola Herodum, in Latin hexameter and pentameter verse, by Ovid. By poetic fiction supposed to have been written by women famous in story, and their husbands either absent or about to leave them; as Penelopê (4 syl.) to Ulysses, Phyllis to Demoph'oön, Briseis (2 syl.) to Achilles, Œnône (3 syl.) to Paris, Dido to Æneas, Medêa to Jason, and so on.

 The word herois (3 syl.) means a lady of first rank, plural heroides.

Her'on (Sir George), of Chip-chace, an officer with sir John Foster.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Heros'tratos or EROSTRATOS, the Ephesian who set fire to the temple of Ephesus (one of the seven wonders of the world) merely to immortalize his name. The Ephesians made it penal even to mention his name.

Herostratus shall prove vice governs fame,
Who built that church he burnt hath lost his name.
Lord Brooke: Inquisition upon Fame (1554-1628).

Herries (Lord), a friend of queen Mary of Scotland, and attending on her at Dundrennan.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Herring (Good red).

Neuters in the middle way of steering,
Are neither fish, nor flesh, nor good red herring.
Dryden: Duke of Guise (1662).

Herring Pond (The), the ocean between the British Isles and America.

"What is your opinion, pray, on the institutions the other side of the Herring Pond?"—Jennie of the Prince's, i.

Herschel (Sir F. Wm.) discovered the eighth planet, at first called the Georgium sidus, in honour of George III., but now called Urdnus. In allusion to this, Campbell says he Gave the lyre of heaven another string.

Pleasures of Hope, i. (1799).

Herswin (Dame), wife of Isengrin, the wolf, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox, by Heinrich von Alkmaar (1498).

Herta, now called St. Kilda, one of the Heb'rides.

Hertford (The marquis of), in the court of Charles II.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

"Hertford" called Har'ford.

Her Trippa, meant for Henry Cornelius Agrippa of Nettesheim, philosopher and physician. "Her" is a contraction of He'ricus, and "Trippa" a play on the words Agrippa and tripe.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, iii. 25 (1545).

Hervé Riel, a Breton sailor, who saved the French squadron when beaten at Cape la Hogue and flying before the English, by piloting it into the harbour of St. Malo (May 31, 1692). He was so unconscious of the service he had rendered, that, when desired to name his reward, he begged for a whole day's holiday to see his wife. He lived at Le Croisic. Browning has a poem called Hervé Riel (1867).

Herwig, king of Hel'igoland, betrothed to Gudrun, daughter of king Hettel (Attila). (See GUDRUN, p. 454.)

Her'zog (Duke), commander-in-chief of the ancient Teutons (Germans). The herzog was elected by the freemen of the tribe; but in times of war and danger, when several tribes united, the princes selected a leader, who was also called a "herzog," similar to the Gaulish "brennus" or "bren," and the Celtic "pendragon" or head chief.

Heskett (Ralph), landlord of the village ale-house where Robin Oig and Harry Wakefield fought.

Dame Heskett, Ralph's wife.—Sir W. Scott: The Two Drovers (time, George III.).

Hesper'ia. Italy was so called by the Greeks, because it was to them the "Western Land." The Romans, for a similar reason, transferred the name to Spain.

Hesper'idês (4 syl.), the women who guarded the golden apples which Earth gave to Herê (Juno) at her marriage with Zeus (Jove). They were assisted by the dragon Ladon. The orchards in which the golden apples grew were the Hesperian Fields. The island is one of the Cape Verd Isles, in the Atlantic.

> Wilt thou fly
> With laughing Autumn to the Atlantic isles,
> And range with him th' Hesperian fields, and see
> Where'er his fingers touch the fruitful grove,
> The branches shoot with gold?
> Akenside: Pleasures of Imagination, I. (1744).

Hesperus, the knight called by Tennyson "Evening Star;" but called in the History of Prince Arthur, "the Green Knight" or sir Pertolope (3 syl.). One of the four brothers who kept the passages of Castle Perilous.—Tennyson: Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette"); sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 127 (1470).

N.B.—It is a manifest blunder to call the Green Knight "Hespĕrus the Evening Star," and the Blue Knight the "Morning Star." The old romance makes the combat with the "Green Knight" at dawn, and with the "Blue Knight" at sunset. The error has arisen from not bearing in mind that our forefathers began the day with the preceding eve, and ended it at sunset. Malory calls the lady Linet.

Hesperus (The Wreck of the), a ballad by Longfellow (1842).

Hettly (May), an old servant of Davie Deans.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Heukbane (Mrs.), the butcher's wife at Fairport, and a friend of Mrs. Mallsetter.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Hew, son of lady Helen of "Mirryland town" (Milan), enticed by an apple presented to him by a Jewish maiden, who then "stabbed him with a penknife, rolled the body in lead, and cast it into a well." Lady Helen went in search of her child, and its ghost cried out from the bottom of the well—

> The lead is wondrous heavy, mither;
> The well is wondrous deep;
> A keen penknife sticks in my heart;
> A word I dunae speik.
> Percy: Reliques, I. 3.

(See HUGH OF LINCOLN; THE PRIORESS'S TALE, one of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales.)

Hewit (Godfrey Bertram), natural son of Mr. Godfrey Bertram.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Hiawa'tha, the prophet-teacher, son of Mudjekee'wis (the west wind) and Weno'nah daughter of Noko'mis. He represents the progress of civilization among the North American Indians. Hiawatha first wrestled with Monda'min (maize), and, having subdued it, gave it to man for food. He then taught man navigation; then he subdued Mishe Nah'ma (the sturgeon), and taught the Indians how to make oil therefrom for winter. His next exploit was against the magician Megissog'non, the author of disease and death; having slain this monster, he taught man the science of medicine. He then married Minneha'ha (laughing water), and taught man to be the husband of one wife, and the comforts of domestic peace. Lastly, he taugh man picture-writing. When the white men came with the gospel, Hiawatha ascended to the kingdom of Pone'mah, the land of the hereafter.—Longfellow: Hiawatha (1855).

Hiawatha's Moccasons. When Hiawatha put on his moccasons, he could measure a mile at a single stride.

> He had moccasons enchanted,
> Magic moccasons of deer-skin;
> When he bound them round his ankles
> At each stride a mile he measured!
> Longfellow: Hiawatha, iv.

Hiawatha's Great Friends, Chibia'bos (the sweetest of all musicians) and Kwa'sind (the strongest of all mortals). —Longfellow: Hiawatha, vi.

Hiber'nia, Ireland. I'ernê is simply a contraction of the same word. Pliny says that "Irish mothers feed their infants with swords instead of spoons."

Hic Jacet, an epitaph, a funeral. The first words on old tombstones = Here lies . . . etc.

The merit of service is seldom attributed to the true . . . performer. I would have that drum . . . or hic jacet [that is, die in my attempt to get it].—Shakespeare: All's Well that Ends Well (1598).

Hick'athrift (Tom or Jack), a poor labourer in the time of the Conquest, of such enormous strength that he killed, with an axletree and cartwheel, a huge giant, who lived in a marsh at Tylney, in Norfolk. He was knighted, and made governor of Thanet. Hickathrift is sometimes called Hickafric.

When a man sits down to write a history, though it be but the history of Jack Hickathrift, . . . he knows no more than his heels what lets . . . he is to meet with in his way.—Sterne.

Hick'ory (Old), general Andrew Jackson. He was first called "Tough," then "Tough as Hickory," and, lastly, "Old Hickory." Another story is that in 1813, when engaged in war with the Creek Indians, he fell short of supplies, and fed his men on hickory nuts (1767–1845).

 This general Andrew Jackson must not be confounded with general Thomas Jackson, better known as "Stone-wall" Jackson (1826–1863).

Hi'erocles (4 syl.), the first person who compiled jokes and bon mots. After a lifelong labour, he got together twenty-eight, which he left to the world as his legacy. Hence arose the phrase, An Hierocl'ean legacy, no legacy at all, a legacy of empty promises, or a legacy of no worth.

One of his anecdotes is that of a man who wanted to sell his house, and carried about a brick to show as a specimen of it.

He that tries to recommend Shakespeare by select quotations, will succeed like the pedant in Hierocles, who, when he offered his house for sale, carried a brick in his pocket as a specimen.—Dr. Johnson: Preface to Shakespeare.

Hieron'imo, the chief character of Thomas Kyd's drama in two parts, pt. i. being called Hieronimo, and pt. ii. The Spanish Tragedy or Hieronimo is Mad Again. In the latter play, Horatio, only son of Hieronimo, sitting with Belimpe'ria in an alcove, is murdered by his rival Balthazar and the lady's brother Lorenzo. The murderers hang the dead body on a tree in the garden, and Hieronimo, aroused by the screams of Belimperia, rushing into the garden, sees the dead body of his son, and goes raving mad (1588).

Higden (Mrs. Betty), an old woman nearly four score, very poor, but hating the union-house more than she feared death. Betty Higden kept a mangle, and "minded young children" at fourpence a week. A poor workhouse lad named Sloppy helped her to turn the mangle. Mrs. Boffin wished to adopt Johnny, Betty's infant grandchild, but he died at the Children's Hospital.

She was one of those old women, was Mrs. Betty Higden, who, by dint of an indomitable purpose and a strong constitution, fight out many years; an active old woman, with a bright dark eye and a resolute face, yet quite a tender creature, too.—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend, i. 16 (1864).

Higg, "the son of Snell," the lame witness at the trial of Rebecca.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Higgen, Prigg, Snapp, and Ferret, knavish beggars in The Beggars' Bush, a drama by Fletcher (1622).

High and Low Heels, two factions in Lilliput. So called from the high and low heels of their shoes, badges of the two factions. The High-heels (tories and the high-church party) were the most friendly to the ancient constitution of the empire, but the emperor employed the Low-heels (whigs and low-churchmen) as his ministers of state. — Swift: Gulliver's Travels ("Lilliput," 1726).

High Life Below Stairs, a farce by the Rev. James Townley. Mr. Lovel, a wealthy commoner, suspects his servants of "wasting his substance in riotous living;" so, pretending to go to his country seat in Devonshire, he assumes the character of a country bumpkin from Essex, and places himself under the charge of his own butler, to learn the duties of a gentleman's servant. As the master is away, Philip (the butler) invites a large party to supper, and supplies them with the choicest wines. The servants all assume their masters' titles, and address each other as "My lord duke," "sir Harry," "My lady Charlotte," "My lady Bab," etc., and mimic the airs of their employers. In the midst of the banquet, Lovel appears in his true character, breaks up the party, and dismisses his household, retaining only one of the lot, named Tom, to whom he entrusts the charge of the silver and plate (1759).

Highgate (a suburb of London). Drayton says that Highgate was so called because Brute, the mythical Trojan founder of the British empire,

"appointed it for a gate of London;" but others tell us that it was so called from a gate set up there, some 400 years ago, to receive tolls for the bishop of London.

Then Highgate boasts his way which men do most frequent, . . .
Appointed for a gate of London to have been,
When first the mighty Brute that city did begin.
Drayton: Polyolbion, XVI. (1613).

Highland Mary. (See MARY IN HEAVEN.)

Highwaymen (Noted).

CLAUDE DUVAL (*-1670). Introduced in White Friars, by Miss Robinson.

TOM KING.

JAMES WHITNEY (1660-1694), aged 34.

JONATHAN WILD of Wolverhampton (1682-1725), aged 43. Hero and title of a novel by Fielding (1744).

JACK SHEPPARD of Spitalfields (1701-1724), aged 24. Hero and title of a novel by Defoe (1724); and one by H. Ainsworth (1839).

DICK TURPIN, executed at York (1711-1739). Hero of a novel by H. Ainsworth.

GALLOPING DICK, executed at Aylesbury in 1800.

CAPTAIN GRANT, the Irish highwayman, executed at Maryborough, in 1816.

SAMUEL GREENWOOD, executed at Old Bailey, 1822.

WILLIAM REA, executed at Old Bailey, 1828.

Hi'gre (a syl.), a roaring of the waters when the tide comes up the Humber.

For when my Higre comes I make my either shore
E'en tremble with the sound that I afar do send.
Drayton: Polyolbion, XXVIII. (1622).

Hilarius (Brother), refectioner at St. Mary's.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Hildebrand, pope Gregory VII. (1013, 1073-1085). He demanded for the Church the right of "investiture" or presentation to all ecclesiastical benefices, and the superiority of the ecclesiastical to the temporal authority; he enforced the celibacy of all clergymen, resisted simony, and greatly advanced the dominion of the popes.

We need another Hildebrand to shake
And purify us.
Longfellow: The Golden Legend (1851).

Hil'debrand (Meister), the Nestor of German romance, a magician and champion.

∴ Maugis, among the paladins of Charlemagne, sustained a similar twofold character.

Hil'debrod (Jacob duke), president of the Alsatian Club.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Hil'desheim. The monk of Hildesheim, doubting how a thousand years with God could be "only one day," listened to the melody of a bird in a green wood, as he supposed, for only three minutes, but found the time had in reality been a hundred years. (See FELIX, p. 361.)

Hill (Dr. John), whose pseudonym was "Mrs. Glasse." Garrick said of him—

For physic and farces,
His equal there scarce is,
For his farces are physic, and his physic a farce is.

Hil'lary (Tom), apprentice of Mr. Lawford the town clerk. Afterwards captain Hillary.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Hinch'up (Dame), a peasant, at the execution of Meg Murdochson.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Hind and Panther (The), a poem by Dryden (1687), in defence of the Catholic religion. The hind is the Latin Church, and the panther is the Church of England. James II. is the lion which protects the hind from the bear (Independents), the wolf (Presbyterians), the hare (Quakers), the ape (Freethinkers), the boar (Anabaptists), and the fox (Arians).

∴ The City and Country Mouse, by Prior and Montague (earl of Halifax), is a parody in ridicule of the Hind and Panther. Dryden says—

A milk-white hind, immortal and unchanged,
Fed on the lawns, and in the forest ranged;
Without unspotted, innocent within,
She feared no danger, for she knew no sin.

The parody is—

A milk-white mouse, immortal and unchanged,
Fed on soft cheese, and o'er the dairy ranged;
Without unspotted, innocent within,
She feared no danger, for she knew no gin.

Hin'da, daughter of Al Hassan the Arabian emir of Persia. Her lover Hafed, a Gheber or fire-worshipper, was the sworn enemy of the emir. Al Hassan sent Hinda away, but she was taken captive by Hafed's party. Hafed, being betrayed to Al Hassan, burnt himself to death in the sacred fire, and Hinda cast herself into the sea.—Moore: Lalla Rookh ("The Fire-Worshippers," 1817).

Hinges (Harmonious). The doors of the harem of Fakreddin turned on harmonious hinges. — Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Hinzelmann, the most famous house-spirit or kobold of German legend. He lived four years in the old castle of Hudemühlen, and then disappeared for ever (1588).

Hipcut Hill, famous for cowslips. The rendezvous of Pigwiggen and queen Mab was a cowslip on Hipcut Hill.—Drayton: Nymphidia (1563–1631).

Hip'pocrene (3 syl.), the fountain of the Muses. Longfellow calls poetic inspiration "a maddening draught of Hippocrene."—Goblet of Life.

Hippol'ito. So Browning spells the name of the son of Theseus (2 syl.) and An'tiopê. Hippolito fled all intercourse with woman. Phædra, his step-mother, tried to seduce him, and when he resisted her solicitations, accused him to her husband of attempting to dishonour her. After death he was restored to life under the name of Virbius (vir-bis, "twice a man"). (See HIPPOLYTOS.)

Hyppolito, a youth who never knew a woman.
R. Browning.

Hippol'yta, queen of the Am'azons, and daughter of Mars. She was famous for a girdle given her by the war-god, which Herculês had to obtain possession of, as one of his twelve labours.

 Shakespeare has introduced Hippolyta in his Midsummer Night's Dream, and betroths her to Theseus (2 syl.) duke of Athens; but according to classic fable, it was her sister An'tiopê (4 syl.) who married Theseus.

Hippol'yta, a rich lady wantonly in love with Arnoldo. By the cross purposes of the plot, Leopold a sea-captain is enamoured of Hippolyta, Arnoldo is contracted to the chaste Zeno'cia, and Zenocia is dishonourably pursued by the governor count Clo'dio.—Fletcher: The Custom of the Country (1647).

Hippol'ytos (in Latin, Hippolytus), son of Theseus (2 syl.). He provoked the anger of Venus by disregarding her love; and Venus, in revenge, made Phædra (his step-mother) fall in love with him. When Hippolytos repulsed her advances, she accused him to her husband of seeking to dishonour her. Theseus prayed Neptune to punish the young man, and the sea-god, while the young man was driving in his chariot, scared the horses with sea-calves. Hippolytos was thrown from the chariot and killed, but Diana restored him to life again. (See HIPPOLITO.)

Hippolytus himself would leave Diana
To follow such a Venus
Massinger: A New Way to Pay Old Debts, iii. 1 (1628)

Hippom'enes (4 syl.), a Grecian prince who outstripped Atalanta in a foot-race, by dropping three golden apples, which she stopped to pick up. By this conquest he won Atalanta to wife.

E'en here, in this region of wonders, I find
That light-footed Fancy leaves Truth far behind,
Or, at least, like Hippomenês, turns her astray
By the golden illusions he flings in her way.
T. Moore.

Hippopot'amus, symbol of impiety and ingratitude. Lear says that "ingratitude in a child is more hideous than the sea-monster."

The hippopotamus killeth his sire, and ravisheth his dam.—Sandys: Travels (1615).

Hippot'ades (4 syl.), Eôlus, the wind-god, son of Hippota.

[He] questioned every gust of rugged wings
That blows from off each beaked promontory:
They knew not of his story;
And sage Hippotadês their answer brings,
That not a blast was from his dungeon strayed.
Milton: Lycidas, 92, etc. (1638).

Hiren, a strumpet. From Peele's play The Turkish Mahomet and Hyren the Fair Greek (1584).

In Italian called a courtesan; in Spanish a margarita; in French un curtain; in English . . . a punk.

"There be sirens in the sea of the world. Syrens? Hirens, as they are now called. What a number of these sirens [hirens], cockatrices, courteghians, in plain English, harlots, swimme amongst us!"—Adams: Spiritual Navigator (1615).

Hiroux (Jean), the French "Bill Sikes," with all the tragic elements eliminated.

Pres. Where do you live? Jean. Haven't got any.
Pres. Where were you born? Jean. At Galard.
Pres. Where is that? Jean. At Galard.
Pres. What department? Jean. Galard.
Henri Monnier: Popular Scenes drawn with Pen and Ink (1825).

Hislop (John), the old carrier at Old St. Ronan's.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Hispa'nia, Spain.

Historia Britonum, a very brief epitome of historic legends, from Adam to A.D. 547, with the life of St. Patrick and the legend of king Arthur, by Nennius, abbot of Bangor (seventh century). (An English translation is contained in Bohn's Six Old English Chronicles.)

Historic Doubts (respecting the life and reign of Richard III.), by Horace Walpole, earl of Oxford (1768).

Historic Doubts relative to Napoleon, by bishop Whately (1821). The object is to show that the doubts applied by unbelievers to the Gospel history might be applied to Napoleon, but would be manifestly absurd.

Histor'ious, the name assumed by sir William Vernon Harcourt, for many years the most slashing writer in the Saturday Review, and a contributor to the Times.

History (Father of). Herod'otos, the Greek historian, is so called by Cicero (B.C. 484-408).

Father of Ecclesiastical History, Polygnotos of Thaos (fl. B.C. 463-435). The Venerable Bede is so called sometimes (672-735).

Father of French History, André Duchesne (1584-1640).

Histrio-mastix, a tirade against theatrical exhibitions, by William Prynne (1633).

For this book archbishop Laud arraigned Prynne before the Star Chamber; and he was condemned to pay a fine of £5000 (equal to about £50,000 of our money), to stand twice in the pillory, and lose his ears, to have his book burnt by the common hangman, to be disbarred, and imprisoned for life. This iniquitous sentence was actually carried out in the reign of Charles I.

Ho'amen, an Indian tribe settled on a south branch of the Missouri, having Az'tlan for their imperial city. The Az'tecas conquered the tribe, deposed the queen, and seized their territory by right of conquest. When Madoc landed on the American shore, he took the part of the Hoamen, and succeeded in restoring them to their rights. The Aztecas then migrated to Mexico (twelfth century).—Southey: Madoc (1805).

Hoare (1 syl.), 37, Fleet Street, London. The golden bottle displayed over the fanlight is the sign of James Hoare, a cooper, who founded the bank. The legend is that it contains the leather bottle or purse of James Hoare, and the half-crown with which he started business in 1677.

Hob Miller of Twyford, an insurgent.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Hob or Happer, miller at St. Mary's Convent.

Mysie Happer, the miller's daughter. She marries sir Piercie Shafton.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Hobbes's Voyage, a leap in the dark. Thomas Hobbes, on the point of death, said, "Now I am about to take my last voyage, a great leap in the dark" (1588-1679).

'Tis enough. I'll not fail. So now I am in for Hobbes's voyage—a great leap in the dark [this leap was matrimony].—Vanbrugh: The Provoked Wife, v. 3 (1697).

Hob'bididance (4 syl.), the prince of dumbness, and one of the five fiends that possessed "poor Tom."—Shakespeare: King Lear, act iv. sc. 1 (1605).

(This name is taken from Harsnett's Declaration of Egregious Popish Impostures, 1561-1631.)

Hobbie o' Sorbie'trees, one of the huntsmen near Charlie's Hope farm.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Hob'bima (The English), John Crome of Norwich, whose last words were, "O Hobbima, Hobbima, how I do love thee!" (1769-1821).

The Scotch Hob'bima, P. Nasmyth (1831-1890).

 Minderhout Hobbima, a famous landscape painter of Amsterdam (1638-1709).

Hobbinol. (See HOBINOL.)

Hobbinol'ia or "Rural Games," a burlesque poem in blank verse, by William Somerville (1740). Hobbinol was the squire of his village, and had a son, who with Ganderetta were chosen king and queen of May.

Hobbler or CLOPINEL, Jehan de Meung, the French poet, who was lame (1260-1320). Meung was called by his contemporaries Père de l'Eloquence.

 Tyrtæus, the Greek elegiac poet, was called "Hobbler" because he introduced the alternate pentameter verse, which is one foot shorter than the old heroic metre.

Hobbler (The Rev. Dr.), at Ellieslaw Castle, one of the Jacobite conspirators with the laird of Ellieslaw.—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Hobby-de-Hoy, a lad from 14 to 21.

1-7. The first seven years, bring up as a child;
7-14. The next to learning, for waxing too wild;
14-21. The next, to keep under sir Hobbard de Hoy;
21-28. The next, a man, and no longer a boy.
Tusser: Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, 1. (1557).

Hobby-horse, in the morris-dance, a pasteboard horse which a man carries and dances about in, displaying tricks of legerdemain, such as threading a needle, running daggers through his cheeks, etc.

The horse had a ladle in its mouth for the collection of half-pence. The colour of the hobby-horse was a reddish white, and the man inside wore a doublet, red on one side and yellow on the other. (See MORRIS-DANCE.)

Cle. They should be morris-dancers by their gingle, but they have no napkins.
Cec. No, nor a hobby-horse.—B. Jonson: The Metamorphosed Gipsies.

N.B.—In Norwich, till the middle of the nineteenth century, a kind of hobby-horse was carried about. It represented a huge dragon, and was preceded by whifflers, who flourished their swords with wonderful agility to keep off the crowd. When the procession was discontinued, "Snap" was deposited in Guild Hall, Norwich.

Hobby-horse, a favourite pursuit, a corruption of hobby-hause ("hawk-tossing"), a favourite diversion in the days of falconry. The term has become confounded with the wicker hobby-horse in which some one, being placed, was made to take part in a morris-dance.

Why can't you ride your hobby-horse without desiring to place me on a pillion behind you?—Sheridan: The Critic, i. 1 (1779).

Hobby-horse (The), one of the masquers at Kennaquhair Abbey —Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Hobinol or Hobbinol is Gabriel Harvey, physician, LL.D., a friend and college chum of Edmund Spenser the poet. Spenser, in Eclogue iv.. makes Thenot inquire, "What gars thee to weep?" and Hobinol replies it is because his friend Colin, having been flouted by Rosalind (Eclogue i.), has broken his pipe and seems heart-broken with grief. Thenot then begs Hobinol to sing to him one of Colin's own songs, and Hobinol sings the lay of "Elisa queen of the shepherds" (queen Elizabeth), daughter of Syrinx and Pan (Anne Boleyn and Henry VIII.). He says Phœbus thrust out his golden head to gaze on her, and was amazed to see a sun on earth brighter and more dazzling than his own. The Graces requested she might make a fourth grace, and she was received amongst them and reigned with them in heaven. The shepherds then strewed flowers to the queen, and Elisa dismissed them, saying that at the proper season she would reward them with ripe damsons (Eclogue iv.). Eclogue ix. is a dialogue between Hobinol and Diggon Davie, upon Popish abuses. (See DIGGON DAVIE.)—Spenser: Shepheards's Calendar (1572).

Hobnel'la, a shepherdess, in love with Lubberkin, who disregarded her. She tried by spells to win his love, and after every spell she said—

With my sharp heel I three times mark the ground,
And turn me thrice around, around, around.
Gay: Pastoral, iv. (1714).

(An imitation of Virgil's Bucolic, viii., "Pharmaceutria.")

Hob'son (Tobias), a carrier who lived at Cambridge in the seventeenth century. He kept a livery stable, but obliged the university students to take his hacks in rotation. Hence the term Hobson's choice came to signify "this or none." Milton (in 1660) wrote two humorous poems on the death of the old carrier.

Hochspring'en (The young duke of), introduced in Donnerhugel's narrative.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Hocus (Humphry), "the attorney" into whose hands John Bull and his friends put the law-suit they carried on against Lewis Baboon (Louis XIV.). Of course, Humphry Hocus is John Churchill, duke of Marlborough, who commanded the army employed against the Grand Monarque.

Hocus was an old cunning attorney; and though this was the first considerable suit he was ever engaged in, he showed himself superior in address to most of his profession. He always kept good clerks. He loved money, was smooth-tongued, gave good words, and seldom lost his temper . . . He provided plentifully for his family; but he loved himself better than them all. The neighbours reported that he was hen-pecked, which was impossible by such a mild-spirited woman as his wife was [his wife was a desperate termagant].—Dr. Arbuthnot: History of John Bull, v. (1712).

Hodei'rah (3 syl.), husband of Zei'nab (2 syl.) and father of Thalâba. He died while Thalaba was a mere lad.—Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, i. (1797).

Hodeken [i.e. little hat], a German kobold or domestic fairy, noted for his little felt hat.

Ho'der, the Scandinavian god of darkness, typical of night. He is called the blind old god. Balder is the god of light, typical of day. According to fable, Höder killed Balder with an arrow made of mistletoe, but the gods restored him to life again.

Höder, the blind old god,
Whose feet are shod with silence.
Longfellow: Tegner's Death.

Hodge, Gammer Gurton's goodman, whose breeches she was repairing when she lost her needle.—Mr. S. Master of Arts: Gammer Gurton's Needle (1551).

 Mr. S. is said to be J. Still, afterwards bishop of Bath and Wells, but in 1551 he was only eight years old.

Hodges (John), one of Waverley's servants.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Hodges (Joe), landlord of Bertram, by the lake near Merwyn Hall.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Hodge'son (Gaffer), a puritan.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Hoel (2 syl.), king of the Armorican Britons, and nephew of king Arthur. Hoel sent an army of 15,000 men to assist his uncle against the Saxons (501). In 509, being driven from his kingdom by Clovis, he took refuge in England; but in 513 he recovered his throne, and died in 545.

[Arthur], calling to his aid
His kinsman Howel, brought from Brittany the less,
Their armies they unite . . . [and conquer the Saxons at Lincoln].
Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

Ho'el, son of prince Hoel and Lla'ian. Prince Hoel was slain in battle by his half-brother David king of North Wales; and Llaian, with her son, followed the fortunes of prince Madoc, who migrated to North America. Young Hoel was kidnapped by Ocell'opan, an Az'tec, and carried to Az'tlan for a propitiatory sacrifice to the Aztecan gods. He was confined in a cavern without food; but Co'atel, a young Aztecan wife, took pity on him, visited him, supplied him with food, and assisted Madoc to release him. —Southey: Madoc (1805).

Hœrnescar, a German mode of punishment, which consisted in carrying a dog on one's shoulders for a certain number of miles.

Plusieurs comtes accusés de malversation, de la peine humiliante du hœrnescar, peine consistant à faire porter un chien pendant plusieurs milles sur les épaules du condamné.—Cocheris: L'Empire d'Allemagne.

Ho'garth (William), called "The Juvenal of Painters" (1695-1764).

The Scottish Ho'garth, David Allan (1744-1796).

The Hogarth of Novelists, Henry Fielding (1707-1754).

Hog Lane, Whitechapel, London; afterwards called "Petticoat Lane," and now "Middlesex Street."

Hohenlin'den, in Bavaria, famous for the battle fought in November, 1801, between the Austrians under Klenau, and the French under Moreau. The French remained the victors, with 10,000 prisoners. Campbell wrote a poem so called.

'Tis morn; but scarce yon level sun
Can pierce the war-clouds rolling dun,
Where furious Frank and fiery Hun
Shout in their sulphurous canopy.
Campbell: Battle of Hohenlinden (1801).

Hoist with his own Petard, caught in his own trap.

For 'tis the sport to have the enginer
Hoist with his own petar.
Shakespeare: Hamlet, act III. sc. 4 (1596).

Hold'enough (Master Nehemiah), a presbyterian preacher, ejected from his pulpit by a military preacher.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Holdfast (Aminadab), a friend of Simon Pure.—Mrs. Centlivre: A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717).

Holiday. When Anaxag'oras, at the point of death, was asked what honour should be conferred on him, he replied, "Give the boys a holiday" (B.C. 500-428).

Holiday (Erasmus), schoolmaster in the Vale of Whitehorse.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Holiday Phrases, set speeches, high-flown phrases. So holiday manners, holiday clothes, meaning the "best" or those put on to make the best appearance. Hotspur, speaking of a fop sent to demand his prisoners, says to the king—

In many holiday and lady terms
He questioned me.
Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. act I. sc. 3 (1597).

Holiday Romance (A), by Charles Dickens (1868).

Holipher'nes (4 syl.), called "English Henry," was one of the Christian knights in the allied army of Godfrey, in the first crusade. He was slain by Dragu'tês (3 syl.). (See HOLOFERNES.)—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, ix. (1575).

Holland. Voltaire took leave of this country of paradoxes in the alliteration following:—"Adieu! canaux canards, canaille" (Adieu! dykes, ducks, and drunkards). Lord Byron calls it—

The waterland of Dutchmen and of ditches,
Whose juniper expresses its best juice,
The poor man's sparkling substitute for riches.
Don Juan, x. 63 (1822).

S. Butler says—

A land that rides at anchor, and is not moored,
In which men do not live, but go aboard.
Hudibras (1663-1678).

Holland in England, one of the three districts of Lincolnshire. Where Boston stands used to be called "High Holland." The other two districts are Lindsey, the highest land; and Kesteven, the western part, famous for its heaths. Holland, the fen-lands in the south-east.

And for that part of me [Lincolns.] which men "High Holland" call,
Where Boston seated is, by plenteous Wytham's fall . . .
No other tract of land doth like abundance yield.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxv. (1622).

Hol'les Street (London). So called from John Holles duke of Newcastle, father of Henrietta Cavendish countess of Oxford and Mortimer. (See HENRIETTA STREET, p. 483.)

Holly-tree Inn (Boots at the). (See COBB, p. 222.)

Holman (Lieutenant James), the blind traveller (1787–1857).

Holofer'nes (4 syl.), a pedantic schoolmaster, who speaks like a dictionary. The character is meant for John Florio, a teacher of Italian in London, who published, in 1598, a dictionary called A World of Words. He provoked the retort by condemning wholesale the English dramas, which, he said, were "neither right comedies, nor right tragedies, but perverted histories without decorum." The following sentence is a specimen of the style in which he talked:—

The deer was . . . in sanguis (blood), ripe as a pomewater who now hangeth like a jewel in the ear of cælo (the sky, the welkin, the heaven); and anon falleth like a crab on the face of terra (the soil, the land, the earth).—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, act iv. sc. 2 (1594).

(Holofernes is an imperfect anagram of "Joh'nes Florio," the first and last letters being omitted.)

Holofernes, lieutenant-general of the armies of Nabuchodonosor, king of Assyria. When he laid siege to Bethulia, he cut off the water supply, and the Jews promised to surrender if God did not succour them within five days. In this interim Judith killed Holofernes with a tent-nail.—Judith.

 There was yet another Holofernes, fore-king mentioned in the Hungarian folk-tale of Magic Helen. (See the collection made by count Mailath.)

Hol'opherne (Thubal), the great sophister, who, in the course of five years and three months, taught Gargantua to say his A B C backwards.—Rabelais: Gargantua, i. 14 (1533).

Holy Bottle (The Oracle of the), the object of Pantag'ruel's search. He visited various lands with his friend Panurge (2 syl.), the last place being the island of Lantern-land, where the "bottle" was kept in an alabaster fount in a magnificent temple. When the party arrived at the sacred spot, the priestess threw something into the fount; whereupon the water began to bubble, and the word "Drink" issued from the "bottle." So the whole party set to drinking Falernian wine, and, being inspired with drunkenness, raved with prophetic madness; and so the romance ends.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel (1545).

Like Pantagruel and his companions in quest of the "Oracle of the Bottle."—Sterne.

Holy Brotherhood (The), in Spain called Santa Hermandad, was an association for the suppression of highway robbery.

The thieves, . . . believing the Holy Brotherhood was coming, . . . got up in a hurry, and alarmed their companions.—Lesage: Gil Blas, i. (1715).

Holy Island, Lindisfarne, in the German Sea, about eight miles from Berwick-upon-Tweed. It was once the see of the famous St. Cuthbert, but now the bishopric is that of Durham. The ruins of the old cathedral are still visible.

Ireland used to be so called, on account of its numerous saints.

Guernsey was so called in the tenth century, on account of the great number of monks residing there.

Rügen was so called by the Slavonic Varini.

Holy Living and Dying, by bishop Jeremy Taylor (1650).

Holy Maid of Kent, Elizabeth Barton, who incited the Roman Catholics to resist the progress of the Reformation, and pretended to act under divine inspiration. She was executed in 1534 for "predicting" that the king (Henry VIII.) would die a sudden death if he divorced queen Katharine and married Anne Boleyn. At one time she was thought to be inspired with a prophetic gift, and even the lord chancellor, sir Thomas More, was inclined to think so.

Holy Mother of the Russians. Moscow is so called.

Holy War (The), by John Bunyan (1684).

Holywell Street, London. So called from a spring of water "most sweet, salubrious, and clear, whose runnels murmur over the shining stones."

 Other similar wells in the suburbs of London were Clerkenwell and St. Clement's Well.

Home, Sweet Home. The words of this popular song are by John Howard Payne, an American. It is introduced in his melodrama called Clari, or The Maid of Milan. The music is by sir Henry Bishop.

Homer, a Greek epic poet, author of the Iliad and the Odyssey, in Greek hexameters. The Iliad is supposed to have been composed somewhere about B.C. 962, and the Odyssey about B.C. 927. They were reduced to writing by Pisistrătos of Athens, B.C. 531. They are not "Attic" Greek, but the Greek of Asia Minor. (For the tales, see ILIAD and ODYSSEY.)

∴ The following have translated into English verse both poems. The first date is for the Iliad, and the second date for the Odyssey :—

Bryant, 1870, 1871; Chapman, in Alexandrian metre, 1598, 1614; Collins, 1861, 1870; Conington and Worsley, in Spenserean metre, both in 1614; Cowper, in blank verse, both in 1791; Hobbes, both in 1677; Morgate, 1860, 1865; Ogilby, 1660, 1669; Pope, 1719, 1725.

¶ The following have translated into English verse the Iliad only :—

Baxter, 1864; Brandreth, 1846; Cordery, 1870; Dart, 1865; lord Derby, 1867; Hall, 1581; Herschel, 1866; Green, 1865; Macpherson, 1773; Merivale, 1869; Morrice, 1809; Newman, 1871; Selwyn, 1865; Simcox, 1865; Wright, 1859.

Tickle translated into English verse bk. i. of the Iliad.

¶ The following have translated into English verse the Odyssey only :—

Cary, 1823; Edginton, 1869; Merry, 1871; Musgrave, 1869.

The British Homer. Milton is so called on Gray's monument in Westminster Abbey.

> No more the Grecian muse unrivalled reigns;
> To Britain let the nations homage pay:
> She felt a Homer's fire in Milton's strains,
> A Pindar's rapture in the lyre of Gray.

The Casket Homer, an edition of Homer corrected by Aristotle, which Alexander the Great carried about with him, and placed in a golden casket richly studded with gems, found in the tent of Darius. Alexander said there was but one thing in the world worthy to be kept in so precious a casket, and that was Aristotle's Homer.

The Celtic Homer, Ossian, son of Fingal king of Morven.

The Oriental Homer, Ferdusi, the Persian poet, who wrote the Châh Nâmeh, or history of the Persian kings. It contains 120,000 verses, and was the work of thirty years (940–1020).

The Prose Homer, Henry Fielding the novelist. Byron calls him "The Prose Homer of Human Nature" (1707–1764).

The Scottish Homer, William Wilkie, author of The Epigon'iad (1721–1772).

The Homer of our Dramatic Poets. Shakespeare is so called by Dryden (1564–1616).

> Shakespeare was the Homer or father of our dramatic poets; Jonson was the Virgil. I admire rare Ben, but I love Shakespeare.—Dryden.

The Homer of Ferra'ra. Ariosto was called by Tasso, Omero Ferrarese (1474–1533).

The Homer of the Franks. Angilbert was so called by Charlemagne. He died 814.

The Homer of the French Drama. Pierre Corneille was so called by sir Walter Scott (1606–1684).

The Homer of Philosophers, Plato (B.C. 429–347).

Homer the Younger, Philiscos, one of the seven Pleiad poets of Alexandria, in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphos.

Homer a Cure for the Ague. It is an old superstition that if the fourth book of the Iliad is laid under the head of a patient suffering from quartan ague, it will cure him at once. Serenus Sammonicus, preceptor of Gordian, a noted physician, says—

> Mæoniæ Iliados quartum suppone timenti.
> Prax. 30.

Homeric Characters.

AGAMEMNON, haughty and imperious; ACHILLES, brave, impatient of command, and relentless; DIOMED, brave as Achilles, but obedient to authority; AJAX the Greater, a giant in stature, foolhardy, arrogant, and conceited; NESTOR, a sage old man, garrulous on the glories of his youthful days; ULYSSES, wise, crafty, and arrogant; PATROCLOS, a gentle friend; THERSITES, a scurrilous demagogue.

HECTOR, the protector and father of his country, a brave soldier, an affectionate husband, a wise counsellor, and a model prince; SARPEDON, the favourite of the gods, gallant and generous; PARIS, a gallant and a fop; TROILUS, "the prince of chivalry;" PRIAM, a broken-spirited old monarch.

HELEN, a heartless beauty, faithless, and fond of pleasure; ANDROM'ACHE, a fond young mother and affectionate wife; CASSANDRA, a querulous, croaking prophetess; HECUBA, an old she-bear robbed of her whelps.

Homespun (Zekiel), a farmer of Castleton. Being turned out of his farm, he goes to London to seek his fortune. Though quite illiterate, he has warm affections, noble principles, and a most ingenuous mind. Zekiel wins £20,000 by a lottery ticket, bought by his deceased father.

Cicely Homespun, sister of Zekiel, betrothed to Dick Dowlas (for a short time the Hon. Dick Dowlas). When Cicely went to London with her brother, she took a situation with Caroline Dormer. Miss Dormer married "the heir-at-law" of baron Duberly, and Cicely married Dick Dowlas.—Colman: The Heir-at-Law (1797).

Homilies (The Book of), under the direction of archbishop Cranmer (1547).

Hominy (Mrs.), philosopher and authoress, wife of major Hominy, and "mother of the modern Gracchi," as she called her daughter, who lived at New Thermopylæ, three days this side of "Eden," in America. Mrs. Hominy was considered by her countrymen a "very choice spirit."—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Homo, man. Said to be a corruption of OMO; the two O's represent the two eyes, and the M the rest of the human face. Dante says the gaunt face of a starved man resembles the letter "M."

> Who reads the name
> For man upon his forehead, there the M
> Had traced most plainly.
> Dante: Purgatory, xxiii. (1308).

N.B.—The two downstrokes represent the contour, and the V of the letter represents the nose. Hence the human face is |°V°|

Honeim's Shoes. I have brought nothing back but Honeim's shoes. A Chinese proverb, meaning, "Mine has been a bootless errand." The tale is that an Arab went to one Honeim to buy a pair of shoes; but, after the usual haggling, he said they were too dear, and left the stall. Honeim knew the road the man would take, and, running on in advance, dropped one of the shoes on purpose. Presently up came the man, sees the shoe in the road, and says, "How marvellously like is this to Honeim's shoes! If now I could find the fellow, I would pick up this." So he looked all about, but without success, and passed on. In the mean time Honeim had run half a league further, and dropped the other shoe, and when the Arab came to the spot and saw it, he regretted that he had not picked up the first shoe; but, tying his camel to a tree, he ran back to fetch it. On returning to the place again, he found his camel had been stolen, and when he arrived at home and was asked what he had brought back, he replied, "Nothing but Honeim's shoes."

¶ Moses Primrose and the green spectacles may be compared with the Arab and Honeim's shoes.

Honest George. General George Monk, duke of Albemarle, was so called by the Cromwellites (1608-1670).

Honest Man. Diogenês, being asked one day what he was searching for so diligently that he needed the light of a lantern in broad day, replied, "An honest man."

> Searched with lantern-light to find an honest man.
> Southey: Roderick, etc., xxi. (1814).
> Still will he hold his lantern up to scan
> The face of monarchs for an honest man.
> Byron: Age of Bronze, x. (1822).

Honest Thieves (The). The "thieves" are Ruth and Arabella, two heiresses, brought up by justice Day, trustee of the estates of Ruth and guardian of Arabella. The two girls wish to marry colonel Careless and captain Manly, but do not know how to get possession of their property, which is in the hands of justice Day. It so happens that Day goes to pay a visit, and the two girls, finding the key of his strong box, help themselves to the deeds, etc., to which they are respectively entitled. Mrs. Day, on her return, accuses them of robbery; but Manly says, "Madam, they have taken nothing but what is their own. They are honest thieves, I assure you."—T. Knight (a farce).

(This is a mere rifacimento of The Committee (1670), by the Hon. sir R. Howard. Most of the names are identical, but "captain Manly" is substituted for colonel Blunt.)

Honesty. Timour used to boast that during his reign a child might carry a purse of gold from furthest east to furthest west of his vast empire without fear of being robbed or molested.—Gibbon: Decline and Fall, etc. (1776–88).

¶ A similar state of things existed in Ireland, brought about by the administration of king Brien. A young lady of great beauty, adorned with jewels, undertook a journey alone from one end of the kingdom to the other; but no attempt was made upon her honour, nor was she robbed of her jewels.—Warner: History of Ireland, i. 10.

 Thomas Moore has made this the subject of one of his Irish Melodies, i. ("Rich and Rare were the Gems she Wore," 1814).

Honey. Glaucus, son of Minos, was smothered in a cask of honey.

Honeycomb (Will), a fine gentleman, and great authority on the fashions of the day. He was one of the members of the imaginary club from which the Spectator issued.—The Spectator (1711–1713).

Sir Roger de Coverley, a country gentleman, to whom reference was made when matters connected with rural affairs were in question; Will Honeycomb gave law on all things concerning the gay world; captain Sentry stood up for the army; and sir Andrew Freeport represented the commercial interest.—Chambers: English Literature, i. 603.

Honeycombe (Mr.), the uxorious husband of Mrs. Honeycombe, and father of Polly. Self-willed, passionate, and tyrannical. He thinks to bully Polly out of her love-nonsense, and by locking her in her chamber to keep her safe, forgetting that "love laughs at locksmiths," and "where there's a will there's a way."

Mrs. Honeycombe, the dram-drinking, maudling, foolish wife of Mr. Honeycombe, always ogling him, calling him "lovey," "sweeting," or "dearie," but generally muzzy, and obfuscated with cordials or other messes.

Polly Honeycombe, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Honeycombe; educated by novels, and as full of romance as don Quixote. Mr. Ledger, a stockbroker, pays his addresses to her; but she hates him, and determines to elope with Mr. Scribble, an attorney's clerk, and nephew of her nurse. This folly, however, is happily interrupted. — Colman: Polly Honeycombe (1760).

Honeyman (Charles), a free-and-easy clergyman, of social habits and fluent speech.—Thackeray: The Newcomes (1855).

Honeymoon (The), a comedy by J. Tobin (1804). The general scheme resembles that of the Taming of the Shrew, viz. breaking-in an unruly colt of high mettle to the harness of wifely life. The duke of Aranza marries the proud, overbearing, but beautiful Juliana, eldest daughter of Balthazar. After marriage, he takes her to a mean hut, and pretends he is only a peasant, who must work for his daily bread, and that his wife must do the household drudgery. He acts with great gentleness and affection; and by the end of the month, Juliana, being thoroughly reformed, is introduced to the castle, where she finds that her husband after all is the duke, and that she is the duchess of Aranza. It is an excellent and well-written comedy.

Honeywood, "the good-natured man," whose property is made the prey of swindlers. His uncle, sir William Honeywood, in order to rescue him from sharpers, causes him to be seized for a bill to which he has lent his name "to a friend who absconded." By this arrest the young man is taught to discriminate between real friends and designing knaves. Honeywood dotes on Miss Richland, but, fancying that she loves Mr. Lofty, forbears to avow his love; eventually, however, all comes right. Honeywood promises to "reserve his pity for real distress, and his friendship for true merit."

Though inclined to the right, [he] had not courage to condemn the wrong. [His] charity was but injustice; [his] benevolence but weakness; and [his] friendship but credulity.—The Good-natured Man, act v.

Sir William Honeywood, uncle of Mr. Honeywood "the good-natured man." Sir William sees with regret the faults of his nephew, and tries to correct them. He is a dignified and high-minded gentleman.—Goldsmith: The Good-natured Man (1767).

Hono'ra, daughter of general Archas, "the loyal subject" of the great-duke of Moscovia, and sister of Viola.—Beaumont (f) and Fletcher: The Loyal Subject (1618). (Beaumont died 1616.)

Hono'ria, a fair but haughty dame, greatly loved by Theodore of Ravenna; but the lady "hated him alone," and "the more he loved the more she disdained." One day, she saw the ghost of Guido Cavalcanti hunting with two mastiffs a damsel who despised his love and who was doomed to suffer a year for every month she had tormented him. Her torture was to be hunted by dogs, torn to pieces, disemboweled, and restored to life again every Friday. This vision so acted on the mind of Honoria, that she no longer resisted the love of Theodore, but, "with the full consent of all, she changed her state."—Dryden: Theodore and Honoria (a poem).

 This tale is from Boccaccio's Decameron (day v. 8).

Honour (Mrs.), the waiting gentlewoman of Sophia Western.—Fielding: Tom Jones (1749).

This is worse than Sophy Western and Mrs. Honour about Tom Jones's broken arm.—Professor Wilson.

Honour and Glory Griffiths. Captain Griffiths, in the reign of William IV., was so called, because he used to address his letters to the Admiralty, to "Their Honours and Glories at the Admiralty."

Honour of the Spear, a tournament.

He came to Runa's echoing halls, and sought the honour of the spear.—Ossian: The War of Inis-Thona.

Honour paid to Learning. A Spaniard travelled from Cadiz to Rome, solely for the purpose of beholding Livy the historian, and, after he had seen him, returned home again.

¶ When Alexander besieged Thebes, he spared the house of Pindar out of reverence to the great poet. (See WISDOM, honour paid to; HOMER, p. 498.)

Honours (Crushed by his or her).

(1) Tarpeia (3 syl.), daughter of Tarpeius (governor of the citadel of Rome), promised to open the gates to Tatius, if his soldiers would give her the ornaments they wore on their arms. As the soldiers entered the gate, they threw on her their shields, and crushed her to death, saying, "These are the ornaments we Sabines wear on our arms."

(2) Draco, the Athenian legislator, was crushed to death in the theatre of Ægina by the number of caps and cloaks showered on him by the audience, as a mark of honour.

(3) Elagab'alus, the Roman emperor, invited the leading men of Rome to a banquet, and, under pretence of showing them honour, rained roses upon them till they were smothered to death.

Hood (Robin), a famous English outlaw. Stow places him in the reign of Richard I., but others make him live at divers periods between Cœur de Lion and Edward II. His chief haunt was Sherwood Forest, in Nottinghamshire. Ancient ballads abound with anecdotes of his personal courage, his skill in archery, his generosity, and his great popularity. It is said that he robbed the rich, but gave largely to the poor; and that he protected women and children with chivalrous magnanimity. According to tradition, he was treacherously bled to death by a nun, at the command of his kinsman, the prior of Kirkless, in Notts.

Stukeley asserts that Robin Hood was Robert Fitzooth, earl of Huntingdon; and it is probable that his name hood, like capet given to the French king Hugues, refers to the cape or hood which he usually wore.

(The chief incidents of his life are recorded by Stow. Ritson has collected a volume of songs, ballads, and anecdotes called Robin Hood . . . that Celebrated English Outlaw (1795). Sir W. Scott has introduced him in his novel called Ivanhoe, which makes the outlaw contemporary with Cœur de Lion. He is also mentioned by Scott in The Talisman.

Robin Hood's Chaplain, friar Tuck.

Robin Hood's Men. The most noted were Little John, whose surname was Nailor; William Scarlet, Scathelooke (2 syl.), or Scadlock, sometimes called two brothers; Will Stutly or Stukely; and Mutch the miller's son.

Chief, beside the butts, there stand
Bold Robin Hood and all his band:
Friar Tuck with staff and cowl,
Old Scathelooke (2 syl.) with his surly scowl,
Maid Marian fair as ivory bone,
Scarlet, and Mutch, and Little John.
Sir Walter Scott.

Robin Hood's Mistress, the Maid Marian.

Hoods. Blue hoods, the party badge of Navarre; red hoods, the party badge of Paris; blue and red hoods, the party badge of Charles [V.], when dauphin; white hoods, the party badge of the Burgundians.

Hookem (Mr.), partner of lawyer Clippurse at Waverley Honour.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Hop (Robin), the hop plant.

Get into thy hop-yard, for now it is time
To teach Robin Hop on his pole how to climb.
Tusser: Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, xli. 17 (1557).

Hope. The name of the first woman, according to Grecian mythology, was Pandôra, made by Hephæstos (Vulcan) out of earth. She was called Pandôra ("all-gifted") because all the deities contributed something to her charms. She married Epime'theus (4 syl.), in whose house was a box which no mortal might open. Curiosity induced Pandôra to peep into it, when out flew all the ills of humanity, and she had but just time to close the lid before the escape of Hope.

When man and nature mourned their first decay . . .
All, all forsook the friendless, guilty mind,
But Hope—the charmer lingered still behind.
Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, i. (1799).

Hope (The Bard of), Thomas Campbell, who wrote The Pleasures of Hope, in two parts (1777–1844).

Hope (The Cape of Good), originally called "The Cape of Storms."

¶ Similarly, the Euxine (i.e. "hospitable") Sea was originally called by the Greeks the Axine (i.e. "the inhospitable") Sea.

(For the "Spirit of the Cape," see SPIRIT.)

Hope Diamond (The), a blue brilliant, weighing 44¼ carats.

It is supposed that this diamond is the same as the blue diamond bought by Louis XIV., in 1668, of Tavernier. It weighed in the rough 112¼ carats, and after being cut 67½ carats. In 1792 it was lost. In 1830, Mr. Daniel Eliason came into possession of a blue diamond without any antecedent history; this was bought by Mr. Henry Thomas Hope, and is called "The Hope Diamond."

Hope of Troy (The), Hector.

[He] stood against them, as the Hope of Troy Against the Greeks.
Shakespeare: 3 Henry VI. act ii. sc. 1 (1592).

Hope the Motive Power of All.

The ambitious prince doth hope to conquer all;
The dukes, earls, lords, and knights hope to be kings;
The prelates hope to push for popish pall;
The lawyers hope to purchase wondrous things;
The merchants hope for no less reckonings;
The peasant hopes to get a ferme [farm] at least;
All men are guests where Hope doth hold the feast.
Gascoigne: The Fruites of Warre, 88 (died 1577).

Hopeful, a companion of Christian after the death of Faithful at Vanity Fair.—Bunyan: The Pilgrim's Progress, i. (1678).

Hopkins (Matthew), of Manningtree, in Essex, the witch-finder. In one year he caused sixty persons to be hanged as reputed witches.

Between three and four thousand persons suffered death for witchcraft between 1643 and 1661.—Dr. Z. Grey.

Hopkins (Nicholas), a Chartreux friar, who prophesied "that neither the king [Henry VIII.] nor his heirs should prosper, but that the duke of Buckingham should govern England."

1st Gent. The devil-monk, Hopkins, hath made this mischief.
2nd Gent. That was he that fed him with his prophecies.
Shakespeare: Henry VIII. act ii. sc. 1 (1601).

Hop-o'-my-Thumb, a character in several nursery tales. Tom Thumb and Hop-o'-my-Thumb are not the same, although they are often confounded with each other. Tom Thumb was the son of peasants, knighted by king Arthur, and killed by a spider. Hop-o'-my-Thumb was a nix, the same as the German daumling, the French le petit pouce, and the Scotch Tom-a-lin or Tamlane. He was not a human dwarf, but a fay of usual fairy proportions.

You Stump-o'-the-gutter, you Hop-o'-my-Thumb,
Your husband must from Lilliput come.
Kane O'Hara: Midas (1778).

Horace, the latin poet (B.C. 65–8). Translated into English verse by Francis, Lonsdale and Lee (1873), lord Ravensworth, Robinson, etc.

Odes: by Forsyth, 1876; Hawkins (Thomas), 1625; Hoveden, 1874; lord Lytton (good), 1869; Theodore Martin (good), 1869; professor Newman, 1875. Bks. i., ii., by Jones, 1865; by J. W. Smith, 1867; four books by Yardley, 1869.
∴ James and Horace Smith published, in 1813, the first two books adapted to modern times.
Epodes: by Hughes, 1867; Martin (good), 1869; R. Wood, 1872.
∴ Pope wrote some imitations of Horace.
Carmen Seculare (4 syl.): by Mathews, 1867.
Satires: by Conington (good), 1869; Mathews, 1847; Martin (good), 1869; Millington, 1870; Wood, 1870. One Satire, Hughes, 1867.
∴ Pope wrote some imitations of these Satires.
Epistles: by Conington (good), 1869; Martin (good), 1869; Millington, 1870.
Ars Poetica: by Conington (good), 1869; Wood, 1872.

The English Horace. Ben Jonson is so called by Dekker the dramatist (1574–1637).

Cowley was preposterously called by George duke of Buckingham "The Pindar, Horace, and Virgil of England" (1618–1667).

The French Horace, Jean Macrinus or Salmon (1490–1557).

Pierre Jean de Beranger is called "The Horace of France," and "The French Burns" (1780–1857).

The Portuguese Horace, A. Ferreira (1528–1569).

The Spanish Horace. Both Lupercio Argen'sola and his brother Bartolome are so called.

Horace, son of Oronte (2 syl.) and lover of Agnes. He first sees Agnes in a balcony, and takes off his hat in passing. Agnes returns his salute, "pour ne point manquer à la civilité." He again takes off his hat, and she again returns the compliment. He bows a third time, and she returns his "politeness" a third time. "Il passe, vient, repasse, et toujours me fait a chaque fois révérence, et moi nouvelle révérence aussi je lui rendois." An intimacy is soon established, which ripens into love. Oronte tells his son he intends him to marry the daughter of Enrique (2 syl.), which he refuses to do; but it turns out that Agnes is in fact Enrique's daughter, so that love and obedience are easily reconciled.—Molière: L'école des Femmes (1662).

Horace de Brienne (2 syl.), engaged to Diana de Lascours; but after the discovery of Ogari'ta [alias Martha, Diana's sister], he falls in love with her, and marries her with the free consent of his former choice.—Stirling: The Orphan of the Frozen Sea (1856).

Horæ Pauli'næ, by Paley (1790), in which the truth of the Acts is supposed to be corroborated by allusions in the Epistles of Paul.

Horatia, daughter of Horatius "the Roman father." She was engaged to Caius Curiatius, whom her surviving brother slew in the well-known combat of the three Romans and three Albans. For the purpose of being killed, she insulted her brother Publius in his triumph, and spoke disdainfully of his "patriotic love," which he preferred to filial and brotherly affection. In his anger he stabbed his sister with his sword.—Whitehead: The Roman Father (1741).

Hora'tio, the intimate friend of prince Hamlet.—Shakespeare: Hamlet Prince of Denmark (1596).

Hora'tio, the friend and brother-in-law of lord Al'tamont, who discovers by accident that Calista, lord Altamont's bride, has been seduced by Lothario, and informs lord Altamont of it. A duel ensues between the bridegroom and the libertine, in which Lothario is killed; and Calista stabs herself.—Rowe: The Fair Penitent (1703).

Horatius, "the Roman father." He is the father of the three Horatii chosen by the Roman senate to espouse the cause of Rome against the Albans. He glories in the choice, preferring his country to his offspring. His daughter, Horatia, was espoused to one of the Curiatii, and was slain by her surviving brother for taunting him with murder under the name of patriotism. The old man now renounced his son, and would have given him up to justice, but king and people interposed in his behalf.

Publius Horatius, the surviving son of "the Roman father." He pretended flight, and as the Curiatii pursued, "but not with equal speed," he slew them one by one as they came up.—Whitehead: The Roman Father (1741).

Horatius [Cocles], captain of the bridge-gate over the Tiber. When Por'sĕna brought his host to replace Tarquin on the throne, the march on the city was so sudden and rapid, that the consul said, "The foe will be upon us before we can cut down the bridge." Horatius exclaimed, "If two men will join me, I will undertake to give the enemy play till the bridge is cut down." Spurius Lartius and Herminius volunteered to join him in this bold enterprise. Three men came against them and were cut down. Three others met the same fate. Then the lord of Luna came with his brand "which none but he could wield," but the Tuscan was also despatched. Horatius then ordered his two companions to make good their escape, and they just crossed the bridge as it fell in with a crash. The bridge being down, Horatius threw himself into the Tiber and swam safe to shore, amidst the applauding shouts of both armies.—Macaulay: Lays of Ancient Rome ("Horatius," 1842).

Horatius Cocles of the Tyrol. Alexandre Davy Dumas was so called for his defence of the bridge of Brixen, in 1798.

Horatius Cocles of Horn, John Haring of Horn. The exploit which won him the name was the following: In 1573 the prince of Orange sent Sonoy, the governor of North Holland, to attack the Diemerdyk, but the Spaniards routed the force. John Haring planted himself alone upon the dyke, where it was so narrow that two men could hardly stand abreast. Here, sword in hand, he opposed and held in check 1000 Spaniards till all his comrades had made good their retreat; then plunging into the sea, untouched by spear or gun, he effected his escape.—Motley: The Dutch Republic, iv. 8.

Horehound (2 syl.) or Marru'bium vulgārĕ ("white horehound"), used in coughs and pulmonary disorders, either in the form of tea or solid candy. Black horehound or Ballŏta nigra is recommended in hysteria.

> For comforting the spleen and liver, get for juice Pale horehound.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Horn (The Cape). So named by Schouten, a Dutch mariner, who first rounded it. He was born at Hoorn, in North Holland, and named the cape after his own native town.

Horn (King), hero of a French metrical romance, the original of our Childe Horne or The Geste of Kyng Horn. The French romance is ascribed to Mestre Thomas; and Dr. Percy thinks the English romance is of the twelfth century, but this is probably at least a century too early.

(King Horn is given in Ritson's Ancient English Metrical Romances; and was published by the Roxburghe and Early English Text Societies.)

Horn. "Poor Tom, thy horn is dry" (King Lear, act iii. sc. 3). Crazy beggars used to carry a cow's horn slung behind. It was their wont to enter schoolrooms to awe naughty children, and for this service the schoolmasters gave them a mug of drink, which was poured into their "horn."

Horn of Chastity and Fidelity. Morgan la Faye sent king Arthur a drinking-horn, from which no lady could drink who was not true to her husband, and no knight who was not feal to his liege lord. Sir Lamorake sent this horn as a taunt to sir Mark king of Cornwall.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 34 (1470).

¶ Ariosto's enchanted cup had the same property.

¶ The cuckold's drinking-horn was a vessel from which no "cuckold could drink without spilling the liquor." (See CARADOC, p. 177.)

¶ La coupe enchantée of Lafontaine was another test horn. (See CHASTITY, p. 198.)

Horne, in the proverb I'll chance it, as old Horne did his neck, refers to Horne, a clergyman in Nottinghamshire, who committed murder, but escaped to the Continent. After several years, he determined to return to England, and when told of the danger of so doing, replied, "I'll chance it." He did chance it; but being apprehended, was tried, condemned, and executed.—The Newgate Calendar.

¶ Magwitch, having acquired a large fortune in Australia as a sheep-farmer, tried the same thing, but was arrested, tried, and condemned to death.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1861).

Horner (Jack), the little boy who sat in a corner to eat his Christmas pie, and thought himself wondrously clever because with his thumb he contrived to pull out a plum.

> Little Jack Horner sat in a corner,
> Eating his Christmas pie;
> He put in his thumb, and pulled out a plum,
> Saying, "What a good boy am I!"
> Nursery Rhyme.

∴ In Notes and Queries, xvi. 156, several explanations are offered, ascribing a political meaning to the words quoted —Jack Horner being elevated to a king's messenger or king's steward, and the "plum" pulled out so cleverly being a valuable deed which the messenger abstracted. Some say he was the steward of the abbot of Glastonbury, and that the "plum" was the title-deeds of the manor of Wells.

HORSE. The first to ride and tame a horse for the use of man was Melizyus king of Thessaly. (See MELIZYUS.)

(For names of noted horses, ancient and modern, see Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 621, col. 2 to p. 627, col. 2.)

The Black Horse, the 7th Dragoon Guards (not the 7th Dragoons). They have black velvet facings, and their plume is black and white. At one time they rode black horses.

The Green Horse, the 5th Dragoon Guards. (These are called "The Princess Charlotte of Wales' . . .") Facings dark green velvet, but the plume is red and white.

The White Horse, the 3rd Dragoon Guards. (These are called "The Prince of Wales' . . .")

(All the Dragoon Guards have velvet facings, except the 6th (or "Carabiniers"), which have white cloth facings. By "facings" are meant the collar and cuffs.)

N.B.—"The white horse within the Garter" is not the heraldic insignia of the White Horse Regiment or 3rd Dragoon Guards, but of the 3rd Hussars (or "The King's Own"), who have also a white plume. This regiment used to be called "The 3rd Light Dragoons."

The Royal Horse, the Blues.

Horse (The Wooden), a huge horse constructed by Ulysses and Diomed, for secreting soldiers. The Trojans were told by Sinon it was an offering made by the Greeks to the sea-god, to ensure a safe home-voyage, adding that the blessing would pass from the Greeks to the Trojans if the horse were placed within the city walls. The credulous Trojans drew the monster into the city; but at night Sinon released the soldiers from the horse and opened the gates to the Greek army. The sentinels were slain, the city fired in several places, and the inhabitants put to the sword. The tale of the "Wooden Horse" forms no part of Homer's Iliad, but is told by Virgil in his Æneid. Virgil borrowed the tale from Arctinos of Miletus, one of the Cyclic poets, who related the story of the "Wooden Horse" and the "burning of Troy."

¶ A very similar stratagem was employed in the seventh century A.D. by Abu Obeidah in the siege of Arrestan, in Syria. He obtained leave of the governor to deposit in the citadel some old lumber which impeded his march. Twenty boxes (filled with soldiers) were accordingly placed there, and Abu, like the Greeks, pretended to march homewards. At night the soldiers removed the sliding bottoms of the boxes, killed the sentries, opened the city gates, and took the town.—Ockley: History of the Saracens, i. 187.

¶ Muskat is said to have been taken by the Arabs, in the seventeenth century, by means of a somewhat similar stratagem. They entered the town in the guise of peaceful peasants, hiding their arms in bundles of firewood, and took the opportunity of the Portuguese garrison being assembled without arms at chapel to attack and massacre them.—Ross: Annals of Omar.

Merlin's Wooden Horse, Clavilēno. This was the horse on which don Quixote effected the disenchantment of the infanta Antonomāsia and others. (See CLAVILENO, p. 215.)

Horse (The Enchanted), a wooden horse with two pegs. By turning one of the pegs the horse rose into the air, and by turning the other it descended where and when the rider listed. It was given by an Indian to the shah of Persia, as a New Year's gift. (See FIROUZ SCHAH, p. 369.)—Arabian Nights ("The Enchanted Horse"). (See HORSE OF BRASS.)

Horse. The 15 points of a good horse.

A good horse shokle have three propyrtees of a man, three of a woman, three of a foxe, three of a haare, and three of an asse. Of a man, bolde, prowde, and hardye. Of a woman, fayre-breasted, faire of heere, and easy to move. Of a foxe, a fair taylle, short eers, with a good trotte. Of a haare, a grate eye, a dry head, and well rennynge. Of an asse, a bygge chynn, a flat legge, and a good hoof.—Wynkyn de Worde (1496).

Horse-hair breeds Animals. According to legend, if the hair of a horse is dropped into corrupted water, it will turn to an animal.

A horse-hair laid in a pale-full of turbid water, will in a short time stir, and become a living creature.—Holinshed: Description of England, 244.

Horse Neighing, a Royal Lot. On the death of Smerdis, the several competitors for the Persian crown agreed that he whose horse neighed first should be appointed king. The horse of Darius neighed first, and Darius was made king. Lord Brooke calls him a Scythian; he was son of Hystaspēs the satrap.

The brave Scythian
Who found more sweetness in his horse's neighing
Than all the Phrygian, Dorian, Lydian playing.
Lord Brooke.

Horse Painted True to Life (A). Apellēs of Cos painted Alexander's horse so wonderfully well that a real horse, seeing it, began to neigh at it, supposing it to be alive.

¶ Myro the statuary made a cow so true to life that several bulls were deceived by it.

¶ Velasquez painted a Spanish admiral so true to life that Felipe IV., mistaking it for the man himself, reproved the supposed officer sharply for wasting his time in a painter's studio when he ought to be with his fleet.

¶ Zeuxis painted some grapes so admirably that birds flew at them, thinking them real fruit.

¶ Parrhasios of Ephesus painted a curtain so inimitably that Zeuxis thought it to be a real curtain, and bade the artist draw it aside that he might see the painting behind.

¶ Quintin Matsys of Antwerp painted a bee on the outstretched leg of a fallen angel so naturally that when old Mandyn, the artist, returned to his studio, he tried to frighten it away with his pocket-handkerchief.

Horse of Brass (The), a present from the king of Araby and Ind to Cambuscan' king of Tartary. A person whispered in its ear where he wished to go, and, having mounted, turned a pin, whereupon the brazen steed rose in the air as high as the rider wished, and within twenty-four hours landed him at the end of his journey.

This steed of brass, that easily and well
Can, in the space of a day natural, . . .
Bearen your body into every place
To which your hearte willeth for to pace.
Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Squire's Tale," 1988).

(See HORSE, The Enchanted.)

Horst (Conrade), one of the insurgents at Liège.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Hortense' (2 syl.), the vindictive French maidservant of lady Dedlock. In revenge for the partiality shown by lady Dedlock to Rosa the village beauty, Hortense murdered Mr. Tulkinghorn, and tried to throw the suspicion of the crime on lady Dedlock.—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Horten'sio, a suitor to Bianca the younger sister of Katharina "the Shrew." Katharina and Bianca are the daughters of Baptista.—Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew (1594).

Horten'sio, noted for his chivalrous love and valour.—Massinger: The Bashful Lover (1636).

Horwendillus, the court at which Hamlet lived.

This is that Hamlet . . . who lived at the court of Horwendillus, 500 years before we were born.—Hazlitt.

Hosier's Ghost (Admiral), a ballad by Richard Glover (1739). Admiral Hosier was sent with twenty sail to the Spanish West Indies, to block up the galleons of that country. He arrived at the Bastimentos, near Portobello, but had strict orders not to attack the foe. His men perished by disease, but not in fight, and the admiral himself died of a broken heart. After Vernon's victory, Hosier and his 3000 men rose, "all in dreary hammocks shrouded, which for windingsheets they wore," and lamented the cruel orders that forbade them to attack the foe, for "with twenty ships he surely could have achieved what Vernon did with only six." {See GRENVILLE, p. 449.}

Hospital of Compassion, the house of correction.

A troop of alguazels carried me to the hospital of compassion.—Lesage: Gil Blas, vii. 7 (1735).

Hotspur. So Harry Percy, son of the earl of Northumberland, was called from his fiery temper, over which he had no control.—Shakespeare: 1 and 2 Henry IV. (1597).

William Bensley [1738-1817] had the true poetic enthusiasm. . . . None that I remember possessed even a portion of that fine madness which he threw out in Hotspur's fine rant about glory. His voice had the dissonance and at times the inspiring effect of the trumpet.—Charles Lamb.

Hotspur of Debate (The), lord Derby, called by lord Lytton, in New Timon, "The Rupert of Debate" (1799-1869).

Houd (1 syl.), a prophet sent to preach repentance to the Adites (2 syl.), and to reprove their king Shedad for his pride. As the Adites and their king refused to hear the prophet, God sent on the kingdom first a drought of three years' duration, and then the Sarsar or icy wind, for seven days, so that all the people perished. Houd is written "Hûd" in Sale's Korân, i.

Then stood the prophet Houd and cried, "Woe! woe to Irem! woe to Ad!
Death is gone up into her palaces!
Woe! woe! a day of guilt and punishment!
A day of desolation!"
Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, I. 41 (1797)

Hough'ton (Sergeant), in Waverley's regiment.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Hounslow, one of a gang of thieves that conspired to break into lady Bountiful's house.—Farquhar: The Beaux' Stratagem (1705).

Houri, plu. Houris, the virgins of paradise; so called from their large black eyes (hûr al oyûn). According to Mohammedan faith, an intercourse with these lovely women is to constitute the chief delight to the faithful in the "world to come."—Al Korân.

Hours of Idleness, the first series of poems published, in 1807, by lord Byron. The severe criticism in the Edinburgh Review brought forth the satire called English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

House judged by a Brick. Hieröclês, the compiler of a book of jests, tells us of a pedant who carried about a brick as a specimen of the house which he wished to sell.

He that tries to recommend Shakespeare by select quotations, will succeed like the pedant in Hieroclês, who, when he offered his house to sale, carried a brick in his pocket as a specimen.—Dr. Johnson: Preface to Shakespeare.

House of Fame, a magnificent palace erected on a lofty mountain of ice, and supported by rows of pillars on which are inscribed the names of illustrious poets. Here the goddess of fame sits on a throne, and dispenses her capricious judgments to the crowd who come to seek her favours.—Chaucer: House of Fame.

House that Jack Built (The), a cumulative nursery story, in which every preceding statement is repeated after the introduction of a new one; thus—

1. [This is] the house that Jack built.
2. [This is] the malt that lay in . . .
3. [This is] the rat that eat . . .
4. [This is] the cat that killed . . .
5. [This is] the dog that worried . . .
6. [This is] the cow with the crumpled horn, that tossed . . .
7. [This is] the maiden all forlorn, that milked . . .
8. [This is] the man all tattered and torn, that kissed . . .
9. This is the priest all shaven and shorn, that married . . .

¶ A similar accumulation occurs in another nursery tale, with this difference —the several clauses are repeated twice: once by entreaty of the old woman to perform some service to get her pig to cross over a bridge that she may get home; and then the reverse way, when each begins the task requested of them. It begins with a statement that an old woman went to market to buy a pig; they came to a bridge, which the pig would not go over, so the old woman called to a stick, and said—

1. [Stick, stick, beat pig, for] pig won't go over the bridge, and I shan't get home to-night.
2. [Fire, fire] burn stick, stick won't beat pig . . .
3. [Water, water] quench fire, fire won't . . .
4. [Ox, ox] drink water, water won't . . .
5. [Butcher, butcher] kill ox, ox won't . . .
6. [Rope, rope] hang butcher, butcher won't . . .
7. [Rat, rat] gnaw rope, rope won't . . .
8. Cat, cat, kill rat, rat won't . . .

Then the cat began to kill the rat, and the rat began to gnaw the rope, and the rope began . . . etc, and the pig went over the bridge, and so the old woman got home that night.

¶ Dr. Doran gave the following Hebrew "parable" in Notes and Queries:—

1. [This is] the kid that my father bought for two zuzim [=½*d.*].
2. [This is] the cat that eat . . .
3. [This is] the dog that bit . . .
4. [This is] the stick that beat . . .
5. [This is] the fire that burnt . . .
6. [This is] the water that quenched . . .
7. [This is] the ox that drank . . .
8. [This is] the butcher that killed . . .
9. This is the angel, the angel of death, that slew . . .

'.' While correcting these proofs, a native of South Africa informs me that he has often heard the Kafirs tell their children the same story.

Household Words, a weekly periodical by Charles Dickens (1850–1857); it gave place to Once a Week, which, since 1859, has been called All the Year Round.

Hous'sain (Prince), the elder brother of prince Ahmed. He possessed a carpet of such wonderful powers that if any one sat upon it it would transport him in a moment to any place he liked. Prince Houssain bought this carpet at Bisnagar, in India.—Arabian Nights ("Ahmed and Paribanou").

The wish of the penman is to him like prince Houssain's tapestry in the Eastern fable.—Sir W. Scott.

¶ Solomon's carpet (q.v.) possessed the same locomotive power.

Houyhnhnms [Whin'-ims], a race of horses endowed with human reason, and bearing rule over the race of man.—Swift: Gulliver's Travels (1726).

"True, true, ay, too true," replied the Domine, his houyhnhnm laugh sinking into an hysterical giggle.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (1815).

How they brought the Good News from Ghent (16—), a ballad by R. Browning (1845). A purely imaginary incident.

Howard, in the court of Edward IV.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

How'atson (Luckie), midwife at Ellangowan.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Howden (Mrs.), saleswoman.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Howe (Miss), the friend of Clarissa Harlowe, to whom she presents a strong contrast. She has more worldly wisdom and less abstract principle. In questions of doubt, Miss Howe would suggest some practical solution, while Clarissa was mooning about hypothetical contingencies. She is a girl of high spirit, disinterested friendship, and sound common sense.—Richardson: Clarissa Harlowe (1749).

Howel or Hoel, king of the West Welsh in the tenth century, surnamed "the Good." He is a very famous king, especially for his code of laws. This is not the Howel or Hoel of Arthurian romance, who was duke of Armorica in the sixth century.

What Mulmutian laws, or Martian, ever were More excellent than those which our good Howel here
Ordained to govern Wales?
Drayton: Polyolbion, IX. (1622).

Howie (Jamie), bailie to Malcolm Bradwardine (3 syl.) of Inchgrabbit.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Howlaglass (Master), a preacher and friend of justice Maulstatute.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Howle'glas (Father), the abbot of Unreason, in the revels held at Kennaquhair Abbey.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Howleglass (2 syl.), a clever rascal. Called "Howleglass," the hero of an old German jest-book, popular in England in the reign of queen Elizabeth. (See TYLL.)

Hoyden (Miss), a lively, ignorant, romping, country girl.—Vanbrugh: The Relapse (1697).

(This was Mrs. Jordan's great character.)

Hoyden (Miss), daughter of sir Tunbelly Clumsy, a green, ill-educated, country girl, living near Scarborough. She is promised in marriage to lord Fop pington, but as his lordship is not personally known either by the knight or his daughter, Tom Fashion, the nobleman's younger brother, passes himself off as lord Foppington, is admitted into the family, and marries the heiress.—Sheridan: A Trip to Scarborough (1777).[1]

(Sheridan's comedy is The Relapse of Vanbrugh (1697), abridged, recast, and somewhat modernized.)

Hrasvelg, the giant who keeps watch on the north side of the root of the Tree of the World, to devour the dead. His shape is that of an eagle. Winds and storms are caused by the movement of his wings.—Scandinavian Mythology.

> Where the heaven's remotest bound
> With darkness is encompassed round,
> There Hrasvel'gr sits and swings
> The tempest from its eagle wings.
> Edda of Sæmund (by Amos Cottle).

Hrimfax'i, the horse of Night, from whose bit fall the rime-drops that every morning bedew the earth.—Scandinavian Mythology.

Hrothgar, king of Denmark, whom Beowulf delivered from the monster Grendel. Hrothgar built Heorot, a magnificent palace, and here he distributed rings (treasure), and held his feasts; but the monster Grendel, envious of his happiness, stole into the hall after a feast, and put thirty of the thanes to death in their sleep. The same ravages were repeated night after night, till Beowulf, at the head of a mixed band of soldiers, went against him and slew him.—Beowulf (an Anglo-Saxon epic poem, sixth century).

Hry'mer, pilot of the ship Nagelfar (made of the "nails of the dead").—Scandinavian Mythology.

Hub of the Universe. A hub is the nave of a wheel, a boss or protuberance; hence the "boss of the world" is much the same as the "hub of the universe," meaning the thing most prominent or important.

> Bayreuth [i.e. Wagnerism] was to be the "hub of the universe," as far as dramatic music [is] concerned.—Nineteenth Century, September, 1896, p. 361.

Hubba and Ingwar, two Danish chiefs, who, in 870, conquered East Anglia and wintered at Thetford, in Norfolk. King Edmund fought against them, but was beaten and taken prisoner. The Danish chiefs offered him his life and kingdom if he would renounce Christianity and pay them tribute; but as he refused to do so, they tied him to a tree, shot at him with arrows, and then cut off his head. Edmund was therefore called "St. Edmund." Alu'red fought seven battles with Hubba, and slew him at Abingdon, in Berkshire.

> Alured . . .
> In seven brave foughten fields their champion Hubbe chased,
> And slew him in the end at Abington [sic].
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xii. (1613).

Hubbard (Old Mother) went to her cupboard to get a bone for her dog, but, not finding one, trotted hither and thither to fetch sundry articles for his behoof. Every time she returned she found Master Doggie performing some extraordinary feat, and at last, having finished all her errands, she made a grand curtsey to Master Doggie. The dog, not to be outdone in politeness, made his mistress a profound bow; upon which the dame said, "Your servant!" and the dog said, "Bow, wow!"—Nursery Tale.

Hubberd (Mother). Mother Hubberd's Tale, by Edmund Spenser, is a satirical fable in the style of Chaucer, supposed to be told by an old woman (Mother Hubberd) to relieve the weariness of the poet during a time of sickness. The tale is this: An ape and a fox went into partnership to seek their fortunes. They resolved to begin their adventures as beggars, so Master Ape dressed himself as a broken soldier, and Reynard pretended to be his dog. After a time they came to a farmer, who employed the ape as shepherd, but when the rascals had so reduced the flock that detection was certain, they decamped. Next they tried the Church, under advice of a priest; Reynard was appointed rector to a living, and the ape was his parish clerk. From this living they were obliged also to remove. Next they went to court as foreign potentates, and drove a splendid business, but came to grief ere long. Lastly, they saw king Lion asleep, his skin was lying beside him, with his crown and sceptre. Master Ape stole the regalia, dressed himself as king Lion, usurped the royal palace, made Reynard his chief minister, and collected round him a band of monsters, chiefly amphibious, as his guard and court. In time, Jupiter sent Mercury to rouse king Lion from his lethargy; so he awoke from sleep, broke into his palace, and bit off the ape's tail, with a part of its ear.

> Since which, all apes but half their ears have left,
> And of their tails are utterly bereft.

As for Reynard, he ran away at the first alarm, and tried to curry favour with ding Lion; but the king only exposed him and let him go (1591).

Hubble (Mr.), wheelwright; a tough, high-shouldered, stooping old man, of a sawdusty fragrance, with his legs extraordinarily wide apart.

Mrs. Hubble, a little curly, sharp-edged person, who held a conventionally juvenile position, because she had married Mr. Hubble when she was much younger than he.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

HUBERT, chamberlain to king John, and "keeper" of young prince Arthur. King John conspired with him to murder the young prince, and Hubert actually employed two ruffians to burn out both the boy's eyes with red-hot irons. Arthur pleaded so lovingly with Hubert to spare his eyes, that he relented; however, the lad was found dead soon afterwards, either by accident or foul play.—Shakespeare: King John (1596). (See KINGSHIP.)

N.B.—This "Hubert" was Hubert de Burgh, justice of England and earl of Kent.

One would think, had it been possible, that Shakespeare, when he made king John excuse his intention of perpetrating the death of Arthur by his comment on Hubert's face, by which he saw the assassin in his mind, had Sandford in idea, for he was rather deformed, and had a most forbidding countenance.—Dibdin: History of the Stage.

Hubert, an honest lord, in love with Jac'ulin daughter of Gerrard king of the beggars.—Fletcher: The Beggars' Bush (1622).

Hubert, brother of prince Oswald, severely wounded by count Hurgonel in the combat provoked by Oswald against Gondibert, his rival for the love of Rhodalind the heiress of Aribert king of Lombardy.—Davenant: Gondibert (died 1668).

Hubert, an archer in the service of sir Philip de Malvoisin.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Hubert (St.), patron saint of huntsmen. He was son of Bertrand duc d'Acquitaine, and cousin of king Pepin.

Huddibras (Sir), a man "more huge in strength than wise in works," the suitor of Perissa (extravagance).—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 2 (1590).

Hudibras, the hero of a rhyming political satire, in three parts, by S. Butler. Sir Hudibras is a presbyterian justice in the Commonwealth, who sets out with his squire Ralph (an independent) to reform abuses, and enforce the observance of the laws for the suppression of popular sports and amusements (1663, 1664, 1678).

 The Grub Street Journal (1731) maintains that the academy figure of Hudibras was colonel Rolle of Devonshire, with whom the poet lodged for some time, and adds that the name is derived from Hugh de Bras, the patron saint of the county. Others say that sir Samuel Luke was the original, and cite the following distich in proof thereof:—

'Tis sung, there's a valiant Mameluke
In foreign lands ycleped * * [sir Luke I].

 Hudibras is in octo-syllabic lines, and has given us the adjective "hudibrastic," to signify poetry in the style and measure of Hudibras.

(It was illustrated by Hogarth in 1726; and sir George Gilfillan, in his introduction to the Works of Butler, gives us an excellent abstract of the poem.)

Edward Ward published (in 1705–1707) an imitation of Butler's satire, which he called Hudibras Redivivus, for which he was twice set in the pillory.

Hudjadge, a shah of Persia, suffered much from sleeplessness, and commanded Fitead, his porter and gardener, to tell him tales to while away the weary hours. Fitead declared himself wholly unable to comply with this request. "Then find some one who can," said Hudjadge, "or suffer death for disobedience." On reaching home, greatly dejected, he told his only daughter, Moradbak, who was motherless, and only 14 years old, the shah's command, and she undertook the task. She told the shah the stories called The Oriental Tales, which not only amused him, but cured him, and he married her.—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales (1743). (See THOUSAND-AND-ONE.)

Hudson (Sir Geoffrey), the famous dwarf, formerly page to queen Henrietta Maria. Sir Geoffrey tells Julian Peveril how the late queen had him enclosed in a pie and brought to table.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

 Vandyke has immortalized sir Geoffrey by his brush; and some of his clothes are said to be preserved in sir Hans Sloane's museum.

Hudson (Tam), gamekeeper.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Hugh, blacksmith at Ringleburn; a friend of Hobbie Elliot, the Heughfoot farmer.—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Hugh, servant at the Maypole inn. This giant in stature and ringleader in the "No Popery riots," was a natural son of sir John Chester and a gipsy. He loved Dolly Varden, and was very kind to Barnaby Rudge, the half-witted lad. Hugh was executed for his participation in the "Gordon riots."—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Hugh count of Vermandois, a crusader.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Hugh de Brass (Mr.), in A Regular Fix, by J. M. Morton.

Hugh of Lincoln. Matthew Paris asserts that in 1255 the Jews of Lincoln kidnapped a boy named Hugh, eight years old, crucified him, and threw his body into a pit. Eighteen of the wealthiest Jews of Lincoln were hanged for taking part in this affair, and the boy was buried in state.

 There are several documents in Rymer's Fœdera relative to this event. The story is told in the Chronicles of Matthew Paris. It is the subject of the Prioress's Tale in Chaucer (q.v.), and Wordsworth has a modernized version of Chaucer's tale.

¶ A similar story is told of William of Norwich, said to have been crucified by the Jews in 1137.

¶ Percy, in his Reliques, i. 3, has a ballad about a boy named Hew (q.v.), whose mother was "lady Hew of Mirryland town" (Milan). He was enticed by an apple given him by a Jewish damsel, who "stabbed him with a penknife, rolled him in lead, and cast him into a well."

¶ Werner is another boy said to have been crucified by the Jews. The place of this alleged murder was Bacharach.

> Of the innocent boy, who, some years back,
> Was taken and crucified by the Jews,
> In that ancient town of Bacharach!
> Longfellow: Golden Legend.

¶ Incredible as it may seem to some persons, the belief that Jews require Christian blood in some of their religious rites is still prevalent in some places.

In 1881 occurred the notorious case of Esther Solymossy, of whose murder the Jew of Tisra-Eszlar (a village in Hungary) was accused. The trial of the Jew lasted two years; and though the accused was acquitted, the villagers generally believed him guilty.

In 1891, at Xanten (in Westphalia), the Jew Buschhoff, a butcher, was accused of murdering a child of five years old for a similar purpose; and although an alibi was proved, the villagers insisted on their belief. Another case occurred in 1893 at Malta, and some since that date.

Hughie Graham, a ballad about Graham, a borderer, who was hanged for stealing the bishop's mare. Scott has introduced a version of it into his Border Minstrelsy.

Hugo, count of Vermandois, brother of Philippe I. of France, and leader of the Franks in the first crusade. Hugo died before Godfrey was appointed general-in-chief of the allied armies (bk. i.), but his spirit appeared to Godfrey when the army went against the Holy City (bk. xviii.).—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Hugo, brother of Arnold; very small of stature, but brave as a lion. He was slain in the faction fight stirred up by prince Oswald against duke Gondibert, his rival in the love of Rhodalind daughter and only child of Aribert king of Lombardy.

> Of stature small, but was all over heart,
> And tho' unhappy, all that heart was love.
> Davenant: Gondibert, l. 1 (died 1668).

Hugo, natural son of Azo chief of the house of Este (2 syl.) and Bianca, who died of a broken heart, because, although a mother, she was never wed. Hugo was betrothed to Parisina, but his father, not knowing it, made Parisina his own bride. One night Azo heard Parisina in her sleep confess her love for Hugo, and the angry marquis ordered his son to be beheaded. What became of Parisina "none knew, and none can ever know."—Byron: Parisina (1816).

Hugo Hugonet, minstrel of the earl of Douglas.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Hugon (King), the great nursery ogre of France.

Huguenot Pope (The). Philippe de Mornay, the great supporter of the French huguenots, is called Le Pape des Huguenots (1549–1623).

 Of course, Philippe de Mornay was not one of the "popes of Rome."

Huguenots (Les), an opera by Meyerbeer (1836). The subject of this opera is the massacre of the French huguenots or protestants, planned by Catherine de Medicis on St. Bartholomew's Day (August 24, 1572), during the wedding festivities of her daughter Margherita (Marguerite) and Henri le Bearnais (afterwards Henri IV. of France).

Huldbrand (Sir), the husband of Undine.—De la Motte Fouqué: Undine (1807).

Hul'sean Lectures, certain sermons preached at Great St. Mary's Church, Cambridge, and paid for by a fund, the gift of the Rev. John Hulse, of Cheshire, in 1777.

N.B.—Till the year 1860, the Hulsean Lecturer was called "The Christian Advocate."

Human Understanding (An Essay concerning), by John Locke, published in 1690. Against the dogma of innate ideas, and in proof that experience is the key of knowledge.

Humber or Humbert, mythical king of the Huns, who invaded England during the reign of Locrin, some 1800 years B.C. In his flight, he was drowned in the river Abus, which has ever since been called the Humber. — Geoffrey: British History, ii. 2; Milton: History of England.

The ancient Britons yet a sceptred king obeyed
Three hundred years before Rome's great foundation laid;
And had a thousand years an empire strongly stood
Ere Cæsar to her shores here stemmed the circling flood;
And long before borne arms against the barbarous Hun,
Here landing with intent the isle to overrun;
And, following them in flight, their general Humberd drowned,
In that great arm of sea by his great name renowned.
Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1612); see also xxviii.

Humgud'geon (Grace-be-here), a corporal in Cromwell's troop.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Humm (Anthony), chairman of the "Brick Lane Branch of the United Grand Junction Ebenezer Temperance Association."—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Humma, a fabulous bird, of which it was said that "the head over which the shadow of its wings passes will assuredly wear a crown."—Wilkes: South of India, v. 423.

Belike he thinks
The humma's happy wings have shadowed him,
And, therefore, Fate with royalty must crown
His chosen head.
Southey: Roderick, etc., xxiii. (1814).

Humourists of the Eighteenth Century, by Thackeray (1851–1853).

Humorous Lieutenant (The), the chief character and title of a comedy by Beaumont (?) and Fletcher (1647). (Beaumont died 1616.) The lieutenant has no name.

Humpback (The). Andrea Sola'ri, the Italian painter, was called Del Gobbo (1470–1527).

Geron'imo Amelunghi was also called Il Gobo di Pisa (sixteenth century).

Humphrey (Master), the hypothetical compiler of the tale entitled "Barnaby Rudge" in Master Humphrey's Clock, by Charles Dickens (1840).

Humphrey (Old), pseudonym of George Mogridge.

(George Mogridge also issued several books under the popular name of "Peter Parley," which was first assumed by S. G. Goodrich, in 1828. Several publishers of high standing have condescended to palm books on the public under this assumed name, some written by William Martin, and others by names wholly unknown.

Humphrey (The good duke), Humphrey Plantagenet, duke of Gloucester, youngest son of Henry IV., murdered in 1446.

To dine with duke Humphrey, to go without dinner. To stay behind in St. Paul's aisles, under pretence of finding out the monument of duke Humphrey, while others more fortunate go home to dinner.

(It was really the monument of John Beauchamp that the "dinnerless" hung about, and not that of duke Humphrey. John Beauchamp died in 1359, and duke Humphrey in 1446.)

¶ A similar phrase is, "To be the guest of the cross-legged knights," meaning the stone effigies in the Round Church (London). Lawyers at one time made this church the rendezvous of their clients, and here a host of dinnerless vagabonds used to loiter about, in the hope of picking up a job which would furnish them with the means of getting a dinner.

¶ "To dine or sup with sir Thomas Gresham" (q.v.) means the same thing, the Royal Exchange being at one time the great lounge of idlers.

Tho' little coin thy purseless pockets line,
Yet with great company thou'rt taken up;
For often with duke Humphrey thou dost dine,
And often with sir Thomas Gresham sup.
Hayman: Quodlibet (Epigram on a Loafer, 1628).

Humphrey's Clock (Master), the name given to a serial by Charles Dickens; but only two tales were included in the oublication (1840–1841). These tales were Barnaby Rudge and The Old Curiosity Shop, both of which were afterwards published separately.

Humphry Clinker. (See CLINKER, p. 219.)

Huncamunca (Princess), daughter of king Arthur and queen Dollallolla, beloved by lord Grizzle and Tom Thumb. The king promises her in marriage to the "pigmy giant-queller." Huncamunca kills Frizaletta "for killing her mamma." But Frizaletta killed the queen for killing her sweetheart Noodle, and the queen killed Noodle because he was the messenger of ill news.—Tom Thumb, by Fielding the novelist (1730), altered by O'Hara, author of Midas (1778).

Hunchback (The). Master Walter "the hunchback" was the guardian of Julia, and brought her up in the country, training her most strictly in knowledge and goodness. When grown to womanhood, she was introduced to sir Thomas Clifford, and they plighted their troth to each other. Then came a change. Clifford lost his title and estates, while Julia went to London, became a votary of fashion and pleasure, abandoned Clifford, and promised marriage to Wilford earl of Rochdale. The day of espousals came. The love of Julia for Clifford revived, and she implored her guardian to break off the obnoxious marriage. Master Walter now showed himself to be the earl of Rochdale, and the father of Julia; the marriage with Wilford fell through, and Julia became the wife of sir Thomas Clifford.—Knowles (1831).

¶ Similarly, Maria "the maid of the Oaks" was brought up by Oldworth as his ward, but was in reality his motherless child.—Burgoyne: The Maid of the Oaks (1779).

Hunchback (The Little), the buffoon of the sultan of Casgar. Supping with a tailor, the little fellow was killed by a bone sticking in his throat. The tailor, out of fear, carried the body to the house of a physician, and the physician, stumbling against it, knocked it downstairs. Thinking he had killed the man, he let the body down a chimney into the storeroom of his neighbour, who was a purveyor. The purveyor, supposing it to be a thief, belaboured it soundly; and then, thinking he had killed the little hunchback, carried the body into the street, and set it against a wall. A Christian merchant, reeling home, stumbled against the body, and gave it a blow with his fist. Just then the patrol came up, and arrested the merchant for murder. He was condemned to death; but the purveyor came forward and accused himself of being the real offender. The merchant was accordingly released, and the purveyor condemned to death; but then the physician appeared, and said he had killed the man by accident, having knocked him downstairs. When the purveyor was released, and the physician led away to execution, the tailor stepped up, and told his tale. All were then taken before the sultan, and acquitted; and the sultan ordered the case to be enrolled in the archives of his kingdom amongst the causes célèbres.—Arabian Nights ("The Little Hunchback").

¶ In the Legends and Stories of Ireland (1832–34), by Samuel Lover, is a story almost identical, excepting that the "deceased" is an old woman.

Hunchback of Notre Dame. (See QUASIMODO.)

Hundebert, steward to Cedric of Rotherwood—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Hundred Fights (Hero of a), Conn, son of Cormac king of Ireland. Called in Irish "Conn Keadcahagh."

> Conn of a hundred fights, sleep in thy grass-grown tomb.—O Gnive.

Admiral Horatio lord Nelson is so called (1758–1805).

Hundred-Handed (The). Briareos (4 syl.) or Ægæon, with his brothers Gygês and Kottos, were all hundred-handed giants.

Homer makes Briareos 4 syl.; but Shakespeare writes it in the Latin form, "Briareus," and makes it 3 syl.

> Then, called by thee, the monster Titan came,
> Whom gods Briareôs, men Ægêon name.
> Pope: Iliad, 1 (1715).
> He is a gouty Briareus. Many hands,
> And of no use.
> Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, act i. sc. 2 (1608).

Hundwolf, steward to the old lady of Baldringham.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Hungarian (An), one half-starved, one suffering from hunger. A pun.

> He is hide-bound; he is an Hungarian.—Howell: English Proverbs (1660).

Hungarian Brothers (The), a romance by Miss A. M. Porter (1807).

Hunia'des (4 syl.), called by the Turks "The Devil." He was surnamed "Corvinus," and the family crest was a crow (1400–1456).

The Turks employed the name of Huniadês to frighten their perverse children. He was corruptly called "Jancus Lain."—Gibbon: Decline and Fall, etc., xii. 166 (1776–88).

Hunsdon (Lord), cousin of queen Elizabeth.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Hunted Down, a tale by Charles Dickens (1860). A Mr. Sampson, chief manager of an insurance office, tells us how Julius Slinkton, having effected an insurance on the life of Alfred Beckwith, endeavoured to poison him, in order to get the insurance money. Being foiled, however, in his attempt, he committed suicide.

Hunter (Mr. and Mrs. Leo), persons who court the society of any celebrity, and consequently invite Mr. Pickwick and his three friends to an entertainment in their house. Mrs. Leo Hunter wrote an "Ode to an Expiring Frog," considered by her friends a most masterly performance.—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Can I view thee panting, lying
On thy stomach, without sighing;
Can I un'moved see thee dying
On a log, expiring frog!

Say, have fiends in shape of boys,
With wild balloo, and brutal noise,
Hunted thee from marshy joys,
With a dog, expiring frog!

Ch. xv.

Hunter (The Mighty), Nimrod; so called in Gen. x. 9.

Proud Nimrod first the bloody chase [war] began,
A mighty hunter, and his prey was man.
Pope: Windsor Forest (1713).

HUNTINGDON (Henry of), Henry archdeacon of Huntingdon (1100–1168), a chronicler who wrote a History of England (Historia Anglorum) from the invasion of Julius Cæsar to the death of Stephen. He was a poet also.

Huntingdon (Robert earl of), generally called "Robin Hood" (q.v.). In 1601 Anthony Munday and Henry Chettle produced a drama entitled The Downfall of Robert Earl of Huntingdon (attributed often to T. Heywood). Ben Jonson began a beautiful pastoral drama on the subject of Robin Hood (The Sad Shepherd, or A Tale of Robin Hood), but left only two acts of it when he died (1637). We have also Robin Hood and his Crew of Souldiers, a comedy acted at Nottingham, and printed 1661; Robin Hood, an opera (1730). J. Ritson edited, in 1795, Robin Hood: a Collection of Poems, Songs, and Ballads relative to that Celebrated English Outlaw.

Huntingdon (The earl of), in the court of queen Elizabeth.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Huntingdon (David earl of), prince royal of Scotland. He appears first as sir Kenneth, Knight of the Leopard, and afterwards as Zohauk the Nubian slave. —Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Huntingdon Sturgeon and Godmanchester Hogs.

During a very high flood in the meadows between Huntingdon and Godmanchester, something was seen floating, which the Godmanchester people thought was a black hog, and the Huntingdon folk declared was a sturgeon. When rescued from the waters, it proved to be a young donkey.—Brayebrook (Pepys: Diary, May 22, 1667).

Huntinglen (The earl of), an old Scotch nobleman.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Huntly (The marquis of), a royalist. —Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time Charles I.).

Huon, a serf, secretary and tutor of the countess Catherine, with whom he falls in love. He reads with music in his voice, talks enchantingly, writes admirably, translates "dark languages," is "wise in rare philosophy," is master of the hautboy, lute, and viol, "proper in trunk and limb and feature;" but the proud countess, though she loves him, revolts from the idea of marrying a serf. At length it comes to the ears of the duke that his daughter loves Huon, and the duke commands him, on pain of death, to marry Catherine, a freed serf. He refuses, till the countess interferes; he then marries, and rushes to the wars. Here he greatly distinguishes himself, and is created a prince, when he learns that the Catherine he has wed is not Catherine the freed serf, but Catherine the countess.—Knowles: Love (1840).

Huon de Bordeaux (Sir), who married Esclairmond, and, when Oberon went to paradise, succeeded him as "king of all Faëry."

In the second part, Huon visits the terrestrial paradise, and encounters Cain, the first murderer, in performance of his penance.—Huon de Bordeaux.

N.B.—An abstract of this romance is in Dunlop's History of Fiction. (See also Keightley's Fairy Mythology.) It is also the subject of Wieland's Oberon, which has been translated by Sotheby.

Hûr al Oyûn, the black-eyed daughters of paradise, created of pure musk. They are free from all bodily weakness, and are ever young. Every believer will have seventy-two of these girls as his household companions in paradise, and those who desire children will see them grow to maturity in an hour.—Al Korân, Sale's notes.

Hurgonel (Count), the betrothed of Orna sister of duke Gondibert.—Davenant: Gondibert, iii. 1 (died 1668).

Hurlo-Thrumbo, a burlesque which had an extraordinary run at the Haymarket Theatre.—Samuel Johnson (not Dr. S. Johnson): Hurlo-Thrumbo, or The Supernatural (1730).

Consider, then, before, like Hurlo-Thrumbo,
You aim your club at any creed on earth,
That, by the simple accident of birth,
You might have been high priest to Mumbo-Jumbo.
Hood.

Hurry, servant of Oldworth of Oldworth Oaks. He is always out of breath, wholly unable to keep quiet or stand still, and proves the truth of the proverb, "The more haste the worse speed." He fancies all things go wrong if he is not bustling about, and he is a constant fidget. —Burgoyne: The Maid of the Oaks (1779).

Poor Weston! "Hurry" was one of his last parts, and was taken from real life. I need not tell those who remember this genuine representer of nature, that in "Hurry" he threw the audience into loud fits of mirth without discomposing a muscle of his features [1757–1776].—T. Davies.

Hurtali, a giant who reigned in the time of the Flood.

The Massorets affirm that Hurtali, being too big to get into the ark, sat astride upon it, as children stride a wooden horse.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, ii. 1 (1545).

(Minage says that the rabbins assert that it was Og, not Hurtâli, who thus outrode the Flood. See Le Pelletier, chap. xxv. of his Noah's Ark.)

Husbandry (Five Hundred Points of Good), by Tusser (1557). (See Southey's Early British Poets.)

Hush'ai (2 syl.), in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is Hyde earl of Rochester. As Hushai was David's friend and wise counsellor, so was Hyde the friend and wise counsellor of Charles II. As the counsel of Hushai rendered abortive that of Achitophel, and caused the plot of Absalom to miscarry, so the counsel of Hyde rendered abortive that of lord Shaftesbury, and caused the plot of Monmouth to miscarry.

Hushai, the friend of David in distress;
In public storms of manly steadfastness;
By foreign treaties he informed his youth,
And joined experience to his native truth.
Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, i. 809–812 (1681).

Hut'cheon, the auld domestic in Wandering Willie's tale.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Hut'cheon, one of Julian Avenel's retainers.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Hutin (Le), Louis X. of France; so called from his expedition against the Hutins, a seditious people of Navarre and Lyons (1289, 1314–1316).

Hy'acinth, son of Amyclas the Spartan king. He was playing quoits with Apollo, when the wind drove the quoit of the sun-god against the boy's head, and killed him on the spot. From the blood grew the flower called hyacinth, which bears on its petals the words, "Ai! Ai!" ("Alas! alas!").—Grecian Fable.

Hyacinthe (3 syl.), the daughter of seigneur Géronte (2 syl.), who passed in Tarentum under the assumed name of Pandolphe (2 syl.). When he quitted Tarentum, he left behind him his wife and daughter Hyacinthe. Octave (2 syl.) son of Argante (2 syl.) fell in love with Hyacinthe (supposing her surname to be Pandolphe), and Octave's father wanted him to marry the daughter of his friend seigneur Géronte. The young man would not listen to his father, and declared that Hyacinthe, and Hyacinthe alone, should be his wife. It was then explained to him that Hyacinthe Pandolphe was the same person as Hyacinthe Géronte, and that the choice of father and son were in exact accord.—Molière: Les Fourberies de Sapin (1671).

(In The Cheats of Scapin, Otway's version of this play, Hyacinthe is called "Clara," her father Géronte "Gripe," and Octave is Anglicized into "Octavian.")

Hyde. (See JEKYLL AND HYDE.)

Hyder Ali Khan Behander, the nawaub of Mysore (2 syl.), disguised as the sheik Hali.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Hydra or Dragon of the Hesperian grove. The golden apples of the Hesperian field were guarded by women called the Hesperidês, assisted by the hydra or dragon named Ladon.

Her flowery store
To thee nor Tempê shall refuse, nor watch
Of wingèd hydra guard Hesperian fruits
From thy free spoil.
Akenside: Pleasures of Imagination, i. (1744).

Hy'dromel properly means a mixture of honey and water; but Mrs. Browning, in her Drama of Exile, speaks of a "mystic hydromel," which corresponds to the classic nectar or drink of the immortals. This "mystic hydromel" was given to Adam and Eve, and held them "immortal" as long as they lived in Eden, but when they fell it was poured out upon the earth.

[And] now our right hand hath no cup remaining . . .
[For] the mystic hydromel is spilt.
Mrs. Browning: A Drama of Exile (1850).

Hydropsy, personified by Thomson—

On limbs enormous, but withal unsound,
Soft-swoln and wan, here lay pale Hydropsy,— Unwieldy man; with belly monstrous round,
For ever fed with watery supply,
For still he drank, and yet was ever dry.
Castle of Indolence, i. 75 (1748).

Hymbercourt (Baron d'), one of the duke of Burgundy's officers.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Hymen, god of marriage; the personification of the bridal song; marriage.

Till Hymen brought his love-delighted hour,
There dwelt no joy in Eden's rosy bower . . .
The world was sad, the garden was a wild,
And man, the hermit, sighed—till woman smiled.
Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, ii. (1799).

Hymettus, a mountain in Attica, noted for honey.

And the brown bees of Hymettus
Make their honey not so sweet.
Mrs. Browning: Wine of Cyprus, 7.

Hymn Tunes. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 641, col. 1.)

Hyndman (Master), usher to the council-chamber at Holyrood.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Hypatia, a novel by Charles Kingsley (1853). Hypatia was born in Alexandria, A.D. 370. She attracted vast crowds by her lectures on philosophy and neo-Platonism. She was a most modest, graceful, and beautiful young woman, but the Christian clergy, headed by archbishop Cyril, stirred up the rabble against her. They seized her, dragged her into one of the churches of Alexandria, and literally tore her to pieces (A.D. 415). It is one of the saddest tales in history.

Hyperi'on, the sun. His parents were Cœlum and Tellus (heaven and earth). Strictly speaking, he was the father of the sun, but Homer uses the word for the sun itself.

When the might
Of Hyperion from his noon-tide throne
Unbends their languid pinions [i.e. of the winds].
Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads (1767).

Shakespeare incorrectly throws the accent on the second syllable: "Hyper'ion to a satyr" (Hamlet, act i. sc. 2). In this almost all English poets have erred with Shakespeare; but Akenside accents the word correctly, and in Fuimus Troes we have—

Blow, gentle Africus,
Play on our poops, when Hyperion's son
Shall couch in west. (1633.)

Placat equo Persis radiis Hyperione cinctum.
Ovid: Fasti, i. 385.

 Keats has left the fragment of a poem entitled Hyperion, of which Byron says, "It seems inspired by the Titans, and is as sublime as Æschylus."

Hyperion, a romance by Longfellow. The hero, Paul Flemming, was heart-broken at the loss of a dear friend. He travelled abroad, to try and assuage his grief, and spent a winter in Heidelberg, where he buried himself in "old dusty books," and held long discussions with his friend the baron of Hohenfels. He met an English lady, Mary Ashburton, and loved her, but pride parted them, and they separated never to meet again. Paul Flemming wandered through many lands, and in a little chapel, on a marble tablet, found the words of consolation which no friend had yet spoken. He determined to face life again, and "be strong." The story is interwoven with charming translations from German poety; most of which are collected in the volume of Longfellow's Poems.

Hypnos, god of sleep, brother of Oneiros (dreams) and Thanătos (death).

In every creature that breathes, from the conqueror resting on a field of blood, to the nest-bird cradled in its bed of leaves, Hypnos holds a sovereignty which nothing mortal can long resist.—Ouida: Folle-Farine, iii. 12.

Hypochondria, personified by Thomson—

And moping here, did Hypochondria sit,
Mother of spleen, in robes of various dye . . .
And some her frantic deemed, and some her doomed a wit.
Castle of Indolence, i. 75 (1748).

Hypocrisy is the homage which vice renders to virtue.

L'hypocrisie est un hommage que le vice rend à la vertu.—Rochefoucauld.

Hyp'ocrite (The), Dr. Cantwell in the English comedy by Isaac Bickerstaff, and Tartuffe in the French comedy by Molière. He pretends to great sanctity, but makes his "religion" a mere trade for getting money, advancing his worldly prospects, and for the better indulgence of his sensual pleasures. Dr. Cantwell is made the guest of sir John Lambert (in French "Orgon"), who looks on him as a saint, and promises him his daughter in marriage; but his mercenary views and his love-making to lady Lambert being at length exposed, sir John forbids him to remain in the house, and a tipstaff arrests him for a felonious fraud (1768).

Hyp'ocrites (The). Abdallah ibn Obba and his partizans were so called by Mahomet.

Hyp'ocrites (The prince of), Tiberius Cæsar (B.C. 42, 14 to A.D. 37).

Hyppolito. (See HIPPOLYTUS.)

Hyrcan Tiger. Hyrcania is in Asia Minor, south-east of the Caspian Sea. Bouillet says, "Ce pays était tout entouré de montagnes remplies de tigres."

> Restore thy fierce and cruel mind
> To Hircan tigres and to ruthless bears.
> Daniel: Sonnets (1594).

> Approach thou like the Russian bear,
> The armed rhinoceros, or the Hyrcan tiger;
> Take any form but that, and my firm nerves
> Shall never tremble.
> Shakespeare: Macbeth, act III. sc. 5 (1606).

Hythloday (Raphael), the imaginary adventurer who discovered Utopia, and gave an account of it to sir Thomas More.

I.

Iachimo [Yak'-i-mo], an Italian libertine. When Posthu'mus, the husband of Imogen, was banished for marrying the king's daughter, he went to Rome, and in the house of Philario the conversation fell on the fidelity of wives. Posthumus bet a diamond ring that nothing could change the fidelity of Imogen, and Iachamo accepted the wager. The libertine contrived to get into a chest in Imogen's chamber, made himself master of certain details, and took away with him a bracelet belonging to Imogen. With these vouchers, Iachimo easily persuaded Posthumus that he had won the bet, and Posthumus handed over to him the ring. A battle subsequently ensued, in which Iachimo and other Romans, with Imogen disguised as a page, were made prisoners, and brought before king Cymbeline. Imogen was set free, and told to ask a boon. She asked that Iachimo might be compelled to say how he came by the ring which he had on his finger, and the whole villainy was brought to light. Posthumus was pardoned, and all ended happily.—Shakespeare: Cymbeline (1605).

∴ The tale of Cymbeline is from the Decameron of Boccaccio (day ii. 9), in which Iachimo is called "Ambrose," Imogen is "Zineura," her husband Bernard "Lomellin," and Cymbeline is the "sultan." The assumed name of Imogen is "Fidelè," but in Boccaccio it is "Sicurano da Finale."

Ia'go (2 or 3 syl.), ancient of Othello commander of the Venetian army, and husband of Emilia. Iago hated Othello, both because Cassio (a Florentine) was promoted to the lieutenancy over his head, and also from a suspicion that the Moor had tampered with his wife; but he concealed his hatred so artfully that Othello felt confident of his "love and honesty." Iago strung together such a mass of circumstantial evidence in proof of Desdemona's love for Cassio, that the Moor killed her out of jealousy. One main argument was that Desdemona had given Cassio the very handkerchief which Othello had given her as a love-gift; but in reality Iago had induced his wife Emilia to purloin the handkerchief. When this villainy was brought to light, Othello stabbed Iago; but his actual death is no incident of the tragedy.—Shakespeare: Othello (1611).

> The cool malignity of Iago, silent in his resentment, subtle in his designs, and studious at once of his interest and his vengeance, . . . are such proofs of Shakespeare's skill in human nature as it would be vain to seek in any modern writer.—Dr. Johnson.

(Byron, speaking of John P. Kemble, says, "Was not his 'Iago' perfection—particularly the last look? I was close to him, and I never saw an English countenance half so expressive.") Iambic Verse (The Father of), Archil'ochos of Paros (B.C. 714-676).

IANTHE (3 syl.), in The Siege of Rhodes, by sir William Davenant (1656).

> Mrs. Betterton was called "Ianthe" by Pepys, in his Diary, as having performed that character to his great approval. The old gossip greatly admired her, and praised her "sweet voice and incomparable acting."—W. C. Russell: Representative Actors.

Ianthe (3 syl.), to whom lord Byron dedicated his Childe Harold, was lady Charlotte Harley, daughter of the earl of Oxford (afterwards lady Charlotte Bacon), who was only eleven years old at the time (1809).

Ianthe. (See IPHIS, p. 526.)

Ianthe, in Shelley's Queen Mab. (See MAB.)

Ibe'ria's Pilot, Christopher Columbus. Spain is called "Iberia" and the Spaniards the "Ibe'ri." The river Ebro is a corrupt form of the Latin word Ibe'rus.

Launched with Iberia's pilot from the steep,
To worlds unknown, and isles beyond the deep.
Campbell: The Pleasures of Hope, ii. (1799).

Iblis ["despair"], called Aza'zil before he was cast out of heaven. He refused to pay homage to Adam, and was rejected by God.—Al Korân.

"We created you, and afterwards formed you, and all worshipped except Eblis." . . . And God said unto him, "What hindered you from worshipping Adam, since I commanded it?" He answered, "I am more excellent than he. Thou hast created me of fire, but him of clay." God said, "Get thee down, therefore, from paradise . . . thou shalt be one of the contemptible."—Al Korân, vii.

Ib'rahim or L'Illustre Bassa, an heroic romance of Mdlle. de Scudéri (1641).

Ice'ni (3 syl.), the people of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, and Huntingdonshire. Their metropolis was Venta (Caistor, near Norwich).—Richard of Cirencester: Chronicle, vi. 30.

The Angles, . . . allured with . . . the fittness of the place
Where the Iceni lived, did set their kingdom down . . .
And the East Angles' kingdom those English did insade.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xvi. (1613).

Ida, the name of the princess in Tennyson's poem called The Princess (1847–1850).

Idalia, Venus; so called from Idălium, a town in Cyprus, where she was worshipped.

Iden (Alexander), a poor squire of Kent, who slew Jack Cade the rebel, and brought the head to king Henry VI., for which service the king said to him—

Iden, kneel down. Rise up a knight.
We give thee for reward a thousand marks;
And will that thou henceforth attend on us.
Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI. act v. sc. 1 (1592).

Idenstein (Baron), nephew of general Kleiner governor of Prague. He marries Adolpha, who turns out to be the sister of Meeta called "The Maid of Mariendorpt."—Knowles: The Maid of Mariendorpt (1838).

Identity. (See MISTAKEN IDENTITY.)

Idiot (The Inspired), Oliver Goldsmith. So called by Horace Walpole (1728–1774).

Idle Lake, the lake on which Phædria (wantonness) cruised in her gondola. One had to cross this lake to get to Wandering Island.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. (1590).

Idleness (The lake of). Whoever drank thereof grew instantly "faint and weary." The Red Cross Knight drank of it, and was readily made captive by Orgoglio.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. (1590).

Idom'eneus [I-dom'-e-nuce], king of Crete. He made a vow when he left Troy, if the gods would vouchsafe him a safe voyage, to sacrifice to them the first living being that he encountered in his own kingdom. The first living object he met was his own son, and when the father fulfilled his vow, he was banished from his country as a murderer.

¶ Agamemnon vowed to Diana to offer up in sacrifice to her the most beautiful thing that came into his possession within the next twelve months. This was an infant daughter; but Agamemnon deferred the offering till Iphigeni'a (his daughter) was full grown. The fleet, on its way to Troy, being wind-bound at Aulis, the prophet Kalchas told Agamemnon it was because the vow had not been fulfilled; accordingly Iphigenia was laid on the altar for sacrifice, but Diana interposed, carried the victim to Tauris, and substituted a hind in her place. Iphigenia in Tauris became a priestess of Diana.

¶ Abraham, being about to sacrifice his son to Jehovah, was stayed by a voice from heaven, and a ram was substituted for the lad Isaac.—Gen. xxii.

Idwal, king of North Wales, and son of Roderick the Great. (See LUDWAL.)

Idy'a, the pastoral name of Britannia, "the most beauteous of all the darlings of Oceanus."—W. Browne: Britannia's Pastorals (1613).

Idylls of the King, a series of poems by Tennyson (between 1859 and 1872), in twelve books, with a dedication to the memory of the prince consort, and an epilogue to the queen. The titles are—

The Coming of Arthur; Gareth and Lynette; The Marriage of Geraint; Geraint and Enid; Balin and Balan; Merlin and Vivien; Lancelot and Elaine; The Holy Grail; Pelleas and Ettarre; The Last Tournament; Guinevere; The Passing of Arthur.

Ier'ne (3 syl.), Ireland. Pytheas (contemporary with Aristotle) was the first to call the island by this name.

The green Ierne's shore.
Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, ii. (1799).

Iger'na, Igerne (3 syl.), or Igrayne (3 syl.), wife of Gorlois duke of Tintag'el, in Cornwall. Igerna married Uther the pendragon of the Britons, and thus became the mother of prince Arthur. The second marriage took place a few hours after the duke's death, but was not made public till thirteen days afterwards.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur (1470).

 Tennyson spells the name Ygerne, and makes Uther conquer and slay Gorlois, and then forcibly marry the widow.

Igna'ro, foster-father of Orgoglio. The old dotard walked one way and looked another. To every question put to him, his invariable answer was, "I cannot tell."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. (1590).

¶ Lord Flint, chief minister of state to one of the sultans of India, used to reply to every disagreeable question, "My people know, no doubt; but I cannot recollect."—Mrs. Inchbald: Such Things Are (1786).

¶ The Italian witnesses summoned on the trial of queen Charlotte, answered to almost every question, "Non mi ricordo."

¶ The "Know-Nothings" of the United States reply to every question, about their secret society, "I know nothing about it."

Igna'tius (Father), Joseph Leycester Lyne, born 1837, monk of the order of St. Benedict (1862). He established a community at Llanthony Abbey, where he lives.

Ignatius (Father), the Hon. and Rev. George Spencer, superior of the order of Passionists (1799-1864).

Ig'noge (3 syl.), daughter of Pan'drasus of Greece, given as wife to Brute mythical king of Britain. Spenser calls her "Inogene" (3 syl.), and Drayton "Innogen."—Geoffrey: British History, i. 11 (1142).

I. H. S. In German, I[esus], H[eiland], S[eligmacher], i.e. Jesus, Saviour, Sanctifier. In Greek, I[ησους], H[μετερος], Σ[ωτηρ], i.e. Jesus, Our Saviour. In Latin, I[esus], H[ominum] S[alvator], i.e. Jesus, Men's Saviour. Those who would like an English equivalent may adopt J[esus], H[eavenly] S[aviour].

The Latin equivalent is attributed to St. Bernardine of Sienna (1347).

Ilderton (Miss Lucy and Miss Nancy), cousins to Miss Vere.—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Il'iad (3 syl.), the tale of the siege of Troy, an epic poem in twenty-four books, by Homer. Menelāos, king of Sparta, received as a guest Paris, a son of Priam king of Troy. Paris eloped with Helen, his host's wife, and Menelaos induced the Greeks to lay siege to Troy, to avenge the perfidy. The siege lasted ten years, when Troy was taken and burnt to the ground. Homer's poem is confined to the last year of the siege.

Book I. opens with a pestilence in the Grecian camp, sent by the sun-god to avenge his priest Chrysēs. The case is this: Chrysēs wished to ransom his daughter, whom Agamemnon, the Greek commander-in-chief, kept as a concubine, but Agamemnon refused to give her up; so the priest prayed to Apollo for vengeance, and the god sent a pestilence. A council being called, Achillēs upbraids Agamemnon as the cause of the divine wrath, and Agamemnon replies he will give up the priest's daughter, but shall take instead Achillēs's concubine. On hearing this, Achillēs declares he will no longer fight for such an extortionate king, and accordingly retires to his tent and sulks there.

II. Jupiter, being induced to take the part of Achillēs, now sends to Agamemnon a lying dream, which induces him to believe that he shall take the city at once; but in order to see how the soldiers are affected by the retirement of Achillēs, the king calls them to a council of war, asks them if it will not be better to give up the siege and return home. He thinks the soldiers will shout "no" with one voice; but they rush to their ships, and would set sail at once if they were not restrained by those privy to the plot.

III. The soldiers, being brought back are then arrayed for battle. Paris proposes to decide the contest by single combat, and Menelaos accepts the challenge. Paris, being overthrown, is carried off by Venus, and Agamemnon demands that the Trojans shall give up Troy in fulfilment of the compact.

IV. While Agamemnon is speaking, Pandārus draws his bow at Menelaos and wounds him, and the battle becomes general.

V. Pandarus, who had violated the truce, is killed by Diomed.

VI. Hector, the general of the Trojan allied armies, recommends that the Trojan women in a body should supplicate the gods to pardon the sin of Pandarus, and in the mean time he and Paris make a sally from the city gate.

VII. Hector fights with Ajax in single combat, but the combatants are parted by the heralds, who declare it a drawn battle; so they exchange gifts and return to their respective tents.

VIII. The Grecian host, being discomfited, retreats; and Hector prepares to assault the enemy's camp.

IX. A deputation is sent to Achillēs, but the sulky hero remains obdurate.

X. A night attack is made on the Trojans by Diomed and Ulyssēs;

XI. And the three Grecian chiefs

(Agamemnon, Diomed, and Ulyssês) are all wounded.

XII. The Trojans force the gates of the Grecian ramparts.

XIII. A tremendous battle ensues, in which many on both sides are slain.

XIV. While Jupiter is asleep, Neptune interferes in the quarrel in behalf of the Greeks;

XV. But Jupiter rebukes him, and Apollo, taking the side of the Trojans, puts the Greeks to a complete rout. The Trojans, exulting in their success, prepare to set fire to the Grecian camp.

XVI. In this extremity, Patroclos arrays himself in Achillês's armour, and leads the Myrmidons to the fight; but he is slain by Hector.

XVII. Achillês is told of the death of his friend;

XVIII. Resolves to return to the battle;

XIX. And is reconciled to Agamemnon.

XX. A general battle ensues, in which the gods are permitted to take part.

XXI. The battle rages with great fury, the slaughter is frightful; but the Trojans, being routed, retreat into their town, and close the gates.

XXII. Achillês slays Hector before he is able to enter the gates, and the battle is at an end. Nothing now remains but XXIII. To burn the body of Patroclos, and celebrate the funeral games.

XXIV. Old Priam, going to the tent of Achillês, craves the body of his son Hector; Achillês gives it up, and the poem concludes with the funeral rites of the Trojan hero.

For English translations in verse, see under HOMER.

N.B.—Virgil continues the tale from this point. Shows how the city was taken and burnt, and then continues with the adventures of Æne'as, who escapes from the burning city, makes his way to Italy, marries the king's daughter, and succeeds to the throne. (See ÆNEID.)

Iliad in a Nutshell (The). Pliny tells us that the Iliad was once copied in so small a hand that the whole of the twenty-four books were shut up in a nutshell.—Hist., vii. 21.

N.B.—Huet, bishop of Avranches, demonstrated the possibility of this being the case by writing eighty lines of the Iliad on the space occupied by one line of this dictionary, so that the whole Iliad might be got into about two-thirds of a single page.

¶ In No. 530 of the Harleian MSS. is an account of a similar performance by Peter Bales, a Chancery clerk in the reign of queen Elizabeth. He wrote out, in 1590, the whole Bible, and enclosed his MS. in a walnut-shell. Bales's MS. contained as many leaves as an ordinary Bible, but the size of the leaves was reduced, and the paper was as thin as possible.

(I have myself seen the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, the Apostles' Creed, and "God save the King!" all written on a space not larger than a silver threepence; and who has not seen a sheet of the Times newspaper reduced to the size of a locket?)

¶ The Iliad in a nutshell is quite outdone by the web given to a prince by the White Cat. It was wrapped in a millet seed, and was 400 yards long. What was more wonderful than this: there were painted on it all sorts of birds, beasts, and fishes; fruits, trees, and plants; rocks and sea-shells; the sun, moon, stars, and planets; the likenesses of all the kings and princes of the world, with their wives, mistresses, and children, all dressed in the proper costume.

> The prince took out of a box, covered with rubies, a walnut, which he cracked, and saw inside it a small hazel nut, which he cracked also, and found inside a kernel of wax. He peeled the kernel, and discovered a corn of wheat, and in the wheat-corn was a grain of millet, which contained a web 400 yards in length.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1682).

Iliad of Old English Literature, "The Knight's Tale" of Palámon and Arcite (2 syl.) in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales (1388). (See ARCITE, p. 56.)

Iliad of Woes (Latin, Ilias malo'rum), a world of disasters (Cicero, Attic., viii. 11). Homer's Iliad is an epic of "woe" from beginning to end.

> Let others boast of blood, and spoils of foes,
> Fierce rapines, murders, Iliads of woes.
> Drummond: Death of Maliades (1616).

Ilis'sus, one of the rivers on which Athens was situated. Plato lays the scene of many of the best conversations of Socratês on the banks of this river.

> . . . the thymy vale,
> Where oft, enchanted with Socratic sounds,

Imis, the daughter and only child of an island king. She was enamoured of her cousin Philax. A fay named Pagan loved her, and, seeing she rejected his suit, shut up Imis and Philax in the "Palace of Revenge." This palace was of crystal, and contained everything the heart could desire except the power of leaving it. For a time, Imis and Philax were happy enough, but after a few years they longed as much for separation as they had once wished to be united.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Palace of Revenge," 1682).

Imitatione Christi (De), generally attributed to Thomas à Kempis (1415). English translations by dean Stanhope (1866), by bishop Goodwin (1868), by Bentham (1874), and many others.

Imlac of Goiama, near the mouth of the Nile; the son of a rich merchant. Imlac was a great traveller and a poet, who accompanied Rasselas in his rambles, and returned with him to the "happy valley."—Dr. Johnson: Rasselas (1759).

Immortal Four of Italy (The): Dantê (1265-1321), Petrarch (1304-1374), Ariosto (1474-1533), and Tasso (1544-1595).

> The poets read he o'er and o'er,

Imogen, daughter of Cym'beline (3 syl.) king of Britain, married clandestinely Posthumus Leonātus. Posthumus, being banished for the offence, retired to Rome. One day, in the house of Philario, the conversation turned on the merits of wives, and Posthumus bet his diamond ring that nothing could tempt the fidelity of Imogen. Iachimo accepted the wager, laid his plans, and after due time induced Posthumus to believe that Imogen had played false showing, by way of proof, a bracelet, which he affirmed she had given him; so Posthumus handed over to him the ring given him by Imogen at parting. Posthumus now ordered his servant Pisanio to inveigle Imogen to Milford Haven, under pretence of seeing her husband, and to murder her on the road; but Pisanio told Imogen his instructions, advised her to enter the service of Lucius, the Roman general in Britain, as a page, and promised that he would make Posthumus believe that she was dead. This was done; and not long afterwards a battle ensued, in which the Romans were defeated, and Lucius, Iachimo, and Imogen were taken prisoners. Posthumus also took part in the battle, and obtained for his services the royal pardon. The captives being brought before Cymbeline, Lucius entreated the king to liberate Imogen. The petition was not only granted, but Imogen was permitted, at the same time, to ask a boon of the British king. She only begged that Iachimo should inform the court how he came by the ring he was wearing on his finger. The whole villainy was thus revealed, a reconciliation took place, and all ended happily. (See ZINEURA.)—Shakespeare: Cymbeline (1605).

> "Juliet," "Rosalind," "the lady Constance," "Portia," "lady Macbeth," and the divine "Imogen" [all Shakespeare] crowd upon our fancy; to have seen Miss Faucit in these characters is to have seen a whole world of poetry revealed.—Dublin University Magazine, 1846.

Im'ogine (The Fair), the lady betrothed to Alonzo "the Brave," and who said to him, when he went to the wars, "If ever I marry another, may thy ghost be present at the bridal feast, and bear me off to the grave." Alonzo fell in battle; Imogine married another; and, at the marriage feast, Alonzo's ghost, claiming the fulfilment of the compact, carried away the bride.—Lewis: Alonzo the Brave and the Fair Imogine (1795).

Im'ogine (The lady), wife of St. Aldobrand. Before her marriage, she was courted by count Bertram, but the attachment fell through, because Bertram was outlawed and became the leader of a gang of thieves. It so happened one day that Bertram, being shipwrecked off the coast of Sicily, was conveyed to the castle of lady Imogine, and the old attachment revived on both sides. Bertram murdered St. Aldobrand; Imogine, going mad, expired in the arms of Bertram; and Bertram killed himself.—Maturin: Bertram (1816).

Imoin'da (3 syl.), daughter of a white man, who went to the court of Angola, changed his religion, and grew great as commander of the forces. His daughter was married to prince Oroonoko. Soon afterwards the young prince was trapanned by captain Driver, taken to Surinam, and sold for a slave. Here he met his young wife, whom the lieutenant-governor wanted to make his mistress, and Oroonoko headed a rising of the slaves. The end of the story is that Imoinda slew herself; and Oroonoko, having stabbed the lieutenant-governor, put an end to his own life.—Southern: Oroonoko (1696).

Impertinent (The Curious), an Italian, who, to make trial of his wife's fidelity, persuades his friend to try and seduce her. The friend succeeds in winning the lady's love, and the impertinent curiosity of the husband is punished by the loss of his friend and wife too.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. 5 (an episode, 1605).

Impostors (Literary). (See FORGERS AND FORGERIES.)

Improvisators.

(1) ACCOLTI (Bernardo), of Arezzo, called the Unico Aretino (1465–1535).

(2) AQUILANO (Serafino), born at Aquila (1466–1500).

(3) BANDETTINI (Teresa), (1763–*).

Marone, Quercio, and Silvio ANTONIANO (eighteenth century).

(4) BERONICIUS (P. J.), who could convert extempore into Latin or Greek verse, a Dutch newspaper or anything else which he heard (died 1676).

(5) CHRISTOPHER, an Italian, was surnamed Altissimo, for his talent in improvising (1514).

(6) CORILLA (Maria Maddelana Fernandes), of Pistoia. Mde. de Staël has borrowed her Corinne from this improvisatrix. Crowned at Rome in 1776 (1740–1800).

(7) GIANNI (Francesco), an Italian, made imperial poet by Napoleon, whose victories he celebrated in verse (1759–1822).

(8) JEHÁN (Núr), of Bengal, during the sultanship of Jehángher. She was the inventor of the otto of roses (died 1645).

(9) KARSCHIN (Anna Louisa), of Germany (1722–1791).

(10) MARONE (Andreas), (1474–1527).

(11) MAZZA (Angelo), the most talented of all improvisators (1741–1817).

(12) METASTASIO (P. A. D. B.), of Assisi, who developed at the age of ten a wonderful talent for extemporizing in verse (1698–1782).

(13) PERFETTI (Bernardino), of Sienna, who received a laurel crown in the capitol, an honour conferred only on Petrarch and Tasso (1681–1747).

(14) PETRARCH (Francesco), who introduced the amusement of improvisation (1304–1374).

(15) QUERNO (Camillo), (1470–1528).

(16) ROSSI, beheaded at Naples in 1799.

(17) SERAFINO D'AQUILA. (See above, "Aquilano.")

(18) SERIO, beheaded at Naples in 1799.

(19) SGRICCI (Tommaso), of Tuscany (1788–1832). His Death of Charles I., Death of Mary Queen of Scots, and Fall of Missolonghi are very celebrated.

(20) TADDEI (Rosa), (1801–*).

(21) ZUCCHI (Marco Antonio), of Verona (*–1764).

∴ To these add Cicconi, Bindocci, Sestini; the brothers Clercq of Holland, Wolf of Altŏna, Langenschwarz of Germany, Eugène de Pradel of France, and our own Thomas Hood (1798–1845).

In Memoriam, a poem in various sections, written between the years 1833 and 1850, by Tennyson, in memory of his friend Arthur H. Hallam, who died in 1833.

Inchcape Rock (The), east of the Isle of May, twelve miles from all land, in the German Sea. Here a warning bell was floated on a buoy by the forethought of an abbot of Aberbrothok. Southey says that Ralph the Rover, in a mischievous freak, cut the bell from the buoy, and it fell into the depths; but on his return voyage his boat ran on the rock, and Ralph was drowned.

> In old times upon the saide rocke there was a bell fixed upon a timber, which rang continually, being moved by the sea, giving notice to saylers of the danger. This bell was put there and maintained by the abbot of Aberbrothok, but being taken down by a sea-pirate, a yeare thereafter he perished upon the same rocke, with ship and goodes, in the righteous judgement of God.—Stoddart: Remarks on Scotland.

¶ A similar story is told of St. Govan's bell, in Pembrokeshire. The silver bell was stolen one night from the chapel by pirates; but no sooner had their boat put out to sea, than all the crew were wrecked.

The silver bell was carried by sea-nymphs to a well, and whenever the stone of that well is struck the bell is heard to moan.

Inconstant (The), a comedy by G. Farquhar (1702). "The inconstant" is young Mirabel, who shilly-shallies with Oria'na till she saves him from being murdered by four bravoes in the house of Lamorce (2 syl.).

This comedy is a réchauffé of the Wild-goose Chase, by Beaumont (?) and Fletcher (1652). (Beaumont died 1616.)

Incorruptible (The). Maximilien Robespierre was so called by his friends in the Revolution (1756–1794).

¶ "William Shippen," says Horace Walpole, "is the only man proof against a bribe."

¶ Fabricius, the Roman hero, could not be corrupted by bribes, nor influenced by threats. Pyrrhus declared it would be as easy to divert the sun from its course as Fabricius from the path of duty.—Roman Story.

In'cubus, a spirit half human and half angelic, living in mid-air between the moon and our earth.—Geoffrey: British History, vi. 18 (1142).

Indian File, one by one. The American Indians, when they go on an attack, march one by one. The one behind carefully steps in the foot-marks of the one before, and the last of the file obliterates the foot-prints. By this means their direction and number are not detected.

Each man followed his leader in Indian file.—Captain Burnaby: On Horseback through Asia Minor (1877).

Indra, god of the elements. His palace is described by Southey in The Curse of Kehama, vii. 10 (1809).

Inesilla de Cantarilla, daughter of a Spanish lute-maker. She had the unusual power of charming the male sex during the whole course of her life, which exceeded 75 years. Idolized by the noblemen of the old court, she saw herself adored by those of the new. Even in her old age she had a noble air, an enchanting wit, and graces peculiar to herself suited to her years.—Lesage: Gil Blas, viii. 1 (1735).

Inez of Cadiz, addressed in Childe Harold, i. (after stanza 84). Nothing known of her.

Inez (Donna), mother of don Juan. She trained her son according to prescribed rules with the strictest propriety, and designed to make him a model of all virtues. Her husband was don José, whom she worried to death by her prudery and want of sympathy. Donna Inez was a "blue-stocking," learned in all the sciences, her favourite one being "the mathematical." She knew every European language, "a little Latin and less Greek." In a word, she was "perfect as perfect is," according to the standard of Miss Edgeworth, Mrs. Trimmer, and Hannah More, but had "a great opinion of her own good qualities." Like Tennyson's "Maud," this paragon of women was, to those who did not look too narrowly, "faultily faultless, icily regular, splendidly null."—Byron: Don Juan, i. 10–30 (1819).

Inez de Castro, crowned six years after her death. The tale is this: Don Pedro, son of Alfonso IV. of Portugal, privately married, in 1345, the "beauty of Castile," and Alfonso was so indignant that he commanded her to be put to death (1355). Two years afterwards, don Pedro succeeded to the crown, and in 1361 had the body of Inez exhumed and crowned.

∴ Camoens, the Portuguese poet, has introduced this story in his Lusiad. A. Ferreira, another Portuguese poet, has a tragedy called Inez de Castro (1554); Lamotte produced a tragedy with the same title (1723); and Guiraud another in 1826. (See next art.)

Inez de Castro, the bride of prince Pedro of Portugal, to whom she was clandestinely married. The king Alfonso and his minister Gonzalez, not knowing of this marriage, arranged a marriage for the young prince with a Spanish princess, and when the prince refused his consent, Gonzalez ferreted out the cause, and compelled Inez to drink poison. He then put the young prince under arrest, but as he was being led away, the announcement came that Alfonso was dead and don Pedro was his successor. The tables were now turned, for Pedro was instantly released, and Gonzalez led to execution. —Rose Neil: Inez de Castro, or The Bride of Portugal. (See previous art.)

Infant Endowed with Speech. The imâm Abzenderoud excited the envy of his confraternity by his superior virtue and piety, so they suborned a woman to father a child upon him. The imâm prayed to Mahomet to reveal the truth, whereupon the new-born infant told in good Arabic who his father was, and Abzenderoud was acquitted with honour. —Gueulette: Chinese Tales ("Imâm Abzenderoud," 1723).

Infant of Lubeck, Christian Henry Heinecken. At one year old he knew the chief events of the Pentateuch!! at thirteen months he knew the history of the Old Testament!! at fourteen months he knew the history of the New Testament!! at two and a half years he could answer any ordinary question of history or geography!! and at three years old he knew German, French, and Latin!! Inferno (The), in thirty-four cantos, by Dantê [Alighieri] (1300). While wandering through a wood (this life), the poet comes to a mountain (fame), and begins to climb it, but first a panther (pleasure), then a lion (ambition), and then a she-wolf (avarice) stand in his path to stay him. The appearance of Virgil (human wisdom), however, encourages him (canto i.), and the Mantuan tells him he is sent by three ladies [Beatrice (faith), Lucia (grace), and Mercy] to conduct him through the realms of hell (canto ii.). On they proceed together till they come to a portal bearing this inscription: ALL HOPE ABANDON, YE WHO ENTER HERE; they pass through, and come to that neutral realm, where dwell the spirits of those not good enough for heaven nor bad enough for hell, "the praiseless and the blameless dead." Passing through this border-land, they command old Charon to ferry them across the Achĕron to Limbo (canto iii.), and here they behold the ghosts of the unbaptized, "blameless of sin" but not members of the Christian Church. Homer is here, Horace, Ovid, and Lucan, who enroll Dantê "sixth of the sacred band." On leaving Limbo, our adventurer follows his guide through the seven gates which lead to the inferno, an enormous funnel-shaped pit, divided into stages. The outer, or first "circle," is a vast meadow, in which roam Electra (mother of Dardănus the founder of Troy), Hector, Æne'as, and Julius Cæsar; Camilla and Penthesile'a; Latīnus and Junius Brutus; Lucretia, Marcia (Cato's wife), Julia (Pompey's wife), and Cornelia; and here "apart retired," they see Saladin, the rival of Richard the Lion-heart. Linos is here and Orpheus; Aristotle, Socratês, and Plato; Democrītos who ascribed creation to blind chance, Diogĕnês the cynic, Heraclītos, Emped'oclês, Anaxag'oras, Thalês, Dioscor'idês, and Zeno; Cicero and Senĕca, Euclid and Ptolemy, Hippocrătês and Galen, Avĭcen, and Averroês the Arabian translator and commentator of Aristotle, (canto iv.). From the first stage they descend to the second, where Minos sits in judgment on the ghosts brought before him. He indicates what circle a ghost is to occupy by twisting his tail round his body: two twists signify that the ghost is to be banished to the second circle; three twists, that it is to be consigned to the third circle, and so on. Here, says the poet, "light was silent all," but shrieks and groans and blasphemies were terrible to hear. This circle is the hell of carnal and sinful love, where Dantê recognizes Semirămis, Dido, Cleopatra, and Helen; Achillês and Paris; Tristan, the lover of his uncle's wife Isoldê; Lancelot, the lover of queen Guinever; and Francesca, the lover of Paolo her brother-in-law (canto v.). The third circle is a place of deeper woe. Here fall in ceaseless showers, hail, black rain, and sleety flaw; the air is cold and dun; and a foul stench rises from the soil. Cerbĕrus keeps watch here, and this part of the inferno is set apart for gluttons, like Ciacco (2 syl.). From this stage the two poets pass on to the "fourth steep ledge," presided over by Plutus (canto vi.), a realm which "hems in all the woe of all the universe." Here are gathered the souls of the avaricious, who wasted their talents, and made no right use of their wealth. Crossing this region, they come to the "fifth steep," and see the Stygian Lake of inky hue. This circle is a huge bog in which "the miry tribe" flounder, and "gulp the muddy lees." It is the abode of those who put no restraint upon their anger (canto vii.). Next comes the city of Dis, where the souls of heretics are "interred in vaults" (cantos viii., ix.). Here Dantê recognizes Farina'ta (a leader of the Ghibelline faction), and is informed that the emperor Frederick II. and cardinal Ubaldini are amongst the number (canto x.). The city of Dis contains the next three circles (canto xi.), through which Nessus conducts them; and here they see the Minotaur and the Centaurs, as Chiron who nursed Achillês and Pholus the passionate. The first circle of Dis (the sixth) is for those who by force or fraud have done violence to man, as Alexander the Great, Dionysius of Syracuse, Attila, Sextus, and Pyrrhus (canto xii.). The next (the seventh circle) is for Jack the Giant-killer had a cloak of invisibility as well as a cap of knowledge. The helmet of Perseus or Hadês (Greek Fable) and Mambrino's helmet rendered the wearers invisible. The moros musphonon was a girdle of invisibility (Mrs. Centlivre: A Bold Stroke for a Wife).

(3) Herbs: as fern seed, mentioned by Shakespeare, and Beaumont and Fletcher.

(4) Rings: as Gyges's ring, taken from the flanks of a brazen horse. When the stone was turned inwards, the wearer was invisible (Plato). The ring of Otnit king of Lombardy, according to The Heldenbuch, possessed a similar virtue. Reynard's wonderful ring had three colours, one of which (the green) caused the wearer to be invisible (Reynard the Fox, 1498); this was the gem called heliotrope.

(5) Stones: as heliotrope, mentioned by Boccaccio in his Decameron (day viii. 3). It is of a green hue. Solinus attributes this power to the herb heliotrope: "Herba ejusdem nominis . . . eum, a quocunque gestabitur, subtrahit visibus obviorum."—Geog., xl.

(6) Poignard: the poignard of Seidel-Beckir rendered the person who bore it, and others also, invisible. (See SEIDEL; SUPERSTITIONS, article, The Blood of a Dog.)

Invulnerability. (1) Stones taken from the cassan plant, which grows in Panten, will render the possessor invulnerable.—Odoricus: In Hakluyt.

(2) A dip in the river Styx rendered Achillês invulnerable.

(3) Luned's ring. (See RING.)

(4) Medea rendered Jason proof against wounds and fire by anointing him with the Promethe'an unguent.—Greek Fable.

(5) Siegfried was rendered invulnerable by anointing his body with dragon's blood.—Nibelungen Lied.

Ion, the title and hero of a tragedy by T. N. Talfourd (1835). The oracle of Delphi had declared that the pestilence which raged in Argos was sent by way of punishment for the misrule of the race of Argos, and that the vengeance of the gods could be averted only by the extirpation of the guilty race. Ion, the son of the king, offered himself a willing sacrifice, and as he was dying, Irus entered and announced that "the pestilence was abating." The heroine is Clemanthe.

Io'na, an island of Scotland south of Staffa, noted for its Culdee institutions, established by St. Columb in 563. It is now called "Icolm-kill," and in Macbeth, act ii. sc. 4, "Colmes-kill" (kill means "burying-ground").

Iphis, the woman who was changed to a man. The tale is this: Iphis was the daughter of Lygdus and Telethusa of Crete. Lygdus gave orders that if the child about to be born was a girl, it was to be put to death. It happened to be a girl; but the mother, to save it, brought it up as a boy. In due time, the father betrothed Iphis to Ianthê, and the mother, in terror, prayed to Isis for help. Her prayer was heard, for Isis changed Iphis into a man on the day of espousals.—Ovid, Metaph., ix. 12; xiv. 699.

¶ Cæneus [Se-nuce] was born of the female sex, but Neptune changed her into a man. Ænêas found her in hadês changed back again. (See CÆNEUS, p 164.)

¶ Tirêsias, the Theban prophet, was converted into a girl for striking two serpents, and married. He afterwards recovered his sex, and declared that the pleasures of a woman were tenfold greater than those of a man.

Iran, the empire of Persia.

Iras, a female attendant on Cleop'atra. When Cleopatra had arrayed herself with robe and crown, prior to applying the asps, she said to her two female attendants, "Come, take the last warmth of my lips. Farewell, kind Charmian! Iras, farewell!" And having kissed them, Iras fell down dead, either broken-hearted, or else because she had already applied an asp to her arm, as Charmian did a little later.—Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra (1608); and Dryden: All for Love (1670, etc.).

Ire'na, Ireland personified. Her inheritance was withheld by Grantorto (rebellion), and sir Artegal was sent by the queen of Faërie-land to succour her. Grantorto being slain, Irena was restored, in 1580, to her inheritance.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. (1596).

Ire'ne (3 syl.), daughter of Horush Barbarossa the Greek renegade and corsair-king of Algiers. She was rescued in the siege of Algiers by Selim, son of the Moorish king, who fell in love with her. When she heard of the conspiracy to kill Barbarossa, she warned her father; but it was too late: the insurgents succeeded, Barbarossa was slain by Othman, and Selim married Irenê.—*J. Iris and the Dying. One of the duties of Iris was to cut off a lock of hair (claimed by Proserpine) from those devoted to death, and, till this was done, Death refused to accept the victim. Thus, when Dido mounted the funeral pile, she lingered in suffering till Iris was sent by Juno to cut off a lock of her hair as an offering to the black queen, but immediately this was done her spirit left the body. Than'atos did the same office to Alcestis when she gave her life for that of her husband. In all sacrifices, a forelock was first cut from the head of the victim as an offering to Proserpine.—See Euripides: Alcestis; Virgil: Æneid, iv.

Irish Character (Sketches of), by Mrs. Hall (1829). In 1840 she published Stories of the Irish Peasantry.

Irish Whisky Drinker (The), John Sheehan, a barrister, who, with "Everard Clive of Tipperary Hall," wrote a series of pasquinades in verse, which were published in Bentley's Miscellany, in 1846, and attracted considerable attention.

Irish Widow (The), a farce by Garrick (1757). (For the plot, see BRADY.)

Irishmen of Islam (The), The Moors of Morocco.

Irol'do, the friend of Prasildo of Babylon. Prasildo falls in love with Tisbi'na, his friend's wife, and, to escape infamy, Iroldo and Tisbina take "poison." Prasildo, hearing from the apothecary that the supposed poison is innocuous, goes and tells them so, whereupon Iroldo is so struck with his friend's generosity, that he quits Babylon, leaving Tisbina to Prasildo. Subsequently, Iroldo's life is in peril, and Prasildo saves his friend at the hazard of his own life.—Bojardo: Orlando Innamorato (1495).

Irolit'a, a princess in love with prince Parcinus, her cousin. The fairy Dan'amo wanted Parcinus to marry her daughter Az'ira, and therefore used all her endeavours to marry Irolita to Brutus; but all her plans were thwarted, for Parcinus married Irolita, and Brutus married Azira.

The beauty of Irolita was worthy the world's admiration. She was about 14 years old, her hair was brown, her complexion blooming as the spring, her mouth delicate, her teeth white and even, her smile bewitching, her eyes a hazel colour and very piercing, and her looks were darts of love.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Perfect Love," 1682).

Iron Arm. Captain François de Lanoue, a huguenot, was called Bras de Fer. He died at the siege of Lamballe (1531–1591).

Iron Chest (The), a drama by G. Colman, based on W. Godwin's novel of Caleb Williams. Sir Edward Mortimer kept in an iron chest certain documents relating to a murder for which he had been tried and honourably acquitted. His secretary Wilford, out of curiosity, was prying into this box, when sir Edward entered and threatened to shoot him; but on reflection he spared the young man's life, told him all about the murder, and swore him to secrecy. Wilford, unable to endure the watchful and suspicious eye of his master, ran away; but sir Edward dogged him like a blood-hound, and at length accused him of robbery. This charge could not be substantiated, so Wilford was acquitted. Sir Edward confessed himself a murderer, and died (1796).

Iron Crown. Walter earl of Athol murdered James I. of Scotland, in Perth, hoping to usurp the crown; but he was crowned with a red-hot iron crown, which ate into his brain, and, of course, killed him.

¶ George Dosa, the Hungarian rebel, was put to death in 1514, by a similar torture, for heading the peasants' rebellion against the nobles. (See LUKE'S IRON CROWN.)

Iron Duke (The), the duke of Wellington (1769–1852).

Iron Emperor (The), Nicholas of Russia (1796, 1826–1855).

Iron Gates or Demir Kara, a celebrated pass of the Teuthras, through which all caravans between Smyrna and Brusa must needs pass.

Iron Hand, Goetz von Berlichingen (q.v.), who replaced his right hand, which he lost at the siege of Landshut, by an iron one (sixteenth century).

 Goethe has made this the subject of an historical drama. (See SILVER HAND.)

Iron Mask (The Man in the). This mysterious man went by the name of Lestang, but who he was is as much in nubibus as the author of the Letters of Junius. The most general opinion is that he was count Er'colo Antonio Matthioli a senator of Mantua and private agent of Ferdinand Charles duke of Mantua; and that his long imprisonment of twenty-four years was for having deceived Louis XIV. in a secret treaty for the purchase of the fortress of Casale. M. Loiseleur utterly denies this solution of the mystery (see Temple Bar, 182-4, May, 1872); but Marius Topin, in his Man in the Iron Mask, maintains that "the man was undoubtedly Matthioli."

N.B.—The tragedies of Zschokke in German (1795), and Fournier in French, are based on the supposition that the man in the mask was marechal Richelieu, a twin-brother of the Grand Monarque, and this is the solution given by the abbé Soulavie.

Iron Tooth, Frederick II. elector of Brandenburg (Dent de Fer), (1657, 1688-1713).

Ironside (Sir), called "The Red Knight of the Red Lands." Sir Gareth, after fighting with him from dawn to dewy eve, subdued him. Tennyson calls him Death, and says that Gareth won the victory with a single stroke. Sir Ironside was the knight who kept the lady Lionês (called by Tennyson "Lyonors") captive in Castle Perilous.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 134-137 (1470).

N.B.—Tennyson seems very greatly to have misconceived the exquisite allegory of Gareth and Linet. He has not only changed the names into Lyonors and Linette, but, by beginning the day in the modern manner, and not on the eve before, he has greatly marred the allegory. (See GARETH, pp. 405, 406.)

Ironside. Edmund II. king of the Anglo-Saxons was so called from his iron armour (989, 1016-1017).

Sir Richard Steele signed himself "Nestor Ironside" in the Guardian (1671-1729).

Ironsides. So were the soldiers of Cromwell called, especially after the battle of Marston Moor, where they displayed their iron resolution (1644).

Ironsides (Captain), uncle of Belfield (Brothers), and an old friend of sir Benjamin Dove. He is captain of a privateer, and a fine specimen of an English naval officer.

He's true English oak to the heart of him, and a fine old seaman-like figure he is.—Cumberland: The Brothers, I. 1 (1769).

Irrefragable Doctor (The), Alexander Hales, founder of the Scholastic theology (*-1245).

Irtish (To cross the ferry of the), to be "laid on the shelf." The ferry of the Irtish is crossed by those who are exiled to Siberia. It is regarded in Russia as the ferry of political death.

Irus, the beggar of Ithăca, who ran on errands for Penelopê's suitors. When Ulyssês returned home dressed as a beggar, Irus withstood him, and Ulyssês broke his jaw with a blow. So poor was Irus that he gave birth to the proverbs, "As poor as Irus," and "Poorer than Irus" (in French, Plus pauvre qu' Irus).

Without respect esteeming equally
King Cresus' pompe and Irus' povertie.
Sackville: A Mirrour for Magistrayles (Induction, 1587).

Irus grows rich, and Cresus must wax poor.
Lord Brooke: Treatie of Warres (1554-1628).

Irwin (Mr.), the husband of lady Eleanor daughter of lord Norland. His lordship discarded her for marrying against his will, and Irwin was reduced to the verge of starvation. In his desperation Irwin robbed his father-in-law on the high-road, but relented and returned the money. At length the iron heart of lord Norland was softened, and he relieved the necessities of his son-in-law.

Lady Eleanor Irwin, wife of Mr. Irwin. She retains her love for lord Norland, even through all his relentlessness, and when she hears that he has adopted a son, exclaims, "May the young man deserve his love better than I have done! May he be a comfort to his declining years, and never disobey him!"—Inchbald: Every One has His Fault (1794).

Irwin (Hannah), former confidante of Clara Mowbray.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Isaac [Mendoza], a rich Portuguese Jew, short in stature, with a snub nose, swarthy skin, and huge beard; very conceited, priding himself on his cunning, loving to dupe others, but woefully duped himself. He chuckles to himself, "I'm cunning, I fancy; a very cunning dog, ain't I? a sly little villain, eh? a bit roguish; he must be very wide awake who can take Isaac in." This conceited piece of goods is always duped by every one he encounters. He meets Louisa, whom he intends to make his wife, but she makes him believe she is Clara Guzman. He meets his rival Antonio, whom he sends to the supposed Clara, and he marries her. He mistakes Louisa's duenna for Louisa, and elopes with her. So all his wit is outwitted.—Sheridan: The Duenna (1775).

Quick's great parts were "Isaac," "Tony Lumpkin" [She Stoops to Conquer, Goldsmith], "Spado" [Castle of Andalusia, O'Keefe], and "sir Christopher Curry," in Inkle and Yarico, by Colman [1748-1831].—Records of a Stage Veteran.

Isaac of York, the father of Rebecca. When imprisoned in the dungeon of Front de Bœuf's castle, Front de Bœuf comes to extort money from him, and orders two slaves to chain him to the bars of a slow fire, but the party is disturbed by the sound of a bugle. Ultimately, both the Jew and his daughter leave England and go to live abroad.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Isabel, called the "She-wolf of France," the adulterous queen of Edward II., was daughter of Philippe IV. (le Bel) of France. According to one tradition,

Isabel murdered her royal husband by thrusting a hot iron into his bowels, and tearing them from his body.

> She-wolf of France, with unrelenting fangs,
> That tear'st the bowels of thy mangled mate.
> Gray: The Bard (1757).

Isabell, sister of lady Hartwell, in the comedy of Wit without Money, by Beaumont (?) and Fletcher (1639).

Beaumont died 1616.

ISABELLA or Isabelle, a pale brown colour or buff, similar to that of a hare. It is so called from the princess Isabella of Austria, daughter of Philip II. The tale is that, while besieging Ostend, the princess took an oath that she would not change her body-linen before the town was taken. The siege, however, lasted three years, and her linen was so stained that it gave name to the colour referred to (1601–1604).

¶ The same story is told of Isabella of Castile at the siege of Grana'da (1483).

¶ Thomas Dyche, "schoolmaster to the charity children of St. Andrew's, Holborn, some time before his death, in 1719, made a vow not to shift his linen 'till the Pretender was seated on the throne.' "—Smeeton: Biog. Curiosa, p. 13.

The horse that Brightsun was mounted on was as black as jet, that of Felix was grey, Chery's was as white as milk, and that of the princess Fairstar an Isabella.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Princess Fairstar," 1682).

Isabella, daughter of the king of Galicia, in love with Zerbi'no, but Zerbino could not marry her because she was a pagan. Her lament at the death of Zerbino is one of the best parts of the whole poem (bk. xii.). Isabella retires to a chapel to bury her lover, and is there slain by Rodomont.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Isabella, sister of Claudio, insulted by the base passion of An'gelo deputy of Vienna in the absence of duke Vincentio. Isabella is delivered by the duke himself, and the deputy is made to marry Mariana, to whom he is already betrothed.—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure (1603).

Isabella, wife of Hieronimo, in The Spanish Tragedy, by Thomas Kyd (1588).

Isabella, mother of Ludov'ico Sforza duke of Milan.—Massinger: The Duke of Milan (1622).

Isabella, a nun who marries Biron eldest son of count Baldwin, who disinherits him for this marriage. Biron enters the army, and is sent to the siege of Candy, where he falls, and (it is supposed) dies. For seven years Isabella mourns her loss, and is then reduced to the utmost want. In her distress she begs assistance of her father-in-law, but he drives her from the house as a dog. Villeroy (2 syl.) offers her marriage, and she accepts him; but the day after her espousals Biron returns. Carlos, hearing of his brother's return, employs ruffians to murder him, and then charges Villeroy with the crime; but one of the ruffians impeaches, and Carlos is apprehended. Isabella goes mad, and murders herself in her distraction.—Southern: The Fatal Marriage (1692).

The part of "Isabella" affords scope for a tragic actress scarcely inferior in pathos to "Belvidera."—R. Chambers: English Literature, i. 588.

(Mrs. E. Barry, says T. Campbell, was unrivalled in this part, 1682–1733.)

N.B.—Wm. Hamilton painted Mrs. Siddons as "Isabella," and the picture belongs to the nation.

Isabella, the coadjutor of Zanga in his scheme of revenge against don Alonzo.—Young: The Revenge (1721).

Isabella, princess of Sicily, in love with Roberto il Diavolo, but promised in marriage to the prince of Grana'da, who challenges Roberto to mortal combat, from which he is allured by Bertram his fiend-father. Alice tells him that Isabella is waiting for him at the altar, when a struggle ensues between Bertram and Alice, one trying to drag him into hell, and the other trying to reclaim him to the ways of virtue. Alice at length prevails, but we are not told whether Roberto marries the princess.—Meyerbeer: Roberto il Diavolo (1831).

Isabella (Donna), daughter of don Pedro a Portuguese nobleman, who designed to marry her to don Guzman, a gentleman of large fortune. To avoid this hateful marriage, she jumps from a window, with a view of escaping from the house, and is caught by a colonel Briton, an English officer, who conducts her to the house of her friend donna Violanté. Here the colonel calls upon her, and don Felix, supposing Violanté to be the object of his visits, becomes furiously jealous. After a considerable embroglio, the mystery is cleared up, and a double marriage takes place.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Wonder (1714).

Middle-sized, a lovely brown, a fine pouting lip, eyes that roll and languish, and seem to speak the exquisite pleasure she could give.—Act v. sc. 1.

Isabella (The countess), wife of Roberto. After a long series of crimes of infidelity to her husband, and of murder, she is brought to execution.—Morton: The Wonder of Women, or Sophonisba (1605).

Isabella (The lady), a beautiful young girl, who accompanied her father on a chase. Her step-mother requested her to return, and tell the cook to prepare the milk-white doe for dinner. Lady Isabella did as she was told, and the cook replied, "Thou art the doe that I must dress." The scullion-boy exclaimed, "Oh, save the lady's life, and make thy pies of me!" But the cook heeded him not. When the lord returned and asked for his daughter, the scullion-boy made answer, "If my lord would see his daughter, let him cut the pasty before him." The father, horrified at the whole affair, adjudged the step-mother to be burnt alive, and the cook to stand in boiling lead, but the scullion-boy he made his heir.—Percy: Reliques, iii. 2.

Isabella or The Pot of Basil, a story from Boccaccio turned into verse by Keats (1820).

Isabelle, sister of Léonor, an orphan; brought up by Sganarelle according to his own notions of training a girl to make him a good wife. She was to dress in serge, to keep to the house, to occupy herself in domestic affairs, to sew, knit, and look after the linen, to hear no flattery, attend no places of public amusement, never to be left to her own devices, but to run in harness like a mill-horse. The result was that she duped Sganarelle and married Valère. (See LÉONOR.)—Molière: L'école des Maris (1661).

Isabinda, daughter of sir Jealous Traffick a merchant. Her father is resolved she shall marry don Diego Barbinetto, but she is in love with Charles Gripe; and Charles, in the dress of a Spaniard, passing himself off as the Spanish don, marries her.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Busy Body (1709).

Isenbras (Sir), a hero of mediæval romance. Sir Isenbras was at first proud and presumptuous, but adversity made him humble and penitent. In this stage he carried two children of a poor wood-cutter across a ford on his horse.

 Millais has taken sir Isenbras carrying the children across the ferry, as the subject of one of his pictures.

I warne you first at the begynninge
That I will make no vain carpinge [great] . . .
Of Octoriane and Isembrase.
William of Nassington.

Isengrin (Sir) or SIR ISENGRIM, the wolf, afterwards created earl of Pitwood, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox. Sir Isengrin typifies the barons, and Reynard the Church. The gist of the tale is to show how Reynard overreaches his uncle Wolf (1498).

Iseult of Brittany, the lady-love of Tristram. Tennyson tells the tale in The Last Tournament (Idylls of the King).

(Matthew Arnold wrote Tristram and Iseult. See YSOLDE.)

Ishah, the name of Eve before the Fall; so called because she was taken out of ish, i.e. "man" (Gen. ii. 23); but after the expulsion from paradise Adam called his wife Eve or Havah, i.e. "the mother of all living" (Gen. iii. 20).

Ishban, meant for sir Robert Clayton. There is no such name in the Bible as Ishban; but Tate speaks of "extorting Ishban" pursued by "bankrupt heirs." He says he had occupied himself long in cheating, but then undertook to "reform the state."

Ishban of conscience suited to his trade,
As good a saint as usurer e'er made . . .
Could David . . . scandalize our peerage with his name . . .
He'd e'en turn loyal to be made a peer.
Tate: Absalom and Achitophel, ii. (1682).

Ish'bosheth, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Richard Cromwell, whose father Oliver is called "Saul." As Ishbosheth was the only surviving son of Saul, so Richard was the only surviving son of Cromwell. As Ishbosheth was accepted king on the death of his father by all except the tribe of Judah, so Richard was acknowledged "protector" by all except the royalists. As Ishbosheth reigned only a few months, so Richard, after a few months, retired into private life.

They who, when Saul was dead, without a blow
Made foolish Ishbosheth the crown forego.
Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, i. (1681).

Ish'monie (3 syl.), the petrified city in Upper Egypt, full of inhabitants all turned to stone.—Perry: View of the Levant.

(Captain Marryat has borrowed this idea in his Pacha of Many Tales.)

I'sidore (3 syl.), a Greek slave, the concubine of don Pèdre a Sicilian nobleman. This slave is beloved by Adraste (2 syl.) a French gentleman, who plots to allure her away. He first gets introduced as a portrait-painter, and reveals his love. Isidore listens with pleasure, and promises to elope with him. He then sends his slave Zaïde to complain to don Pèdre of ill-treatment, and to crave protection. Don Pèdre promises to stand her friend, and at this moment Adraste appears and demands that she be given up to the punishment she deserves. Pèdre intercedes; Adraste seems to relent; and the Sicilian calls to the young slave to appear. Instead of Zaïde, Isidore comes forth in Zaïde's veil. "There," says Pédre, "I have arranged everything. Take her, and use her well." "I will do so," says the Frenchman, and leads off the Greek slave.—Molière: Le Sicilien ou L'Amour Peindre (1667).

Isis (Egyptian), the Moon personified. Called "the great mother goddess, mother of Horus" (Cleopatra, p. 37). The sun is Osi'ris.

Mother Isis was arisen, and threw her gleaming robe across the bosom of the earth.—H. Rider Haggard: Cleopatra, ch. iii.

They [the priests] wore rich mitres shaped like the moon,
To show that Isis doth the moon portend,
Like as Osiris signifies the sun.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 7 (1596).

Isis, a poem by Mason (1748), being an attack on Oxford Jacobinism. Warton replied to it in what he calls The Triumph of Isis (1749).

Iskander Beg=Alexander the Great, George Castriot (1414–1467). (See SKANDERBEG.)

Iskander with the Two Horns, Alexander the Great.

This Friday is the 18th day of the moon of Safar, in the year 653 [i.e. of the hegira, or A.D. 1255] since the retreat of the great prophet from Mecca to Medi'na; and in the year 7320 of the epoch of the great Iskander with the two horns.—Arabian Nights ("The Tailor's Story").

Island of the Seven Cities, a kind of Dixie's land, where seven bishops, who quitted Spain during the dominion of the Moors, founded seven cities. The legend says that many have visited the island, but no one has ever quitted it.

Islands of the Blest, called by the Greeks "Happy Islands," and by the Latins "Fortunate Islands;" imaginary islands somewhere in the West, where the favourites of the gods are conveyed at death, and dwell in everlasting joy.

Their place of birth alone is mute
To sounds that echo further west
Than your sire's Islands of the Blest.
Byron.

Isle of Lanterns, an imaginary country, inhabited by pretenders to knowledge, called "Lanternois."—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, v. 32, 33 (1545).

¶ Lucian has a similar conceit, called The City of Lanterns; and dean Swift, in his Gulliver's Travels, makes his hero visit Laputa, which is an empire of quacks, false projectors, and pretenders to science.

Isle of Mist, the Isle of Skye, whose high hills are almost always shrouded in mist.

Nor sleep thy hand by thy side, chief of the Isle of Mist.—Ossian: Fingal, i.

Isle of Saints, Ireland. So called in the early Middle Ages, from the readiness with which its people accepted the Christian faith; and also from the number of its learned ecclesiastics.

Islington (The marquis of), one of the companions of Billy Barlow the noted archer. Henry VIII. jocosely created Barlow "duke of Shoreditch," and his two companions "earl of Pancras" and "marquis of Islington."

Ismael "the Infidel," one of the Immortal Guard.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

(Lord Lytton, at the age of 15, wrote an Oriental tale so called. It was published in 1820.)

Isme'ne and Isme'nias, a love story in Greek by Eustathius, in the twelfth century. It is puerile in its delineation of character, and full of plagiarisms; but many of its details have been copied by D'Urfé, Montemayor, and others. Ismenê is the "dear and near and true" lady of Isme'nias.

N.B.—Through the translation by Godfrey of Viterbo, the tale of Ismenê and Ismenias forms the basis of Gower's Confeisso Amantis, and Shakespeare's Pericles Prince of Tyre.

Isme'no, a magician, once a Christian, but afterwards a renegade to Islam. He was killed by a stone hurled from an engine.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, xviii. (1575).

Isoo'rates (The French), Esprit Fléchier, bishop of Nismes (1632–1710).

Isoline (3 syl.), the high-minded and heroic daughter of the French governor of Messi'na, and bride of Fernando (son of John of Procida). Isoline was true to her husband, and true to her father, who had opposite interests in Sicily. Both fell victims to the butchery called the "Sicilian Vespers" (March 30, 1282), and Isoline died of a broken heart.—Knowles: John of Procida (1840).

Isolt (so Tennyson, in The Last Tournament, spells the name YSOLT, q.v.). There are two ladies connected with Arthurian romance of this name: one, Isolt "the Fair," daughter of Anguish king of Ireland; and the other Isolt "of the White Hands," daughter of Howell king of Brittany. Isolt the Fair was the wife of sir Mark king of Cornwall, but Isolt of the White Hands was the wife of sir Tristram. Sir Tristram loved Isolt the Fair; and Isolt hated sir Mark, her husband, with the same measure that she loved sir Tristram, her nephew-in-law. Tennyson's tale of the death of sir Tristram is so at variance with the romance, that it must be given separately. He says that sir Tristram was one day dallying with Isolt the Fair, and put a ruby carcanet round her neck. Then, as he kissed her throat—

Out of the dark, just as the lips had touched,
Behind him rose a shadow and a shriek—
"Mark's way!" said Mark, and clove him thro' the brain.
Tennyson: The Last Tournament. (See ISOND.)

Isond, called La Beale Isond, daughter of Anguish king of Ireland. When sir Tristram vanquished sir Marhaus, he went to Ireland to be cured of his wounds. La Beale Isond was his leech, and fell in love with him; but she married sir Mark the dastard king of Cornwall. This marriage was a very unhappy one, for Isond hated Mark as much as she loved sir Tristram, with whom she eloped and lived in Joyous Guard Castle, but was in time restored to her husband, and Tristram married Isond the Fair-handed. In the process of time, Tristram, being severely wounded, sent for La Beale Isond, who alone could cure him, and if the lady consented to come the vessel was to hoist a white flag. The ship hove in sight, and Tristram's wife, out of jealousy, told him it carried a black flag at the mast-head. On hearing this, sir Tristram fell back on his bed, and died. When La Beale Isond landed, and heard that sir Tristram was dead, she flung herself on the body, and died also. The two were buried in one grave, on which a rose and vine were planted, which grew up and so intermingled their branches that no man could separate them.—Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. (1470).

∴ Sir Palimedes the Saracen (i.e. unbaptized) also loved La Beale Isond, but met with no encouragement. Sir Kay Hedius died for love of her.—History of Prince Arthur, ii. 172. (See ISOLT.)

Isond, called le Blanch Mains, daughter of Howell king of Britain (i.e. Brittany). Sir Tristram fell in love with her for her name's sake; but, though he married her, his love for La Beale Isond, wife of his uncle Mark, grew stronger and stronger. When sir Tristram was dying and sent for his uncle's wife, it was Isond le Blanch Mains who told him the ship was in sight, but carried a black flag at the mast-head; on hearing which sir Tristram bowed his head and died.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 35, etc. (1470). (See ISOLT.)

Is'rael, in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, means England. As David was king of Israel, so Charles II. was king of England. Of his son, the duke of Monmouth, the poet says—

Early in foreign fields he won renown
With kings and states allied to Israel's crown.
Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, i. (1681).

Is'raelites (3 syl.), Jewish money-lenders.

. . . all the Israelites are fit to mob its Next owner, for their . . . post-obits.
Byron: Don Juan, i. 195 (1823).

Is'rafil, the angel who will sound the "resurrection blast." Then Gabriel and Michael will call together the "dry bones" to judgment. When Israfil puts the trumpet to his mouth, the souls of the dead will be cast into the trumpet, and when he blows, out will they fly like bees, and fill the whole space between earth and heaven. Then will they enter their respective bodies, Mahomet leading the way.—Sale: Korân (Preliminary discourse, iv.).

(Israfil is the angel of melody in paradise. It is said that his ravishing songs, accompanied by the daughters of paradise and the clanging of bells, will give delight to the faithful.)

Is'sachar, in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Thomas Thynne, of Longleate Hall, a friend to the duke of Monmouth. There seems to be a very slight analogy between Thomas Thynne and Issachar son of Jacob. If the tribe (compared to an ass overburdened) is alluded to, the poet could hardly have called the rich commoner "wise Issachar."

N.B.—Mr. Thynne and count Koningsmark both wished to marry the widow of Henry Cavendish earl of Ogle. Her friends contracted her to the rich commoner, but before the marriage was consummated, he was murdered. Three months afterwards, the widow married the duke of Somerset.

Hospitable treats did most commend
Wise Issachar, his wealthy western friend.
Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, i. (1681).

Issland, the kingdom of Brunhild.—The Nibelungen Lied.

Istakhar, in Fars (Persia), upon a rock. (The word means "the throne of Jemshid.") It is also called "Chil'-Minar'," or the forty pillars. The Greeks called it Persep'olis. Istakhar was the cemetery of the Persian kings, and a royal treasury.

She was fired with impatience to behold the superb tombs of Istakhar, and the palace of forty columns.—Beckford: Vathek (1786).

Isumbras (Sir) or Ysumbras. (See ISENBRAS, p. 531.)

Itadach (Colman), surnamed "The Thirsty." In consequence of his rigid observance of the rule of St. Patrick, he refused to drink one single drop of water; but his thirst in the harvest-time was so great that it caused his death.

Italy, a poem in heroic verse, by Samuel Rogers (1822). It is in two parts, each part in twenty-two subdivisions. The stories, he tells us, are taken from old chronicles.

Item, a money-broker. He was a thorough villain, who could "bully, cajole, curse, fawn, flatter, and filch." Mr. Item always advised his clients not to sign away their money, but at the same time stated to them the imperative necessity of so doing. "I would advise you strongly not to put your hand to that paper, though Heaven knows how else you can satisfy these duns and escape imprisonment."—Holcroft: The Deserted Daughter (altered into The Steward).

Ith'acan Suitors. During the absence of Ulyssês king of Ithaca in the Trojan war, his wife Penel'opê was pestered by numerous suitors, who assumed that Ulyssês, from his long absence, must be dead. Penelopê put them off by saying she would finish a certain robe which she was making for Laërtês, her father-in-law, before she gave her final answer to any of them; but at night she undid all the work she had woven during the day. At length, Ulyssês returned, and relieved her of her perplexity.

All the ladies, each at each,
Like the Ithacensian suitors in old time,
Stared with great eyes and laughed with alien lips.
Tennyson: The Princess, iv.

Ith'ocles (3 syl.), in love with Calantha princess of Sparta. Ithoclês induces his sister Penthêa to break the matter to the princess, and in time she not only becomes reconciled to his love, but also requites it, and her father consents to the marriage. During a court festival, Calantha is informed by a messenger that her father has suddenly died, by a second that Penthea has starved herself to death, and by a third that Ithoclês has been murdered by Or'gilus out of revenge.—Ford: The Broken Heart (1633).

Ithu'riel (4 syl.), a cherub sent by Gabriel to find out Satan. He finds him squatting like a toad beside Eve as she lay asleep, and brings him before Gabriel. (The word means "God's discovery.")—Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 788 (1665).

Ithuriel's Spear, the spear of the angel Ithuriel, whose slightest touch exposed deceit. Hence, when Satan squatted like a toad "close to the ear of Eve," Ithuriel only touched the creature with his spear, and it resumed the form of Satan.

. . . for no falsehood can endure
Touch of celestial temper, but returns
Of force to its own likeness.
Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. (1669).

Ithu'riel, the guardian angel of Judas Iscariot. After Satan entered into the heart of the traitor, Ithuriel was given to Simon Peter as his second angel.—Klopstock: The Messiah, iii., iv. (1748, 1771).

Ivan the Terrible, Ivan IV. of Russia, a man of great energy, but infamous for his cruelties. He was the first to adopt the title of czar (1529, 1533–1584).

I'vanhoe (3 syl.), a novel by sir W. Scott (1820). A brilliant and splendid romance. Rebecca, the Jewess, was Scott's favourite character. The scene is laid in England in the reign of Richard I., and we are introduced to Robin Hood in Sherwood Forest, banquets in Saxon halls, tournaments, and all the pomp of ancient chivalry. Rowena, the heroine, is quite thrown into the shade by the gentle, meek, yet high-souled Rebecca.

Ivanhoe (Sir Wilfred, knight of), the favourite of Richard I., and the disinherited son of Cedric of Rotherwood. Disguised as a palmer, he goes to Rotherwood, and meets there Rowe'na his father's ward, with whom he falls in love; but we hear little more of him except as the friend of Rebecca and her father Isaac of York, to both of whom he shows repeated acts of kindness, and completely wins the affections of the beautiful Jewess. In the grand tournament, Ivanhoe [I'-van-ho] appears as the "Desdichado" or the "Disinherited Knight," and overthrows all comers. King Richard pleads for him to Cedric, reconciles the father to his son, and the young knight marries Rowena.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Ivan'ovitch (son of Ivan or John), the popular name of a Russian. Similar to our "John-son," the Danish "Jan-sen," and the Scotch "Mac-Ina."

N.B.—The popular name of the English as a people is John Bull; of the Germans, Cousin Michael; of the French, Jean Crapaud; of the Chinese, John Chinaman; of the North American States, Brother Jonathan; of the Welsh, Taffy; of the Scotch, Sandy; of the Swiss, Colin Tampon; of the Russians, Ivan; etc.

Ivàn Ivànovitch, a poem by R. Browning (Dramatic Idylls, 1879). The story, which takes place in Russia about "Peter's [the Great] time, when hearts were great, not small," is as follows: Ivàn Ivànovitch, a Russian carpenter, is working at a "huge shipmast trunk," when a sledge dashes up to the workyard with a half-frozen, fainting woman in it, who is recognized by the crowd assembled as "Dmitri's wife." She tells them that on her journey home in the sledge, with her three children, she is overtaken by wolves, and, to save herself, throws the children to the beasts. Ivàn Ivànovitch takes the law into his own hands, and slays her with an axe as she lies before him. The village pope judges that he has done right in killing so vile a mother, and the crowd go to Ivàn's house to tell him he is acquitted. They find him calmly making a model of the Kremlin, with his children round him, and when "they told him he was free as air to walk about," "How otherwise?" asked he, so sure is he that he acted as God's servant.

Iverach (Allan), or steward of Inveraschalloch with Gallraith, at the Clachan of Aberfoyle.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Ives (St.), originally called Slepe. Its name was changed in honour of St. Ive, a Persian missionary.

From Persia, led by zeal, St. Ive this island sought,
And near our eastern fens a fit place finding, taught
The faith; which place from him alone the name derives,
And of that sainted man has since been called St. Ives.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1622).

Ivory Gate of Dreams. Dreams which delude pass through the ivory gate, but those which come true through the horn gate. This whim depends upon two puns: ivory, in Greek, is elephas, and the verb elephairo means "to cheat;" horn, in Greek is keras, and the verb karanδo means "to accomplish."

Sunt geminæ somni portæ, quarum altera fertur
Cornea, qua veris facilis datur exitus umbris;
Altera candenti perfecta nitens elephanto,
Sed falsa ad cœlum mittunt insomnia Manes.
Virgil: Æneid, vi. 893-6.

From gate of horn or ivory, dreams are sent;
These to deceive, and those for warning meant.
E. C. B.

The title, The Ivory Gate, was used for a novel by sir Walter Besant in 1892.

Ivory Shoulder. Demēter ate the shoulder of Pelops, served up by Tan'talos; so when the gods restored the body to life, Demeter supplied the lacking shoulder by one made of ivory.

¶ Pythag'oras had a golden thigh, which he showed to Ab'aris the Hyperborèan priest.

Not Pelops' shoulder whiter than her hands,
Nor snowy swans that jet on Isca's sands.
Browne: Britannia's Pastorals, ii. 3 (1613).

Ivory Tube of prince Ali, a sort of telescope, which showed the person who looked through it whatever he wished most to see.—Arabian Nights ("Ahmed and Pari-Banou").

Ivry, in France, famous for the battle won by Henry of Navarre over the League (1590).

Hurrah! hurrah! a single field
Hath turned the chance of war,
Hurrah! hurrah! for Ivry,
And Henry of Navarre.
Macaulay: Lays ("Ivry," 1848).

Ivy Lane, London; so called from the houses of the prebendaries of St. Paul's, overgrown with ivy.

I'wein, a knight of the Round Table. He slays the possessor of an enchanted fountain, and marries the widow, whose name is Laudine. Gaw'ein or Gawain urges him to new exploits, so he quits his wife for a year in quest of adventures, and as he does not return at the stated time, Laudine loses all love for him. On his return, he goes mad, and wanders in the woods, where he is cured by three sorcerers. He now helps a lion fighting against a dragon, and the lion becomes his faithful companion. He goes to the enchanted fountain, and there finds Lunet' prisoner. While struggling with the enchanted fountain, Lunet aids him with her ring, and he in turn saves her life. By the help of his lion, Iwein kills several giants, delivers three hundred virgins, and, on his return to king Arthur's court, marries Lunet.—Hartmann von der Aue (thirteenth century).

Ixi'on, king of the Lap'ithæ, attempted to win the love of Hērē (Juno); but Zeus substituted a cloud for the goddess, and a centaur was born.

J.

J. (in Punch), the signature of Douglas Jerrold, who first contributed to No. 9 of the serial (1803–1858).

Jaafer, who carried the sacred banner of the prophet at the battle of Muta. When one hand was lopped off, he clutched the banner with the other; this hand also being lost, he held it with his two stumps. When, at length, his head was cleft from his body, he contrived so to fall as to detain the banner till it was seized by Abdallah, and handed to Khaled.

¶ ADMIRAL BENBOW, in an engagement with the French near St. Martha, in 1701, was carried on deck on a wooden frame after both his legs and thighs were shivered into splinters by chain-shot.

¶ ALMEYDA, the Portuguese governor of India, had himself propped against the mainmast after both his legs were shot off.

Jabos (Jock), postilion at the Golden Arms inn, Kippletringan, of which Mrs. M'Candlish was landlady.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Ja'chin, the parish clerk, who purloined the sacramental money, and died disgraced.—Crabbe: Borough (1810).

Jacinta, a first-rate cook, "who deserved to be housekeeper to the patriarch of the Indies," but was only cook to the licentiate Sedillo of Valladolid.—Ch. ii. 1.

The cook, who was no less dexterous than Dame Jacinta, was assisted by the coachman in dressing the victuals.—Lesage: Gil Blas, iii. 10 (1715).

Jacin'tha, the supposed wife of Octa'vio, and formerly contracted to don Henrique (2 syl.) an uxorious Spanish nobleman. — Fletcher: The Spanish Curate (1622).

Jacin'tha, the wealthy ward of Mr. Strickland; in love with Bellamy. Jacintha is staid but resolute, and, though "she elopes down a ladder of ropes" in boy's costume, has plenty of good sense and female modesty.—Dr. Hoadley: The Suspicious Husband (1747).

Jack, in Dr. Arbuthnot's History of John Bull, is meant for John Calvin. In Swift's Tale of a Tub, Calvin is introduced as Jack. "Martin" in both these tales means Martin Luther.

Jack (Colonel), the hero of Defoe's novel entitled The History of the Most Remarkable Life and Extraordinary Adventures of the truly Hon. Colonel, Jacque, vulgarly called Colonel Jack. The colonel (born a gentleman and bred a pickpocket) goes to Virginia, and passes through all the stages of colonial life, from that of "slavie" to that of an owner of slaves and plantations.

The transition from their refined Oron'datês and Stati'ras to the society of captain [sic] Jack and Moll Flanders . . . is (to use a phrase of Sterne) like turning from Alexander the Great to Alexander the coppersmith. — Encyclopædia Britannica (article "Romance").

Jack, the wooden figure of a man which formerly struck on a bell at certain times during divine service. Several of these figures still remain in churches in East Anglia. (See JAQUEMART, p. 539.)

Jack Amend-all, a nickname given to Jack Cade the rebel, who promised to remedy all abuses (*–1450). As a specimen of his reforms, take the following examples:—

I, your captain, am brave, and vow reformation. There shall be in England seven half-penny loaves sold for a penny; the three-hooped pot shall have ten hoops; and I will make it felony to drink small beer. . . . When I am king, there shall be no money; all shall eat and drink on my score; and I will apparel all in one livery.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI. act iv. sc. 2 (1591).

Jack and Jill, said to be the Saxon and Norman stocks united. "Jack" is the Saxon John, and "Jill" the French Julienne.

Jack and Jill went up the hill
To fetch a pail of water;
Jack fell down and cracked his crown,
And Jill came tumbling after.
Nursery Rhyme.

Or thus, by Samuel Wilberforce—

'Twas not on Alpine ice or snow,
But homely English soil;
"Excelsior!" their motto was;
They spared nor time nor toil;
They did not go for fame or wealth,
But went as duty's call;
And tho' united in their aim,
Were severed in their fall.

Jack and the Bean-Stalk. Jack was a very poor lad, sent by his mother to sell a cow, which he parted with to a butcher for a few beans. His mother, in her rage, threw the beans away; but one of them grew during the night as high as the heavens. Jack climbed the stalk, and, by the direction of a fairy, came to a giant's castle, where he begged food and rest. This he did thrice, and in his three visits stole the giant's red hen which laid golden eggs, his money-bags, and his harp. As he ran off with the last treasure, the harp cried out, "Master! master!" which woke the giant, who ran after Jack; but the nimble lad cut the bean-stalk with an axe, and the giant was killed in his fall

(This is said to be an allegory of the Teutonic Al-fader: the "red hen" representing the all-producing sun, the "money-bags" the fertilizing rain, and the "harp" the winds.)

Jack-a-Lent, a kind of aunt Sally set up during Lent to be pitched at; hence a puppet, a sheepish booby, a boy-page, a scarecrow. Mrs. Page says to Robin, Falstaff's page—

> You little Jack-a-Lent, have you been true to us?—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, act iii. sc. 3 (1603).

Jack-in-the-Green, one of the May-day mummers.

(Dr. Owen Pugh says that Jack-in-the-Green represents Melvas king of Somersetshire, disguised in green boughs and lying in ambush for queen Guenever the wife of king Arthur, as she was returning from a hunting expedition.)

Jack of Newbery, John Winchcomb, the greatest clothier of the world in the reign of Henry VIII. He kept a hundred looms in his own house at Newbery, and equipped at his own expense a hundred of his men to aid the king against the Scotch in Flodden Field (1513).

(Thomas Delony published, in 1633, a tale so called.)

Jack Robinson. This famous comic song is by Hudson, tobacconist, No. 98, Shoe Lane, London, in the early part of the nineteenth century. The last line is, "And he was off before you could say 'Jack Robinson.'" The tune to which the words are sung is the Sailors' Hornpipe. Halliwell quotes these two lines from an "old play"—

> A warke it ys as easie to be doone
> As 'tys to saye, Jacke! robys on.
> Archaic Dictionary.

Jack Sprat, of nursery rhymes.

> Jack Sprat could eat no fat,
> His wife could eat no lean;
> And so betwixt 'em both
> They licked the platter clean.

Jack the Giant-Killer, a series of nursery tales to show the mastery of skill and wit over brute strength. Jack encounters various giants, but outwits them all. The following would illustrate the sort of combat: Suppose they came to a thick iron door, the giant would belabour it with his club hour after hour without effect; but Jack would apply a delicate key, and the door would open at once. This is not one of the stories, but will serve to illustrate the sundry contests. Jack was a "valiant Cornishman," and his first exploit was to kill the giant Cormoran, by digging a deep pit which he filmed over with grass, etc. The giant fell into the pit, and Jack knocked him on the head with a hatchet. Jack afterwards obtained a coat of invisibility, a cap of knowledge, a resistless sword, and shoes of swiftness. Thus armed, he almost rid Wales of its giants.

> Our Jack the Giant-killer is clearly the last modern transmutation of the old British legend told by Geoffrey of Monmouth, of Corineus the Trojan, the companion of the Trojan Brutus when he first settled in Britain.—Masson.

Jack-with-a-Lantern. This meteoric phenomenon, when seen on the ground or a little above it, is called by sundry names, as Brenning-drake, Burning candle, Corpse candles, Dank Will, Death-fires, Dick-a-Tuesday, Elf-fire, the Fair maid of Ireland, Friar's lantern, Gillion-a-burnt-tail, Gyl Burnt-tail, Ignis fatuus, Jack-o'-lantern, Jack-with-a-lantern, Kit-o'-the-canstick, Kitty-wi'-a-wisp, Mad Crisp, Peg-a-lantern, Puck, Robin Goodfellow, Shot stars, Spittle of the stars, Star jelly, a Sylham lamp, a Walking fire, Wandering fires, Wandering wild-fire, Will-with-a-wisp.

(Those led astray by these "fool fires" are said to be Elf-led, Mab-led, or Puck-led.)

N.B.—When seen on the tips of the fingers, the hair of the head, mast-tops, and so on, the phenomenon is called Castor and Pollux (if double), Cuerpo Santo (Spanish), Corpusants, Dipsas, St. Elmo or Fires of St. Elmo (Spanish), St. Ermyn, Feu d'Hélène (French), Fire-drakes, Fuole or Looke Fuole, Haggs, Helen (if single), St. Hel'ena, St. Helme's fires, Leda's twins, St. Peter and St. Nicholas (Italian) or Fires of St. Peter and St. Nicholas.

(The superstitions connected with these "fool-fires" are: That they are souls broken out from purgatory, come to earth to obtain prayers and masses for their deliverance; that they are the mucus sneezed from the nostrils of rheumatic planets; that they are ominous of death; that they indicate hid treasures; etc.)

Jack's, a noted coffee-house, where London and country millers used to assemble to examine their purchases after the market was closed. It stood in the rear of old 'Change, London.

Jacks (The Two Genial), Jack Munden and Jack Dowton. Planché says, "They were never called anything else." The former was Joseph Munden (1758–1832), and the latter William Dowton (1764–1851).—Planché: Recollections, etc., i. 28.

Jackdaw of Rheims (The), one of the Ingoldsby legends (q.v.). It describes how a jackdaw stole a cardinal's ring, and the cardinal laid a curse on the thief. The jackdaw soon became a most pitiable object; but ultimately the ring was found in the jackdaw's nest; the curse was removed, the jackdaw recovered, left off his thievish tricks, became a most sanctimonious bird, and at death was canonized as "Jim Crow." (See RHEIMS, etc.)

Jacob the Scourge of Grammar, Giles Jacob, master of Romsey, in Southamptonshire, brought up for an attorney. Author of a Law Dictionary, Lives and Characters of English Poets, etc. (1686–1744).

Jacob's Ladder, a meteoric appearance resembling broad beams of light from heaven to earth. A somewhat similar phenomenon may be seen when the sun shines through the chink or hole of a closed shutter. The allusion is, of course, to the ladder which Jacob dreamt about (Gen. xxviii. 12).

Jacob's Staff, a mathematical instrument for taking heights and distances.

> Reach, then, a soaring quill, that I may write
> As with a Jacob's Staff to take her height.
> Cleveland: The Hecatomb to his Mistress (1641).

Jac'omo, an irascible captain and a woman-hater. Frank (the sister of Frederick) is in love with him.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Captain (1613).

Jacques (1 syl.), one of the domestic men-servants of the duke of Aranza. The duke, in order to tame down the overbearing spirit of his bride, pretends to be a peasant, and deputes Jacques to represent the duke for the nonce. Juliana, the duke's bride, lays her grievance before "duke" Jacques, but of course receives no redress, although she learns that if a Jacques is "duke," the "peasant" Aranza is the better man.—Tobin: The Honeymoon (1804).

Jacques (Pauvre), the absent sweetheart of a love-lorn maiden. Marie Antoinette sent to Switzerland for a lass to attend the dairy of her "Swiss village" in miniature, which she arranged in the Little Trianon (Paris). The lass was heard sighing for pauvre Jacques, and this was made a capital sentimental amusement for the court idlers. The swain was sent for, and the marriage consummated.

> Pauvre Jacques, quand j'etais près de loi
> Je ne sentais pas ma misère;
> Mais à présent que tu vis loin de moi
> Je manque de tout sur la terre.
> Marquis de Travenet: Pauvre Jacques.

Jacques. (See JAQUES.)

Jac'ulin, daughter of Gerrard king of the beggars, beloved by lord Hubert. —Fletcher: The Beggars' Bush (1622).

Jaffier, a young man befriended by Priuli, a proud Venetian senator. Jaffier rescued the senator's daughter Belvidera from shipwreck, and afterwards married her clandestinely. The old man now discarded both, and Pierre induced Jaffier to join a junto for the murder of the senators. Jaffier revealed the conspiracy to his wife, and Belvidera, in order to save her father, induced her husband to disclose it to Priuli, under promise of free pardon to the conspirators. The pardon, however, was limited to Jaffier, and the rest were ordered to torture and death. Jaffier now sought out his friend Pierre, and, as he was led to execution, stabbed him to prevent his being broken on the wheel, and then killed himself. Belvidera went mad and died.—Otway: Venice Preserved (1682).

 Betterton (1635–1710), Robert Wilks (1670–1732), Spranger Barry (1719–1777), C. M. Young (1777–1856), and W. C. Macready (1793–1873), are celebrated for this character.

Jaga-naut, the seven-headed idol of the Hindûs, described by Southey in the Curse of Kehama, xiv. (1809).

Jaggers, a lawyer of Little Britain, London. He was a burly man, of an exceedingly dark complexion, with a large head and large hand. He had bushy black eyebrows that stood up bristling, sharp suspicious eyes set very deep in his head, and strong black dots where his beard and whiskers would have been if he had let them. His hands smelt strongly of scented soap, he wore a very large watch-chain, was in the constant habit of biting his fore-finger, and when he spoke to any one, he threw his fore-finger at him pointedly. A hard, logical man was Mr. Jaggers, who required an answer to be "yes" or "no," allowed no one to express an opinion, but only to state facts in the fewest possible words. Magwitch appointed him Pip's guardian, and he was Miss Havisham's man of business.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

Jairus's Daughter, restored to life by Jesus, is called by Klopstock Cidli.—Klopstock: The Messiah, iv. (1771).

Jalût, the Arabic name for Goliath.—Sale: Al Korân, xvii.

James (Prince), youngest son of king Robert III. of Scotland, introduced by sir W. Scott in The Fair Maid of Perth (1828).

James I. of England, introduced by sir W. Scott in The Fortunes of Nigel (1822).

Ja'mie (Don), younger brother of don Henrique (2 syl.), by whom he is cruelly treated.—Fletcher: The Spanish Curate (1622).

Jamie Duffs. Weepers are so called, from a noted Scotchman of the eighteenth century, whose craze was to follow funerals in deep mourning costume.—Kay: Original Portraits, i. 7; ii. 9, 17, 95.

Ja'mieson (Bet), nurse at Dr. Gray's, surgeon at Middlemas.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Jamshid, king of the genii, famous for a golden cup filled with the elixir of life. The cup was hidden by the genii, but found when digging the foundations of Persep'olis.

> I know, too, where the genii hid
> The jewelled cup of their king Jamshid,
> With life's elixir sparkling high.
> Moore: Lalla Rookh ("Paradise and the Peri," 1817).

Jane Eyre, heroine of a novel so called by Currer Bell (Charlotte Brontë).

Jane Shore. (See SHORE.)

Jan'et, the Scotch laundress of David Ramsay the watchmaker.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Jan'et of Tomahourich (Muhme), aunt of Robin Oig M'Combich a Highland drover.—Sir W. Scott: The Two Drovers (time, George III.).

Janet's Repentance, one of the tales in Scenes of Clerical Life, by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross) (1858).

Jannekin (Little), apprentice of Henry Smith the armourer.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Jannie Duff, with her little sister and brother, were sent to gather broom, and were lost in the bush (Australia). The parents called in the aid of the native blacks to find them, and on the ninth day they were discovered. "Father," cried the little boy, "why didn't you come before? We cooed quite loud, but you never came." The sister only said, "Cold!" and sank in stupor. Jannie had stripped herself to cover little Frank, and had spread her frock over her sister to keep her warm, and there all three were found almost dead, lying under a bush.

Janot [Zha-no], a simpleton, one who exercises silly ingenuity or says vapid and silly things.

> Without being a Janot, who has not sometimes in conversation committed a Janotism?—Ourry: Trans.

January and May. January is an old Lombard baron, some 60 years of age, who marries a girl named May. This young wife loves Damyan, a young squire. One day, the old baron found them in close embrace; but May persuaded her husband that his eyes were so dim he had made a mistake, and the old baron, too willing to believe, allowed himself to give credit to the tale.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Merchant's Tale," 1388).

(Modernized by Ogle and Pope, 1741.)

Jaquemart, the automata of a clock, consisting of a man and woman who strike the hours on a bell. So called from Jean Jaquemart of Dijon, a clockmaker, who devised this piece of mechanism. Menage erroneously derives the word from jaccomarchiardus ("a coat of mail"), "because watchmen watched the clock of Dijon fitted with a jaquemart."

Jaquenetta, a country wench courted by don Adriano de Armado.—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost (1594).

Jaques, one of the lords attendant on the banished duke in the forest of Arden. A philosophic idler, cynical, sullen, contemplative, and moralizing. He could "suck melancholy out of a song, as a weasel sucks eggs." Jaques resents Orlando's passion for Rosalind, and quits the duke as soon as he is restored to his dukedom.—Shakespeare: As You Like It (1598).

N.B.—Sometimes Shakespeare makes one syllable and sometimes two syllables of the word. Sir W. Scott makes one syllable of it, but Charles Lamb two. For example—

Whom humorous Jaques with envy viewed (1 syl.).
Sir W. Scott.

Where Jaques fed his solitary vein (2 syl.).—Lamb.

The "Jaques" of [Charles M. Young, 1777-1856] is indeed most musical, most melancholy, attuned to the very wood-walks among which he muses.—New Monthly Magazine (1822).

Jaques (1 syl.), the miser in a comedy by Ben Jonson, entitled The Case is Altered (1574-1637).

Jaques (1 syl.), servant to Sulpit'ia a bawd. (See JACQUES.)—Fletcher: The Custom of the Country (1647).

Jarley (Mrs.), a kind-hearted woman, mistress of a travelling wax-work exhibition, containing "one hundred figures the size of life;" the "only stupendous collection of real wax-work in the world;" "the delight of the nobility and gentry, the royal family, and crowned heads of Europe." Mrs. Jarley was kind to little Nell, and employed her as a decoy-duck to "Jarley's unrivalled collection."

If I know'd a donkey wot wouldn't go
To see Mrs. Jarley's wax-work show;
Do you think I'd acknowledge him? Oh no, no!
Then run to Jarley.
Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop, xvii. (1840).

Jarnac (Coup de), a cut which severs the ham-string. So called from a cut given by Jarnac to La Châteigneraie in a duel fought in the presence of Henri II., in 1547.

Jarn'dyce v. Jarn'dyce (2 syl.), a Chancery suit "never ending, still beginning," which had dragged its slow length along over so many years that it had blighted the prospects and ruined the health of all persons interested in its settlement.—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Jarn'dyce (Mr.), client in the great Chancery suit of "Jarndyce v. Jarndyce," and guardian of Esther Summerson. He concealed the tenderest heart under a flimsy churlishness of demeanour, and could never endure to be thanked for any of his numberless acts of kindness and charity. If anything went wrong with him, or if he heard of an unkind action, he would say, "I am sure the wind is in the east;" but if he heard of kindness or goodness, the wind would veer round at once, and be "due west."—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Jarvie (Bailie Nicol), a magistrate at Glasgow, and kinsman of Rob Roy. He is petulant, conceited, purse-proud, without tact, and intensely prejudiced, but kind-hearted and sincere. Jarvie marries his maid. The novel of Rob Roy has been dramatized by J. Pocock, and Charles Mackay was the first to appear in the character of "Bailie Nicol Jarvie." Talfourd says (1829), "Other actors are sophisticate, but Mackay is the thing itself."—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

The character of Bailie Nicol Jarvie is one of the author's happiest conceptions, and the idea of carrying him to the wild rugged mountains, among outlaws and desperadoes—at the same time that he retained a keen relish of the comforts of the Saltmarket of Glasgow, and a due sense of his dignity as a magistrate—complete the ludicrous effect of the picture.—Chambers: English Literature, ii. 587.

Jarvis, a faithful old servant, who tries to save his master, Beverley, from his fatal passion of gambling.—Edward Moore: The Gamester (1753).

Jaspar was poor, heartless, and wicked; he lived by highway robbery, and robbery led to murder. One day, he induced a poor neighbour to waylay his landlord; but the neighbour relented, and said, "Though dark the night, there is One above who sees in darkness." "Never fear!" said Jaspar; "for no eye above or below can pierce this darkness." As he spoke, an unnatural light gleamed on him, and he became a confirmed maniac.—Southey: Jaspar (a ballad).

Jasper (Old), a ploughman at Glendearg Tower.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Jasper (Sir), father of Charlotte. He wants her to marry a Mr. Dapper; but she loves Leander, and, to avoid a marriage she dislikes, pretends to be dumb. A mock doctor is called in, who discovers the facts of the case, and employs Leander as his apothecary. Leander soon cures the lady with "pills matrimoniac." In Molière's Le Médecin Malgré Lui (from which this play is taken), sir Jasper is called "Géronte" (2 syl.).—Fielding: The Mock Doctor (1733).

Jasper Packlemerton, of atrocious memory, one of the chief figures in Mrs. Jarley's wax-work exhibition.

"Jasper courted and married fourteen wives, and destroyed them all by tickling the soles of their feet when they were asleep. On being brought to the scaffold and asked if he was sorry for what he had done, he replied he was only sorry for having let them off so easy. 'Let this,' said Mrs. Jarley, 'be a warning to all young ladies to be particular in the character of the gentlemen of their choice. Observe, his fingers are curled, as if in the act of tickling, and there is a wink in his eyes.'"—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop, xxviii (1840).

Jaup (Allson), an old woman at Middlemas village.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Jaup (Saunders), a farmer at Old St. Ronan's.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Javan lost his father on the day of his birth, and was brought up in the "patriarch's glen" by his mother, till she also died. He then sojourned for ten years with the race of Cain, and became the disciple of Jubal the great musician. He then returned to the glen, and fell in love with Zillah; but the glen being invaded by giants, Zillah and Javan, with many others, were taken captives. Enoch reproved the giants; and, as he ascended up to heaven, his mantle fell on Javan, who released the captives, and conducted them back to the glen. The giants were panic-struck by a tempest, and their king was killed by some unknown hand.—James Montgomery: The World before the Flood (1812).

Ja'van's Issue, the Ionians and Greeks generally (Gen. x. 2). Milton uses the expression in Paradise Lost, i. 508.

(In Isa. lxvi. 19 and in Ezek. xxvii. 13 the word is used for Greeks collectively.)

Javert, an officer of police, the impersonation of inexorable law.—Victor Hugo: Les Miserables (1862).

Ja'zer, a city of Gad, personified by Isaiah. "Moab shall howl for Moab, every one shall howl. . . . I will bewail, with the weeping of Jazer, the vine of Sibmah; I will water thee with my tears, O Heshbon."—Isa. xvi. 7–9.

It did not content the congregation to weep all of them; but they howled with a loud voice, weeping with the weeping of Jazer.—Kirkton, 150.

Jealous Traffick (Sir), a rich merchant, who fancies everything Spanish is better than English, and intends his daughter Isabinda to marry don Diego Barbinetto, who is expected to arrive forthwith. Isabinda is in love with Charles [Gripe], who dresses in a Spanish costume, passes himself off as don Diego Barbinetto, and is married to Isabinda. Sir Jealous is irritable, headstrong, prejudiced, and wise in his own conceit.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Busy Body (1709).

Jealous Wife (The), a comedy by George Colman (1761). Harriot Russet marries Mr. Oakly, and becomes "the jealous wife;" but is ultimately cured by the interposition of major Oakly, her brother-in-law.

(This comedy is founded on Fielding's Tom Jones.)

Jeames de la Pluche, a flunky, in the service of sir George Flimsey of Berkley Square, who comes unexpectedly into a large fortune. Jeames is a synonym for a flunky.—Thackeray: Jeames's Diary (1849).

Jean des Vignes, a drunken performer of marionettes. The French say, Il fait comme Jean des Vignes (i.e. "He is a good-for-nothing fellow"); Le mariage de Jean des Vignes (i.e. "a hedge marriage"); Un Jean des Vignes (i.e. "an ungain-doing fellow"); Plus sot que Jean des Vignes (i.e. "worse than come out"), etc.

Jean! que dire sur Jean? C'est un terrible nom,
Qui jamais n'accompagne une épithète honête.
Jean des Vignes, Jean ligne. Où vais-je? Trouvez bon
Qu'en si beau chemin je m'arrête.
Virgil Travesti ("Juno to Æneas"), vii.

Jean Folle Farine, a merry Andrew, a poor fool, a Tom Noodle. So called because he comes on the stage like a great loutish boy, dressed all in white, with his face, hair, and hands thickly covered with flour. Scaramouch is a sort of Jean Folle Farine.

(Ouida has a novel called Folle Farine, but she uses the phrase in quite another sense.)

Jean Jacques. So J. J. Rousseau is often called (1712–1778).

That is almost the only maxim of Jean Jacques to which I can . . . subscribe.—Lord Lytton.

Jean Paul. J. P. Friedrich Richter is generally so called (1763–1825).

Jeanne of Alsace, a girl ruined by Dubosc the highwayman. She gives him up to justice, in order to do a good turn to Julie Lesurques (2 syl.), who had befriended her.—Stirling: The Courier of Lyons (1852).

Jebusites (The). The Catholics are so called in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel.

But far more numerous was the herd of such,
Who think too little, and who talk too much;
These out of mere instinct, they knew not why,
Adored their fathers' God, and property;
And, by the same blind benefit of fate,
The devil and the Jebusite did hate.
Part I. par. 530–540 (1681).

Jedburgh, Jeddart, or Jedwood Justice, hang first and try afterwards. The custom rose from the summary way of dealing with border marauders.

(Jeddart and Jedwood are merely corruptions of Jedburgh.)

¶ Cupar Justice is the same thing.

¶ Abingdon Law, the same as "Jedburgh Justice." In the Commonwealth, major-general Brown, of Abingdon, first hanged his prisoners and then tried them.

¶ Lynch Law, mob law. So called from James Lynch of Piedmont, in Virginia. It is a summary way of dealing with marauders, etc. Called in Scotland, Burlaw or Byrlaw.

Jeddler (Dr.), "a great philosopher." The heart and mystery of his philosophy was to look upon the world as a gigantic practical joke; something too absurd to be considered seriously by any rational man. A kind and generous man by nature was Dr. Jeddler, and though he had taught himself the art of turning good to dross and sunshine into shade, he had not taught himself to forget his warm benevolence and active love He wore a pigtail, and had a streaked face like a winter pippin, with here and there a dimple "to express the peckings of the birds;" but the pippin was a tempting apple, a rosy, healthy apple after all.

Grace and Marion Jeddler, daughters of the doctor, beautiful, graceful, and affectionate. They both fell in love with Alfred Heathfield; but Alfred loved the younger daughter. Marion, knowing the love of Grace, left her home clandestinely one Christmas Day, and all supposed she had eloped with Michael Warden. In due time, Alfred married Grace, and then Marion made it known to her sister that she had given up Alfred out of love to her, and had been living in concealment with her aunt Martha. Report says she subsequently married Michael Warden, and became the pride and honour of his country mansion.—Dickens: The Battle of Life (1846).

Jed'ida and Benjamin, two of the children that Jesus took in His arms and blessed.

"Well I remember," said Benjamin, "when we were on earth, with what loving fondness He folded us in His arms; how tenderly He pressed us to His heart. A tear was on His cheek, and I kissed it away. I see it still, and shall ever see it." "And I, too," answered Jedida, "remember when His arms were clasped around me how He said to our mothers, 'Unless ye become as little children, ye cannot enter the kingdom of heaven.'"—Klopstock: The Messiah, I. (1748).

Jehoi'achim, the servant of Joshua Geddes the quaker.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Jehu, a coachman, one who drives at a rattling pace.

The driving is like the driving of Jehu the son of Nimshi; for he driveth furiously.—2 Kings ix. 20.

Jehu (Companions of). The "Chouans" were so called, from a fanciful analogy between their self-imposed task and that appointed to Jehu on his being set over the kingdom of Israel. As Jehu was to cut off Ahab and Jezebel, with all their house; so the Chouans were to cut off Louis XVI., Marie Antoinette, and all the Bourbons.

Jehu and Henry IV. While Ahab king of Israel was alive, Jehu was anointed king, and the heads of Ahab's sons, enclosed in baskets, were sent to Jehu as an acceptable present.—2 Kings x. 9 (B.C. 884).

¶ While Richard II. was still living, Henry [IV.] was anointed king of England, and the heads of the earls of Kent, Salisbury, and Holland, who had conspired against him, were sent in baskets to him as an acceptable present.—Froissart, bk. iv. ch. 119 (A.D. 1400).

Jekyll (Dr.) and Mr. Hyde. This is a remarkable allegory, illustrating the dual nature of man. Dr. Jekyll is an honourable man, beloved by all for his philanthropic labours. Mr. Hyde is positively loathsome, and from him all shrink as from one deformed and foul. He lives without restraint, and plunges into all manner of evil. The truth is that Dr. Jekyll is Mr. Hyde. He has discovered a potion by means of which he can change himself into Mr. Hyde, and another to effect the change back again into Dr. Jekyll. He says at the outset that he can be rid of Mr. Hyde at will; but not till Mr. Hyde commits a dastardly and outrageous murder does Dr. Jekyll promise to have no more to do with Mr. Hyde. Even then he does not make an absolute renunciation of the past, for he still keeps the house where he lived as Mr. Hyde, as well as the clothes he then wore. At last he locks the door which leads into Hyde's house, and stamps the key underfoot. But it is too late. He finds himself transformed into Mr. Hyde without taking the potion; and, though he takes double doses of the other potion to keep himself Dr. Jekyll, he often lapses. At last he can procure no more of one of the ingredients of the mixture, and commits suicide.—R. L. Stevenson: Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (1886).

Jel'licot (Old Goody), servant at the under-keeper's hut, Woodstock Forest.—

Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Jellyby (Mrs.), a sham philanthropist, who spends her time, money, and energy on foreign missions, to the neglect of her family and home duties. Untidy in dress, living in a perfect litter, she has a habit of looking "a long way off," as if she could see nothing nearer to her than Africa. Mrs. Jellyby is quite overwhelmed with business correspondence relative to the affairs of Borrioboola Gha.—Dickens: Bleak House, iv. (1852).

Jemlikha, the favourite Greek slave of Dakiānos of Ephesus. Nature had endowed him with every charm, "his words were sweeter than the honey of Arabia, and his wit sparkled like a diamond." One day, Dakianos was greatly annoyed by a fly, which persisted in tormenting the king, whereupon Jemlikha said to himself, "If Dakianos cannot rule a fly, how can he be the creator of heaven and earth?" This doubt he communicated to his fellow-slaves, and they all resolved to quit Ephesus, and seek some power superior to that of Dakianos.—Comte Caylus: Oriental Tales ("Dakianos and the Seven Sleepers," 1743).

Jemmie Duffs, weepers. (See JAMIE DUFFS, p. 539.)

Jemmies, sheep's heads, and also a house-breaker's instrument.

Mr. Sikes made many pleasant witticisms on "Jemmies," a cant name for sheep's heads, and also for an ingenious implement much used in his profession.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Jemmy. This name, found on engravings of the eighteenth century, means James Worsdale (died 1767).

Jemmy Dawson, a ballad by Shenstone, relating the love of Kitty for captain Dawson, in the service of the young chevalier. He was "hanged, drawn, and quartered" on Kennington Common in 1746.

Jemmy Twitcher, a cunning and treacherous highwayman.—Gay: The Beggar's Opera (1727).

(Lord Sandwich, member of the Kit-Kat Club, was called "Jemmy Twitcher," 1765.)

Jenkin, the servant of George-a-Green. He says a fellow ordered him to hold his horse, and see that it took no cold. "No, no," quoth Jenkin, "I'll lay my cloak under him." He did so, but "mark you," he adds, "I cut four holes in my cloak first, and made his horse stand on the bare ground."—R. Greene: George-a-Green, the Pinner of Wakefield (1584).

Jenkin, one of the retainers of Julian Avenel (2 syl.) of Avenel Castle.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time Elizabeth).

Jenkins (Mrs. Winifred), Miss Tabitha Bramble's maid, noted for her bad spelling, misapplication of words, and ludicrous misnomers. Mrs. Winifred Jenkins is the original of Mrs. Malaprop.—Smollett: The Expedition of Humphry Clinker (1771).

Jenkins, a vulgar lick-spittle of the aristocracy, who retails their praises and witticisms, records their movements and deeds, gives flaming accounts of their dresses and parties, either vivâ voce or in newspaper paragraphs: "Lord and lady Dash attended divine service last Sunday, and were very attentive to the sermon" (wonderful!). "Lord and lady Dash took a drive or walk last Monday in their magnificent park of Snobdoodleham. Lady Dash wore a mantle of rich silk, a bonnet with ostrich fellows, and shoes with rosettes." The name is said to have been given by Punch to a writer in the Morning Post.

Jenkinson (Ephraim), a green old swindler, whom Dr. Primrose met in a public tavern. Imposed on by his venerable appearance, apparent devoutness, learned talk about "cosmogony," and still more so by his flattery of the doctor's work on the subject of monogamy, Dr. Primrose sold the swindler his horse, Old Blackberry, for a draft upon Farmer Flamborough. When the draft was presented for payment, the farmer told the vicar that Ephraim Jenkinson "was the greatest rascal under heaven," and that he was the very rogue who had sold Moses Primrose the spectacles. Subsequently the vicar found him in the county jail, where he showed the vicar great kindness, did him valuable service, became a reformed character, and probably married one of the daughters of Farmer Flamborough.—Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield (1765).

For our own part, we must admit that we have never been able to treat with due gravity any allusion to the learned speculations of Man'etho, Bero'sius, or Sanchoni'athon, from their indissoluble connection in our mind with the finished cosmogony of Jenkinson.—Encyclopædia Britannica (article, "Romance").

Jennie, housekeeper to the old laird of Dumbiedikes.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Jenny [Diver]. Captain Macheath says, "What, my pretty Jenny! as prim and demure as ever? There's not a prude, though ever so high bred, hath a more sanctified look, with a more mischievous heart." She pretends to love Macheath, but craftily secures one of his pistols, that his other "pals" may the more easily betray him into the hands of the constables (act ii. sc. 1).—Gay: The Beggar's Opera (1727).

Jenny l'Ouvrière, the type of a hard-working Parisian needlewoman. She is contented with a few window-flowers which she terms "her garden," a caged bird which she calls "her songster;" and when she gives the fragments of her food to some one poorer than herself, she calls it "her delight."

> Entendez-vous un oiseau familier?
> C'est le chanteur de Jenny l'Ouvrière,
> Au cœur content, content de peu
> Elle pourrait être riche, et préfère
> Ce qui vient de Dieu.
> Emile Barateau (1847).

Jeph'thah's Daughter. When Jephthah went forth against the Ammonites, he vowed that if he returned victorious he would sacrifice, as a burnt offering, whatever first met him on his entrance into his native city. He gained a splendid victory, and at the news thereof his only daughter came forth dancing to give him welcome. The miserable father rent his clothes in agony, but the noble-spirited maiden would not hear of his violating the vow. She demanded a short respite, to bewail upon the mountains her blighted hope of becoming a mother, and then submitted to her fate.—Judg. xi.

¶ An almost identical tale is told of Idom'eneus king of Crete. On his return from the Trojan war, he made a vow in a tempest that, if he escaped, he would offer to Neptune the first living creature that presented itself to his eye on the Cretan shore. His own son was there to welcome him home, and Idomeneus offered him up a sacrifice to the sea-god, according to his vow. Fénelon has introduced this legend in his Télémaque, v.

¶ Agamemnon vowed to Diana, if he might be blessed with a child, that he would sacrifice to her the dearest of all his possessions. Iphigenia, his infant daughter, was, of course, his "dearest possession;" but he refused to sacrifice her, and thus incurred the wrath of the goddess, which resulted in the detention of the Trojan fleet at Aulis. Iphigenia being offered in sacrifice, the offended deity was satisfied, and interposed at the critical moment, by carrying the princess to Tauris and substituting a stag in her stead.

¶ The latter part of this tale cannot fail to call to mind the offering of Abraham. As he was about to take the life of Isaac, Jehovah interposed, and a ram was substituted for the human victim.—Gen. xxii.

> [He] not bent as Jephthah once,
> Blindly to execute a rash resolve;
> Whom better it had suited to exclaim,
> "I have done ill!" than to redeem his pledge
> By doing worse. Not unlike to him
> In folly that great leader of the Greeks—
> Whence, on the altar Iphigenia mourned
> Her virgin beauty.
> Dante: Paradise, v. (1321).

¶ Jephthah's daughter has often been dramatized. Thus we have in English Jephthah his Daughter, by Plessie Morney; Jephthah (1546), by Christopherson; Jephthah, by Buchanan (1554); and Jephthah (an opera, 1752), by Handel.

 Percy, in his Reliques (bk. ii. 3), has inserted a ballad called Jephthah, Judge of Israel, which Hamlet quotes (act ii. sc. 2)—

> Hamlet: O Jeptha, judge of Israel, what a treasure hadst thou!
> Polonius: What [a] treasure had he, my lord?
> Hamlet: Why, "one fair and no more, the which he loved passing well. . . ."
> Polonius: If you call me Jeptha, my lord, I have a daughter, that I love passing well.
> Hamlet: Nay, that follows not.
> Polonius: What follows then, my lord?
> Hamlet: Why, "As by lot, God wot."

The first verse of the ballad is—

> Have you not heard these many years ago,
> Jeptha was judge of Israel;
> He had one only daughter, and no mo,
> The which he loved passing well,
> And as by lot, God wot,
> It so came to pass . . .

(Polonius asks, "What follows ['passing well']?" to which Hamlet replies, "As by lot, God wot.")

Jepson (Old), a smuggler.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Jeremi'ah (The British), Gildas, author of De Exidio Britanniæ, a book of lamentations over the destruction of Britain. He is so called by Gibbon (516-570).

Jer'emy (Master), head domestic of lord Saville.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Jeremy Diddler, an adept at raising money on false pretences.—Kenney: Raising the Wind (1803).

Jericho, the manor of Blackmore, near Chelmsford. Here Henry VIII. had a house of pleasure, and when he was absent on some affair of gallantry, the expression in vogue was, "He's gone to Jericho."

Jermyn (Matthew) the lawyer, husband of Mrs. Transome, and father of Harold.—George Eliot (Mrs. J.W. Cross): Felix Holt, the Radical (a novel, 1866).

Jerningham (Master Thomas), the duke of Buckingham's gentleman.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Jerome (Don), father of don Ferdinand and Louisa; pig-headed, passionate, and mercenary, but very fond of his daughter. He insists on her marrying Isaac Mendoza, a rich Portuguese Jew; but Louisa, being in love with don Antonio, positively refuses to do so. She is turned out of the house by mistake, and her duenna is locked up, under the belief that she is Louisa. Isaac, being introduced to the duenna, elopes with her, supposing her to be don Jerome's daughter; and Louisa, taking refuge in a convent, gets married to don Antonio. Ferdinand, at the same time, marries Clara the daughter of don Guzman. The old man is well content, and promises to be the friend of his children, who, he acknowledges, have chosen better for themselves than he had done for them.—Sheridan: The Duenna (1775).

Jerome (Father), abbot at St. Bride's Convent.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Jeron'imo, the principal character in The Spanish Tragedy, by Thomas Kyd (1597). On finding his application to the king ill-timed, he says to himself, "Go by! Jeronimo;" which so tickled the fancy of the audience that it became a common street jest.

Jerry, manager of a troupe of dancing dogs. He was a tall, black-whiskered man, in a velveteen coat.—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop, xviii. (1840).

Jerry Cruncher. (See CRUNCHER, p. 249.)

Jerry Hawthorn, the rustic in Pierce Egan's Life in London (1824). (See CORINTHIAN TOM, p. 235.)

Jerry Sneak, a hen-pecked husband. —Foote: Mayor of Garratt (1763).

Jerryman'dering, so dividing a state or local district as to give one part of it a political advantage over the other. The word is a corruption of "Gerrymandering;" so called from Elbridge Gerry, governor of Massachusetts, member of Congress from 1776 to 1784, and vice-president of the United States in 1812. Elbridge Gerry died in 1814.

Jeru'salem, in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, means London; "David" is Charles II., and "Absalom" the duke of Monmouth, etc.

> The inhabitants of old Jerusalem
> Were Jebusites [Catholics].
> Pt. I. 87, 88.

Jerusalem. 1. Henry IV. was told "he should not die but in Jerusalem." Being in Westminster Abbey, he inquired what the chapter-house was called, and when he was told it was called the "Jerusalem Chamber," he felt sure that he would die there "according to the prophecy," and so he did.

2. Pope SYLVESTER II. was told the same thing, and died as he was saying mass in a church so called at Rome.—Brown: Fasciculus.

3. CAMBYSES, son of Cyrus, was told that he should die in Echat'ana, which he supposed meant the capital of Media; but he died of his wounds in a place so called in Syria.

Jerusalem (The Fall of), a dramatic poem by dean Milman (1820).

Jerusalem Delivered, an epic poem in twenty books, by Torquato Tasso (1575). The tale is as follows:—

The crusaders, having encamped on the plains of Torto'sa, choose Godfrey for their chief. The overtures of Argantês being declined, war is declared by him in the name of the king of Egypt. The Christian army reaches Jerusalem, but it is found that the city cannot be taken without the aid of Rinaldo, who had withdrawn from the army because Godfrey had cited him for the death of Girnando, whom he had slain in a duel. Godfrey sends to the enchanted island of Armi'da to invite the hero back, and on his return Jerusalem is assailed in a night attack. The poem concludes with the triumphant entry of the Christians into the Holy City, and their adoration at the Saviour's tomb.

(The two chief episodes are the loves of Olindo and Sophronia, and of Tancred and Corinda.)

English translations in verse by Carew in 1594; by Fairfax in 1600; and by Hoole in 1763.

Jervis (Mrs.), the virtuous housekeeper of young squire B. Mrs. Jervis protects Pam'ela when her young master assails her.—Richardson: Pamela or Virtue Rewarded (1740).

Jessamy, the son of colonel Oldboy. He changed his name in compliment to lord Jessamy, who adopted him and left him his heir. Jessamy is an affected, conceited prig, who dresses as a fop, carries a muff to keep his hands warm, and likes old china better than a pretty girl. This popinjay proposes to Clarissa Flowerdale; but she despises him, much to his indignation and astonishment.—Bickerstaff: Lionel and Clarissa (1735-1790).

He's a coxcomb, a fop, a dainty milksop,
Who essenced and dizened from bottom to top,
And looked like a doll from a milliner's shop . . .
He shrugs and takes snuff, and carries a muff,
A minickin, finicking, French powdered puff.
Act I. 2.

Jessamy. As an adjective, having the colour or smell of jasmine. As a noun, the plant jasmine; one who wears jasmine in a button-hole; a fop. (See the Standard Dict. of Eng. Lang., p. 962.)

Jessamy Bride (The), Mary Horneck, with whom Goldsmith fell in love in 1769.

A writer in Notes and Queries, April 10, 1897, suggests that "jessamy" is equivalent to "jasmine," and that Goldsmith simply used the word to express Mary's sweetness, daintiness, and grace. The flowers of the jasmine were used to perfume gloves; and Pepys, in his Diary, February 15, 1668-9, says, "I did this day call at the New Exchange, and bought her . . . and two pairs of jessimy gloves."

(Frankfort Moore has just (1897) written a novel so called.)

Jes'sica, daughter of Shylock the Jew. She elopes with Lorenzo.—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice (1597).

Jessica cannot be called a sketch, or, if a sketch, she is dashed off in glowing colours from the rainbow palette of a Rubens. She has a rich tint of Orientalism shed over her.—Mrs. Jameson.

Jessie, the Flower o' Dumblane (The Charming Young), a song by Robert Tannahill.

How sweet is the brier, in its saft fauldin' blossom!
And sweet is the hill wi' its mantle o' green;
Yet fairer and sweeter, and dear to my bosom,
The charming young Jessie, the flower o' Dumblane.

Jesters. (See FOOLS, p. 380.)

Jests (The Father of), Joseph or Joe Miller, an English comic actor, whose name has become a household word for a stale jest (1684-1738). The book which goes by his name was compiled by Mr. Mottley the dramatist (1739). Joe Miller himself never uttered a jest in his life, and it is a lucus a non lucendo to father them on such a taciturn, commonplace dullard.

Jesus Christ and the Clay Bird. The Korân says, "O Jesus, son of Mary, remember . . . when thou didst create of clay the figure of a bird . . . and didst breathe thereon, and it became a bird!"—Ch. v.

N.B.—The allusion is to a legend that Jesus was playing with other children who amused themselves with making clay birds, but when the child Jesus breathed on the one He had made, it instantly received life and flew away.—Hone: Apocryphal New Testament (1820).

Jew (The), a comedy by R. Cumberland (1776), written to disabuse the public mind of unjust prejudices against a people who have been long "scattered and peeled." The Jew is Sheva, who was rescued at Cadiz from an auto da fé by don Carlos, and from a howling London mob by the son of don Carlos, called Charles Ratcliffe. His whole life is spent in unostentatious benevolence, but his modesty is equal to his philanthropy. He gives £10,000 as a marriage portion to Ratcliffe's sister, who marries Frederick Bertram, and he makes Charles the heir of all his property.

Shylock the Jew. Of C. Macklin's acting Pope said—

This is the Jew
That Shakespeare drew.

Jew (The Wandering).

1. Of Greek tradition. ARIS'TEAS, a poet, who continued to appear and disappear alternately for above 400 years, and who visited all the mythical nations of the earth.

2. Of Jewish story. Tradition says that CARTAPH'ILOS, the door-keeper of the judgment-hall in the service of Pontius Pilate, struck our Lord as he led Him forth, saying, "Get on! Faster, Jesus!" Whereupon the Man of Sorrows replied, "I am going; but tarry thou till I come [again]." This man afterwards became a Christian, and was baptized by Ananias under the name of Joseph. Every hundred years he falls into a trance, out of which he rises again at the age of 30.

3. In German legend, the Wandering Jew is associated with JOHN BUTTADÆUS, seen at Antwerp in the thirteenth century, again in the fifteenth, and again in the sixteenth centuries. His last appearance was in 1774, at Brussels.

(Leonard Doldius, of Nürnberg, in his Praxis Alchymiæ (1604), says that the Jew Ahasue'rus is sometimes called "Buttadæus.")

4. The French legend. The French call the Wandering Jew ISAAC LAKE'DION or Laquedem. (See Mitternacht: Dissertatio in Johan., xxi. 19.)

5. Of Dr. Croly's novel. The name given to the Wandering Jew by Dr. Croly is SALATHIEL BEN SADI, who appeared and disappeared towards the close of the sixteenth century at Venice, in so sudden a manner as to attract the attention of all Europe.

6. It is said in legend that GIPSIES are doomed to be everlasting wanderers, because they refused the Virgin and Child hospitality in their flight into Egypt.—Aventinus: Annalium Boiorum, libri septem, vii. (1554).

N.B.—The earliest account of the Wandering Jew is in the Book of the Chronicles of the Abbey of St. Alban's, copied and continued by Matthew Paris (1228). In 1242 Philip Mouskes, afterwards bishop of Tournay, wrote the "rhymed chronicle."

Cartaphilos, we are told, was baptized by Ananias (who baptized Paul), and received the name of Joseph. (See Book of the Chronicles of the Abbey of St. Albans.)

¶ Another legend is that Jesus, pressed down by the weight of His cross, stopped to rest at the door of a cobbler named AHASUE'RUS, who pushed Him away, saying, "Get off! Away with you! away!" Our Lord replied, "Truly, I go away, and that quickly; but tarry thou till I come."

(This is the legend given by Paul von Eitzen, bishop of Schleswig in 1547.—Greve: Memoirs of Paul von Eitzen, 1744.)

¶ A third legend says that it was the cobbler Ahasue'rus who haled Jesus to the judgment-seat; and that as the Man of Sorrows stayed to rest awhile on a stone, he pushed Him, saying, "Get on, Jesus! Here you shall not stay!" Jesus replied, "I truly go away, and go to rest; but thou shalt go away and never rest till I come."

Signor GUALDI, who had been dead 130 years, appeared in the latter half of the eighteenth century, and had his likeness taken by Titian. One day he disappeared as mysteriously as he had come. —Turkish Spy, ii. (1682).

¶ Dr. Croly, in his novel called Salathiel (1827), traces the course of the Wandering Jew; so does Eugène Sue, in Le Juif Errant (1845); but in these novels the Jew makes no figure of importance.

(G. Doré, in 1861, illustrated the legend in folio wood engravings.)

N.B.—The legend of the Wild Huntsman, called by Shakespeare "Herne the Hunter," and by Father Matthieu "St. Hubert," is said to be a Jew who would not suffer Jesus to drink from a horse-trough, but pointed out to Him some water in a hoof-print, and bade Him go there and drink.—Kuhn von Schwars: Nordd. Sagen, 499.

(Poetical versions of the legend have been made by A. W. von Schlegel, Die Warnung; by Schubert, Ahasuer; by Goethe, Aus Meinem Leben, all in German. By Mrs. Norton, The Undying One, in English; etc. The legend is based on St. John's Gospel xxi. 22, "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?" The apostles thought the words meant that John would not die, but tradition has applied them to some one else.)

Jews sacrificing Christian children. (See HUGH OF LINCOLN, p. 510.)

Jews (The), in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, means those English who were loyal to Charles II. called "David" in the satire (1681-2).

Jewels. For Persia, turquoises; for Africa, rubies; for India, amethysts; for England and France, diamonds.

Jewkes (Mrs.), a detestable character in Richardson's Pamela (1740).

Jez'ebel (A Painted), a flaunting woman, of brazen face but loose morals. So called from Jezebel, the wife of Ahab king of Israel.

Jim, the boy of Reginald Lowestoffe the young Templar.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Jim Crow, the name of a popular comic nigger song, brought out in 1836 at the Adelphi Theatre, and popularized by T. D. Rice. The burden of the song is—

Wheel about, and turn about, and do just so;
And every time you wheel about, jump Jim Crow.

Jin Vin, i.e. Jenkin Vincent, one of Ramsay's apprentices, in love with Margaret Ramsay.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Jin'gle (Alfred), a strolling actor, who, by his powers of amusing and sharp-wittedness, imposes for a time on the members of the Pickwick Club, and is admitted to their intimacy; but being found to be an impostor, he is dropped by them. The generosity of Mr. Pickwick, in rescuing Jingle from the Fleet, reclaims him, and he quits England. Alfred Jingle talks most rapidly and flippantly, but not without much native shrewdness; and he knows a "hawk from a handsaw." —Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Jingo, a corruption of Jainko, the Basque Supreme Being. "By Jingo!" or "By the living Jingo!" is an appeal to deity. Edward I. had Basque mountaineers conveyed to England to take part in his Welsh wars, and the Plantagenets held the Basque provinces in possession. This Basque oath is a landmark of these facts.

Jingoes (The), the anti-Russians in the war between Russia and Turkey. The term arose (1878) from Macdermott's War-song, beginning thus—

We don't want to fight, but by Jingo if we do,
We've got the ships, we've got the men, we've got the money too.

(This song has also furnished the word jingoism (bragging war spirit, Bobadilism) and the adjective jingo.)

Jiniwin (Mrs.), a widow, the mother of Mrs. Quilp. A shrewd, ill-tempered old woman, who lived with her son-in-law in Tower Street.—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop (1840).

Jinker (Lieutenant Jamie), horse dealer at Doune. — Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Jinn, plu. of Jinnee, a sort of fairy in Arabian mythology, the offspring of fire. The jinn propagate their species like human beings, and are governed by kings called suleymans. Their chief abode is the mountain Kâf, and they appear to men under the forms of serpents, dogs, cats, etc., which become invisible at pleasure. Evil jinn are hideously ugly, but good jinn are exquisitely beautiful. (See GINN, p. 425.)

(Jinnistan means the country of the jinn. The connection of Solomon with the jinn is a mere blunder, arising from the similarity of suleyman and Solomon.)

J. J., in Hogarth's "Gin Line," written on a gibbet, is sir Joseph Jekyll, obnoxious for his bill for increasing the duty on gin.

N.B.—Jean Jacques [Rousseau] was often referred to by these initials in the eighteenth century.

Jo, a poor little outcast, living in one of the back slums of London, called "Tom All-alone's." The little human waif is hounded about from place to place, till he dies of want.—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Joan. Cromwell's wife was always called Joan by the cavaliers, although her real name was Elizabeth.

Joan, princess of France, affianced to the duke of Orleans.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Joan of Arc, surnamed La Pucelle, born in a village upon the marches of Barre, called Domremy, near Vaucouleurs. Her father was James of Arc, and her mother Isabel, poor country-folk, who brought up their child to keep their cattle. Joan professed to be inspired to liberate France from the English, and actually raised the siege of Orleans, after which Charles II. was crowned (1402–1431).

A young wench of an eighteene years old; of favour was she counted likesome, of person stronglie made and manlie, of courage great, hardie and stout withall . . . she had great semblance of chastitie both of body and behaviour.—Hollinshed: Chronicles, 600 (1577).

. . . there was no bloom of youth
Upon her cheek; yet had the loveliest hues
Of health, with lesser fascination, fixed
The gazer's eye; for wan the maiden was,
Of saintly paleness, and there seemed to dwell,
In the strong beauties of her countenance,
Something that was not earthly.
Southey: Joan of Arc (1795).

 Schiller published a tragedy on the subject, Jungfrau von Orleans (1801); Loumet another, Jeanne d'Arc (1825); T. Taylor an historic drama, Joan of Arc (1870); Balfe an opera (1839).

Historic poems on the subject (Joan of Arc) are by Southey, in ten books (blank verse), 1795; Français Czaneaux, in French; J. Chaplain, a French poet, toiled thirty years on his poem called La Pucelle, published in 1656.

Casimir Delavigne, a French poet, published an admirable elegy on The Maid (1846); and Voltaire a burlesque, La Pucelle d'Orleans, in 1738.

Joanna, the "deserted daughter" of Mr. Mordent. Her father abandoned her in order to marry lady Anne, and his money-broker placed her under the charge of Mrs. Enfield, who kept a house of intrigue. Cheveril fell in love with Joanna, and described her as having "blue eyes, auburn hair, aquiline nose, ivory teeth, carnation lips, a ravishing mouth, enchanting neck, a form divine, and the face of an angel."—Holcroft: The Deserted Daughter (altered into The Steward).

Job (The Book of), one of the five poetical books of the Old Testament, which records how Job was "plagued" by Satan; and, having continued steadfast to the end, was restored to health and prosperity.

¶ The tale of the patient Griselda is somewhat of the same character.

Job and Elspat, father and mother of sergeant Houghton.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Job Thornberry. (See THORNBERRY.)

Job Trotter. (See TROTTER.)

Job's Wife. Some call her Rahmat, daughter of Ephraim son of Joseph; and others call her Makhir, daughter of Manasses.—Sale: Korân, xxi. note.

Joblillies (The), the small gentry of a village, the squire being the Grand Panjandrum (q.v.).

There were present the Picninnies, and the Joblillies, and the Garyulies, and the Grand Panjandrum himself.—Foote: The Quarterly Review, xcv. 516, 517.

Jobling, medical officer to the "Anglo-Bengalee Company." Mr. Jobling was a portentous and most carefully dressed gentleman, fond of a good dinner, and said by all to be "full of anecdote." He was far too shrewd to be concerned with the Anglo-Bengalee bubble company, except as a paid functionary.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Jobson (Joseph), clerk to squire Inglewood the magistrate. — Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Jobson (Zekel), a very masterful cobbler, who ruled his wife with a rod of iron.

Neil Jobson, wife of Zekel, a patient, meek, sweet-tempered woman.—Coffey: The Devil to Pay (died 1745).

Jock o' Dawston Cleugh, the quarrelsome neighbour of Dandie Dinmont, of Charlie's Hope.

Jock Jabos, postilion to Mrs. M'Candlish the landlady of the Golden Arms inn, Kippletringan.

Slomging Jock, one of the men of M'Guffog the jailer.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Jock o' Hazeldean, the young man beloved by a "ladye fair." The lady's father wanted her to marry Frank, "the chief of Errington and laird of Langley Dale," rich, brave, and gallant; but "aye she let the tears down fa' for Jock o' Hazeldean." At length the wedding morn arrived, the kirk was gaily decked, the priest and bridegroom, with dame and knight, were duly assembled; but no bride could be seen: she had crossed the border and given her hand to Jock of Hazeldean.

(This ballad, by sir W. Scott, is a modernized version of an ancient ballad entitled Jock o' Hazelgreen.)

Jockey of Norfolk, sir John Howard, a firm adherent of Richard III. On the night before the battle of Bosworth Field, he found in his tent this warning couplet—

Jockey of Norfolk, be not too bold,
For Dickon, thy master, is bought and sold.

Jodelet, valet of Du Croisy (q.v.).—Molière: Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659).

Joe, "the fat boy," page in the family of Mr. Wardle. He has an unlimited capacity for eating and sleeping.—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Joe Gargery, a blacksmith. He was a fair man, with curls of flaxen hair on each side of his smooth face, and with eyes of "such very undecided blue, that they seemed to have got mixed with their own whites. He was a mild, sweet-tempered, easy-going, foolish, dear fellow. A Hercules in strength, and in weakness also." He lived in terror of his wife; but loved Pip, whom he brought up. His great word was "meantersay." Thus: "What I meantersay, if you come a-badgering me, come out. Which I meantersay as sech, if you're a man, come on. Which I meantersay that what I say I meantersay and stand to it" (ch. xviii.). His first wife was a shrew; but soon after her death he married Biddy, a young woman wholly suited to him.

Mrs. Joe Gargery, the blacksmith's first wife; a "rampageous woman," always "on the ram-page." By no means good-looking was Mrs. Joe, with her black hair, and fierce eyes, and prevailing redness of skin, looking as if "she scrubbed herself with a nutmeg-grater instead of soap and flannel." She "was tall and bony, and wore a coarse apron fastened over her figure behind with two loops, and having a square bib in front, stuck full of needles and pins." She brought up Pip, but made his home as wretched as she could, always keeping a rod called "Tickler" ready for immediate use. Mrs. Joe was a very clean woman, and cleanliness is next to godliness; but Mrs. Joe had the art of making her cleanliness as disagreeable to every one as many people do their godliness. She died after a long illness.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

Joe Miller. (See JESTS; MILLER.)

Joe Willet. (See under WILLET.)

Johannes Agricola, a German reformer of the sixteenth century, and alleged founder of the sect of Antinomians. Browning has a poem so called.

JOHN (The Gospel of St.), the fourth book of the New Testament, generally called "the Spiritual Gospel," because it shows Christ as the "Son of God," while the other three evangelists speak of Him mainly as the "Son of man." It passes over the birth, baptism, and temptation of Jesus, but records five miracles, four discourses or addresses, and four events not mentioned in the three synoptic Gospels.

(1) The five miracles—

Turning water into wine (ch. ii. 1–11); healing the son of the nobleman of Capernaum (ch. iv. 43–54); healing the man at the pool of Bethesda (ch. v.); giving sight to the man born blind (ch. ix.); and the raising of Lazarus from the dead (ch. xi.).

(2) The four discourses or addresses—

The discourse with Nicodemus (ch. iii. 1–21); the discourse with the woman of Samaria (ch. iv. 1–42); Christ's address to His disciples on the prospect of death (chs. xiv.–xvii.); and His words on the cross (ch. xix. 26, 27, 28).

(3) The four events—

The pre-existence of Christ (ch. i. 1–4); the doubts of Thomas (ch. xx. 26–29); Christ's appearance to Mary after the Resurrection (ch. xx. 14–18); and His appearance to His disciples at the sea of Tiberias (ch. xxi. 1–24).

John (The herb), also called St. Johnwort, devil-fuge, heal-all, etc. It is mentioned by Pliny and Dioscorides (5 syl.). Called "devil-fuge" because it was supposed to be a charm against evil spirits. Called "heal-all" because it was at one time considered a panacea both for external injuries and for internal complaints. Its Latin name is Hypericum perforàtum. The -icum is the Greek εἰκών, "a phantom," from its supposed charm against ghosts and evil spirits.

John, a proverbially unlucky name for royalty. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 684, col. 2.)

We shall see, however, that this poor king [Robert II.] remained as unfortunate as if his name had still been John [he changed it from John to Robert].—Sir W. Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, I. 17.

John, a Franciscan friar. — Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet (1598).

John, the driver of the Queen's Ferry diligence.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

John (Don), the bastard brother of Don Pedro prince of Aragon. In order to torment the governor, don John tries to mar the happiness of his daughter Hero, who is about to be married to lord Claudio. Don John tells Claudio that his fiancée has promised him a rendezvous by moonlight, and, if Claudio will hide in the garden, he may witness it. The villain had bribed the waiting-woman of Hero to dress up in her mistress's clothes and to give him this interview. Claudio believes the woman to be Hero, and when the bride appears at the altar next morning he rejects her with scorn. The truth, however, comes to light; don John takes himself to flight; and Hero is married to lord Claudio, the man of her choice.—Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing (1600).

I have seen the great Henderson [1747–1785] . . . His "don John" is a comic "Cato," and his "Hamlet" a mixture of tragedy, comedy, pastoral, farce, and nonsense.—Garrick (1775).

John (Friar), a tall, lean, wide-mouthed, long-nosed friar of Seville, who despatched his matins and vigils quicker than any of his fraternity. He swore like a trooper, and fought like a Trojan. When the army from Lernê pillaged the convent vineyard, friar John seized the staff of a cross and pummelled the rogues without mercy, beating out brains, smashing limbs, cracking ribs, gashing faces, breaking jaws, dislocating joints, in the most approved Christian fashion; and never was corn so mauled by the flail as were these pillagers by "the batôn of the cross."—Rabelais: Gargantua, i. 27 (1533).

(Of course, this is a satire of what are called Christian or religious wars.)

John (King), a tragedy by Shakespeare (1598). This drama is founded on The First and Second Parts of the Troublesome Raigne of John King of England, etc. As they were sundry times publickly acted by the Queenes Majesties players in the Honourable Citie of London (1591).

The tale is this: King John usurped the crown of England from Arthur, the rightful heir, who thus became hateful to the usurper. King John induced his chamberlain, Hubert, to murder the young prince, and Hubert employed two men to put out the prince's eyes, which would prevent his being a king. (See KINGSHIP, Disqualification for.) Hubert relented and saved the boy, but the rumour of his death got wind, and the nobles rose in rebellion. John accused Hubert as the cause of this, but Hubert informed the king that prince Arthur was alive. Unknown to Hubert, the prince was found dead, the pope put John under an interdict, and gave his kingdom to the French dauphin. When the dauphin landed with his army, king John gave his kingdom to the pope, who removed the interdict, and commanded the dauphin to return to France. However, a monk poisoned the king, who died, and the crown of England passed in regular succession to Henry III.

In "Macbeth," "Hamlet," "Wolsey," "Coriolanus," and "king John," he [Edmund Kean, 1787–1833] never approached within any measurable distance of the learned, philosophical, and majestic Kemble.—Quarterly Review (1835).

W. C. Macready [1793–1873] in the scene where he suggests to "Hubert" the murder of "Arthur," was masterly, and his representation of death by poison was true, forcible, and terrific.—Talfourd.

Kynge Johan, a drama of the transition state between the moralities and tragedy. Of the historical persons introduced we have king John, pope Innocent, cardinal Pandulphus, Stephen Langton, etc.; and of allegorical personages we have Widowed Britannia, Imperial Majesty Nobility, Clergy, Civil Order, Treason, Verity, and Sedition. This play was published in 1838 by the Camden Society, under the care of Mr. Collier (about 1550).

John (Little), one of the companions of Robin Hood.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

John (Prester). According to Mandeville, Prester John was a lineal descendant of Ogier the Dane. This Ogier penetrated into the north of India with fifteen barons of his own country, among whom he divided the land. John was made sovereign of Teneduc, and was called Prester because he converted the natives.

Another tradition says he had seventy kings for his vassals, and was seen by his subjects only three times a year.

Marco Polo says that Prester John was the khan Ung, who was slain in battle by Jenghiz Khan, in 1202. He was converted by the Nestorians, and his baptismal name was John. Gregory Bar-Hebræus' says that God forsook him because he had taken to himself a wife of the Zinish nation, called Quarakhata.

Otto of Freisingen is the first author who makes mention of Prester John. His chronicle is brought down to the year 1156, and in it we are assured that this most mysterious personage was of the family of the Magi, and ruled over the country of these Wise Men. "He used" (according to Otto) "a sceptre made of emeralds."

Bishop Jordānus, in his description of the world, sets down Abyssinia as the kingdom of Prester John. At one time Abyssinia went by the name of Middle India.

Maimonidēs mentions Prester John, and calls him Preste-Cuan. The date of Maimonidēs is 1135–1204.

(Before 1241 a letter was addressed by Prester John to Manuel Comne'nus, emperor of Constantinople. It is to be found in the Chronicle of Albericus Trium Fontium, who gives the date as 1165.)

N.B.—In Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, xvii., Prester John is called Sena'pus king of Ethiopia. He was blind. Though the richest monarch of the world, he pined "in plenty with endless famine," because harpies carried off his food whenever the table was spread; but this plague was to cease "when a stranger came to his kingdom on a flying horse." Astolpho came on a flying griffin, and with his magic horn chased the harpies into Cocy'tus.

John (Prince), son of Henry II., introduced by sir W. Scott in The Betrothed (1825).

John (Prince), brother of Richard I., introduced by sir W. Scott in The Talisman (1825).

John (Sir). (See LUKE, p. 639.)—Foote: The Lame Lover (1770).

John and the abbot of Canterbury. King John, being jealous of the state kept by the abbot of Canterbury, declared he should be put to death unless he answered these three questions: (1) "How much am I worth?" (2) "How long would it take me to ride round the world?" and (3) "What are my thoughts?" The king gave the abbot three weeks for his reply. A shepherd undertook to disguise himself as the abbot, and to answer the questions. To the first he said, "The king's worth is twenty-nine pence, for the Saviour Himself was sold for thirty pence, and his majesty is mayhap a penny worse than He." To the second question he answered, "If you rise with the sun and ride with the sun, you will get round the world in twenty-four hours." To the third question he replied, "Your majesty thinks me to be the abbot, but I am only his servant."—Percy: Reliques, II. iii. 6.

There is doubt whether the age of these questions is as great as is claimed, or certainly the true shape of the earth must have been generally known before it is usually supposed to have been.

¶ In Sacchetti's Fourth Novella is a similar story: The miller answers the questions of Messer Bernabo lord of Mil'an, who imagined that he was questioning the abbot.

¶ In Eulenspiegel (the fifteenth section) is a disputation between Eulenspiegel and the rector of Prague. Eulenspiegel replies to the questions with similar answers to the "shepherd." Thus, being asked, "How far is it to heaven?" Owlglasse replies, "Not far; for a prayer whispered ever so low can be heard there instantly." Being asked, "How large is heaven?" he replied, "Twelve thousand leagues by ten thousand; and if you doubt my word, go and measure it yourself." Being asked, "How many days have passed since the creation of Adam?" he replied, "Only seven; for when seven days are passed they begin again."

¶ In another section, called The Miller and the Magistrate, the same questions and answers occur as in king John and the abbot, but the last answer is varied thus: "You believe that I am your curate, but I am only your miller."

¶ Another curious story of hard questions is related of Aberdeen, only in this case the conversation is in dumb-show, which gives rise to a rich vein of humour, because of the ambiguity. A Spanish ambassador, who is also a professor of "signs," is informed by the Scottish king that there is a brother professor in the north of his kingdom. The professor must see him. The king requests the civic authorities to make the best of the situation. A one-eyed butcher agrees to meet the professor. The don holds up one finger; the butcher, two; the Spaniard holds up three of his fingers; the other, his clenched fist; the professor displays an orange; the butcher, a dry crust. The professor is delighted: When he had said there was one God, the other had replied that there were Father and Son; when he had declared faith in the Trinity, the other had as strongly asserted the Unity; when he had said the earth was as round as an orange, the other had replied that bread was the staff of life. The butcher was no less pleased with the way in which he had met the insulting remarks of the Spaniard: When the latter had held up one finger, thereby hinting that the butcher had but one eye, he had replied that probably he could see a thing as clearly with that one as the professor with his two; when the don gently intimated that they had but three eyes between them, he wished him to understand, in reply, that were it not for the authorities, he would have made him rue his insolence; and lastly, when the other held up his orange, implying that no such fruit could be grown thereabouts, he had answered that they did not care for that so long as they had plenty of good rye-bread.

¶ Similar questions and answers might be varied almost without end. For example: (1) "Where is heaven?" Ans. "It is the abode of God, who dwells in every contrite heart." (2) "What is the worth of the whole world?" Ans. "Thirty pence; for Jesus was sold for that sum, and purchased the redemption of the world." (3) "What am I now thinking about?" Ans. "What answer will be given to your question."

John Anderson, my jo, John. An old Scotch song, consisting of two stanzas, each of eight lines. R. Burns added six extra stanzas (about 1788).

John Blunt, a person who prides himself on his brusqueness, and in speaking unpleasant truths in the rudest manner possible. He not only calls a spade a spade, but he does it in an offensive tone and manner.

John Bull, the national name for an Englishman. (See BULL, p. 158.)

John Chinaman, a Chinese.

John Company, the old East India Company.

In old times, John Company employed nearly 4000 men in warehouses.—Old and New London, ii. 185.

John Grueby, the honest, faithful servant of lord George Gordon, who wished "the blessed old creetur, named Bloody Mary, had never been born." He had the habit of looking "a long way off." John loved his master, but hated his religious craze.

"Between Bloody Marys, and blue cockades, and glorious queen Besses, and no poperys, and protestant associations," said Grueby to himself, "I believe my lord's half off his head."—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge, xxxvi. (1841).

John Halifax, Gentleman, a novel by Miss Mulock (Mrs. Craik) 1857 (her best).

John of Bruges (1 syl.), John van Eyck, the Flemish painter (1370–1441).

John o' Groat, a Dutchman, who settled in the most northerly part of Scotland in the reign of James IV. He is immortalized by the way he put an end to a dispute among his nine sons respecting precedency. He had nine doors made to his cottage, one for each son, and they sat at a round table.

From John o' Groat's house to the Land's End, from furthest north to furthest south of the island, i.e. through its entire length.

John of Hexham, Johannes Hagustaldensis, a chronicler (twelfth century).

John of Leyden, John Bockhold or Boccold, a fanatic (1510–1536).

N.B.—In the opera, he is called "the prophet." Being about to marry Bertha, three anabaptists meet him, and observe in him a strong likeness to a picture of David in Munster Cathedral. Having induced him to join the rebels, they take Munster, and crown him "Ruler of Westphalia." His mother meets him while he is going in procession, but he disowns her; subsequently, however, he visits her in prison, and is forgiven. When the emperor arrives, the anabaptists fall off, and John, setting fire to the banquet-room of the palace, perishes with his mother in the flames.—Meyerbeer: Le Prophète (1849).

John with the Leaden Sword. The duke of Bedford, who acted as regent for Henry VI. in France, was so called by earl Douglas (surnamed Tine-man).

Johnny, the infant son of Mrs. Betty Higden's "daughter's daughter." Mrs. Boffin wished to adopt the child, and to call him John Harmon, but it died. During its illness, Bella Wilfer went to see it, and the child murmured, "Who is the boofer lady?" The sick child was placed in the Children's Hospital, and, just at the moment of death, gave his toys to a little boy with a broken leg in an adjoining bed, and sent "a kiss to the boofer lady."—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1804).

Johnny Crapaud. A Frenchman was so called by English sailors in the time of Napoleon I. The Flemings called the French "Crapaud Franchos." The allusion is to the toads borne in the ancient arms of France.

Johnson, in Albert Smith's novel The Adventures of Mr. Ledbury (1844), a polished Bohemian, "good-natured, reckless, and witty."

Johnson (John), in cantos vii., viii., of Don Juan, by Byron (1823).

In truth he was a noble fellow.

Johnson (Dr. Samuel), lexicographer, essayist, and poet (1709–1784).

I own I like not Johnson's turgid style,
That gives an inch th' importance of a mile:
Casts of manure a waggon-load around,
To raise a simple daisy from the ground;
Uplifts the club of Hercules—for what?
To crush a butterfly or brain a gnat;
Creates a whirlwind from the earth, to draw
A goose's feather or exalt a straw;
Bids ocean labour with tremendous roar,
To heave a cockle-shell upon the shore.
Alike in every theme his pompous art,
Heaven's awful thunder or a rumbling cart.
Peter Pindar [Dr. John Wolcot] (1816).

Johnstone (Auld Willie), an old fisherman, father to Peggy the laundry-maid at Woodburne.

Young Johnstone, his son.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Johnstone's Tippet (St.), a halter; so called from Johnstone the hangman.

Joliffe (2 syl.), footman to lady Penfeather.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Joliffe (Joceline), under-keeper of Woodstock Forest.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Joliquet (Bibo), the garçon of the White Lion inn, held by Jerome Lesurques (2 syl.).—Stirling: The Courier of Lyons (1852).

Jollup (Sir Jacob), father of Mrs. Jerry Sneak and Mrs. Bruin. Jollup is the vulgar pomposo landlord of Garratt, who insists on being always addressed as "sir Jacob."

Reg. Anan, sir.
Sir Y. "Sir!" sirrah! and why not "sir Jacob," you rascal? Is that all your manners? Has his majesty dubbed me knight, for you to make me a mister?—Foote: The Mayor of Garratt, i. 2 (1763).

Jolter. In the agony of terror, on hearing the direction given to put on the dead-lights in a storm off Calais, Smollett tells us that Jolter went through the steps of a mathematical proposition with great fervour instead of a prayer.

Jonas, the name given, in Absalom and Achitophel, to sir William Jones, attorney-general, who conducted the prosecution of the popish plot.—Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, i. (1681).

. . . bull-faced Jonas, who could statutes draw
To mean rebellion, and make treason law.
581, 582.
("Mean," the verb.)

JONATHAN, a sleek old widower. He was a parish orphan, whom sir Benjamin Dove apprenticed, and then took into his family. When Jonathan married, the knight gave him a farm rent free and well stocked. On the death of his wife, he gave up the farm, and entered the knight's service as butler. Under the evil influence of lady Dove, this old servant was inclined to neglect his kind master; but sir Benjamin soon showed him that, although the lady was allowed to peck him, the servants were not.—Cumberland: The Brothers (1769).

Jonathan, one of the servants of general Harrison.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Jonathan, an attendant on lord Saville.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Jonathan (Brother), a national nickname for an American of the United States. In the Revolutionary war, Washington used to consult his friend Jonathan Trumbull, governor of Connecticut, in all his difficulties. "We must ask brother Jonathan," was so often on his lips, that the phrase became synonymous with the good genius of the States, and was subsequently applied to the North Americans generally.

Jonathan's, a noted coffee-house in 'Change Alley, described in The Tatler as the "general mart for stock-jobbers." What is now termed "the Royal Stock Exchange" was at one time called "Jonathan's."

Yesterday the brokers and others . . . came to a resolution that [the new building] instead of being called "New Jonathan's," should be called "The Stock Exchange." The brokers then collected sixpence each, and christened the house.—Newspaper paragraph (July 15, 1773).

Jones (Tom), the hero of a novel by Fielding, called The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling (1749). Tom Jones is a model of generosity, openness, and manly spirit, mingled with thoughtless dissipation. With all this, he is not to be admired; his reputation is flawed, he sponges for a guinea, he cannot pay his landlady, and he lets out his honour to hire.

The romance of Tom Jones, that exquisite picture of human manners, will outlive the palace of the Escurial and the imperial eagle of Austria.—Gibbon.

To Tom Jones is added the charm of a plot of unrivalled skill, in which the complex threads of interest are all brought to bear upon the catastrophe in a manner equally unexpected and simple.—Encyclopædia Britannica (article "Romance").

Jones (Mrs.), the waiting-woman of lady Penfeather.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Jonson (Ben), the poet, introduced by sir Walter Scott in his Woodstock. Shakespeare is introduced in the same novel.

Jopson (Jacob), farmer at the village near Clifton.

Cicely Jopson, Jacob's daughter. She marries Ned Williams.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Jordan (Mrs.), the actress, who lived with the duke of Clarence, was Miss Dorothea Bland. She called herself Dora, first appeared in York as Miss Francis, and changed her name at the request of an aunt who left her a little property. When the change of name was debated between her and the manager, Tate suggested "Mrs. Jordan," and gave this very pertinent reason—

"You have crossed the water," said Tate, "so I'll call you 'Jordan.'"

Jorkins, the partner of Mr. Spenlow, in Doctors' Commons. Mr. Jorkins is really a retiring, soft-hearted man; but to clients he is referred to by Spenlow as the stern martinet, whose consent will be most difficult to obtain.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Jorworth-ap-Jevan, envoy of Gwenwyn prince of Powys-land.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Josaphat, a young Indian prince, of whom it had been predicted that he would embrace Christianity and become a devotee. His father tried to seclude him from all knowledge of misery and evil, and to attach him only to pleasurable pursuits. At length the young prince took three drives, in one of which he saw Old Age, in another Sickness, and in the third Death. This had such an effect upon him that he became a hermit, and at death was canonized both by the Eastern and Western Churches.—Johannes Damascenus: Barlaham and Josaphat (eighth century).

Josceline (Sir), an English knight and crusader in the army of Richard I.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

José (Don), father of don Juan, and husband of donna Inez. He was henpecked and worried to death by his wife's "proprieties." To the world they were "models of respectability," but at home they were "cat and dog." Donna Inez tried to prove him mad, in order to obtain a divorce, and "kept a journal where all his faults were noted." "She witnessed his agonies with great magnanimity;" but, while seeking a divorce, don José died.—Byron: Don Juan, i. 26, 33 (1819).

JOSEPH, the old gardener at Shaw's Castle.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Joseph, a Jew of the noblest type; with unbounded benevolence and most excellent charity. He sets a splendid example of "Christian ethics" to those who despised him for not believing the "Christian creed." Joseph the Jew was the good friend of the Christian minister of Mariendorpt.—Knowles: The Maid of Mariendorpt (1838). (See SHEVA.)

Joseph (A), a young man not to be seduced from his continency by any temptation. The reference is to Joseph in Potiphar's house (Gen. xxxix.).

Joseph (St.), of Arimathæ'a, said to have brought to Glastonbury in a mystic vessel some of the blood which trickled from the wounds of Christ at the Crucifixion, and some of the wine left at the Last Supper. This vessel plays a very prominent part in the Arthurian legends.

Next holy Joseph came . . .
The Saviour of mankind in sepulchre that laid;
That to the Britons was th' apostle. In his aid
St. Duvian, and with him St. Fagan, both which were His scholars.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1622).

(He also brought with him the spear of Longînus, the Roman soldier who pierced the side of Jesus.—Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 40 (1470). The famous Glastonbury thorn, says tradition, sprang from the staff which Joseph stuck into the ground. See GLASTONBURY, p. 428.)

N.B.—The "mystic vessel" brought by Joseph is sometimes called the San Graal; but by referring to the word GRAAL, it will be seen that the usual meaning of the term in Arthurian romance is very different.

Joseph the Patriarch. His wife's name, according to tradition, was Zulieka; the Bible gives Asenath.

Jos'ephine (3 syl.), wife of Werner, and mother of Ulric. Josephine was the daughter of a decayed Italian exile of noble blood.—Byron: Werner (1822).

Joshua (The book of), the sixth book of the Old Testament, which tells us how Joshua, after the death of Moses, led the Israelites into the promised land. It covers a period of about thirty years.

Jos'ian, daughter of the king of Armenia, and wife of sir Bevis of Southampton. It was she who gave the hero his sword "Morglay" and his steed "Arundel."—Drayton: Polyolbion, ii. (1612).

Josse (1 syl.), a jeweller. Lucinde (2 syl.), the daughter of Sganarelle, pined and fell away, and the anxious father asked his neighbours what they would advise him to do. Mon. Josse replied—

"Pour moi, je tiens que la braverie, que l'ajustement est la chose qui réjoult le plus les filles; et si j'étois que de vous, je lui achéterois dès aujourd'hui une belle garniture de diamants, ou de rubis, ou d'émeraudes."

Sganarelle made answer—

"Vous êtes orfèvre, Monsieur Josse; et votre conseil sent son homme qui a envie de se défaire de sa marchandise."—Molière: L'Amour Médecin, i. 1 (1665).

Vous êtes orfevre, Mon. Josse ("You are a jeweller, Mon. Josse, and are not disinterested in your advice"). (See above.)

Jo'tham, the person who uttered the parable of "The Trees choosing a King," when the men of Shechem made Abimelech king. In Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, it stands for George Saville, marquis of Halifax.

Jotham of piercing wit and pregnant thought,
Endued by nature, and by learning taught
To move assemblies . . . turned the balance too;
So much the weight of one brave man can do.
Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, 819–822 (1681).

Jötunheim, the abode of the frost giants in Scandinavian mythology. One of the roots of the ash tree yggdrasil descended into it.

Jour des Morts (All Souls' Day). A Dieppoise legend explains the phrase thus—

Le guetteur de la jetée voit au milieu de la nuit arriver un bateau à le hêle, il s'empresse de lui jeter le grelin; mais à ce moment même le bateau disparaît; on entend des cris plaintifs qui font frissonner, car on les reconnaît c'est la voix des marins qui ont naufragé dans l'année.—Chapus: Dieppe et ses Environs (1853).

Jour king of Mambrant, the person who carried off Jos'ian the wife of sir Bevis of Southampton, his sword "Morglay," and his steed "Ar'undel." Sir Bevis, disguised as a pilgrim, recovered all three.—Drayton: Polyolbion, ii. (1612).

Jourdain (Mons.), an elderly tradesman, who has suddenly fallen into a large fortune, and wishes to educate himself up to his new position in society. He employs masters of dancing, fencing, philology, and so on; and the fun of the drama turns on the ridiculous remarks that he makes, and the awkward figure he cuts as the pupil of these professors. One remark is especially noted: he says he had been talking prose all his life, and never knew it till his professor told him. —Molière: Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme (1670).

Journalists. Napoleon I. said—

A journalist is a grumbler, a censurer, a giver of advice, a regent of sovereigns, a tutor of nations. Four hostile newspapers are more formidable than a thousand bayonets.

Journey from this World to the Next, a tract by Fielding, the novelist (1743).

Jovian, emperor of Rome, was bathing one day, when a person stole his clothes and passed himself off as the emperor. Jovian, naked and ashamed, went to a knight, said he was emperor, and begged the loan of a few garments for the nonce; but the knight called him an impostor, and had him scourged from the gate. He next went to a duke, who was his chief minister; but the duke had him confined, and fed on bread and water as a vagrant and a madman. He then applied at the palace, but no one recognized him there. Lastly, he went to his confessor, and humbled himself, confessing his sins. The priest took him to the palace, and the sham emperor proved to be an angel sent to reform the proud monarch. The story says that Jovian thenceforth reigned with mercy and justice, till he died.—Evenings with the Old Story-tellers.

Jowler, in Smollett's History and Adventures of an Atom, a political satire, is meant for the earl of Chatham (1769).

Joyeuse (2 syl.), Charlemagne's sword, which bore the inscription, Decem præceptorum custos Carolus. It was buried with the king, as Tizo'na (the Cid's sword) was buried with the Cid, and the sword Durindana with Orlando.

Joyeuse-Garde or Garde-Joyeuse, the estate given by king Arthur to sir Launcelot du Lac for defending the queen's honour against sir Mador. Here sir Launcelot was buried.

Joyous Entrance (The), the constitution granted to the city of Brabant by Philip II. of Spain, in 1564. It provided (1) that the ecclesiastical power shall not be further augmented; (2) that no subject shall in any wise be prosecuted except in the ordinary civil law courts; (3) that no foreigner shall be appointed to any office in Brabant; and (4) if any sovereign violates these provisions, the oath of allegiance shall be no longer binding.—Motley: The Dutch Republic, pt. i. 2.

Joyous Isle, the place to which sir Launcelot retired during his fit of madness, which lasted two years.

JUAN, in The Spanish Gypsy, a dramatic poem by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross) (1868).

> Juan was a troubadour, . . .
> Freshening life's dusty road with babbling rills
> Of wit and song.

Juan (Don), a hero of the sixteenth century, a natural son of Charles-quint, born at Ratisbonne, in 1545. He conquered the Moors of Grana'da, won a great naval victory over the Turks at Lepanto, made himself master of Tunis, and put down the insurgents of the Netherlands (1545–1578).

(This is the don Juan of C. Delavigne's drama entitled Don Juan d'Autriche, 1835.)

Juan (Don), son of don Louis Tenorio, of Sicily, a heartless roué. His valet says of him—

> "Tu vois en don Juan le plus grand scélérat que la terre ait jamais porté, un enragé, un chien, un démon, un Turc, un hérétique qui ne croit ni ciel, ni enfer, ni diable, qui passe cette vie en véritable bête brute, un pourceau d'Epicure, un vrai Sardanapale; qui ferme l'oreille à toutes les remontrances qu'on lui peut faire, et traite de billevesées tout ce que nous croyons."—Molière: Don Juan, I. 1 (1665).

Juan (Don), a native of Seville, son of don José and donna Inez (a blue-stocking). When Juan was 16 years old, he got into trouble with donna Julia, and was sent by his mother (then a widow) on his travels. His adventures form the story of a poem so called; but the tale is left incomplete.—Byron: Don Juan (1819–21).

> Cantos I., II., published 1819; cantos III., IV., V., published 1821; cantos VI. to XIV., published 1823; cantos XV., XVI., published 1824.

 Byron's Don Juan and Don Giovanni have nothing in common but the name. Byron's Don Juan is merely a young voluptuary, of great amatory proclivities.

Juan (Don), or don Giovanni, the prince of libertines. The original of this character was don Juan Tenorio, of Seville, who attempted the seduction of the governor's daughter; and the father, forcing the libertine to a duel, fell. A statue of the murdered father was erected in the family vault; and one day, when don Juan forced his way into the vault, he invited the statue to a banquet. The statue accordingly placed itself at the board, to the amazement of the host, and, compelling the libertine to follow, delivered him over to devils, who carried him off triumphant.

(Dramatized first by Gabriel Telles (1626). Molière (1665) and Thomas Corneille, in Le Festin de Pierre, both imitated from the Spanish (1673), have made it the subject of French comedies; Goldoni (1765), of an Italian comedy; Glück, of a musical ballet (1765); Mozart, of an opera called Don Giovanni (1787), a princely work. See JUAN.)

Juan Fernandez, a rocky island in the Pacific Ocean, near the coast of Chili. Here Alexander Selkirk, a buccaneer, resided in solitude for four years. Defoe is supposed to have based his tale of Robinson Crusoe on the history of Alexander Selkirk.

(Defoe places the island of his hero "on the east coast of South America," somewhere near Dutch Guiana.)

Juba, prince of Numidia, warmly attached to Cato while he lived at Utica (in Africa), and passionately in love with Marcia, Cato's daughter. Sempro'nius, having disguised himself as Juba, was mistaken for the Numidian prince by Marcia; and being slain, she gave free vent to her grief, thus betraying the state of her affection. Juba overheard her, and as it would have been mere prudery to deny her love after this display, she freely confessed it, and Juba took her as his betrothed and future wife.—Addison: Cato (1713).

Jubal, son of Lamech and Adah. The inventor of the lyre and flute.—Gen. iv. 19–21.

Then when he [Javan] heard the voice of Jubal's lyre,
Instinctive genius caught the ethereal fire.
Montgomery: The World before the Flood, i. (1812).

Jubilee Dicky, in Steele's comedy of The Conscious Lovers (1721).

Judas, in pt. ii. of Absalom and Achitophel, by Tate, is meant for Mr. Ferguson, a nonconformist, who joined the duke of Monmouth, and afterwards betrayed him.

Shall that false Hebronite escape our curse—
Judas, that keeps the rebels' pension-purse;
Judas, that pays the treason-writer's fee;
Judas, that well deserves his namesake's tree?
Absalom and Achitophel, ii. 319–322 (1682).

Judas Colour. In the old mystery-plays, Judas had hair and beard of a fiery red colour.

Let their beards be Judas's own colour.
Kyd: The Spanish Tragedy (1597).

Judas Iscariot. Klopstock says that Judas Iscariot had a heart formed for every virtue, and was in youth unpolluted by crime, insomuch that the Messiah thought him worthy of being one of the twelve. He, however, was jealous of John, because Jesus loved him more than He loved the rest of the apostles; and this hatred towards the beloved disciple made him hate the lover of "the beloved." Judas also feared (says Klopstock) that John would have a higher post than himself in the kingdom, and perhaps be made treasurer. The poet tells us that Judas betrayed Jesus under the expectation that it would drive Him to establish His kingdom at once, and rouse Him into action.—Klopstock: The Messiah, iii. (1748).

Judas Tree, a gallows.

N.B.—The garden shrub called the Judas tree is a mere blunder for kuamos tree, i.e. the bean tree; but the corrupt name has given rise to the legend that Judas hanged himself on one of these trees.

Judges (The Book of) contains the history of the Israelites after the death of Joshua, when the people were governed by judges.

There were fourteen Judges, but the history of the last two (Eli and Samuel) is contained in the First Book of Samuel. Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, and Deborah a woman) are the chief rulers mentioned in the Book of Judges.

Judgment of Hercules (The). (See Hercules's Choice.)

Judgment of Paris, a poem, by James Beattie (1765). Tennyson's Œnone (1832) is the same subject.

(N.B.—Œnone (3 syl.) was the beloved of Paris, who had to decide which of the three goddesses (Juno, Minerva, and Venus) was the most beautiful. All three tried the effects of bribery: Juno promised him dominion, Minerva promised wisdom, but Venus promised him the most beautiful of women for a wife. Of course, Paris gave his award in favour of Venus.)

Judi (Al), the mountain on which the ark rested. The word is a corruption of Al Kurdu, so called because it was inhabited by the Kurds. The Greeks corrupted the name into Gordyæi, and the mountain was often called the Gordyæan.

The ark rested on the mountain Al Judi.—Al Koran, xi.

Judith, a beautiful Jewess of Bethu'lia, who, to save her native town, assassinated Holofernes, the general of Nebuchadnezzar. When Judith showed the head of the general to her countrymen, they rushed on the invading army, and put it to a complete rout.—Judith vii., x.–xv.

(The words of the opera of Judith are by Bickerstaff, the music by Dr. Arne, 1764.)

Judith (Aunt), sister to Master George Heriot the king's goldsmith.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Judy, the wife of Punch. Master Punch, annoyed by the cries of the baby, gives it a knock, which kills it, and, to conceal his crime from his wife, throws the dead body out of the window. Judy comes to inquire about the child, and, hearing of its death, upbraids her lord stoutly, and tries on him the "reproof of blows." This leads to a quarrel, in which Judy is killed. The officers of justice, coming to arrest the domestic tyrant, meet the same fate as his child and wife; but at last the devil outwits him, he is hanged, and carried off to the place of all evil-doers.

Juel (Nils), a celebrated Danish admiral, who received his training under Tromp and De Ruyter. He defeated the Swedes in 1677 in several engagements.

> Nils Juel gave heed to the tempest's roar . . .
> "Of Denmark's Juel who can defy
> The power?"
> Longfellow: King Christian [V.].

Julet'ta, the witty, sprightly attendant of Alinda.—Fletcher: The Pilgrim (1621)

Julia, a lady beloved by Protheus. Her waiting-woman is Lucetta.—Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona (1594).

Julia, the "ward" of Master Walter "the hunchback." She was brought up by him most carefully in the country, and at a marriageable age was betrothed to sir Thomas Clifford. Being brought to London, she was carried away in the vortex of fashion, and became the votary of pleasure and dissipation, abandoned Clifford, and promised to marry the earl of Rochdale. As the wedding day drew nigh, her love for Clifford returned, and she implored her guardian to break off her promise of marriage to the earl. Walter now showed himself to be the real earl of Rochdale, and father of Julia. Her nuptials with the supposed earl fell to the ground, and she became the wife of sir Thomas Clifford.—Knowles: The Hunchback (1831).

Julia (Donna), a lady of Sev'ille, of Moorish origin, a married woman, "charming, chaste, and twenty-three." Her eye was large and dark, her hair glossy, her brow smooth, her cheek "all purple with the beam of youth," her husband 50, and his name Alfonso. Donna Julia loved a lad of 16, named don Juan, "not wisely but too well," for which she was confined in a convent.—Byron: Don Juan, i. 59-188 (1819).

Tender and impassioned, but possessing neither information to occupy her mind, nor good principles to regulate her conduct, donna Julia is an illustration of the women of Seville, "whose minds have but one idea, and whose life-business is intrigue." The slave of every impulse . . . she now prostrates herself before the altar of the Virgin, making the noblest efforts "for honour, pride, religion, virtue's sake," and then, "in the full security of innocence," she seeks temptation, and finds retreat impossible.—Finden: Byron Beauties.

Julia Melville, a ward of sir Anthony Absolute; in love with Faulkland, who saved her life when she was thrown into the water by the upsetting of a boat.—Sheridan: The Rivals (1775).

Julian (Count), a powerful lord of the Spanish Goths. When his daughter Florinda was violated by king Roderick, the count was so indignant that he invited ove. the Moors to come and push him from the throne, and even turned regenade the better to effect his purpose. The Moors succeeded, but condemned count Julian to death, "to punish treachery, and prevent worse ill." Julian, before he died, sent for "father Maccabee," and said—

> I would fain
> Die in the faith wherein my fathers died.
> I feel that I have sinned, and from my soul
> Renounce the Impostor's faith, which in my soul
> No place obtained.
> Southey: Roderick, etc., xxiv. (1814).

Julian (St.), patron saint of hospitality. A synonym for an epicure, or man of hospitality.

> An househalder and that a grot was he;
> Seint Julian he was in his countré.
> Chaucer: Introduction to Canterbury Tales (1388).

Julian St. Pierre, the brother of Mariana (q.v.).—Knowles: The Wife (1833).

Juliana, wife of Virölet, saint and heroine.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Double Marriage (1647).

(The other marriage was with Martia.)

Juliana, eldest daughter of Balthaza. A proud, arrogant, overbearing "Katharine," who marries the duke of Aranza, and intends to be lady paramount. The duke takes her to a poor hut, which he calls his home, gives her the household duties to perform, and pretends to be a day labourer. She chafes for a time, but his manliness, affection, and firmness get the mastery; and when he sees that she loves him for himself, he announces the fact that after all he is the duke and she the duchess of Aranza.—Tobin: The Honeymoon (1804).

Julian'ce, a giant.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 98 (1470).

Julie (a syl.), the heroine of Molière's comedy entitled Mons. de Pourceaugnac (1669).

Julie (2 syl.), the heroine of J. J. Rousseau's novel entitled Julie ou la Nouvelle Héloïse (1760). The prototype was the comtesse d'Houdetot. Julie had a pale complexion, a graceful figure, a profusion of light brown hair, and her near-sightedness gave her "a charming mixture of gaucherie and grace." Rosseau went every morning to meet her, that he might receive from her that single kiss with which Frenchwomen salute a friend. One day, when Rousseau told her that she might innocently love others besides her husband, she naively replied, "Je pourrais donc aimer mon pauvre St. Lambert." Lord Byron has made her familiar to English-readers.

> His love was passion's essence . . .
> This breathed itself to life in Julie; this > Invested her with all that's wild and sweet;
> This hallowed, too, the memorable kiss
> Which every morn his fevered lip would greet
> From her's, who but with friendship his would meet.
> Byron: Childe Harold, lii. 79 (1816).

N.B.—Julie was in love with St. Preux; and the object of Rousseau's novel is to invest vice with an air of attraction.

> To make madness beautiful, and cast
> O'er erring deeds and thoughts a heavenly hue
> Of words, like sunbeams, dazzling as they pass.

Julie de Mortemar, an orphan, ward of Richelieu, loved by king Louis XIII., count Baradas, and Adrien de Mauprat, the last of whom she married. After many hair-breadth escapes and many a heart-ache, the king allowed the union and blessed the happy pair.—Lord Lytton: Richelieu (1839).

Ju'liet, daughter of lady Cap'ulet of Verona, in love with Ro'meo son of Mon'tague (3 syl.), a rival house. As the parents could not be brought to sanction the alliance, the whole intercourse was clandestine. In order that Juliet might get from the house and meet Romeo at the cell of Friar Laurence, she took a sleeping draught, and was carried to the family vault. The intention was that on waking she should repair to the cell and get married; but Romeo, seeing her in the vault, killed himself from grief; and when Juliet woke and found Romeo dead, she killed herself also.—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet (1598).

 C. H. Wilson says of Mrs. Baddeley (1742–1780) that her "'Juliet' was never surpassed." W. Donaldson, in his Recollections, says that "Miss O'Neill made her first appearance in Covent Garden Theatre in 1815 as 'Juliet,' and never was such an impression made before by any actress whatsoever." Miss Fanny Kemble and Miss Helen Faucit were both excellent in the same character.

> The doating fondness and silly peevishness of the nurse tends [sic] to relieve the soft and affectionate character of "Juliet," and to place her before the audience in a point of view which those who have seen Miss O'Neill perform "Juliet" know how to appreciate —Sir W. Scott: The Drama.

Juliet, the lady beloved by Claudio brother of Isabella.—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure (1603).

Ju'lio, a noble gentleman, in love with Lelia a wanton widow.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Captain (1603).

Julio of Harancour, "the deaf and dumb" boy, ward of Darlemont. Darlemont gets possession of Julio's inheritance, and abandons him in the streets of Paris; but he is rescued by the abbé De l'Epée, who brings him up, and gives him the name of Theodore. Julio grows up a noble-minded and intelligent young man, is recognized by the Franval family, and Darlemont confesses that "the deaf and dumb" boy is the count of Harancour.—Holcroft: The Deaf and Dumb (1785).

Julius (St.), a British martyr of Caerleon or the City of Legions (Newport, in South Wales). He was torn limb from limb by Maximia'nus Herculius, general of the army of Diocle'tian in Britain. Two churches were founded in the City of Legions—one in honour of St. Julius, and one in honour of St. Aaron, his fellow-martyr.

> . . . two other . . . sealed their doctrine with their blood;
> St. Julius, and with him St. Aaron, have their room
> At Carleon, suffering death by Diocletian's doom.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1622).

Julius Cæsar, an historic tragedy by Shakespeare (1601, printed 1623). Julius Cæsar is chosen king of Rome, at the Lúpercal, but, though offered the crown thrice by Antony, he "did thrice refuse." However, his friend Brutus, with Cassius, Casca, and others, conspired his death, and murdered him. This gave rise to two factions: the party of Antony, which consisted of Antony, Octavius, and Lepidus; and the party of Brutus. This led to a civil war. At the battle of Philippi Cassius was slain, Brutus killed himself; the triumvirate became masters of Rome.

(Stirling published, in 1607, a tragedy entitled The Death of Julius Cæsar; and Antoni, in 1691, The Conspiracy of Brutus.)

Jumps (Jemmy), in The Farmer. One of the famous parts of Jos. S. Munden (1758–1832).

June (The Glorious First of) was June, 1794, when lord Howe gained a great victory over the French.

Junius (Letters of), forty-four letters on political subjects which appeared in the Public Advertiser between 1769 and 1772. The duke of Grafton, the duke of Bedford, and lord Mansfield were especially attacked. Generally attributed to sir Philip Francis; but sir Philip always denied that he was the author.

There were other letters which followed: one signed Philo Junius; 113 under various names; and 72 addressed to Woodfall, publisher of the Advertiser.

Junkerthum, German squirearchy. (From junker, "a young nobleman;" our younker.)

Juno's Birds. Juno is represented in works of art as drawn through fields of air by a pair of peacocks harnessed to her chariot.

Jupe (Signor), clown in Sleary's circus, passionately attached to his daughter Cecilia. Signor Jupe leaves the circus suddenly, because he is hissed, and is never heard of more.

Cecilia Jupe, daughter of the clown. After the mysterious disappearance of her father, she is adopted and educated by Thomas Gradgrind, Esq., M.P.—Dickens: Hard Times (1854).

Just (The).

ARISTIDÊS, the Athenian died B.C. 468).

BA'HARAM, called Shah endeh ("the just king"). He was the fifth of the Sassan'idês (276–296).

CASSIMIR II. of Poland (1117, 1177–1194).

FERDINAND I. of Aragon (1373, 1412–1416).

HAROUN-AL-RASCHID ("the just,"), the greatest of the Abbasside caliphs (765, 786–808).

JAMES II. of Aragon (1261, 1285–1327.)

KHOSRÛ or CHOSROES I., called by the Arabs Molk al Adel ("the just king"). He was the twenty-first of the Sassanidês (*, 531–579).

MORAN, counsellor of Feredach an early king of Ireland.

PEDRO I. of Portugal (1320, 1357–1367).

Justin'ian (The English), Edward I. (1239, 1272–1307).

Ju'venal (The English), John Oldham (1653–1683).

Ju'venal (The Young). [Dr.] Thomas Lodge is so called by Robert Green (1555–1625).—A Groat'sworth of Wit, bought with a Million of Repentance.

Ju'venal of Painters (The), William Hogarth (1697–1794).

J'y suis et j'y reste ("Here am I placed, and here I mean to remain"). This was said by marshal de MacMahon, and shows the character of the marshal-president of the French better than a volume (1877). He resigned in 1879; born 1808, died 1893.

K.

K.D.G. The 1st or King's Dragoon Guards, raised in 1685. Called "The King's Regiment of Horse," in 1714; and in 1746 "The 1st or King's Regiment of Dragoon Guards." Their badge is the royal cypher within the garter; and their uniform scarlet, with blue facings, and a red plume.

Kadr (Al), the night on which the Korân was sent down to Mahomet. Al Kadr is supposed to be the seventh of the last ten nights of Ramadân, or the night between the 23rd and 24th days of the month.

Verily we sent down the Korân on the night of Al Kadr; and what can make thee comprehend how excellent the night of Al Kadr is?—Al Korân, xcvii.

Kâf (Mount), a mountain encircling the whole earth, said to be a huge table-land which walls in the earth as a ring encircles one's finger. It is the home of giants and fairies, jinn, peris, and deevs, and rests on the sacred stone called Sakhrat. It is fully described in the romance of Hatim Taï, the hero of which often visited the region. The romance has been translated into English by Duncan Forbes.—Mohammedan Mythology.

The mountain of Kâf surrounds the whole world. It is composed of one entire emerald. Beyond it there are forty other worlds, entirely different to this; each of the forty worlds has 400,000 cities, and each city 400,000 gates. The inhabitants of these cities are entirely exempt from all the sufferings of the race of men; the day there has no night, the earth is gold, and the inhabitants angels, who sing without ceasing the praises of Allah and his prophet.

The mountain Kâf is placed between the horns of a white ox, named Kimit. The head of this ox touches the east, and his hind parts the west, and the distance between these horns could not be traversed in 100,000 years.—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("History of Abdal Motalleb," 1743).

The mountain of Kâf may set bounds to the world, but not to the wishes of the ambitious.—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("Dakianos and the Seven Sleepers," 1743).

From Kâf to Kâf, from one extremity of the earth to the other. The sun was supposed to rise from one of its eminences and to set on the opposite.

The mountain of Kâf may tremble, but the power of Allah remaineth fast for ever and ever.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Kâf, a fountain, the waters of which confer immortality on the drinker.

Sure his lips
Have drunk of Kâf's dark fountain, and he comes Strong in his immortality.
Southey: Roderick, etc., xxv. (1814).

Kail, a prince of Ad, sent to Mecca to pray for rain. Three clouds appeared, a white one, a red one, and a black one, and Kail was bidden to make his choice. He chose the last, but when the cloud burst, instead of rain it cast out lightning, which killed him.—Sale: Al Korân, vii. note.

Kail'yal (2 syl.), the lovely and holy daughter of Ladur'lad, persecuted relentlessly by Ar'valan; but virtue and chastity, in the person of Kailyal, always triumphed over sin and lust. When Arvalan "in the flesh" attempted to dishonour Kailyal, he was slain by Ladurlad; but he then continued his attacks "out of the flesh." Thus, when Kailyal was taken to the Bower of Bliss by a benevolent spirit, Arvalan borrowed the dragon-car of the witch Lor'rimite (3 syl.) to drag him thence; the dragons, however, unable to mount to paradise, landed him in a region of thick-ribbed ice. Again, Kailyal, being obliged to quit the Bower, was made the bride of Jaga-naut, and when Arvalan presented himself before her again, she set fire to the pagoda, and was carried from the flames by her father, who was charmed from fire as well as water. Lastly, while waiting for her father's return from the submerged city, whither he had gone to release Ereen'ia (3 syl.), Arvalan once more appeared, but was seized by Baly, the governor of hell, and cast into the bottomless pit. Having descended to hell, Kailyal quaffed the water of immortality, and was taken by Ereenia to his Bower of Bliss, to dwell with him for ever in endless joy.—Southey: Curse of Kehama (1809).

Kaimes (Lord), one of the two judges in Peter Peebles's lawsuit.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Kalas'rade (3 syl.), the virtuous wife of Sadak, persecuted by the sultan Am'urath. (See SADAK.)—Ridley: Tales of the Genii, xi. (1751).

Kaled. Gulnare (2 syl.) disguised as a page, in the service of Lara. After Lara is shot, she haunts the spot of his death as a crazed woman, and dies at length of a broken heart.

Light was his form, and darkly delicate
That brow whereon his native sun had sate . . .
And the wild sparkle of his eye seemed caught
From high, and lightened with electric thought;
Tho' its black orb those long low lashes fringe
Had tempered with a melancholy tinge.
Byron: Lara (1814).

Kalemberg (The curé of), a recueil of facetiæ. The escapades of a young student made a chaplain in the Austrian court. He sets at defiance and torments every one he encounters, and ends in being court fool to Otho the Gay, grandson of Rudolf of Hapsburg.—German Poem (fifteenth century).

Kalyb, "the Lady of the Woods," who stole St. George from his nurse, brought him up as her own child, and endowed him with gifts. St. George enclosed her in a rock, where she was torn to pieces by spirits.—Johnson: Seven Champions of Christendom, i. (1617).

Kâ'ma, the Hundû god of love. He rides on a sparrow, the symbol of lust; holds in his hand a bow of sugar-cane strung with bees; and has five arrows, one for each of the five senses.

Her ebony brows have the form of the bow of Kama, the god of love, and she seems to have been modelled by the hand of Vicvarcarna, the immortal sculptor.—Ocaf Uddaul: Description of queen Ahmehmagara.

Karma, the necessary effect of a cause, when not interfered with by anything. It is, therefore, natural justice: "As you sow so you must reap." (See NIRVANA.)

Karûn, son of Yeshar or Izhar, uncle of Moses, the most beautiful and wealthy of all the Israelites.

Riches of Karûn, an Arabic and Jewish proverb. The Jews say that Karûn had a large palace, the doors of which were of solid gold.—Sale: Al Korân, xxviii.

(This Karûn is the Korah of the Pentateuch.)

Kashan (Scorpions of). Kashân, in Persia, is noted for its scorpions, which are both large and venomous. A common curse in Persia is, May you be stung by a scorpion of Kashan!

Kate [PLOWDEN], niece of colonel Howard of New York, in love with lieutenant Barnstable of the British navy, but promised by the colonel in marriage to captain Boroughcliff, a vulgar, conceited Yankee. Ultimately, it is discovered that Barnstable is the colonel's son, and the marriage is arranged amicably between Barnstable and Kate.—Fitzball: The Pilot.

Kate Kearney [Kar'-ney], an Irish song, by lady Morgan of Dublin (1797).

Oh! did you ne'er hear of Kate Kearney?
She lives on the banks of Killarney;
From the glance of her eye, shun danger and fly,
For fatal's the glance of Kate Kearney.
Stanza I.

Katerfelto, a celebrated quack; a generic name for a quack.—Cowper: The Task, bk. iv. ("Winter Evening," ver. 86).

Kathari'na, the elder daughter of Baptista of Padua. She was of such an ungovernable spirit and fiery temper, that she was nicknamed "The Shrew." As it was very unlikely any gentleman would select such a spitfire for his wife, Baptista made a vow that his younger daughter Bianca should not be allowed to marry before her sister. Petruchio married Katharina and tamed her into a most submissive wife, insomuch that when she visited her father a bet was made by Petruchio and two other bridegrooms on their three brides. First Lucentio sent a servant to Bianca to desire her to come into the room; but Bianca sent word that she was busy. Hortensio next sent the servant "to entreat" his bride to come to him; but she replied that Hortensio had better come to her if he wanted her. Petruchio said to the servant, "Tell your mistress I command her to come to me at once;" she came at once, and Petruchio won the bet.—Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew (1594).

Katharine, a lady in attendance on the princess of France. Dumain, a young lord in the suite of Ferdinand king of Navarre, asks her hand in marriage, and she replies—

A twelvemonth and a day
I'll mark no words that smooth-faced wooers say.
Come then . . .
And if I have much love, I'll give you some.
Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost (1594).

Katharine (Queen), the divorced wife of Henry VIII.—Shakespeare: Henry VIII. (1601).

The following actresses are celebrated for their impersonations of this character:—Mrs. Pritchard (1711–1768); Margaret [Peg] Woffington (1718–1760); Mrs. Siddons (1755–1831); Mrs. Barley (1785–1850).

Katherine de Medici of China, Voo-chee, widow of king Tae-tsông. She was most imperious and cruel, but her energy was irresistible (684–705).

Kathleen Mavourneen. Words by Mrs. Crawford, music by Frederick William Nicholls Crouch, who died 1896. He was born in 1808 at Warren Street, St. Pancras. The song first appeared in Chapman's Metropolitan Monthly Magazine. Crouch obtained £100 for the "performing rights" of this song, and Mrs. Crawford £20 for the words of this and three other songs, viz. Dermot Astore! Shella, my Darling Colleen; and The Death of Dermott (on the Field of Waterloo).

Katin'ka, a Georgian, "white and red, with great blue eyes, a lovely hand and arm, and feet so small they scarce seemed made to tread, but rather skim the earth." She was one of the three beauties of the harem, into which don Juan was admitted in female disguise. The other two were Lolah and Dudù.—Byron: Don Juan, vi. 40, 41 (1824).

Katmir', the dog of the seven sleepers. It spoke with a human voice, and said to the young men who wanted to drive it out of the cave, "I love those who love God. Go to sleep, masters, and I will keep guard." The dog kept guard over them for 309 years, and neither slept nor ate. At death it was taken up into paradise.—Sale: Al Korân, xviii. notes.

(Katmir, in the Oriental Tales, is called "Catnier.")

The shepherd had a little dog named Catnier [etc.], that followed them. They threw a stone at him to drive him back; the stone broke his left leg, but the dog still followed them, limping. They then threw another stone at the dog, and broke his right fore leg. It now followed them on its two hind legs, and a third stone having broken one of these, the poor creature could no longer stand. God now gave it the gift of speech, . . . at which they were so astonished that they carried it with them by turns.—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("Daklanos and the Seven Sleepers," 1743).

He wouldn't give a bone to Katmir, or He wouldn't throw a bone to the dog of the seven sleepers, an Arabic proverb, applied to a very niggardly man.

Kavanagh, a novel by Longfellow (1849). Kavanagh is a clergyman who marries Cecilia Vaughan.

Kay (Sir), son of sir Ector, and foster-brother of prince Arthur, who made him his seneschal or steward. Sir Kay was ill-tempered, mean-spirited, boastful, and overbearing. He had not strength of mind enough to be a villain like Hagen, nor strength of passion enough to be a traitor like Ganelon and Mordred; but he could detract and calumniate, could be envious and spiteful, could annoy and irritate. His wit consisted in giving nicknames: Thus he called young Gareth "Big Hands" (Beaumains), "because his hands were the largest that ever any one had been." He called sir Brewnor "The Shocking Bad Coat" (La Cote Male-taild), because his doublet fitted him so badly, and was full of sword-cuts.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 3, 4, 120, etc. (1470). (See KEY.)

Kayward, the name of the hare in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498).

Keblah, the point towards which Mohammedans turn their faces in prayer.

Kecksey, a wheezy old wittol, who pretends to like a termagant wife who can flirt with other men—ugh, ugh!—he loves high spirits—ugh, ugh!—and to see his wife—ugh, ugh!—happy and scampering about—ugh, ugh!—to theatres and balls—ugh, ugh!—he likes to hear her laugh—ugh, ugh!—and enjoy herself—ugh, ugh! Oh! this troublesome cough! —ugh, ugh!—Garrick: The Irish Widow (1757).

Ke'derli, the St. George of Mohammedan mythology. Like St. George, he slew a monstrous dragon to save a damsel exposed to its fury, and, having drunk of the water of life, rode through the world to aid those who were oppressed.

Keelavine (Mr.), painter at the Spa hotel.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Keene (Abel), a village schoolmaster, afterwards a merchant's clerk. Being led astray, he lost his place and hanged himself.—Crabbe: Borough, xxi. (1810).

Keepers (of Piers Plowman's visions), the Malvern Hills. Piers Plowman (W. or R. Langland, 1362) supposes himself fallen asleep on the Malvern Hills, and in his dream he sees various visions of an allegorical character pass before him. These "visions" he put into poetry, the whole containing 15,000 verses, divided into twenty parts, each part being called a passus or separate vision.

> Keepers of Piers Plowman's vision, thro' the sunshine and the snow.
> Mrs. Browning: The Lost Bower.

Keha'ma, the almighty rajah of earth, and all-powerful in Swerga or heaven. After a long tyranny, he went to Pan'dalon (hell) to claim domination there also. Kehama demanded why the throne of Yamen (or Pluto) was supported by only three persons, and was told that he himself must be the fourth. He paid no heed to this prophecy, but commanded the amreeta-cup or draught of immortality to be brought to him, that he might quaff it and reign for ever. Now, there are two immortalities—the immortality of life for the good, and the immortality of death for the wicked. When Kehama drank the amreeta, he drank immortal death, and was forced to bend his proud neck beneath the throne of Yamen, to become the fourth supporter.—Southey: Curse of Kehama (1809).

 Ladurlad was the person subjected to the "curse of Kehama," and under that name the story will be found.

Kela, now called Calabar.

> Salling with a fair wind, we reached Kela in six days, and landed. Here we found lead-mines, some Indian canes, and excellent camphor.—Arabian Nights ("Sinbad," fourth voyage).

Keltie (Old), innkeeper at Kinross.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Kendah, an Arabian tribe, which used to bury alive their female children as soon as they were born. The Kordn refers to them in ch. vi.

Kenelm (St.) was murdered at Clente-in-Cowbage, near Winchelcumb, in Gloucestershire; but the murder "was miraculously notified at Rome by a white dove," which alighted on the altar of St. Peter's, bearing in its beak a scroll with these words—

> In Clent cow-pasture, under a thorn,
> Of head bereft, lies Kenelm king-born.
> Roger de Wendover: Chronicles (died 1237).

Kenelm Chillingly, a novel by lord Lytton (1873).

Kenge (1 syl.), of the firm of Kenge and Carboy, Lincoln's Inn, generally called "Conversation Kenge," loving above all things to hear "the dulcet tones of his own voice." The firm was engaged on the side of Mr. Jarndyce in the great Chancery suit of "Jarndyce v. Jarndyce."—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Kenilworth, a novel by sir W. Scott (1821). This is very superior to The Abbot and The Monastery. For interest it comes next to Ivanhoe, and the portrait of queen Elizabeth is life-like and correct. That of queen Mary is given in The Abbot. The novel is full of courtly gaieties and splendour, but contains the unhappy tale of the beautiful Amy Robsart, which cannot fail to excite our sympathy and pity.

The tale is about the infidelity of the earl of Leicester and the death of his wife, Amy Robsart. Queen Elizabeth went to Kenilworth Castle on a visit to the earl of Leicester, who wished and hoped to become king-consort, but Amy Robsart was in the way. The queen, having heard about Amy, requested to see her, but Varney (the earl's master-of-the-house) assured her majesty that Amy (whom he called his wife) was too ill to enter the royal presence. Matters were now so complicated and dangerous that Varney induced the earl to send Amy a cup of poison to make away with her. She was compelled to drink the draught, but its fatal effects were neutralized by an antidote. Amy now made her escape from the castle, and took refuge in Cumnor Place, a seat belonging to the earl. Here Varney inveigled her into a dark passage, under pretence that the earl was waiting for her. She rushed forwards to meet her husband, and, falling through a secret trap into an abyss, was killed.

Kenna, daughter of king Oběron, who fell in love with Albion son of the island king. According to this fable, "Kensington Garden" is Kenna's-town-garden.—Tickell: Kensington Garden (died 1740). (See KENSINGTON.)

Kennahtwhar ["I know not where"], the capital of Noman's-land, 91° north latitude and 181° west longitude.

A chronicler of Kennahtwhar of literary mystery, The Conquest of Granada left in manuscript for history. The Queen ("Double Acrostic," 1878).

(This chronicler was "Fray Antonio Agapida," the hypothetical author of The Conquest of Granada, by W. Irving.)

Kenna-quhair [Scotch, "I don't know where"], an hypothetical locality.

Melrose may in general pass for Kennaquhair.—Sir W. Scott.

Kennedy (Frank), an excise officer, who shows Mr. G. Godfrey Bertram, the laird of Ellangowan and a magistrate, the smuggler's vessel chased by a war-sloop. The smugglers afterwards murder him.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Kenneth (Sir), "Knight of the Leopard," a disguise assumed by David earl of Huntingdon, prince royal of Scotland.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Kenrick (Felix), the old foster-father of Caroline Dormer. His wife Judith was her nurse. Kenrick, an Irishman, clings to his mistress in all her misfortunes, and proves himself a most attached, disinterested, and faithful old servant.—Colman: The Heir-at-Law (1797).

Kensington, according to Tickell's fable, is so called from the fairy Kenna, daughter of king Oběron. The tale is that prince Albion was stolen by Milkah the fairy, and carried to Kensington. When 19 years old, he fell in love with Kenna; but Oberon was so angry at this engagement, that he drove Albion out of the garden, and compelled Kenna to marry Azuriel, a fairy from Holland Park. Albion laid his complaint before Neptune, who sent Oriel with a fairy army against Oberon. In this battle Albion was slain, and Neptune, in revenge, utterly destroyed the whole empire. The fairies, being dispersed, betook themselves to the hills and dales, the caves and mines. Kenna poured juice of the herb mōly over the dead body of Albion, and the unhappy prince was changed thus into a snowdrop.—Tickell: Kensington Garden (died 1740).

Kent. According to fable, Kent is so called from Can'ute, one of the companions of Brute the Trojan wanderer, who, according to Geoffrey's British History, settled in England, and founded a dynasty of kings. Canute had that part of the island assigned to him which was called Canutium, contracted into Can'tium, and again into Cant or Kent.

But Canute had his portion from the rest,
The which he called Canuthum, for his hire,
Now Cantium, which Kent we commonly inquire.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, II. x. 12 (1590).

Kent (Earl of), under the assumed name of Caius, attended upon the old king Lear, when his two elder daughters refused to entertain him with his suite.

He afterwards took him to Dover Castle. When the old king was dying, he could not be made to understand how Caius and Kent could be the same person.—Shakespeare: King Lear (1605).

Kent (The Fair Maid of), Joan, only daughter of Edmund Plantagenet earl of Kent. She married thrice: (1) William de Montacute earl of Salisbury, from whom she was divorced; (2) sir Thomas Holland; and (3) her second cousin, Edward the Black Prince, by whom she became the mother of Richard II.

Kentish man (A), those of West Kent; the natives of East Kent call themselves "Men of Kent." This is the distinction given by my father, who was a "man of Kent," many generations in descent.

Kenwigs (Mr.), a turner in ivory, and "a monstrous genteel man." He toadies Mr. Lillyvick, his wife's uncle, from whom he has "expectations."

Mrs. Kenwigs, wife of the above, considered "quite a lady," as she has an uncle who collects the water-rates and sends her daughter Moleena to a day school.

The Misses Kenwigs, pupils of Nicholas Nickleby, remarkable for wearing their hair in long braided tails down their backs, the ends being tied with bright ribbons.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Kera Khan, a gallant and generous Tartar chief in a war between the Poles and the Tartars.—J. P. Kemble: Lodoiska (a melodrame).

Kerns, light-armed Irish foot-soldiers. The word (Kigheyren) means "a hell shower;" so called because they were hell-rakes or the "devil's black-guard." (See GALLOWGLASSES, p. 402.)—Stanihurst: Description of Ireland, viii. 28.

Kesche'tiouch, the shepherd who joined the six Greek slaves of Ephesus, and was one of the "seven sleepers."

Keschetiouch's Dog, Catnier, called by Sale, in his notes to the Koràn, "Katmir."—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("History of Dakianos," 1743).

Kes'teven. Lincolnshire is divided into Lindsey, the highest lands; Kesteven, the heaths (west); and Holland, the fens.

Quoth Kesteven . . . how I hate
Thus of her foggy fens to hear rude Holland prate!
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxv. (1622).

Kettle of Fish (A Pretty), a pretty muddle, a bad job. A corruption of Kiddle of fish. A kiddle is a basket set in the opening of a weir for catching fish. (French, quideau.)

Kettle-drum, a corruption of Kiddle-drum, a drum in the shape of a kiddle or basket employed for catching fish (v.s.).

Kettledrummle (Gabriel), a covenanter preacher.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Keuser, one of the rivers of Mahomet's paradise, the waters whereof are sweeter than new milk.

He who has seen the garden of thy beauty, O adorable princess, would not change his ravishment for a draught of the water of Keuser.—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("The Basket," 1743).

Kevin (St.), a young man who went to live on a solitary rock at Glendalough, in Wicklow. This he did to flee from Kathleen, who loved him, and whose eyes he feared his heart would not be able to resist. Kathleen tracked him, and while he slept "bent over him;" but, starting from his sleep, the "holy man" cast the girl from the rock into the sea, which her ghost haunted amidst the sounds of sweet music.—Moore: Irish Melodies, iv. ("By that Lake . . ." 1814).

Key (Sir), son of sir Ector the foster-father of prince Arthur. He was Arthur's seneschal, and is represented as rude and boastful. Sir Gaw'ain is the type of courtesy, sir Launcelot of chivalry, sir Mordred of treachery, sir Galahad of chastity, sir Mark of cowardice. (See KAY.)

Key and Bible, used for the detection of thieves. A key is placed over an open Bible at the words, "Whither thou goest, I will go" (Ruth i. 16); and, the fingers of the person being held so as to form a cross, the text is repeated. The names of suspected persons are then pronounced in succession, and when the name of the thief is uttered, the key jumps and dances about. An instance of this method of thief-finding was brought before the magistrates at the borough petty sessions at Ludlow, in January, 1879.

A married woman, named Mary Collier, was charged with using abusive and insulting language to her neighbour, Eliza Oliver; and the complainant, in her statement to the magistrates, said that on December 27 she was engaged in carrying water, when Mrs. Collier stopped her, and stated that another neighbour had had a sheet stolen, and had "turned the key on the Bible near several houses; that when it came to her (Oliver's) house, the key moved of itself, and that when complainant's name was mentioned the key and the Book turned completely round, and fell out of their hands." She also stated that the owner of the sheet then inquired from the key and the Book whether the theft was committed at dark or daylight, and the reply was "daylight." Defendant then called complainant "A —— daylight thief," and charged her with stealing the sheet.—Newspaper paragraph (January, 1879).

Key of Russia, Smolensk, on the Dnieper. Famous for its resistance to Napoleon I. in 1812.

Key of the Mediterranean, the fortress of Gibraltar, which commands the entrance of the Mediterranean Sea.

Keys of Knowledge. Five things are known to God alone: (1) The time of the day of judgment; (2) the time of rain; (3) the sex of an animal before birth; (4) what will happen on the morrow; (5) where any one will die. These the Arabs call the five keys of secret knowledge.—Sale: Al Korân, xxxi. note.

(The five senses are called "The five doors of knowledge." No. 2 is certainly knowable to science; and No. 5 is too general.)

Keyne [Keen] or ST. KEYNA, daughter of Braga'nus prince of Garthmatrin or Brecon, called "Keyna the Virgin." Her sister Melaria was the mother of St. David. Many nobles sought her in marriage, but she refused them all, being resolved to live and die a virgin. She retired to a spot near the Severn, which abounded with serpents, but at her prayer they were all turned into Ammonites, and "abide to this day." Subsequently she removed to Mount St. Michael, and by her prayer a spring of healing waters burst out of the earth, and whoever drinks first of this water after marriage will become the dominant house-power. "Now," says Southey, "a Cornishman took his bride to church, and the moment the ring was on ran up the mount to drink of the mystic water. Down he came in full glee to tell his bride; but the bride said, 'My good man, I brought a bottle of the water to church with me, and drank of it before you started.'"—Southey: The Well of St. Keyne (1798).

Khadijah, daughter of Khowailed; Mahomet's first wife, and one of the four perfect women. The other three are Fâtima, the prophet's daughter; Mary, daughter of Imrân; and Asia, wife of the Pharaoh drowned in the Red Sea.

Khawla, one of the sorceresses in the caves of Dom-Daniel, "under the roots of the ocean." She is called "the woman-fiend," "fiercest of the enchanter brood." She had heard that one of the race of Hodei'rah (3 syl.) would be their destruction, so Okba was sent forth to cut off the whole race. He succeeded in killing eight, but one named Thal'aba escaped. Abdaldar was chosen to hunt him up and kill him. He found the boy in an Arab's tent, and raised the dagger, but ere the blow fell, the murderer himself was killed by the death-angel.—Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer (1797).

Khid'ir or CHIDDER, the tutelary god of voyagers; his brother Elias is the tutelary god of travellers. The two brothers meet once a year at Mina, near Mecca.—Mouradgea d'Ohsson: History of the Ottoman Empire (1821).

Khorassan (The Veiled Prophet of), Mokanna, a prophet-chief, who wore a veil under pretence of shading the dazzling light of his countenance. The truth is, he had lost an eye, and his face was otherwise disfigured in battle. Mokanna assumed to be a god, and maintained that he had been Adam, Noah, and other representative men. When the sultan Mahadi environed him so that escape was impossible, the prophet poisoned all his followers at a banquet, and then threw himself into a burning acid, which wholly consumed his body.—Moore: Lalla Rookh ("The Veiled Prophet, etc.," 1817).

Kickleburys on the Rhine (The), "A Christmas Book," by Thackeray (1851).

Kifri, a giant and enchanter, the impersonation of atheism and blasphemy. After some frightful blasphemies, he hurled into the air a huge rock, which fell on himself and killed him, "for self-murderers are generally infidels or atheists."—Sir C. Morell []. Ridley]: Tales of the Genii ("The Enchanter's Tale," vi., 1751).

Kil, in the names of places, means a "cell, cloister, or chapel."

Kilbarchan (Scotland), Kil-bara-cin, the kil on the hill-top.
Kilcrin (Ireland), the little kil.
Kildare is Kil-dara, the "kil of the oak." St. Bridget built her first cell under a large oak.
Kilham (Yorkshire), the chapel close.
Kilkenny, the kil or cloister of St. Kenny or Canicê.
Kilmore (Ireland), the big kil.
Kilsyth (Ireland), the great kil (sytha, "great").
Icolmkill (Scotland), is I-columb-kil, i.e. the "island of St. Columb's cell." The Culdee institutions of St. Columb were established in 565, for the purpose of converting the Picts to Christianity.

Kildare (2 syl.), famous for the fire of St. Bridget, which was never allowed to go out. St. Bridget returns every twentieth year to tend to the fire herself.

Part of the chapel of St. Bridget still remains, and is called "The Fire-house."

Like the bright lamp that shone in Kildare's holy fane,
And burned through long ages of darkness and storm.
Moore: Irish Melodies, iii. ("Erin, O Erin!" 1814).

Apud Kildariam occurrit ignis Sanctæ Brigidæ quem inextinguibilem vocant. — Giraldus Cambrensis: Hibernia, ii. 34 (1187).

Kilderkin (Ned), keeper of an eating-house at Greenwich.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Kilian (St.), an Irish missionary who suffered martyrdom at Würzburg, in 689. A cathedral was erected to his memory in the eighth century.

Kilian of Kersberg, the 'squire of sir Archibald von Hagenbach.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Killed by Kindness. It is said that the ape not unfrequently strangles its young ones by hugging them too hard.

The Athenians, wishing to show honour to Draco the law-giver, showered on him their caps and cloaks, and he was smothered to death by the pile thus heaped upon him.

Killing no Murder. Carpentier de Marigny, the enemy of Mazarin, issued, in 1658, a tract entitled Tuer un Tyran n'est par un Crime.

Sexby wrote a tract entitled Killing no Murder, generally thought to have been the production of William Allan. The object of the book was to show that it would be no crime to murder Cromwell.

Kilmansegg (Miss), an heiress with great expectations, who had an artificial leg of solid gold.—T. Hood: Miss Kilmansegg and her Golden Leg, a Golden Legend (1828).

KING, a title of sovereignty or honour. At one time, crown tenants were called kings or dukes, at the option of the sovereign; thus, Frederick Barbarossa made one of his brothers a king-vassal, and another a duke-vassal, simply by the investiture of a sword. In English history, the lord of Man was styled "king;" so was the lord of the Isle of Wight, and the lord of Connaught, as clearly appears in the grants of John and Henry III. Several examples might be quoted of earls conferring the title of "king" on their vassals.—See Selden's Titles of Honour, iii. (1614).

Like a King. When Porus, the Indian prince, was taken prisoner, Alexander asked him how he expected to be treated. "Like a king," he replied; and Alexander made him his friend.

The Factory King, Richard Oastler of Bradford, the successful advocate of the "Ten Hours Bill" (1789-1861).

Since then a clamour has arisen for the reduction to eight hours (1897).

Credo ut Persam nunc propter rubea tegumenta capitis Rubeum Caput vocant, ita reges Moscoviæ, propter alba tegumenta Albos Reges appellari.—Sigismund.

The Snow King, Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, killed in the "Thirty Years' War" at the battle of Lützen, 1632. (See SNOW KING.)

At Vienna he was called "The Snow King," in derision. Like a snow-ball, he was kept together by the cold, but as he approached a warmer soil he melted away and disappeared.—Dr. Crichton: Scandinavia, ii. 61 (1838).

(Sweden and Norway are each called "Snow Kingdom.")

Let no vessel of the kingdom of snow [Norway] bound on the dark-rolling waves of Inistore [the Orkneys].—Ossian: Fingal, i.

The Summer King, Amadeus of Spain.

The Winter King, Frederick V., who married Elizabeth Stuart, daughter of James I. (See WINTER KING.)

The White King. The ancient kings of Muscovy were so called from the white robe which they used to wear. Solomon wore a white robe; hence our Lord, speaking of the lilies of the field, says that "Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these" (Luke xii. 27).

Principem Moscoviæ Album Regem nuncupant. . . . Credo ut Persam nunc propter rubea tegumenta capitis Rubeum Caput vocant, ita reges Moscoviæ, propter alba tegumenta Albos Reges appellari.—Sigismund.

(Another explanation may be suggested: Muscovy was called "White Russia," as Poland was called "Black Russia." See WHITE KING and WHITE QUEEN.)

King (Tom), "the choice spirit of the day for a quiz, a hoax, a joke, a jest, a song, a dance, a race, or a row. A jolly dog, a rare blood, prime buck, rum soul, and funny fellow." He drives M. Morblet, a French barber, living in the Seven Dials, London, almost out of his senses by inquiring over and over again for Mr. Thompson.—Moncrieff: Mon. Tonson.

(There is a Mon. Tonson by Taylor, 1767.)

Romanus II. emperor of the East (939, 959–963).

King and the Beggar. It is said that king Copethua or Cophetua of Africa fell in love with a beggar-girl, and married her. The girl's name was Penel'ophon; called by Shakespeare Zenel'ophon (Love's Labour's Lost, act iv. sc. 1, 1594).

King and the Cobbler. The interview between Henry VIII. and a merry London cobbler is the subject of one of the many popular tales in which Bluff Hal is represented as visiting a humble subject in disguise.

King and the Locusts. A king made a proclamation that, if any man would tell him a story which should last for ever, he would make him his heir and son-in-law; but if any one undertook to do so and failed, he should lose his head. After many failures, came one, and said, "A certain king seized all the corn of his kingdom, and stored it in a huge granary; but a swarm of locusts came, and a small cranny was descried, through which one locust could contrive to creep. So one locust went in, and carried off one grain of corn; and then another locust went in, and carried off another grain of corn; and then another locust went in," etc.; and so the man went on, day after day, and week after week, "and so another locust went in, and carried off another grain of corn." A month passed; a year passed. In six months more, the king said, "How much longer will the locusts be?" "Oh, your majesty," said the story-teller, "they have cleared at present only a cubit, and there are many thousand cubits in the granary." "Man, man!" cried the king; "you will drive me mad. Take my daughter, take my kingdom, take everything I have; only let me hear no more of these intolerable locusts!"—Letters from an Officer in India (edited by the Rev. S. A. Pears).

King and the Miller of Mansfield (The). (See MILLER.)

King of Bark, Christopher III. of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. So called because in a time of scarcity, he had the bark of birchwood mixed with meal for food (died 1448).

King of Bath, Beau Nash, who was for fifty-six years master of the ceremonies of the bath-rooms in that city, and conducted the balls with great splendour and judgment (1674-1761).

King of England. This title was first assumed by Egbert in 828.

King of Exeter 'Change, Thomas Clark, friend of the famous Abraham Newland (1737-1817).

King of France. This title was first assumed by Louis VII. (1171). It was changed into "king of the French" by the National Assembly in 1789. Louis XVIII. resumed the title "king of France" in 1814; and Louis Philippe again resumed the more republican title, "king of the French" (1830).

King of France. Edward III. of England assumed the title in 1337; but in 1801 it was relinquished by proclamation (time, George III.).

King of Ireland. This title was first assumed by Henry VIII. in 1542. The title previously assumed by the kings of England was "lord of Ireland."

In Rymer's Fœdera (vol. i.) a deed of gift is ascribed (under Henry I.) to "Henry lord of Ireland;" but no English king was lord of Ireland before the reign of Henry II.

King of Painters, a title assumed by Parrhasios. Plutarch says he wore a purple robe and a golden crown (fl. B.C. 400).

King of Preachers, Louis Bourdaloue, a French clergyman (1632-1704).

King of Rome, a title conferred by Napoleon I. on his son the very day he was born; but he was generally called the duke of Reichstadt.

It is thought that this title was given in imitation of Charlemagne. If so, it was a blunder; Charlemagne was never "king of Rome," but he was "patrician of Rome." In the German empire, the emperor-elect was "king of the Romans," not "king of Rome," and, after being crowned by the pope, was styled "emperor of the Romans," and from 962 "kaiser of the Holy Roman Empire." After the reign of Frederick II., the second consecration was dispensed with.

King of Ships, Carausius, who assumed the purple in A.D. 287, and, seizing on Britain, defeated the emperor Maximian Herculius in several naval engagements (250, 287-293).

King of Yvetot [Ev-to], a king of name only; a mockery king; one who assumes mighty honours without the wherewithal to support them. Yvetot, near Rouen, was a seigneurie, on the possessor of which Clotaire I. conferred the title of king in 534, and the title continued till the fourteenth century.

Il était un roi d'Yvetot,
Peu connu dans l'histoire;
Se levant tard, se couchant tôt,
Dormant fort bien sans gloire.
Bérenger.

A king there was "roi d'Yvetot" clept,
But little known in story,
Went soon to bed, till daylight slept,
And soundly, without glory.
E. C. B.

King of the Beggars, Bampfylde Moore Carew (1693-1770). He succeeded Clause Patch, who died 1730, and was therefore king of the beggars for forty years (1730-1770).

King of the World, the Roman emperor. This is the title generally accorded to him in the old Celtic romances.

King Sat on the Rocky Brow (A). The reference is to Xerxes viewing the battle of Salamis from one of the declivities of mount Ægal'eos.

A king sat on the rocky brow
Which looks o'er sea-born Salamis;
And ships, by thousands, lay below.
Byron: Don Juan, iii. ("The Isles of Greece," xiii).

("Ships by thousands" is a gross exaggeration. The original fleet was only 1200 sail, and 400 were wrecked off the coast of Sêpias before the sea-fight of Salamis began, thus reducing the number to 800 at most.)

King should Die Standing (A). Vespasian said so, and Louis XVIII. of France repeated the same conceit. Both died standing.

King's Cave (The), opposite to Campbeltown (Argyllshire); so called because king Robert Bruce with his retinue lodged in it.—Statistical Account of Scotland, v. 167.

King's Chair, the hands of two persons so crossed as to form a seat. On Candlemas Day (February 2) it was at one time customary for Scotch children to carry offerings to their schoolmaster, and the boy and girl who brought the richest gift were elected king and queen for the nonce. When school was dismissed, each of these two children was carried in a king's chair, by way of triumph.

In the early part of the nineteenth century it was a common nursery game in England, and the fun was to break hands and let the rider down. I have played it many and many times between 1813 and 1818. I learn, too, that it was a common outdoor children's game in East Anglia as late as 1860.

King's Own (The), a novel by captain Marryat (1830).

King's Quair (The), a poem by James I. of England, in celebration of his love for lady Jane Beaufort, daughter of the earl of Somerset, and niece of Henry VIII. It is in stanzas of seven lines each, called the "rhyme royal."

(The word "quair," like our "quire," is the French cahier, and means here a "little book.")

The "king's quair," that is, the king's little book, is from the old French quayer or cayer, in modern French cahier. — H. Morley: A First Sketch of English Literature, p. 177 (1873).

Kings (The Two Books of). The first of these two books contains the history of the Hebrew monarchs for 126 years, and the second book carries on the history for 227 more years, when the kingdom of Judah was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon.

The twelve tribes formed two kingdoms on the death of Solomon. The duration of the kingdom of Judah was 387 years, and that of Israel 254 years.

Kings. Many lines of kings have taken the name of some famous forefather or some founder of a dynasty as a titular name.—Selden: Titles of Honour, v.

Alban kings, called Silvius.
Amalekite kings, Agag.
Bithynian kings, Nicomēdēs.
Constantinopolitan kings, Constantine.
Egyptian kings (ancient), Pharaoh.
" " (mediæval), Ptolemy.
Indian kings, called Palibothri (from the ity of Palibothra).
Parthian kings, Arsăcēs.
Roman emperors, Cæsar.
Servian kings, Lazar, i.e. Eleazar Bulk or Bulk-ogar, sons of Bulk.
Upsala kings, called Drott.
Royal patronymics.—Athenian, Cecrop'idæ, from Cecrops.
Danish, Skiold-ungs, from Skiold.
Persian, Achmen'-idæ, from Achmenēs.
Thessalian, Aleva-dæ, from Alevas; etc., etc.

Kings of Cologne (The Three), the three Magi who came from the East to offer gifts to the infant Jesus. Their names are Melchior, Gaspar, and Balthazar. The first offered gold, symbolic of kingship; the second, frankincense, symbolic of divinity; the third, myrrh, symbolic of death, myrrh being used in embalming the dead. (See COLOGNE, p. 226.)

Kings of England. Since the Conquest, not more than three successive sovereigns have reigned without a crisis—

William I., William II., Henry I.
Stephen usurper.
Henry II., Richard I., John.
The pope gives the crown to the dauphin.
Henry III., Edward I., Edward II.
Edward II. murdered.
Edward III., Richard II.
Richard II. deposed.
Henry IV., V., VI.
Lancaster changed to York.
Edward IV., V., Richard III.
Dynasty changed.
Henry VII., VIII., Edward VI.
Lady Jane Grey.
Mary, Elizabeth.
Dynasty changed.
James I., Charles I.
Charles I. beheaded.
Charles II., James II.
James II. dethroned.
William III., Anne.
Dynasty changed.
George I., II., III.
Regency.
George IV., William IV., Victoria (indirect successions).

Kings of England. Except in one instance (that of John), we have never had a great-grandchild sovereign in direct descent. The exception is not creditable, for in John's reign the kingdom was given away twice; his son Henry III. was imprisoned by Leicester; and his great-grandson Edward II., was murdered. In two other instances a grandchild has succeeded, viz. Henry VI., whose reign was a continued civil war; and Edward VI., the sickly son of Jane Seymour. Stephen was a grandchild of William I., but a usurper; Richard II. was a grandchild of Edward III., and George III. was grandson of George II.; but their fathers did not succeed to the throne.

William I.; his sons, William II., Henry I.
Stephen (a usurper).
Henry II.; his sons, Richard I., John (discrowned).
From John, in regular succession, we have Henry III. (imprisoned), Edward I., Edward II. (murdered), Edward III.
Richard II., son of the Black Prince, and without offspring.
Henry IV., Henry V., Henry VI. (civil wars).
Edward IV., Edward V.

Richard III. (no offspring).
Henry VII., Henry VIII., Edward VI.
Mary, Elizabeth (daughters of Henry VIII.).
James I., Charles I.
Cromwell (called lord protector).
Charles II., James II. (two brothers).
William III., prince of Orange.
Anne, intervening between the prince of Orange and the Hanoverians.
George I., George II.
George III. (great-grandson of George I., but not in direct descent), George IV.
William IV. (brother of George IV.).
Victoria (the niece of William IV. and George IV.).

Kings of England. Three seems to be a kind of ruling number in our English sovereigns. Besides the coincidences mentioned above connected with the number, may be added the following: (1) That of the four kings who married French princesses, three of them suffered violent deaths, viz. Edward II., Richard II., and Charles I. (2) The three longest kings' reigns have been three threes, viz. Henry III., Edward III., and George III. (3) We have no instance, as in France, of three brothers succeeding each other.

(Queen Victoria began to reign in 1837, and was still on the throne in 1897—her "diamond jubilee" year. Vivat Regina!)

Kings of France. The French have been singularly unfortunate in their choice of royal surnames, when designed to express anything except some personal quality, as handsome, fat, of which we cannot judge the truth. Thus, Louis VIII., a very feeble man in mind and body, was surnamed the Lion; Philippe II., whose whole conduct was overreaching and selfish, was the Magnanimous; Philippe III., the tool of Labrosse, was the Daring; Philippe VI., the most unfortunate of all the kings of France, was surnamed the Lucky; Jean, one of the worst of all the kings, was called the Good; Charles VI. an idiot, and Louis XV. a scandalous debauchee, were surnamed the Well-beloved; Henri II., a man of pleasure, wholly under the thumb of Diane de Poitiers, was called the Warlike; Louis XIII., most unjust in domestic life, where alone he had any freedom of action, was called the Just; Louis XIV., a man of mere ceremony and posture, who lost battle after battle, and brought the nation to absolute bankruptcy, was surnamed the Great King. (He was little in stature, little in mind, little in all moral and physical faculties; and great only in such littlenesses as posturing, dressing, ceremony, and gormandizing.) And Louis XVIII., forced on the nation by conquerors quite against the general will, was called the Desired.

Kings of France. The succession of three brothers has been singularly fatal in French monarchism. The Capetian dynasty terminated with three brothers, sons of Philippe le Bel (viz. Louis X., Philippe V., and Charles IV.). The Valois dynasty came to an end by the succession of the three brothers, sons of Henri II. (viz. François II., Charles IX., and Henri III.). The next or Bourbon dynasty terminated in the same manner (Louis XVI., Louis XVIII., and Charles X.).

After Charles IV. (the third brother of the Capetian dynasty), came Philippe de Valois, a collateral descendant; after Henri III. (the third brother of the Valois dynasty), came Henry de Bourbon, a collateral descendant; and after Charles X. (the third brother of the Bourbon dynasty), came Louis Philippe, a collateral descendant. With the third of the third the monarchy ended.

(1) The fine painting of Bonington represents Henri IV. (of France) carrying his children pickaback, to the horror of the Spanish ambassador.

(2) Plutarch tells us that Agesiläos was one day discovered riding cock-horse on a walking-stick, to please and amuse his children.

(3) George III. was on one occasion discovered on all-fours, with one of his children riding astride his back. He is also well remembered by the painting of "George III. Playing at Ball with the Princess Amelia."

King Franconi. (See FRANCONI, p. 392.)

King John. (See under JOHN, p. 550.)

King John and the abbot of Canterbury. (See under JOHN, p. 551.)

King Log. (See LOG, p. 622.)

King-Maker (The), Richard Neville, earl of Warwick, who fell in the battle of Barnet (1420-1471). So called because when he espoused the Yorkists, Edward IV. was set up king; and when he espoused the Lancastrian side, Henry VI. was restored.

Thus fortune to his end the mighty Warwick brings.
This puissant setter-up and plucker-down of kings.
Draylon: Polyalbion, xxii. (1622).

King Pétaud. (See PÉTAUD.)

King Smith. (See SMITH.)

King Stork. (See STORK.)

Kingdom of Snow, Norway. Sweden also is so called. When these kingdoms had each a separate king, either of them was called "The Snow King." (See KING, SNOW.)

Let no vessel of the kingdom of snow bound on the dark-rolling waves of Inistore [the Orkneys].—Ossian: Fingal, i.

Kingsale (Lord), allowed to wear his hat in the presence of royalty. In 1203, Hugh de Lacie treacherously seized sir John de Courcy lord of Kingsale, and king John condemned him to perpetual imprisonment in the Tower. When he had been there about a year, king John and Philippe Auguste of France agreed to determine certain claims by combat. It was then that John applied to De Courcy to be his champion; and as soon as the giant knight entered the lists, the French champion ran away panic-struck. John now asked his champion what reward he could give him for his service. "Titles and estates I have enow," said De Courcy; and then requested that, after having paid obeisance, he and his heirs might stand covered in the presence of the king and his successors.

¶ John Pakington, ancestor of lord Hampton, had a grant made him in the 20th Henry VIII. "of full liberty during his life to wear his hat in the royal presence."

Kingship (Disqualifications for).

(1) Any personal blemish disqualified a person from being king during the semi-barbarous stage of society; thus putting out the eyes of a prince, to disqualify him from reigning, was by no means uncommon. It will be remembered that Hubert designed to put out the eyes of prince Arthur, with this object. Witi'za the Visigoth put out the eyes of Theodofred, "inhabilitandole pāra la monarchia," says Ferraras. When Alboquerque took possession of Ormuz, he deposed fifteen kings of Portugal, and, instead of killing them, put out their eyes.

(2) Yorwerth, son of Owen Gwynedh, was set aside from the Welsh throne because he had a broken nose. (See LLEWELLYN.)

(3) Count Oliba of Barcelona was set aside because he could not speak till he had stamped thrice with his foot, like a goat.

(4) The son of Henry V. was to be received as king of France, only on condition that his body was without defect, and was not stunted.—Monstrelet: Chroniques, v. 190 (1512).

(5) Llewellyn (q.v.) was set aside because he had a blemish in the face.

Un Conde de Gallicia que fuera valiado,
Pelayo avie nombre, ome fo desforzado,
Perdio la vision, andaba embargado,
Ca ome que non vede, non debie seer nado.
Gonzales de Bercee: S. Dom., 388 (died 1266).

N.B.—Without doubt this disqualification was due the office of kings as offerers of sacrifice. Both the sacrifice itself and the sacrificer were bound to be without blemish, as any bodily defect in either was a mark of God's displeasure. The question asked by Jesus' disciples, "Who did sin, this man [in his pre-existing state], or his parents, that he was born blind?" will readily occur to the reader.

"Whoever . . . hath any blemish, let him not approach to offer the bread of his God. For whatsoever . . . hath a blemish, he shall not approach: [as] a blind man, . . . he that hath a flat nose, or anything superfluous, or a man that is broken-footed, or broken-handed, or crookbacked, or a dwarf," etc.—Lev. xxi. 17–21.

Kinmont Willie. William Armstrong of Kinmonth. This notorious freebooter, who lived in the latter part of the sixteenth century, is the hero of a famous Scotch ballad.

Kinoce'tus, a precious stone, which will enable the possessor to cast out devils.—Mirror of Stones.

Kirk (Mr. John), foreman of the jury on Effie Deans's trial.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Kirkcaldy (Scotland), a corruption of Kirk-Culdee, one of the churches founded in 563 by St. Columb and his twelve brethren, when they established the Culdee institutions. The doctrines, discipline, and government of the Culdees resembled presbyterianism.

Kirkrapine (3 syl.), a sturdy thief, "wont to rob churches of their ornaments, and poor men's boxes." All he could lay hands on he brought to the hut of Abessa, daughter of Corce'ca. While Una was in the hut, Kirkrapine knocked at the door, and, as it was not immediately opened, knocked it down; whereupon the lion sprang upon him, "under his lordly foot did him suppress," and then "rent him in thousand pieces small."

The meaning is that popery was reformed by the British lion, which slew Kirkrapine, or put a stop to the traffic in spiritual matters. Una represents truth or the Reformed Church.—Spenser: Fairie Queene, i. 3 (1590).

Kiss the Scavenger's Daughter (To), to be put to the torture. Strictly speaking, "the scavenger's daughter" was an instrument of torture invented by William Skevington, lieutenant of the Tower in the reign of Henry VIII. Skevington became corrupted into scavenger, and the invention was termed his daughter or offspring.

Kit [NUBBLES], the lad employed to wait on little Nell, and do all sorts of odd jobs at the "curiosity shop" for her grandfather. He generally begins his sentences with "Why then." Thus, "'Twas a long way, wasn't it, Kit?" "Why then, it was a goodish stretch," returned Kit. "Did you find the house easily?" "Why then, not over and above," said Kit. "Of course you have come back hungry?" "Why then, I do think I am rather so." When the "curiosity shop" was broken up by Quilp, Kit took service under Mr. Garland, Abel Cottage, Finchley.

Kit was a shock-headed, shambling, awkward lad, with an uncommonly wide mouth, very red cheeks, a turned-up nose, and a most comical expression of face. He stopped short at the door on seeing a stranger, twirled in his hand an old round hat without a vestige of brim, resting himself now on one leg, and now on the other, and looking with a most extraordinary leer. He was evidently the comedy of little Nell's life.—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop, i. (1840).

Kit-Cat Club, held in Shire Lane, now called Lower Serle's Place (London). The members were whig "patriots," who, at the end of William III.'s reign, met to secure the protestant succession. Addison, Steele, Congreve, Garth, Vanbrugh, Mainwaring, Walpole, Pulteney, etc., were members.

Kit-Cat Pictures, forty-two portraits, painted by sir Godfrey Kneller, three-quarter size, to suit the walls of Tonson's villa at Barn Elms, where, in its latter days, the Kit-Cat Club was held.

("Kit-Cat" derives its name from Christopher Cat, a pastry-cook, who served the club with mutton-pies.)

Kite (Sergeant), the "recruiting officer." He describes his own character thus—

"I was born a gipsy, and bred among that crew till I was 10 years old; there I learnt canting and lying. I was bought from my mother by a certain nobleman for three pistoles, who . . . made me his page: there I learnt impudence and pimping. Being turned off for wearing my lord's linen, and drinking my lady's ratafia, I turned bailiff's follower; there I learnt bullying and swearing. I at last got into the army, and there I learnt . . . drinking. So that . . . the whole sum is: canting, lying, impudence, pimping, bullying, swearing, drinking, and a halberd."—Farquhar: The Recruiting Officer, iii. 1 (1705).

Sergeant Kite is an original picture of low life and humour, rarely surpassed.—R. Chambers: English Literature, i. 599.

Kitely (2 syl.), a rich City merchant, extremely jealous of his wife.—Ben Jonson: Every Man in His Humour (1598).

Kitt Henshaw, boatman of sir Patrick Charteris of Kinfauns, provost of Perth.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Kittlecourt (Sir Thomas), M.P., neighbour of the laird of Ellangowan.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Kitty, one of the servants of Mr. Peregrine Lovel. She spoke French like a native, because she was once "a half-boarder at Chelsea." Being asked if she had read Shakespeare: "Shikspur, Shikspur!" she replied. "Who wrote it? No, I never read that book; but I promise to read it over one afternoon or other."—Townley: High Life Below Stairs (1759).

Kitty, younger daughter of sir David and lady Dunder of Dunder Hall, near Dover. She is young, wild, and of exuberant spirits, "her mind full of fun, her eyes full of fire, her head full of novels, and her heart full of love." Kitty fell in love with Random at Calais, and agreed to elope with him, but the fugitives were detected by sir David during their preparations for flight, and, to prevent scandal, the marriage was sanctioned by the parents, and duly solemnized at Dunder Hall.—Colman: Ways and Means (1788).

Kitty Pry, the waiting-maid of Melissa. Very impertinent, very inquisitive, and very free in her tongue. She has a partiality to Timothy Sharp "the lying valet."—Garrick: The Lying Valet (1741).

Kitty Willis, a "soiled dove," employed by Saville to attend a masquerade in the same costume as lady Francis, in order to dupe Courtall.—Mrs. Cowley: The Belle's Stratagem (1780).

Klabot'ermann, a ship-kobold of the Baltic, sometimes heard, but rarely seen. Those who have seen him say he sits on the bowsprit of a phantom ship called Carmilhan, dressed in yellow, wearing a night-cap, and smoking a cutty pipe.

Klăs (Kaiser), a nickname given to Napoleon I. (1769, 1804–1814, 1821).

Hort măl lüd, en bitgen still,
Hort wat ick vertellen will,
Van den gröten kaiser Klăs,
Dat wăr mal en fixen Bäs,
Dod von Korsika her tên
Wall de welt mal recht beseha.
* * * *
Helena de Jumfer is
Nu sin Brût, sin Paradis;
Klăs geit mit ĕr op de Jagd
Drömt nich mehr von krieg um Schlacht,
Un het he măl Langewil
Schleit he Rötten d'ôt mil'n Bil.

Kaiser Klăs.

Klaus (Doctor), hero and title of a comedy by Herr Adolph l'Arronge (1878). Dr. Klaus is a gruff, but noble-minded and kind-hearted man, whose niece (a rich jeweller's daughter) has married a poor nobleman of such extravagant notions that the wife's property is soon dissipated; but the young spendthrift is reformed. The doctor has a coachman, who invades his master's province, and undertakes to cure a sick peasant.

Klaus (Peter), the prototype of Rip van Winkle. Klaus [Klows] is a goat-herd of Sittendorf, who was one day accosted by a young man, who beckoned him to follow. Peter obeyed, and was led into a deep dell, where he found twelve knights playing skittles, no one of whom uttered a word. Gazing around, he noticed a can of wine, and, drinking some of its contents, was overpowered with sleep. When he awoke, he was amazed at the height of the grass, and when he entered the village everything seemed strange to him. One or two companions encountered him, but those whom he knew as boys were grown middle-aged men, and those whom he knew as middle-aged were grey-beards. After much perplexity, he discovered he had been asleep for twenty years. (See SLEEPERS.)

Your Epimenidès, your somnolent Peter Klaus, since named "Rip van Winkle."—Carlyle.

Kleiner (General), governor of Prague, brave as a lion, but tender-hearted as a girl. It was Kleiner who rescued the infant daughter of Mahldenau at the siege of Magdeburg. A soldier seized the infant's nurse, but Kleiner smote him down, saved the child, and brought it up as his own daughter. Mahldenau being imprisoned in Prague as a spy, Meeta his daughter came to Prague to beg for his pardon, and it then came to light that the governor's adopted daughter was Meeta's sister.—Knowles: The Maid of Mariendorpt (1838).

Knag (Miss), forewoman of Mme. Mantalini, milliner, near Cavendish Square, London. After doting on Kate Nickleby for three whole days, this spiteful creature makes up her mind to hate her for ever.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby, xviii. (1838).

Knickerbocker (Diedrich), a name assumed by Washington Irving, in his History of New York (1809).

Knight. An early British king knighted by Augustus. Cunobelinus or Cymbeline.

Thou art welcome, Caius,
Thy Cæsar knighted me.
Shakespeare: Cymbeline, act iii. sc. 5 (1609).

N.B.—Holinshed (vol. i. p. 33) says, "It is reported that Kymbeline, being brought to Rome, and knighted in the court of Augustus, ever shewed himselfe a friend to the Romans."

Knight (A lady). Queen Elizabeth knighted Mary (wife of sir Hugh Cholmondeley of Vale Royal, near Chester), who was therefore called "the bold lady of Cheshire."

Knight of Arts and Industry, the hero of Thomson's Castle of Indolence (canto ii. 7–13, 1748).

Knight of La Mancha, don Quixote de la Mancha, the hero of Cervantes's novel called Don Quixote, etc. (1605, 1615).

Knight of the Blade, a bully; so called because, when swords were worn, a bully was for ever asserting his opinions by an appeal to his sword.

Knight of the Burning Pestle, a comedy in ridicule of chivalrous romance, by F. Beaumont (1611).

Knight of the Ebon Spear, Brîtŏmart. In the great tournament she "sends sir Artegal over his horse's tail," then disposes of Cambel, Tri'amond, Blan'damour, and several others in the same summary way, for "no man could bide her enchanted spear."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 4 (1596).

Knight of the Fatal Sword, Emedōrus of Grana'da. Known for his love to the incomparable Alzay'da.

"Sir," said the lady, "your name is so celebrated in the world, that I am persuaded nothing is impossible for your arm to execute."—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The Knights-Errant," 1682).

Knight of the Invincible Sword. So Am'adis of Gaul styled himself.—Vasco de Lobeira: Amadis of Gaul (fourteenth century). He cleft in twain, at one stroke, two tremendous giants.

Knight of the Leopard. David earl of Huntingdon, prince royal of Scotland, assumed the name and disguise of sir Kenneth, "Knight of the Leopard," in the crusade.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Knight of the Lions, the appellation assumed by don Quixote after his attack upon the van containing two lions sent by the general of Oran as a present to the king of Spain.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. i. 17 (1615).

Knight of the Pestle, an apothecary or druggist.

Knight of the Post, one who haunted the purlieus of the courts, ready to be hired to swear anything. So called because these mercenaries hung about the posts to which the sheriffs affixed their announcements.

I'll be no knight of the post, to sell my soul for a bribe;
Tho' all my fortunes be crossed, yet I scorn the cheater's tribe.
Ragged and Torn and True (a ballad).

Also a man in the pillory, or one that has been publicly tied to a post and whipped.

Knight of the Rainbow, a footman; so called from his gorgeous raiment.

Knight of the Roads, a foot-pad or highwayman; so termed by a pun on the military order entitled "The Knights of Rhodes."

Knight of the Rueful Countenance. Don Quixote de la Mancha, the hero of Cervantes's novel, is so called by Sancho Panza his 'squire.

Knight of the Shears, a tailor. Shires (counties), pronounced shears, gives birth to the pun.

Knight of the Sun, Almanzor prince of Tunis. So called because the sun was the device he bore on his shield.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Princess Zamea," 1682).

Knight of the Swan, Lohengrin, son of Parzival. He went to Brabant in a ship drawn by a swan. Here he liberated the princess Elsen, who was a captive, and then married her, but declined to tell his name. After a time, he joined an expedition against the Hungarians, and after performing miracles of valour, returned to Brabant covered with glory. Some of Elsen's friends laughed at her for not knowing her husband's name, so she implored him to tell her of his family; but no sooner was the question asked than the white swan reappeared and conveyed him away.—Wolfram von Eschenbach (a minnesinger): Lohengrin (thirteenth century). (See KNIGHTS OF THE SWAN.)

Knight of the Tomb (The), sir James Douglas, usually called "The Black Douglas."—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Knight of the Whip, a coachman.

Knight of the White Moon, the title assumed by Samson Carrasco, when he tilted with don Quixote, on the condition that if the don were worsted in the encounter he should quit knight-errantry and live peaceably at home for twelve months.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iv. 12–14 (1615).

Knight of the Woeful Countenance, don Quixote de la Mancha.

Knight with Two Swords, sir Balin le Savage, brother of sir Balan.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 27, 33 (1470).

Knights. The three bravest of king Arthur's knights were sir Launcelot du Lac, sir Tristram de Lionês or Lyonês, and sir Lamorake de Galis (i.e. Wales).—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 132 (1470).

∴ The complement of the knights of the Round Table was 150 (ditto, i. 120). But in Lancelot of the Lake, ii. 81, they are said to have amounted to 250.

Knights ('Prentice), a secret society established to avenge the wrongs of apprentices on their "tyrant masters." Mr. Sim Tappertit was captain of this "noble association," and their meetings were held in a cellar in Stagg's house, in the Barbican. The name was afterwards changed into "The United Bull-dogs," and the members joined the anti-popery rout of lord George Gordon.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge, viii. (1841).

Knights of Alcan'tara, a military order of Spain, which took its name from the city of Alcantara, in Estremadura. These knights were previously called "Knights of the Pear Tree," and subsequently "Knights of St. Julian." The order was founded in 1156 for the defence of Estremadura against the Moors. In 1197 pope Celestine III. raised it to the rank of a religious order of knighthood.

Knights of Calatra'va, a military order of Spain, instituted by Sancho III. of Castile. When Sancho took the strong fort of Calatrava from the Moors, he gave it to the Knights Templars, who, wanting courage to defend it, returned it to the king again. Then don Reymond of the Cistercian order, with several cavelleros of quality, volunteered to defend the fort, whereupon the king constituted them "Knights of Calatrava."

Knights of Christian Charity, instituted by Henri III. of France, for the benefit of poor military officers and maimed soldiers. This order was founded at the same time as that of the "Holy Ghost," which was meant for princes and men of distinction. The order was completed by Henri IV., and resembled our "Poor Knights of Windsor," now called "The Military Knights of Windsor."

Knights of Malta. First called "Knights of St. John of Jerusalem," otherwise "Knights of Rhodes." The most celebrated religious military order of the Middle Ages. In 1048 a hospital was dedicated to St. John the Baptist, which had been built by some merchants of Amalfi, to receive the pilgrims from Europe visiting the Holy Sepulchre. The nurses were first called the "Hospitaller Brothers of St. John the Baptist of Jerusalem." The hospice was plundered by the Seljuk Turks; and the Crusaders under Geoffroy de Bouillon, in 1099, rescued the first superior Gérard from prison. He resumed his work at the hospital, being joined by several of the Crusaders. The order then became military as well as religious. After various vicissitudes, the Knights, in 1310, under their grand-master, Foulkes de Villaret, captured Rhodes and seven other islands from the Greek and Saracen pirates, but they had to surrender Rhodes to Solyman in 1523. In 1530 they were given the island of Malta, with Tripoli and Gozo, by Charles V. The order has existed in parts of Italy, Russia, and Spain.

Knights of Montesa, a Spanish order of knighthood, instituted by James II. of Aragon in 1317.

Knights of Nova Scotia, in the West Indies, created by James I. of Great Britain. These knights wore a ribbon of an orange tawny colour.

Knights of Our Lady of Mount Carmel (Chevaliers de l'Ordre de Notre Dame du Mont Carmel), instituted by Henri IV. of France in 1607, and consisting of a hundred French gentlemen.

N.B.—These knights must not be confounded with the Carmelites, or L'Ordre des Carmes, founded by Bertholde count of Limoges in 1156; said by legend to have been founded by the prophet Elijah, and to have been revived by the Virgin Mary. The religious house of Carmel was founded in 400 by John patriarch of Jerusalem, in honour of Elijah, and this gave rise to the legend.

Knights of Rhodes. The "Knights of Malta" were so called between 1310 and 1523. (See KNIGHTS OF MALTA.)

Knights of St. Andrew, instituted by Peter the Great of Moscovy, in 1698. Their badge is a gold medal, having St. Andrew's cross on one side, with these words, Czar Pierre monarque de tout le Russie.

Knights of St. Genette (Chevaliers de l'Ordre de St. Genette), the most ancient order of knighthood in France, instituted by Charles Martel, after his victory over the Saracens in 782, where a vast number of gennets, like Spanish cats (civet cats), were found in the enemy's camp.

Knights of St. George. There are several orders so called—

1. St. George of Alfama, founded by the kings of Aragon.

2. St. George of Austria and Carinthia, instituted by the emperor Frederick III. first archduke of Austria.

3. Another founded by the same emperor in 1470, to guard the frontiers of Bohemia and Hungary against the Turks.

4. St. George, generally called "Knights of the Garter" (q.v.).

5. An order in the old republic of Genoa.

6. The Teutonic knights were originally called "Knights of St. George."

Knights of St. Jago, a Spanish order, instituted under pope Alexander III., the grand-master of which is next in rank to the sovereign. St. Jago or James (the Greater) is the patron saint of Spain.

Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. (See KNIGHTS OF MALTA, p. 579.)

Knights of St. Lazare (2 syl.), a religious and military order of Knights Hospitallers, established in the twelfth century, and confirmed by the pope in 1255. Their special mission was to take care of lepers. The name is derived from Lazarus the beggar who lay at the gate of Divês. The order was introduced into France under Louis VII., and was abolished in the first Revolution.

Knights of St. Magdalene (3 syl.), a French order, instituted by St. Louis (IX.), to suppress duels.

Knights of St. Maria de Mercede (3 syl.), a Spanish order, for the redemption of captives.

Knights of St. Michael the Archangel (Chevaliers de l'Ordre de St. Michel), a French order, instituted by Louis XI. in 1469. The king was at the head of the order. M. Bouillet says, "St. Michel est regardé comme le protecteur et l'ange tutélaire de la France."

Knights of St. Patrick, instituted in 1783. The ruling sovereign of Great Britain and Ireland, and the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, are ex-officio members of this order. The order is named after St. Patrick, the patron saint of Ireland.

Knights of St. Salvador, in Aragon, instituted by Alphonso I. in 1118.

Knights of Windsor, formerly called "Poor Knights of Windsor," but now entitled "The Military Knights of Windsor," a body of military pensioners, who have their residence within the precincts of Windsor Castle.

Knights of the Bath, an order of knighthood derived from the ancient Franks, and so termed because the members originally "bathed" before they performed their vigils. The last knights created in this ancient form were at the coronation of Charles II. in 1661.

G.C.B. stands for Grand Cross of the Bath (the first class); K.C.B. for Knight Commander of the Bath (the second class); and C.B. for Companion of the Bath (the third class).

Knights of the Blood of Our Saviour, an order of knighthood in Mantua, instituted by duke Vincent Gonçaga in 1608, on his marriage. It consisted of twenty Mantuan dukes. The name originated in the belief that in St. Andrew's Church, Mantua, certain drops of our Saviour's blood are preserved as a relic.

Knights of the Broom Flower (Chevaliers de l'Ordre de la Geneste), instituted by St. Louis (IX.) of France on his marriage. The collar was decorated with broom flowers, intermixed with fleurs de lys in gold. The motto was, Exaltat humtlès.

Knights of the Carpet or CARPET KNIGHTS, i.e. non-military or civil knights, such as mayors, lawyers, authors, artists, physicians, and so on, who receive their knighthood kneeling on a carpet, and not in the tented field.

Knights of the Chamber or CHAMBER KNIGHTS, knights bachelors made in times of peace in the presence-chamber, and not in the camp. These are always military men, and therefore differ from "Carpet Knights," who are always civilians.

Knights of the Cock and Dog, founded by Philippe I., Auguste, of France.

Knights of the Crescent, a military order, instituted by Renatus of Anjou, king of Sicily, etc., in 1448. So called from the badge, which is a crescent of gold enamelled. What gave rise to this institution was that Renatus took for his device a crescent, with the word los ("praise"), which, in the style of rebus, makes los in crescent, i.e. "by advancing in virtue one merits praise."

Knights of the Dove, a Spanish order, instituted in 1379 by John I. of Castile.

Knights of the Dragon, created by the emperor Sigismond in 1417, upon the condemnation of Huss and Jerome of Prague "the heretics."

Knights of the Ermine (Chevaliers de l'Ordre de l'Epic), instituted in 1450 by François I. duc de Bretagne. The collar was of gold, composed of ears of corn in saltier, at the end of which hung an ermine, with the legend à ma vie. The order expired when the dukedom was annexed to the crown of France.

Knights of the Garter, instituted by Edward III. of England in 1344. According to Selden, "it exceeds in majesty, honour, and fame, all chivalrous orders in the world." The story is that Joan countess of Salisbury, while dancing with the king, let fall her garter, and the gallant Edward, perceiving a smile on the faces of the courtiers, picked it up, bound it round his knee, and exclaimed, "Honi soit qui mal y pense." The blue garter and the motto of the order are thus accounted for.

Knights of the Golden Fleece, a military order of knighthood, instituted by Philippe le Bon of Burgundy in 1429. It took its name from a representation of the golden fleece on the collar of the order. The king of Spain is grand-master, and the motto is, Ante feret quam flamma micet.

Knights of the Golden Shield, an order instituted by Louis II. of France, for the defence of the country. The motto is, Allons (i.e. "Let us go in defence of our country").

Knights of the Hare, an order of twelve knights, instituted by Edward III. while he was in France. The French raised a tremendous shout, and Edward thought it was the cry of battle, but it was occasioned by a hare running between the two armies. From this incident the knights created on the field after this battle were termed "Knights of the Order of the Hare."

Knights of the Holy Ghost (Chevaliers de l'Ordre du Saint Esprit), instituted by Henri III. of France on his return from Poland. Henri III. was both born and crowned on Whit-Sunday, and hence the origin of the order.

Knights of the Holy Sepulchre, an order of knighthood founded by St. Helena, when she visited Jerusalem at the age of 80, and found (as it is said) the cross on which Christ was crucified in a cavern under the temple of Venus, A.D. 328. This order was confirmed by pope Pascal II. in 1114.

Knights of the Lily, an order of knighthood in Navarre, founded by Garcia in 1048.

Knights of the Order of Fools, established November, 1381, and continued to the beginning of the sixteenth century. The insignia was a jester or fool embroidered on the left side of their mantles, cap and bells, yellow stockings, a cup of fruit in the right hand, and a gold key in the left. It resembled the "Oddfellows" of more modern times.

Knights of the Porcupine (Chevaliers de l'Ordre du Porcépic), a French order of knighthood. The original motto was, Cominus et eminus, changed by Louis XII. into Ultus avos Trojæ.

Knights of the Red Staff, an order instituted by Alfonso XI. of Castile and Leon in 1330.

Knights of the Round Table. King Arthur's knights were so called, because they sat with him at a round table made by Merlin for king Leodegraunce. This king gave it to Arthur on his marriage with Guinever, his daughter. It contained seats for 150 knights, 100 of which king Leodegraunce furnished when he sent the table.

Knights of the Shell. The argonauts of St. Nicholas were so called from the shells worked on the collar of the order.

Knights of the Ship, an order of knighthood founded by St. Louis (IX.) of France in his expedition to Egypt.

Knights of the Star (Chevaliers de l'Ordre de l'Etoile), an ancient order of knighthood in France. The motto of the order was, Monstrant regibus astra viam.

Knights of the Swan (Chevaliers de l'Ordre du Cygne), an order of knighthood founded in 1443 by the elector Frederick II. of Brandenburg, and restored in 1843 by Frederick William IV. of Prussia Its object is the relief of distress generally. The king of Prussia is grand-master. The motto is, Gott mit uns ("God be with you"); and the collar is of gold. The white swan is the badge of the house of Cleves (Westphalia).

Lord Berners has a novel called The Knight of the Swan (sixteenth century).

Knights of the Thistle, said to be founded by Archaicur king of the Scots in 809; revived in 1540 by James V. of Scotland; again in 1687 by James II. of Great Britain; and again by queen Anne, who placed the order on a permanent footing. The decoration consists of a collar of enamelled gold, composed of sixteen thistles interlaced with sprigs of rue, and a small golden image of St. Andrew within a circle. The motto is, Nemo me impune lacessit. The members are sometimes called "Knights of St. Andrew."

The rue mixed with the thistles is a pun on the word "Andrew," thistles And-rue.

(There was at one time a French "Order of the Thistle" in the house of Bourbon, with the same decoration and motto.)

Knights of the Virgin's Looking-glass, an order instituted in 1410 by Ferdinand of Castile.

Knights Sword-bearers, founded in 1201 by bishop Meinhard, for the defence of Livonia. The last grand-master of the order was Gothard Kettler, created duke of Courland in 1561.

Knights Teutonic, originally called "Knights of St. George," then "Knights of the Virgin Mary," and lastly "Teutonic Knights of the Hospital of St. Mary the Virgin." This order was instituted by Henry king of Jerusalem, in compliment to the German volunteers who accompanied Frederick Barbarossa on his crusade. The knights were soon afterwards placed under the tutelage of the Virgin, to whom a hospital for German pilgrims had been dedicated; and in 1191 pope Celestine III. confirmed the privileges, and changed the name to the "Teutonic Knights." Abolished by Napoleon, 1809. It still has a titular existence in Austria.

Knighton, groom of the duke of Buckingham.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Knockwinnock (Sybil), wife of sir Richard of the Redhand, and mother of Malcolm Misbegot.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Knot (Gordian). (See GORDIUS, p. 438.)

Know. Not to know me argues yourselves unknown. The words of Satan to Zephon and Ithu'riél, when they discovered him lurking in the garden of Eden.—Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 830 (1665).

Knowledge (Finn's Tooth of). According to old Celtic romances, Finn Ma Cumal (Fingal) had the gift of divination, which he could exercise at will by placing his thumb under one of his teeth. The legends say that he obtained the power from being the first to eat of the salmon of knowledge, which swam in the pool of Linn-Fec, in the Boyne. The process seems to have been attended with pain, so that it was only on very solemn and trying occasions Finn exercised the gift.

Kochla'ni, a race of Arabian horses, whose genealogy for 2000 years has been most strictly preserved. They are derived from Solomon's studs. This race of horses can bear the greatest fatigue, can pass days without food, show undaunted courage in battle, and when their riders are slain will carry them from the field to a place of safety.—Niebuhr.

(The Kadischi is another celebrated race of horses, but not equal to the Kochlani.)

Koh-i-noor ["mountain of light"], a diamond once called "The Great Mogul." Held in the fourteenth century by the rajah of Malwa. Later it fell into the hands of the sultans of Delhi, after their conquest of Malwa. It belonged in the seventeenth century to Aurungzebe the Great. The shah Jihan sent it to Hortensio Borgio to be cut, but the Venetian lapidary reduced it from 793½ carats to 186, and left it dull and lustreless. It next passed into the hands of Aurungzebe's great-grandson, who hid it in his turban. Nadir Shah invited the possessor to a feast, and insisted on changing turbans, "to cement their love," and thus it fell into Nadir's hands, who gave it the name of "Koh-i-noor." It next passed into the hands of Ahmed Shah, founder of the Cabûl dynasty; was extorted from shah Shuja by Runjet Singh, who wore it set in a bracelet. After the murder of Shu Singh, it was deposited in the Lahore treasury, and after the annexation of the Punjaub was presented to queen Victoria in 1849. It has been re-cut, and, though reduced to 106 carats, is supposed to be worth £140,000.

 There is another diamond of the same name belonging to the shah of Persia.

Kolao, the wild man of Misamichis. He had a son who died in early youth, and he went to Pat-Koot-Parout to crave his son's restoration to life. Pat-Koot-Parout put the soul of the dead body in a leather bag, which he fastened with packthread, and hung round the neck of Kolao, telling him to lay the body in a new hut, put the bag near the mouth, and so let the soul return to it, but on no account to open the bag before everything was ready. Kolao placed the bag in his wife's hands while he built the hut, strictly enjoining her not to open it; but curiosity led her to open the bag, and out flew the soul to the country of Pat-Koot-Parout again.—Gueulette: Chinese Tales ("Kolao, the Wild Man," 1723).

¶ Orpheus, having lost his wife Eurydicê by the bite of a serpent, obtained permission of Pluto for her restoration, provided he looked not back till he reached the upper world. He had got to the end of his journey when he turned round to see if Pluto had kept his word. As he turned he just caught sight of Eurydicê, who was instantly caught back again to the infernal regions.

¶ Adam and Eve in Paradise were forbidden to eat the fruit of the tree of knowledge; but Eve could not resist. She ate and gave to Adam, who ate of the fruit also, and both were expelled from Paradise.

¶ Pando'ra entrusted her box to Epime'theus (4 syl.) her husband, but enjoined him on no account to open it. Curiosity induced Epimetheus to peep into it, when out flew all the ills that flesh is heir to. However, the lid was slammed down before Hope had made his escape.

(Similar tales are extremely numerous.)

Koppenberg, the mountain of Westphalia to which the pied piper (Bunting) led the children, when the people of Hamelin refused to pay him for killing their rats.—Browning.

¶ The Old Man of the Mountain led the children of Lorch into the Tannenberg, for a similar offence.

Korigans or Korrigans, nine fays of Brittany, not above two feet in height, who can predict future events, assume any shape, and move from place to place as quick as thought. They sing like syrens, and comb their long hair like mermaids. The Korigans haunt fountains, flee at the sound of bells, and their breath is deadly.—Breton Mythology.

Kosciusko (Thaddæus), the Polish general who contended against the allied army of Russia under the command of Suwarrow, in 1794. He was taken prisoner and sent to Russia, but in 1796 was set at liberty by the czar.

> Hope for a season bade the world farewell,
> And Freedom shrieked—as Kosciusko fell.
> Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, I. (1799).

Krakamal, the Danish death-song.

Kriemhild [Kreem-hild], daughter of Dancrat, and sister of Günther king of Burgundy. She first married Siegfried king of the Netherlanders, who was murdered by Hagan. Thirteen years afterwards, she married Etzel (Attila) king of the Huns. Some time after her marriage, she invited Günther, Hagan, and others to visit her, and Hagan slew Etzel's young son. Kriemhild now became a perfect fury, and cut off the head of both Günther and Hagan with her own hand, but was herself slain by Hildebrand. Till the death of Siegfried, Kriemhild was gentle, modest, and lovable, but afterwards she became vindictive, bold, and hateful.—The Nibelungen Lied (by the German minnesingers, twelfth century).

Krook, proprietor of a rag-and-bone warehouse, where everything seems to be bought and nothing sold. He is a grasping drunkard, who eventually dies of spontaneous combustion. Krook is always attended by a large cat, which he calls "Lady Jane," as uncanny as her master.—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Kruits'ner, or the "German's Tale," in Miss H. Lee's Canterbury Tales. Lord Byron founded his tragedy of Werner on this tale.

> The drama [of Werner] is taken entirely from the "German's Tale" [Kruitsner], published in Lee's Canterbury Tales, written by two sisters . . . I have adopted the characters, plan, and even the language of many parts of the story.—Byron: Preface to Werner (1822).

Krux, a dirty-minded, malicious brute, without sufficient courage to be a villain, but quite mean-spirited enough to be malicious.—Robertson: School (1869).

Kubla Khan. Coleridge says that he composed this fragment from a dream, after reading Purchas's Pilgrimage, a description of khan Kubla's palace; and he wrote it down on awaking (1797).

(It is said that Tartini composed The Devil's Sonata in his sleep.)

Rouget de Lisle slept at the harpsichord whilst composing the Marseillaise; on waking he recalled the song as one recalls the impression of a dream, and then wrote down words and music (1792).

Kudrun, called the German Odyssey (thirteenth century); divided into three parts called Hagen, Hilde (2 syl.), and Kudrun.

N.B.—Hagen is the son of Siegebrand king of Irland, and is carried off by a griffin to a distant island, where three princesses take charge of him. In due time a ship touches on the island, takes all the four to Irland, and Hagen marries Hilda, the youngest of the three sisters.

Hilda. In due time Hilda has a daughter, who is called by the same name, and at a marriageable age becomes the wife of Hedel king of Friesland.

Kudrun. Hilda's daughter Kudrun becomes affianced to Herwig, but, while preparing the wedding dresses, is carried off by Hartmut, son of Ludwig king of Normandy. Her father goes in pursuit, but is slain by Ludwig. On reaching Normandy, Gerlinde (3 syl.) the queen-mother treats Kudrun with the greatest cruelty, and puts her to the most servile work, because she refuses to marry her son. At length, succour is at hand. Her lover and brother arrive and slay Ludwig. Gerlinde is just about to put Kudrun to death, when Watt Long-beard rushes in, slays the queen, and rescues Kudrun, who is forthwith married to Herwig her affianced lover. — Author unknown (one of the minnesingers).

Kwa'sind, the strongest man that ever lived, the Herculês of the North American Indians. He could pull up cedars and pines by the roots, and toss huge rocks about like playthings. His wondrous strength was "seated in his crown," and there of course lay his point of weakness, but the only weapon which could injure him was the "blue cone of the fir tree," a secret known only to the pygmies or Little-folk. This mischievous race, out of jealousy, determined to kill the strong man, and one day, finding him asleep in a boat, pelted him with fir cones till he died; and now, whenever the tempest rages through the forests, and the branches of the trees creak and groan and split, they say, "Kwasind is gathering in his fire-wood." (See HERCULES, p. 485.)

> Dear, too, unto Hiawatha
> Was the very strong man Kwasind;
> He the strongest of all mortals.
> Longfellow: Hiawatha, XV. and XVIII.

Kyrie Elyson de Montalban (Don) or "don Quirieleyson de Montalvan," brother of Thomas de Montalban, in the romance called Tirante le Blanc, author unknown.

(Dr. Warburton, in his essay on the old romances, falls into the strange error of calling this character an "early romance of chivalry." As well might he call Claudius king of Denmark a play of Shakespeare's, instead of a character in the tragedy of Hamlet.)

> A large quarto dropped at the barber's feet . . . it was the history of that famous knight Tirante le Blanc. "Pray let me look at that book," said the priest; "we shall find in it a fund of amusement. Here shall we find the famous knight don Kyrie Elyson of Montalban, and his brother Thomas. . . . This is one of the most amusing books ever written."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. i. 6 (1605).

L.

Lab'arum, the imperial standard carried before the Roman emperors in war. Constantine, having seen a luminous cross in the sky the night before the battle of Saxa Rubra, added the sacred monogram XP (Christos). — Gibbon: Decline and Fall, etc., XX. note (1788).

N.B.—The labarum bore the device of a cross, above which was a crown adorned with the sacred monogram and the Greek letters α, ω. Attached to the transverse rod was a small purple banner with a gold fringe.

> . . . stars would write his will in heaven,
> As once when a labarum was not deemed
> Too much for the old founder of those walls [Constantinople].
> R. Browning: Paracelsus, II.

Labe (2 syl.), the sorceress-queen of the Island of Enchantments. She tried to change Beder, the young king of Persia, into a halting, one-eyed hack; but Beder was forewarned, and changed Labê herself into a mare.—Arabian Nights ("Beder and Glauharê").

Labe'rius, a Roman writer of pantomimes, contemporary with Julius Cæsar.

> Laberius would be always sure of more followers than Sophocles.—Macpherson: Dissertation on Ossian.

La Creevy (Miss), a little talkative, bustling, cheery miniature-painter. Simple-minded, kind-hearted, and bright as a lark. She marries Tim Linkinwater, the old clerk of the brothers Cheeryble.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Lackitt (Widow), the widow of an Indian planter. This rich vulgar widow falls in love with Charlotte Weldon, who assumes the dress of a young man and calls herself Mr. Weldon. Charlotte even marries the widow, but then informs her that she is a girl in male apparel, engaged to Mr. Stanmore. The widow consoles herself by marrying Jack Stanmore.—Southern: Oroonoko (1696).

Lacy (Sir Hugo de), constable of Chester, a crusader.

Sir Damian de Lacy, nephew of sir Hugo. He marries lady Eveline.

Randal de Lacy, sir Hugo's cousin, introduced in several disguises, as a merchant, a hawk-seller, and a robber-captain.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

La'das, Alexander's messenger, noted for his swiftness of foot. Lord Rosebery named one of his horses "Ladas."

Ladislaus, a cynic, whose humour is healthy and amusing.—Massinger: The Picture (1629).

Ladislaw (Will), the artist in love with Dorothea Brooke the heroine of the novel, who first marries Casaubon, and afterwards Will Ladislaw.—George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross): Middlemarch (1872).

Ladon, the dragon or hydra that assisted the Hesperidês in keeping watch over the golden apples of the Hesperian grove.

> So oft th' unamiable dragon hath slept,
> That the garden's imperfectly watched after all.
> Moore: Irish Melodies (1814).

Ladrone Islands, i.e. "thieves' islands;" so called by Magellan in 1519, from the thievish disposition of the natives.

Ladur'lad, the father of Kail'yal (2 syl.). He killed Ar'valan for attempting to dishonour his daughter, and thereby incurred the "curse of Keha'ma" (Arvalan's father). The curse was that water should not wet him nor fire consume him, that sleep should not visit him nor death release him, etc. After enduring a time of agony, these curses turned to blessings. Thus, when his daughter was exposed to the fire of the burning pagoda, he was enabled to rescue her, because he was "charmed from fire." When her lover was carried by the witch Lorrimite (3 syl.) to the city of Baly under the ocean, he was able to deliver the captive, because he was "charmed from water, the serpent's tooth, and all beasts of blood." He could even descend to the infernal regions to crave vengeance against Kehama, because "he was charmed against death." When Kehama drank the cup of "immortal death," Ladurlad was taken to paradise.—Southey: The Curse of Kehama (1809).

Lady (A). This authoress of A New System of Domestic Cookery (1808) is Mrs. Rundell.

Lady (A), authoress of The Diary of an Ennuyée (1826), is Mrs. Anna Jameson.

Several other authoresses have adopted the same signature, as Miss Gunn of Christchurch, Conversations on Church Polity (1833); Mrs. Palmer, A Dialogue in the Devonshire Dialect (1837); Miss S. Fenimore Cooper, Rural Hours (1854); Julia Ward, Passion-flowers, etc. (1854); Miss E. M. Sewell, Amy Herbert (1865); etc.

Lady Bountiful (A). The benevolent lady of a village is so called, from "lady Bountiful" in the Beaux' Stratagem, by Farquhar (1707). (See BOUNTIFUL, p. 140.)

Lady Freemason, the Hon. Miss Elizabeth St. Leger, daughter of lord Doneraile. The tale is that, in order to witness the proceedings of a Freemasons' lodge, she hid herself in an empty clock-case when the lodge was held in her father's house; but, being discovered, she was compelled to submit to initiation as a member of the craft.

Lady Magistrate (The), lady Berkley, made justice of the peace for Gloucestershire by queen Mary. She sat on the bench at assizes and sessions girt with a sword.

Lady Margaret, mother of Henry VII. She founded a professorship of divinity in the University of Cambridge (1502); and a preachership in both universities.

Lady in the Sacque. The apparition of this hag forms the story of the Tapestried Chamber, by sir W. Scott.

Lady of England, Maud, daughter of Henry I. The title of Domina Anglorum was conferred upon her by the council of Winchester, held April 7, 1141. (See Rymer's Fœdera, i. (1703).)

A. L. O. E., the initial letters of A Lady Of England, was the signature adopted by Miss Tucker, authoress of Pride and Prejudice, etc. (1821–1893).

Lady of Lyons (The). Pauline Deschappelles, daughter of a Lyonese merchant. She rejected the suits of Beauseant, Glavis, and Claude Melnotte, who therefore combined on vengeance. To this end, Claude, who was a gardener's son, aided by the other two, passed himself off as prince Como, married Pauline, and brought her home to his mother's cottage. The proud beauty was very indignant, and Claude left her to join the French army. In two years and a half he became a colonel, and returned to Lyons. He found his father-in-law on the eve of bankruptcy, and that Beauseant had promised to satisfy the creditors if Pauline would consent to marry him. Pauline was heart-broken; Claude revealed himself, paid the money required, and carried home Pauline as his loving and true-hearted wife.—Lord Lytton: Lady of Lyons (1838).

Lady of Mercy (Our), an order of knighthood in Spain, instituted in 1218 by James I. of Aragon, for deliverance of Christian captives from the Moors. As many as 400 captives were rescued in six years by these knights.

Lady of Shalott, a maiden who died for love of sir Lancelot of the Lake. Tennyson has a poem so entitled.

 The story of Elaine, "the lily maid of Astolat," in Tennyson's Idylls of the King, is substantially the same.

Lady of the Bleeding Heart, Ellen Douglas. The cognizance of the Douglas family is a "bleeding heart."—Sir W. Scott: Lady of the Lake (1810).

LADY OF THE LAKE (A), a harlot. (Anglo-Saxon, ldc, "a present.") A "guinea-fowl" or "guinea-hen" is a similar term.

> But for the difference marriage makes
> 'Twixt wives and "ladies of the lake."
> S. Butler: Hudibras, iii. 2 (1678).

Lady of the Lake (The), Nimue (sic), one of the damsels of the lake, that king Pellinore took to his court. Merlin, in his dotage, fell in love with her, when she wheedled him out of all his secrets, and enclosed him in a rock, where he died (pt. i. 60). Subsequently, Nimue married sir Pelleas (pt. i. 81, 82). (See next article.)

> So upon a time it happened that Merlin shewed Nimue in a rock whereas was a great wonder, and wrought by enchantment, which went under a stone. So, by her subtle craft and working, she made Merlin go under that stone . . . and so wrought that he never came out again. So she departed, and left Merlin.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 60 (1470).

(Tennyson, in his Idylls of the King ("Merlin and Vivien"), makes Vivien the enchantress who wheedled old Merlin out of his secrets; and then, "in a hollow oak," she shut him fast, and there "he lay as dead, and lost to life, and use, and name, and fame.")

N.B.—This seems to be an error. At any rate, it is not in accordance with the Mort d'Arthur of Caxton renown.

Lady of the Lake (The), Nineve. It is not evident from the narrative whether Nineve is not the same person as Nimue, and that one of the two (probably the latter) is not a typographical error.

> Then the Lady of the Lake, that was always friendly unto king Arthur, understood by her subtle crafts that king Arthur was like to have been destroyed; and therefore this Lady of the Lake, that hight Nineve, came into the forest to seek sir Launcelot du Lake.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 57 (1470).
> The feasts that underground the faëry did him [Arthur] make,
> And there how he enjoyed the Lady of the Lake.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

Lady of the Lake (The). Vivienne (3 syl.) is called La Dame du Lac, and dwelt en la marche de la petite Bretaigne. She stole Lancelot in his infancy, and plunged with him into her home lake; hence was Lancelot called du Lac. When her protégé was grown to manhood, she presented him to king Arthur.

Lady of the Lake (The), Ellen Douglas, once a favourite of king James; but when her father fell into disgrace, she retired with him near Loch Katrine.—Sir W. Scott: Lady of the Lake (1810).

Lady of the Lake and Arthur's Sword. The Lady of the Lake gave to king Arthur the sword "Excalibur." "Well," said she, "go into yonder barge and row yourself to the sword, and take it." So Arthur and Merlin came to the sword that a hand held up, and took it by the handles, and the arm and hand went under the lake again (pt. i. 23).

This Lady of the Lake asked in recompense the head of sir Balin, because he had slain her brother; but the king refused the request. Then said Balin, "Evil be ye found! Ye would have my head; therefore ye shall lose thine own." So saying, with his sword he smote off her head in the presence of king Arthur.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 28 (1470).

Lady of the Mercians, Æthelfled or El'flida, daughter of king Alfred. She married Æthelred chief of that portion of Mercia not claimed by the Danes.

Lady of the Sun, Alice Perrers (or Pierce), a mistress of Edward III. of England. She was a married woman, and had been lady of the bed-chamber to queen Philippa. Edward lavished on her both riches and honours; but when the king was dying, she stole his jewels, and even the rings from his fingers.

Lady with a Lamp, Florence Nightingale (1820–).

> On England's annals . . .
> A Lady with a Lamp shall stand . . .
> A noble type of good,
> Heroic womanhood.

Ladies' Rock, Stirling (Scotland).

> In the castle hill is a hollow called "The Valley," comprehending about an acre, . . . for justings and tournaments. . . . Closely adjoining . . . is a small rocky . . . mount called "The Ladies' Hill," where the fair ones of the court took their station to behold these feats.—Nimmo: History of Stirlingshire, 282.

Laer'tes (3 syl.), son of Polōnius lord chamberlain of Denmark, and brother of Ophelia. He is induced by the king to challenge Hamlet to a "friendly" duel, but poisons his rapier. Laertēs wounds Hamlet; and in the scuffle which ensues, the combatants change swords, and Hamlet wounds Laertēs, so that both die.—Shakespeare: Hamlet (1596).

Laer'tes (3 syl.), a Dane, whose life Gustavus Vasa had spared in battle. He becomes the trusty attendant of Christi'na, daughter of the king of Sweden, and never proves ungrateful to the noble Swede.—Brooke: Gustavus Vasa (1730).

Laer'tes's Son, Ulysses.

> But when his strings with mournful magic tell
> What dire distress Laertēs' son befell,
> The streams, meandering thro' the maze of woe,
> Bid sacred sympathy the heart o'erflow.
> Falconer: The Shipwreck, iii. 1 (1756).

Lafeu, an old French lord, sent to conduct Bertram count of Rousillon to the king of France, by whom he was invited to the royal court.—Shakespeare: All's Well that Ends Well (1598).

Lafontaine (The Danish), Hans Christian Andersen (1805–1875).

Lafontaine of the Vaudeville. So C. F. Panard is called (1691–1765).

Lag'ado, capital of Balnibarbi, celebrated for its grand school of projectors, where the scholars have a technical education, being taught to make pincushions from softened granite, to extract from cucumbers the sunbeams which ripened them, and to convert ice into gunpowder. —Swift: Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Lapu'ta," 1726).

La Grange and his friend Du Croisy pay their addresses to two young ladies whose heads have been turned by novels. (The tale is given under Du Croisy, q.v.) —Molière: Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659).

Laider (Donald), one of the prisoners at Portanferry. — Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Lai'la (2 syl.), a Moorish maiden, of great beauty and purity, who loved Manuel, a youth worthy of her. The father disapproved of the match; and they eloped, were pursued, and overtaken near a precipice on the Guádalhorcê (4 syl.). They climbed to the top of the precipice, and the father bade his followers discharge their arrows at them. Laila and Manuel, seeing death to be inevitable, threw themselves from the precipice, and perished in the fall. It is from this incident that the rock was called "The Lovers' Leap."

> And every Moorish maid can tell
> Where Laila lies who loved so well;
> And every youth who passes there,
> Says for Manuel's soul a prayer.
> Southey: The Lovers' Rock (a ballad, 1798, taken from Mariana: De la Peña de los Enamorados).

Laila, daughter of Okba the sorcerer. It was decreed that either Laila or Thalaba must die. Thalaba refused to redeem his own life by killing Laila; and Okba exultingly cried, "As thou hast disobeyed the voice of Allah, God hath abandoned thee, and this hour is mine." So saying, he rushed on the youth; but Laila, intervening to protect him, received the blow, and was killed. Thalaba lived on, and the spirit of Laila, in the form of a green bird, conducted him to the simorg (q.v.), which he sought, that he might be directed to Dom-Daniel, the cavern "under the roots of the ocean."—Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, x. (1797).

La'is (2 syl.), a generic name for a courtezan. Laïs was a Greek hetæra, who sold her favours for £200 English money. When Demosthenēs was told the fee, he said he had "no mind to buy repentance at such a price." One of her great admirers was Diog'enēs the cynic.

> This is the cause
> That Lais leads a lady's life aloft.
> Gascoigne: The Steele Glas (died 1577).

Lake Poets (The), Wordsworth, Southey, and Coleridge, who lived about the lakes of Cumberland. According to Mr. Jeffrey, the conductor of the Edinburgh Review, they combined the sentimentality of Rousseau with the simplicity of Kotzebue and the homeliness of Cowper. Of the same school were Lamb, Lloyd, and Wilson. Also called "Lakers" and "Lakists."

Laked'ion (Isaac), the name given in France to the Wandering Jew (q.v.).

Lalla Rookh, the supposed daughter of Aurungzebe emperor of Delhi. She was betrothed to Alfris sultan of Lesser Bucharia. On her journey from Delhi to Cashmere, she was entertained by Fer'amorz, a young Persian poet, with whom she fell in love; and unbounded was her delight when she discovered that the young poet was the sultan to whom she was betrothed.—Moore: Lalla Rookh (1817).

Lambert (General), parliamentary leader.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Lambert (Sir John), the dupe of Dr. Cantwell "the hypocrite." He entertains him as his guest, settles on him £4000 a year, and tries to make his daughter Charlotte marry him, although he is 59 and she is under 20. His eyes are opened at length by the mercenary and licentious conduct of the doctor. Lady Lambert assists in exposing him, but old lady Lambert remains to the last a believer in the "saint." In Molière's comedy, "Orgon" takes the place of Lambert, "Mme. Parnelle" of the old lady, and "Tartuffe" of Dr. Cantwell.

Lady Lambert, the gentle, loving wife of sir John. By a stratagem, she convinces him of Dr. Cantwell's true character.

Colonel Lambert, son of sir John and lady Lambert. He assists in unmasking "the hypocrite."

Charlotte Lambert, daughter of sir John and lady Lambert. A pretty, bright girl, somewhat giddy and fond of teasing her sweetheart Darnley (see act i. 1).—Bickerstaff: The Hypocrite (1769).

Lambourne (Michael), a retainer of the earl of Leicester.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Lambro, a Greek pirate, father of Haidée (q.v.).—Byron: Don Juan, iii. 26, etc. (1820).

We confess that our sympathy is most excited by the silent, wolf-like suffering of Lambro, when he experiences "the solitude of passing his own door without a welcome," and finds "the innocence of that sweet child" polluted.—Finden: Byron Beauties.

(The original of this character was major Lambro, who was captain (1791) of a Russian piratical squadron, which plundered the islands of the Greek Archipelago, and did great damage. When his squadron was attacked by seven Algerine corsairs, major Lambro was wounded, but escaped. The incidents referred to in canto vi., etc., are historical.)

Lamderg and Gelchossa. Gelchossa was beloved by Lamderg and Ullin son of Cairbar. The rivals fought, and Ullin fell. Lamderg, all bleeding with wounds, just reached Gelchossa to announce the death of his rival, and expired also. "Three days Gelchossa mourned, and then the hunters found her cold," and all three were buried in one grave.—Ossian: Fingal, ii.

Lame (The).

Jehan de Meung (1260-1320), called "Clopinel," because he was lame and bobbled.

Tyrtæus, the Greek poet, was called the lame or hobbling poet, because he introduced the pentameter verse alternately with the hexameter. Thus his distich consisted of one line with six feet and one line with only five.

The Lame King, Charles II. of Naples, Boiteux (1248, 1289-1309).

Lame Lover (The), by Foote (1770). (See LUKE.)

Lamech's Song. "Ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech: for I have slain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt! If Cain shall be avenged sevenfold, truly Lamech seventy and sevenfold."—Gen. iv. 23, 24.

As Lemech grew old, his eyes became dim, and finally all sight was taken from them, and Tubal-cain, his son, led him by the hand when he walked abroad. And it came to pass . . . that he led his father into the fields to hunt, and said to his father: "Lo! yonder is a beast of prey; shoot thine arrow in that direction." Lemech did as his son had spoken, and the arrow struck Cain, who was walking afar off, and killed him. . . . Now when Lemech . . . saw [sic] that he had killed Cain, he trembled exceedingly, . . . and being blind, he saw not his son, but struck the lad's head between his hands, and killed him. . . . And he cried to his wives, Ada and Zillah, "Listen to my voice, ye wives of Lemech. . . . I have slain a man to my hurt, and a child to my wounding!"—The Talmud, i. (See LOKI.)

Lamia, a poem by Keats, of a young man who married a lamia (or serpent), which had assumed the form of a beautiful woman (1820).

The idea is borrowed from Philostratus, De Vita Apollonii, bk. iv. (See Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy.)

Lamin'ak, Basque fairies, little folk, who live under ground, and sometimes come into houses down the chimney, in order to change a fairy child for a human one. They bring good luck with them, but insist on great cleanliness, and always give their orders in words the very opposite of their intention. They hate church-bells. Every Basque familiar is named Guillen (William). (See SAY AND MEAN.)

Lamington, a follower of sir Geoffrey Peveril.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Lami'ra, wife of Champernel, and daughter of Vertaigné (2 syl.) a nobleman and a judge.—Fletcher: The Little French Lawyer (1647).

Lamkin (Mrs. Alice), companion to Mrs. Bethune Baliol.—Sir W. Scott: The Highland Widow (time, George II.).

Lammas. At latter Lammas, never; equivalent to Suetonius's "Greek kalends."

Lammas Day is "Loaf-Mass" Day (August 1), on which occurred a special festival for the blessing of bread.

Lammikin, a blood-thirsty builder, who built and baptized his castle with blood. He was long a nursery ogre, like Lunsford.—Scotch Ballad.

Lammle (Alfred), a "mature young gentleman, with too much nose on his face, too much ginger in his whiskers, too much torso in his waistcoat, too much sparkle in his studs, his eyes, his buttons, his talk, his teeth." He married Miss Akershem, thinking she had money, and she married him under the same delusion; and the two kept up a fine appearance on nothing at all. Alfred Lammle had many schemes for making money: one was to oust Rokesmith from his post of secretary to Mr. Boffin, and get his wife adopted by Mrs. Boffin in the place of Bella Wilfer; but Mr. Boffin saw through the scheme, and Lammle, with his wife, retired to live on the Continent. In public they appeared very loving and amiable to each other, but led at home a cat-and-dog life.

Sophronia Lammle, wife of Alfred Lammle. "A mature young lady, with raven locks, and complexion that lit up well when well powdered."—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1864).

Lamoracke (Sir), LAMEROCKE, LAMORAKE, LAMOROCK, or LAMARECKE, one of the knights of the Round Table, and one of the three most noted for deeds of prowess. The other two were sir Launcelot and sir Tristram. Sir Lamoracke's father was king Pellinore of Wales, who slew king Lot. His brothers were sir Aglavale and sir Percival; sir Tor, whose mother was the wife of Aries the cowherd, was his half-brother (pt. ii. 108). Sir Lamoracke was detected by the sons of king Lot in adultery with their mother, and they conspired his death.

> Sir Gawain and his three brethren, sir Agrawain, sir Gahĕris, and sir Modred, met him [sir Lamoracke] in a privy place, and there they slew his horse; then they fought with him on foot for more than three hours, both before him and behind his back, and all-to hewed him in pieces.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 144 (1470).

> Roger Ascham says, "The whole pleasure of La Morte d'Arthur standeth in two special poyntes: in open manslaughter and bold bawdye, in which booke thiey are counted the noblest knights that doe kill most men without any quarrell, and commit foulest adulteries by sutlest shiftes: as sir Launcelote with the wife of king Arthur his master, sir Tristram with the wife of king Marke his uncle, and sir Lamerocke with the wife of king Lote that was his aunt."—Works, 254 (fourth edit.).

Lamorce' (2 syl.), a woman of bad reputation, who inveigles young Mirabel into her house, where he would have been murdered by four bravoes, if Oriana, dressed as a page, had not been by.—Farquhar: The Inconstant (1702).

Lamourette's Kiss (A), a kiss of peace when there is no peace; a kiss of apparent reconciliation, but with secret hostility. On July 7, 1792, the abbé Lamourette induced the different factions of the Legislative Assembly of France to lay aside their differences; so the deputies of the Royalists, Constitutionalists, Girondists, Jacobins, and Orleanists, rushed into each others' arms, and the king was sent for, that he might see "how these Christians loved one another;" but the reconciliation was hardly made when the old animosities burst forth more furiously than ever.

Lampad'ion, a lively, petulant courtezan. A name common in the later Greek comedy.

Lam'pedo, of Lacedæmon. She was daughter, wife, sister, and mother of a king. Agrippina was granddaughter, wife, sister, and mother of a king.—Tacitus: Annales, xii. 22, 37.

¶ The wife of Raymond Ber'enger (count of Provence) was grandmother of four kings, for her four daughters married four kings: Margaret married Louis IX. king of France; Eleanor married Henry III. king of England; Sancha married Richard king of the Romans; and Beatrice married Charles I. king of Naples and Sicily.

Lam'pedo, a country apothecary-surgeon, without practice; so poor and ill-fed that he was but "the sketch and outline of a man." He says of himself—

> Altho' to cure men be beyond my skill,
> 'Tis hard, indeed, if I can't keep them ill.
> Tobin: The Honeymoon, iii. 3 (1804).

Lamplugh (Will), a smuggler.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Lance (1 syl.), falconer and ancient servant to the father of Valentine the gallant who would not be persuaded to keep his estate.—Fletcher: Wit without Money (1622).

Lancelot or LAUNCELOT GOBBO, servant of Shylock, famous for his soliloquy whether or not he should run away from his master.—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice (1598).

Tarleton [1530-1588] was inimitable in such parts as "Launcelot," and "Touchstone" in As You Like It. In clowns' parts he never had his equal, and never will.—Baker: Chronicles.

Lancelot du Lac, by Ulrich of Zazikoven, the most ancient poem of the Arthurian series. It is the adventures of a young knight, gay and joyous with animal spirits and light-heartedness. (See LAUNCELOT.)—One of the minnesongs of Germany (twelfth century).

Lancelot du Lac and Tarquin. Sir Lancelot, seeking adventures, met with a lady who prayed him to deliver certain knights of the Round Table from the power of Tarquin. Coming to a river, he saw a copper basin hung on a tree for gong, and he struck it so hard that it broke. This brought out Tarquin, and a furious combat ensued, in which Tarquin was slain. Sir Lancelot then liberated three score and four knights, who had been made captives by Tarquin. (See LAUNCELOT.)—Percy: Reliques, I. ii. 9.

Lancelot of the Laik, a Scotch metrical romance, taken from the French Launcelot du Lac. Galiot, a neighbouring king, invaded Arthur's territories, and captured the castle of lady Melyhalt among others. When sir Lancelot went to chastise Galiot, he saw queen Guinevere, and fell in love with her. The French romance makes Galiot submit to king Arthur; but the Scotch tale terminates with his capture. (See LAUNCELOT.)

Land of Beulah, land of rest, representing that peace of mind which some Christians experience prior to death (Isa. lxii. 4).—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, I. (1678).

Land of Cakes, and brither Scots; i.e. Scotland.—Burns.

Land of Joy. Worms, in Germany, was so called by the minnesingers, from its excellent wine.

Land of Life. This term is frequently met with in the old Celtic romances. The ancient inhabitants of Erin had, in common with other races of antiquity, the vague belief that there somewhere existed a land where people were always youthful, free from care and trouble and disease, and lived for ever. This country went by various names, as Tir-na-nóg, etc. It had its own inhabitants—fairies, but mortals were sometimes brought there, as was Ossian the poet son of Fingal; and while they lived in it were gifted in the same manner as the fairy people themselves, and partook of their pleasures.

Land of Promise. In ancient Gaelic romantic tales, mention is often made of Tir Tairrngire, the Land of Promise, Fairyland, as being one of the chief dwelling-places of the Dedannans or fairy host. In many passages this Land of Promise is identified with Inis-Manann, or the Isle of Man, which was ruled over by Mannanan Mac Lir, the sea-god, and named from him.

Landey'da ["the desolation of the country"], the miraculous banner of the ancient Danes, on which was wrought a raven by the daughters of Regner Lodbrok. It was under this banner that Hardrada and Tostig attacked Harold at the battle of Stamford Bridge, a little before the battle of Senlac (Hastings).

Landi (The Fête of the). Charlemagne showed to pilgrims once a year the relics of the chapel in Aix-la-Chapelle. Charles le Chauve removed the relics to Paris, and exhibited them once a year in a large field near the boulevard St. Denis [D'nee]. A procession was subsequently formed, and a fair held the first Monday after St. Barnabas's Day.

Le mot Latin indictum signifie un jour et un lieu indiqués pour quelque assemblée du peuple. L'i, changé d'abord en e, le fut définitivement en a. On dit donc successivement, au lieu d'indictum; l'indict, l'endit, l'andit, et enfin landi.—Dumas: L'Horoscope, I.

Landois (Peter), the favourite minister of the duc de Bretagne.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Landscape Gardening (Father of), Lenotre (1613-1700).

Lane (Jane), daughter of Thomas, and sister of colonel John Lane. So save king Charles II. after the battle of Worcester, she rode behind him from Bentley, in Staffordshire, to the house of her cousin Mrs. Norton, near Bristol. For this act of loyalty, the king granted the family the following armorial device: a strawberry horse saliant (couped at the flank), bridled, bitted, and garnished, supporting between its feet a royal crown proper. Motto: Garde le roy.

Lane (The), Drury Lane.

There were married actresses in his company when he managed the Garden and afterwards the Lane.—Temple Bar (W. C. Macready), 76 (1875).

Laneham (Master Robert), clerk of the council-chamber door.

Sybil Laneham, his wife, one of the revellers at Kenilworth Castle.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Langcale (The laird of), a leader of the covenanters' army.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Langley (Sir Frederick), a suitor to Miss Vere, and one of the Jacobite conspirators with the laird of Ellieslaw.—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Langosta (Duke of), the Spanish nickname of Aosta the elected king of Spain. The word means "a locust" or "plunderer."

Language (The Primæval).

(1) Psammetichus, an Egyptian king, wishing to ascertain what language Nature gave to man, shut up two infants where no word was ever uttered in their hearing. When brought before the king, they said, bekos ("toast").—Herodotos, ii. 2.

(2) Frederick II. of Sweden tried the same experiment.

(3) James IV. of Scotland, in the fifteenth century, shut up two infants in the Isle of Inchkeith, with only a dumb attendant to wait on them, with the same object in view.

Language Characteristics.

Charles Quint used to say, "I speak German to my horses, Spanish to my household, French to my friends, and Italian to my mistress."

¶ The Persians say, the serpent in paradise spoke Arabic (the most suasive of all languages); Adam and Eve spoke Persian (the most poetic of all languages); and the angel Gabriel spoke Turkish (the most menacing of all languages).—Chardin: Travels (1686).

L'Italien se parle aux dames;
Le Français se parle aux savants (or) aux hommes;
L'Anglais se parle aux oiseaux;
L'Allemand se parle aux chiens;
L'Espagnol se parle à Dieu.

Language given to Man to Conceal his Thoughts. Said by Montrond, but generally ascribed to Talleyrand. (See TALLEYRAND.)

Languish (Lydia), a romantic young lady, who is for ever reading sensational novels, and moulding her behaviour on the characters which she reads of in these books of fiction. Hence she is a very female Quixote in romantic notions of a sentimental type (see act i. 2).—Sheridan: The Rivals (1775).

Miss Mellon [1775-1837] called on Sheridan, and was requested to read the scenes of Lydia Languish and Mrs. Malaprop from The Rivals. She felt frightened, and answered, with the naïve, unaffected manner which she retained through life, "I dare not, sir; I would rather read to all England. But suppose, sir, you do me the honour of reading them to me?" There was something so unassuming and childlike in the request, that the manager entered into the oddity of it, and read to her nearly the whole play.—Boaden.

Lan'o, a Scandinavian lake, which emitted in autumn noxious vapours.

He dwells at the waters of Lano, which sends forth the vapour of death.—The War of Inis-Thona.

Lanternize (To) is to spend one's time in literary trifles, to write books, to waste time in "brown studies," etc.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, v. 33 (1545).

Lantern-Land, the land of authors, whose works are their lanterns. The inhabitants, called "Lanterners" (Lanternois), are bachelors and masters of arts, doctors and professors, prelates and divines of the council of Trent, and all other wise ones of the earth. Here are the lanterns of Aristotle, Epicūros, and Aristophănēs; the dark earthen lantern of Epictētos, the duplex lantern of Martial, and many others. The sovereign was a queen when Pantag'ruel visited the realm to make inquiry about the "Oracle of the Holy Bottle."—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, v. 32, 33 (1545).

Lanternois, pretenders to science, quacks of all sorts, and authors generally. They are the inhabitants of Lantern-land, and their literary productions are "lanterns."—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, v. 32, 33 (1545).

Laocoon [La.ok'.o.on], a Trojan priest, who, with his two sons, was crushed to death by serpents. Thomson, in his Liberty, iv., has described the group, which represents these three in their death-agony. The group was discovered in 1506, in the baths of Titus, and is now in the Vatican. It was sculptured at the command of Titus by Agesander, Polydorus, and Athenodorus, in the fifth century B.C.—Virgil: Æneid, ii. 201-227.

Laodami'a, wife of Protesila'os who was slain at the siege of Troy. She prayed that she might be allowed to converse with her dead husband for three hours, and her request was granted; but when her husband returned to hadês, she accompanied him thither.

(Wordsworth has a poem on this subject, entitled Laodamia.)

Laodice'a, now Latakí'a, noted for its tobacco and sponge. (See Rev. iii. 14-18.)

Laon. (See REVOLT OF ISLAM.)

Lapet (Mons.), a model of poltroonery, the very "Ercles' Vein" of fanatical cowardice. M. Lapet would fancy the world out of joint if no one gave him a tweak of the nose or lug of the ear. He was the author of a book on the "punctilios of duelling."—Fletcher: Nice Valour or The Passionate Madman (1647).

Lappet, the "glory of all chambermaids."—Fielding: The Miser (1732).

Lapraick (Laurie), friend of Steenie Steenson, in Wandering Willie's tale.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Laprel, the rabbit, in the beast-epic entitled Reynard the Fox, by Heinrich von Alkmaar (1498).

Laputa, the flying island, inhabited by scientific quacks. This is the "Lantern-land" of Rabelais, where wise ones lanternized, and were so absorbed in thought that attendants, called "Flappers," were appointed to flap them on the mouth and ears with blown bladders when their attention to mundane matters was required.—Swift: Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Laputa," 1726).

Lara, the name assumed by Conrad the corsair after the death of Medo'ra. On his return to his native country, he was recognized by sir Ezzelin at the table of lord Otho, and charged home by him. Lara arranged a duel for the day following, but sir Ezzelin disappeared mysteriously. Subsequently, Lara headed a rebellion, and was shot by Otho.—Byron: Lara (1814).

Lara (The Seven Sons of), sons of Gonzalez Gustios de Lara, a Castilian hero, brother of Ferdinand Gonzalez count of Castile. A quarrel having arisen between Gustios and Rodrigo Velasques his brother-in-law, Rodrigo caused him to be imprisoned in Cor'dova, and then allured his seven nephews into a ravine, where they were all slain by an ambuscade, after performing prodigies of valour. While in prison, Zaïda, daughter of Almanzor the Moorish prince, fell in love with Gustios, and became the mother of Mudarra, who avenged the death of his seven brothers (A.D. 993).

Lope de Vega has made this the subject of a Spanish drama, which has several imitations, one by Mallefille, in 1836. (See Ferd. Denis: Chroniques Chevaleresques d' Espagne, 1839.)

Larder (The Douglas), the flour, meal, wheat, and malt of Douglas Castle, emptied on the floor by good lord James Douglas, in 1307, when he took the castle from the English garrison. Having staved in all the barrels of food, he next emptied all the wine and ale, and then, having slain the garrison, threw the dead bodies into this disgusting mess, "to eat, drink, and be merry."—Sir W. Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, ix.

¶ Wallace's Larder is a similar mess. It consisted of the dead bodies of the garrison of Ardrossan, in Ayrshire, cast into the dungeon keep. The castle was surprised by him in the reign of Edward I.

Lardoon (Lady Bab), a caricature of fine life, the "princess of dissipation," and the "greatest gamester of the times." She becomes engaged to sir Charles Dupely, and says, "To follow fashion where we feel shame, is the strongest of all hypocrisy, and from this moment I renounce it."—Burgoyne: The Maid of the Oaks (1779).

La Roche, a Swiss pastor, travelling through France with his daughter Margaret, was taken ill, and like to die. There was only a wayside inn in the place, but Hume the philosopher heard of the circumstance, and removed the sick man to his own house. Here, with good nursing, La Roche recovered, and a strong friendship sprang up between the two. Hume even accompanied La Roche to his manse in Berne. After the lapse of three years, Hume was informed that Mademoiselle was about to be married to a young Swiss officer, and hastened to Berne to be present at the wedding. On reaching the neighbourhood, he observed some men filling up a grave, and found on inquiry that Mademoiselle had just died of a broken heart. In fact, her lover had been shot in a duel, and the shock was too much for her. The old pastor bore up heroically, and Hume admired the faith which could sustain a man in such an affliction.—Mackenzie: The Story of La Roche (in The Mirror).

Lars, the emperor or over-king of the ancient Etruscans. A khedive, satrap, or under-king, was called lŭcŭmo. Thus the king of Prussia, as emperor of Germany, is lars, but the king of Bavaria is a lucumo.

Larthmor, petty king of Ber'rathon, one of the Scandinavian islands. He was dethroned by his son Uthal, but Fingal sent Ossian and Toscar to his aid. Uthal was slain in single combat, and Larthmor restored to his throne.—Ossian: Berrathon.

Larthon, the leader of the Fir-bolg or Belgæ of Britain who settled in the southern parts of Ireland.

> Larthon, the first of Bolga's race who travelled in the winds. White-bosomed spread the sails of the king towards streamy Inisfail [Ireland]. Dun night was rolled before him, with its skirts of mist. Unconstant blew the winds and rolled him from wave to wave.—Ossian: Temora, vii.

La Saisiaz (Savoyard for "The Sun"), a poem by R. Browning (1878). The name of a villa in the mountains near Geneva, where Mr. and Mrs. Browning and a friend spent part of the summer of 1877. The friend died very suddenly, and the poem is Browning's "In Memoriam." Compare La Saisiaz with Tennyson's In Memoriam.

Last Words. (See "Dying Sayings," in The Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, pp. 395-398.)

Lath'erum, the barber at the Black Bear inn, at Darlington.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Lathmon, son of Nuäth a British prince. He invaded Morven while Fingal was in Ireland with his army; but Fingal returned unexpectedly. At dead of night, Ossian (Fingal's son) and his friend Gaul the son of Morni went to the enemy's camp, and "struck the shield" to arouse the sleepers. Then rush they on, and a great slaughter ensues in the panic. Lathmon sees the two opponents moving off, and sends a challenge to Ossian; so Ossian returns, and the duel begins. Lathmon flings down his sword, and submits; and Fingal, coming up, conducts Lathmon to his "feast of shells." After passing the night in banquet and song, Fingal dismisses his guest next morning, saying, "Lathmon, retire to thy place; turn thy battles to other lands. The race of Morven are renowned, and their foes are the sons of the unhappy."—Ossian: Lathmon.

 In Oithona he is again introduced, and Oithona is called Lathmon's brother.

Lat'imer (Mr. Ralph), the supposed father of Darsie Latimer, alias sir Arthur Darsie Redgauntlet.

Lati'nus, king of the Laurentians, who first opposed Æne'as, but afterwards formed an alliance with him, and gave him his daughter Lavinia in marriage.—Virgil: Æneid.

Lati'nus, an Italian, who went with his five sons to the siege of Jerusalem. His eldest son was slain by Solyman; the second son, Aramantês, running to his brother's aid, was next slain; then the third son, Sabi'nus; and lastly Picus and Laurentês, who were twins. The father, having lost his five sons, rushed madly on the soldan, and was slain also. In one hour fell the father and five sons.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Latmian Swain (The), Endym'ion. So called because it was on mount Latmos, in Caria, that Cinthia (the moon) descended to hold converse with him.

Thou didst not, Cinthia, scorn the Latmian swain.
Ovid: Art of Love, iii.

Lato'na, mother of Apollo (the sun) and Diana (the moon). Some Lycian hinds jeered at her as she knelt by a fountain in Delos to drink, and were changed into frogs.

As when those hinds that were transformed to frogs
Railed at Latona's twin-born progeny,
Which after held the sun and moon in fee.

I became as mad as the disciples of Porcius Latro, who, when they had made themselves as pale as their master by drinking decoctions of cumin, imagined themselves as learned.—Lesage: Gil Blas, vii. 9 (1735)

Laud (Archbishop). One day, when the archbishop was about to say grace before dinner, Archie Armstrong, the royal jester, begged permission of Charles I. to perform the office instead. The request being granted, the wise fool said, "All praise to God, and little Laud to the devil!" the point of which is increased by the fact that Laud was a very small man.

Lauderdale (The duke of), president of the privy council.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Laughing Philosopher (The), Democ'ritos of Abde'ra (B.C. 460–357), who laughed or jeered at the feeble powers of man so wholly in the hands of fate, that nothing he did or said was uncontrolled.

(The "Crying Philosopher" was Heraclitos.)

¶ Dr. Jeddler, the philosopher, looked upon the world as a "great practical joke, something too absurd to be considered seriously by any rational man."—Dickens: The Battle of Life (1846).

Laughter is situated in the midriff.

Here sportful laughter dwells, here, ever sitting,
Defies all lumpish griefs and wrinkled care.
Phineas Fletcher: The Purple Island (1633).

Laughter (Death from). A fellow in rags told Chalchas the soothsayer that he would never drink the wine of the grapes growing in his vineyard; and added, "If these words do not come true, you may claim me for your slave." When the wine was made, Chalchas made a feast, and sent for the fellow to see how his prediction had failed; and when he appeared, the soothsayer laughed so immoderately at the would-be prophet that he died.—Lytton: Tales of Miletus, iv.

¶ Very similar is the tale of Ancæos. This king of the Lelĕgés, in Samos, planted a vineyard, but was warned by one of his slaves that he would never live to taste the wine thereof. Wine was made from the grapes, and the king sent for his slave, and said, "What do you think of your prophecy now?" The slave made answer, "There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip;" and the words were scarcely uttered, when the king rushed from table to drive out of his vineyard a boar which was laying waste the vines, but was killed in the encounter.—Pausanias.

¶ Crassus died from laughter on seeing an ass eat thistles. Margutte the giant died of laughter on seeing an ape trying to pull on his boots. Philemon or Philomēnēs died of laughter on seeing an ass eat the figs provided for his own dinner (Lucian, i. 2). Zeuxis died of laughter at sight of a hag which he had just depicted.

¶ April 19, 1782, Mrs. Fitzherbert died from laughter at the way C. Banister portrayed "Polly" in Gay's Beggar's Opera (1727), at Drury Lane Theatre.

Launay (Vicomte de), pseudonym of Mme. Emile de Girardin (née Delphine Gay).

Launce, the clownish servant of Protheus one of the two "gentlemen of Verona." He is in love with Julia. Launce is especially famous for soliloquies to his dog Crab, "the sourest-natured dog that lives." Speed is the serving-man of Valentine the other "gentleman."—Shakespeare: The Two Gentlemen of Verona (1594).

Launcelot, bard to the countess Brenhilda's father.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Launcelot (Sir), originally called Galahad, was the son of Ban king of Benwick (Brittany) and his wife Elein (pt. i. 60). He was stolen in infancy by Vivienne the Lady of the Lake, who brought him up till he was presented to king Arthur and knighted. In consequence, he is usually called sir Launcelot du Lac. He was in "the eighth degree [or generation] of our Saviour" (pt. iii. 35); was uncle to sir Bors de Ganis (pt. iii. 4); his brother was sir Ector de Maris (pt. ii. 127); and his son, by Elaine daughter of king Pelles, was sir Galahad, the chastest of the 150 knights of the Round Table, and therefore allotted to the "Siege Perilous" and the quest of the holy graal, which he achieved. Sir Launcelot had from time to time a glimpse of the holy graal; but in consequence of his amours with queen Guenever, was never allowed more than a distant and fleeting glance of it (pt. iii. 18, 22, 45).

Sir Launcelot was the strongest and bravest of the 150 knights of the Round Table; the two next were sir Tristram and sir Lamoracke. His adultery with queen Guenever was directly or indirectly the cause of the death of king Arthur, the breaking up of the Round Table, and the death of most of the knights. The tale runs thus: Mordred and Agravain hated sir Launcelot, told the king he was too familiar with the queen, and, in order to make good their charge, persuaded Arthur to go a-hunting. While absent in the chase, the queen sent for sir Launcelot to her private chamber, when Mordred, Agravain, and twelve other knights beset the door, and commanded him to come forth. In coming forth he slew sir Agravain and the twelve knights; but Mordred escaped, and told the king, who condemned Guenever to be burnt to death. She was brought to the stake, but rescued by sir Launcelot, who carried her off to Joyous Guard, near Carlisle. The king besieged the castle, but received a bull from the pope, commanding him to take back the queen. This he did, but refused to be reconciled to sir Launcelot, who accordingly left the realm and went to Benwick. Arthur crossed over with an army to besiege Benwick, leaving Mordred regent. The traitor Mordred usurped the crown, and tried to make the queen marry him; but she rejected his proposal with contempt. When Arthur heard thereof, he returned, and fought three battles with his nephew, in the last of which Mordred was slain, and the king received from his nephew his death-wound. The queen now retired to the convent of Almesbury, where she was visited by sir Launcelot; but as she refused to leave the convent, sir Launcelot turned monk, died "in the odour of sanctity," and was buried in Joyous Guard (pt. iii. 143–175).

"Ah! sir Launcelot," said sir Ector; "thou were [or art] head of all Christian knights." "I dare say," said sir Bors, "that sir Launcelot there thou liest, thou were never matched of none earthly knight's hand; and thou were the courteoust knight that ever bare shield; and thou were the truest friend to thy lover that ever bestrode horse; and thou were the truest lover of sinfull man that ever loved woman; and thou were the kindest man that ever struck with sword; and thou were the goodliest person that ever came among press of knights; and thou were the meekest man and the gentlest that ever eat in hall among ladies; and thou were the sternest knight to thy mortal foe that ever put spear in rest."—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 176 (1470).

N.B.—The Elaine above referred to is not the Elaine of Astolat, the heroine of Tennyson's Idyll. Sir Ector de Maris is not sir Ector the foster-father of king Arthur; and sir Bors de Ganis must be kept distinct from sir Bors of Gaul, and also from sir Borre or sir Bors a natural son of king Arthur by Lyonors daughter of the earl Sanam (pt. i. 15).

Sir Launcelot and Elaine. The Elaine of Tennyson's Idyll, called the "fair maid of Astolat," was the daughter of sir Bernard lord of Astolat, and her two brothers were sir Tirre (not sir Torre, as Tennyson writes the word) and Lavaine (pt. iii. 122). The whole tale, and the beautiful picture of Elaine taken by the old dumb servitor down the river to the king's palace, is all borrowed from sir T. Malory's compilaton. "The fair maid of Astolat" asked sir Launcelot to marry her, but the knight replied, "Fair damsel, I thank you, but certainly cast me never to be married;" and when the maid asked if she might be ever with him without being wed, he made answer, "Mercy defend me, no!" "Then," said Elaine, "I needs must die for love of you;" and when sir Launcelot quitted Astolat, she drooped and died. But before she died she called her brother, sir Tirre (not sir Lavaine, as Tennyson says, because sir Lavaine went with sir Launcelot as his 'squire), and dictated the letter her brother was to write, and spake thus—

"While my body is whole, let this letter be put into my right hand, and my hand bound fast with the letter until that I be cold, and let me be put in a fair bed, with all my richest clothes . . . and be laid in a chariot to the next place, whereas the Thames is, and there let me be put in a barge, and but one man with me . . . to steer me thither, and that my barge be covered with black samite.' . . . So her father granted . . . that all this should be done, . . . and she died. And so, when she was dead, the corpse and the bed . . . were put in a barge, . . . and the man steered the barge to Westminster.—Pt. iii. 123.

The narrative then goes on to say that king Arthur had the letter read, and commanded the corpse to be buried right royally, and all the knights then present made offerings over her grave. Not only the tale, but much of the verbiage, has been appropriated by Tennyson.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur (1470).

Launcelot and Guenever. Sir Launcelot was chosen by king Arthur to conduct Guenever (his bride) to court; and then began that disloyalty between them which lasted to the end.

¶ Gottfried, the German minnesinger (twelfth century) who wrote the tale of sir Tristan [our Tristram], makes king Mark send Tristan to Ireland, to conduct Yseult to Cornwall, and then commenced that disloyalty between sir Tristram and his uncle's wife, which also lasted to the end, and was the death of both.

Launcelot Mad. Sir Launcelot, having offended the queen, was so vexed, that he went mad for two years, half raving and half melancholy. Being partly cured by a vision of the holy graal, he settled for a time in Joyous Isle, under the assumed name of Le Chevalier Mal-Fet. His deeds of prowess soon got blazed abroad, and brought about him certain knights of the Round Table, who prevailed on him to return to court. Then followed the famous quest of the holy graal. The quest of the graal is the subject of a minnesong by Wolfram (thirteenth century), entitled Parzival. (In the History of Prince Arthur, compiled by sir T. Malory, it is Galahad son of sir Launcelot, not Percival, who accomplished the quest.)

∴ The madness of Orlando, by Ariosto, resembles that of sir Launcelot.

Launcelot a Monk. When sir Launcelot discovered that Guenever was resolved to remain a nun, he himself retired to a monastery, and was consecrated a hermit by the bishop of Canterbury. After twelve months, he was miraculously summoned to Almesbury, to remove to Glastonbury the queen, who was at the point of death. Guenever died half an hour before sir Launcelot arrived, and he himself died soon afterwards (pt. iii. 174). The bishop in attendance on the dying knight affirmed that "he saw angels heave sir Launcelot up to heaven, and the gates of paradise open to receive him" (pt. iii. 175). Sir Bors, his nephew, discovered the dead body in the cell, and had it buried with all honours at Joyous Guard (pt. iii. 175).—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur (1470); and also Walter Mapes.

When sir Bors and his fellows came to his (sir Launcelot's) bed, they found him stark dead, and he lay as he had smiled, and the sweetest savour about him that ever they smelled.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 175 (1470).

N.B.—When sir Launcelot quitted the court of Arthur and retired to Benwick, he intended to found religious houses every ten miles between Sandwich and Carlisle, and to visit every one of them barefoot; but king Arthur made war upon him, and put an end to this intention.

∴ Other particulars of sir Launcelot. The tale of sir Launcelot was first composed in monkish Latin, and was translated by Walter Mapes (about 1180). Robert de Borron wrote a French version, and sir T. Malory took his History of Prince Arthur from the French, the third part being chiefly confined to the adventures and death of this favourite knight. There is a metrical romance called La Charrette, begun by Chrestiens de Troyes (twelfth century), and finished by Geoffrey de Ligny.

Launcelot, the man of Mons. Thomas. (See LANCELOT.)—Fletcher: Mons. Thomas (1619).

Launfal (Sir), steward of king Arthur. Detesting queen Gwennere, he retired to Carlyoun, and fell in love with a lady named Tryamour. She gave him an unfailing purse, and told him if he ever wished to see her, all he had to do was to retire into a private room, and she would be instantly with him. Sir Launfal now returned to court, and excited much attention by his great wealth. Gwennere made advances to him, but he told her she was not worthy to kiss the feet of the lady to whom he was devoted. At this repulse, the angry queen complained to the king, and declared to him that she had been most grossly insulted by his steward. Arthur bade sir Launfal produce this paragon of women. On her arrival, sir Launfal was allowed to accompany her to the isle of Ole'ron; and no one ever saw him afterwards.—T. Chestre: Sir Launfal (a metrical romance, time, Henry VI.).

(James Russell Lowell has a poem entitled The Vision of Sir Launfal.)

Laura, niece of duke Gondibert, loved by two brothers, Arnold and Hugo, the latter dwarfed in stature. Laura herself loved Arnold; but both brothers were slain in the faction fight stirred up by prince Oswald against duke Gondibert. (For this faction fight, see GONDIBERT.) As the tale was never finished, we have no key to the poet's intention respecting Laura.—Davenant: Gondibert (died 1668).

Laura, a Venetian lady, who married Beppo. Beppo, being taken captive, turned Turk, joined a band of pirates, and grew rich. He then returned to his wife, made himself known to her, and "had his claim allowed." Laura is represented as a frivolous mixture of millinery and religion. She admires her husband's turban, and dreads his new religion. "Are you really, truly now a Turk?" she says. "Well, that's the prettiest shawl! Will you give it me? They say you eat no pork. Bless me! Did I ever? No, I never saw a man grown so yellow! How's your liver?" and so she rattles on.—Byron: Beppo (1820).

We never read of Laura without being reminded of Addison's Dissection of a Coquette's Heart, in the endless intricacies of which nothing could be distinctly made out but the image of a flame-coloured hood.—Finden: Byron Beauties.

Laura and Petrarch. Some say La belle Laure was only an hypothetical name used by the poet to hang the incidents of his life and love on. If a real person, it was Laura de Noves, the wife of Hugues de Sade of Avignon, and she died of the plague in 1348.

Think you, if Laura had been Petrarch's wife,
He would have written sonnets all his life?
Byron: Don Juan, iii. 8 (1820).

Laurence (Friar), the good friar who promises to marry Romeo and Juliet. He supplies Juliet with the sleeping draught, to enable her to quit her home without arousing scandal or suspicion. (See LAWRENCE.)—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet (1597).

Laurringtons (The), a novel by Mrs. Trollope, a satire on "superior people," the bustling Bothebys of society (1843).

Lausus, son of Mezentius, king of the Rutulians, on the side of Turnus. In the Æne'id (bk. vii.), Virgil greatly praises his bravery, and holds him up as a model of filial piety. In bk. x. he tells how Lausus, in defending his father, met with his death. Mezentius being wounded by Ænēas, Lausus throws himself between the combatants, and gives his father time to escape. Ænēas, furious at being thus thwarted, turns upon Lausus and slays him.

Lauzun (The duke de), a courtier in the court of Louis XIV. Licentious, light-hearted, unprincipled, and extravagant. In order to make a market, he supplanted La Vallière by Mme. de Montespan in the king's favour. Montespan thought Lauzun loved her; but when he proposed to La Vallière, the discarded favourite, Montespan kicked him over. The duke, in revenge, persuaded the king to banish the lady, and when La Vallière took the veil, the king sent Mme. de Montespan this cutting epistle—

> We do not blame you; blame belongs to love,
> And love had nought with you.
> The duke de Lauzun, of these lines the bearer,
> Confirms their purport. From our royal court
> We do excuse your presence.
> Lord Lytton: The Duchess de la Vallière, v. 5 (1836).

Lavaine (Sir), brother of Elaine, and son of the lord of As'tolat. Young, brave, and knightly. He accompanied sir Lancelot when he went to tilt for the ninth diamond.—Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("Elaine").

Lavalette (3 syl.), condemned to death for sending to Napoleon secret intelligence of Government despatches. He was set at liberty by his wife, who took his place in prison, but became a confirmed lunatic.

¶ Lord Nithsdale escaped in a similar manner from the Tower of London. His wife disguised him as her maid, and he passed the sentries without being detected.

La Vallière (Louise duchess de), betrothed to the marquis de Bragelonê (4 syl.), but in love with Louis XIV., whose mistress she became. Conscience accused her, and she fled to a convent; but the king took her out, and brought her to Versailles. He soon forsook her for Mme. de Montespan, and advised her to marry. This message almost broke her heart, and she said, "I will choose a bridegroom without delay." Accordingly, she took the veil of a Carmelite nun, and discovered that Bragelonê was a monk. Mme. de Montespan was banished from the court by the capricious monarch.—Lord Lytton: The Duchess de la Vallière (1836). (See LAUZUN.)

Lavender's Blue.

> When I am king, little finger, you shall be queen."
> "Who told you so, thumby? Thumby, who told you so?"
> "'Twas my own heart, little finger, that told me so."
> "When you are dead, little finger, as it may hap,
> You shall be buried, little finger, under the tap."
> "For why? for why, thumby? Thumby, for why?"
> "That you may drink, little finger, when you are dry."

Lavin'ia, daughter of Latinus, betrothed to Turnus king of the Rutuli. When Æne'as landed in Italy, Latinus made an alliance with him, and promised to give him Lavinia to wife. This brought on a war between Turnus and Æneas, that was decided by single combat, in which Æneas was the victor.—Virgil: Æneid.

Lavinia, daughter of Titus Andron'icus a Roman general employed against the Goths. She was betrothed to Bassia'nus, brother of Saturnius emperor of Rome. Being defiled by the sons of Tam'ora queen of the Goths, her hands were cut off and her tongue plucked out. At length her father Titus killed her, saying, "I am as woeful as Virginius was, and have a thousand times more cause than he to do this outrage."—(?) Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus (1593).

(In the play, Andronicus is always called An-dron'-i-kus, but in classic authors it is An-dro-ni'-kus.)

Lavin'ia, sister of lord Al'tamont, and wife of Horatio.—Rowe: The Fair Penitent (1703).

Lavinia and Pale'mon. Lavinia was the daughter of Acasto patron of Palemon, from whom his "liberal fortune took its rise." Acasto lost his property, and, dying, left a widow and daughter in very indigent circumstances. Palemon often sought them out, but could never find them. One day, a lovely modest maiden came to glean in Palemon's fields. The young squire was greatly struck with her exceeding beauty and modesty, but did not dare ally himself with a pauper. Upon inquiry, he found that the beautiful gleaner was the daughter of Acasto; he proposed marriage, and Lavinia "blushed assent."—Thomson: Seasons ("Autumn," 1730).

¶ The resemblance between this tale and the Bible story of Ruth and Boaz must be obvious to every one.

Lavinian Shore (The), Italy. Lavinium was a town of Latium, founded by Æne'as in honour of his wife Lavinia.

> From the rich Lavinian shore,
> Your market come to store.

> Shakespeare.

Law of Athens (The). By Athenian law, a father could dispose of his daughter in marriage as he liked. Egēus pleaded this law, and demanded that his daughter Hermia should marry Demētrius or suffer the penalty of the law; if she will not > Consent to marry with Demetrius,

> I beg the ancient privilege of Athens;
> As she is mine, I may dispose of her:
> Which shall be either to this gentleman,
> Or to her death; according to our law.
> Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, act i. sc. 1 (1592).

Law of Flanders (The). Charles "the Good" earl of Flanders made a law that a serf, unless legally emancipated, was always a serf, and that whoever married a serf became a serf. S. Knowles has founded his tragedy called The Provost of Bruges on this law (1836).

Law of Lombardy (The).

> We have a law peculiar to this realm,
> That subjects to a mortal penalty
> All women nobly born . . . who, to the shame
> Of chastity, o'erleap its thorny bounds,
> To wanton in the flowery path of pleasure.
> Act ii. sc. 2.

On this law Robert Jephson has founded the following tragedy: The duke Bire'no, heir to the crown, falsely charges the princess Sophia of incontinence. The villainy of the duke being discovered, he is slain in combat by a Briton named Paladore, and the victor marries the princess (1779).

Law of the Road. (See ROAD.)

Law's Bubble, the famous Mississippi scheme, devised by John Law (1716–1720).

Law's Tale (The Man of), the tale about Custance, daughter of the emperor of Rome, affianced to the sultan of Syria. On the wedding night the sultan's mother murdered all the bridal party for apostacy, except Custance, whom she turned adrift in a ship. The ship stranded on the shores of Britain, where Custance was rescued by the lord-constable of Northumberland, whose wife, Hermegild, became much attached to her. A young knight wished to marry Custance, but she declined his suit; whereupon he murdered Hermegild, and then laid the knife beside Custance, to make it appear that she had committed the deed. King Alla, who tried the case, soon discovered the truth, executed the knight, and married Custance. Now was repeated the same infamy as occurred to her in Syria: the queen-mother Donegild disapproved of the match, and, during the absence of her son in Scotland, embarked Custance and her infant son in the same ship, which she turned adrift. After floating about for five years, it was taken in tow by the Roman fleet on its return from Syria, and Custance was put under the charge of a Roman senator. It so happened that Alla was at Rome at the very time on a pilgrimage, met his wife, and they returned to Northumberland together.

(This story is found in Gower, who probably took it from the French chronicle of Nicholas Trivet.)

¶ A similar story forms the outline of Emărê (3 syl.), a romance in Ritson's collection.

(The knight murdering Hermegild, etc., resembles an incident in the French Roman de la Violette, the English metrical romance of Le Bone Florence of Rome (in Ritson), and also a tale in the Gesta Romanorum, 69.)

Lawford (Mr.), the town clerk of Middlemas.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Lawrence (Friar), a Franciscan who undertakes to marry Romeo and Juliet. (See LAURENCE.)

Lawrence (Tom), alias "Tyburn Tom" or Tuck, a highwayman. (See LAURENCE.)—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

La Writ, a little wrangling French advocate.—Fletcher: The Little French Lawyer (1647).

Lawson (Sandie), landlord of the Spa hotel.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Lawyers' Bags. In the Common Law bar, barristers' bags are either red or dark blue. "Red bags" are reserved for queen's counsel and serjeants, but a stuff-gownsman may carry one "if presented with it by a 'silk.'" Only red bags may be taken into Common Law courts, blue ones must be carried no further than the robing-room. In Chancery courts the etiquette is not so strict.

Lay of the Last Minstrel. Ladye Margaret [Scott] of Branksome Hall, the "flower of Teviot," was beloved by baron Henry of Cranstown, but a deadly feud existed between the two families. One day, an elfin page allured ladye Margaret's brother (the heir of Branksome Hall) into a wood, where he fell into the hands of the Southerners. At the same time an army of 3000 English marched to Branksome Hall to take it, but hearing that Douglas, with 10,000 men, was on the march against them, the two chiefs agreed to decide the contest by single combat. The English champion was sir Richard Musgrave, the Scotch champion called himself sir William Deloraine. Victory fell to the Scotch, when it was discovered that "sir William Deloraine" was in reality lord Cranstown, who then claimed and received the hand of ladye Margaret as his reward.—Sir W. Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel (1805).

Lays of Ancient Rome, a series of ballads by Macaulay (1842). The chief are called, Horatius; The Battle of the Lake Regillus; and Virginia. The first of these is the best.

Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers, by Aytoun (1849).

Layers-over for Meddlers, nothing that concerns you. Said to children when they want to know something which the person asked does not think proper to explain to them. A layer-over means "a whip," and a layer-over for meddlers means a "rod for the meddlesome."

Lazarillo, a humoursome varlet, who serves two masters, "don Felix" and Octavio. Lazarillo makes the usual quota of mistakes, such as giving letters and money to the wrong master; but it turns out that don Felix is donna Clara, the fiancée of Octavio, and so all comes right.—Jephson: Two Strings to your Bow (1792).

Joseph Munden [1758–1832] was the original "Lazarillo."—Memoir of J. S. Munden (1832).

Lazarillo de Tormes, the hero of a romance of roguery by don Diego de Mendo'za (1553). Lazarillo is a compound of poverty and pride, full of stratagems and devices. The "hidalgo" walks the streets (as he says) "like the duke of Arcos," but is occupied at home "to procure a crust of dry bread, and, having munched it, he is equally puzzled how to appear in public with due decorum. He fits out a ruffle so as to suggest the idea of a shirt, and so adjusts a cloak as to look as if there were clothes under it." We find him begging bread, "not for food," but simply for experiments. He eats it to see "if it is digestible and wholesome;" yet is he gay withal and always rakish.

Lazarus and Divês. Lazarus was a blotched beggar, who implored the aid of Divês. At death, Lazarus went to heaven, and Divês to hell, where he implored that the beggar might be suffered to bring him a drop of water to cool his lips withal. —Luke xvi. 19–31.

N. B.—Lazarus is the only proper name given in any of the New Testament parables.

Lazy Lawrence of Lubber-Land, the hero of a popular tale. He served the schoolmaster, the squire's cook, the farmer, and his own wife, all which was accounted treason in Lubber-land. (Probably the seventeenth century.)

Le Beau, a courtier attending upon Frederick the usurper of his brother's throne.—Shakespeare: As You Like It (1600).

Le Febre, a poor lieutenant, whose admirable story is told by Sterne in The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy (1759–1767).

Lea, one of the "daughters of men," beloved by one of the "sons of God." The angel who loved her ranked with the least of the spirits of light, whose post around the throne was in the outermost circle. Sent to earth on a message, he saw Lea bathing, and fell in love with her; but Lea was so heavenly minded that her only wish was to "dwell in purity and serve God in singleness of heart." Her angel-lover, in the madness of his passion, told Lea the spell-word that gave him admittance into heaven. The moment Lea uttered it, her body became spiritual, rose through the air, and vanished from sight. On the other hand, the angel lost his ethereal nature, and became altogether earthly, like a child of clay.—Moore: Loves of the Angels, i. (1822).

Lead Apes in Hell (To), i.e. to die an old maid.

> And now Tatlanthê, thou art all my care . . .
> Pity that you, who've served so long and well,
> Should die a virgin, and lead apes in hell.
> Choose for yourself, dear girl, our empire round;
> Your portion is twelve hundred thousand pound.
> Carey: Chrononhotonthologos.

League (The), a league formed at Péronne in 1576, to prevent the accession of Henri IV. to the throne of France, because he was of the reformed religion. This league was mainly due to the Guises. It is occasionally called "The Holy League;" but the "Holy League" strictly so called is quite another thing, and it is better not to confound different events by giving them the same name. (See LEAGUE, Holy.)

The Achæan League (B.C. 281–146).

The old league consisted of the twelve Achæan cities confederated for self-defence from the remotest times. The league properly so called was formed against the Macedonians.

The Ætolian League, formed some three centuries B.C., when it became a formidable rival to the Macedonian monarchs and the Achæan League.

The Grey League (1424), called Lia Grischa or Graubünd, from the grey homespun dress of the confederate peasants, the Grisons, in Switzerland. This league combined with the League Caddee (1401) and the League of the Ten Jurisdictions (1436) in a perpetual alliance in 1471. The object of these leagues was to resist domestic tyranny.

The Hanse or Hanseatic League (1241–1630), a great commercial confederation of German towns, to protect their merchandise against Baltic pirates, and defend their rights against German barons and princes. It began with Hamburg and Lubeck, and was joined by Bremen, Bruges, Bergen, Novogorod, London, Cologne, Brunswick, Danzig; and, afterwards by Dunkerque, Anvers, Ostend, Dordrecht, Rotterdam, Amsterdam, etc.; still later by Calais, Rouen, St. Malo, Bordeaux, Bayonne, Marseilles, Barcelona, Seville, Cadiz, and Lisbon; and lastly by Messina, Naples, etc.; in all eighty cities.

The Holy League. Several leagues are so denominated, but that emphatically so called is the league of 1511 against Louis XII., formed by pope Julius II., Ferdinand "the Catholic," Henry VIII., the Venetians, and the Swiss. Gaston de Foix obtained a victory over the league at Ravenna in 1512, but died in the midst of his triumph.

The Solemn League (1638), formed in Scotland against the episcopal government of the Church.

League Caddee (The), or Ligue de la Maison de Dieu (1401), a confederation of the Grisons for the purpose of resisting domestic tyranny. (See LEAGUE, Grey.)

League of Augsburg (1686), a confederation of the house of Austria with Sweden, Saxony, Bavaria, the circles of Swabia and Franconia, etc., against Louis XIV. This league was the beginning of that war which terminated in the peace of Ryswick (1698).

League of Cambray (1508), formed against the republic of Venice by the emperor Maximilian I., Louis XII. of France, Ferdinand "the Catholic," and pope Julius II.

League of Ratisbonne (1524), by the catholic powers of Germany against the progress of the Reformation.

League of Smalkalde (December 31, 1530), the protestant states of Germany leagued against Charles Quint. It was almost broken up by the victory obtained over it at Mühlberg in 1547.

League of Wurtzburg (1610), formed by the catholic states of Germany against the "Protestant Union" of Hall. Maximilian I. of Bavaria was at its head.

League of the Beggars (1560), a combination formed against the Inquisition in Flanders.

League of the Cities of Lombardy (1167), under the patronage of pope Alexander III., against Frederick Barbarossa emperor of Germany. In 1225, the cities combined against Frederick II. of Germany.

League of the Public Weal (Ligue du Bien Public), 1464, a league between the dukes of Burgundy, Brittany, Bourbon, and other princes, against Louis XI. of France.

Lean'der (3 syl.), a young man of Aby'dos, who swam nightly across the Hellespont to visit his lady-love, Hero a priestess of Sestos. One night he was drowned in his attempt, and Hero leaped into the Hellespont and died also.

(The story is told by Musæus in his poem called Hero and Leander. Schiller has made it the subject of a ballad.)

(1) Lord Byron and lieutenant Ekenhead repeated the feat of Leander, and accomplished it in 1 hr. 10 min.; the distance (allowing for drifting) would be about four miles.

(2) A young native of St. Croix, in 1817, swam across the Sound in 2 hr. 40 min., the distance being six miles.

(3) Captain Webb, August 24, 1875, swam from Dover to Calais in 22 hr. 40 min., the distance being thirty miles, including drifting.

Lean'der, a young Spanish scholar, smitten with Leonora, a maiden under the charge of don Diego, and whom the don wished to make his wife. The young scholar disguised himself as a minstrel to amuse Mungo the slave, and with a little flattery and a few gold pieces lulled the vigilance of Ursula the duenna, and gained admittance to the lady. As the lovers were about to elope, don Diego unexpectedly returned; but being a man of 60, and, what is more, a man of sense, he at once perceived that Leander was a more suitable husband for Leonora than himself, and accordingly sanctioned their union and gave the bride a handsome dowry.—Bickerstaff: The Padlock (1768).

Leandra, daughter of an opulent Spanish farmer, who eloped with Vincent de la Rosa, a heartless adventurer, who robbed her of all her money, jewels, and other valuables, and then left her to make her way home as best she could. Leandra was placed in a convent till the scandal had blown over.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. 20 ("The Goat-herd's Story," 1605).

Léandre (2 syl.), son of Géronte (2 syl.). During the absence of his father, he fell in love with Zerbinette, whom he supposed to be a young gipsy, but who was in reality the daughter of Argante (2 syl.) his father's friend. Some gipsies had stolen the child when only four years old, and required £30 for her ransom—a sum of money which Scapin contrived to obtain from Léandre's father under false pretences. When Géronte discovered that his son's bride was the daughter of his friend Argante, he was quite willing to excuse Scapin for the deceit practised on him.—Molière: Les Fourberies de Scapin (1671).

(In Otway's version of this comedy, called The Cheats of Scapin, Léandre is Anglicized into "Leander;" Géronte is called "Gripe;" Zerbinette is "Lucia;" Argante is "Thrifty;" and the sum of money is £200.)

Léandre (2 syl.), the lover of Lucinde daughter of Géronte. (See LUCINDE.)—Molière: Le Médecin Malgré Lui (1666).

Lean'dro, a gentleman who wantonly loves Amaranta (the wife of Bar'tolus a covetous lawyer).—Fletcher: The Spanish Curate (1622).

Lean'dro the Fair (The Exploits and Adventures of), part of the series called Le Roman des Romans, pertaining to "Am'adis of Gaul." This part was added by Pedro de Lujan.

Lear, mythical king of Britain, son of Bladud. He had three daughters, and when four score years old, wishing to retire from the active duties of sovereignty, resolved to divide his kingdom between them in proportion to their love. The two elder said they loved him more than their tongue could express, but Cordelia the youngest said she loved him as it became a daughter to love her father. The old king, displeased with her answer, disinherited Cordelia, and divided his kingdom between the other two, with the condition that each alternately, month by month, should give him a home, with a suite of a hundred knights. He spent the first month with his eldest daughter, who showed him scant hospitality. Then going to the second, she refused to entertain so large a suite; whereupon the old man would not enter her house, but spent the night abroad in a storm. When Cordelia, who had married the king of France, heard of this, she brought an army over to dethrone her sisters, but was taken prisoner and died in jail. In the mean time, the elder sister (Goneril) first poisoned her younger sister from jealousy, and afterwards put an end to her own life. Lear also died.—Shakespeare: King Lear (1605).

(The best performers of "king Lear" have been David Garrick (1716-1779) and W. C. Macready (1793-1873). The stage Lear is a corrupt version by Nahum Tate (Tate and Brady); as the stage Richard III. is Colley Cibber's travesty.)

N.B.—(1) Percy, in his Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, has a ballad about "King Leir and His Three Daughters" (series I. ii.).

(2) The story is given by Geoffrey of Monmouth, in his British History. Spenser has introduced the tale in his Faërie Queene (ii. 10).

(3) Camden tells a similar story of Ina the king of the West Saxons (Remains, 306).

In the Gesta Romanorum, Introd. xxxix. ch. 21, the king is called Theodorius.

(Shakespeare's tragedy of King Lear, first printed in quarto (1608), is founded on The True Chronicle History of King Leir and His Three Daughters, Gonorill, Ragan, and Cordelia, 1605.)

Learned (The), Coloman king of Hungary (*, 1095-1114).

Learned Blacksmith (The), Elihu Burritt, the linguist (1811-1879).

Learned Painter (The), Charles Lebrun, noted for the accuracy of his costumes (1619-1690).

Learned Tailor (The), Henry Wild of Norwich, who mastered, while he worked at his trade, Greek, Latin, Hebrew, Chaldaic, Syriac, Persian, and Arabic (1684-1734).

Learned Theban (A), a guesser of riddles or dark sayings: in allusion to Œdipos king of Thebes, who solved the riddle of the Sphinx.

I'll talk a word with this same learned Theban.
Shakespeare: King Lear, act iii. sc. 4 (1605).

Learning Honoured. (See EMATHIAN CONQUEROR, p. 322; HONOUR PAID TO LEARNING, p. 501.)

Leather-stocking, the nickname of Natty Bumppo, a half-savage and half-Christian chevalier of American wild life. He reappears and closes his career in The Prairie.—Fenimore Cooper: The Pioneers.

Leather-stocking stands half-way between savage and civilized life. He has the freshness of nature and the first-fruits of Christianity; the seed dropped into vigorous soil. These are the elements of one of the most original characters in fiction.—Duyckinck.

Le Castre, the indulgent father of Mirabel "the wild goose."—Fletcher: The Wild-goose Chase (1652).

L'Eclair (Philippe), orderly of captain Florian. L'Eclair is a great boaster, who brags under the guise of modesty. He pays his court to Rosabelle, the lady's-maid of lady Geraldine.—Dimond: The Foundling of the Forest.

Led Captain (A), an obsequious person, who styles himself "captain;" and, out of cupboard love, dances attendance on the master and mistress of a house.

Mr. Wagg, the celebrated wit, and a led captain and trencherman of my lord Steyne, was caused by the ladies to make the assault.—Thackeray: Vanity Fair, ii. (1848).

Ledbrook (Miss), of the Portsmouth Theatre, the bosom friend of Miss Snevellicci.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Ledbury (The Adventures of Mr.), a novel by Albert Smith (1844).

Lee (Sir Henry), an officer in attendance at Greenwich Palace.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Lee (Sir Henry), an old royalist, and head-ranger of Woodstock Forest.

Alice Lee, daughter of the old knight. She marries Markham Everard.

Colonel Albert Lee, her brother, the friend of Charles II.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Leek, worn on St. David's Day. The general tale is that king Cadwallader, in 640, gained a complete victory over the Saxons by the special interposition of St. David, who ordered the Britons to wear leeks in their caps, that they might recognize each other. The Saxons, for want of some common cognizance, often mistook friends for foes. Drayton gives another version: He says the saint lived in the valley Ewias (2 syl.), situate between the Hatterill Hills, in Monmouthshire. It was here "that reverend British saint to contemplation lived,"

. . . and did so truly fast,
As he did only drink what crystal Hodney yields,
And fed upon the leeks he gathered in the fields.
In memory of whom, in each revolving year,
The Welshmen, on his day [March 1], that sacred herb do wear.
Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

Lefevre (Lieutenant), a poor officer dying from want and sickness. His pathetic story is told by Sterne, in a novel called The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy (1759).

"Mr. Fulmer, I have borrowed a book from your shop. 'Tis the sixth volume of my deceased friend, Tristram. . . . The divine story of Lefevre, which makes part of this book, . . . does honour, not to its author only, but to human nature."—Cumberland: The West Indian, ii. 1 (1771).

Leg of Mutton School (The), authors who praise those who give them good dinners and suppers. Lockhart introduced the phrase.

Legend (Sir Sampson), a foolish, testy, prejudiced, and obstinate old man, between 50 and 60. His favourite oath is "Odd!" He tries to disinherit his elder son Valentine, for his favourite son Ben, a sailor; and he fancies Angelica is in love with him, when she only intends to fool him.

He says, "I know the length of the emperor of China's foot, have kissed the Great Mogul's slipper, and have rid a-hunting upon an elephant with the cham of Tartary."—Congreve: Love for Love, ii. (1695).

"Sir Sampson Legend" is such another lying, overbearing character, but he does not come up to "sir Epicure Mammon" [Ben Jonson: The Alchemist].—C. Lamb.

Legend (The Golden), a semi-dramatic poem by Longfellow, taken from an old German tale by Hartmann von der Aue [Our], called Poor Henry (1851). Hartmann was one of the minnesingers, and lived in the twelfth century. (See HENRY, Poor.)

Legend of Montrose, a novel by sir W. Scott (1819). This brief, imperfect story contains one of Scott's best characters, the redoubted Rittmaster, Dugald Dalgetty, a combination of soldado and pedantic student of Mareschal College, Aberdeen (time, Charles I.).

The plot of the novel consists of a battle between the Royalists and Parliamentarians, and a slight love-story. In 1644 James Graham, earl of Montrose, was created commander-in-chief of the royal forces in Scotland, and in 1645 conquered, at Inverlochy, the marquis of Argyle, the parliamentary leader.

The love-story is this: the earl of Menteith and Allan M'Aulay, both royalists, proposed to Annot Lyle, daughter of sir Duncan Campbell, a parliamentarian. She chose the earl, and married him.

In regard to Dalgetty, he was a royalist, in the employ of Menteith. Argyle tried to seduce him, but he knocked him down and fled to the royalist forces.

Legends (Golden), a collection of monkish legends, in Latin, by Jacob de Voragine or Varagine, born at Varaggio, in Genoa. His Legenda Sancta was so popular that it was called "Legenda Aurea" (1230–1298).

Legion of Honour, an order of merit, instituted by Napoleon I. when "first consul," in 1802. The undress badges are, for—

Chevaliers, a bow of red ribbon in the button-hole of their coat, to which a medal is attached.
Officers, a rosette of red ribbon, etc., with medal.
Commanders, a collar-ribbon.
Grand-officers, a broad ribbon under the waistcoat.
Grand-cross, a broad ribbon, with a star on the breast, and a jewel-cross pendent.

N.B.—Napoleon III. instituted a lower degree than Chevalier, called Médaille Militaire, distinguished by a yellow ribbon.

Legree, a slave-dealer and hideous villain, brutalized by slave-dealing and slave-driving.—Mrs. Beecher Stowe: Uncle Tom's Cabin (1853).

Leicester (The earl of), in the court of queen Elizabeth.

The countess of Leicester (born Amy Robsart), but previously betrothed to Edmund Tressilian.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Leigh (Amyas), the hero of Charles Kingsley's novel, Westward Ho! A young man of great bodily strength and amiable disposition, but very combative (1855).

Leigh (Aurora), the heroine and title of a poem by Mrs. Browning. The design of this poem is to show the noble aim of true art.

Leila, the young Turkish child rescued by don Juan at the siege of Ismail (canto viii. 93–102). She went with him to St. Petersburg, and then he brought her to England. As Don Juan was never completed, the future history of Leila has no sequel.

> . . . at his side
> Sat little Leila, who survived the parries
> He made 'gainst Cossack sabres, in the wide
> Slaughter of Ismail.
> Byron: Don Juan, x. 51 (1824).

Leila (2 syl.), the beautiful slave of the caliph Hassan. She falls in love with "the Giaour" [djow'-er], flees from the seraglio, is overtaken, and cast into the sea.

> Her eyes' dark charm 'twere vain to tell;
> But gaze on that of the gazelle—
> It will assist thy fancy well.
> Byron: The Giaour (1813).

Leila, or "The Siege of Grana'da," a novel by lord Lytton (1838).

Leilah, the Oriental type of female loveliness, chastity, and impassioned affection. Her love for Mejnôun, in Mohammedan romance, is held in much the same light as that of the bride for the bridegroom in Solomon's song, or Cupid and Psyché among the Greeks.

When he sang the loves of Megnôun and Leilah etc. . . . tears insensibly overflowed the cheeks of his auditors.—Beckford: Vathek (1786).

Leipsic. So-and-so was my Leipsic, my fall, my irrevocable disaster, my ruin; referring to the battle of Leipsic (October, 1813), in which Napoleon I. was defeated and compelled to retreat. This was the "beginning of his end."

> Juan was my Moscow [turning-point], and Fallero (3 syl.)
> My Leipsic.
> Byron: Don Juan, xi. 56 (1824).

Leir and his Three Daughters, a ballad inserted by Percy in his Reliques (series i. 2). (See LEAR, p. 602.)

L. E. L., initialism of Letitia Elizabeth Landon (afterwards Mrs. Maclean), poetess (1802–1838).

Lela Marien, the Virgin Mary.

In my childhood, my father kept a slave, who, in my own tongue [Arabic], instructed me in the Christian worship, and informed me of the many things of Lela Marien.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. 20 (1605).

Le'lia, a cunning, wanton widow, with whom Julio is in love.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Captain (1613).

Lélie (2 syl.), a young man engaged to Célie daughter of Gorgibus; but Gorgibus insists that his daughter shall give up Lélie for Valère, a much richer man. Célie faints on hearing this, and drops the miniature of Lélie, which is picked up by Sganarelle's wife. Sganarelle finds it, and, supposing it to be a lover of his wife, takes possession of it, and recognizes Lélie as the living original. Lélie asks how he came by it, is told he took it from his wife, and concludes that he means Célie. He accuses her of infidelity in the presence of Sganarelle, and the whole mystery is cleared up.—Molière: Sganarelle (1660).

Lélie, an inconsequential, light-headed, but gentlemanly coxcomb.—Molière: L'Etourdi (1653).

Le'man (Lake), the lake of Geneva; called in Latin Lemannus.

> Lake Leman woos me with its crystal face,
> The mirror where the stars and mountains view
> The stillness of their aspect in each trace
> Its clear depth yields of their fair height and hue.
> Byron: Childe Harold, iii. 68 (1816).

Lemnian Deed (A), one of unparalleled cruelty and barbarity. This Greek phrase owes its origin to the legend that the Lemnian women rose one night, and put to death every man and male child in the island.

On another occasion they slew all the men and all the children born of Athenian parents.

Lenore (2 syl.), a name which Edgar Poe has introduced in two of his poems; one called The Raven, and the other called Lenore (1811–1849).

Lenore, the heroine of Bürger's ballad of that name, in which a spectral lover appears after death to his mistress, and carries her on horseback behind him to the graveyard, where their marriage is celebrated amid a crew of howling goblins. Based on a Dutch ballad.

¶ The Suffolk Miracle is an old English ballad of like character.

Lenormand (Mlle.), a famous tireuse de cartes. She was a squat, fussy little old woman, with an imperturbable eye and a gnarled and knotted visage. She wore her hair cut short and parted on one side, like that of a man; dressed in an odd-looking casaquin, embroidered and frogged like the jacket of an hussar; and snuffed continually. This was the little old woman whom Napoleon I. regularly consulted before setting out on a campaign. Mlle. Lenormand foretold to Josephine her divorce; and when Murat king of Naples visited her in disguise, she gave him the cards to cut, and he cut four times in succession le grand pendu (king of diamonds); whereupon Mlle. rose and said, "La séance est terminée; c'est dix louis pour les rois;" pocketed the fee, and left the room taking snuff.

(In cartomancy, le grand pendu signifies that the person to which it is dealt, or who cuts it, will die by the hands of the executioner. See GRAND PENDU, p. 442.)

Lent (Galeazzo's), a form of torture devised by Galeazzo Visconti, calculated to prolong the victim's life for forty days.

Len'ville (2 syl.), first tragedian at the Portsmouth Theatre. When Nicholas Nickleby joined the company, Mr. Lenville was jealous, and attempted to pull his nose; but Nicholas pulled the nose of Mr. Lenville instead.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Leo Hunter (Mr. and Mrs.), tuft-hunters. Their idiosyncrasy was to entertain persons of note, the "social lions" of the day.—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Leodegraunce or LEODOGRAN, king of Camelyard, father of Guenever (king Arthur's wife). Uther the pendragon gave him the famous Round Table, which would seat 150 knights (pt. i. 45); and when Arthur married Guenever, Leodegraunce gave him the table and 100 knights as a wedding gift (pt. i. 45). The table was made by Merlin, and each seat had on it the name of the knight to whom it belonged. One of the seats was called the "Siege Perilous," because no one could sit on it without "peril of his life" except sir Galahad the virtuous and chaste, who accomplished the quest of the holy graal.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur (1470).

> Leodogran, the king of Cameliard [sic],
> Had one fair daughter and none other child;
> And she was fairest of all flesh on earth,
> Guinevere, and in her his one delight.
> Tennyson: Coming of Arthur.

Le'oline (3 syl.), one of the male attendants of Dionys'ia wife of Cleon governor of Tarsus, and employed by his mistress to murder Mari'na, the orphan daughter of prince Pericles, who had been committed to her charge to bring up. Leoline took Marina to the shore with this view, when some pirates seized her, and sold her at Metali'nê for a slave. Leoline told his mistress that the orphan was dead, and Dionysia raised a splendid sepulchre to her memory.—Shakespeare: Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

Leon, son of Constantine the Greek emperor. Amon and Beatrice, the parents of Bradamant, promise to him their daughter Bradamant in marriage; but the lady is in love with Roger'o. When Leon discovers this attachment, he withdraws his suit, and Bradamant marries Rogero.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Leon, the hero who rules Margaritta his wife wisely, and wins her esteem and wifely obedience. Margaritta is a wealthy Spanish heiress, who married in order to indulge in wanton intrigues more freely. She selected Leon because he was supposed to be a milksop whom she could bend to her will; no sooner, however, is she married than Leon acts with manly firmness and determination, but with great affection also. He wins the esteem of every one, and Margaritta becomes a loving, devoted, virtuous, and obedient wife.—Fletcher: Rule a Wife and Have a Wife (1640).

Edward Kynaston [1619–1687] executed the part of "Leon" with a determined manliness, well worth the best actor's imitation. He had a piercing eye, and a quick, imperious vivacity of voice.—Colley Cibber.

Leonard, a real scholar, forced for daily bread to keep a common school.—Crabbe: Borough, xxiv. (1810).

Leonardo [GONZAGA], duke of Mantua. Travelling in Switzerland, an avalanche fell on him; he was nursed through a severe illness by Mariana the daughter of a Swiss burgher, and they fell in love with each other. On his return home, he was entrapped by brigands, and kept prisoner for two years. Mariana, seeking him, went to Mantua, where count Florio fell in love with her, and obtained her guardian's consent to their union; but Mariana refused to comply. The case was referred to the duke (Ferrardo), who gave judgment in favour of the count. Leonardo happened to be present, and, throwing off his disguise, assumed his rank as duke, and married Mariana; but, being called away to the camp, left Ferrardo regent. Ferrardo laid a most villainous scheme to prove Mariana guilty of adultery with Julian St. Pierre; but Leonardo refused to credit her guilt. Julian turned out to be her brother, exposed the whole plot, and amply vindicated Mariana of the slightest indiscretion.—Knowles: The Wife (1833).

Leona'to, governor of Messina, father of Hero, and uncle of Beatrice.—Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing (1600).

Leonesse (3 syl.), LEONNESSE, LEONNAIS, LEONÉS, LEONNOYS, LYONNOYS, etc., a mythical country belonging to Cornwall, supposed to have been sunk under the sea since the time of king Arthur. It is very frequently mentioned in the Arthurian romances.

Leonidas, an historic poem in twelve books, by Richard Glover (1737).

Leonidas. When one said to Leonĭdas king of Sparta, who was sent with 300 Spartans to withstand the whole army of Xerxes at the defile of Thermop'ylæ, that the Persians were so numerous their arrows would darken the sun, he answered, "It is well, friend; for we shall fight in the shade."—Plutarch, ∴ Herodotos puts the same words into the mouth of Dienĕces (also a Spartan); and says, when one was telling Dieneces (4 syl.) about the battle of Thermopylæ, that the arrows of the Persians were so numerous they actually shut out the sun, he naïvely replied, "So much the better, for then they fought in the shade."—Herodotos: History, vii. 226.

Leonidas of Modern Greece, Marco Bozzaris, a Greek patriot, who, with 1200 men, put to rout 4000 Turco-Albanians, at Kerpenisi, but was killed in the attack (1823). He was buried at Mesolonghi.

Le'onine (3 syl.), servant to Dionyza.—Shakespeare: Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

Leonine Verse. So called from Leonius, a canon of the church of St. Victor, in Paris, in the twelfth century, who first composed in such verse. It has a rhyme in the middle of the line; as—

Pepper is black, though it hath a good smack.
Est avis in dextra melior quam quatuor extra.

Leonnoys or Leonesse (q.v.), a country once joining Cornwall, but now sunk in the sea full forty fathoms deep. Sir Tristram was born in Leonês or Leonnoys, and is always called a Cornish knight.

(Tennyson calls the word "Lyonnesse," but sir T. Malory "Leonês.")

Leo'no's Head (or Liono's Head), Porto Leono, the ancient Piræus. So called from a huge lion of white marble, removed by the Venetians to their arsenal.

The wandering stranger near the port descries
A milk-white lion of stupendous size,
Of antique marble,—hence the haven's name,
Unknown to modern natives whence it came.
Falconer: The Shipwreck, iii. 3 (1795).

Léonor, sister of Isabelle, an orphan; brought up by Ariste (2 syl.) according to his notions of training a girl to make him a good wife. He put her on her honour, tried to win her confidence and love, gave her all the liberty consistent with propriety and social etiquette, and found that she loved him, and made him a fond and faithful wife. (See ISABELLE, p. 531.)—Molière: L'école des Maris (1661).

LEONO'RA, the usurping queen of Aragon, betrothed to Bertran a prince of the blood-royal, but in love with Torrismond general of the forces. It turns out that Torrismond is son and heir of Sancho the deposed king. Sancho is restored, and Torrismond marries Leonora.—Dryden: The Spanish Fryar (1680).

Leono'ra, betrothed to don Carlos, but don Carlos resigned her to don Alonzo, to whom she proved a very tender and loving wife. Zanga the Moor, out of revenge, poisoned the mind of Alonzo against his wife, by insinuating her criminal love for don Carlos. Out of jealousy, Alonzo had his friend put to death, and Leonora, knowing herself suspected, put an end to her life.—Young: The Revenge (1721).

Leono'ra, the daughter of poor parents, who struck the fancy of don Diego. The don made a compact with her parents to take her home with him and place her under a duenna for three months, to ascertain if her temper was as sweet as her face was pretty, and at the expiration of that time, either to return her spotless or to make her his wife. At the end of three months, don Diego (a man of 60) goes to arrange for the marriage, locking his house and garden, as he supposes, securely; but Leander, a young student, smitten with Leonora, makes his way into the house, and is about to elope with her when the don returns. Like a man of sense, don Diego at once sees the suitability of the match, consents to the union of the young people, and even settles a marriage portion on Leonora, his ward if not his wife.—Bickerstaff: The Padlock (1768).

Leono'ra, betrothed to Ferdinand a fiery young Spaniard (jealous of donna Clara, who has assumed boy's clothes for a time). Ferdinand despises the "amphibious coxcomb," and calls his rival "a vile compound of fringe, lace, and powder."—Jephson: Two Strings to your Bow (1792).

Leono'ra, the heroine of Miss Edgeworth's novel of the same name. The object of the tale is to make the reader feel what is good, and desirous of being so (1806).

Leono'ra, wife of Fernando Florestan a State prisoner in Seville. In order to effect her husband's release, she assumed the attire of a man, and the name of Fidelio. In this diguise she entered the service of Rocco the jailer, and Marcellina the jailer's daughter fell in love with her. (For the rest of the tale, see FERNANDO, p. 363.)—Beethoven: Fidelio (an opera, 1791).

Leono'ra, a princess, who falls in love with Manri'co, the supposed son of Azuce'na a gipsy, but in reality the son of Garzia (brother of the conte di Luna). The conte di Luna entertains a base passion for the princess, and, getting Manrico into his power, is about to kill him, when Leonora intercedes, and promises to give herself to the count if he will spare his nephew's life. The count consents; but while he goes to release Manrico, Leonora kills herself by sucking poison from a ring, and Manrico dies also.—Verdi: Il Trovato're (an opera, 1853).

Leono'ra (The History of), an episode in the novel of Joseph Andrews, by Fielding (1742).

Leono'ra [D'ESTE] (2 syl.), sister of Alfonso II. reigning duke of Ferrara. The poet Tasso conceived a violent passion for this princess, but "she knew it not or viewed it with disdain." Leonora never married, but lived with her eldest sister Lauretta duchess of Urbino, who was separated from her husband. The episode of Sophronia and Olindo (Jerusalem Delivered, ii.) is based on this love incident. The description of Sophronia is that of Leonora, and her ignorance of Olindo's love points to the poet's unregarded devotion.

> But thou . . . shalt have
> One-half the laurel which o'ershades my grave . .
> Yes, Lenora, it shall be our fate
> To be entwined for ever,—but too late.
> Byron: The Lament of Tasso (1817).

Leonora de Guzman, the "favourite" of Alfonso XI. of Castile. Ferdinando, not knowing that she was the king's mistress, fell in love with her; and Alfonso, to reward Ferdinando's services, gave her to him in marriage. No sooner was this done, than the bridegroom learned the character of his bride, rejected her with scorn, and became a monk. Leonora became a noviciate in the same convent, obtained her husband's forgiveness, and died.—Donisetti · La Favorita (an opera, 1842).

Leon'tes (3 syl.), king of Sicily. He invited his old friend Polixenês king of Bohemia to come and stay with him, but became so jealous of him that he commanded Camillo to poison him. Instead of doing so, Camillo warned Polixenês of his danger, and fled with him to Bohemia. The rage of Leontês was now unbounded, and he cast his wife Hermionê into prison, where she gave birth to a daughter. The king ordered the infant to be cast out on a desert shore, and then brought his wife to a public trial. Hermionê fainted in court, the king had her removed, and Paulina soon came to announce that the queen was dead. Ultimately, the infant daughter was discovered under the name of Perdîta, and was married to Florizel the son of Polixenês. Hermionê was also discovered to the king in a tableau vivant, and the joy of Leontês was complete.—Shakespeare: The Winter's Tale (1604).

Leontius, a brave but merry old soldier.—Fletcher: The Humorous Lieutenant (1647).

Le'opold, a sea-captain, enamoured of Hippol'yta, a rich lady wantonly in love with Arnoldo. Arnoldo, however, is contracted to the chaste Zeno'cia, who is basely pursued by the governor count Clodio.—Fletcher: The Custom of the Country (1647).

Leopold, archduke of Austria, a crusader who arrested Richard I. on his way home from the Holy Land.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Leopold, nicknamed Peu-à-peu by George IV. Stein, speaking of Leopold's vacillating conduct in reference to the Greek throne, says of him, "He has no colour," i.e. no fixed plan of his own, but only reflects the colour of those around him; in other words, he is "blown about by every wind."

Lepol'emo (The Exploits and Adventures of), part of the series called Le Roman des Romans, pertaining to "Am'adis of Gaul." This part was added by Pedro de Lujan.

Leporello, in The Libertine, by Shadwell (1676).

The following advertisement from Liston appeared in June, 1817:—

"My benefit takes place this evening at Covent Garden Theatre, and I doubt not will be splendidly attended. . . . I shall perform 'Fegrun' in The Slave, and 'Leporello' in The Libertine. In the delineation of these arduous characters I shall display much feeling and discrimination, together with great taste in my dresses and elegance of manner. The audiences will be delighted, and will testify their approbation by rapturous applause. When, in addition to my professional merits, regard is paid to the loveliness of my person and the fascination of my face, . . . there can be no doubt that this announcement will receive the attention it deserves."—J. Liston.

Leporello, the valet of don Giovanni.—Mozart: Don Giovanni (an opera, 1787).

Lermites and Martafax, two rats that conspired against the White Cat.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1682).

Lesbia, the poetic name given by the poet Catullus to his favourite lady Clodia.

Lesbian Kiss (A), an immodest kiss. The ancient Lesbians were noted for their licentiousness, and hence to "Lesbianize" became synonymous with licentious sexual indulgence, and "Lesbia" meant a shameless harlot.

Lesbian Poets (The), Terpander, Alcæus, Ari'on, and the poetess Sappho.

Lesbian Rule, squaring the rule from the act, and not the act from the rule; like correcting a sun-dial by a clock, and not the clock by the sun-dial. A Jesuit excuse for doing or not doing as inclination dictates.

Lesley (Captain), a friend of captain M'Intyre.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Leslie (General), a parliamentary leader.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Lesly (Ludovic), surnamed Le Balafré, an old archer in the Scotch guard of Louis XI. of France. Uncle of Quentin Durward.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Lesurques (Jerome), a solicitor, who, being in greatly reduced circumstances, holds the White Lion inn, unknown to his son (act i. 2).

Joseph Lesurques (2 syl.), son of the solicitor, and father of Julie. He is so like Dubosc the highwayman, that he is accused of robbing the night-mail from Lyons, and murdering the courier.

Julie Lesurques, daughter of Joseph

Lesurques, in love with Didier. When her father is imprisoned, she offers to release Didier from his engagement; but he remains loyal throughout.—Stirling: The Courier of Lyons (1852).

Le'the (2 syl.), one of the five rivers of hell. The word means "forgetfulness." The other rivers are Styx, Ach'eron, Cocy'tus, and Phleg'ethon. Dantê makes Lêthê the boundary between purgatory and paradise.

Far off from these [four] a slow and silent stream
Lethê, the river of oblivion, rolls
Her watery labyrinth, whereof who drinks
Forthwith his former state and being forgets—
Forgets both joy and grief, pleasure and pain.
Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 583, etc. (1665).

Lethe'an Dews, that which produces a dreamy languor and obliviousness of the troubles of life. Lêthê personified oblivion in Grecian mythology, and the soul, at the death of the body, drank of the river Lêthê that it might carry into the world of shadows no remembrance of earth and its concerns.

The soul with tender luxury you [the Muses] fill,
And o'er the sense Lethean dews distill.
Falconer: The Shipwreck, iii. 4 (1756).

Letters (Greek). Cadmus, the Phœnician, introduced sixteen; Simonidês and Epicharmos (the poets) introduced six or eight others; but there is the greatest diversity upon what letters, or how many, are to be attributed to them. Aristotle, says Epicharmos introduced θ, χ; others ascribe to him ξ, η, ψ, ω. Dr. Smith, in his Classical Dictionary, tells us Simonidês introduced "the long vowels and double letters" (η, ω, θ, χ, φ, ψ). Lemprière, under "CADMUS," ascribes to him θ, ζ, φ, χ; and under "SIMONIDES," η, ω, ξ, ψ. Others maintain that the Simonidês' letters are η, ω, ζ, ψ.

Letters (Father of), François I. of France, Père des Lettres (1494, 1515-1547). Lorenzo de' Medici, "the Magnificent" (1448-1492).

Letters of the Sepulchre, the laws made by Godfrey and the patriarchs of the court of Jerusalem. There were two codes, one respecting the privileges of the nobles, and the other respecting the rights and duties of burghers. These codes were laid up in a coffer with the treasure of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

Letters to his Son, by lord Chesterfield (1771).

Leuca'dia's Rock, a promontory, the south extremity of the island Leucas or Leucadia, in the Ionian Sea. Sappho leapt from this rock when she found her love for Pha'on unrequited. At the annual festival of Apollo, a criminal was hurled from Leucadia's Rock into the sea; but birds of various sorts were attached to him, in order to break his fall, and if he was not killed he was set free. The leap from this rock is called "The Lovers' Leap."

All those may leap who rather would be neutes
(Leucadia's Rock still overlooks the wave).
Byron: Don Juan, iii. 205 (1819).

Leucip'pe (3 syl.), wife of Menippus; a bawd who caters for king Antig'onus, who, although an old man, indulges in the amorous follies of a youth.—Fletcher: The Humorous Lieutenant (1647).

Leucippe, a rough Athenian soldier, in love with Myrinê, Pygmalion's sister. —Gilbert: Pygmalion and Galatea (1871).

Leucoth'ea, once called "Ino." Ath'amas son of Æôlus had by her two sons, one of whom was named Melicer'tês. Athamas being driven mad, Ino and Melicertês threw themselves into the sea; Ino became Leucothea, and Melicertês became Palæmon or Portumnus the god of ports or strands. Leucothea means the "white goddess," and is used for "Matuta" or the dawn, which precedes sunrise, i.e. Aurora.

By Leucothea's lovely hands,
And her son that rules the strands.
Milton: Comus, 875 (1634).

To resalute the world with sacred light,
Leucothea waked, and with fresh dews embalmed
The earth.
Milton: Paradise Lost, xi. 135 (1665).

Lev'ant Wind (The), the east wind, from levant ("the sunrise"). Ponent is the west wind, or wind from the sunset.

Forth rush the Levant and the Ponent winds.
Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 704 (1665).

Leven (The earl of), a parliamentary leader.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Leviathan (The), by Hobbes (1651). A political treatise in commendation of a universal commonwealth, both civil and ecclesiastical. (See INTELLECTUAL SYSTEM, p. 525.)

Leviathan of Literature (The), Dr. Samuel Johnson (1709-1784).

Levites (The), in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, means the nonconformist ministers expelled by the Act of Conformity (1681-2).

Not Levites headed these [rebels] . . .
Resumed their cant, and with a zealous cry
Pursued their own beloved theocracy

With Sanhedrim [parliament] and priest enslaved the nation,
And justified their spoils by inspiration.
Part I. 530–536.

Leviticus, the Greek title of the third book of the Old Testament. It was intended for the Levites, the tribe of the Jewish priesthood, and gives them full instructions about feast-days and sacrifices.

The Jews have no name for this book, but refer to it by the first words, And the Lord called unto Moses.

Levitt (Frank), a highwayman.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, (George II.).

LEWIS, landgrave of Thuringia, and husband of Elizabeth, a type of the unerotic adorers of women in the Middle Ages.—Kingsley: The Saints' Tragedy, a dramatic poem (1846).

Lewis (Don), brother of Antonio, and uncle of Carlos the bookworm, of whom he is dotingly fond. Don Lewis is no scholar himself, but he adores scholarship. He is headstrong and testy, simple-hearted and kind.

John Quick's great parts were "don Lewis," "Tony Lumpkin," and "Bob Acres" [1748–1831].—Records of a Stage Veteran.

("Tony Lumpkin" in She Stoops to Conquer (Goldsmith); "Bob Acres" in The Rivals, by Sheridan.)

Lewis (Lord), father of Angeli'na.—Fletcher: The Elder Brother (1637).

Lewis (Matthew Gregory), generally called "Monk Lewis," from his romance The Monk (1794). His best-known verses are the ballads of Alonzo the Brave and Bill Jones. He also wrote a drama entitled Timour the Tartar (1775–1818).

Oh! wonder-working Lewis! Monk or bard,
Who fain would make Parnassus a churchyard!
Lo! wreaths of yew, not laurel, bind thy brow;
Thy Muse a sprite, Apollo's sexton thou.
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Lewis Baboon. Louis XIV. of France is so called by Dr. Arbuthnot in his History of John Bull. Baboon is a pun on the word Bourbon, specially appropriate to this royal "posture-master" (1712).

Lewkner's Lane (London), now called Charles Street, Drury Lane; always noted for its "soiled doves."

The nymphs of chaste Diana's train,
The same with those in Lewkner's Lane.
S. Butler: Hudibras, iii. 1 (1678).

Lew'some (2 syl.), a young surgeon and general practitioner. He forms the acquaintance of Jonas Chuzzlewit, and supplies him with the poison which he employs.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Lewson, a noble, honest character. He is in love with Charlotte Beverley, and marries her, although her brother has gambled away all her fortune.—E. Moore: The Gamester (1753).

Leycippes and Clitophonta, a romance in Greek, by Achilles Tatius, in the fifth century; borrowed largely from the Theag'enès and Chariclēa of Heliodōrus bishop of Trikka.

Liar (The), a farce by Samuel Foote (1761). John Wilding, a young gentleman fresh from Oxford, has an extraordinary propensity for romancing. He invents the most marvellous tales, utterly regardless of truth, and thereby involves both himself and others in endless perplexities. He pretends to fall in love with a Miss Grantam, whom he accidentally meets, and, wishing to know her name, is told it is Godfrey, and that she is an heiress. Now it so happens that his father wants him to marry the real Miss Grantam, and, in order to avoid so doing, he says he is already married to a Miss Sibthorpe. He afterwards tells his father he invented this tale because he really wished to marry Miss Godfrey. When Miss Godfrey is introduced, he does not know her, and while in this perplexity a woman enters, who declares she is his wife, and that her maiden name was Sibthorpe. Again he is dumfounded, declares he never saw her in his life, and rushes out, exclaiming, "All the world is gone mad, and is in league against me!"

The plot of this farce is from the Spanish. It had been already taken by Corneille in Le Menteur (1642), and by Steele in his Lying Lover (1704).

Liar (The), Al Aswad; also called "The Impostor," and "The Weather-cock." He set himself up as a prophet against Mahomet; but frequently changed his creed.

¶ Mosëilma was also called "The Liar." He wrote a letter to Mahomet, which began thus: "From Mosëilma prophet of Allah, to Mahomet prophet of Allah;" and received an answer beginning thus: "From Mahomet the prophet of Allah, to Mosëilma the Liar."

Liars (The Prince of), Ferdinand Mendez Pinto, a Portuguese traveller, whose narratives deal so much in the marvellous that Cervantes dubbed him "The Prince of Liars." He is alluded to in the Tatler as a man "of infinite adventure and unbounded imagination."

Sir John Mandeville is called "The Lying Traveller" (1300–1372).

Liban'iel (4 syl.), the guardian angel of Philip the apostle.—Klopstock: The Messiah, iii. (1748).

Libec'chio, the ventus Lyb'icus or south-west wind; called in Latin A'fer. The word occurs in Paradise Lost, x. 706 (1665).

Liberator (The). Daniel O'Connell was so called because he was the leader of the Irish party, which sought to sever Ireland from England. Also called "The Irish Agitator" (1776–1847).

¶ Simon Bolivar, who established the independence of Peru, is so called by the Peruvians (1785–1831).

Liberator of the New World (The), Dr. Franklin (1706–1790).

Liberty, a poem in five parts, by Thomson. Part 1, Ancient and Modern Italy compared; part 2, Greece; part 3, Rome; part 4, Britain; part 5, a prospect of future times, given by the goddess of Liberty. It is an excellent poem.

(Percy Bysshe Shelley published, in 1858, an Ode to Liberty; and John Stuart Mill an essay On Liberty, 1858.)

Liberty (Goddess of), Mlle. Malliard. On December 20, 1793, the French installed the worship of reason for the worship of God, and M. Chaumette induced Mlle. Malliard, an actress, to personify the "goddess of Liberty." She was borne in a palanquin, dressed with buskins, a Phrygian cap, and a blue chlamys over a white tunic. Being brought to Notre Dame, she was placed on the high altar, and a huge candle was placed behind her. Mlle. Malliard lighted the candle, to signify that liberty frees the mind from darkness, and is the "light of the world;" then M. Chaumette fell on his knees to her and offered incense as to a god.

Liberty (The goddess of). The statue so called, placed over the entrance of the Palais Royal, represented Mme. Tallien.

Liberty Hall. Squire Hardcastle says to young Marlow and Hastings, when they mistake his house for an "inn," and give themselves airs, "This is Liberty Hall, gentlemen; you may do just as you please here."—Goldsmith: She Stoops to Conquer, i. 2 (1773).

Libiti'na, the goddess who presides over funerals, and hence in Latin an undertaker is called libitina'rius.

He brought two physicians to visit me, who, by their appearance, seemed zealous ministers of the goddess Libitina.—Lesage: Gil Blas, ix. 8 (1735).

Library (St. Victor's), in Paris. Joseph Scaliger says "it had absolutely nothing in it but trash and rubbish." Rabelais gives a long list of its books, amongst which may be mentioned the Tumbril of Salvation, the Pomegranate of Vice, the Henbane of Bishops, the Mustard-pot of Penance, the Crucible of Contemplation, the Goad of Wine, the Spur of Cheese, the Cobbled-Shoe of Humility, the Trivet of Thought, the Curé's Rap on the Knuckles, the Pilgrims' Spectacles, the Prelates' Bagpipes, the Lawyers' Furred Cat, the Cardinals' Rasp, etc.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, ii. 7 (1533).

Lichas, servant of Herculês, who brought to him from Dejani'ra the poisoned shirt of Nessus. He was thrown by Herculês from the top of mount Etna into the sea. Seneca says (Hercules) that Lichas was tossed aloft into the air, and sprinkled the clouds with his blood. Ovid says, "He congealed, like hail, in mid-air, and turned to stone; then, falling into the Euboic Sea, became a rock, which still bears his name and retains the human form" (Met., ix.).

Let me lodge Lichas on the horns of the moon.
Shakespeare. Antony and Cleopatra, act iv. sc. 10 (1608).

Lichfield. The field of the dead bodies. Anglo-Saxon liced, licit, or licet feld (lic, the place of a dead body, or a dead body).

[Lichfield] is said to have derived its name from the martyrdom of more than a thousand Christians, who are said to have been massacred here in the reign of Diocletian.—Lewis: Topographical Dictionary (article "Lichfield").

(Lich-gate is a shelter at the gate of a churchyard, where the bearers rest the coffin before ascending the steps of the churchyard, and to await the clergyman.)

Licked into Shape. According to legend, the young bear is born a shapeless mass, and the dam licks her cub into its proper shape.

The she-bear licks her cubs into a sort
Of shape.
Byron: The Deformed Transformed, i. 1 (1822).

Lickitup (The laird of), friend of Neil Blanc the town piper.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Lie. The four P's disputed as to which could tell the greatest lie. The Palmer asserted that he had never seen a woman out of patience; the other three P's (a Pardoner, a Poticary, and a Pedlar) were so taken aback by this assertion that they instantly gave up the contest, saying that it was certainly the greatest falsehood they had ever heard.—Heywood: The Four P's (1520).

N.B.—Tennyson says—

A lie which is half a truth is ever the blackest of lies.
A lie which is all a lie may be met and fought with outright;
But a lie which is part a truth is a harder matter to fight.
The Grandmother.

Liebenstein and Sternfels, two ruined castles on the Rhine. Leoline the orphan was the sole surviving child of the lord of Liebenstein, and two brothers (Warbeck and Otto) were the only surviving children of the lord of Sternfels. Both these brothers fell in love with Leoline, but as the lady gave Otto the preference, Warbeck joined the crusades. Otto followed his brother to Palestine, but the war was over, and Otto brought back with him a Greek girl, whom he had made his bride. Warbeck now sent a challenge to his brother for this insult to Leoline, but Leoline interposed to stop the fight. Soon after this the Greek wife eloped, and Otto died childless. Leoline retired to the adjacent convent of Bornhofen, which was attacked by robbers, and Warbeck, in repelling them, received his death-wound, and died in the lap of Leoline.—Traditions of the Rhine.

Life (The Battle of), a Christmas story, by C. Dickens (1846). It is the story of Grace and Marion, the two daughters of Dr. Jeddler, both of whom loved Alfred Heathfield, their father's ward. Alfred loved the younger daughter; but Marion, knowing of her sister's love, left her home clandestinely, and all thought she had eloped with Michael Warden. Alfred then married Grace, and in due time Marion made it known to her sister that she had given up Alfred to her, and had gone to live with her aunt Martha till they were married. It is said that Marion subsequently married Michael Warden, and found with him a happy home.

Life in London, or "The Day and Night Scenes of Jerry Hawthorn and Corinthian Tom," by Pierce Egan (1824). The illustrations are by Cruikshank.

Lige'a, one of the three syrens. Milton gives the classic syrens combs; but this is mixing Greek syrens with Scandinavian mermaids. (Ligēa or Largeia means "shrill," or "sweet-voiced.")

[By] fair Ligea's golden comb,
Wherewith she sits on diamond rocks,
Sleeking her soft alluring locks.
Milton: Comus, 880 (1634).

(The three syrens were Parthen'opē, Ligēa, and Leucos'ia, not Leucothea, q.v.)

Light of the Age, Maimon'idēs or Rabbi Moses ben Maimon of Cor'dova (1135-1204).

Light of the Haram [sic], the sultana Nour'mahal', afterwards called Nourjeham ("light of the world"). She was the bride of Selim son of Acbar.—Moore: Lalla Rookh (1817).

Light o' Heel (Janet), mother of Godfrey Bertram Hewit.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life, a series of tales by professor John Wilson (1822).

Lightbody (Luckie), alias "Marian Loup-the-Dyke," mother of Jean Girder the cooper's wife.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Lightborn, the murderer who assassinated Edward II.—Marlowe: Edward II. (1592).

Lightfoot, one of the seven attendants of Fortunio. So swift was he of foot, that he was obliged to tie his legs when he went hunting, or else he always outran the game, and so lost it.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Fortunio," 1682).

Lightning. Benjamin Franklin invented lightning conductors; hence Campbell says it is allotted to man, with Newton to mark the speed of light, with Herschel to discover planets, and

With Franklin grasp the lightning's fiery wing.
Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, i. (1799).

Lovers killed by Lightning. (See under LOVERS.)

Lightning Protectors. Jupiter chose the eagle as the most approved preservative against lightning, Augustus Cæsar the sea-calf, and Tiberius the laurel.—Collumella, x.; Suetonius: In Vit. Aug., xc.; Suetonius: In Vita Tib., lxix.

Houseleek, called "Jupiter's Beard," is a defence against lightning and evil spirits; hence Charlemagne's edict—

Et habeat quisque supra domum suam Jovis barbam.

Lightwood (Mortimer), a solicitor, who conducts the "Harmon murder" case. He is the great friend of Eugene Wrayburn, barrister-at-law, and it is the great ambition of his heart to imitate the nonchalance of his friend. At one time Mortimer Lightwood admired Bella Wilfer.—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1864).

Ligurian Republic (The), Venetia, Genoa, and part of Sardinia, formed by Napoleon I. in 1797.

Ligurian Sage (The), Aulus Persius Flaccus, the satirist (34-62).

Likenesses Repeated.

(1) Strabo (father of Pompey) and his cook were exactly alike.

(2) Sura (proconsul of Sicily) and a fisherman were so much alike that Sura asked the fisherman if his mother had ever been in Rome. "No," said the man, "but my father has."

(3) Walter de Hempsham abbot of Canterbury and his shepherd were so alike that when the shepherd was dressed in the abbot's gown, even king John was deluded by the resemblance.—Percy: Reliques ("King John and the abbot of Canterbury," q.v.).

(4) The brothers Antipholus, the brothers Dromio, the brothers Menæchmus (called by Plautus, Sosicles and Menæchmus), were exactly alike.

Lik'strond, the abode, after death, of perjurers, assassins, and seducers. The word means "strand of corpses." Nestrond is the strand or shore of the dead.—Scandinavian Mythology.

Lilburn (John), a contentious leveller in the Commonwealth, of whom it was said, If no one else were alive, John would quarrel with Lilburn. The epigrammatic epitaph of John Lilburn is as follows:—

Is John departed, and is Lilburn gone?
Farewell to both, to Lilburn and to John!
Yet being gone, take this advice from me:
Let them not both in one grave buried be.
Here lay ye John; lay Lilburn thereabout;
For if they both should meet, they would fall out.

Lili, immortalized by Goethe, was Anna Elizabeth Schönemann, daughter of a Frankfort banker. She was 16 when Goethe first knew her.

Lilies (City of), Florence.

Lil'inau, a woman wooed by a phantom that lived in her father's pines. At nightfall the phantom whispered love, and won the fair Lilinau, who followed his green waving plume through the forest, but never more was seen.—American-Indian Legend.

Told she the tale of the fair Lilinau, who was wooed by a phantom
That through the pines o'er her father's lodge, in the hush of the twilight,
Breathed like the evening wind, and whispered love to the maiden;
Till she followed his green and waving plume tho' the forest,
And never more returned, nor was seen again by her people.
Longfellow: Evangeline, ii. 4 (1849).

Lilis or Lilith, Adam's wife before Eve was created. Lilis refused to submit to Adam, and was turned out of paradise; but she still haunts the air, and is especially hostile to new-born children.

(Goethe has introduced her in his Faust, 1790.)

Lil'lia-Bianca, the bright airy daughter of Nantolet, beloved by Pinac the fellow-traveller of Mirabel "the wild goose."—Fletcher: The Wild-goose Chase (1652).

Lilli-burlero, bullen-a-la! a song which greatly contributed to deprive James II. of his three kingdoms, and to drive him into exile. He had appointed Richard Talbot earl of Tyrconnel, a most out-and-out papist, to the lieutenancy of Ireland, in 1686, and the violence of his administration gave great offence to the protestant party. The song was written in 1683 or 1684, and the king abdicated in 1688.

Ho! broder Teague, dost hear de decree?
Lilli-burlero, bullen-a-la!
Dat we shall have a new deputie?
Lilli-burlero, bullen-a-la!
Lero, lero, lilli-burlero,
Lero, lero, bullen-a-la!

Ho! by shain't Tyburn, it is de Talbote;
Lilli-burlero, bullen-a-la!
And he will cut de Englishmen's troate!
Lilli-burlero, bullen-a-la!
Lero, lero, lilli-burlero,
Lero, lero, bullen-a-la!
(Attributed to Lord Wharton.)

 The song is inserted in Percy's Reliques, ser. iii. bk. iii. 23.

Lilliput, the country of the Lilliputians, a race of pygmies of very diminutive size, to whom Gulliver appeared a monstrous giant.—Swift: Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Lilliput," 1726).

N.B.—The voyage to Lilliput is a satire on the manners and habits of George I.

Lilly, the wife of Andrew. Andrew is the servant of Charles Brisac a scholar.—Fletcher: The Elder Brother (1637).

Lilly (William), an English astrologer, who was employed during the Civil Wars by both parties; and even Charles I. consulted him about his projected escape from Carisbrooke Castle (1602-1681). (See LENORMAND, p. 605.)

He talks of Raymond Lully [q.v.] and the ghost of Lilly.—Congreve: Love for Love, iii. (1695).

Lillyvick, the collector of water-rates, and uncle to Mrs. Kenwigs. He considered himself far superior in a social point of view to Mr. Kenwigs, who was only an ivory-turner; but he confessed him to be "an honest, well-behaved, respectable sort of a man." Mr. Lillyvick looked on himself as one of the élite of society. "If ever an old gentleman made a point of appearing in public shaved close and clean, that old gentleman was Mr. Lillyvick. If ever a collector had borne himself like a collector, and assumed a solemn and portentous dignity, as if he had the whole world on his books, that collector was Mr. Lillyvick." Mr. Kenwigs thought the collector, who was a bachelor, would leave each of the Kenwigses £100; but he "had the baseness" to marry Miss Petowker of the Theatre Royal, and "swindle the Kenwigses of their golden expectations."—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Lily (The), the French king for the time being. So called from the lilies, which, from the time of Clovis, formed the royal device of France. Tasso (Jerusalem Delivered) calls them gigli d'ore ("golden lilies"); but lord Lytton calls them "silver lilies"—

Lord of the silver lilies, canst thou tell
If the same fate await not thy descendant?
Lord Lytton: The Duchess de la Vallière (1836).

The Lily Maid of Astolat, Elaine.—Tennyson: Idylls of the King (1859). ("Astolat" is in Guildford, Surrey.)

The Lily of Medicine, a treatise written by Bernard Gordon, called Lilium Medicinæ (1480). (See GORDONIUS, p. 438.)

Limberham, a tame, foolish keeper. Supposed to be meant for the duke of Lauderdale.—Dryden: Limberham or The Kind Keeper.

Limbo (Latin, limbus, "an edge"), a sort of neutral land on the confines of paradise, for those who are not good enough for heaven and not bad enough for hell, or rather for those who cannot (according to the Church "system") be admitted into paradise, either because they have never heard the gospel or have never been baptized.

These of us
Were blameless; and if aught they merited,
It profits not, since baptism was not theirs.
. . . If they before
The gospel lived, they served not God aright.
. . . For these defects
And for no other evil, we are lost.
Dante: Inferno, iv. (1300).

Limbo of the Moon. Ariosto, in his Orlando Furioso, xxxiv. 70, says, in the moon are treasured up the precious time misspent in play, all vain efforts, all vows never paid, all counsel thrown away, all desires that lead to nothing, the vanity of titles, flattery, great men's promises, court services, and death-bed alms. Pope says—

There heroes' wits are kept in ponderous vases,
And beaus' in snuff-boxes and tweezer-cases;
There broken vows and death-bed alms are found,
And lovers' hearts with ends of ribbon bound;
The courtier's promises, the sick man's prayers,
The smiles of harlots, and the tears of heirs;
Cages for gnats, and chains to yoke a flea,
Dried butterflies, and tomes of casuistry.
Pope: Rape of the Lock, v. (1712).

Limbus Fatuōrum or the "Fools' Paradise," for idiots, madmen, and others who are not responsible for their sins, but yet have done nothing worthy of salvation. Milton says, from the earth fly to the Paradise of Fools

All things transitory and vain . . . the fruits
Of painful superstition and blind zeal . . .
All the unaccomplished works of Nature's hand,
Abortive, monstrous, or unkindly mixed . . .
The builders here of Babel . . .
Others come single. He who to be deemed
A god, leaped fondly into Etna's flames,
Empedoclès; and he who to enjoy
Plato's elysium, leaped into the sea . . .
Embryos and idiots, eremites and friars.
Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 448 (1665).

Limbus Patrum, that half-way house between purgatory and paradise, where patriarchs and prophets, saints, martyrs, and confessors, await the "second coming." This, according to some, is the hadês or "hell" into which Christ descended when "He preached to the spirits in prison." Dantê places Limbo on the confines of hell, but tells us those doomed to dwell there are "only so far afflicted as that they live without hope" (Inferno, iv.).

I have some of them in Limbo Patrum, and there they are like to dance these three days.—Shakespeare: Henry VIII. act v. sc. 3 (1601).

Limbus Puerōrum or "Child's Paradise," for unbaptized infants too young to commit actual sin, but not eligible for heaven because they have not been baptized.

 According to Dantê, Limbo is between hell and that border-land where dwell "the praiseless and the blameless dead." (See INFERNO, p. 523.)

Limisso, the city of Cyprus, called Caria by Ptolemy.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Lincius. (See LYNCEUS.)

Lincoln (The bishop of), in the court of queen Elizabeth. He was Thomas Cowper.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Lincoln Green. Lincoln at one time dyed the best green of all England, and Coventry the best blue.

> . . . and girls in Lincoln green.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, XXV. (1622).

 Kendal was also at one time noted for its green. Hence Falstaff speaks of "three misbegotten knaves in Kendal green."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. act ii. sc. 4 (1597).

> Here be a sort of ragged knaves come in,
> Clothed all in Kendale greene.
> Playe of Robyn Hood.

Lincolnshire Grazier (A). The Rev. Thomas Hartwell Horne published The Complete Grazier under this pseudonym (1805).

Linco'ya (3 syl.), husband of Co'atel, and a captive of the Az'tecas. "Once, when a chief was feasting Madoc, a captive served the food." Madoc says, "I marked the youth, for he had features of a gentler race; and oftentimes his eye was fixed on me with looks of more than wonder." This young man, "the flower of all his nation," was to be immolated to the god Tezcalipo'ca; but on the eve of sacrifice he made his escape, and flew to Madoc for protection. The fugitive proved both useful and faithful, but when he heard of the death of Coatel, he was quite heart-broken. Ayaya'ca, to divert him, told him about the spirit-land; and Lincoya asked, "Is the way thither long?"

> The old man replied, "A way of many moons."
> "I know a shorter path," exclaimed the youth.
> And up he sprang, and from the precipice
> Darted. A moment; and Ayaya'ca heard
> His body fall upon the rocks below.
> Southey: Madoc, II. 22 (1805).

Lindab'rides (4 syl.), a euphemism for a female of no repute, a courtezan. Lindabridês is the heroine of the romance entitled The Mirror of Knighthood, one of the books in don Quixote's library (pt. I. i. 6), and the name became a household word for a mistress. It occurs in two of sir W. Scott's novels, Kenilworth and Woodstock.

Lindesay, an archer in the Scotch guard of Louis XI. of France.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Lindesay (Lord), one of the embassy to queen Mary of Scotland.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Lindor, a poetic swain or lover en bergère.

> Do not, for Heaven's sake, bring down Corydon and Lindor upon us.—Sir W. Scott.

Lindsay (Margaret), the heroine of a novel by professor John Wilson, entitled Trials of Margaret Lindsay, a very pathetic story (1785–1854).

Linet', daughter of sir Persaunt, and sister of Lionês of Castle Perilous (ch. 131). Her sister was held captive by sir Ironside, the Red Knight of the Red Lands. Linet went to king Arthur to entreat that one of his knights might be sent to liberate her; but as she refused to give up the name of her sister, the king said no knight of the Round Table could undertake the adventure. At this, a young man nicknamed "Beaumains" (Gareth), from the unusual size of his hands, and who had been serving in the kitchen for twelve months, entreated that he might be allowed the quest, which the king granted. Linet, however, treated him with the utmost contumely, calling him dish-washer, kitchen knave, and lout; but he overthrew all the knights opposed to him, delivered the lady Lionês, and married her. (See LYNETTE.)—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 120–153 (1470).

N.B.—Some men nicknamed her "The Savage" (ch. 151). Tennyson, in his Gareth and Lynette, makes Gareth marry Lynette, which spoils the allegory (see p. 406).

Lingo, in O'Keefe's comedy Agreeable Surprise (1798).

Lingon (Parson), in the novel called Felix Holt, the Radical, by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross) (1866).

Lingua, or "the Combat of the Tongue," an allegorical play. Cromwell took the part of "Tactus" in this play (1607).

Linkinwater (Tim), confidential clerk to the brothers Cheeryble. A kind-hearted old bachelor, fossilized in ideas, but most kind-hearted, and devoted to his masters almost to idolatry. He is much attached to a blind blackbird called "Dick," which he keeps in a large cage. The bird has lost its voice from old age; but, in Tim's opinion, there is no equal to it in the whole world. The old clerk marries Miss La Creevy, a miniature-painter.

Punctual as the counting-house dial . . . he performed the minutest actions, and arranged the minutest articles in his little room in a precise and regular order. Paper, pens, ink, ruler, sealing-wax, wafers, . . . Tim's hat, Tim's scrupulously folded gloves, Tim's other coat, . . . all had their accustomed inchus of space. . . . There was not a more accurate instrument in existence than Tim Linkinwater.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby, xxxvii. (1838).

Linklater (Laurie), yeoman of the king's kitchen. A friend to Ritchie Moniplies.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Linne (The Heir of), a ballad in two parts. (See under HEIR OF LINNE, p. 479.)

Lion (A), emblem of the tribe of Judah. The old church at Totnes contained a stone pulpit divided into compartments containing shields, decorated with the several emblems of the Jewish tribes, of which this is one.

Judah is a lion's whelp; . . . he couched as a lion, and as an old lion; who shall rouse him up?—Gen. xlix. 9.

The Lion, a symbol of ambition. When Dantè began the ascent of fame, he was met first by a panther (pleasure), and then by a lion (ambition), which tried to stop his further progress.

A lion came
With head erect, and hunger mad.
Dantè: Hell, i. (1300).

Lion (The), Henry duke of Bavaria and Saxony, son of Henry "the Proud" (1129–1195).

Louis VIII. of France, born under the sign Leo (1187, 1223–1226).

William of Scotland, who chose a red lion rampant for his cognizance (*, 1165–1214).

The Golden Lion, emblem of ancient Assyria. The bear was that of ancient Persia.

Where is th' Assyrian lion's golden hide,
That all the East once grasped in lordly paw?
Where that great Persian bear, whose swelling pride
The lion's self tore out with rav'nous jaw?
P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, vii. (1633).

The Valiant Lion, Alep Arslan, son of Togrul Beg the Perso-Turkish monarch (*, 1063–1072).

Lion Attending on Man.

(1) Una was attended by a lion. Spenser says that Una was seeking St. George, and as she sat to rest herself, a lion rushed suddenly out of a thicket, with gaping mouth and lashing tail; but as it drew near, it was awe-struck, licked her feet and hands, and followed her like a dog. Sansloy slew the faithful beast.—Faërie Queene, I. iii. 42 (1590).

N.B.—This is an allegory of the Reformation. The "lion" means England, and "Una" means truth or the reformed religion. England (the lion) waited on truth or the Reformation. "Sansloy" means queen Mary or false faith, which killed the lion, or separated England from truth (or the true faith). It might seem to some that Sansfoy should have been substituted for Sansloy; but this could not be, because Sansfoy had been slain already.

(2) Sir Ewain de Gallis or Iwain de Galles was attended by a lion, which, in gratitude to the knight, who had delivered it from a serpent, ever after became his faithful servant, approaching the knight with tears, and rising on its hind feet.

(3) Sir Geoffrey de Latour was aided by a lion against the Saracens; but the faithful brute was drowned in attempting to follow the vessel in which the knight had embarked on his departure from the Holy Land.

(4) St. Jerome is represented as attended by a lion. The tale is that while St. Jerome was lecturing, a lion entered the room, and lifted up one of his paws. All the disciples fled precipitately, but St. Jerome took up the paw and saw it was wounded with a thorn. He took out the thorn and dressed the wound; and the lion showed a wish to stay with its benefactor, and, followed him about like a dog. (See ANDROCLUS, p. 42.)

Lion of God (The), Ali, son-in-law of Mahomet. He was called at birth "The Rugged Lion" (al Haïdara) (602, 655–661).

Hamza, called "The Lion of God and of His Prophet." So Gabriel told Mahomet his uncle was registered in heaven.

Lion of Janina, Ali Pasha, overthrown in 1822 by Ibrahim Pasha (1741, 1788–1822).

Lion of the North (The), Gustavus Adolphus (1594, 1611–1632).

Lion-Heart. Richard I. was called Cœur de Lion because he plucked out a lion's heart, to which beast he had been exposed by the duke of Austria, for having slain his son.

It is sayd that a lyon was put to kynge Richarde, beying in prison, . . . to devour him; and when the lyon was gapynge, he put his arme in his mouth, and pulled the lyon by the harte so hard that he slewe the lyon; and therefore . . . he is called Richarde Cure de Lyon.—Rastal: Chronicle (1532).

Lion King of Assyria, Arioch al Asser (B.C. 1927–1897).

Lion Rouge (Le), marshal Ney, who had red hair and red whiskers (1769–1815).

Lion-Tamer. One of the most remarkable was Ellen Bright, who exhibited in Wombwell's menagerie. She was killed by a tiger in 1850, aged 17 years.

Lion's Provider (The), the jackal, which often starts prey which the lion appropriates.

> . . . the poor jackals are less foul
> (As being the brave lion's keen providers)
> Than human insects catering for spiders.
> Byron: Don Juan, ix. 27 (1824).

Lions (White and Red). Prester John, in his letter to Manuel Comnēnus emperor of Constantinople, says his land is the "home of white and red lions" (1165).

Lionel and Clarissa, an opera by Bickerstaff (1768). Sir John Flowerdale has a daughter named Clarissa, whose tutor is Lionel, an Oxford graduate. Colonel Oldboy, his neighbour, has a daughter Diana and a son named Jessamy, a noodle and a fop. A proposal is made for Clarissa Flowerdale to marry Jessamy; but she despises the prig, and loves Lionel. After a little embroglio, sir John gives his consent to this match. Now for Diana: Harman, a guest of Oldboy's, tells him he is in love, but that the father of the lady will not consent to his marriage. Oldboy advises him to elope, lends his carriage and horses, and writes a letter for Harman, which he is to send to the girl's father. Harman follows this advice, and elopes with Diana; but Diana repents, returns home unmarried, and craves her father's forgiveness. The old colonel yields, the lovers are united, and Oldboy says he likes Harman the better for his pluck and manliness.

Lionell (Sir), brother of sir Launcelot, son of Ban king of Benwick (Brittany).

Lionet (3 syl.), daughter of sir Persaunt of Castle Perilous, where she was held captive by sir Ironside, the Red Knight of the Red Lands. Her sister Linet went to the court of king Arthur to request that some knight would undertake to deliver her sister from her oppressors; but as she refused to give up the name of the lady, the king said no knight of the Round Table could undertake the quest. (For the rest of the tale, see LINET.)—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 120–153 (1470).

Li'onesse (3 syl.), Lyonesse, or Lionës, a tract of land between Land's End and the Scilly Isles, now submerged "full forty fathoms under water." It formed a part of Cornwall. Thus sir Tristram de Lionês is always called a Cornish knight. When asked his name, he tells sir Kay that he is sir Tristram de Lionês; to which the seneschal answers, "Yet heard I never in no place that any good knight came out of Cornwall."—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 56 (1470), (See LEONESSE, p. 606.)

(Respecting the knights of Cornwall, sir Mark the king of Cornwall had thrown the whole district into bad odour. He was false, cowardly, mean, and most unknightly.)

Lir. The Death of the Children of Lir. This is one of the three tragic stories of the ancient Irish. The other two are The Death of the Children of Touran and The Death of the Children of Usnach. (See FIONNUALA, p. 369.)—O'Flanghan: Transactions of the Gaelic Society, i.

 Lir (King). father of Fionnuala. On the death of Fingula (the mother of his daughter), he married the wicked Aoife, who, through spite, transformed the children of Lir into swans, doomed to float on the water for centuries, till they hear the first mass-bell ring. Tom Moore has versified this legend.

> Silent, O Moyle, be the roar of thy water;
> Break not, ye breezes, your chain of repose—
> While murmuring mournfully Lir's lonely daughter
> Tells to the night-star her tale of woes.
> Moore: Irish Melodies, iv. ("Song of Fionnuala," 1814).

Liris, a proud but lovely daughter of the race of man, beloved by Rubi, first of the angel host. Her passion was the love of knowledge, and she was captivated by all her angel lover told her of heaven and the works of God. At last she requested Rubi to appear before her in all his glory, and, as she fell into his embrace, she was burnt to ashes by the rays which issued from him.—Moore: Loves of the Angels, ii. (1822).

(This is the tale of SEMELE, q.v.)

Lirriper's Lodgings (Mrs.), 81, Norfolk Street, Strand. A Christmas tale told in All the Year Round, by Dickens (1863). It recounts her troubles with her lodgers, and with Miss Wozenham, an opposition lodging-house keeper; but the cream of the tale is the adoption of poor Jemmy by mayor Jackman—his education at home and his being sent to a boarding-school. It is an excellent tale. A sequel, called Mrs. Lirriper's Legacy, appeared in 1864.

Lisa, an innkeeper's daughter, who wishes to marry Elvi'no a wealthy farmer; but Elvino is in love with Ami'na. Suspicious circumstances make Elvino renounce his true love and promise marriage to Lisa; but the suspicion is shown to be causeless, and Lisa is discovered to be the paramour of another. So Elvino returns to his first love, and Lisa is left to Alessio, with whom she had been living previously.—Bellini: La Sonnambula, an opera (1831).

Lis'boa or Lisbo'a, Lisbon.

Lisette. Les Infidélités de Lisette and Les Gueux are the two songs which, in 1813, gained for Béranger admission to the "Caveau," a club of Paris, established in 1729 and broken up in 1749; it was re-established in 1806, and finally closed in 1817.

Les Infidélités supposes that Béranger loved Lisette, who bestowed her favours on sundry admirers; and Béranger, at each new proof of infidelity, "drowned his sorrow in the bowl."

> Lisette, ma Lisette,
> Tu m'as trompé toujours,
> Mais vive la grisette!
> Je veux, Lisette,
> Boire à nos amours.
> Les Infidélités de Lisette.

Lismaha'go (Captain), a superannuated officer on half-pay, who marries Miss Tabitha Bramble for the sake of her £4000. He is a hard-featured, forbidding Scotchman, singular in dress, eccentric in manners, self-conceited, pedantic, disputatious, and rude. Though most tenacious in argument, he can yield to Miss Tabitha, whom he wishes to conciliate. Lismahago reminds one of don Quixote, but is sufficiently unlike to be original.—Smollett: The Expedition of Humphry Clinker (1771).

Lissardo, valet to don Felix. He is a conceited high-life-below-stairs fop, who makes love to Inis and Flora.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Wonder (1713). (See FLIPPANTA, p. 374.)

> Lee Lewes [1740–1803] played "Lissardo" in the style of his great master [Woodward], and most divertingly.—Boaden: Life of Mrs. Siddons.

Lis'uarte (The Exploits and Adventures of), part of the series of Le Roman des Romans, or that pertaining to "Am'adis of Gaul." This part was added by Juan Diaz.

Literary Forgers. (See FORGERS AND FORGERIES, p. 382.)

Literary Men and their Wives. (See MARRIED MEN OF GENIUS.)

Literature (Father of Modern French), Claude de Seyssel (1450–1520).

Father of German Literature, Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729–1781).

Littimer, the painfully irreproachable valet of Steerforth; in whose presence David Copperfield feels always most uncomfortably small. Though as a valet he is propriety in Sunday best, he is nevertheless cunning and deceitful. Steerforth, tired of "Little Em'ly," wishes to marry her to Littimer; but from this lot she is rescued, and emigrates to Australia.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Little (Thomas). Thomas Moore published, in 1808, a volume of amatory poems under this name.

> 'Tis Little!—young Catullus of his day,
> As sweet but as immoral as his lay.
> Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Little Billee. (See BILLEE, p. 120.)

Little Britain, Brittany; also called Armor'ica, and in Arthurian romance Benwicke or Benwick,

N.B.—There is a part of London called "Little Britain." It lies between Christ's Hospital (the Blue-coat School) and Aldersgate Street. It was here that Mr. Jaggers had his chambers. (See JAGGERS, p. 538.)

Little Corporal (The). General Bonaparte was so called after the battle of Lodi in 1796, from his youthful age and low stature.

Little Dorrit, the heroine and title of a novel by C. Dickens (1855). Little Dorrit was born and brought up in the Marshalsea prison, Bermondsey, where her father was confined for debt; and when about 14 years of age she used to do needlework, to earn a subsistence for herself and her father. The child had a pale, transparent face; quick in expression, though not beautiful in feature. Her eyes were a soft hazel, and her figure slight. The little dove of the prison was idolized by the prisoners, and when she walked out, every man in Bermondsey who passed her touched or took off his hat out of respect to her good works and active benevolence. Her father, coming into a property, was set free at length, and Little Dorrit married Arthur Clen-nam, the marriage service being celebrated in the Marshalsea, by the prison chaplain.

Little-Endians and Big-Endians, two religious factions, which waged incessant war with each other on the right interpretation of the fifty-fourth chapter of the Blun'decral: "All true believers break their eggs at the convenient end." The godfather of Calin Deffar Plune, the reigning emperor of Lilliput, happened to cut his finger while breaking his egg at the big end, and therefore commanded all faithful Lilliputians to break their eggs in future at the small end. The Blefuscudians called this decree rank heresy, and determined to exterminate the believers of such an abominable practice from the face of the earth. Hundreds of treatises were published on both sides, but each empire put all those books opposed to its own views into the Index Expurgatorius, and not a few of the more zealous sort died as martyrs for daring to follow their private judgment in the matter.—Swift: Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Lilliput," 1726).

Little Fleas have Lesser Parasites. Swift, in his Rhapsody on Poetry, wrote—

> So naturalists observe, a flea
> Has smaller fleas that on him prey
> And these have smaller still to bite 'em,
> And so proceed ad infinitum.

Little French Lawyer (The), a comedy by Beaumont (?) and Fletcher (1647). The person so called is La Writ, a wrangling French advocate.

(Beaumont died 1616.)

Little Gentleman in Velvet (To the), a favourite Jacobite toast in the reign of queen Anne. The reference is to the mole that raised the hill against which the horse of Willian III. stumbled while riding in the park of Hampton Court. By this accident the king broke his collar-bone, a severe illness ensued, and he died early in 1702.

Little John (whose surname was Nailor), the fidus Achatès of Robin Hood. He could shoot an arrow a measured mile and somewhat more. So could Robin Hood; but no other man ever lived who could perform the same feat. In one of the Robin Hood ballads we are told that the name of this free-shooter was John Little, and that William Stutely, in merry mood, reversed the names.

> "O, here is my hand," the stranger replyed;
> "I'll serve you with all my whole heart.
> My name is John Little, a man of good mettle;
> Ne'er doubt me, for I'll play my part."
> He was, I must tell you, full seven foot high,
> And maybe an ell in the waste . . .
> Brave Stutely said then . . .
> "This infant was called John Little," quoth he;
> "Which name shall be changèd anon:
> The words we'll transpose, so wherever he goes
> His name shall be called Little John."
> Ritson: Robin Hood Ballads, ii. 21 (before 1689).

(A bow (says Ritson) which belonged to Little John, with the name Naylor on it, is now in the possession of a gentleman in the west riding of Yorkshire.)

Scott has introduced Little John in The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Little John (Hugh). John Hugh Lockhart, grandson of sir Walter Scott, is so called by sir Walter in his Tales of a Grandfather, written for his grandson.

Little Marlborough, count von Schwerin, a Prussian field-marshal and a companion of the duke of Marlborough (1684-1757).

Little Nell, a child distinguished for her purity of character, though living in the midst of selfishness, impurity, and crime. She was brought up by her grandfather, who was in his dotage and, having lost his property, tried to eke out a narrow living by selling lumber or curiosities. At length, through terror of Quilp, the old man and his grandchild stole away, and led a vagrant life, the one idea of both being to get as far as possible from the reach of Quilp. They finally settled down in a cottage overlooking a country churchyard, where Nell died.—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop (1840).

Little Peddlington, an imaginary place, the village of quackery and cant, egotism and humbug, affectation and flattery.—Poole: Little Peddlington.

Little Queen, Isabella of Valois, who was married at the age of eight years to Richard II. of England, and was a widow at 13 years of age (1387-1410).

Little Red Riding-Hood (Le Petit Chaperon Rouge), from Les Contes of Charles Perrault (1697). Ludwig Tieck reproduced the same tale in his Volksmärchen (Popular Stories), in 1795, under the German title Leben und Tod des Kleinen Röthkappchen. A little girl takes a present to her grandmother; but a wolf has assumed the place of the old woman, and, when the child gets into bed, devours her. The brothers Grimm have reproduced this tale in German. In the Swedish version, Red Riding-Hood is a young woman, who takes refuge in a tree, the wolf gnaws the tree, and the lover arrives just in time to see his mistress devoured by the monster.

"O grandmama, what great eyes you have got!" "The better to see you with, my little dear." "O grandmama, what great ears you have got!" "The better to hear you with, my little dear." "O grandmama, what a great mouth you have got!" "The better to eat you up, my little dear," and so saying . . .

Littlejohn (Bailie), a magistrate at Fairport.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Live to Please . . . Dr. Johnson, in the prologue spoken by Garrick at the opening of Drury Lane, in 1747, says—

The drama's laws the drama's patrons give,
For we that live to please must please to live.

Livingstone (Guy), a novel by George A. Lawrence.

Livy (The Protestant), John Sleidan of Cologne, who wrote a History of the Reformation in Germany (1506–1556).

Livy (The Russian), Nicholas Michaelovitch Karamzin (1765–1826).

Livy of France, Juan de Mariana (1537–1624).

Livy of Portugal, João de Barros (1496–1570).

Lizard. (See "Lizard" under the heading of SUPERSTITIONS.)

Lizard Islands, fabulous islands, where damsels, outcast from the rest of the world, find a home and welcome.—Torquemada: Garden of Flowers.

Lizard Point (Cornwall), a corruption of Lazar's Point, being a place of retirement for lazars or lepers.

Lla'ian, the unwed mother of prince Hoel. His father was prince Hoel, the illegitimate son of king Owen of North Wales. Hoel the father was slain in battle by his half-brother David, successor to the throne; and Llaian, with her young son, also called Hoel, accompanied prince Madoc to America.—Southey: Madoc (1805).

Llewel'lyn, son of Yorwerth, and grandson of Owen king of North Wales. Yorwerth was the eldest son, but was set aside because he had a blemish in the face, and his half-brother David was king. David began his reign by killing or banishing all the family of his father who might disturb his succession. Amongst those he killed was Yorwerth, in consequence of which Llewellyn resolved to avenge his father's death; and his hatred against his uncle was unbounded.—Southey: Madoc (1805).

"Blemish . . ." see KINGSHIP.

Llewellyn's Dog. (See GELERT, p. 410.)

Lloyd with an "L."

One morning, a Welsh coach-maker came with his bill to my lord (the earl of Brentford). "You are called, I think, Mr. Lloyd?" "At your lordship's service, my lord." "What! Lloyd with an 'L'?" It was with an "L." "In your part of the world I have heard that Lloyd and Floyd are synonymous; is it so?" inquired his lordship. "Very often, indeed, my lord," was the reply. "You say that you spell your name with an 'L'?" "Always, my lord." "That, Mr. Lloyd, is a little unlucky; for I am paying my debts alphabetically, and in four or five years you might have come in with the 'F's'; but I am afraid I can give you no hopes for your 'L.' Good morning."—Foote: The Lame Lover.

Lloyd's Books, two enormous ledger-looking volumes, raised on desks at right and left of the entrance to Lloyd's Rooms. These books give the principal arrivals, and all losses by wreck, fire, or other accident at sea. The entries are written in a fine, bold, Roman hand, legible to all readers.

Lloyd's List is a London periodical, in which the shipping news received at Lloyd's Rooms is regularly published.

L. N. R., initialism of Mrs. Raynard, authoress of The Book and Its Story, The Missing Link, etc. Died 1879.

Loathly Lady (The), a hideous creature, whom sir Gaw'ain marries, and who immediately becomes a most beautiful woman.—The Marriage of Sir Gawain (a ballad).

The walls . . . were clothed with grim old tapestry, representing the memorable story of sir Gawain's wedding . . . with the Loathly Lady.—Sir W. Scott.

Loba'ba, one of the sorcerers in the caverns of Dom-Daniel, "under the roots of the ocean." These spirits were destined to be destroyed by one of the race of Hodeirah, and, therefore, they persecuted the whole of that race even to death. (For the sequel of the tale, see MOHARER.) —Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer (1797).

Locha'ber (Farewell to), a song by Allan Ramsay, set to music for three voices by Dr. Chalcott.

Farewell to Locha'ber, and farewell to Jean [Jeen],
Where heartsome with thee I have many days been.
These tears that I shed are all for my dear,
And not for the dangers attending on war;
Though borne on rough seas to a far-distant shore,
Maybe to return to Lochaber no more!

Lochaw. It's a far cry to Lochaw; i.e. his lands are very extensive. Lochaw was the original seat of the Campbells; and so extensive were their possessions, that no cry or challenge could reach from one end of them to the other. Metaphorically, it means—the subject following has no connection, or a remote one, with the subject just mentioned.

Lochiel' (2 syl.). Sir Evan Cameron, lord of Lochiel, surnamed "The Black" and "The Ulysses of the Highlands," died 1719. His son, called "The Gentle Lochiel," is the one referred to by Thomas Campbell in Lochiel's Warning. He fought in the battle of Cullo'den for prince Charles, the Young Pretender (1746).

Lochiel, Lochiel, beware of the day
When the Lowlands shall meet thee in battle array!
For a field of the dead rushes red on my sight,
And the clans of Cullo'den are scattered in fight.
Campbell: Lochiel's Warning.

And Cameron, in the shock of steel,
Die like the offspring of Lochiel.
Sir W. Scott: Field of Waterloo.

Lochinvar', a young Highlander, in love with a lady at Netherby Hall (condemned to marry a "laggard in love and a dastard in war"). Her young chevalier induced the too-willing lassie to be his partner in a dance; and, while the guests were intent on their amusements, swung her into his saddle and made off with her before the bridegroom could recover from his amazement.—Sir W. Scott: Marmion (1808).

Lochleven (The lady of), mother of the regent Murray.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

(Michael Bruce wrote a descriptive poem in blank verse, called Lochleven, which was published in 1770.)

Lochlin, the Gaelic name for Scandinavia. It generally means Denmark. —Ossian: Fingal.

Lockit, the jailer in Gay's Beggar's Opera. He was an inhuman brute, who refused to allow captain Macheath any more candles in his cell, and threatened to clap on extra fetters, unless he supplied him with more "garnish" (jail fees). Lockit loaded his prisoners with fetters in inverse proportion to the fees which they paid, ranging "from one guinea to ten." (See LUCY.)—Gay: The Beggar's Opera (1727).

The quarrel between Peachum and Lockit was an allusion to a personal collision between Walpole and his colleague lord Townsend.—R. Chambers: English Literature, i. 571.

Locksley, in Nottinghamshire, the birthplace of Robin Hood.

In Locksly town, in merry Nottinghamshire,
In merry, sweet Locksly town,
There bold Robin Hood was born and was bred,
Bold Robin of famous renown.
Ritson: Robin Hood, ii. 1 (1795).

Locksley, alias "Robin Hood," an archer at the tournament (ch. xiii.). Said to have been the name of the village where the outlaw was born.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Locksley Hall. The lord of Locksley Hall loves his cousin Amy, but Amy, at her father's instigation, marries a rich clown. The lord of Locksley Hall, indignant, says he will leave Europe, where all are slaves to gold, and marry some iron-jointed savage; but on reflection he says there can be no sympathy of mind in such a union; and he resolves to continue at Locksley Hall, for "better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay." —Tennyson: Locksley Hall.

Locrin (2 syl.), father of Sabri'na, and eldest son of the mythical Brutus king of ancient Britain. On the death of his father, Locrin became king of Loe'gria (England).—Geoffrey: Brit. Hist., ii. 5.

Locusta, a by-word of infamy. She lived in the early part of the Roman empire. Locusta poisoned Claudius and Britannicus, and attempted to destroy Nero, but, being found out, was put to death.

Loda or Cruth-Loda, a Scandinavian god, which dwelt "on the misty top of U-thorno . . . the house of the spirits of men." Fingal did not worship at the "stone of this power," but looked on it as hostile to himself and friendly to his foes. Hence, when Loda appeared to him on one occasion, Fingal knew it was with no friendly intent, and with his sword he cleft the intrenchant spirit in twain. Whereupon it uttered a terrible shriek, which made the island tremble; and, "rolling itself up, rose upon the wings of the wind," and departed. (See MARS WOUNDED.)—Ossian: Carric-Thura.

(In Oina-Morul, "Loda" seems to be a place—

They stretch their hands to the shells in Loda.)

Lodbrog, king of Denmark (eighth century), famous for his wars and victories. He was also an excellent scald or bard, like Ossian. Falling into the hands of his enemies, he was cast into jail, and devoured by serpents.

Lodging. "My lodging is on the cold ground."—Rhodes: Bombastes Furioso (1790).

Lodois'ka (4 syl.), a beautiful Polish princess, in love with count Floreski. She is the daughter of prince Lupauski, who places her under the protection of a friend (baron Lovinski) during a war between the Poles and Tartars. Here her lover finds her a prisoner at large; but the baron seeks to poison him. At this crisis, the Tartars arrive and invade the castle. The baron is killed, the lady released, and all ends happily.—J. P. Kemble: Lodoiska (a melodrame).

Lodo'na, a nymph, fond of the chase. One day, Pan saw her, and tried to catch her; but she fled, and implored Cynthia to save her. Her prayer was heard, and she was instantly converted into "a silver stream, which ever keeps its virgin coolness." Lodona is an affluent of the Thames.—Pope: Windsor Forest (1713).

Lodore (2 syl.), a cataract three miles from Greta Hall, Keswick, rendered famous by Southey's piece of word-painting called The Cataract of Lodore (1820). This and Edgar Poe's Bells are the best pieces of word-painting in the language, at least of a similar length.

Lodovi'co, kinsman to Brabantio the father of Desdemona.—Shakespeare: Othello (1611).

Lodovico and Piso, two cowardly gulls.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Captain (1613).

Lodowick, the name assumed by the duke of Vienna, when he retired for a while from State affairs, and dressed as a friar, to watch the carrying out of a law recently enforced against prostitution.—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure (1603).

Loe'gria (4 syl.), England, the kingdom of Logris or Locrine, eldest son of Brute the mythical king of Britain.

Thus Cambria [Wales] to her right that would herself restore,
And rather than to lose Loëgria, looks for more.
Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1622).

Il est écrit qu'il est une heure,
Où tout le royaume de Logres,
Qui jadis fut la terre ès ogres
Sera détruit par cette lance.
Chrétien de Troyes: Parsival (1170).

Lofty, a detestable prig, always boasting of his intimacy with people of quality.—Goldsmith: The Good-natured Man (1767).

Lofty (Sir Thomas), a caricature of lord Melcombe. Sir Thomas is a man utterly destitute of all capacity, yet sets himself up for a Mecænas; and is well sponged by needy scribblers, who ply him with fulsome dedications.—Foote: The Patron (1764).

Log (King), a roi fainéant. The frogs prayed to Jove to send them a king, and the god threw a log into the pool, the splash of which terribly alarmed them for a time; but they soon learnt to despise a monarch who allowed them to jump upon its back, and never resented their familiarities. The croakers complained to Jove for sending them so worthless a king, and prayed him to send one more active and imperious; so he sent them a stork, which devoured them.—Æsop's Fab'es. (See STORK.)

Logic (Bob), the Oxonian, in Pierce Egan's Life in London (1824).

Logistil'la, a good fairy, sister of Alci'na the sorceress. She taught Ruggie'ro (3 syl.) to manage the hippogriff, and gave Astolpho a magic book and horn. Logistilla is human reason personified.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Logothete (The), or chancellor of the Grecian empire.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Logres (2 syl.). England is so called from Logris or Locrine, eldest son of the mythical king Brute.

. . . le royaume de Logres,
Qui jadis fut la terre ès ogres.
Chrétien de Troyes: Parsival (1170).

Logria, England. (See LOGRES.)

Logris or Locris, same as Locrin or Locrine, eldest son of Brute the mythical king of Britain.

Logris, England.

I am banished out of the country of Logris for ever; that is to say, out of the country of England.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 19 (1470).

Lohengrin, "Knight of the Swan," son of Parzival. He came to Brabante in a ship drawn by a swan; and, having liberated the duchess Elsen who was a captive, he married her, but declined to reveal his name. Not long after this, he went against the Huns and Saracens, performed marvels of bravery, and returned to Germany covered with glory. Elsen, being laughed at by her friends for not knowing the name of her husband, resolved to ask him of his family; but no sooner had she done so than the white swan reappeared and carried him away. —Wolfram von Eschenbach (a minnesinger, thirteenth century).

L'Oiseleur ["the bird-catcher"], the person who plays the magic flute.—Mozart: Die Zauberflöte (1791).

Loki, the god of strife and spirit of all evil. His wife is Angerbode (4 syl.), i.e. "messenger of wrath," and his three sons are Fenris, Midgard, and Hela. Loki gave the blind god Höder an arrow of mistletoe, and told him to try it; so the blind Höder discharged the arrow and slew Baldr (the Scandinavian Apollo). This calamity was so grievous to the gods, that they unanimously agreed to restore him to life again.—Scandinavian Mythology. (See LAMECH'S SONG, p. 588.)

Lokman, an Arabian contemporary with David and Solomon. Noted for his Fables.

Lolah, one of the three beauties of the harem into which don Juan in female disguise was admitted. She "was dusk as India and as warm." The other two were Katin'ka and Dudù.—Byron: Don Juan, vi. 40, 41 (1824).

Lollius, an author often referred to by writers of the Middle Ages, but probably a "Mrs. Harris" of Kennahtwhar.

Lollius, if a writer of that name existed at all, was a somewhat somewhere.—Coleridge.

London, a poem by Dr. Johnson, in imitation of the Third Satire of Juvenal (1738).

London Antiquary (A). John Camden Hotten published his Dictionary of Modern Slang, etc., under this pseudonym.

London Bridge is Built on Woolpacks. In the reign of Henry II., Pious Peter, a chaplain of St. Mary Colechurch, in the Poultry, built a stone bridge in lieu of the wooden one which had been destroyed by fire. The king helped him by a tax on wool, and hence the saying referred to above.

London Spy (The), by Ned Ward (1698–1700). (See Old and New London, vol. i. p. 423.)

Long (Tom), the hero of an old popular tale entitled The Merry Conceits of Tom Long the Carrier, etc.

Long Peter, Peter Aartsen, the Flemish painter. He was so called from his extraordinary height (1507–1573).

Long-Sword (Richard), son of the "fair Rosamond" and Henry II. His brother was Geoffroy archbishop of York.

Long-sword, the brave son of beauteous Rosamond.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xviii. (1613).

Long-Sword, William I. of Normandy, son of Rollo, assassinated by the count of Flanders (920–943).

Long Tom Coffin, a sailor of heroic character and most amiable disposition, introduced by Fenimore Cooper of New York in his novel called The Pilot (1823). Fitzball has dramatized the story.

Longaville (3 syl.), a young lord attending on Ferdinand king of Navarre. He promises to spend three years in study with the king, during which time no woman is to approach the court; but no sooner has he signed the compact than he falls in love with Maria. When he proposes to her, she defers his suit for twelve months, and she promises to change her "black gown for a faithful friend" if he then remains of the same mind.

A man of sovereign parts he is esteemed;
Well fitted in arts, glorious in arms:
Nothing becomes him ill; that he would well,
The only soil of his fair virtue's gloss . . .
Is a sharp wit matched with too blunt a will;
Whose edge . . . none spares that come within his power.
Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, act ii. sc. 1 (1594).

Longchamp, bishop of Ely, high justiciary of England during the absence of king Richard Cœur de Lion.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Longevity. Lord Bacon cites the cases of persons who have died between the ages of 150 and 160 years, and asserts that the citations rest on the most satisfactory evidence.

¶ The Manchester Iris (October 11, 1823) speaks of a couple then "living," the husband 128 and the wife 126 years of age. (See Notes and Queries, February 21, 1891, p. 144.)

The following is a list of persons of note in Great Britain, who have exceeded 100 years :—

(1) BOWELS (James), of Killingworth, Warwickshire, died November, 1756, at the age of 153.

(2) CARN (Thomas), according to the parish register of St. Leonard's Church, Shropshire, died January 22, 1588, at the age of 207!! If this entry is correct, he was born in the age of Richard II., and died in that of Elizabeth.

(3) CATHARINE, countess of Desmond (fifteenth century), died at the age of 140.

(4) EVANS (Henry), a Welshman, died at the age of 129 (1642–1771).

(5) FINCH (Margaret) died at the age of 109. (See MARGARET FINCH.)

(6) GIBSON (Margaret) died at the age of 136 or 147. (See MARGARET GIBSON.)

(7) HASTINGS (Henry), Charles I.'s forester, died at the age of 102 (1537–1639).

(8) LAUGHER (Thomas), of Markley, Worcestershire, died at the age of 107 (1700–1807).

His mother reached the age of 108.

(9) LUFKIN (The Rev.) died at the age of 111, and was rector of Offord 57 years (1621–1678). He did "duty" to the last, and preached the Sunday before his death.—Parish Register.

(10) JENKINS (Henry) died at the age of 169 (1591–1670, October 8).

Ufland, professor of medicine in Jena University, investigated this case.

(11) KIRTON (George), of Yorkshire, died at the age of 125. (See Notes and Queries, January 28, 1893, p. 66.)

(12) MACKLIN or MACLAUGHLIN (Charles), playwright and actor, died at the age of 107 (1690–1797).

(13) PARR (Thomas), of Atterbury, in Shropshire, an agricultural labourer, died at the age of 152 (1483–1635). He married his second wife when he was 122 years old, and had a son. Old Parr lived in the reigns of ten sovereigns.

There were four others of the same family, the youngest of whom died at the age of 123; and what is still more marvellous is that his son-in-law, John Newell, also reached the age of 127.

(14) PATTEN or BATTEN (Margaret), of Glasgow, died at the age of 134 (1603–1737). She was buried at St. Margaret's, Westminster; and a portrait of her was hung at St. Margaret's Workhouse.

(15) SCRIMSHAW (Jane) died at the age of 127 (1584–1711). She lived in the reigns of eight sovereigns.

The next two are from tablets in St. Andrew's Church, Shiffnal, Salop—

(16) WAKLBY (William) died at the age of 124. He was baptized at Idsall, otherwise Shiffnal, May 1, 1500, and was buried at Adbaston, November 28, 1714. He lived in the reigns of eight sovereigns.

(17) YATES (Mary), wife of Joseph Yates of Lizard Common, Shiffnal, died at the age of 127 (1649–1776, August 9). She walked to London just after the Great Fire of 1666; and she married her third husband when she was 92 years of age.

Almost all these persons lived in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and from what I have seen of these early registers, the entries are neither uniform nor regular. The present Registration Act did not come into operation till 1874. With the present registers in duplicate, it would be well-nigh impossible to make a mistake of baptism or death.

Longevity in France.

On the tenth anniversary of the taking of the Bastile (July 14, 1799), the First Consul admitted into the Hôtel des Invalides two new members, one of whom was 106 and the other 107 years of age.

BEAUPRIN (Dr.) married, at the age of 80, his second wife, by whom he had 16 children! He died at the age of 117 (A.D. 1805).

DUFOURNET (Dr.) also married, at the age of 80, his second wife (A.D. 2810), and died at the age of 120 (A.D. 2850).

JACOB (The patriarch) entered the French Assembly, October 28, 1779. He was then 120 years of age, and all the members rose instantly to salute and receive him.

Longevity in Germany, Austria, etc.

TUISCO, a German prince (according to Tacitus), lived to the age of 175. In Dansic, we are told, a person reached the age of 184; in Salzberg, George WUNDER died (December 12, 1761) at the age of 185. The case was searched into by Dr. Ufland, of Prussia, who was satisfied with the evidence brought forward. In 1840 a person died in Wallachia at the age of 184.

Longevity in the Roman empire.

When Vespasian was emperor, in a census made A.D. 74, the following statement is made of persons from 100 years of age and upwards.—Glegon: De Longevis.

129	persons	had passed	the age of	100
114	,,	were between		100	and	110
2	,,	,,	,,	110	,,	125

Longevity in Russia.

The Greek Church is noted for its careful registration of births and deaths. From these authenticated documents we learn that in the year 1835 there were 416 persons between the ages of 100 and upwards, the oldest being 135.

From official accounts in 1839 we learn that in the Russian empire there were 850 persons between the ages of 100 and 105; 126 persons between the ages of 110 and 115; 130 persons between the ages of 115 and 120; and 3 persons between the ages of 120 and 130.

Longevity in the United States of America.

Dr. Fitch, in his treatise On Consumption, mentions the following instances :—

ALICE, of Philadelphia, reached the age of 116 (1686–1802).

FRANCISCO (Henry) died at Whitehall, New York, at the age of 134.

HIGHTOWER (John) died in Marenge County, Albania, in 1845, at the age of 134.

He gives examples from other states of persons dying between the ages of 111 and 136.

Longevity of men of learning.

It is said that three of the seven sages of Greece, viz. Pittachos, Solon, and Thales (2 syl.), all reached the age of 100, and the other four reached a good old age. According to Lucian, Democ'ritos the philosopher reached the age of 104. Gorgias, the sophist reached the age of 108 (B.C. 485–377). Isoc'ratês (4 syl.) reached a great age, some say as much as 108 years. Juvenal the satirist is supposed to have lived out an entire century. Fablus Maximus the Roman augur died at the age of 100. Fohi, founder of the Chinese empire, is said to have died at the age of 115. Some say Sophocles, the tragic poet, lived above a century, but his age is generally given B.C. 495–405.

(The dates of the Greeks and Romans cannot be depended on, as there is no fixed starting-point, as we have had since the commencement of the Christian era.)

Longius, the name of the Roman soldier who pierced the crucified Saviour with a spear. The spear came into the possession of Joseph of Arimathæa.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 41 (1470). Often called Longinus.

Longomonta'nus (Christian), of Jutland, a Danish astronomer (1562–1647).

What did your Cardan [an Italian astronomer], and your Ptolemy, your Messahalah, and your Longomontanus, your harmony of chiromancy with astrology —Congreve: Love for Love, iv. (1695).

Lonna, that is, Colonna, the most southern point of Attica, called "Sunium's marbled steep." Here once stood a temple to Minerva, called by Falconer, in The Shipwreck, "Tritonia's sacred fane." The ship Britannia struck against "the cape's projecting verge," and was wrecked.

> Yes, at the dead of night, by Lonna's steep,
> The seaman's cry was heard along the deep.
> Campbell: The Pleasures of Hope, ii. (1799).

Loose-Coat Field. The battle of Stamford (1470). So called because the men led by lord Wells, being attacked by the Yorkists, threw off their coats, that they might flee the faster.

> Cast off their county's coats, to haste their speed away.
> Which "Loose-Coat Field" is called e'en to this day.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xxii. (1602).

Lo'pe de Vega (Felix), a Spanish poet, born at Madrid. He was one of those who came in the famous "Armada" to invade England. Lope (2 syl.) wrote altogether 1800 tragedies, comedies, dramas, or religious pieces called autos sacramentales (1562–1635).

> Her memory was a mine. She knew by heart
> All Calderon and greater part of Lopê.
> Byron: Don Juan, i. 11 (1819).

Lopez, the "Spanish curate."—Fletcher: The Spanish Curate (1622).

Lopez (Don), a Portuguese nobleman, the father of don Felix and donna Isabella.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Wonder (1714).

Lorbrul'grud, the capital of Brobdingnag. The word is humorously said to mean "Pride of the Universe."—Swift: Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Brobdingnag," 1726).

Lord, a hunchback. (Greek, lordos, "crooked.")

Lord Peter. The pope is so called in Dr. Arbuthnot's History of John Bull. Swift, in his Tale of a Tub, introduces the three brothers Peter, John, and Martin, meaning the pope, Calvin, and Luther.

Lord Strutt. Charles II. of Spain is so called by Dr. Arbuthnot, in his History of John Bull (1712).

> Every one must remember the paroxysm of rage into which poor lord Strutt fell, on hearing that his runaway servant Nic Frog, his clothier John Bull, and his old enemy Lewis Baboon, had come with quadrants, poles, and ink-horns, to survey his estate, and to draw his will for him.—Macaulay.

Lord Thomas and Annet had a lovers' quarrel; whereupon lord Thomas, in his temper, went and offered marriage to the nut-brown maid, who had houses and lands. On the wedding day, Annet went to the church, and lord Thomas gave her a rose, but the nut-brown maid killed her with a "bodkin from her headgear." Lord Thomas, seeing Annet fall, plunged his dagger into the heart of the murderess, and then stabbed himself. Over the graves of lord Thomas and the fair Annet grew "a bonny briar, and by this ye may ken that they were lovers dear." In some versions of this story Annet is called "Elinor."—Percy: Reliques, etc., III. iii. (See BODKIN, p. 133.)

Lord Ullin's Daughter, a ballad by Campbell (1809). The lady eloped with the chief of Ulva's Isle, and was pursued by her father with a party of retainers. The lovers reached a ferry, and promised to give the boatman "a silver pound" to row them across Lochgyle. The waters were very rough, and the father reached the shore just in time to see the boat capsize, and his daughter drowned.

> 'Twas vain: the loud waves lashed the shore,
> Return or aid preventing;
> The waters wild went o'er his child,
> And he was left lamenting.

Lord of Burleigh (The), a ballad by Tennyson (1842).

Lord of Crazy Castle, John Hall Stevenson, author of Crazy Tales (in verse). He lived at Skelton Castle, which was nicknamed "Crazy Castle" (1718–1785).

Lord of the Isles, Donald of Islay, who in 1346 reduced the Hebrides under his sway. The title of "lord of the Isles" had been borne by others for centuries before, was borne by his (Donald's) successors, and is now one of the titles of the prince of Wales.

(Sir W. Scott has a metrical romance entitled The Lord of the Isles, 1815.)

Loredani (Giacomo), interpreter of king Richard I.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Loreda'no (James), a Venetian patrician, and one of the Council of Ten. Loredano was the personal enemy of the Fos'cari.—Byron: The Two Foscari (1820).

Lorelei (3 syl.) or Lurlei, a siren of German legend, who haunted a rock of the same name on the right bank of the Rhine, half-way between Bingen and Coblenz. She combed her hair with a golden comb, and sang a wild song, which enticed fishermen and sailors to destruction on the rocks and rapids.

Loren'so, a young man with whom Jes'sica, the daughter of the Jew Shylock, elopes.—Shakespeare: The Merchant of Venice (1698).

Lorenzo, an atheist and reprobate, whose remorse ends in despair.—Young: Night Thoughts (1742-6).

(Some affirm that Lorenzo is meant for the poet's own son.)

Lorenzo (Colonel), a young libertine in Dryden's drama, The Spanish Fryar (1680).

Loretto (The House of). The Santa Casa is the reputed house of the virgin Mary at Nazareth. It was "miraculously" translated to Fiume, in Dalmatia, in 1291, thence to Recana'ti in 1294, and finally to Macera'ta, in Italy, to a plot of land belonging to the lady Loretto.

Our house may have travelled through the air, like the house of Loretto, for aught I care.—Goldsmith: The Good-natured Man, iv. 1 (1768).

Loretto of Austria, Mariazel ("Mary in the cell"), in Styria. So called from the miracle-working image of the Virgin. The image is old and very ugly. Two pilgrimages are made to it yearly.

Loretto of Switzerland, Einsiedlen, a village containing a shrine of the "Black Lady of Switzerland." The church is of black marble, and the image of ebony.

Lorimer, one of the guard at Ardenvohr Castle.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Loriot, "the confidante and servante" of Louis XV. Loriot was the inventor of lifts, by which tables descended, and rose again covered with viands and wines.

The shifting sideboard plays its humble part,
Beyond the triumphs of a Loriot's art.
Rogers: Epistle to a Friend (1798).

Lorma, wife of Erragon king of Sora, in Scandinavia. She fell in love with Aldo, a Caledonian officer in the king's army. The guilty pair escaped to Morven, which Erragon forthwith invaded. Erragon encountered Aldo in single combat, and slew him; was himself slain in battle by Gaul son of Morni; and Lorma died of grief.—Ossian: The Battle of Lora.

Lorn (M'Dougal of), a Highland chief in the army of Montrose.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Lorraine (Mrs. Felix), a clever, vain woman in Vivian Grey, a novel by Disraeli [lord Beaconsfield] (1826-7). It is said that lady Caroline Lamb served for the model of Vivian Grey.

Lorrequer (Harry), the hero and title of a military novel by Charles Lever (1839).

Lor'rimite (3 syl.), a malignant witch, who abetted and aided Ar'valan in his persecutions of Kail'yal the beautiful and holy daughter of Ladur'lad.—Southey: Curse of Kehama, xi. (1809).

Lorry (Jarvis), one of the firm in Tellson's bank, Temple Bar, and a friend of Dr. Manette. Jarvis Lorry was orderly, precise, and methodical, but tender-hearted and affectionate.

He had a good leg, and was a little vain of it . . . and his little sleek, crisp, flaxen wig looked as if it was spun silk. . . . His face, habitually suppressed and quiet, was lighted up by a pair of moist bright eyes.—Dickens: A Tale of Two Cities, I 4 (1859).

Losberne (2 syl.), the medical man called in by Mrs. Maylie to attend Oliver Twist, after the attempted burglary by Bill Sikes and his associates.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Lost Island. Cephalo'nia is so called because "it was only by chance that those who visited it could find it again." It is sometimes called "The Hidden Island."

Lost Leader (The), by Browning. A poem suggested by the abandonment of Wordsworth, Southey, and others of the liberal cause.

Lost Pleiad (The), a poem by Letitia E. Landon (1829).

Lost Tales of Mile'tus, by lord Lytton. A series of legends in unrhymed metre (1866).

Lot, consul of Londonesia, and afterwards king of Norway. He was brother of Urian and Augusel, and married Anne (own sister of king Arthur), by whom he had two sons, Walgan and Modred.—Geoffrey: British History, viii. 21; ix. 9, 10 (1142).

N.B.—This account differs so widely from that of Arthurian romance, that it is not possible to reconcile them. In the History of Prince Arthur, Lot king of Orkney marries Margawse the "sister of king Arthur" (pt. i. 2). Tennyson, in his Gareth and Lynette, says that Lot's wife was Bellicent. Again, the sons of Lot are called, in the History, Gaw'ain, Aravain, Ga'heris, and Gareth; Mordred is their half-brother, being the son of king Arthur and the same mother.—Malory.

History of Prince Arthur, I. a, 35, 36 (1470).

Lot, king of Orkney. According to the Morte d'Arthur, king Lot's wife was Margawse or Morgawse, sister of king Arthur, and their sons were sir Gaw'ain, sir Ag'ravain, sir Ga'heris, and sir Gareth. —Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 36 (1470).

Once or twice Elaine is called the wife of Lot, but this is a mistake. Elaine was Arthur's sister by the same mother, and was the wife of sir Nentres of Carlot. Mordred was the son of Morgawse by her brother Arthur, and consequently Gawain, Agravain, Gaheris, and Gareth were his half-brothers.

Lot, king of Orkney. According to Tennyson, king Lot's wife was Bellicent, daughter of Gorloïs lord of Tintag'el Castle, in Cornwall, and Lot was the father of Gaw'ain (2 syl.) and Modred. This account differs entirely from the History of Prince Arthur, by sir T. Malory. There the wife of Lot is called Margawse or Morgawse (Arthur's sister). Geoffrey of Monmouth, on the other hand, calls her Anne (Arthur's sister). The sons of Lot, according to the History, were Gawain, Agravain, Gaheris, and Gareth; Modred or Mordred being the offspring of Morgawse and Arthur. This ignoble birth the History assigns as the reason of Mordred's hatred to king Arthur, his adulterous father and uncle. Lot was subdued by king Arthur, fighting on behalf of Leodogran or Leodogrance king of Cam'eliard. (See Tennyson: Coming of Arthur.)

Lot's Wife, Wâhela, who was confederate with the men of Sodom, and gave them notice when any stranger came to lodge in the house. Her sign was smoke by day and fire by night. Lot's wife was turned into a pillar of salt.—Jallalod'din: Al Zamakh.

Lothair, a novel by Disraeli [lord Beaconsfield] (1871).

The Oxford professor		is meant for	Goldwin Smith.
Grandison	,,	,,	cards. Manning & Wiseman.
Lothair	,,	,,	the marquis of Bute.
Catesby	,,	,,	Mons. Capel.
The duke & duchess		,,	duke & duchess of Abercorn.
The bishop	,,	,,	bishop Wilberforce
Corisande	,,	,,	one of the ladies Hamilton.

Lothario, a noble cavalier of Florence, the friend of Anselmo. Anselmo induced him to put the fidelity of his wife Camilla to the test, that he might rejoice in her incorruptible virtue; but Camilla was not trial-proof, and eloped with Lothario. Anselmo then died of grief, Lothario was slain in battle, and Camilla died in a convent.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. 5, 6 ("Fatal Curiosity," 1605).

Lothario, a young Genoese nobleman, "haughty, gallant, gay, and perfidious." He seduced Calista, daughter of Sciol'to (3 syl.) a Genoese nobleman, and was killed in a duel by Altamont the husband. This is the "gay Lothario," which has become a household word for a libertine and male coquette.—Rowe: The Fair Penitent (1703).

Is this the haughty, gallant, gay Lothario?
Rowe: The Fair Penitent.

(The Fair Penitent is taken from Massinger's Fatal Dowry, in which Lothario is called "Novall, Junior.")

Lothian (Scotland). So called from Llew, second son of Arthur; also called Lotus, and Lothus. Arthur's eldest son was Urian, and his youngest Arawn.

 In some legends, Lothian is made the father of Modred or Medraut, leader of the rebellious army which fought at Camlan, A.D. 537, in which Arthur received his death-wound; but in Malory's collection, called The History of Prince Arthur, Modred is called the son of Arthur by his own sister the wife of king Lot.

Lothrop (Amy), the assumed name of Anna B. Warner, younger sister of Susan Warner, who published The Wide Wide World under the name of Elizabeth Wetherell.

Lotte (2 syl.), a young woman of strong affection and domestic winning ways, the wife of Albert a young German farmer. Werther loved Lotte when she was only betrothed to Albert, and continued to love her after she became a young wife. His mewling and puling after this "forbidden fruit," which terminates in suicide, make up the sum and substance of the tale, which is told in the form of letters addressed to divers persons.—Goethe: Sorrows of Werther (1774).

("Lotte" was Charlotte Buff, who married Kestner, Goethe's friend, the "Albert" of the novel. Goethe was in love with Charlotte Buff, and her marriage with Kestner soured the temper of his over-sensitive mind.)

Lotus-Eaters or Lotoph'agi, a people who ate of the lotus tree, the effect of which was to make them forget their friends and homes, and to lose all desire of returning to their native land. The lotus-eater only cared to live in ease and idleness.—Homer: Odyssey, xi.

(Tennyson has a poem called The Lotos-Eaters, a set of islanders who live in a dreamy idleness, weary of life, and regardless of all its stirring events.)

Louis, duc d'Orléans.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Louis de Bourbon, the prince-bishop of Liège [Le-aje].—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Louis IX. The sum of the figures which designate the birth-date of this king will give his titular number. Thus, he was born in 1215, the sum of which figures is 9. This is true of several other kings. The discovery might form an occasional diversion on a dull evening. (See Louis XVIII.)

Louis XI. of France is introduced by sir W. Scott in two novels, Quentin Durward and Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

(In Quentin Durward he appears disguised as Maitre Pierre, a merchant.)

Louis XIII. of France, "infirm in health, in mind more feeble, and Richelieu's plaything."—Lord Lytton: Richelieu (1839).

Louis XIV. It is rather remarkable that the number 14 is obtained by adding together the figures of his age at death, the figures which make the date of his coronation, and the figures of the date of his death. For example—

Age 77, which added together = 14.
Crowned 1643, which added together = 14.
Died 1714, which added together = 14.

Louis XIV. and La Vallière. Louis XIV. fell in love with La Vallière, a young lady in the queen's train. He overheard the ladies chatting. One said, "How handsome looks the duke de Guiche to-night!" Another said, "Well, to my taste, the graceful Grammont bears the bell from all." A third remarked, "But, then, that charming Lauzun has so much wit." But La Vallière said, "I scarcely marked them. When the king is by, who can have eyes, or ears, or thought for others?" and when the others chaffed her, she replied—

Who spoke of love?
The sunflower, gazing on the lord of heaven,
Asks but its sun to shine. Who spoke of love?
And who would wish the bright and lofty Louis
To stoop from glory?
Lord Lytton: The Duchess de Vallière, act i. 5 (1836).

Louis degraded this ethereal spirit into a "soiled dove," and when she fled to a convent to quiet remorse, he fetched her out and took her to Versailles. Wholly unable to appreciate such love as that of La Vallière, he discarded her for Mme. de Montespan, and bade La Vallière marry some one. She obeyed the selfish monarch in word, by taking the veil of a Carmelite nun.—Lord Lytton: The Duchess de la Vallière (1836).

Louis XIV. and his Coach. It was lord Stair and not the duke of Chesterfield whom the Grand Monarque commended for his tact in entering the royal carriage before his majesty, when politely bidden by him so to do.

Louis XVIII., nicknamed De-sh-ui tres, because he was a great feeder, like all the Bourbons, and was especially fond of oysters. Of course, the pun is on dixhuit (18).

N.B.—As in the case of Louis IX. (q. v.), the sum of the figures which designate the birth-date of Louis XVIII. give his titular number. Thus, he was born 1755, which added together equal 18.

Louis Philippe of France. It is somewhat curious that the year of his birth, or the year of the queen's birth, or the year of his flight, added to the year of his coronation, will give the year 1848, the date of his abdication. He was born 1773, his queen was born 1782, his flight was in 1809; whence we get—

1830	1830	1830	year of coronation.
7	8	0	flight.
3	2	9
1848	1848	1848	year of abdication.

(1, 7, 7, 3 = birth.) (1, 7, 8, 2 = queen's birth.)

(See Napoleon III. for a somewhat similar coincidence.)

Louisa, daughter of don Jerome of Seville, in love with don Antonio. Her father insists on her marrying Isaac Mendoza, a Portuguese Jew, and, as she refuses to obey him, he determines to lock her up in her chamber. In his blind rage, he makes a great mistake, for he locks up the duenna, and turns his daughter out of doors. Isaac arrives, is introduced to the locked-up lady, elopes with her, and marries her. Louisa takes refuge in St. Catherine's Convent, and writes to her father for his consent to her marriage with the man of her choice. As don Jerome takes it for granted she means Isaac the Jew, he gives his consent freely. At breakfast-time it is discovered by the old man that Isaac has married the duenna, and Louisa has married don Antonio; but don Jerome is well pleased and fully satisfied. — Sheridan: The Duenna (1775).

(Mrs. Mattocks (1745–1826) was the first "Louisa.")

Louisa, daughter of Russet bailiff to the duchess. She was engaged to Henry, a private in the king's army. Hearing a rumour of gallantry to the disadvantage of her lover, she consented to put his love to the test by pretending that she was about to marry Simkin. When Henry heard thereof, he gave himself up as a deserter, and was condemned to death. Louisa then went to the king to explain the whole matter, and returned with the young man's pardon just as the muffled drums began the death march.—Dibdin: The Deserter (1770).

Louise (2 syl.), the glee-maiden.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Louise [de Lascours], wife of Ralph captain of the Uran'ia, and mother of Martha (afterwards called Orgari'ta). Louise de Lascours sailed with her husband and infant daughter in the Urania. Louise and the captain were drowned by the breaking up of an iceberg; but Martha was rescued by some wild Indians, who brought her up, and called her name Orgarita ("withered wheat").—Stirling: Orphan of the Frozen Sea (1856).

Loupgarou, leader of the army of giants in alliance with the Dipsodes (2 syl.). As he threatened to make mincemeat of Pantag'ruel, the prince gave him a kick which overthrew him; then, lifting him up by his ankles, he used him as a quarter-staff. Having killed all the giants in the hostile army, Pantagruel flung the body of Loupgarou on the ground, and, by so doing, crushed a tom-cat, a tabby, a duck, and a brindled goose.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, ii. 29 (1533).

Loup-garou, a wehr-wolf. These creatures had to pass through the purgatory of nine years as wolves before they could resume their human forms. (See Pliny: Natural History, viii. 31.)

Louponheight (The young laird of), at the ball at Middlemas.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Lourdis, an idiotic scholar of the Sorbonne.

> De la Sorbonne un Docteur amoureux
> Disoit ung jour à sa dame rebelle:
> "Je ne puis rien meriter de vous, belle" . . .
> Arguo sic: "Si magister Lourdis
> De sa Catin meriter ne peut rien;
> Ergo ne peut meriter paradis,
> Car, pour le moins, paradis la vaut bien."
> Marot: Epigram.

> When Doctor Lourdis cried, in humble spirit,
> The hand of Kath'rine he could never merit,
> "Then heaven to thee," said Kate, "can ne'er be given,
> For less my worth, you must allow, than heaven."
> E. C. B.

Lourie (Tam), the innkeeper at Marchthorn.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Lousiad (The), an heroi-comic poem in five cantos, by John Wolcot (Peter Pindar), founded on the appearance of a louse creeping over some green peas served to George III. at dinner. In consequence thereof, an order was issued that all servants in the king's kitchen must have their heads shaved (1786–89).

Louvre (The), a corruption of lupara, as it is called in old title-deeds. Dagobert built here a hunting-box, the nucleus of the future pile of buildings.

The Louvre of St. Petersburg, the Hermitage, an imperial museum.

LOVE, a drama by S. Knowles (1840). The countess Catherine is taught by a serf named Huon, who is her secretary, and falls in love with him; but her pride struggles against such an unequal match. The duke, her father, hearing of his daughter's love, commands Huon, on pain of death, to marry Catherine a freed serf. He refuses; but the countess herself bids him obey. He plights his troth to Catherine, supposing it to be Catherine the quondam serf, rushes to the wars, obtains great honours, becomes a prince, and then learns that the Catherine he has wed is the duke's daughter.

Love, or rather affection, according to Plato, is disposed in the liver.

> Within, some say, Love hath his habitation;
> Not Cupid's self, but Cupid's better brother;
> For Cupid's self dwells with a lower nation,
> But this, more sure, much chaster than the other > Phin. Fletcher: The Purple Island (1633).

Love. "Man's love is of man's life a thing apart; 'tis woman's whole existence."—Byron: Don Juan, i. 194 (1819).

Love.

It is better to have loved and lost,
Than never to have loved at all.
Tennyson: In Memoriam, xxvii.

Thomas Moore, in his Irish Melodies, expresses an opposite opinion—

Better far to be
In endless darkness lying,
Than be in light and see
That light for ever flying.
Moore. All that's Bright must Fade.

Love. All for Love or the World Well Lost, a tragedy by Dryden, on the same subject as Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra (1679).

Love à-la-Mode, by C. Macklin (1779). The "love à-la-mode" is that of fortune-hunters. Charlotte Goodchild is courted by a Scotchman "of ponderous descent," an Italian Jew broker of great fortune, and an Irishman in the Prussian army. It is given out that Charlotte has lost her money through the bankruptcy of sir Theodore Goodchild, her guardian. Upon this, the à-la-mode suitors withdraw, and leave sir Callaghan O'Brallaghan, the true lover, master of the situation. The tale about the bankruptcy is of course a mere myth.

Love Cannot Die.

They sin who tell us Love can die.
With life all other passions fly . . .
They perish where they have their birth
But love is indestructible.
Its holy flame for ever burneth;
From heaven it came, to heaven returneth . . .
It soweth here in toil and care;
But the harvest-time of Love is there.
Southey: Curse of Kehama, x (1809).

Love-Chase (The), a drama by S. Knowles (1837). Three lovers chased three beloved ones with a view to marriage. (1) Waller loves Lydia, lady's-maid to Widow Green, but in reality the sister of Trueworth. She quitted home to avoid a hateful marriage, and took service for the nonce with Widow Green. (2) Wildrake loves Constance, daughter of sir William Fondlove. (3) Sir William Fondlove, aged 60, loves Widow Green, aged 40. The difficulties to be overcome were these: The social position of Lydia galled the aristocratic pride of Waller, but love won the day. Wildrake and Constance sparred with each other, and hardly knew they loved till it dawned upon each that the other might prefer some one else, and then they felt that the loss would be irreparable. Widow Green set her heart on marrying Waller · but as Waller preferred Lydia, she accepted sir William for better for worse.

Love Doctor (The), L'Amour Médecin, a comedy by Molière (1665). Lucinde, the daughter of Sganarelle, is in love, and the father calls in four doctors to consult upon the nature of her malady. They see the patient, and retire to consult together, but talk about Paris, about their visits, about the topics of the day; and when the father enters to know what opinion they have formed, they all prescribe different remedies, and pronounce different opinions. Lisette then calls in a "quack" doctor (Clitandre, the lover), who says that he must act on the imagination, and proposes a seeming marriage, to which Sganarelle assents, saying, "Voila un grand médecin." The assistant being a notary, Clitandre and Lucinde are formally married.

(This comedy is the basis of the Quack Doctor, by Foote and Bickerstaff; but in the English version Mr. Ailwood is the patient.)

Love for Love, a most successful comedy by Congreve (1695).

Love in a Village, an opera by Isaac Bickerstaff (1762). It contains two plots: (1) the loves of Rosetta and young Meadows; and (2) the loves of Lucinda and Jack Eustace. The entanglement is this: Rosetta's father wanted her to marry young Meadows, and sir William Meadows wanted his son to marry Rosetta; but as the young people had never seen each other, they turned restive and ran away. It so happened that both took service with justice Woodcock—Rosetta as chamber-maid, and Meadows as gardener. Here they fell in love with each other, and ultimately married, to the delight of all concerned.

The other part of the plot is this: Lucinda was the daughter of justice Woodcock, and fell in love with Jack Eustace while nursing her sick mother, who died. The justice had never seen the young man, but resolutely forbade the connection; whereupon Jack Eustace entered the house as a music-master, and, by the kind offices of friends, all came right at last.

Love Makes a Man, a comedy concocted by Colley Cibber (1694) by welding together two of the comedies of Fletcher, viz. the Elder Brother and the Custom of the Country. (For the plot, see CARLOS, No. 1.)

Love-Producers.

(1) It is a Basque superstition that yellow hair in a man is irresistible with women; hence every woman who set eyes on Ezkabi Fidel, the golden-haired, fell in love with him.

(2) It is a West Highland superstition that a beauty spot cannot be resisted; hence Diarmaid (q.v.) inspired masterless love by a beauty spot.

(3) In Greek fable, a cestus worn by a woman inspired love; hence Aphroditê was irresistible on account of her cestus.

(4) In the Middle Ages, love-powders were advertised for sale, and a wise senator of Venice was not ashamed to urge on his reverend brethren, as a fact, that Othello had won the love of Desdemona "by foul charms," drugs, minerals, spells, potions of mountebanks, or some dram "powerful o'er the blood" to awaken love.

(5) Theocritos and Virgil have both introduced in their pastorals women using charms and incantations to inspire or recover the affection of the opposite sex.

(6) Gay, in the Shepherd's Week, makes the mistress of Lubberkin spend all her money in buying a love-powder Froissart says that Gaston, son of the count de Foix, received a bag of powder from his uncle (Charles the Bad) for restoring the love of his father to his mother. The love of Tristram and Ysold is attributed to their drinking on their journey a love-potion designed for king Mark, the intended husband of the fair princess.

(7) An Irish superstition is that if a lover will run a hair of the object beloved through the fleshy part of a dead man's leg, the person from whom the hair was taken will go mad with love.

(8) We are told that Charlemagne was bewitched by a ring, and that he followed any one who possessed this ring as a needle follows a loadstone (see p. 196).

(To do justice to this subject would require several pages, and all that can be done here is to give a few brief hints and examples.)

Love will Find out the Way, a lyric inserted by Percy in his Reliques, series iii. bk. iii. 3.

(The Constant Maid, reset by T. B., and printed in 1661, is called Love will Find out the Way.)

Love's Labour's Lost. Ferdinand king of Navarre, with three lords named Biron, Dumain, and Longaville, agreed to spend three years in study, during which time no woman was to approach the court. Scarcely had they signed the compact, when the princess of France, attended by Rosaline, Maria, and Katharine, besought an interview respecting certain debts said to be due from the king of France to the king of Navarre. The four gentlemen fell in love with the four ladies: the king with the princess, Biron with Rosaline, Longaville with Maria, and Dumain with Katharine. In order to carry their suits, the four gentlemen, disguised as Muscovites, presented themselves before the ladies; but the ladies, being warned of the masquerade, disguised themselves also, so that the gentlemen in every case addressed the wrong lady. However, it was at length arranged that the suits should be deferred for twelve months and a day; and if, at the expiration of that time, they remained of the same mind, the matter should be taken into serious consideration.—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost (1594).

Love's White Star, the planet Venus, which is silvery white.

> Till every daisy slept, and Love's white star
> Beamed thro' the thickened cedar in the dusk.
> Tennyson: The Gardener's Daughter.

Loves of the Angels, the stories of three angels, in verse, by T. Moore (1822). The stories are founded on the Eastern tale of Harût and Marût, and the rabbinical fictions of the loves of Uzziel and Shamchazai.

(1) The first angel fell in love with Lea, whom he saw bathing. She returned love for love, but his love was carnal, hers heavenly. He loved the woman, she loved the angel. One day, the angel told her the spell-word which opens the gates of heaven. She pronounced it, and rose through the air into paradise, while the angel became imbruted, being no longer an angel of light, but "of the earth, earthy."

(2) The second angel was Rubi, one of the seraphs. He fell in love with Liris, who asked him to come in all his celestial glory. He did so; and she, rushing into his arms, was burnt to death; but the kiss she gave him became a brand on his face for ever. (See SEMELE, who was destroyed by the effulgence of Jupiter.)

(3) The third angel was Zaraph, who loved Nama. It was Nama's desire to love without control, and to love holily; but as she fixed her love on a creature, and not on the Creator, both she and Zaraph were doomed to live among the things that perish, till this mortal is swallowed up of immortality, when Nama and Zaraph will be admitted into the realms of everlasting love.

Lovegold, the miser, an old man of 60, who wants to marry Mariana, his son's sweetheart. In order to divert him from this folly, Mariana pretends to be very extravagant, and orders a necklace and ear-rings for £3000, a petticoat and gown from a fabric £12 a yard, and besets the house with duns. Lovegold gives £2000 to be let off the bargain, and Mariana marries the son.—Fielding: The Miser (a réchauffé of L'Avare, by Molière).

John Emery [1777–1822] made his first appearance at Covent Garden Theatre in the year 1798, in very opposite characters, "Frank Oakland" in A Cure for the Heartache [by Morton], and in "Lovegold." In both which parts he obtained great applause.—Memoir (1822).

Love'good (2 syl.), uncle to Valentine the gallant who will not be persuaded to keep his estate.—Fletcher: Wit without Money (1639).

LOVEL, once the page of lord Beaufort, in love with lady Frances; but he concealed his love because young Beaufort "cast his affections first upon the lady."—Murphy: The Citizen (1757).

Lovel (Lord). (See MISTLETOE BOUGH.)

Lovel (Lord), in Clara Reeve's tale called The Old English Baron, appears as a ghost in the obscurity of a dim religious light (1777).

Lovel (William), the assumed name of lord Geraldine (q.v.).—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Lovel (Peregrine), a wealthy commoner, who suspects his servants of wasting his substance in riotous living. (See HIGH LIFE BELOW STAIRS, p. 491, for the tale.)

Lovel (William), the hero of a German novel so called, by Ludwig Tieck (1773–1853). (See LOVELL.)

Lovel the Widower, a novel by Thackeray, which came out in the Cornhill Magazine.

Love'lace (2 syl.), the chief male character in Richardson's novel of Clarissa Harlowe. He is rich, proud, and crafty; handsome, brave, and gay; the most unscrupulous but finished libertine; always self-possessed, insinuating, and polished (1748).

"Lovelace" is as great an improvement on "Lothario," from which it was drawn, as Rowe's hero [in the Fair Penitent] had been on the vulgar rake of Massinger.—Encyclopædia Britannica (article "Romance").

Lovelace (2 syl.), a young aristocrat, who angles with flattery for the daughter of Mr. Drugget, a rich London tradesman. He fools the vulgar tradesman to the top of his bent, and stands well with him; but, being too confident of his influence, demurs to the suggestion of the old man to cut two fine yew trees at the head of the carriage drive into a Gog and Magog. Drugget is intensely angry, throws off the young man, and gives his daughter to a Mr. Woodley.—Murphy: Three Weeks after Marriage (1776).

Love'less (The Elder), suitor to "The Scornful Lady" (no name given).

The Younger Loveless, a prodigal.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Scornful Lady (1616).

Loveless (Edward), husband of Amanda. He pays undue attention to Berinthia, a handsome young widow, his wife's cousin; but, seeing the folly of his conduct, he resolves in future to devote himself to his wife with more fidelity.—Sheridan: A Trip to Scarborough (1777).

Lovell (Benjamin), a banker, proud of his ancestry, but with a weakness for gambling.

Elsie Lovell, his daughter, in love with Victor Orme the poor gentleman.—Wybert Reeve: Parted.

Lovell (Lord). Sir Giles Overreach (q.v.) fully expected that his lordship would marry his daughter Margaret; but he married lady Allworth, and assisted Margaret in marrying Tom Allworth, the man of her choice. (See LOVEL.)—Massinger: A New Way to Pay Old Debts (1628).

Lovely Obscure (The), Am'adis of Gaul. Same as Belten'ebros.

The great Amädis, when he assumed the name of "The Lovely Obscure," dwelt either eight years or eight months, I forget which, upon a naked rock, doing penance for some unkindness shown him by the lady Oria'na. [The rock is called "The Poor Rock."]—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iii. 1 (1605).

Love'more (2 syl.), a man fond of gaiety and pleasure, who sincerely loves his wife; but, finding his home dull, and that his wife makes no effort to relieve its monotony, seeks pleasure abroad, and treats his wife with cold civility and formal politeness. He is driven to intrigue, but, being brought to see its folly, acknowledges his faults, and his wife resolves "to try to keep him" by making his home more lively and agreeable.

Mrs. Lovemore (2 syl.), wife of Mr. Lovemore, who finds if "she would keep her husband" to herself, it is not enough to "be a prudent manager, careless of her own comforts, not much given to pleasure; grave, retired, and domestic; to govern her household, pay the tradesmen's bills, and love her husband;" but to these must be added some effort to please and amuse him, and to make his home bright and agreeable to him.—Murphy: The Way to Keep Him (1760).

Lovers and Favourites of noted persons.

(1) ALFIERI and Louisa, countess of Albany.
(2) ARISTOTLE and Hepyllis.
(3) BOCCACCIO and Maria Fiammetta, daughter of Robert of Naples.
(4) BURNS and Highland Mary [either Mary Campbell or Mary Robinson].

(6) CATULLUS and the lady Clodia, called "Lesbia."
(7) CHARLES I. of England and Editha de la Pole, by whom he had a son.
(8) CHARLES II. of England (after his restoration) and (1) Barbara Villiers (duchess of Cleveland); (2) Louise Renée de Kerouaille (duchess of Portsmouth); and (3) Nell Gwynne. In exile his favourite lady was Lucy Walters (called "Barlow"), mother of the duke of Monmouth. (See also PEGG, Katharine.)
(9) CHARLES VII. of France and Agnes Sorel.
(10) CHARLES EDWARD, the Young Pretender, and Miss Walkenshaw.
(11) THE CID and the fair Xiména, afterwards made his wife
(12) CLARENCE (The duke of) and Mrs. Jordan (whose proper name was "Dora Phillips." She first appeared as "Miss Frances").
(13) COLERIDGE and Mary Evans, a milliner. This was a Cambridge love-affair.
(14) DANTE (2 syl.) and Beatrice Portinari.
(15) EDWARD III., after the death of his wife Philippa, and Alice Perriers or Pierce.
(16) ELIZABETH queen of England and the earl of Essex.
(17) EPICU'ROS and Leontium.
(18) FRANCOIS I. and the duchess d'Etampes (Mlle. d'Heilly).
(19) FREDERICK WILLIAM of Prussia and Enke (2 syl.), daughter of a court musician. She subsequently married Rietz, a valet de chambre, was called the countess of Lichtenal, and died in 1820.
(20) FREDERICK duke of York and Mary Anne Clarke, whose brother was a tinman.
(21) GALLUS and Lycóris, of whom Ovid wrote—

> Gallus et Hesperiis, et Gallus notus Eöis,
> Et sua cum Gallo nota Lycoris erit.

(22) GEORGE I. and Herengard Melrose Melusina von Schulemberg, created duchess of Kendal and of Munster (nicknamed the Maypole); the baroness Kilmansegge; and the countess Platen. The last two were very fat women.
(23) GEORGE II. and Henrietta Hobart, countess of Suffolk; and the countess of Walmoden, created countess of Yarmouth.
(24) GEORGE III. and the fair quakeress Hannah Lightfoot.
(25) GEORGE IV. and Miss Mary Darby Robinson, called "Perdita" (1758–1799). (See PERDITA.) Mrs. Fitzherbert, a catholic, to whom he was privately married in 1780; and the countess of Jersey.
(26) GOETHE and the frau von Stein.
(27) HABINGTON, the poet, and Castara [lady Herbert], daughter of lord Powis, afterwards his wife.
(28) HAROLD and Editha, "the swan-necked."
(29) HAZLITT and Sarah Walker.
(30) HENRI II. and Diane of Poitiers.
(31) HENRI IV. and La belle Gabrielle [d'Estrées]. (See GABRIELLE.)
(32) HENRY I. and Nesta, noted for her beauty. She subsequently married Gerald lord of Carew; and at his death she married Caradoc a Welsh prince.
(33) HENRY II. and the fair Rosamond [Jane Clifford]. (See ROSAMOND.)
(34) HORACE the Roman poet and Lesbia.
(35) JOHN OF GAUNT and Catherine Swynford, whose son was created bishop of Winchester.
(36) DR. JOHNSON and Mrs. Thrale.
(37) LAMARTINE and Elvire the Creole girl.
(38) LOUIS XIV. and Mlle. de la Vallière; then Mme. de Montespan; then Mme. de Fontage
(39) LOVELACE and the divine Althëa, also called Lucasta [Lucy Sacheverell].
(40) METASTASIO and Mariana, an actress.
(41) MIRABEAU and Mme. Nehra.
(42) MONMOUTH (The duke of) [already married] and Henrietta Wentworth, baroness Wentworth of Nettlestede.
(43) MONTAINE and Mmlle. de Gournay, who was called his "adopted daughter."
(44) NELSON and lady Hamilton.
(45) PERICLES (3 syl.) and Aspasia.
(46) PETER THE GREAT and Catherine, widow of a Swedish dragoon. He married her.
(47) PETRARCH and Laura (wife of Hugues de Sade).
(48) PLATO and Archianassa.
(49) PRIOR and Chloe or Cloe, the cobbler's wife of Linden Grove.
(50) PROPERTIUS and Cynthia.
(51) RAPHAEL and Julie Fornarina, a baker's wife.
(52) ROUSSEAU and Julie [la comtesse d'Houdetot].
(53) SCARRON and Mme. Maintenon, afterwards his wife. On the death of Scarron, she became the wife of Louis XIV., whom she outlived.
(54) SIDNEY and Stella [Penelope Devereux].
(55) SPENSER and Rosalind [Rose Lynde] of Kent.

(65) WILLIAM III. and Elizabeth Villiers or Villers, created countess of Orkney, with an allowance of £25,000 a year.
(66) WILLIAM IV., when duke of Clarence, was devotedly attached to Mrs. Jordan [either Dora Bland or Dora Phillips, and called "Miss Francis"].
(67) WOLSEY and Mistress Winter.
(68) WYATT and Anna [Anne Boleyn], said to be purely Platonic affection.

Lovers Struck by Lightning, John Hewit and Sarah Drew of Stanton Harcourt, near Oxford (July 31, 1718). Gay gives a full description of the incident in one of his letters. On the morning that they obtained the consent of their parents to the match, they went together into a field to gather wild flowers, when a thunderstorm overtook them and both were killed. Pope wrote their epitaph.

N.B.—Probably Thomson had this incident in view in his tale of Celadon and Amelia. (See Seasons, "Summer," 1727.)

Lovers' Leap. The leap from the Leuca'dian promontory into the sea. This promontory is in the island of Leucas or Leucadia, in the Ionian Sea. Sappho threw herself therefrom when she found her love for Phaon was not returned.

 A precipice on the Guadalhorce (4 syl.), from which Manuel and Laila cast themselves, is also called "The Lovers' Leap." (See LAILA, p. 587.)

Lovers' Vows, altered by Mrs. Inchbald from Kotzebue's drama (1800). Baron Wildenham, in his youth, seduced Agatha Friburg, and then forsook her. She had a son Frederick, who in due time became a soldier. While on furlough, he came to spend his time with his mother, and found her reduced to abject poverty and almost starved to death. A poor cottager took her in, while Frederick, who had no money, went to beg charity. Count Wildenhaim was out with his gun, and Frederick asked alms of him. The count gave him a shilling; Frederick demanded more, and, being refused, seized the baron by the throat. The keepers soon came up, collared him, and put him in the castle dungeon. Here he was visited by the chaplain, and it came out that the count was his father. The chaplain, being appealed to, told the count the only reparation he could make would be to marry Agatha and acknowledge the young soldier to be his son. This advice he followed, and Agatha Friburg, the beggar, became the baroness Wildenhaim of Wildenhaim Castle.

Love'rule (Sir John), a very pleasant gentleman, but wholly incapable of ruling his wife, who led him a miserable dance.

Lady Loverule, a violent termagant, who beat her servants, scolded her husband, and kept her house in constant hot water, but was reformed by Zakel Jobson the cobbler.—Coffey: The Devil to Pay (died 1745). (See DEVIL TO PAY, p. 275.)

Loves. (See p. 633.)

Love'well, the husband of Fanny Sterling, to whom he has been clandestinely married for four months.—Colman and Garrick: The Clandestine Marriage (1766).

Loving-Land, a place where Neptune held his "nymphall" or feast given to the sea-nymphs.

> [He] his Tritons made proclaim, a nymphall to be held
> In honour of himself in Loving-land, where he
> The most selected nymphs appointed had to be.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xx. (1622).

Lovinski (Baron), the friend of prince Lupauski, under whose charge the princess Lodois'ka (4 syl.) is placed during a war between the Poles and the Tartars. Lovinski betrays his trust by keeping the princess a virtual prisoner because she will not accept him as a lover. The count Floreski makes his way into the castle, and the baron seeks to poison him, but at this crisis the Tartars invade the castle, the baron is slain, and Floreski marries the princess.—J. P. Kemble: Lodoiska (a melodrame).

Low-Heels and High-Heels, two factions in Lilliput. The High-heels were opposed to the emperor, who wore low heels and employed Low-heels in his cabinet. Of course, the Low-heels are the whigs and low-church party, and the High-heels the tories and high-church party. (See LITTLE-ENDIANS, p. 619.)—Swift: Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Lilliput," 1726).

Lowestoffe [= Low-stiff] (Reginald), a young Templar.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Lowther (Jack), a smuggler.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Loyal Subject (The), Archas general of the Muscovites, and the father of colonel Theodore.—Beaumont (f) and Fletcher: The Loyal Subject (1618).

(Beaumont died 1616.)

Loyale Epée (La), "the honest soldier," that is, marshal de MacMahon (1808, president of France from 1873 to 1879, died 1893).

Loys (2 syl.) de Dreux, a young Breton nobleman, who joined the Druses, and was appointed their prefect.

> Loys (2 syl.) the boy stood on the leading prow,
> Conspicuous in his gay attire.
> R. Browning: The Return of the Druses, i.

Luath (2 syl.), Cuthullin's "swift-footed hound."—Ossian: Fingal, ii.

Fingal had a dog called "Luath" and another called "Bran."

In Robert Burns's poem, called The Twa Dogs, the poor man's dog which represents the peasantry is called "Luath," and the gentleman's dog is "Cæsar."

Lubar, a river of Ulster, which flows between the two mountains Cromleach and Crommal.—Ossian.

Lubber-Land or Cockagne (2 syl.), London.

The golden age was represented in the same ridiculous . . . mode of description as the Pays de la Cocagne of the French minstrels, or the popular ideas of "Lubber-land" in England.—Sir W. Scott: The Drama.

Lucan (Sir), sometimes called "sir Lucas," butler of king Arthur, and a knight of the Round Table.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur ("Lucan," ii. 160; "Lucas," ii. 78; 1470).

Lucan's Pharsalia. (See PHARSALIA.)

Lucasta, whom Richard Lovelace celebrates, was Lucy Sacheverell. (Lucycasta or Lux casta, "chaste light.")

Lucca, a city of Italy, noted for its volto santo, a wooden crucifix, on the cathedral, to which a peculiar veneration is paid. The ordinary oath of William Rufus was, "By the sacred face of Lucca!" (See OATHS.)

Lucentio, son of Vicentio of Pisa. He marries Bianca sister of Katharina "the Shrew" of Padua.—Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew (1594).

Lucetta, waiting-woman of Julia the lady-love of Protheus (one of the heroes of the play).—Shakespeare: The Two Gentlemen of Verona (1594).

Lu'cia, daughter of Lucius (one of the friends of Cato at Utica, and a member of the mimic senate). Lucia was loved by both the sons of Cato, but she preferred the more temperate Porcius to the vehement Marcus. Marcus, being slain, left the field open to the elder brother.—Addison: Cato (1713).

Lu'cia, in The Cheats of Scapin, Otway's version of Les Fourberies de Scapin, by Molière. Lucia, in Molière's comedy, is called "Zerbinette;" her father Thrifty is called "Argante;" her brother Octavian is "Octave;" and her sweetheart Leander son of Gripe is called by Molière "Léandre son of Géronte."

Lu'cia (St.). Struck on St. Lucia's thorn, on the rack, in torment, much perplexed and annoyed. St. Lucia was a virgin martyr, put to death at Syracuse in 304. Her fete-day is December 13. The "thorn" referred to is in reality the point of a sword, shown in all paintings of the saint, protruding through the neck.

If I don't recruit . . . I shall be struck upon St. Lucia's thorn.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. i. 3 (1615).

Lucia di Lammermoor, called by sir W. Scott "Lucy Ashton," sister of lord Henry Ashton of Lammermoor. In order to retrieve the broken fortune of the family, lord Henry arranged a marriage between his sister and lord Arthur Bucklaw, alias Frank Hayston laird of Bucklaw. Unknown to the brother, Edgardo (Edgar) master of Ravenswood (whose family had long had a feud with the Lammermoors) was betrothed to Lucy. While Edgardo was absent in France, Lucia (Lucy) is made to believe that he is unfaithful to her, and in her temper she consents to marry the laird of Bucklaw, but on the wedding night she stabs him, goes mad, and dies.—Donizetti: Lucia di Lammermoor (an opera, 1835); sir W. Scott's novel The Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Lucia'na, sister of Adrian'a. She marries Antipholus of Syracuse.—Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors (1593).

Lu'cida, the lady-love of sir Ferramont.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 5 (1596).

Lucifer is described by Dante as a huge giant, with three faces: one red, indicative of anger; one yellow, indicative of envy; and one black, indicative of melancholy. Between his shoulders, the poet says, there shot forth two enormous wings, without plumage, "in texture like a bat's." With these "he flapped i' the air," and "Cocytus to its depth was frozen." "At six eyes he wept," and at every mouth he champed a sinner. —Dante: Hell, xxxiv. (1301).

Lucifer is one of the characters in Bailey's Festus. Hepworth Dixon says that Bailey's Festus is not a bold bad man, like Marlowe's; nor a proud defiant one, like Milton's; nor a sneering sarcastic one, like Goethe's; but the "principle of evil" personified.

Luci'fera (Pride), daughter of Pluto and Proser'pina. Her usher was Vanity. Her chariot was drawn by six different beasts, on each of which was seated one of the queen's counsellors. The foremost beast was an ass, ridden by Idleness who resembled a monk; paired with the ass was a swine, on which rode Gluttony clad in vine leaves. Next came a goat, ridden by Lechery arrayed in green; paired with the goat was a camel, on which rode Avarice in threadbare coat and cobbled shoes. The next beast was a wolf, bestrid by Envy arrayed in a kirtle full of eyes; and paired with the wolf was a lion, bestrid by Wrath in a robe all blood-stained. The coachman of the team was Satan.

Lo! underneath her scornful feet was lain
A dreadful dragon, with a hideous traine;
And in her hand she held a mirror bright,
Wherein her face she often viewëd fain.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. 4 (1590).

Lucille, a poem by Robert Bulwer-Lytton, lord Lytton (1860). His best.

Lucinda, the daughter of opulent parents, engaged in marriage to Cardenio, a young gentleman of similar rank and equal opulence. Lucinda was, however, promised by her father in marriage to don Fernando, youngest son of the duke Ricardo. When the wedding day arrived, the young lady fell into a swoon, and a letter informed don Fernando that the bride was married already to Cardenio. Next day she left the house privately, and took refuge in a convent, whence she was forcibly abducted by don Fernando. Stopping at an inn, the party found there Dorothea the wife of don Fernando, and Cardenio the husband of Lucinda, and all things arranged themselves satisfactorily to the parties concerned.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. (1605).

Lucinda, the bosom friend of Rosetta; merry, coquettish, and fit for any fun. She is the daughter of justice Woodcock, and falls in love with Jack Eustace. (For the tale, see EUSTACE, Jack, p. 345.) —Bickerstaff: Love in a Village (1762).

Lucinda, referred to by the poet Thomson, in his Spring, was Lucy Fortescue, daughter of Hugh Fortescue of Devonshire, and wife of lord George Lyttelton.

O Lyttelton . . .
Courting the Muse, thro' Hagley Park thou strayst . . .
Perhaps thy loved Lucinda shares thy walk,
With soul to thine attuned.
Thomson: The Seasons ("Spring," 1728).

Lucinde (2 syl.), daughter of Sganarelle. As she has lost her spirit and appetite, her father sends for four physicians, who all differ as to the nature of the malady and the remedy to be applied. Lisette (her waiting-woman) sends in the mean time for Clitandre, the lover of Lucinde, who comes under the guise of a mock doctor. He tells Sganarelle the disease of the young lady must be reached through the imagination, and prescribes the semblance of a marriage. As his assistant is in reality a notary, the mock marriage turns out to be a real one.—Molière: L'Amour Médecin (1665).

Lucinde (2 syl.), daughter of Géronte (2 syl.). Her father wanted her to marry Horace; but as she was in love with Léandre, she pretended to have lost the power of articulate speech, to avoid a marriage which she abhorred. Sganarelle, the faggot-maker, was introduced as a famous dumb doctor, and soon saw the state of affairs; so he took with him Léandre as an apothecary, and the young lady received a perfect cure from "pills matrimoniac."—Molière: Le Médecin Malgré Lui (1666).

Lu'cio, not absolutely bad, but vicious and dissolute. He is "like a wave of the sea, driven by the wind and tossed," and has no abiding principle.—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure (1603).

Lucip'pe (3 syl.), a woman attached to the suite of the princess Calis (sister of Astorax king of Paphos).—Beaumont (?) and Fletcher: The Mad Lover (1618). (Beaumont died 1616.)

Lu'cius, son of Coillus; a mythical king of Britain. Geoffrey says he sent a letter to pope Eleutherius (177–193), desiring to be instructed in the Christian religion, whereupon the pope sent over Dr. Faganus and Dr. Duvanus for the purpose. Lucius was baptized, and "people from all countries" with him. The pagan temples in Britain were converted into churches, the archflamens into archbishops, and the flamens into bishops. So there were twenty-eight bishops and three archbishops.—British History, iv. 19 (1470).

He our flamens' seats who turned to bishops' sees,
Great Lucius, that good king to whom we chiefly owe
This happiness we have—Christ crucified to know.
Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1612).

(Nennius says that king Lucius was baptized in 167 by Evaristus; but this is a blunder, as Evaristus lived a century before the date mentioned.)

The archflamens were those of London, York, and Newport (the City of Legions or Caerleon-on-Usk).

Drayton calls the two legates "Fugatius and St. Damian."

Those goodly Romans . . . who . . .
Wan good king Lucius first to embrace the Christian faith;
Fugatius and his friend St. Damian . . .
. . . have their remembrance here.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiv. (1613).

(After baptism, St. Lucius abdicated, and became a missionary in Switzerland, where he died a martyr's death.)

Lucius (Caius), general of the Roman forces in Britain in the reign of king Cym'beline (3 syl.).—Shakespeare: Cymbeline (1605).

(There is a Lucius in Timon of Athens, and in Julius Cæsar also.)

Lucius Tiberius, general of the Roman army, who wrote to king Arthur, commanding him to appear at Rome to make satisfaction for the conquests he had made, and to receive such punishment as the senate might think proper to award. This letter induced Arthur to declare war with Rome. So, committing the care of government to his nephew Modred, he marched to Lyonaise (in Gaul), where he won a complete victory, and left Lucius dead on the field. He then started for Rome; but being told that Modred had usurped the crown, he hastened back to Britain, and fought the great battle of the West, where he received his death-wound from the hand of Modred.—Geoffrey: British History, ix. 15–20; x. (1142).

Great Arthur did advance
To meet, with his allies, that puissant force in France
By Lucius thither led.
Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

Luck of Roaring Camp (The), the best of the prose sketches of Bret Harte of America. It describes the ameliorating influence of a little child on a set of ruffians (1870).

(It has been dramatized. See SILAS MARNER, a tale somewhat similar, by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross), 1816.)

Lucre'tia, daughter of Spurius Lucretius prefect of Rome, and wife of Tarquinius Collati'nus. She was dishonoured by Sextus, the son of Tarquinius Superbus. Having avowed her dishonour in the presence of her father, her husband, and their friends Junius Brutus and Valerius, she stabbed herself.

N.B.—This subject has been dramatized in French by Ant. Vincent Arnault, in a tragedy called Lucrèce (1792); and by François Ponsard in 1843. In English, by Thomas Heywood, in a tragedy entitled The Rape of Lucrece (1630); by Nathaniel Lee, entitled Lucius Junius Brutus (seventeenth century); and by John H. Payne, entitled Brutus or The Fall of Tarquin (1820). Shakespeare selected the same subject for his poem entitled The Rape of Lucrece (1594).

¶ Tennyson wrote a dramatic monologue called Lucretius.

Lucrezia di Borgia, daughter of pope Alexander VI. She was thrice married, her last husband being Alfonso duke of Ferra'ra. Before this marriage, she had a natural son named Genna'ro, who was brought up by a Neapolitan fisherman. When grown to manhood, Gennaro had a commission given him in the army, and in the battle of Rim'ini he saved the life of Orsini. In Venice he declaimed freely against the vices of Lucrezia di Borgia, and on one occasion he mutilated the escutcheon of the duke by knocking off the B, thus converting Borgia into Orgia. Lucrezia insisted that the perpetrator of this insult should suffer death by poison; but when she discovered that the offender was her own son, she gave him an antidote, and released him from jail. Scarcely, however, was he liberated, than he was poisoned at a banquet given by the princess Neg'roni. Lucrezia now told Gennaro that he was her own son, and died as her son expired.—Donizetti: Lucrezia di Borgia (an opera, 1834).

(Victor Hugo has a drama entitled Lucrèce Borgia.)

Lucullus, a wealthy Roman, noted for his banquets and self-indulgence. On one occasion, when a superb supper had been prepared, being asked who were to be his guests, he replied, "Lucullus will sup to-night with Lucullus" (B.C. 110–57). (See GLUTTON, p. 431.)

Ne'er Falernian threw a richer
Light upon Lucullus' tables.
Longfellow: Drinking Song.

Luco'mo, a satrap, chieftain, or khedive among the ancient Etruscans. The over-king was called lars. Servius the grammarian says, "Lucumo rex sonat linguâ Etruscâ;" but it was such a king as that of Bavaria in the empire of Germany, where the king of Prussia is the lars.

And plainly and more plainly
Now might the burghers know,
By port and vest, by horse and crest,
Each warlike lucumo.
Macaulay: Lays of Ancient Rome ("Horatius," xxiii., 1842).

Lucy, a dowerless girl betrothed to Amidas. Being forsaken by him for the wealthy Philtra, she threw herself into the sea, but was saved by clinging to a chest. Both being drifted ashore, it was found that the chest contained great treasures, which Lucy gave to Bracidas, the brother of Amidas, who married her.

In this marriage, Bracidas found "two goodly portions, and the better she."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 4 (1596).

Lucy, daughter of Mr. Richard Wealthy, a rich London merchant. Her father wanted her to marry a wealthy tradesman, and as she refused to do so, he turned her out of doors. Being introduced as a fille de joie to sir George Wealthy "the minor," he soon perceived her to be a modest girl who had been entrapped, and he proposed marriage. When the facts of the case were known, Mr. Wealthy and sir William (the father of the young man) were delighted at the happy termination of what might have proved a most untoward affair.—Foote: The Minor (1760).

Lucy [LOCKIT], daughter of Lockit the jailer. A foolish young woman, who, decoyed by captain Macheath under the specious promise of marriage, effected his escape from jail. The captain, however, was recaptured, and condemned to death; but being reprieved, confessed himself married to Polly Peachum, and Lucy was left to seek another mate.

How happy could I be with either [Lucy or Polly],
Were t'other dear charmer away!
Gay: The Beggar's Opera, ii. 2 (1727).

(Miss Fenton (duchess of Bolton) was the original "Lucy Lockit," 1708–1760.)

Lucy Deane, in the novel called The Mill on the Floss, by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross) (1860).

Lucy Goodwill, a girl of 16, and a child of nature, reared by her father who was a widower. "She has seen nothing," he says; "she knows nothing, and, therefore, has no will of her own." Old Goodwill wished her to marry one of her relations, that his money might be kept in the family; but Lucy had "will" enough of her own to see that her relations were boobies, and selected for her husband a big, burly footman named Thomas.—Fielding: The Virgin Unmasked (1740).

Lucy and Colin. Colin was betrothed to Lucy, but forsook her for a bride "thrice as rich as she." Lucy drooped, but was present at the wedding; and when Colin saw her, "the damps of death bedewed his brow, and he died." Both were buried in one tomb, and many a hind and plighted maid resorted thither, "to deck it with garlands and true-love knots."—Tickell: Lucy and Colin (1720).

(Vincent Bourne translated this ballad into Latin verse.)

Through all Tickell's works there is a strain of ballad-thinking. . . . In this ballad [Lucy and Colin] he seems to have surpassed himself. It is, perhaps, the best in our language.—Goldsmith: Beauties of English Poetry (1767).

Lucyl'ius (B.C. 148–103), the father of Roman satire.

I have presumed, my lord for to present
With this poore Glasse, which is of trustie Steele [satire],
And came to me by wil and testament
Of one that was a Glassmaker [satirist] indeede:
Lucylius this worthy man was namde.
Gascoigne: The Steele Glas (died 1577).

Lud, son of Heli, who succeeded his father as king of Britain. "Lud rebuilt the walls of Trinovantum, and surrounded the city with innumerable towers . . . for which reason it was called Kaer-lud, Anglicized into Lud-ton, and softened into London. . . . When dead, his body was buried by the gate . . . Parthlud, called in Saxon Ludes-gate."—Geoffrey: British History, iii. 20 (1142).

. . . that mighty Lud, in whose eternal name
Great London still shall live (by him rebuilded).
Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1612).

("Parth-lud," in Latin Porta-Lud.)

Lud (General), leader of the distressed and riotous artisans in the manufacturing districts of England, who, in 1811, endeavoured to prevent the use of power-looms.

Luddites (2 syl.), the riotous artisans who followed the leader called general Lud.

Above thirty years before this time, an imbecile named Ned Lud living in a village in Leicestershire, being tormented by some boys, . . . pursued one of them into a house, and . . . broke two stocking-frames. His name was taken by those who broke power-looms.—H. Martineau.

Lud's Town, London, as if a corruption of Lud-ton. Similarly, Ludgate is said to be Lud's-gate; and Ludgate prison is called "Lud's Bulwark." Of course, the etymologies are only fit for fable.

King Lud, repairing the city, called it after his name, "Lud's town;" the strong gate which he built in the west part he named "Lud-gate." In 1260 the gate was beautified with images of Lud and other kings. Those images, in the reign of Edward VI., had their heads smitten off. . . . Queen Mary did set new heads upon their old bodies again. The 28th of queen Elizabeth, the gate was newly beautified with images of Lud and others, as before.—Stow: Survey of London (1598).

Ludov'ico, chief minister of Naples. He heads a conspiracy to murder the king and seize the crown. Ludovico is the craftiest of villains, but, being caught in his own guile, he is killed.—Sheil: Evadne or The Statue (1820).

Ludovico in Shakespeare's Othello (1602).

Ludwal or Idwal, son of Roderick the Great, of North Wales. He refused to pay Edgar king of England the tribute which had been levied ever since the time of Æthelstan. William of Malmesbury tells us that Edgar commuted the tribute for 300 wolves' heads yearly; the wolf-tribute was paid for three years, and then discontinued, because there were no more wolves to be found.

O Edgar! who compelledst our Ludwal hence to pay
Three hundred wolves a year for tribute unto thee.
Drayton: Polyolbion, ix. (1612).

Lufra, Douglas's dog, "the fleetest hound in all the North."—Sir W. Scott: Lady of the Lake (1810).

Ellen, the while, with bursting heart,
Remained in lordly bower apart . . .
While Lufra, crouching at her side,
Her station claimed with jealous pride.
Sir W. Scott: Lady of the Lake, vi. 23 (1810).

Luggnagg, an island where the inhabitants never die. Swift shows some of the evils which would result from such a destiny, unless accompanied with eternal youth and freshness.—Swift: Gulliver's Travels (1726).

Lu'gier, the rough, confident tutor of Oriana, etc., and chief engine whereby "the wild goose" Mirabel is entrapped into marriage with her.—Fletcher: The Wild-goose Chase (1652).

Luke, brother-in-law of "the City madam." He was raised from a state of indigence into enormous wealth by a deed of gift of the estates of his brother, sir John Frugal, a retired merchant. While dependent on his brother, lady Frugal ("the City lady") treated Luke with great scorn and rudeness; but when she and her daughter became dependent on him, he cut down the superfluities of the fine lady to the measure of her original state—as daughter of Goodman Humble, farmer.—Massinger: The City Madam (1639).

Massinger's best characters are the hypocritical "Luke" and the heroic "Marullo."—Spalding.

Luke, patriarch's nuncio, and bishop of the Druses. He terms the Druses

. . . the docile crew
My bezants went to make me bishop of.
R. Browning: The Return of the Druses, v.

Luke (Sir), or SIR LUKE LIMP, a tuft-hunter, a devotee to the bottle, and a hanger-on of great men for no other reason than mere snobbism. Sir Luke will "cling to sir John till the baronet is superseded by my lord; quitting the puny peer for an earl, and sacrificing all three to a duke."—Foote: The Lame Lover (1770).

Luke's Bird (St.), the ox.

Luke's Iron Crown. George and Luke Dosa headed an unsuccessful revolt against the Hungarian nobles in the sixteenth century. Luke was put to death by a red-hot iron crown, in mockery of his having been proclaimed king.

This was not an unusual punishment for those who sought regal honours in the Middle Ages. Thus, when Tancred usurped the crown of Sicily, kaiser Heinrich VI. of Germany set him on a red-hot iron throne, and crowned him with a red-hot iron crown (twelfth century).

It was not Luke but George Dosa who suffered this punishment. (See IRON CROWN, p. 528.)

N.B.—The "iron crown of Lombardy" must not be mistaken for an iron crown of punishment. The former is said to be one of the nails used in the Crucifixion, beaten out into a thin rim of iron, magnificently set in gold, and adorned with jewels. Charlemagne and Napoleon I. were both crowned with it.

Luke's Summer (St.), or L'été de S. Martin, a few weeks of fine summerly weather, which occur between St. Luke's Day (October 18) and St. Martin's Day (November 11).

In such St. Luke's short summer lived these men,
Nearing the goal of three score years and ten.
W. Morris: The Earthly Paradise ("March").

Lully (Raymond), an alchemist who searched for the philosopher's stone by distillation, and made some useful chemical discoveries. He was also a magician and a philosophic dreamer. Generally called Doctor Illuminātus (1235–1315).

He talks of Raymond Lully and the ghost of Lilly (q.v.).—Congreve: Love for Love, iii. (1695).

Lulu, the love-name of the prince imperial, son of Napoleon III., slain in the Zulu war. His full name was Napoleon Eugéne Louis Jean Joseph (1856–1879).

Lumbercourt (Lord), a voluptuary, greatly in debt, who consented, for a good money consideration, to give his daughter to Egerton McSycophant. Egerton, however, had no fancy for the lady, but married Constantia, the girl of his choice. His lordship was in alarm lest this contretemps should be his ruin; but sir Pertinax told him the bargain should still remain good if Egerton's younger brother, Sandy, were accepted by his lordship instead. To this his lordship readily agreed.

Lady Rodolpha Lumbercourt, daughter of lord Lumbercourt, who, for a consideration, consented to marry Egerton McSycophant; but as Egerton had no fancy for the lady, she agreed to marry Egerton's brother Sandy on the same terms.

"As I ha' nae reason to have the least affection till my cousin Egerton, and as my intended marriage with him was entirely an act of obedience till my grandmother, provided my cousin Sandy will be as agreeable till her ladyship as my cousin Charles here would have been, I have nae the least objection till the change. Ay, ay, one brother is as good to Rodolpha as another." —Macklin: The Man of the World, v. (1764).

Lumbey (Dr.), a stout, bluff-looking gentleman, with no shirt-collar, and a beard that had been growing since yesterday morning. The doctor was very popular, and the neighbourhood prolific. —Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Lumley (Captain), in the royal army under the duke of Montrose.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Lumon, a hill in Inis-Huna, near the residence of Sulmalla. Sulmalla was the daughter of Conmor (king of Inis-Huna) and his wife Clun'galo.—Ossian: Temora.

Where art thou, beam of light? Hunters from the mossy rock, saw you the blue-eyed fair? Are her steps on grassy Lumon, near the bed of roses? Ah me! I beheld her bow in the hall. Where art thou, beam of light?

(Bishop has selected these words from Temora for a glee of four voices.)

Lumpkin (Tony), the rough, good-natured booby son of Mrs. Hardcastle by her first husband. Tony dearly loved a practical joke, and was fond of low society, where he could air his conceit and self-importance. He is described as "an awkward booby, reared up and spoiled at his mother's apron-string" (act i. 2); and "if burning the footman's shoes, frighting [sic] the maids, and worrying the kittens, be humorous," then Tony was humorous to a degree (act i. 1). —Goldsmith: She Stoops to Conquer (1773).

I feel as Tony Lumpkin felt, who never had the least difficulty in reading the outside of his letters, but who found it very hard work to decipher the inside.—Boyd.

Quick's great parts were "Isaac," "Tony Lumpkin," "Spado," and "sir Christopher Curry."—Records of a Stage Veteran.

Quick [1748-1831] was the original "Tony Lumpkin," "Acres," and "Isaac Mendoza."—Memoir of John Quick (1831).

("Isaac" in The Duenna, by Sheridan; "Spado" in The Castle of Andalusia, by O'Keefe; "sir C. Curry" in Inkle and Yarico, by Colman.)

Lun. So John Rich called himself when he performed "harlequin." It was John Rich who introduced pantomime (1681-1761).

On one side Fo'ly sits, by some called Fun;
And on the other his archpatron Lun.
Churchill.

Luna (Il conte di), uncle of Manri'co. He entertains a base passion for the princess Leonōra, who is in love with Manrico; and, in order to rid himself of his rival, is about to put him to death, when Leonora promises to give herself to him if he will spare her lover. The count consents; but while he goes to release his captive, Leonora poisons herself.—Verdi: Il Trova'torè (an opera, 1853).

Lundin (Dr. Luke), the chamberlain at Kinross.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Lundin (The Rev. sir Louis), town clerk of Perth.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Lunsford (Sir Thomas), governor of the Tower. A man of such vindictive temper that the name was used as a terror to children.

Made children with your tones to run for't,
As bad as Bloody-bones or Lunsford.
S. Butler: Hudibras, iii. 2, line 1112 (1678).

From Fielding and from Vavasore,
Both ill-affected men;
From Lunsford eke deliver us,
That eateth childëren.

Lupauski (Prince), father of princess Lodois'ka (4 syl.).—J. P. Kemble: Lodoiska (a melodrame).

Lu'pin (Mrs.), hostess of the Blue Dragon. A buxom, kind-hearted woman, ever ready to help any one over a difficulty. —Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Lu'ria, a noble Moor, single-minded, warm-hearted, faithful, and most generous; employed by the Florentines to lead their army against the Pisans (fifteenth century). Luria was entirely successful; but the Florentines, to lessen their obligation to the conqueror, hunted up every item of scandal they could find against him; and, while he was winning their battles, he was informed that he was to be brought to trial to answer these floating censures. Luria was so disgusted at this, that he took poison, to relieve the state by his death of a debt of gratitude which the republic felt too heavy to be borne.—R. Browning: Luria.

Lu'siad, the adventures of the Lusians (Portuguese), under Vasquez da Gama, in their discovery of India. Bacchus was the guardian power of the Mohammedans, and Venus or Divine Love of the Lusians. The fleet first sailed to Mozambique, then to Quil'oa, then to Melinda (in Africa), where the adventurers were hospitably received and provided with a pilot to conduct them to India. In the Indian Ocean, Bacchus tried to destroy the fleet; but the "silver star of Divine Love" calmed the sea, and Gama arrived at India in safety. Having accomplished his object, he returned to Lisbon.—Camoëns: The Lusiad, in ten books (1572).

N.B.—Vasquez da Gama sailed thrice to India: (1) In 1497, with four vessels. This expedition lasted two years and two months. (2) In 1502, with twenty ships. In this expedition he was attacked by Zamorin king of Calicut, whom he defeated, and returned to Lisbon the year following. (3) When John III. appointed him viceroy of India. He established his government at Cochin, where he died in 1525. The story of The Lusiad is the first of these expeditions.

 This really classic epic in ten books, worthy to be ranked with Virgil's Æneid, has been translated into English verse by Auberton in 1878; Fanshawe in 1655; and by Mickle in 1775.

(English versions by Fanshawe in 1655; by Mickle (in heroic rhyming metre) in 1775; by Auberton in 1878; and by Burton in 1880.)

Lusignan [D'OUTREMER], king of Jerusalem, taken captive by the Saracens, and confined in a dungeon for twenty years. When 80 years old, he was set free by Osman the sultan of the East, but died within a few days.—A. Hill: Zara (adapted from Voltaire's tragedy).

Lusita'nia, the ancient name of Portugal; so called from Lusus, the companion of Bacchus in his travels. This Lusus colonized the country, and called it "Lusitania," and the colonists "Lusians."—Pliny: Historia Naturalis, iii. 1.

Lute'tia (4 syl.), ancient Latin name of Paris (Lutetia Parisiorum, "the mud-town of the Parisii").

Luther (Martin), at the age of 40, married Katharine Borê or Bora, a nun (1520).

What is called Luther's Hymn is the hymn beginning thus: "Great God, what do I see and hear!" but in Germany it is Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott, translated by Carlyle, "A safe stronghold our God is He."

Luther (The Danish), Hans Tausen. There is a stone in Viborg called "Tausensminde," with this inscription: "Upon this stone, in 1528, Hans Tausen first preached Luther's doctrine in Viborg."

Lutin, the gipsy page of lord Dalgarno.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Lux Mundi, Johann Wessel; also called Magister Contradictionum, for his opposition to the Scholastic philosophy. He was the predecessor of Luther (1419–1489).

Luz, a bone which the Jews affirm remains uncorrupted till the last day, when it will form the nucleus of the new body. This bone Mahomet called Al ajb or the rump-bone.

Eben Ezra and Manasseh ben Israil say this bone is in the rump.

> The learned rabbins of the Jews
> Write, there's a bone, which they call luez (1 syl.)
> I' the rump of man.
> S. Butler: Hudibras, iii. 2 (1678).

Lyæus ["spleen-melter"], one of the names of Bacchus.

> He perchance the gifts
> Of young Lyæus, and the dread exploits,
> May sing.
> Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads (1767).

Lyb'ius (Sir), a very young knight, who undertook to rescue the lady of Sinadone. After overcoming sundry knights, giants, and enchanters, he entered the palace, when the whole edifice fell to pieces, and a horrible serpent coiled about his neck and kissed him. The spell being broken, the serpent turned into the lady of Sinadone, who became sir Lybius's bride.—Libeaux (a romance).

Lyca'on, king of Arcadia, instituted human sacrifices, and was metamorphosed into a wolf. Some say all his sons were also changed into wolves, except one named Nictimus. Oh that

> Of Arcady the beares
> Might plucke awaye thine eares;
> The wilde wolfe, Licáon',
> Bite asondre thy backe-bone!
> Skelton: Philip Sparow (time, Henry VIII.).

> For proof, when with Lycá'on's tyranny
> Man durst not deal, then did Jove . . .
> Him fitly to the greedy wolf transform.
> Brooke: Declination of Monarchy (1633).

Lyce'um, a gymnasium on the banks of the Ilissus, in Attica, where Aristotle taught philosophy as he paced the walks.

> Guide my way
> Through fair Lyceum's walks.
> Akenside: Pleasures of Imagination, i. 715 (1744).

Lychor'ida, nurse of Mari'na who was born at sea. Marina was the daughter of Pericles prince of Tyre and his wife Thaisa.—Shakespeare: Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

Lyc'idas, the name under which Milton celebrates the untimely death of Edward King, Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge. Edward King was drowned in the passage from Chester to Ireland, August 10, 1637. He was the son of sir John King, secretary for Ireland.

(Lycidas is the name of a shepherd in Virgil's Eclegue, iii.)

Lycome'des (4 syl.), king of Scyros, to whose court Achillês was sent, disguised as a maiden, by his mother Thetis, who was anxious to prevent his going to the Trojan war.

Lycore'a (He has slept on Lycorêa), one of the two chief summits of mount Parnassus. Whoever slept there became either inspired or mad.

Lydford Law. "First hang and draw, then hear the cause by Lydford law." Lydford, in the county of Devon.

> I oft have heard of Lydford law,
> How in the morn they hang and draw,
> And sit in judgment after.
> A Devonshire poet (anon.).

¶ Jedburgh Justice, Cupar Justice, and Abingdon Law, mean the same thing.

¶ Lynch Law, Burlaw, Mob Law, and Club Law, mean summary justice dealt to an offender by a self-constituted judge.

Lydia, daughter of the king of Lydia, was sought in marriage by Alcestês a Thracian knight. His suit being rejected, he repaired to the king of Armenia, who gave him an army, with which he besieged Lydia. He was persuaded to raise the siege, and the lady tested the sincerity of his love by a series of tasks, all of which he accomplished. Lastly, she set him to put to death his allies, and, being powerless, mocked him. Alcestês pined and died, and Lydia was doomed to endless torment in hell.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, xvii. (1516).

Lydia, lady's-maid to Widow Green. She was the sister of Trueworth, ran away from home to avoid a hateful marriage, took service for the nonce, and ultimately married Waller. She was "a miracle of virtue, as well as beauty," warm-hearted, and wholly without artifice.—Knowles: The Love-Chase (1837).

Lydia Languish, niece and ward of Mrs. Malaprop. She had a fortune of £30,000, but, if she married without her aunt's consent, forfeited the larger part thereof. She was a great novel-reader, and was courted by two rival lovers—Bob Acres, and captain Absolute whom she knew only as ensign Beverley. Her aunt insisted that she should throw over the ensign and marry the son of sir Anthony Absolute, and great was her joy to find that the man of her own choice was that of her aunt's, nomine mutato. Bob Acres resigned all claim on the lady to his rival.—Sheridan: The Rivals (1775).

Lydian Poet (The), Alcman of Lydia (fl. B.C. 670).

Lygo'nes, father of Spaco'nia.—Beaumont and Fletcher: A King or No King (1611).

Lying Traveller (The), sir John Mandeville (1300-1372).

Lying Valet (The), Timothy Sharp, the lying valet of Charles Gayless. He is the Mercury between his master and Melissa, to whom Gayless is about to be married. The object of his lying is to make his master, who has not a sixpence in the world, pass for a man of fortune.—Garrick: The Lying Valet (1741).

Lyle (Annot), daughter of sir Duncan Campbell the knight of Ardenvohr. She was brought up by the M'Aulays, and was beloved by Allan M'Aulay; but she married the earl of Menteith.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Lyn'ceus, one of the Argonauts; so sharp-sighted that he could discern objects at a distance of 130 miles. Varro says he could "see through rocks and trees;" and Pliny, that he could see "the infernal regions through the earth."

> Strange tale to tel: all officers be blynde,
> And yet their one eye, sharpe as Lin'ceus' sight.
> Gascoigne: The Steele Glas (died 1577).

Lynch (Governor) was a great name in Galway (Ireland). It is said that he hanged his only son out of the window of his own house (1526). The very window from which the boy was hung is carefully preserved, and still pointed out to travellers.—Annals of Galway.

Lynch Law, law administered by a self-constituted judge. Webster says James Lynch, a farmer of Piedmont, in Virginia, was selected by his neighbours (in 1688) to try offences on the frontier summarily, because there were no law courts within seven miles of them.

Lynchnobians, lantern-sellers, that is, booksellers and publishers. Rabelais says they inhabit a little hamlet near Lantern-land. — Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, v. 33 (1545).

Lyndon (Barry), an Irish sharper, whose adventures are told by Thackeray. The story is full of spirit, variety, and humour, reminding one of Gil Blas. It first came out in Fraser's Magazine.

Lynette, sister of lady Lyonors of Castle Perilous. She goes to king Arthur, and prays him to send sir Lancelot to deliver her sister from certain knights. The king assigns the quest to Beaumains (the nickname given by sir Kay to Gareth), who had served for twelve months in Arthur's kitchen. Lynette is exceedingly indignant, and treats her champion with the utmost contumely; but, after each victory, softens towards him, and at length marries him.—Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("Gareth and Lynette").

N.B.—This version of the tale differs from that of the History of Prince Arthur by sir T. Malory (1470) in many respects. (See LINET, p. 615.)

 Tennyson describes Linette thus—

> A damsel of high lineage; and a brow
> May-blossom; and a cheek of apple-blossom;
> Hawk-eyes; and lightly was her tender nose,
> Tip-tilted like the petal of a flower.

Lyon (Rufus), the dissenting minister in the novel Felix Holt, by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross) (1866).

Lyonnesse (3 syl.), west of Camelot. The battle of Lyonnesse was the "last great battle of the West," and the scene of the final conflict between Arthur and sir Modred. The land of Lyonnesse is where Arthur came from, and it is now submerged full "forty fathoms under water."

> Until king Arthur's table [knights], man by man,
> Had fallen in Lyonnesse about their lord.
> Tennyson: Morte d'Arthur.

Lyonors, daughter of earl Sanam. She came to pay homage to king Arthur, and by him became the mother of sir Borre (1 syl.), one of the knights of the Round Table.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 15 (1470).

 Lionês, daughter of sir Persaunt, and sister of Linet of Castle Perilous, married sir Gareth. Tennyson calls this lady "Lyonors," and makes Gareth marry her sister, who, we are told in the History, was married to sir Gaheris (Gareth's brother).

Lyonors, the lady of Castle Perilous, where she was held captive by several knights, called Morning Star or Phosphŏrus, Noonday Sun or Merid'ies, Evening Star or Hesperus, and Night or Nox. Her sister Lynette went to king Arthur, to crave that sir Lancelot might be sent to deliver Lyonors from her oppressor. The king gave the quest to Gareth, who was knighted, and accompanied Lynette, who used him very scornfully at first; but at every victory which he gained she abated somewhat of her contempt; and married him after he had succeeded in delivering Lyonors. The lot of Lyonors is not told. (See LIONES, p. 617.)—Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("Gareth and Lynette").

N.B.—According to the collection of tales edited by sir T. Malory, the lady Lyonors was quite another person. She was daughter of earl Sanam, and mother of sir Borre by king Arthur (pt. i. 15). It was Lionês who was the sister of Linet, and whose father was sir Persaunt of Castle Perilous (pt. i. 153). The History says that Lionês married Gareth, and Linet married his brother, sir Gaheris. (See GARETH, p. 405.)

Lyric Poets. There were only nine poets recognized as lyrists in the time of Horace. They were all Greeks: Alcæos, Alcman, Anacreon, Bacchilidês, Ilysos, Pindar, Sappho, Simonidês, and Stenchoros. Horace is the only one among the Romans.

> Quod si me Lyricis vatibus inseres,
> Sublimi feriam sidera vertice.
> Horace: 1 Odes i. vers. 35, 36.

Lyrists (Prince of), Franz Schubert (1797–1828).

Lysander, a young Athenian, in love with Hermia daughter of Egĕus (3 syl.). Egeus had promised her in marriage to Demētrius, and insisted that she should either marry him or suffer death "according to the Athenian law." (For the rest of the tale, see DEMETRIUS, p. 270.) —Shakespeare: A Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

Lysim'achus, governor of Metali'nê, who marries Mari'na the daughter of Per'iclês prince of Tyre and his wife Thais'a.—Shakespeare: Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

Lysimachus, the artist, a citizen.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Lyttelton, addressed by Thomson in "Spring," was George lord Lyttelton of Hagley Park, Worcestershire, who procured for the poet a pension of £100 a year. He was a poet and historian (1709–1773).

> O Lyttelton . . . from these, distracted, oft
> You wander thro' the philosophic world; . . .
> And oft, conducted by historic truth,
> You tread the long extent of backward time; . . .
> Or, turning thence thy view, these graver thoughts
> The Muses charm.
> Thomson: The Seasons ("Spring," 1728).

M.

M, said to represent the human face without the two eyes. By adding these, we get O M O, the Latin homo, "man." Dantê, speaking of faces gaunt with starvation, says—

> Who reads the name
> For man upon his forehead, there the M
> Had traced most plainly.
> Dante: Purgatory, xxiii. (1308).

 The two downstrokes stand for the contour, and the V of the letter for the nose. Thus: I°V°I

M. This letter is very curiously coupled with Napoleon I. and III.

1. NAPOLEON I.:

¶ MACK (General) capitulated at Ulm (October 19, 1805).
MAITLAND (Captain), of the Bellerophon, was the person to whom he surrendered (1814).
MALET conspired against him (1812).
MALLIEU was one of his ministers, with Maret and Montalivet.
MARBEUF was the first to recognise his genius at the military college (1779).
MARCHAND was his valet; accompanied him to St. Helena; and assisted Montholon in his Mémoires.
MARET duke of Bassano was his most trusty counsellor (1804–1814).
MARIE LOUISE was his wife, the mother of his son, and shared his highest fortunes. His son was born in March; so was the son of Napoleon III.
MARMONT duke of Ragusa was the second to desert him. (See MURAT.)
¶ 6 Marshals and 26 Generals of Divisions had M for their initial letter.
MACDONALD duke of Tarentum.
MASSENA was the general who gained the victory of Rivoli (1797). Napoleon gave him the sobriquet of L'Enfant Chéri de la Victoire; he was made duke of Essling, and after his victory of Rivoli created duke of Rivoli.
MELAS was the Austrian general conquered at Marengo, and forced back to the Mincio (June 14, 1800).
MENOU lost him Egypt (1801).
METTERNICH vanquished him in diplomacy.
MIOLLIS was employed by him to take Pius VII. prisoner (1809).
MONEY duke of Coriegliano.
MONTALIVET was one of his ministers, with Maret and Mallieu.
MONTBEL wrote the life of his son, "the king of Rome" (1833).
MONTESQUIEU was his first chamberlain.
MONTHOLON was his companion at St. Helena, and, in conjunction with Marchand his valet, wrote his Mémoires.
MOREAU betrayed him (1813).
MORTIER duke of Treviso was one of his best generals.
MOURAD BEY was the general he vanquished in the battle of the Pyramids (July 23, 1798).
MURAT duke of Eichingen was his brother-in-law. He was the first martyr in his cause, and was the first to desert him. (See MARMONT.)
Murat was made by him king of Naples (1808).
¶ MADRID capitulated to him (December 4, 1808).
MAGLIANI was one of his famous victories (April 15, 1796).
MALMAISON was his last halting-place in France. Here the empress Joséphine lived after her divorce, and here she died (1814).
MALTA taken (June 11, 1797), and while there he abolished the order called "The Knights of Malta" (1798).
MANTUA was surrendered to him by Wurmser, in 1797.
MARENGO was his first great victory (June 14, 1800).
MARSEILLES is the place he retired to when proscribed by Paoli (1792). Here too was his first exploit, when captain, in reducing the "Federalists" (1793).
MERY was a battle gained by him (February 22, 1814).
MILAN was the first enemy's capital (1800), and Moscow the last, into which he walked victorious (1812).
It was at Milan he was crowned "king of Italy" (May 20, 1805).
MILLESIMO, a battle won by him (April 14, 1796).
MONDOVI, a battle won by him (April 22, 1796).
MONTENOTTE was his first battle (1796), and Mont St. Jean his last (1815).
MONTEREAU, a battle won by him (February 18, 1814).
MONTMARTRE was stormed by him (March 29, 1814).
MONTMIRAIL, a battle won by him (February 11, 1814).
MONT ST. JEAN (Waterloo), his last battle (June 18, 1815).
MONT THABOR was where he vanquished 20,000 Turks with an army not exceeding 2000 men (July 25, 1799).
MORAVIA was the site of a victory (July 11, 1809).
MOSCOW was his pitfall. (See MILAN.)
¶ Months—
MAY. In this month he quitted Corsica, married Joséphine, took command of the army of Italy, crossed the Alps, assumed the title of emperor, and was crowned as Milan. In the same month he was defeated at Aspern, he arrived at Elba, and died at St. Helena.

25, 1802, peace of Amiens.
31, 1814, Paris entered by the allies.

2. NAPOLEON III.:

¶ MACMAHON duke of Magenta, his most distinguished marshal, and, after a few months, succeeded him as ruler of France (1873–1893).
MALAKOFF (Duke of), next to Macmahon his most distinguished marshal.
MARIA of Portugal was the lady his friends wanted him to marry, but he refused to do so.
MAXIMILIAN and Mexico, his evil stars (1864–1867).
MENSCHIKOFF was the Russian general defeated at the battle of the Alma (September 20, 1854).
MICHAUD, MIGNET, MICHELET, and MERIMER were distinguished historians in the reign of Napoleon III.
MOLTKE was his destiny.
MONTHOLON was one of his companions in the escapade at Boulogne, and was condemned to imprisonment for twenty years.
MONTIJO (Countess of), his wife. Her name was Marie Eugénie, and his son was born in March; so was the son of Napoleon I.
MORNY, his greatest friend.
¶ MAGENTA, a victory won by him (June 4, 1859).
MALAKOFF. Taking the Malakoff tower and the Mamelon-vert were the great exploits of the Crimean war (September 8, 1855).
MAMELON-VERT. (See above.)
MANTUA. He turned back before the walls of Mantua after the battle of the Mincio.
MARENGO. Here he planned his first battle of the Italian campaign, but it was not fought till after those of Montebello and Magenta.
MARIGNANO. He drove the Austrians out of this place.
METZ, the "maiden fortress," was one of the most important sieges and losses to him during the Franco-Prussian war.
MEXICO and Maximilian, his evil stars.
MILAN. He made his entrance into Milan, and drove the Austrians out of Marignano.
MINCIO (The battle of the), called also Solferino, a great victory. Having won this, he turned back at the walls of Mantua (June 24, 1859).
MONTEBELLO, a victory won by him (June, 1859).
∴ The mitrailleuse was to win him Prussia, but it lost him France.
¶ Months—
MARCH. In this month his son was born, he was deposed by the National Assembly, and was set at liberty by the Prussians. The treaty of Paris was March 30, 1856. Savoy and Nice were annexed in March, 1860.
MAY. In this month he made his escape from Ham. The great French Exhibition was opened in May, 1855.
By far his best publication is his Manual of Artillery.

Mab, queen of the fairies, according to the mythology of the English poets of the fifteenth century. Shakespeare describes queen Mab in Romeo and Juliet, act I. sc. 4 (1598).

Chaucer makes Proserpina the spouse of Pluto, an calls Pluto "the king of Fairie."

Queen Mab's Maids of Honour. They were Hop and Mop, Drap, Pip, Trip, and Skip. Her train of waiting-maids were Fib and Tib, Pinck and Pin, Tick and Quick, Jill and Jin, Tit and Nit, Wap and Win.—Drayton: Nymphidia (1563–1631).

Queen Mab, the Fairies' Midwife, that is, the midwife of men's dreams, employed by the fairies. Thus, the queen's or king's judges do not judge the sovereign, but are employed by the sovereign to judge others.

Mab (Queen), a speculative poem by P. B. Shelley, in blank verse, divided into nine sections of about two hundred lines each. The outline of the story is as follows:—

Ianthe (3 syl.) falls asleep, and dreams that her disembodied spirit is conveyed to the court of queen Mab, beyond the confines of this earth. Here she is taught the evils of civil government, and the untruthfulness of religion generally. Queen Mab then summons into her presence Ahasuerus, the "Wandering Jew," who tells her all about creation and redemption, when the queen dismisses him. Ianthe then dreams that the earth is renewed, and that love is made the ruling spirit, both of earth and heaven. Then waking from her sleep, she finds Henry sitting beside her, lovingly watching her varying moods. The poem was written when Shelley was about 18 (1810).

Mabinogion. A series of Welsh tales, chiefly relating to Arthur and the Round Table. A MS. volume of some 700 pages is preserved in the library of Jesus College, Oxford, and is known as the Red Book of Hergest, from the place where it was discovered. Lady Charlotte Guest published an edition in Welsh and English, with notes, three vols. (1838–49). The word is the Welsh mabi nogi, "juvenile instruction" (mabin, "juvenile;" mab, "a boy;" and ogi, "to use the harrow").

Does he [Tennyson] make no use of the Mabinogion in his Arthurian series?—Notes and Queries, November 23, 1878.

Macaber (The Dance) or the "Dance of Death" (Arabic, makabir, "a churchyard"). The dance of death was a favourite subject in the Middle Ages for wall-paintings in cemeteries and churches, especially in Germany. Death is represented as presiding over a round of dancers, consisting of rich and poor, old and young, male and female. A work descriptive of this dance, originally in German, has been translated into most European languages, and the painting of Holbein, in the Dominican convent at Basle, has a world-wide reputation. Others are at Minden, Lucerne, Lubeck, Dresden, and the north side of old St. Paul's.

Elsie. What are these paintings on the walls around us?
Prince. "The Dance Macaber" . . . "The Dance of Death."
Longfellow: The Golden Legend (1851).

Macaire (Le Chevalier Richard), a French knight, who, aided by lieutenant Landry, murdered Aubry de Montdidier in the forest of Bondy, in 1371. Montdidier's dog, named Dragon, showed such an aversion to Macaire, that suspicion was aroused, and the man and dog were pitted to single combat. The result was fatal to the man, who died confessing his guilt. See the Chanson de Geste (twelfth century).

There are two French plays on the subject, one entitled Le Chien de Montargis, and the other Le Chien d'Aubry. The former of these has been adapted to the English stage. Dragon was called Chien de Montargis, because the assassination took place near this castle, and was depicted in the great hall over the chimney-piece.

N.B.—In the English drama, the sash of the murdered man is found in the possession of lieutenant Macaire, and is recognized by Ursula, who worked the sword-knot, and gave it to captain Aubri, who was her sweetheart. Macaire then confessed the crime. His accomplice, lieutenant Landry, trying to escape, was seized by the dog Dragon, and bitten to death.

¶ For a similar dog-tale, see TALISMAN.

The story is contained in the Chanson de Geste of the twelfth century, and is called La reine Sibile.

Macaire (Robert), a cant name for a Frenchman.

MacAlpine (Jeanie), landlady of the Clachan o 1Aberfoyle.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Macamut, a sultan of Cambaya, who lived so much upon poison that his very breath and touch were fatal.—Purchas: Pilgrimage (1613).

MacAnaleister (Eachin), a follower of Rob Roy.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Macare (2 syl.), the impersonation of good temper.—Voltaire: Thelème and Macare (an allegory).

Macaulay (Angus), a Highland chief in the army of the earl of Montrose.

Allan Macaulay or "Allan of the Red Hand," brother of Angus. Allan is "a seer," in love with Annot Lyle. He stabs the earl of Menteith on the eve of his marriage, out of jealousy, but the earl recovers and marries Annot Lyle.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Macbeth', son of Sinel thane of Glamis, and grandson of Malcolm II. by his second daughter; the elder daughter married Crynin, father of Duncan who succeeded his grandfather on the throne. Hence king Duncan and Macbeth were cousins. Duncan, staying as a guest with Macbeth at the castle of Inverness (1040), was murdered by his host, who then usurped the crown. The battle which Macbeth had just won was this: Sueno king of Norway had landed with an army in Fife, for the purpose of invading Scotland; Macbeth and Banquo were sent against him, and defeated him with such loss, that only ten men of all his army escaped alive. Macbeth was promised by the witches (1) that none of woman born should kill him; and (2) that he should not die till Birnam Wood removed to Dunsinane. He was slain in battle by Macduff, who was "from his mother's womb untimely ripped;" and as for the moving wood, the soldiers of Macduff, in their march to Dunsinane, were commanded to carry boughs of the forest before them, to conceal their numbers.

Lady Macbeth, wife of Macbeth, a woman of great ambition and inexorable will. When her husband told her that the witches prophesied he should be king, she induced him to murder Duncan, who was at the time their guest. She would herself have done it, but "he looked in sleep so like her father that she could not." However, when Macbeth had murdered the king, she felt no scruple in murdering the two grooms that slept with him, and throwing the guilt on them. After her husband was crowned, she was greatly troubled by dreams, and used to walk in her sleep, trying to rub from her hands imaginary stains of blood. She died, probably by her own hand.—Shakespeare: Macbeth (1606).

She is a terrible impersonation of evil passions and mighty powers, never so far removed from our own nature as to be cast beyond the pale of our sympathy; for she remains a woman to the last, and is always linked with her sex and with humanity.—Mrs. Jameson.

N.B.—C. Dibdin says "that though 'lady Macbeth' had been frequently well performed, no actress, not even Mrs. Barry, could in the smallest degree be compared to Mrs. Betterton." Mrs. Siddons calls Mrs. Pritchard "the greatest of all the 'lady Macbeths;'" but Mrs. Siddons herself was so great in this character, that in the sleep-walking scene, in her farewell performance, the whole audience stood on the benches, and demanded that the performance should end with that scene. Since then, Helen Faucit has been the best "lady Macbeth." Mrs. Betterton (died 1712); Mrs. Barry (1682–1733); Mrs. Pritchard (1711–1768); Mrs. Siddons (1755–1831); Helen Faucit (born 1820).

(Dr. Lardner says that the name of lady Macbeth was Graoch, and that she was the daughter of Kenneth IV.)

MacBriar (Ephraim), an enthusiast and a preacher.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Mac'cabee (Father), the name assumed by king Roderick after his dethronement.—Southey: Roderick, the Last of the Goths (1814).

MacCallum (Dougal), the auld butler of sir Robert Redgauntlet, introduced in Wandering Willie's story.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

MacCandlish (Mrs.), landlady of the Gordon Arms inn at Kippletringan.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

MacCasquil (Mr.), of Drumquag, a relation of Mrs. Margaret Bertram.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

MacChoak'umchild, schoolmaster at Coketown. A man crammed with facts. "He and some 140 other schoolmasters had been lately turned at the same time, in the same factory, on the same principles, like so many pianoforte legs."—Dickens: Hard Times (1854).

MacCombich (Evan Dhu), foster-brother of Fergus M'Ivor, both of whom were sentenced to death at Carlisle.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

MacCombich (Robin Oig) or M'Gregor, a Highland drover, who stabs Harry Wakefield, and is found guilty at Carlisle.—Sir W. Scott: The Two Drovers (time, George III.).

MacCrosskie (Deacon), of Creochstone, a neighbour of the laird of Ellangowan.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

MacDonald's Breed (Lord), vermin or human parasites. Lord MacDonald, son of the "Lord of the Isles," once made a raid on the mainland. He and his followers dressed themselves in the clothes of the plundered party, but their own rags were so full of vermin that no one was poor enough to covet them.

MacDougal of Lorn, a Highland chief in the army of Montrose.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Macduff, thane of Fife in the time of Edward the Confessor. One of the witches told Macbeth to "beware of the thane of Fife," but another added that "none of woman born should have power to harm him." Macduff was at this moment in England, raising an army to dethrone Macbeth, and place Malcolm (son of Duncan) on the throne. Macbeth did not know of his absence, but with a view of cutting him off, attacked his castle, and slew lady Macduff with all her children. Having raised an army, Macduff led it to Dunsinane, where a furious battle ensued. Macduff encountered Macbeth, and being told by the king that "none of woman born could prevail against him," replied that he (Macduff) was not born of a woman, but was taken from his mother's womb by the Cæsarian operation. Whereupon they fought, and Macbeth fell.—Shakespeare: Macbeth (1606).

MacEagh (Ranald), one of the "Children of the Mist," and an outlaw. Ranald is the foe of Allan Macaulay.

Kenneth M'Eagh, grandson of Ranald M'Eagh.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Macedonicus, Æmilius Paulus, conqueror of Perseus (B.C. 230–160).

Macfie, the laird of Gudgeonford, a neighbour of the laird of Ellangowan.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Macfin (Miles), the cadie in the Canongate, Edinburgh.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

MacFittoch (Mr.), the dancing-master at Middlemas.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

MacFleck'noe, in Dryden's satire so called, is meant for Thomas Shadwell, who was promoted to the office of poet-laureate. The design of Dryden's poem is to represent the inauguration of one dullard as successor of another in the monarchy of nonsense. R. Flecknoe was an Irish priest and hackney poet of no reputation, and Mac is Celtic for son; "MacFlecknoe" means the son of the poetaster so named. Flecknoe, seeking for a successor to his own dulness, selects Shadwell to bear his mantle.

> Shadwell alone my perfect image bears,
> Mature in dulness from his tender years; . . .
> The rest to some faint meaning make pretence,
> But Shadwell never deviates into sense.
> Dryden: MacFlecknoe (a satire, 1682).

An ordinary reader would scarcely suppose that Shadwell, who is here meant by MacFlecknoe, was worth being chastised; and that Dryden, descending to such game, was like an eagle stooping to catch flies. But the truth is, that Shadwell at one time held divided reputation with this great poet. Every age produces its fashionable dunces, who . . . supply talkative ignorance with materials for conversation.—Goldsmith: Beauties of English Poets (1767).

MacGrainer (Master), a dissenting minister at Kippletringan.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

MacGregor (Rob Roy) or ROBERT CAMPBELL, the outlaw. He was a Highland freebooter.

Helen M'Gregor, Rob Roy's wife.

Hamish and Robert Oig, the sons of Rob Roy.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

MacGregor, or Robin Oig M'Combich, a Highland drover, who stabbed Harry Wakefield at an ale-house. Being tried at Carlisle for the murder, he was found guilty and condemned.—Sir W. Scott: The Two Drovers (time, George III.).

MacGruther (Sandie), a beggar imprisoned by Mr. Godfrey Bertram laird of Ellangowan.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

MacGuffog (David), keeper of Portanferry prison.

Mrs. M'Guffog, David's wife.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Macham (Robert), the discoverer of Madeira Island, to which he was driven while eloping with his lady-love (A.D. 1344). The lady soon died, and the mariners made off with the ship. Macham, after his mourning was over, made a rude boat out of a tree, and, with two or three men, putting forth to sea, landed on the shores of Africa. The Rev. W. L. Bowles has made the marvellous adventures of Robert Macham the subject of a poem; and Drayton, in his Polyolbion, xix., has devoted twenty-two lines to the same subject.

Macheath (Captain), captain of a gang of highwaymen; a fine, bold-faced ruffian, "game" to the very last. He is married to Polly Peachum, but finds himself dreadfully embarrassed between Polly his wife, and Lucy to whom he has promised marriage. Being betrayed by eight women at a drinking bout, the captain is lodged in Newgate, but Lucy effects his escape. He is recaptured, tried, and condemned to death; but being reprieved, acknowledges Polly to be his wife, and promises to remain constant to her for the future.—Gay: The Beggar's Opera (1727).

Men will not become highwaymen because Macheath is acquitted on the stage.—Dr. Johnson.

(T. Walker was the original "Macheath," but Charles Hulet (1701–1736) was allowed to excel him. O'Keefe says West Digges (1720–1786) was the best "Macheath" he ever saw in person, song, and manners. Incledon (1764–1826) performed the part well, and in 1821 Miss Blake delighted play-goers by her pretty imitation of the highwayman.)

Machiavelli (Niccolo dei), of Florence, author of a book called The Prince, the object of which is to show that all is fair in diplomacy, as well as in "love and war" (1469–1527).

Machiavellism, political cunning and duplicity, the art of tricking and over-reaching by diplomacy.

N.B.—Tiberius, the Roman emperor, is called "The Imperial Machiavelli" (B.C. 42 to A.D. 37). Louis XI. used to say, "He who knows not how to gammon knows not how to govern."

MacIan (Gilchrist), father of Ian Eachin M'Ian.

Ian Eachin (or Hector) M'Ian, called Conachar, chief of the clan Quhele, son of Gilchrist M'Ian. Hector is old Glover's Highland apprentice, and casts himself down a precipice, because Catharine Glover loves Henry Smith better than himself.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

MacIlduy, or Mhich Connel Dhu, a Highland chief in the army of Montrose.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

MacIntyre (Maria), niece of Mr. Jonathan Oldbuck "the antiquary."

Captain Hector M'Intyre*, nephew of Mr. Jonathan Oldbuck, and brother of Maria M'Intyre.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

MacIvor (Fergus), or "Vich Ian Vohr," chief of Glennaquoich. He is executed.

Flora M'Ivor, sister of Fergus, and the heroine of Waverley.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Mackitchinson, landlord at the Queen's Ferry inn.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Macklin. The real name of this great actor was Charles MacLaughlin; but he dropped the middle syllable when he came to England (1690-1797).

Macklin (Sir), a priest who preached to Tom and Bob and Billy, on the sinfulness of walking on Sundays. At his "sixthly" he said, "Ha, ha, I see you raise your hands in agony!" They certainly had raised their hands, for they were yawning. At his "twenty-firstly" he cried, "Ho, ho, I see you bow your heads in heartfelt sorrow!" Truly they bowed their heads, for they were sleeping. Still on he preached and thumped his hat, when the bishop, passing by, cried, "Bosh!" and walked him off.—Gilbert: The Bab Ballads ("Sir Macklin").

Maclean (Sir Hector), a Highland chief in the army of Montrose.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Macleary (Widow), landlady of the Tully Veolan village ale-house.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

MacLeish (Donald), postilion to Mrs. Bethune Baliol.—Sir W. Scott: Highland Widow (time, George II.).

Macleod (Colin or Cawdie), a Scotchman, one of the house-servants of lord Abberville, entrusted with the financial department of his lordship's household. Most strictly honest and economical, Colin Macleod is hated by his fellow-servants, and, having been in the service of the family for many years, tries to check his young master on his road to ruin.

 The object of the author in this character is "to weed out the unmanly prejudice of Englishmen against the Scotch," as the object of The Jew (another drama) was to weed out the prejudice of Christians against that much-maligned people.—Cumberland: The Fashionable Lover (1780).

Macleuchar (Mrs.), book-keeper at the coach-office in Edinburgh.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

MacLouis, captain of the king's guard.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Maclure (Elizabeth), an old widow and a covenanter.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

MacMorlan (Mr.), deputy-sheriff, and guardian to Lucy Bertram.

Mrs. M'Morlan, his wife.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

MacMurrough, "Nan Fonn," the family bard at Glennaquoich to Fergus M'Ivor.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Ma'coma', a good and wise genius, who protects the prudent and pious against the wiles of all evil genii.—Sir C. Morell [J. Ridley]: Tales of the Genii ("The Enchanter's Tale," vi., 1751).

Macon, same as Mahoun, that is, Mahomet. Mecca, the birthplace of Mahomet, is sometimes called Macon in poetry.

> "Praisèd," quoth he, "be Macon, whom we serve."
> Fairfax.

MacPhadraick (Miles), a Highland officer under Barcaldine or captain Campbell.—Sir W. Scott: The Highland Widow (time, George II.).

Macraw (Francie), an old domestic at the earl of Glenallan's.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Macready (Pate), a pedlar, the friend of Andrew Fairservice gardener at Osbaldistone Hall.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Mac'reons, the British. Great Britain is the "Island of the Macreons." The word is a Greek compound, meaning "long-lived," "because no one is put to death there for his religious opinions." Rabelais says the island "is full of antique ruins and relics of popery and ancient superstitions."—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel (1545).

 Rabelais describes the persecutions which the Reformers met with as a storm at sea, in which Pantagruel and his fleet were tempest-tossed.

Macro'bii ["the long-lived"], an Ethiopian race, said to live to 120 years and upwards. They are the handsomest and tallest of all men, as well as the longest-lived.

Macroth'umus, Long-suffering personified. Fully described in canto x. (Greek, makrothumia, "long-suffering.") —P. Fletcher: The Purple Island (1633).

MacSarcasm (Sir Arthur), "a proud Caledonian knight, whose tongue, like the dart of death, spares neither sex nor age. . . . His insolence of family and licentiousness of wit gained him the contempt of every one" (act i. 1). Sir Archy tells Charlotte, "In the house of M'Sarcasm are twa barons, three viscounts, six earls, ane marquisate, and twa dukes, besides baronets and lairds oot o' a' reckoning" (act i. 1). He makes love to Charlotte Goodchild, but, thinking that she has lost her fortune, he declares to her that he has just received letters "frae the dukes, the marquis, and a' the dignitaries of the family . . . expressly prohibiting the contamination of the blood of the M'Sarcasms wi' onything sprung from a hogshead or a coonting-house" (act ii. 1).

The man has something droll, something ridiculous about him. His abominable Scotch accent, his grotesque visage almost buried in snuff, the roll of his eyes and twist of his mouth, his strange inhuman laugh, his tremendous periwig, and his manners altogether—why, one might take him for a mountebank doctor at a Dutch fair.—Macklin: Love à-la-Mode, act i. 1 (1779).

Sir Archy's Great-grandmother. Sir Archy insisted on fighting sir Callaghan O'Brallaghan on a point of ancestry. The Scotchman said that the Irish are a colony from Scotland, "an ootcast, a mere ootcast." The Irishman retorted by saying that "one MacFergus O'Brallaghan went from Carrickfergus, and peopled all Scotland with his own hands." Charlotte Goodchild interposed, and asked the cause of the contention; whereupon sir Callaghan replied, "Madam, it is about sir Archy's great-grandmother" (act i. 1).—Macklin: Love à-la-Mode (1779).

We shall not now stay to quarrel about sir Archy's great-grandmother.—Macpherson: Dissertation upon Ossian.

(Boaden says, "To Covent Garden, G. F. Cooke [1746-1812] was a great acquisition, as he was a 'Shylock,' an 'Iago,' a 'Kitely,' a 'sir Archy,' and a 'sir Pertinax' [MacSycophant]." Leigh Hunt says that G. F. Cooke was a new kind of Macklin, and, like him, excelled in "Shylock" and "sir Archy M'Sarcasm.")

"Shylock" in the Merchant of Venice (Shakespeare); "Iago" in Othello (Shakespeare); "Kitely" in Every Man in His Humour (B. Jonson); "sir Archy" that is, "M'Sarcasm;" "sir Pertinax MacSycophant" in The Man of the World (Macklin).

MacSillergrip, a Scotch pawnbroker, in search of Robin Scrawkey, his runaway apprentice, whom he pursues upstairs and assails with blows.

Mrs. M'Sillergrip, the pawnbroker's wife, always in terror lest the manager should pay her indecorous attentions.—Charles Mathew (At home, in Multiple).

The skill with which Mathews [1775-1835] carried on a conversation between these three persons produced a most astonishing effect.—Contemporary Paper.

MacStin'ger (Mrs.), a widow who kept lodgings at No. 9, Brig Place, on the brink of a canal near the India Docks. Captain Cuttle lodged there. Mrs. MacStinger was a termagant, and rendered the captain's life miserable. He was afraid of her, and, although her lodger, was her slave. When her son Alexander was refractory, Mrs MacStinger used to beat him well and then seat him on a paving-stone to cool! She contrived to make captain Bunsby her second husband. —Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

MacSyc'ophant (Sir Pertinax), the hot-headed, ambitious father of Charles Egerton. His love for Scotland is very great, and he is continually quarrelling with his family because they do not hold his country in sufficient reverence.

I raised it [my fortune] by booing . . . I never could stand straight in the presence of a great man, but always booed, and booed, and booed, as it were by instinct.—Act iii. 1 (1764).

Charles Egerton M'Sycophant, son of sir Pertinax. Egerton was the mother's name. Charles Egerton marries Constantia.—Macklin: The Man of the World (1764).

Mactab (The Hon. Miss Lucretia), sister of lord Lofty, and sister-in-law of lieutenant Worthington "the poor gentleman." Miss Lucretia was an old maid, "stiff as a ramrod." Being very poor, she allowed the lieutenant "the honour of maintaining her," for which "she handsomely gave him her countenance;" but when the lieutenant was obliged to discontinue his hospitality, she resolved to "countenance a tobacconist of Glasgow, who was her sixteenth cousin."—Colman: The Poor Gentleman (1808).

MacTavish Mhor or Hamish M'Tavish, a Highland outlaw.

Elspat M'Tavish, or "The Woman of the Tree," widow of M'Tavish Mhor; "the Highland widow."

Hamish Bean M'Tavish, son of Elspat M'Tavish. He joins a Highland regiment, and goes to visit his mother, who gives him a sleeping draught to detain him. As he does not join his regiment in time, he is arrested for desertion, tried, and shot at Dunbarton Castle; and Elspat goes mad.—Sir W. Scott: The Highland Widow (time, George II.).

MacTurk (Captain Mungo or Hector), "the man of peace," in the managing committee of the Spa hotel.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

MacVittie (Ephraim), a Glasgow merchant, one of Osbaldistone's creditors. —Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

MacWheeble (Duncan), bailie at Tully Veolan to the baron of Bradwardine.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Mad. The Bedlam of Belgium is Gheel, where madmen reside in the houses of the inhabitants, generally one in each family.

Dymphna, a woman of rank, was murdered by her father for resisting his incestuous passion, and became the tutelar saint of those stricken in spirit. A shrine in time rose in her honour, which for ten centuries has been consecrated to the relief of mental diseases. This was the origin of the insane colony of Gheel.

Mad Cavalier (The), prince Rupert of Bavaria, nephew of Charles I. Noted for his rash courage and impetuosity (1619–1682).

Mad Lover (The), a drama by Beaumont and Fletcher (before 1618). The name of the "mad lover" is Memnon, who is general of Astorax king of Paphos.

Mad Poet (The), Nathaniel Lee (1657–1690).

Madasi'ma (Queen), an important character in the old romance called Amadis de Gaul; her constant attendant was Elis'abat, a famous surgeon, with whom she roamed in solitary retreats.

Madeline, the heroine of lord Lytton's Eugene Aram, a novel (1832).

Mad'elon, cousin of Cathos, and daughter of Gor'gibus a plain citizen of the middle rank of life. (See CATHOS, p. 188.)—Molière: Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659).

Mademoiselle. What is understood by this word when it stands alone is Mlle. de Montpensier, daughter of Gaston duc d'Orléans, and cousin of Louis XIV.

Anne Marie Louise d'Orléans, duchesse de Montpensier, connue sous le nom de Mademoiselle, née à Paris, 1627; m. 1693; était fille de Gaston d'Orléans frère de Louis XIII.—Bouillet.

Mademoiselle, the French lady's-maid waiting on lady Fanciful; full of the grossest flattery, and advising her ladyship to the most unwarrantable intrigues. Lady Fanciful says, "The French are certainly the prettiest and most obliging people. They say the most acceptable, well-mannered things, and never flatter." When induced to do what her conscience and education revolted at, she would playfully rebuke Mlle. with, "Ah! la méchante Françoise!" to which Mlle. would respond, "Ah! la belle Anglaise!"—Vanbrugh: The Provoked Wife (1697).

Madge Wildfire, the insane daughter of old Meg Murdochson the gipsy thief. Madge was a beautiful but giddy girl, whose brain was crazed by seduction and the murder of her infant.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Madman (Macedonia's), Alexander the Great (B.C. 356, 336–323).

Heroes are much the same, the point's agreed,
From Macedonia's Madman to the Swede [Charles XII.].
Pope: Essay on Man, iv. 219 (1733).

How vain, how worse than vain, at length appear
The madman's wish, the Macedonian tear!
He wept for worlds to conquer; half the earth
Knows not his name, or but his death and birth.
Byron: Age of Bronze (1823).

The Brilliant Madman, Charles XII. of Sweden (1682, 1697–1718).

The Madman of the North, Charles XII. of Sweden (1682, 1697–1718).

The Worst of Madmen.

For Virtue's self may too much zeal be had;
The worst of madmen is a saint run mad.
Pope: Imitations of Horace, vi. (1730).

Ma'doc, youngest son of Owain Gwynedd king of North Wales (who died 1169). He is called "The Perfect Prince," "The Lord of Ocean," and is the very beau-ideal of a hero. Invincible, courageous, strong, and daring, but amiable, merciful, and tender-hearted; most pious, but without bigotry; most wise, but without dogmatism; most provident and far-seeing. He left his native country in 1170, and ventured on the ocean to discover a new world; his vessels reached America, and he founded a settlement near the Missouri. Having made an alliance with the Az'tecas, he returned to Wales for a fresh supply of colonists, and conducted six ships in safety to the new settlement, called Caer-Madoc. War soon broke out between the natives and the strangers; but the white men proving the conquerors, the Az'tecas migrated to Mexico. On one occasion, being set upon from ambush, Madoc was chained by one foot to "the stone of sacrifice," and consigned to fight with six volunteers. His first opponent was Ocell'opan, whom he slew; his next was Tlalăla "the tiger," but during this contest Cadwallon came to the rescue.—Southey: Madoc (1805).

. . . Madoc
Put forth his well-rigged fleet to seek him foreign ground,
And sailèd west so long until that world he found . . .
Long ere Columbus lived.
Drayton: Polyolbion, ix. (1612).

Mador (Sir), a Scotch knight, who accused queen Guinever of having poisoned his brother. Sir Launcelot du Lac challenged him to single combat, and overthrew him; for which service king Arthur gave the queen's champion La Joyeuse Garde as a residence.

Mæce'nas (Caius Cilnius), a wealthy Roman nobleman, friend of Augustus, and liberal patron of Virgil, Horace, Propertius, and other men of genius. His name has become proverbial for a "munificent friend of literature" (died B.C. 8).

Are you not called a theatrical quidnunc and a mock Mæcênas to second-hand authors?—Sheridan: The Critic, i. 1 (1779).

Mæ'nad, a Bacchant, plu. Mænads or Mæ'nades (3 syl.). So called from the Greek, mainomai ("to be furious"), because they acted like mad women in their "religious" festivals.

Among the boughs did swelling Bacchus ride,
Whom wild-grown Mænads bore.
P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, vii. (1633).

Mæon'ides (4 syl.). Homer is so called, either because he was son of Mæon, or because he was a native of Mæon'ia (Lydia). He is also called Mæonius Senex, and his poems Mæonian Lays.

When great Mæonides, in rapid song,
The thundering tide of battle rolls along,
Each ravished bosom feels the high alarms,
And all the burning pulses beat to arms.
Falconer: The Shipwreck, iii. 3 (1756).

Mævius, a satire by Gifford, on the Della Cruscan school of poetry (published 1796). The word is from Virgil's Bucolics.

Qui Bavium non odit, amet tua carmina, Mævi,
Atque idem jungat vulpes, et mulgeat hircos.
Virgil: Bucolics, iii. 90, 91.

Who hates not Bavius, or on Mævius dotes,
Should plough with foxes, or should milk he-goats.

Mævius, any vile poet. (See BAVIUS, p. 97.)

But if fond Bavius vent his clouted song,
Or Mævius chant his thoughts in brothel charm,
The witless vulgar, in a numerous throng,
Like summer flies about the dunghill swarm . . .
Who hates not one may he the other love.
P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, i. (1633).

Magalo'na (The Fair), daughter of the king of Naples. She is the heroine of an old romance of chivalry, originally written in French, but translated into Spanish in the fifteenth century. Cervantes alludes to this romance in Don Quixote. The main incident of the story turns on a flying horse made by Merlin, which came into the possession of Peter of Provence.—The History of the Fair Magalona and Peter Son of the Count of Provence.

 Tieck has reproduced the history of Magalona in German (1773–1853).

Mage Negro King, Gaspar king of Tarshish, a black Ethiop, and tallest of the three Magi. His offering was myrrh, indicative of death.

As the Mage negro king to Christ the babe.
R. Browning: Luria, i.

Maggots of the Brain. Swift says it was the opinion of certain virtuosi that the brain is filled with little maggots, and that thought is produced by their biting the nerves.

To tickle the maggot born in an empty head.
Tennyson: Maud, II. v. 3.

Maggy, the half-witted granddaughter of Little Dorrit's nurse. She had had a fever at the age of ten, from ill-treatment, and her mind and intellect never went beyond that period. Thus, if asked her age, she always replied, "Ten;" and she always repeated the last two or three words of what was said to her. She called Amy Dorrit "Little Mother."

She was about eight and twenty, with large bones, large features, large feet and hands, large eyes, and no hair. Her large eyes were limpid and almost colourless; they seemed to be very little affected by light, and to stand unnaturally still. There was also that attentive listening expression in her face, which is seen in the faces of the blind; but she was not blind, having one tolerably serviceable eye. Her face was not exceedingly ugly, being redeemed by a smile. . . . A great white cap, with a quantity of opaque frilling . . . apologised for Maggy's baldness, and made it so difficult for her old black bonnet to retain its place upon see head, that it held on round her neck like a gipsy's baby. . . . The rest of her dress resembled sea-weed, with here and there a gigantic tea-leaf. Her shawl looked like a huge tea-leaf after long infusion.— Dickens: Little Dorrit, lx. (1857).

Magi or Three kings of Cologne, the "wise men from the East," who followed the guiding star to the manger in Bethlehem with offerings. Melchior king of Nubia, the shortest of the three. He offered gold, indicative of royalty; Balthazar king of Chaldea offered frankincense, indicative of divinity; and Gaspar king of Tarshish, a black Ethiop, the tallest of the three, offered myrrh, symbolic of death.

(Melchior means "king of light;" Balthazar, "lord of treasures;" and Gaspar or Caspar, "the white one.")

N.B.—Klopstock, in his Messiah, makes the Magi six in number, and gives the names as Hadad, Selima, Zimri, Mirja, Beled, and Sunith.—Bk. v. (1771).

Magic Garters. No horse can keep up with a man furnished with these garters. They are made thus: Strips of the skin of a young hare are cut two inches wide, and some motherwort, gathered in the first degree of the sign Capricorn and partially dried, is sewn into these strips, which are then folded in two. The garters are to be worn as other garters.—Les Secrets Merveilleux de Petit Albert, 128.

> Were it not for my magic garters, . . .
> I should not continue the business long.
> Longfellow: The Golden Legend (1851).

Magic Rings, like that of Gygês king of Lydia. Plato in his Republic, and Cicero in his Offices, say the ring was found in the flanks of a horse of brass. Those who wore it became invisible. By means of this ring, Gygês entered the chamber of Candaulês, and murdered him.

Magic Staff (The). This staff would guarantee the bearer from all the perils and mishaps incidental to travellers. No robber nor wild beast, no mad dog, venomous animal, nor accident, could hurt its possessor. The staff consisted of a willow branch, gathered on the eve of All Saints' Day; the pith being removed, two eyes of a young wolf, the tongue and heart of a dog, three green lizards, the hearts of three swallows, seven leaves of vervain gathered on the eve of John the Baptist's Day, and a stone taken from a lapwing's nest, were inserted in the place of the pith. The toe of the staff was furnished with an iron ferrule; and the handle was of box, or any other material, according to fancy.—Les Secrets Merveilleux de Petit Albert, 130.

> Were it not for my magic . . . staff,
> I should not continue the business long.
> Longfellow: The Golden Legend (1851).

Magic Wands. The hermit gave Charles the Dane and Ubaldo a wand, which, being shaken, infused terror into all who saw it.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

¶ The palmer who accompanied sir Guyon had a wand of like virtue. It was made of the same wood as Mercury's caduceus.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. (1590).

Magician of the North (The), sir Walter Scott (1771–1832).

> How beautifully has the magician of the North described "The Field of Waterloo"!—Lord Lennox: Celebrities, etc., i. 16.

¶ Johann Georg Hamann of Prussia called himself "The Magician of the North" (1730–1788).

Magliabechi, the greatest bookworm that ever lived. He devoured books, and never forgot anything he had read. He had also so exact a memory, that he could tell the precise place and shelf of a book, as well as the volume and page of any passage required. He was the librarian of the great-duke Cosmo III. His usual dinner was three hard-boiled eggs and a draught of water (1633–1714).

Magnu, the coquette of Astracan.

> Though naturally handsome, she used every art to set off her beauty. Not a word proceeded from her mouth that was not studied. To counterfeit a violent passion, to sigh à propos, to make an attractive gesture, to trifle agreeably, and collect the various graces of dumb eloquence into a smile, were the arts in which she excelled. She spent hours before her glass in deciding how a curl might be made to hang loose upon her neck to the greatest advantage; how to open and shut her lips so as best to show her teeth without affectation—to turn her face full or otherwise, as occasion might require. She looked on herself with ceaseless admiration, and always admired most the works of her own hand in improving on the beauty which nature had bestowed on her.—Gueulette: Chinese Tales ("Magnu," 1723).

Magnanimous (The), Alfonso V. of Aragon (1385, 1416–1458).

Khosrû or Chosroës, the twenty-first of the Sassanidês, was surnamed Noushirwan ("Magnanimous") (*, 513–579).

Magnano, one of the leaders of the rabble that attacked Hudibras at a bear-baiting. The character is designed for Simeon Wait, a tinker, as famous an independent preacher as Burroughs. He used to style Cromwell "the archangel who did battle with the devil."—S. Butler: Hudibras, i. 2 (1663).

Magnetic Mountain (The). This mountain drew out all the nails and iron bolts of any ship which approached it, thus causing it to fall to pieces.

This mountain is very steep, and on the summit is a large dome made of fine bronze, which is supported upon columns of the same metal. On the top of the dome there is a bronze horse with the figure of a man upon it. . . . There is a tradition that this statue is the principal cause of the loss of so many vessels and men, and that it will never cease from being destructive . . . till it be overthrown.—Arabian Nights ("The Third Calender").

Magnificent (The), Khosrû or Chosroës I. of Persia (*, 531–579).

Lorenzo de Medici (1448–1492).

Robert duc de Normandie; called Le Diable also (*, 1028–1035).

Soliman I., greatest of the Turkish sultans (1493, 1520–1566).

Magnus (Mr. Peter), the hero of an episode in the Pickwick Papers by Dickens (1836).

Magog, according to Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix., was a country of people over whom Gog was prince. Some say the Goths are meant, others the Persians, others the Scythians or the northern nations of Europe generally.

N.B.—Sale says that Magog is the tribe called by Ptolemy "Gilân," and by Strabo "Geli" or "Gelæ."—Al Korân, xxviii. note. (See GOG, p. 433.)

Ma'gog, one of the princes of Satan, whose ambition is to destroy hell.

Magounce (a syl.), Arundel Castle.

She drew southward unto the sea-side, till, by fortune, she came to a castle called Magounce, and now is called Arundell, in Southsex.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 118 (1470).

Magricio, the champion of Isabella of Portugal, who refused to pay truage to France. He vanquished the French champion, and thus liberated his country from tribute.

Magwitch (Abel), a convict for life, the unknown father of Estella who was adopted from infancy by Miss Havisham the daughter of a rich banker. The convict, having made his escape to Australia, became a successful sheep-farmer, and sent money secretly to Mr. Jaggers, a London lawyer, to educate Pip as a gentleman. When Pip was 23 years old, Magwitch returned to England, under the assumed name of Provis, and made himself known to Pip. He was tracked by Orlick and Compeyson, arrested, condemned to death, and died in jail. All his money was confiscated.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

Mahmut, the "Turkish Spy," who remained undiscovered in Paris for forty-five years, revealing to his Government all the intrigues of the Christian courts (1637–1682).

Mahomet or Mohammed, the titular name taken by Halabi, founder of Islam (570–632).

ADOPTED SON: Usma, son of Zaid his freedman (See below, "Zainab.")

ANGEL who revealed the Korân to Mahomet: Gabriel.

BANNER: Sanjak-sherif, kept in the Hyab mosque at Constantinople.

BIRTHPLACE: Mecca, A.D. 570.

BOW: Al Catûm ("the strong"), confiscated from the Jews. In his first battle he drew it with such force that it snapped in two.

BURIED at Medî'na, on the very spot where he died.

CAMEL: Al Adha ("the slit-eared"), the swiftest of his camels. One of the ten dumb animals admitted into paradise.

CAVE (The) in which Gabriel appeared to him was Hoîd.

CONCUBINES: Mariyeh, mother of Ibrahim his son, was his favourite; but he had fourteen others.

COUSINS: Alî, his best friend; Abû Sofiân sbn al Hareth.

CUIRASS: Al Fadha. It was of silver, and was confiscated from the Jews.

DAUGHTERS BY KADIJAH: Zainab, Rukaîjah, Umm Kulthûm, and Fâtima his favourite (called one of the "three perfect women").

DEFEAT: at Ohud, where it was reported that he was slain (A.D. 623).

DIED at Medîna, on the lap of Ayishah, his favourite wife, 11 Hedjrah (June 8, 632).

FATHER: Abdallah, of the family of Hâshim and tribe of Koreish. Abdallah was a small merchant, who died when his son was five years old. At the death of his father, his grandfather took charge of him; but he also died within two years. He then lived with his uncle Abû Taleb (from the age of seven to 14). (See ZESBET.)

FATHER-IN-LAW: Abû Bekr, father of his favourite wife Ayishah.

FLIGHT: Hedjrah or Heg'îra, July 16, 622.

FOLLOWERS: called Moslem or Mussulmans.

GRANDSON: Abd-el-Motalleb.

HORSE: Al Borak ("the lightning"), brought to him by Gabriel to carry him to the seventh heaven. It had the wings of an eagle, the face of a man, with the cheeks of a horse, and spoke Arabic.

JOURNEY TO HEAVEN (The), on Al Borak, is called Isra.

MOTHER: Amina or Aminta, of the family of Zuhra and tribe of Koreish. (See ZESBET.)

NICKNAME IN BOYHOOD: El Amin ("the safe man").

PERSONAL APPEARANCE: Middle height, rather lean, broad shoulders, strongly built, abundance of black curly hair, coal-black eyes with thick lashes, nose large and slightly bent, beard long. He had between his shoulders a black mole, "the seal of prophecy."

POISONED by Zainab, a Jewess, who placed before him poisoned meat, in 624. He tasted it, and ever after suffered from its effects, but survived eight years.

SCRIPTURE: Al Korân ("the reading"). It is divided into 114 chapters.

SONS BY KADIJAH: Al Kâsim and Abd Manâf; both died in childhood. By Mariyeh (Mary) his concubine: Ibrahim, who died when 15 months old. Adopted son: Usma, the child of his freedman Zaid. (See "Zainab.")

STANDARD: Bajura.

SUCCESSOR: Abû Bekr, his father-in-law (father of Ayishah).

SWORDS: Dhu'l Fakâr ("the trenchant"); Al Batta ("the striker"); Hatel ("the deadly"); Medham ("the keen").

TRIBE: that of the Koraichites or Koraich or Koreish, on both sides.

UNCLES: Abû Talab, a prince of Mecca, but poor;

he took charge of the boy between the ages of seven and 14, and was always his friend. Abû Laheb, who called him "a fool," and was always his bitter enemy; in the Korân, cxi. "the prophet" denounces him. Hamza, a third head of Islam.

VICTORIES: Bedr (624); Muta (629); Taïf (630); Honein (630 or 8 Hedjrah).

WHITE MULE: Fadda.

WIVES: Ten, and fifteen concubines.

(1) Kadîjah, a rich widow of his own tribe. She had been twice married, and was 40 years of age (Mahomet being 25). Kadîjah was his sole wife for twenty-five years, and brought him two sons and four daughters. (Fâtima was her youngest child.)

(2) Souda, widow of Sokran, nurse of his daughter Fâtima. He married her in 621, soon after the death of his first wife. The following were simultaneous with Souda.

(3) Ayishah, daughter of Abû Bekr. She was only nine years old on her wedding day. This was his favourite wife, on whose lap he died. He called her one of the "three perfect women."

(4) Hend, a widow, 28 years old. She had a son when she married. Her father was Omeya.

(5) Zainab, divorced wife of Zaïd his freed slave. Married 627 (5 Hedjrah).

(6) Barra, a captive, widow of a young Arab chief slain in battle.

(7) Rehana, a Jewish captive. Her father was Simeon.

(8) Safiya, the espoused wife of Kenâna. This wife outlived the prophet for forty years. Mahomet put Kenana to death in order to marry her.

(9) Umm Habîba (mother of Habîba), widow of Abû Sofian.

(10) Maimuna, who was 51 when he married her, and a widow. She survived all his ten wives.

 It will be observed that most of Mahomet's wives were widows.

Mahomet. Voltaire wrote a drama so entitled in 1738; and James Miller, in 1740, produced an English version of the same, called Mahomet the Impostor. The scheme of the play is this: Mahomet is laying siege to Mecca, and has in his camp Zaphna and Palmira, taken captives in childhood and brought up by him. They are really the children of Alcanor the chief of Mecca, but know it not, and love each other. Mahomet is in love with Palmira, and sets Zaphna to murder Alcanor, pretending that it is God's will. Zaphna obeys the behest, is told that Alcanor is his father, and is poisoned. Mahomet asks Palmira in marriage, and she stabs herself.

J. Bannister (1760–1836) began his stage career in tragedy, and played "Mahomet." Garrick . . . asked him what character he wished to play next. "Why," said Bannister, "'Oroonoko.'" "Eh, eh!" said David, staring at Bannister, who was very thin; "Eh, eh! you will look as much like 'Oroonoko' as a chimney-sweeper in consumption."—T. Campbell.

Mahomet's Coffin is said to be suspended in mid-air. The wise ones affirm that the coffin is of iron, and is suspended by means of loadstones. The faithful assert it is held up by four angels. Burckhardt says it is not suspended at all. A marabout old Labat—

Que le tombeau de Mahomet étoit porté en l'air par le moyen de certains Anges qui se relayent d'heure en heure pour soutenir ce fardeau.—Labat: Afrique Occidentale, ii. 243 (1728).

The balance always would hang even,
Like Mah'met's tomb 'twixt earth and heaven.
Prior: Alma, ii. 199 (1727).

 According to Indian tradition, Benares is built on the ancient Casi, which was at one time suspended in mid-air.

Mahomet's Dove, a dove which Mahomet taught to pick seed placed in his ear. The bird would perch on the prophet's shoulder and thrust its bill into his ear to find its food; but Mahomet gave out that it was the Holy Ghost, in the form of a dove, sent to impart to him the counsels of God.—Dr. Prideaux: Life of Mahomet (1697); sir W. Raleigh: History of the World, I. i. 6 (1614).

Instance proud Mahomet . . .
The sacred dove whispering into his ear,
That what his will imposed, the world must fear.
Brooke: Declination of Monarchie, etc. (1554–1628).

Was Mahomet inspirèd with a dove?
Thou with an eagle art inspirèd [Joan of Arc].
Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. act i. sc. 2 (1598).

Mahomet's Knowledge of Events. Mahomet in his coffin is informed by an angel of every event which occurs respecting the faithful.

Il est vivant dans son tombeau. Il fait la prière dans ce tombeau à chaque fois que le crieur en fait la proclamation, et au même tems qu'on la recite. Il y a un ange posté sur son tombeau qui a le soin de lui donner avis des prières que les fidèles font pour lui.—Gagnier: Vie de Mahomet, vii. 18 (1723).

Mahomet of the North, Odin, both legislator and supreme deity.

Mahoud, son of a rich jeweller of Delhi, who ran through a large fortune in riotous living, and then bound himself in service to Bennaskar, who proved to be a magician. Mahoud impeached Bennaskar to the cadi, who sent officers to seize him; but, lo! Mahoud had been metamorphosed into the likeness of Bennaskar, and was condemned to be burnt alive. When the pile was set on fire, Mahoud became a toad, and in this form met the sultan Misnar, his vizier Horam, and the princess Hemju'nah of Cassimir, who had been changed into toads also.—Sir C. Morell [J. Ridley]: Tales of the Genii ("The Enchanter's Tale," vi., 1751).

Mahound or Mahoun, a name of contempt for Mahomet or any pagan god. Hence Ariosto makes Ferrau "blaspheme his Mahoun and Termagant" (Orlando Furioso, xii. 59).

Fittar for a turban for Mahound or Termagant, than a head-gear of a reasonable creature.—Sir W. Scott.

Mahu, the fiend-prince that urges to theft.

Five fiends have been in poor Tom at once: of lust, as Obidicut; Hobididance, prince of dumbness; Mahu, of stealing; Modo, of murder; and Flibbertigibbet, of mopping and mowing.—Shakespeare: King Lear, act iv. sc. 1 (1605).

Maid Ma'rian, a name assumed by Matilda, daughter of Robert lord Fitzwalter, while Robin Hood remained in a state of outlawry. She was poisoned with a poached egg at Dunmow Priory, by a messenger of king John sent for the purpose. This was because Marian was loved by the king, but rejected him. Drayton has written her legend.

He to his mistress dear, his lovëd Marian,
Was ever constant known; which wheresoe'er she came,
Was sovereign of the woods, chief lady of the game.
Her clothes tucked to the knee, and dainty braided hair,
With bow and quiver armed, she wandered here and there
Amongst the forest wild. Diana never knew
Such pleasures, nor such harts as Mariana slew.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxvi. (1622).

Maid Marian, introduced into the May-day morris-dance, was a boy dressed in girl's clothes. She was queen of the May, and used to wear a tinsel crown, and carry in her left hand a flower. Her coif was purple, her surcoat blue, her cuffs white, the skirts of her robe yellow, the sleeves carnation, and the stomacher red with yellow cross bars. (See MORRIS-DANCE.)

(Thomas Love, in 1822, published a novel called Maid Marian.)

Maid of Athens, There'sa Macri, rendered famous by Byron's song—

Maid of Athens, ere we part,
Give, oh give me back my heart!

Twenty-four years after this song was written, an Englishman sought out "the Athenian maid," and found a beggar without a single vestige of beauty. She was married and had a large family; but the struggle of her life was to find bread to keep herself and family from positive starvation.

Maid of Bath (The), Miss Linley, who married R. B. Sheridan. Samuel Foote wrote a farce entitled The Maid of Bath, in which he gibbets Mr. Walter Long under the name of "Flint."

Maid of Honour (The), by P. Massinger (1637). Camiola, a very wealthy, high-minded lady, was in love with prince Bertoldo, brother of Roberto king of the Two Sicilies; but Bertoldo, being a Knight of Malta, could not marry without a dispensation from the pope. While matters were in this state, Bertoldo led an army against Aurelia duchess of Sienna, and was taken prisoner. Camiola paid his ransom, and Aurelia commanded the prisoner to be brought before her. Bertoldo came; the duchess fell in love with him and offered marriage; and Bertoldo, forgetful of Camiola, accepted the offer. The betrothed then presented themselves to the king, when Camiola exposed the conduct of Bertoldo. The king was indignant at the baseness, Aurelia rejected Bertoldo with scorn, and Camiola took the veil.

Maid of Mariendorpt (The), a drama by S. Knowles, based on Miss Porter's novel of The Village of Mariendorpt (1838). The "maid" is Meeta, daughter of Mahldenau minister of Mariendorpt, and betrothed to major Rupert Roselheim. The plot is this: Mahldenau starts for Prague in search of Meeta's sister, who fell into some soldiers' hands in infancy during the siege of Magdeburg. On entering Prague, he is seized as a spy, and condemned to death. Meeta, hearing of his capture, walks to Prague to plead for his life, and finds that the governor's "daughter" is her lost sister. Rupert storms the prison and releases Mahldenau.

Maid of Norway, Margaret, daughter of Eric II. and Margaret of Norway. She was betrothed to Edward, son of Edward I. of England, but died on her passage (1290).

Maid of Orleans, Jeanne d'Arc, famous for having raised the siege of Orleans, held by the English. The general tradition is that she was burnt alive as a witch, but this is doubted (1412–1431).

Maid of Perth (Fair), Catharine Glover, daughter of Simon Glover, the old glover of Perth. She kisses Henry Smith while asleep on St. Valentine's morning, and ultimately marries him.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Maid of Saragoza, Augustina, noted for her heroism at the siege of Saragoza, 1808–9. (See Southey's History of the Peninsular War.)

Her lover sinks—she sheds no ill-timed tear;
Her chief is slain—she fills his fatal post;
Her fellows flee—she checks their base career;
The foe retires—she heads the sallying host.
. . . the flying Gaul,
Foiled by a woman's hand before a battered wall.
Byron: Childe Harold, i. 56 (1809).

Maid of the Mill (The), an opera by Isaac Bickerstaff. Patty, the daughter of Fairfield the miller, was brought up by lord Aimworth's mother. At the death of lady Aimworth, Patty returned to the mill, and her father promised her in marriage to Farmer Giles; but Patty refused to marry him. Lord Aimworth about the same time betrothed himself to Theodosia, the daughter of sir Harry Sycamore; but the young lady loved Mr. Mervin. When lord Aimworth knew of this attachment, he readily yielded up his betrothed to the man of her choice, and selected for his bride Patty "the maid of the mill" (1765).

Maid of the Oaks (The), a two-act drama by J. Burgoyne. Maria "the maid of the Oaks" is brought up by Oldworth of Oldworth Oaks as his ward, but is informed on the eve of her marriage with sir Harry Groveby that she is Oldworth's daughter. The under-plot is between sir Charles Dupely and lady Bab Lardoon. Dupely professed to despise all women, and lady Lardoon was "the princess of dissipation;" but after they fell in with each other, Dupely promised to abjure his creed, and lady Lardoon that she would henceforth renounce the world of fashion and its follies (1779).

Maid's Tragedy (The). The "maid" is Aspa'tia the troth-plight wife of Amintor, who, at the king's command, is made to marry Evad'ne (3 syl.). Her death forms the tragical event which gives name to the drama.—Beaumont and Fletcher (1610).

(The scene between Antony and Ventidius, in Dryden's tragedy of All for Love, is copied from The Maid's Tragedy, where "Melantius" answers to Ventidius.)

Maiden (The), a kind of guillotine, introduced into Scotland by the regent Morton, who was afterwards beheaded by it. The "maiden" resembled in form a painter's easel about ten feet high. The victim placed his head on a cross-bar some four feet from the bottom, kept in its place by another bar. In the inner edges of the frame were grooves, in which slid a sharp axe weighted with lead and supported by a long cord. When all was ready, the cord was cut and down fell the axe with a thud.—Pennant: Tour in Scotland, iii. 365 (1771).

The unfortunate earl [Argyll] was appointed to be beheaded by the "maiden."—Sir W. Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, ii. 83.

The Italian instrument of execution was called the mannaia. The apparatus was erected on a scaffold; the axe was placed between two perpendiculars . . . In Scotland the instrument of execution was an inferior variety of the mannaia.—Memoirs of the Sansons, i 83.

It seems pretty clear that the "maiden" . . . is merely a corruption of the Italian mannaia.—A. G. Reid.

Maiden King (The), Malcolm IV. of Scotland (1141, 1153–1165).

Malcolm, . . . son of the brave and generous prince Henry, . . . was so kind and gentle in his disposition, that he was usually called Malcolm "the maiden."—Sir W. Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, iv.

Maiden Queen (The), Elizabeth of England (1533, 1558–1603).

Maiden of the Mist (The), Anne of Geierstein, daughter of count Albert of Geierstein. She is the baroness of Arnheim.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Maidens' Castle (The), on the Severn. It was taken from a duke by seven knights, and held by them till sir Galahad expelled them. It was called "The Maidens' Castle" because these knights made a vow that every maiden who passed it should be made a captive. This is an allegory.

The Castle of Maidens betokens the good souls that were in prison afore the incarnation of Christ. And the seven knights betoken the seven deadly sins which reigned in the world . . . And the good knight sir Galahad may be likened to the Son of the High Father, that Light within a maiden which brought all souls out of thraldom.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 44 (1470).

Mailsetter (Mrs.), keeper of the Fairport post-office.

Davie Mailsetter, her son.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Maimou'ne (3 syl.), a fairy, daughter of Damriat "king of a legion of genii." When the princess Badoura, in her sleep, was carried to the bed of prince Camaral'zaman to be shown to him, Maimounè changed herself into a flea, and bit the prince's neck to wake him. Whereupon he sees the sleeping princess by his side, falls in love with her, and afterwards marries her.—Arabian Nights ("Camaralzaman and Badoura").

Mai'muna or Maimu'na, one of the sorceresses of Dom-Daniel, who repents and turns to Allah. Thal'aba first encounters her, disguised as an old woman spinning the finest thread. He greatly marvels at its extreme fineness, but she tells him he cannot snap it; whereupon he winds it round his two wrists, and becomes powerless. Maimuna and her sister-sorceress Khwala, then carry him to the island of Moha'reb, where he is held in durance; but Maimuna releases him, repents, and dies.—Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, ix. (1797).

Mainote (2 syl.), a pirate who infests the coast of Attica.

> . . . boat
> Of island-pirate or Mainote.
> Byron: The Giaour (1813).

Mainy (Richard), out of whom the Jesuits cast the seven deadly sins, each in the form of some representative animal. As each devil came forth, Mainy indicated the special sin by some trick or gesture. Thus, for pride he pretended to curl his hair, for gluttony to vomit, for sloth to gape, and so on.—Harsnett: Declaration of Popish Impostures, 279, 280.

Maitland (Thomas), the pseudonym of Robert Buchanan in the Contemporary Review, October, 1871, when, in an article called "The Fleshly School," he attacked Rossetti and his followers.

Malachi, the canting, preaching assistant of Thomas Turnbull a smuggler and schoolmaster.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Malacoda, the fiend sent as an envoy to Virgil, when he conducted Dantê through hell.—Dante: Hell, xxi. (1300).

Malade Imaginaire (Le), Mons. Argan, who took seven mixtures and twelve lavements in one month instead of twelve mixtures and twenty lavements, as hitherto. (See ARGAN, p. 57.)—Molière: Le Malade Imaginaire (1673).

Malagi'gi, son of Buovo, brother of Aldïger and Vivian (of Clarmont's race), one of Charlemagne's paladins, and cousin of Rinaldo. Being brought up by the fairy Orianda, he became a great enchanter.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Malagri'da (Gabriel), an Italian Jesuit and missionary to Brazil, who was accused of conspiring against the king of Portugal (1689–1761).

Lord Shelburne was nicknamed "Malagrida." He was a zealous oppositionist during lord North's administration (1737–1805).

> "Do you know," said Goldsmith to his lordship, "that I never could conceive why they call you 'Malagrida,' for Malagrida was a very good sort of a man." . . . He meant to say, as Malagrida was a "good sort of a man," he could not conceive how it became a word of reproach.—W. Irving.

Malagrowther (Sir Mungo), a crabbed old courtier, soured by misfortune, and peevish from infirmities. He tries to make every one as sour and discontented as himself.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Malagrowther (Malachi), the pseudonym of sir Walter Scott, in his remonstrances with the British Government, which stopped the circulation of banknotes under £5 in value (1826).

Lockhart says that these "diatribes produced in Scotland a sensation not inferior to that of the Drapier's letters in Ireland." They came out in the Edinburgh Weekly Journal.

Malambru'no, a giant, first cousin to queen Maguncia of Candaya. "Exclusive of his natural barbarity, Malambruno was also a wizard," who enchanted don Clavijo and the princess Antonomasia—the former into a crocodile of some unknown metal, and the latter into a monkey of brass. The giant sent don Quixote the wooden horse, and was appeased "by the simple attempt of the knight to disenchant the victims of his displeasure."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iii. 4, 5 (1615).

Malaprop (Mrs.), aunt and guardian to Lydia Languish the heiress. Mrs. Malaprop sets her cap at sir Lucius O'Trigger, "a tall Irish baronet," and corresponds with him under the name of Delia. Sir Lucius fancies it is the nlece, and, when he discovers his mistake, declines the honour of marriage with the aunt. Mrs. Malaprop is a synonym for those who misapply words without mispronouncing them. Thus Mrs. Malaprop talks of a Derbyshire putrefaction, an allegory of the Nile, a barbarous Vandyke, she requests that no delusions to the past be made, talks of flying with the utmost felicity, and would say precipitate one down the prejudice instead of "precipice."—Sheridan: The Rivals (1775).

> Mrs. Malaprop's mistakes in what she calls "orthodoxy," have often been objected to as improbable from a woman of her rank of life, but . . . the luckiness of her simile, "as headstrong as an allegory on the banks of the Nile," will be acknowledged as inimitable.—Moore. (See JENKINS, Mrs., p. 543.)

Malbecco, "a cankered, crabbed carl," very wealthy and very miserly, husband of a young wife named Hel'inore (3 syl.), of whom he is very jealous, and not without cause. Helinore, falling in love with sir Paridel her guest, sets fire to the closet where her husband keeps his treasures, and elopes with Paridel, while Malbecco stops to put out the flames. This done, Malbecco starts in pursuit, and finds that Paridel has tired of the dame, who has become the satyrs' dairy-maid. He soon finds her out, but she declines to return with him; and he, in desperation, throws himself from a rock, but receives no injury. Malbecco then creeps into a cave, feeds on toads and frogs, and lives in terror lest the rock should crush him or the sea overwhelm him. "Dying, he lives on, and can never die," for he is no longer Malbecco, "but JEALOUSY is hight."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 9, 10 (1590).

Malbrough', corrupted in English into Marlbrook, the hero of a popular French song. Generally thought to refer to John Churchill duke of Marlborough, so famous for his victories over the French in the reign of Louis XIV.; but no incident of the one corresponds with the life of the other. The Malbrough of the song was evidently a crusader or ancient baron, who died in battle. His lady, climbing the castle tower and looking out for her lord, reminds one of the mother of Sisera, who "looked out at a window, and cried through the lattice, Why is his chariot so long in coming? Why tarry the wheels of his chariots? . . . Have they not sped? Have they not divided the spoil?" (Judg. v. 28-30). The following are the words of the song:—

"Malbrough is gone to the wars. Ah! when will he return?" "He will come back by Easter, lady, or at latest by Trinity." "No, no! Easter is past, and Trinity is past; but Malbrough has not returned." Then did she climb the castle tower, to look out for his coming. She saw his page, but he was clad in black. "My page, my bonnie page," cried the lady, "what tidings bring you—what tidings of my lord?" "The news I bring," said the page, "is very sad, and will make you weep. Lay aside your gay attire, lady, your ornaments of gold and silver, for my lord is dead. He is dead, lady, and laid in earth. I saw him borne to his last home by four officers: one carried his cuirass, one his shield, one his sword, and the fourth walked beside the bier but bore nothing. They laid him in earth. I saw his spirit rise through the laurels. They planted his grave with rosemary. The nightingale sang his dirge. The mourners fell to the earth; and when they rose up again, they chanted his victories. Then retired they all to rest."

This song used to be sung as a lullaby to the infant son of Louis XVI.; and Napoleon I. never mounted his charger for battle without humming the air of Malbrough s'en va-t-en guerre. Mon. de Las Casas says he heard him hum the same air a little before his death.

Malbrouk, of Basque legend, is a child brought up by his godfather of the same name. At the age of seven he is a tall, full-grown man, and, like Proteus, can assume any form by simply naming the form he wishes to assume. Thus, by saying "Jesus, ant," he becomes an ant; and "Jesus, pigeon," he becomes a pigeon. After performing most wonderful prodigies, and releasing the king's three daughters who had been stolen by his godfather, he marries the youngest of the princesses, and succeeds the king on his throne.

∴ The name Malbrouk occurs in the Chanson de Gestes, and in the Basque Pastorales. (See above, MALBROUGH.)

Malcolm, surnamed "Can More" ("great head"), eldest son of Duncan "the Meek" king of Scotland. He, with his father and younger brother, was a guest of Macbeth at Inverness Castle, when Duncan was murdered. The two young princes fled—Malcolm to the English court, and his brother Donalbain to Ireland. When Macduff slew Macbeth in the battle of Dunsinane, the son of Duncan was set on the throne of Scotland, under the name and title of Malcolm III.—Shakespeare: Macbeth (1606).

Malebolge (4 syl.), the eighth circle of Dante's inferno. It was divided into ten bolgi or pits.

> There is a place within the depths of hell,
> Called Malebolgé.
> Dante: Hell, xviii. (1300).

Mal'ecasta, the mistress of Castle Joyous, and the impersonation of lust. Britomart (the heroine of chastity) entered her bower, after overthrowing four of the six knights who guarded it; and Malecasta sought to win the stranger to wantonness, not knowing her sex. Of course, Britomart resisted all her wiles, and left the castle next morning.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 1 (1590).

Maledisaunt, a damsel who threw discredit on her knightly lover to prevent his encountering the danger of the battle-field. Sir Launcelot condoned her offence, and gave her the name of Biendensaunt.

¶ The Cape of Good Hope was called the "Cape of Storms" (Cabo Tormentoso) by Bartholomew Diaz, when discovered in 1493; but the king of Portugal (John II.) changed the name to "Good Hope."

¶ So the Euxine (that is, "the hospitable") Sea was originally called "The Axine" (or "the inhospitable") Sea.

¶ The Furies were called for luck sake Eumenides (4 syl.) or Sweet-minded.

Maleffort, seneschal of lady Bria'na; a man of "mickle might," slain by sir Calidore.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, vi. 1 (1596).

Male'ger (3 syl.), captain of the host which besieged Body Castle, of which Alma was queen. Prince Arthur found that his sword was powerless to wound him, so he took him up in his arms and tried to crush him, but without effect. At length the prince remembered that the earth was the earl's mother, and supplied him with new strength and vigour as often as he went to her for it; so he carried the body, and flung it into a lake. (See ANTÆOS, p. 47.)—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 11 (1590).

Malen'gin, Guile personified. When attacked by Talus, he changed himself into a fox, a bush, a bird, a hedgehog, and a snake; but Talus, with his iron flail, beat him to powder, and so "deceit did the deceiver fail." On his back Malengin carried a net "to catch fools" with.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 9 (1596).

Malepardus, the castle of Master Reynard the fox, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498).

Mal-Fet (The chevalier), the name assumed by sir Launcelot in Joyous Isle, during his fit of madness, which lasted two years.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. (1470).

Malfort (Mr.), a young man who has ruined himself by speculation.

Mrs. Malfort, the wife of the speculator, "houseless, friendless, defenceless, and forlorn." The wants of Malfort are temporarily relieved by the bounty of Frank Heartall and the kindness of Mrs. Cheerly "the soldier's daughter." The return of Malfort, senior, from India, restores his son to ease and affluence.—Cherry: The Soldier's Daughter (1804).

Malfy (Duchess of), twin-sister of Ferdinand duke of Calabria. She fell in love with Antonio, her steward, and gave thereby mortal offence to her twin-brother Ferdinand, and to her brother the cardinal, who employed Bosola to strangle her.—Webster: Duchess of Malfy (1618).

Malgo, a mythical king of Britain, noted for his beauty and his vices, his munificence and his strength. Malgo added Ireland, Iceland, Gothland, the Orkneys, Norway, and Dacia to his dominions.—Geoffrey: British History, xi. 7 (1142).

Next Malgo . . . first Orkney overran,
Proud Denmark then subdued, and spacious Norway wan,
Seized Iceland for his own, and Gothland to each shore.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xix. (1622).

Malherbe (a syl.). If any one asked Malherbe his opinion about any French words, he always sent him to the street-porters at the Port au Foin, saying that they were his "masters in language."—Racan: Vie de Malherbe (1630).

¶ It is said that Shakespeare read his plays to an oyster-woman when he wished to know if they would suit the popular taste.

Mal'inal, brother of Yuhid'thiton. When the Az'tecas declared war against Madoc and his colony, Malinal cast in his lot with the White strangers. He was a noble youth, who received two arrow-wounds in his leg while defending the white women; and, being unable to stand, fought in their defence on his knees. When Malinal was disabled, Amal'ahta caught up the princess, and ran off with her; but Mervyn the "young page" (in fact, a girl) struck him on the hamstrings with a bill-hook, and Malinal, crawling to the spot, thrust his sword in the villain's groin and killed him.—Southey: Madoc, ii. 16 (1805).

Mal'iom. Mahomet is so called in some of the old romances.

"Send five, send six against me! By Maliom! I swear I'll take them all."—Fierabras.

Malkin. The Maid Marian of the morris-dance is so called by Beaumont and Fletcher—

Put on the shape of order and humanity,
Or you must marry Malkin the May-Lady.
Monsieur Thomas (1615).

Mall Cutpurse, Mary Frith, a thief and receiver of stolen goods. John Day, in 1610, wrote "a booke called The Madde Prancks of Merry Mall of the Bankside, with her Walks in Man's Apparel, and to what Purpose." It is said that she was an androgyne (1584–1659).

Last Sunday, Mall Cutpurse, a notorious baggage, that used to go about in man's apparel, and challenged the field of diverse gallants, was brought to [St. Paul's Cross], where she wept bitterly, and seemed very penitent; but it is since doubted she was maudlin drunk, being discovered to have tippeled of three quarts of sack before she came to her penance.—J. Chamberlain (1611).

Mal-Orchol, king of Fuär'fed (an island of Scandinavia). Being asked by Ton-Thormod to give him his daughter in marriage, he refused, and the rejected suitor made war on him. Fingal sent his son Ossian to assist Mal-Orchol, and on the very day of his arrival he took Ton-Thormod prisoner. Mal-Orchol, in gratitude, now offered Ossian his daughter in marriage; but Ossian pleaded for Ton-Thormod, and the marriage of the lady with her original suitor was duly solemnized. (The daughter's name was Oina-Morul.)—Ossian: Oina-Morul.

Malt. Dr. Dodd, prebendary of Brecon, having made himself conspicuous by his declamations against the drinking habits of university students, was one day beset by some Cantabs a few miles from the city, who insisted on his preaching to them, from a hollow tree, on the word "Malt." His sermon was as follows:—

Beloved, I am a little man, come at a short notice, to preach a short sermon, on a short text, to a small congregation. My text is "Malt." I cannot divide it into words, there being but one, nor into syllables for the same reason; I must therefore of necessity divide it into letters, which are M-A-L-T.

"M," my beloved, is Moral; "A," Allegorical; "L," Literal; and "T," Theological.

The "Moral" is to teach you drunkards manners; therefore "M," masters; "A," all of you; "L," leave off; "T," tippling.

"Allegorical" is when one thing is spoken of, and another thing is meant. The thing spoken of in my text is "Malt," the thing meant is beer, which is brewed from malt, and which you, Cantabs, make "M," your master; "A," your ambition; "L," your lord; "T" your trust.

"Literal" is according to the letter of the text: "M," much; "A," ale; "L," little; "T," truth.

"Theological" is the reference of our text to the life that now is, and to that which is to come. In this life, drunkenness leads to "M," murder; "A," adultery; "L," licentiousness; "T," tremor, treason, theft. For the life to come it leads to "M," misery; "A," anguish; "L," lamentation; "T," torment.

So much for the text. Now for the improvement. A drunkard is the ruin of "M," modesty; "A," ability; "L," learning; "T," truthfulness. He is the curse of domestic life, the pest of society, the brewers' agent, the publicans' benefactor; his wife's sorrow, his children's trouble, his own shame, his neighbours' scorn; a walking swill-bowl, the picture of a beast, the monster of a man, the child of the devil. Therefore, I beseech you "M," my masters; "A," all of you; "L," leave off; "T," tippling.

Maltravers (Ernest), a novel by lord Lytton (1837).

Maltworm, a tippler. Similarly, bookworm means a student.

Gadshill. I am joined with no foot-land-rakers [footpads], no long-staff sixpenny strikers [common priggers, who strike small coins from the hands of children]; none of these . . . purple-hued maltworms; but with nobility.—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. act II. sc. 1 (1597).

Mal'venu, Lucif'ĕra's porter.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. 4 (1590).

Malvi'na, daughter of Toscar. She was betrothed to Oscar son of Ossian: but he was slain in Ulster by Cairbar before the day of marriage arrived.—Ossian: Temora, i.

I was a lovely tree in thy presence, Oscar, with all my branches round me; but thy death came like a blast from the desert, and laid my green head low. The spring returned with its showers; no leaf of mine arose. . . . The tear was in the cheek of Malvina.—Ossian: Croma.

Malvoisin (Sir Albert de), a preceptor of the Knights Templars.

Sir Philip de Malvoisin, one of the knights challengers at the tournament.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Malvo'lio, Olivia's steward. When he reproves sir Toby Belch for riotous living, the knight says to him, "Dost thou think, because thou art virtuous, there shall be no more cakes and ale?" Sir Toby and sir Andrew Ague-cheek join Maria in a trick against the steward. Maria forges a letter in the handwriting of Olivia, leading Malvolio to suppose that his mistress is in love with him, telling him to dress in yellow stockings, and to smile on the lady. Malvolio falls into the trap; and when Olivia shows astonishment at his absurd conduct, he keeps quoting parts of the letter he has received, and is shut up in a dark room as a lunatic. — Shakespeare: Twelfth Night (1614).

Clearing his voice with a preliminary "Hem!" he addressed his kinsman, checking, as Malvolio proposed to do when seated in his state, his familiar smile with an austere regard of control.—Sir W. Scott.

Bensley's "Malvolio" was simply perfection. His legs in yellow stockings most villainously cross-gartered, with a horrible laugh of ugly conceit to top the whole, rendered him Shakespeare's "Malvolio" at all points [1738–1817].—Boaden: Life of Jordan.

Mamamouchi, an imaginary order of knighthood. M. Jourdain, the parvenu, is persuaded that the grand seignior of the order has made him a member, and he submits to the ceremony of a mock installation.—Molière: Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme (1670).

All the women most devoutly swear,
Each would be rather a poor actress here
Than to be made a Mamamouchi there.
Dryden.

Mambrino's Helmet, a helmet of pure gold, which rendered the wearer invisible. It was taken possession of by Rinaldo, and stolen by Scaripantê.

Cervantes tells us of a barber who was caught in a shower of rain, and who, to protect his hat, clapped his brazen basin on his head. Don Quixote insisted that this basin was the helmet of the Moorish king; and, taking possession of it, wore it as such.

N.B.—When the knight set the galley-slaves free, the rascals "snatched the basin from his head, and broke it to pieces" (pt. I. iii. 8); but we find it sound and complete in the next book (ch. 15), when the gentlemen at the inn sit in judgment on it, to decide whether it is really a "helmet or a basin." The judges, of course, humour the don, and declare the basin to be an undoubted helmet.—Cervantes: Don Quixote (1605).

"I will lead the life I have mentioned, till, by the force and terror of my arm, I take a helmet from the head of some other knight." . . . The same thing happened about Mambrino's helmet, which cost Scaripante so dear.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. ii. 2 (1605).

Mamillius, a young prince of Sicilia. —Shakespeare: Winter's Tale (1604).

Mammon, the personification of earthly ambition, be it wealth, honours, sensuality, or what not. "Ye cannot serve God and mammon" (Matt. vi. 24). Milton makes Mammon one of the rebellious angels—

Mammon, the least-erected spirit that fell
From heaven; for e'en in heaven his looks and thoughts
Were always downward bent, admiring more
The riches of heaven's pavement, trodden gold,
Than aught, divine or holy, else enjoyed.
Paradise Lost, i. 679, etc. (1665).

Mammon tells sir Guyon if he will serve him, he shall be the richest man in the world; but the knight replies that money has no charm in his sight. The god then takes him into his smithy, and tells him to give any order he likes; but sir Guyon declines the invitation. Mammon next offers to give the knight Philotine to wife; but sir Guyon still declines. Lastly, the knight is led to Proserpine's bower, and told to pluck some of the golden fruit, and to rest him awhile on the silver stool; but sir Guyon resists the temptation. After three days' sojourn in the infernal regions, the knight is led back to earth, and swoons.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 7 (1590).

Mammon (Sir Epicure), the rich dupe who supplies Subtle "the alchemist" with money to carry on his artifices, under pretence of transmuting base metals into gold. Sir Epicure believes in the possibility, and glories in the mighty things he will do when the secret is discovered.—Jonson: The Alchemist (1610).

[Sir] Epicure Mammon has the whole "matter and copy of the father—eye, nose, lip, the trick of his frown." It is just such a swaggerer as contemporaries have described Ben to be. . . . He is arrogance personified. . . . What a "towering bravery" there is in his sensuality! He affects no pleasure under a sultan.—C. Lamb.

Mammoth (The) or big buffalo is an emblem of terror and destruction among the American Indians. Hence, when Brandt, at the head of a party of Mohawks and other savages, was laying waste Pennsylvania, and approached Wyo'ming, Outalissi exclaims—

The mammoth comes—the foe—the monster Brandt,
With all his howling, desolating band . . .
Red is the cup they drink, but not of wine!
Campbell: Gertrude of Wyoming, iii. 16 (1809).

Mammoth Cave (The), in Edmondson County, Kentucky. It is the largest in the world.

Mammoth Grove (The), in California. Some of the trees grow to the height of from 200 to 300 feet, and have a girth of from 100 to 200 feet.

Mammoun, eldest of the four sons of Corcud. One day, he showed kindness to a mutilated serpent, which proved to be the fairy Gialout, who gave him for his humanity the power of joining and mending whatever was broken. He mended a pie's egg which was smashed into twenty pieces, and so perfectly that the egg was hatched. He also mended in a moment a ship which had been wrecked and broken in a violent storm.—Gueulette: Chinese Tales ("Corcud and his Four Sons," 1723).

Man. His descent according to the Darwinian theory: (1) The larvæ of ascidians, a marine mollusc; (2) fish lowly organized, as the lancelet; (3) ganoids, lepidosiren, and other fish; (4) amphibians; (5) birds and reptiles; (6) from reptiles we get the monotremata, which connects reptiles with the mammalia; (7) the marsupials; (8) placental mammals; (9) lemuridæ; (10) similidæ; (11) the New World monkeys called platyrhines, and the Old World monkeys called catarrhines; (12) between the catarrhines and the race of man the "missing link" is placed by some; but others think between the highest organized ape and the lowest organized man the gradation is simple and easy.

¶ The Bedouins say the monkeys of Kara were once human beings, and were transformed for disobedience. The prophet of Mount Kara bade them drink the milk, and wash in the water set before them; but they reversed the order, by drinking the water and washing in the milk. Whereupon he transformed them into monkeys.

¶ The Arabs maintain that the monkey Nasnâs and the ape Wabâr were once human beings.

¶ According to Plato man is "a two-legged animal without feathers."

". . . to leave what with his toil he won
To that unfledged and two-legged thing, a son.
Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, i. 171–2 (1681).

Man (Isle of), a corruption of main-ax

("little island"); Latinized into Menavia. Cæsar calls it "Mon-a," the Scotch pronunciation of main-au; and hence comes "Monabia" for Menavia.

Man (Races of). According to the Bible, the whole human race sprang from one individual, Adam. Virey affirms there were two original pairs. Jacquinot and Latham divide the race into three primordial stocks; Kant into four; Blumenbach into five; Buffon into six; Hunter into seven; Agassiz into eight; Pickering into eleven; Bory St. Vincent into fourteen; Desmoulins into sixteen; Morton into twenty-two; Crawfurd into sixty; and Burke into sixty-three.

Man in Black (The), said to be meant for Goldsmith's father. A true oddity, with the tongue of a Timon and the heart of an uncle Toby. He declaims against beggars, but relieves every one he meets; he ridicules generosity, but would share his last cloak with the needy. —Goldsmith: Citizen of the World (1759).

(Washington Irving has a tale called The Man in Black.)

Man in the Moon (The). Some say it is the man who picked up a bundle of sticks on the sabbath day (Numb. xv. 32-36). Dante says it is Cain, and that the "bush of thorns" is an emblem of the curse pronounced on the earth, "Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee" (Gen. iii. 18). Some say it is Endymion, taken there by Diana.

N.B.—The curse pronounced on the "man" was this: "As you regarded not 'Sunday' on earth, you shall keep a perpetual 'Moon-day' in heaven." This, of course, is a Teutonic tradition.

The bush of thorns, in the Schaumburg-lippê version, is to indicate that the man strewed thorns in the church path, to hinder people from attending mass on Sundays.

> Now doth Cain with fork of thorns confine
> On either hemisphere, touching the wave
> Beneath the towers of Seville. Yesternight
> The moon was round.
> Dante: Inferno, xx. (1308).

> Her gite way gray and full of spottis black,
> And on her brest a chorle painted ful even,
> Bering a bush of thornis on his back,
> Which for his theft might clime so nar the heven.
> Chaucer.

A North Frisian version gives cabbages instead of a faggot of wood.

(There are other traditions, among which may be mentioned "The Story of the Hare and the Elephant." In this story "the man in the moon" is a hare. —Pantschatantra, a collection of Sanskrit fables.)

Man in the Moon, a man who visits the "inland parts of Africa."—W. Thomson: Mammuth or Human Nature Displayed on a Grand Scale (1789).

Man in the Moon, the man who, by the aid of a magical glass, shows Charles Fox (the man of the people) various eminent contemporaries.—W. Thomson: The Man in the Moon or Travels into the Lunar Regions (1783).

(Drayton has a poem called The Man on the Moone, 1605.)

Man of Blood. Charles I. was so called by the puritans, because he made war on his parliament. The allusion is to 2 Sam. xvi. 7.

Man of Brass, Talos, the work of Hephæstos (Vulcan). He traversed the Isle of Crete thrice a year. Apollo'nius (Argonautica, iv.) says he threw rocks at the Argonauts, to prevent their landing. It is also said that when a stranger was discovered on the island, Talos made himself red hot, and embraced the intruder to death.

> That portentous Man of Brass
> Hephæstus made in days of yore,
> Who stalked about the Cretan shore,
> And saw the ships appear and pass,
> And threw stones at the Argonauts.
> Longfellow: The Wayside Inn (1863).

Man of December, Napoleon III. So called because he was made president December 11, 1848; made the coup d'état, December 2, 1851; and was made emperor, December 2, 1852.

(Born in the Rue Lafitte, Paris (not in the Tuileries), April 20, 1808; reigned 1852-1870; died at Chiselhurst, Kent, January 9, 1873.)

Man of Destiny, Napoleon I., who always looked on himself as an instrument in the hands of destiny, and that all his acts were predestined.

> The Man of Destiny . . . had power for a time "to bind kings with chains, and nobles with fetters of iron." —Sir W. Scott.

Man of Feeling (The), Harley, a sensitive, bashful, kind-hearted, sentimental sort of a hero.—Mackenzie: The Man of Feeling (1771).

(Sometimes Henry Mackenzie is himself called "The Man of Feeling.")

Man of Law's Tale. (See under LAW'S TALE, p. 599.)—Chaucer; Canterbury Tales (1388).

Man of Ross, John Kyrle, of Ross, in Herefordshire, distinguished for his benevolence and public spirit. "Richer than miser, nobler than king or king-polluted lord."—Pope: Epistle, iii. ("On the Use of Riches," 1709).

Man of Salt (A), a man like Æne'as, always melting into tears called "drops of salt."

> This would make a man, a man of salt,
> To use his eyes for garden water-pots.
> Shakespeare: King Lear, act iv. sc. 6 (1605).

Man of Sedan, Napoleon III. So called because he surrendered his sword to William king of Prussia after the battle of Sedan in September, 1870.

Also called the "Man of Silence," and "Man of December" (q.v.).

Man of Silence, Napoleon III.

> You should know better than I your position with the "Man of Silence."—For Sceptre and Crown, ch. 1.

Man of Sin (The), mentioned in 2 Thess. ii. 3.

Whitby says the "Man of sin" means the Jews as a people.

Grotius says it means Caius Cæsar or else Caligula.

Wetstein says it is Titus.

Olshausen thinks it is typical of some one yet to come.

Roman Catholics say it means Antichrist.

Protestants at one time said it was the pope.

The Fifth-Monarchy men applied it to Cromwell. (See "Number of the Beast," Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 901.)

Man of the Hill, a tedious "hermit of the vale," introduced by Fielding into his novel of Tom Jones (1749).

Man of the Mountain (Old). (See KOPPENBERG, p. 583.)

Man of the People, Charles James Fox (1749–1806).

Man of the Sea (The Old), the man who got upon the shoulders of Sinbad the sailor, and would not get off again, but clung there with obstinate pertinacity till Sinbad made him drunk, when he was easily shaken off. Sinbad then crushed him to death with a large stone.

> "You had fallen," said they, "into the hands of the Old Man of the Sea, and you are the first whom he has not strangled."—Arabian Nights ("Sinbad," fifth voyage).

Man of the World (The), sir Pertinax McSycophant, who acquires a fortune by "booing" and fawning on the great and rich. He wants his son Egerton to marry the daughter of lord Lumbercourt, but Egerton, to the disgust of his father, marries Constantia the protégée of lady McSycophant. Sir Pertinax had promised his lordship a good round sum of money if the marriage was effected; and when this contretemps occurs, his lordship laments the loss of the money, "which will prove his ruin." Sir Pertinax tells lord Lumbercourt that his younger son Sandy will prove more pliable; and it is agreed that the bargain shall stand good if Sandy will marry the young lady.—Macklin: The Man of the World (1764).

(This comedy is based on Voltaire's Nanine (1749). Henry Mackenzie, in 1773, published a novel of the same title.)

Man without a Skin. Richard Cumberland the dramatist was so called by Garrick, because he was so extremely sensitive that he could not bear "to be touched" by the finger of criticism (1732–1811).

Managarm, the most gigantic and formidable of the race of hags. He dwells in the Iron-wood, Jamvid. Managarm will first fill himself with the blood of man, and then will he swallow up the moon. This hag symbolizes War, and the "Iron-wood" in which he dwells is the wood of spears.—Prose Edda.

Manchester, in Lancashire, noted for its cotton manufactures, textile fabrics, and general trade.

American Manchester, Lowell, Massachusetts. So called from its cotton-mills.

The Manchester of Belgium, Ghent.

The Manchester of Prussia, Elberfeld. The speciality of Prussian Manchester is its "Turkey red." Krupp is the chief manufacturer there of steel.

The Manchester Poet, Charles Swain (1803–1874).

Manchester Massacre. (See PETERLOO.)

Manciple's Tale (The). Phœbus had a crow which he taught to speak; it was white as down, and as big as a swan He had also a wife, whom he dearly loved. One day, when he came home, the crow cried, "Cuckoo, cuckoo, cuckoo!" and Phœbus asked the bird what it meant; whereupon it told the god that his wife was unfaithful to him. Phœbus, in his wrath, seized his bow, and shot his wife through the heart; but to the bird he said, "Curse on thy tell-tale tongue! never more shall it brew mischief." So he deprived it of the power of speech, and changed its plumage from white to black. Moral—Be no tale-bearer, but keep well thy tongue, and think upon the crow.

My sone, bewar, and be noon auctour newe,
Of tydyngs, whether they ben fals or trewe;
Wherso thou comest, amongst high or lowe,
Kep wel thy tonge, and think upon the crowe.
Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, 17, 291–4 (1388).

(This is Ovid's tale of "Coronis" in the Metamorphoses, ii. 543, etc.)

A manciple (Latin, manus capio, "to take in the hand") is an official who supplies a college or inns of court with provisions or "battels."

Manda'ne (3 syl.), wife of Zamti the Chinese mandarin, and mother of Hamet. Hamet was sent to Corea to be brought up by Morat, while Mandanê brought up Zaphimri (under the name of Etan), the orphan prince and only surviving representative of the royal race of China. Hamet led a party of insurgents against Ti'murkan', was seized, and ordered to be put to death as the supposed prince. Mandanê tried to save him, confessed he was not the prince; and Etan came forward as the real "orphan of China." Timurkan, unable to solve the mystery, ordered both to death, and Mandanê with her husband to the torture; but Mandanê stabbed herself.—Murphy: The Orphan of China (1759).

Mandane (2 syl.), the heroine of Mlle. Scud'eri's romance called Cyrus the Great (1650).

Manda'ne and Statī'ra, stock names of melodramatic romance. When a romance-writer hangs the world on the caprice of a woman, he chooses a Mandanê or Statīra for his heroine. Mandanê of classic story was the daughter of king Astyagês, wife of Cambÿsês, and mother of Cyrus the Great. Statīra was daughter of Darius the Persian, and wife of Alexander the Great.

Man'dans, an Indian tribe of Dacota, in the United States, noted for their skill in horsemanship.

Marks not the buffalo's track, nor the Mandans' dexterous horse-race.
Longfellow: Evangeline (1849).

Mandeville, any one who draws the long-bow; a flam. Sir John Mandeville [Man'-de-vil], an English traveller, published a narrative of his voyages, which abounds in the most extravagant fictions (1300–1372).

Oh! he is a modern Mandeville. At Oxford he was always distinguished by the facetious appellation of "The Bouncer."—Foote: The Liar, ii. 1 (1764).

Mandeville (Bernard de), a Dutch physician, born at Dort, in the second half of the last century. He settled in England after taking his degree. He published The Fable of the Bees, and other works of a more professional nature (1670–1733). Browning introduces him in the poem Parleyings with Certain People.

Man'drabul's Offering, one that decreases at every repetition. Mandrabul of Samos, having discovered a gold-mine, offered a golden ram to Juno for the discovery. Next year he offered a silver one, the third year a brazen one, and the fourth year nothing.

Mandrag'ora, a narcotic and love-philtre.

Nor poppy, nor mandragora,
Nor all the drowsy syrups of the world,
Can ever med'cine thee to that sweet sleep
Which thou owedst yesterday.
Shakespeare: Othello, act iii. sc. 3 (1621).

Have the pygmies made you drunken
Bathing in mandragora?
Mrs. Browning: Dead Pan, ii.

Mandricardo, king of Tartary, son of Agrican. Mandricardo wore Hector's cuirass, married Dorālis, and was slain by Roge'ro in single combat.—Bojardo. Orlando Innamorato (1495); Ariosto. Orlando Furioso (1516).

Mandriccardo, a knight whose adventures are recorded by Barahona (Mandriccardo, etc., i. 70, 71).

Manduce (2 syl.), the idol Gluttony, venerated by the Gastrol'aters, a people whose god was their belly.

It is a monstrous figure; . . . its eyes are bigger than its belly, and its head larger than all the rest of its body, . . . having a goodly pair of wide jaws lined with two rows of teeth, which, by the magic of twine, are made to clash, chatter, and rattle one against the other, as the jaws of St. Clement's dragon on St. Mark's procession at Metz.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, iv. 59 (1545).

Manette (Dr.), of Beauvais. He had been imprisoned eighteen years, and had gradually lost his memory. After his release he somewhat recovered it, but any train of thought connected with his prison life produced a relapse. While in prison, the doctor made shoes, and whenever the relapse occurred, his desire for cobbling returned.

Lucie Manette, the loving, golden-haired, blue-eyed daughter of Dr. Manette. She married Charles Darnay.

Lucie Manette had a forehead with the singular capacity of lifting and knitting itself into an expression that was not quite one of perplexity, or wonder, or alarm, or merely of bright fixed attention, though it included all the four expressions.—Dickens: A Tale of Two Cities, i. 4 (1859).

Maney or MANNY (Sir Walter), a native of Belgium, who came to England as page to Philippa queen of Edward III. When he first began his career of arms, he and some young companions of his own age put a black patch over their left eye, and vowed never to remove it till they had performed some memorable act in the French wars (died 1372).

With whom our Maney here deservedly doth stand,
Which first inventor was of that courageous band
Who closed their left eyes up, as never to be freed
Till there they had achieved some high adventurous deed.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xviii. (1613).

Man'fred (Count), son of Sig'ismund. He sold himself to the prince of darkness, and received from him seven spirits to do his bidding. They were the spirits of "earth, ocean, air, night, mountains, winds, and the star of his own destiny." Wholly without human sympathies, the count dwelt in splendid solitude among the Alpine Mountains. He once loved the beautiful As'tarte (2 syl.), and, after her murder, went to the hall of Arima'nês to see her. The spirit of Astarte informed him that he would die the following day; and when asked if she loved him, she sighed "Manfred," and vanished.—Byron: Manfred (1817).

N.B.—Byron sometimes makes Astarte two syllables and sometimes three. The usual pronunciation is As-tar-te.

Mangerton (The laird of), John Armstrong, an old warrior who witnesses the national combat in Liddesdale valley between his own son (the Scotch champion) and Foster (the English champion). The laird's son is vanquished.—Sir W. Scott: The Laird's Jock (time, Elizabeth).

Maniche'an (4 syl.), a disciple of Manês or Manachee the Persian heresiarch. The Manicheans believe in two opposing principles—one of good and the other of evil. Theodora, wishing to extirpate these heretics, put 100,000 of them to the sword.

Yet would she make full many a Manichean.
Byron: Don Juan, vi. 3 (1824).

Manicon, a species of nightshade, supposed to produce madness.

Man'ito or Mani'tou, the Great Spirit of the North American Indians. These Indians acknowledge two supreme spirits—a spirit of good and a spirit of evil. The former they call Gitchi-Manito, and the latter Matchê-Manito. The good spirit is symbolized by an egg, and the evil one by a serpent.—Longfellow: Hiawatha, xiv.

As when the evil Manitou that dries
Th' Ohio woods, consumes them in his ire.
Campbell: Gertrude of Wyoming, i. 17 (1809).

Manlius, surnamed Torquātus, the Roman consul. In the Latin war, he gave orders that no Roman, on pain of death, should engage in single combat. One of the Latins having provoked young Manlius by repeated insults, he slew him; but when the young man took the spoils to his father, Manlius ordered him to be put to death for violating the commands of his superior officer.—Roman Story.

Manlius Capitoli'nus, consul of Rome B.C. 392, then military tribune. After the battle of Allia (390), seeing Rome in the power of the Gauls, he threw himself into the capitol with 1000 men, surprised the Gauls, and put them to the sword. It was for this achievement he was called Capitolinus. Subsequently he was charged with aiming at sovereignty, and was hurled to death from the Tarpeian Rock.

(Lafosse (1698) has a tragedy called Manlius Capitolinus, and "Manlius" was one of the favourite characters of Talma the French actor. Lafosse's drama is an imitation of Otway's tragedy of Venice Preserved, 1682.)

MANLY, the lover of lady Grace Townly sister-in-law of lord Townly. Manly is the cousin of sir Francis Wronghead, whom he saves from utter ruin. He is noble, judicious, upright, and sets all things right that are going wrong.—Vanbrugh and Cibber: The Provoked Husband (1728).

The address and manner of Dennis Delane [1700–1753] were easy and polite; and he excelled in the well-bred man, such as "Manly."—T. Davies.

Manly, "the plain dealer." An honest, surly sea-captain, who thinks every one a rascal, and believes himself to be no better. Manly forms a good contrast to Olivia, who is a consummate hypocrite of most unblushing effrontery.

"Counterfeit honours," says Manly, "will not be current with me. I weigh the man, not his titles. 'Tis not the king's stamp can make the metal better or heavier."—Wycherly: The Plain Dealer, i. 1 (1677).

 Manly, the plain dealer, is a copy of Molière's "Misanthrope," the prototype of which was the duc de Montausier.

Manly (Captain), the fiancé of Arabella ward of justice Day and an heiress.

Arabella. I like him much—he seems plain and honest.
Ruth. Plain enough, in all conscience.
T. Knight: The Honest Thieves.

Manly (Colonel), a bluff, honest soldier, to whom honour is dearer than life. The hero of the drama.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Beau's Duel (1703).

Mann (Mrs.), a dishonest, grasping woman, who kept a branch workhouse, where children were farmed. Oliver Twist was sent to her child-farm. Mrs. Mann systematically starved the children placed under her charge. — Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Mannaia, goddess of retribution. The word in Italian means "an axe."

> All in a terrible moment came the blow
> That beat down Paolo's fence, ended the play
> Of the foil, and brought Mannaia on the stage.
> R. Browning: The Ring and the Book, iii. (date of the story, 1487).

Mannering (Guy) or colonel Mannering.

Mrs. Mannering (née Sophia Wellwood), wife of Guy Mannering.

Julia Mannering, daughter of Guy. She marries captain Bertram. "Rather a hare-brained girl, but well deserving the kindest regards" (act i. 2 of the dramatized version).

Sir Paul Mannering, uncle to Guy Mannering.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

N.B.—The plot of this novel is given under GUY MANNERING, p. 459. It was dramatized by Terry in 1816, with music by Bishop.

Mano'a, the fabulous capital of El Dora'do, the houses of which city were roofed with gold. El Dorado was said to be situated on the west shore of lake Parime, at the mouth of a large river.

Manon Lescaut, the heroine of a French novel entitled Histoire de Chevalier des Grieux et de Manon, by the abbé Prévost (1733). Manon was the "fair mischief" of the story. Her charms seduced and ruined the chevalier des Grieux, and they lived together in a disreputable manner. Manon was ultimately transported to New Orleans, and des Grieux managed to accompany her in the transport, pretending he was her husband. She fled the colony, where they settled, on account of the governor's son, who made love to her, and died of privation in the wilderness, her lover by her side. The Chevalier returned to France. (See GRIEUX, p. 450.)

(The object of this novel, like that of La Dame aux Camélias, by Dumas fils (1848), is to show how true-hearted, how self-sacrificing, how attractive, a fille de joie may be.)

Manri'co, the supposed son of Azuce'na the gipsy, but in reality the son of Garzia (brother of the conte di Luna). Leono'ra is in love with him. (For the rest, see LEONORA, p. 607.)—Verdi: Il Trovato're (an opera, 1853).

Man's, a fashionable coffee-house in the reign of Charles II.

Mans (The count of), Roland, nephew of Charlemagne. He is also called the "knight of Blaives."

Mansel (Sir Edward), lieutenant of the Tower of London.

Lady Mansel, wife of sir Edward.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Mansfield (The Miller of), a humorous, good-natured countryman, who offered Henry VIII. hospitality when he had lost himself in a hunting expedition. The miller gave the king half a bed with his son Richard. Next morning, the courtiers were brought to the cottage by under-keepers, and Henry, in merry pin, knighted his host, who thus became sir John Cockle. He then made him "overseer of Sherwood Forest," with a salary of 1000 marks a year.—Dodsley: The King and the Miller of Mansfield (1737).

 In the ballad called The King and the Miller of Mansfield, the king is Henry II., and there are several other points of difference between the ballad and the play. In the play, Cockle hears a gun fired, and goes out to look for poachers, when he lays hold of the king, but, being satisfied that he is no poacher, he takes him home. In the ballad, the king outrides his lords, gets lost, and, meeting the miller, asks of him a night's lodging. When the miller feels satisfied with the face and bearing of the stranger, he entertains him right hospitably. He gives him for supper a venison pasty, but tells him on no account to tell the king "that they made free with his deer." Another point of difference is this: In the play, the courtiers are seized by the under-keepers, and brought to Cockle's house; but in the ballad they track the king and appear before him next morning. In the play, the king settles on sir John Cockle 1000 marks; in the ballad, £300 a year.—Percy: Reliques, III. ii. 20.

(As Dodsley introduced the "firing of a gun," he was obliged to bring down his date to more modern times, and none of the Henrys between Henry II. and Henry VIII. would be the least likely to indulge in such a prank.)

Mansur (Elijah), a warrior, prophet, and priest, who taught a more tolerant form of Islâm; but not being an orthodox Moslem, he was condemned to imprisonment in the bowels of a mountain. Mansur is to reappear and wave his conquering sword, to the terror of the Muscovite. —Milner: Gallery of Geography, 781.

A similar survival is told of Arthur, Barbarossa (q.v.), Boabdil, Charlemagne, Desmond, Henry the Fowler, Ogier, Sebastian I., Theodorick, and some others.

Mantacci'ni, a charlatan, who professed to restore the dead to life.

Mantali'ni (Madame), a fashionable milliner near Cavendish Square, London. She dotes upon her husband, and supports him in idleness.

Mr. Mantalini, the husband of madame; he is a man-doll and cockney fop, noted for his white teeth, his minced oaths, and his gorgeous morning gown. This "exquisite" lives on his wife's earnings, and thinks he confers a favour on her by lavishing her money on his selfish indulgences.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Mantle (The Boy and the). One day, a little boy presented himself before king Arthur, and showed him a curious mantle "which would become no wife that was not leal" to her true lord. The queen tried it on, but it changed its colour and fell into shreds; sir Kay's lady tried it on, but with no better success; others followed, but only sir Cradock's wife could wear it.—Percy: Reliques.

Mantuan (The), that is, Baptista Spag'nolus, surnamed Mantua'nus, from the place of his birth. He wrote poems and eclogues in Latin. His works were translated into English by George Tuberville in 1567. He lived 1443–1516.

Ah, good old Mantuan! I may speak of thee as the traveller doth of Venice—

Vinegia, Vinegia,
Chi non te vede, ei non te pregia.

Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, act iv. sc. 2 (1594).

Mantuan Swan (The), Virgil, a native of Mantua (B.C. 70–19).

Mantua me genuit; Calabri rapuere; tenet nunc Parthenopé; cecini pascua, rura, duces.
On Virgil's Tomb (composed by himself).

Ages elapsed ere Homer's lamp appeared;
And ages ere the Mantuan Swan was heard.
Cowper.

Ma'nucodia'ta, a bird resembling a swallow, found in the Molucca Islands. "It has no feet, and though the body is not bigger than that of a swallow, the span of its wings is equal to that of an eagle. These birds never approach the earth, but the female lays her eggs on the back of the male, and hatches them in her own breast. They live on the dew of heaven, and eat neither animal nor vegetable food."—Cardan: De Rerum Varietate (1557).

Less pure the footless fowl of heaven, that never Rest upon earth, but on the wing for ever,
Hovering o'er flowers, their fragrant food inhale,
Drink the descending dew upon the way,
And sleep aloft while floating on the gale.
Southey: Curse of Kehama, xxi. 6 (1809).

Manuel du Sosa, governor of Lisbon, and brother of Guiomar (mother of the vainglorious Duarte, 3 syl.).—Fletcher: The Custom of the Country (1647).

Mapp (Mrs.), bone-setter. She was born at Epsom, and at one time was very rich, but she died in great poverty at her lodgings in Seven Dials (1737).

Maqueda, the queen of the South, who visited Solomon, and had by him a son named Melech.—Zaga Zabo: Ap. Damian a Goes.

∴ Maqueda is generally called Balkis queen of Saba or Zaba.

Marcadiges (4 syl.), father of the lady beloved by Crampart (q.v.).—Heinrich von Alkmaar: Reynard the Fox (1498).

Marcassin (Prince). This nursery tale is from the Nights of Straporola, an Italian (sixteenth century). Translated into French in 1585.

Marce'lia, the "Desdemona" of Massinger's Duke of Milan. Sforza "the More" doted on his young bride, and Marcelia returned his love. During Sforza's absence at the camp, Francesco, "the lord protector," tried to seduce the young bride from her fidelity, and, failing in his purpose, accused her to the duke of wishing to play the wanton. "I laboured to divert her . . . urged your much love . . . but hourly she pursued me." The duke, in a paroxysm of jealousy, flew on Marcelia and slew her.—Massinger: The Duke of Milan (1622).

Marcella, daughter of William a farmer. Her father and mother died while she was young, leaving her in charge of an uncle. She was "the most beautiful creature ever sent into the world," and every bachelor who saw her fell madly in love with her, but she declined their suits. One of her lovers was Chrysostom, the favourite of the village, who died of disappointed hope, and the shepherds wrote on his tombstone: "From Chrysostom's fate, learn to abhor Marcella, that common enemy of man, whose beauty and cruelty are both in the extreme."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. ii. 4, 5 (1605).

Marcellin de Peyras. The chevalier to whom the baron de Peyras gave up his estates when he retired to Grenoble. De Peyras eloped with lady Ernestine, but soon tired of her, and fell in love with his cousin Margaret, the baron's daughter.—Stirling: The Gold-Mine or The Miller of Grenoble (1854).

Marcelli'na, daughter of Rocco jailer of the State prison of Seville. She fell in love with Fidelio, her father's servant; but this Fidelio turned out to be Leonora, wife of the State prisoner Fernando Florestan.—Beethoven: Fidelio (an opera, 1791).

Marcello, in Meyerbeer's opera of Les Huguenots, unites in marriage Valenti'na and Raoul (1836).

Marcello, the pseudonym of the duchess of Castiglionê Colonna, widow of the duc Charles de Castiglionê Aldiovandi. The best works of this noted sculptor are "The Gorgon," "Marie Antoinette," "Hecate," and the "Pythia" in bronze. Born 1837.

Marcellus (M. Claudius), called "The Sword of Rome." Fabius "Cunctator" was "The Shield of Rome."

Marcellus, an officer of Denmark, to whom the ghost of the murdered king appeared before it presented itself to prince Hamlet.—Shakespeare: Hamlet (1596).

Marchioness (The), the half-starved girl-of-all-work, in the service of Sampson Brass and his sister Sally. She was so lonesome and dull, that it afforded her relief to peep at Mr. Swiveller even through the keyhole of his door. Though so dirty and ill cared for, "the marchioness" was sharp-witted and cunning. It was Mr. Swiveller who called her the "marchioness," when she played cards with him, "because it seemed more real and pleasant" to play with a marchioness than with a domestic slavey (ch. lvii.). When Dick Swiveller was turned away and fell sick, the "marchioness" nursed him carefully, and he afterwards married her.—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop (1840).

Marchmont (Miss Matilda), the confidante of Julia Mannering.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Marcia, in Addison's drama called Cato, is beloved both by Sempronius and by Juba (1713).

Marcian, armourer to count Robert of Paris.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Marck (William de la), a French nobleman, called "The Wild Boar of Ardennes" (Sanglier des Ardennes).—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Marcliffe (Theophilus), pseudonym of William Godwin (author of Caleb Williams, 1756–1836).

Marcomanic War, a war carried on by the Marcomanni, under the leadership of Maroboduus, who made himself master of Bohemia, etc. Maroboduus was defeated by Arminius, and his confederation broken up (A.D. 20). In the second Christian century a new war broke out between the Marcomanni and the Romans, which lasted thirteen years. In A.D. 180 peace was purchased by the Romans, and the war for a time ceased.

Marcos de Obregon, the hero of a Spanish romance, from which Lesage has borrowed very freely in his Gil Blas.—Vicente Espinel: Vida del Escudero Marcos de Obregon (1618).

Marculf and Salomon or "The Fool and the Philosopher." Marculf the fool, who had delivered Salomon from captivity, outwits "the sage" by knavery and cunning.—Stricker: from a German poem, twelfth century.

Marcus, son of Cato of Utica, a warm-hearted, impulsive young man, passionately in love with Lucia daughter of Lucius; but Lucia loved the more temperate brother, Portius. Marcus was slain by Cæsar's soldiers when they invaded Utica.

> Marcus is furious, wild in his complaints;
> I hear with a secret kind of dread,
> And tremble at his vehemence of temper.
> Addison: Cato, I. 1 (1713).

Mardi-Gras (Le), the last day of the carnival; noted in Paris for the travestie of a Roman procession marching to offer an ox in sacrifice to the gods. The ox, which is always the "prize" beast of the season, is decorated with gilt horns and fillet round its head; mock priests with axes, etc., march beside it, a band with all sorts of tin instruments or instruments of thin brass follow, and lictors, etc., fill up the procession.

> Tous les ans on vient de la ville
> Les marchands dans nos cantons,
> Pour les mener aux Tuileries,
> Au Mardi-Gras, devant le roi
> Et puis les vendre aux boucheries
> J'aime Jeanne ma femme, eh, ha! j'aimerais mieux
> La voir mourir que voir mourir mes bœufs.
> Pierre Dupont: Les Bœufs.

Mardonius (Captain), in Beaumont and Fletcher's drama called A King or No King (1619).

Mareschal of Mareschal Wells (Young), one of the Jacobite conspirators, under the leadership of Mr. Richard Vere laird of Ellieslaw.—Sir W. Scott: The Black Dwarf (time, Anne).

Marfi'sa, an Indian queen.—Bojardo: Orlando Innamorato (1495); and Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Marforio's Statue. This statue lies on the ground in Rome, and was at one time used for libels, lampoons, and jests, but was never so much used as Pasquin's.

Margar'elon (4 syl.), a Trojan hero of modern legend, who performed deeds of marvellous bravery. Lydgate, in his Boke of Troy (1513), calls him a son of Priam. According to this authority, Margarelon attacked Achillês, and fell by his hand.

MARGARET, only child and heiress of sir Giles Overreach. Her father set his heart on her marrying lord Lovel, for the summit of his ambition was to see her a peeress. But Margaret was modest, and could see no happiness in ill-assorted marriages; so she remained faithful to Tom Allworth, the man of her choice.—Massinger: A New Way to Pay Old Debts (1628).

Margaret, wife of Vandunke (2 syl.), the drunken burgomaster of Bruges.—Fletcher: The Beggars' Bush (1622).

Margaret (Ladye), "the flower of Teviot," daughter of the duchess Margaret and lord Walter Scott of Branksome Hall. The ladye Margaret was beloved by Henry of Cranstown, whose family had a deadly feud with that of Scott. (For the rest of the tale, see LAY OF THE LAST MINSTREL, p. 599.)—Sir W. Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel (1805).

Margaret, the heroine of Goethe's Faust. Faust first encounters her on her return from church, falls in love with her, and seduces her. Overcome with shame, Margaret destroys the infant to which she gives birth, and is condemned to death. Faust attempts to save her; and, gaining admission to her cell, finds her huddled up on a bed of straw, singing, like Ophelia, wild snatches of ancient ballads, her reason faded, and her death at hand. Faust tries to persuade the mad girl to flee with him, but in vain. Mephistoph'elês, passionless and grim, arrives to hurry them both to their spiritual ruin; but Margaret calls "upon the judgment-seat of God," and when Mephistopheles says, "She is judged," voices from above answer, "Is saved." She ascends to heaven as Faust disappears with Mephistopheles. Margaret is often called by the pet diminutive "Gretchen," and in Gounod's (1859) opera, "Margheri'ta."—Goethe: Faust (1790).

> Shakespeare has drawn no such portrait as that of Margaret; no such peculiar union of passion, simplicity, homeliness, and witchery. The poverty and inferior social position of Margaret are never lost sight of—she never becomes an abstraction. It is love alone which exalts her above her station.—Lewes.

Margaret Catchpole, a Suffolk celebrity, born at Nacton, in that county, in 1773; the title and heroine of a tale by the Rev. R. Cobbold. She falls in love with a smuggler named Will Laud, and in 1797, in order to reach him, steals a horse from Mr. J. Cobbold, brewer, of Ipswich, in whose service she had lived much respected. She dresses herself in the groom's clothes, and makes her way to London, where she is detected while selling the horse, and is put in prison. She is sentenced to death at the Suffolk assizes—a sentence afterwards commuted to one of seven years' transportation. Owing to a difficulty in sending prisoners to New South Wales, she is confined in Ipswich jail; but from here she makes her escape, joins Laud, who is shot in her defence. Margaret is recaptured, and again sentenced to death, which is for the second time commuted to transportation, this time for life, and she arrives at Port Jackson in 1801. Here, by her good behaviour, she obtains a free pardon, and ultimately marries a former lover named John Barry, who had emigrated and risen to a high position in the colony.

She died, much respected, in the year 1841.

Margaret Finch, queen of the gipsies. She was born at Sutton, in Kent (1631), and finally settled in Norway. From a constant habit of sitting on the ground, with her chin on her knees, she was unable to stand, and when dead was buried in a square box (1740); aged 109 years.

Margaret Gibson, afterwards called Patten, a famous Scotch cook, who was employed in the palace of James I. She was born in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and died June 26, 1739, either 136 or 141 years of age.

Margaret Lamburn, one of the servants of Mary queen of Scots, who undertook to avenge the death of her royal mistress. To this end, she dressed in man's clothes and carried two pistols—one to shoot queen Elizabeth and the other herself. She had reached the garden where the queen was walking, when she accidentally dropped one of the pistols, was seized, carried before the queen, and frantically told her tale. When the queen asked how she expected to be treated, Margaret replied, "A judge would condemn me to death, but it would be more royal to grant me pardon." The queen did so, and we hear no more of this fanatic.

Margaret Simon, daughter of Martin Simon the miller of Grenoble; a brave, beautiful, and noble girl.—Stirling: The Gold-Mine or Miller of Grenoble (1854).

Margaret Street, Portman Square, London. So called from Margaret, only child of Edward second earl of Oxford and Mortimer. (See BENTINCK, p. 111.)

Margaret of Anjou, widow of king Henry VI. of England. She presents herself, disguised as a mendicant, in Strasburg Cathedral, to Philipson (i.e. the earl of Oxford).—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Margaret's Ghost, a ballad by David Mallet (1724). William courted the fair Margaret, but jilted her; he promised love, but broke his promise; said her face was fair, her lips sweet, and her eyes bright, but left the face to pale, the eyes to weep, and the maid to languish and die. Her ghost appeared to him at night to rebuke his heartlessness; and next morning, William left his bed raving mad, hied him to Margaret's grave, thrice called her by name, "and never word spake more."

We shall have ballads made of it within two months, setting forth how a young squire became a serving-man of low degree, and it will be stuck up with Margaret's Ghost against the walls of every cottage in the country. —Bickerstaff: Love in a Village (1762).

Margaretta, a maiden attached to Robin. Her father wanted her to marry "a stupid old man, because he was rich;" so she ran away from home and lived as a ballad-singer. Robin emigrated for three years, and made his fortune. He was wrecked on the coast of Cornwall on his return, and met Margaretta at the house of Farmer Crop his brother-in-law, when the acquaintance was renewed. (See NO SONG, etc.)—Hoare: No Song no Supper (1754–1834).

Margarit'ta (Donna), a Spanish heiress, "fair, young, and wealthy," who resolves to marry that she may the more freely indulge her wantonness. She selects Leon for her husband, because she thinks him a milksop, whom she can twist round her thumb at pleasure; but no sooner is Leon married than he shows himself the master. By ruling with great firmness and affection, he wins the esteem of every one, and the wanton coquette becomes a modest, devoted, and obedient wife.—Fletcher: Rule a Wife and Have a Wife (1640).

Margery (Dame), the old nurse of lady Eveline Berenger "the betrothed."—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Margheri'ta. (See MARGARET (4th entry) on opposite page.)

Margheri'ta di Valois, daughter of Catherine de Medicis and Henri II. of France. She married Henri le Bearnais (afterwards Henri IV. of France). It was during the wedding solemnities of Margherita and Henri that Catherine de Medicis carried out the massacre of the French huguenots. The bride was at a ball during this horrible slaughter.—Meyerbeer: Les Huguenots or Gli Ugonotti (1836).

Marguerite des Marguerites ("The Pearl of Pearls") was not Marguerite di Valois wife of Henri IV., but Marguerite the wife of Henri d'Albert, mother of Henri IV.

Margia'na (Queen), a mussulman, the mortal enemy of the fire-worshippers. Prince Assad became her slave, but, being stolen by the crew of Behrâm, was carried off. The queen gave chase to the ship; Assad was thrown overboard, and swam to shore. The queen with an army demanded back her slave, discovered that Assad was a prince, and that his half-brother was king of the city to which she had come; whereupon she married him, and carried him home to her own dominions.—Arabian Nights ("Amgiad and Assad").

Marguerite Gautier, called "La Dame aux Camélias" — a celebrated courtezan, the heroine of a novel and play by Dumas fils.

Margutte (3 syl.), a low-minded, vulgar giant, ten feet high, with enormous appetite and of the grossest sensuality. He died of laughter on seeing a monkey pulling on his boots.—Pulci: Morgante Maggiore (1488).

¶ Chalchas, the Homeric soothsayer, died of laughter. (See LAUGHTER, p. 594.)

Marhaus (Sir), a knight of the Round Table, a king's son, and brother of the queen of Ireland. When sir Mark king of Cornwall refused to pay truage to Anguish king of Ireland, sir Marhaus was sent to defy sir Mark and all his knights to single combat. No one durst go against him; but Tristram said, if Mark would knight him, he would defend his cause. In the combat, sir Tristram was victorious. With his sword he cut through his adversary's helmet and brain-pan, and his sword stuck so fast in the bone that he had to pull thrice before he could extricate it. Sir Marhaus contrived to get back to Ireland, but soon died.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 7, 8 (1470).

∴ Sir Marhaus carried a white shield; but as he hated women, twelve damsels spat thereon, to show how they dishonoured him.—Ditto, pt. i. 75.

MARIA, a lady in attendance on the princess of France. Longaville, a young lord in the suite of Ferdinand king of Navarre, asks her to marry him, but she defers her answer for twelve months. To this Longaville replies, "I'll stay with patience, but the time is long;" and Maria makes answer, "The liker you; few taller are so young."—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost (1594).

Maria, the waiting-woman of the countess Olivia.—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night (1614).

Maria, wife of Frederick the unnatural and licentious brother of Alphonso king of Naples. She is a virtuous lady, and appears in strong contrast to her infamous husband.—Fletcher: A Wife for a Month (1624).

Maria, daughter and only child of Thorowgood a wealthy London merchant. She is in love with George Barnwell, her father's apprentice; but George is executed for robbery and murder.—Lillo: George Barnwell (1732).

A dying man sent for David Ross the actor [1728-1790], and addressed him thus: "Some forty years ago, like 'George Barnwell,' I wronged my master to supply the unbounded extravagance of a 'Millwood.' I took her to see your performance, which so shocked me that I vowed to break the connection and return to the path of virtue. I kept my resolution, replaced the money I had stolen, and found a 'Maria' in my master's daughter. . . . I have now left £1000 affixed to your name in my will and testament."—Pelham: Chronicles of Crime.

Maria, the ward of sir Peter Teazle. She is in love with Charles Surface, whom she ultimately marries. — Sheridan: School for Scandal (1777).

Maria, "the maid of the Oaks," brought up as the ward of Oldworth of Oldworth Oaks, but is in reality his daughter and heiress. Maria is engaged to sir Harry Groveby, and Hurry says, "She is the most charmingest, sweetest, delightfulest, mildest, beautifulest, modestest, genteelest young creature in the world."—Burgoyne: The Maid of the Oaks (1779).

Maria, a maiden whose banns were forbidden "by the curate of the parish who published them;" in consequence of which, Maria lost her wits, and used to sit on the roadside near Moulines (2 syl.), playing on a pipe vesper hymns to the Virgin. She led by a ribbon a little dog named Silvio, of which she was very jealous, for at one time she had a favourite goat, that forsook her.—Sterne: Sentimental Journey (1768).

Maria, a foundling, discovered by Sulpizio a sergeant of the 11th regiment of Napoleon's Grand Army, and adopted by the regiment as their daughter. Tonio, a Tyrolese, saved her life and fell in love with her, but just as they were about to be married the marchioness of Berkenfield claimed the foundling as her own daughter, and the suttler-girl had to quit the regiment for the castle. After a time, the castle was taken by the French, and although the marchioness had promised Maria in marriage to another, she consented to her union with Tonio, who had risen to the rank of a field-officer,—Donizetti: La Figlia del Reggimento (an opera, 1840).

Maria [Delaval], daughter of colonel Delaval. Plighted to Mr. Versatile; but just previous to the marriage Mr. Versatile, by the death of his father, came into a baronetcy and large fortune. The marriage was deferred; Mr. (now sir George) Versatile went abroad, and became a man of fashion. They met, the attachment was renewed, and the marriage consummated.

Sweetness and smiles played upon her countenance. She was the delight of her friends, the admiration of the world, and the coveted of every eye. Lovers of fortune and fashion contended for her hand, but she had bestowed her heart.—Holcroft: He's Much to Blame, v. 2 (1790).

Maria [WILDING], daughter of sir Jasper Wilding. She is in love with Beaufort; and being promised in marriage against her will to George Philpot, disgusts him purposely by her silliness. George refuses to marry her, and she gives her hand to Beaufort.—Murphy: The Citizen (1757).

Maria Theresa Panza, wife of Sancho Panza. She is sometimes called Maria, and sometimes Theresa.—Cervantes: Don Quixote (1605).

Mariage Forcé (Le). Sganarelle, a rich man of 64, promises marriage to Dorimène (3 syl.), a girl under 20, but, having scruples about the matter, consults his friend, two philosophers, and the gipsies, from none of whom can he obtain any practicable advice. At length, he overhears Dorimène telling a young lover that she only marries the old man for his money, and that he cannot live above a few months; so the old man goes to the father, and declines the alliance. On this, the father sends his son to Sganarelle. The young man takes with him two swords, and with the utmost politeness and sang-froid requests Mons. to choose one. When the old man declines to do so, the young man gives him a thorough drubbing, and again with the utmost politeness requests the old man to make his choice. On his again declining to do so, he is again beaten, and at last consents to ratify the marriage.—Molière: Le Mariage Forcé (1664).

Mariamne (4 syl.), a Jewish princess, daughter of Alexander and wife of Herod "the Great." Mariamnè was the mother of Alexander and Aristobulus, both of whom Herod put to death in a fit of jealousy, and then fell into a state of morbid madness, in which he fancied he saw Mariamnè and heard her asking for her sons.

(This has been made the subject of several tragedies: e.g. A. Hardy, Mariamne (1623); Pierre Tristan l'Ermite, Mariamne (1640); Voltaire, Mariamne, 1724.)

MARIAN, "the Muses' only darling," is Margaret countess of Cumberland, sister of Anne countess of Warwick.

Fair Marian, the Muses' only darling,
Whose beauty shineth as the morning clear,
With silver dew upon the roses pearling.
Spenser: Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1595).

Marian, "the parson's maid," in love with Colin Clout who loves Cicely. Marian sings a ditty of dole, in which she laments for Colin, and says how he once gave her a knife, but "Woe is me! for knives, they tell me, always sever love."—Gay: Pastorals, ii. (1714).

Marian, "the daughter" of Robert a wrecker, and betrothed to Edward a young sailor. She was fair in person, loving, and holy. During the absence of Edward at sea, a storm arose, and Robert went to the coast to look for plunder. Marian followed him, and in the dusk saw some one stab another. She thought it was her father, but it was Black Norris. Her father being taken up, Marian gave evidence against him, and the old man was condemned to death. Norris now told Marian he would save her father if she would become his wife. She made the promise, but was saved the misery of the marriage by the arrest of Norris for murder.—Knowles: The Daughter (1836).

Marian, or "A Young Maid's Fortunes," an excellent novel of Irish life by Mrs. S. C. Hall, published in 1840. Katey Macane, an Irish cook, adopts Marian a foundling, and watches over her with untiring affection.

MARIAN'A, a lovely and lovable lady, married to Angelo (deputy duke of Vienna) by civil contract, but not by religious rites. Her pleadings to the duke for Angelo are wholly unrivalled.—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure (1603).

Timid and shrinking before, she does not now wait to be encouraged in her suit. She is instant and importunate. She does not reason with the duke; she begs, she implores.—R. G. White.

N.B.—Mariana was Angelo's wife by civil contract, but not by the "sacrament of marriage." She was wed to him, but was not his wife, according to the rites of the Catholic Church.

(Mariana is a subordinate character in All's Well that Ends Well. She is a neighbour and friend of the Old Widow of Florence.)

Mariana, sister of Ludovi'co Sforza duke of Milan, and wife of Francesco his chief minister of state.—Massinger: The Duke of Milan (1622).

Mariana, daughter of lord Charney; taken prisoner by the English, and in love with Arnold (friend of the Black Prince). Just before the battle of Poitiers, thinking the English cause hopeless, Mariana induces Arnold to desert; but lord Charney will not receive him. Arnold returns to the English camp, and dies in the battle. Lord Charney is also slain, and Mariana dies distracted.—Shirley: Edward the Black Prince (1640).

Mariana, the young lady that Lovegold the miser wanted to marry. (For the tale, see LOVEGOLD, p. 632.)—Fielding: The Miser (1732).

Mariana, the daughter of a Swiss burgher, "the most beautiful of women." "Her gentleness a smile without a smile, a sweetness of look, speech, act." Leonardo being crushed by an avalanche, she nursed him through his illness, and they fell in love with each other. He started for Mantua, but was detained for two years captive by a gang of thieves; and Mariana followed him, being unable to support life where he was not. In Mantua count Florio fell in love with her, and obtained her guardian's consent to their union; but Mariana refused, was summoned before the duke (Ferrardo), and judgment was given against her. Leonardo, being present at the trial, now threw off his disguise, and was acknowledged to be the real duke. He assumed his rank, and married Mariana; but, being called to the camp, left Ferrardo regent. Ferrardo, being a villain, laid a cunning scheme to prove Mariana guilty of adultery with Julian St. Pierre, a countryman; but Leonardo refused to believe the charge. Julian, who turned out to be Mariana's brother, exposed the whole plot of Ferrardo, and amply cleared his sister of the slightest taint or thought of a revolt.—Knowles: The Wife (1833).

Mariana, daughter of the king of Thessaly. She was beloved by sir Alexander, one of the three sons of St. George the patron saint of England. Sir Alexander married her, and became king of Thessaly.—R. Johnson: The Seven Champions of Christendom, iii. 2, 3, 11 (1617).

Mariana in the Moated Grange, a young damsel who sits in the moated grange, looking out for her lover, who never comes; and the burden of her life-song is, "My life is dreary, for he cometh not; I am aweary, and would that I were dead!"

The sequel is called Mariana in the South, in which the love-lorn maiden looks forward to her death, "when she will cease to be alone, to live forgotten, and to love forlorn."—Tennyson: Mariana (in two parts).

∴ Mariana, the lady betrothed to Angelo, passed her sorrowful hours "at the Moated Grange." Thus the duke says to Isabella—

> Haste you speedily to Angelo. . . . I will presently to St. Luke's. There, at the moated grange, resides the dejected Mariana.—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure, act iii. sc. 1 (1603).

Marianne (3 syl.), a statuette to which the red republicans of France pay homage. It symbolizes the republic, and is arrayed in a red Phrygian cap. This statuette is sold at earthenware shops, and in republican clubs, enthroned in glory, and sometimes it is carried in procession to the tune of the Marseillaise. (See MARY ANNE, p. 682.)

The reason seems to be this: Ravaillac, the assassin of Henri IV. (the Harmodius or Aristogiton of France), was honoured by the red republicans as "patriot, deliverer, and martyr." This regicide was incited to his deed of blood by reading the celebrated treatise De Rege et Regio Institutione, by Mariana the Jesuit, published 1599 (about ten years previously). As Mariana inspired Ravaillac "to deliver France from her tyrant" (Henri IV.), the name was attached to the statuette of liberty, and the republican party generally.

(The association of the name with the guillotine favours this suggestion.)

Marianne [Franval], sister of Franval the advocate. She is a beautiful, loving, gentle creature, full of the deeds of kindness, and brimming over with charity. Marianne loves captain St. Alme, a merchant's son, and though her mother opposes the match as beneath the rank of the family, the advocate pleads for his sister, and the lovers are duly betrothed to each other.—Holcroft: The Deaf and Dumb (1785).

Maridu'num, i.e. Caer-Merdin (now Caermarthen).—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 3 (1590).

Marie (Countess), the mother of Ul'rica (a love-daughter), the father of Ulrica being Ernest de Fridberg, "the prisoner of State." Marie married count D'Osborn, on condition of his obtaining the acquittal of her lover Ernest de Fridberg; but the count broke his promise, and even attempted to get the prisoner smothered in his dungeon. His villainy being made known, the king ordered him to be executed, and Ernest, being set at liberty, duly married the countess Marie. —Stirling: The Prisoner of State (1847).

Marie de Brabant, daughter of Henri III. duc de Brabant. She married Philippe le Hardi, king of France, and was accused by Labrosse of having poisoned Philippe's son by his former wife. Jean de Brabant defended the queen's innocence by combat, and being the victor, Labrosse was hung (1260–1321).

(Ancelot has made this the subject of an historical poem called Marie de Brabant, in six chants, 1825.)

Marie Kirikitoun, a witch, who promised to do a certain task for a lassie, in order that she might win a husband, provided the lassie either remembered the witch's name for a year and a day, or submitted to any punishment she might choose to inflict. The lassie was married, and forgot the witch's name; but the fay was heard singing, "Houpa, houpa, Marie Kirikitoun! Nobody will remember my name." The lassie, being able to tell the witch's name, was no more troubled.—Basque Legend.

¶ Grimm has a similar tale, but the name is Rumpel-stilzchen, and the song was—

> Little dreams my dainty dame,
> Rumpelstilzshen is my name.

Marigold's Prescriptions (Dr.), a Christmas number of All the Year Round for 1865, by Dickens. Dr. Marigold is an itinerant cheap Jack, called "doctor" in compliment to the medical man who attended at his birth, and would only accept a tea-tray for his fee. The death of little Sophy in her father's arms, while he is convulsing the rustic crowd with his ludicrous speeches, is one of the most pathetic touches ever written. I heard Dickens himself read the story.

Mari'na, a shepherdess of unrivalled beauty, loved by Celandine, a neighbouring shepherd "rich in all those gifts which seely hearts bewitch." Celandine despised her love, because it was too easily won, so Marina threw herself into a river, from which she was rescued by a shepherd who fell in love with her. To avoid this new suitor, she threw herself into a well-spring, but was rescued by the presiding god thereof, who declared his devotion to her, and committed her to the charge of a water-nymph. This nymph gave her a draught from the waters of Oblivion, which made her forget all about Celandine. — Browne: Britannia's Pastorals (1613).

Mari'na, daughter of Per'iclês prince of Tyre, born at sea, where her mother Thais'a, as it was supposed, died in giving her birth. Prince Periclês entrusted the infant to Cleon (governor of Tarsus) and his wife Dionys'ia, who brought her up excellently well, and she became most highly accomplished; but when grown to budding womanhood, Dionysia, out of jealousy, employed Le'onine (3 syl.) to murder her. Leonine took Marina to the coast with this intent, but the outcast was seized by pirates, and sold at Metali'nê as a slave. Here Periclês landed on his voyage from Tarsus to Tyre, and Marina was introduced to him to chase away his melancholy. She told him the story of her life, and he perceived at once that she was his daughter. Marina was now betrothed to Lysimachus governor of Metalinê; but, before the espousals, went to visit the shrine of Diana of Ephesus, to return thanks to the goddess; and the priestess was discovered to be Thaisa the mother of Marina.—Shakespeare: Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

Mari'na, wife of Jacopo Fos'cari the doge's son.—Byron: The Two Foscari (1820).

Marinda or MARIDAH, the fair concubine of Haroun-al-Raschid.

Marinda, mother of Doridon "the pride of swains."—Browne: Britannia's Pastorals (1613).

Marine (The Female), Hannah Snell of Worcester. She was present at the attack of Pondicherry. Ultimately she left the service, and opened a public-house in Wapping (London), but still retained her male attire (born 1723).

Mari'nel, the beloved of Florimel "the Fair." Marinel was the son of black-browed Cym'oent (daughter of Nereus and Dumarin), and allowed no one to pass by the rocky cave where he lived without doing battle with him. When Marinel forbade Britomart to pass, she replied, "I mean not thee entreat to pass;" and with her spear knocked him "grovelling on the ground." His mother, with the sea-nymphs, came to him; and the "lily-handed Liagore," who knew leechcraft, feeling his pulse, said life was not extinct. So he was carried to his mother's bower, "deep in the bottom of the sea," where Tryphon (the sea-gods' physician) soon restored him to perfect health. One day, Proteus asked Marinel and his mother to a banquet, and while the young man was sauntering about, he heard a female voice lamenting her hard lot, and saying her hardships were brought about for her love to Marinel. The young man discovered that the person was Florimel, who had been shut up in a dungeon by Proteus for rejecting his suit; so he got a warrant of release from Neptune, and married her.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 8; iv. 11, 12 (1590, 1596).

Mari'ni (J. B.), called Le cavalier Marin, born at Naples. He was a poet, and is known by his poem called Adonis or L'Adone, in twenty cantos (1623). The poem is noted for its description of the "Garden of Venus."

If the reader will . . . read over Ariosto's picture of the garden of paradise, Tasso's garden of Armi'da, and Marini's garden of Venus, he will be persuaded that Milton imitates their manner, but . . . excels the originals.—Thyer.

Mari'no Falie'ro, the forty-ninth doge of Venice, elected 1354. A patrician named Michel Steno, having behaved indecently to some of the ladies at a great civic banquet given by the doge, was turned out of the house by order of the duke. In revenge, the young man wrote a scurrilous libel against the dogaressa, which he fastened to the doge's chair of state. The insult being referred to "the Forty," Steno was condemned to imprisonment for a month. This punishment was thought by the doge to be so inadequate to the offence, that he joined a conspiracy to overthrow the republic. The conspiracy was betrayed by Bertram, one of the members, and the doge, at the age of 76, was beheaded on the "Giants' Staircase."—Byron: Marino Faliero (1819).

(Casimir Delavigne, in 1829, brought out a tragedy on the same subject, and with the same title.)

Marion de Lorme, in whose house the conspirators met. She betrayed all their movements and designs to Richelieu.—Lord Lytton: Richelieu (1839).

Maritor'nes (4 syl.), an Asturian chamber-maid at the Crescent Moon tavern, to which don Quixote was taken by his 'squire after their drubbing by the goat-herds. The crazy knight insisted that the tavern was a castle, and that Maritornes, "the lord's daughter," was in love with him.

She was broad-faced, flat-nosed, blind of one eye, and had a most delightful squint with the other; the peculiar gentility of her shape, however, compensated for every defect, she being about three feet in height, and remarkably hunchbacked.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iii 2 (1605).

Marius (Caius), the Roman general, tribune of the people, B.C. 119; the rival of Sylla.

(Antony Vincent Arnault wrote a tragedy in French entitled Marius à Minturnes (1791). Thomas Lodge, M.D., in 1594, wrote a drama called Wounds of Civil War, lively set forth in the True Tragedies of Marius and Sylla.)

Mar'ivaux (Pierre de Chamblain de), a French writer of comedies and romances (1678–1763).

(S. Richardson is called "The English Marivaux," 1689–1761.)

Marjory of Douglas, daughter of Archibald earl of Douglas, and duchess of Rothsay.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Mark (The Gospel of St.), the second book of the New Testament. It shows us Christ in active life going about doing good, as the First Gospel shows Him mainly as a Teacher.

Mark was no apostle, nor is it known for certain who he was, in what language his Gospel was originally written, nor when it was written.

Mark (Sir), king of Cornwall, who held his court at Tintag'el. He was a wily, treacherous coward, hated and despised by all true knights. One day, sir Dinadan, in jest, told him that sir Launcelot might be recognized by "his shield, which was silver with a black rim." This was, in fact, the cognizance of sir Mordred; but, to carry out the joke, sir Mordred lent it to Dagonet, king Arthur's fool. Then, mounting the jester on a large horse, and placing a huge spear in his hand, the knights sent him to offer battle to king Mark. When Dagonet beheld the coward king, he cried aloud, "Keep thee, sir knight, for I will slay thee!" King Mark, thinking it to be sir Launcelot, spurred his horse to flight. The fool gave chase, rating king Mark "as a woodman [madman]." All the knights who beheld it roared at the jest, told king Arthur, and the forest rang with their laughter. The wife of king Mark was Isond (Ysolde) the Fair of Ireland, whose love for sir Tristram was a public scandal.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 96, 97 (1470).

Mark Tapley, a serving companion of Martin Chuzzlewit, who goes out with him to Eden, in North America. Mark Tapley thinks there is no credit in being jolly in easy circumstances; but when in Eden he found every discomfort, lost all his money, was swindled by every one, and was almost killed by fevers, then indeed he felt it would be a real credit "to be jolly under the circumstances."—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1843).

Markham, a gentleman in the train of the earl of Sussex.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Markham (Mrs.), pseudonym of Mrs. Elizabeth Penrose (born Elizabeth Cartwright), authoress of History of England, etc.

Markleham (Mrs.), the mother of Annie. Devoted to pleasure, she always maintained that she indulged in it for "Annie's sake." Mrs. Markleham is generally referred to as "the old soldier."—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Marksman, one of Fortunio's seven attendants. He saw so clearly and to such a distance, that he generally bandaged his eyes in order to temper the great keenness of his sight.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Fortunio," 1682).

Marlborough (The duke of), John Churchill. He was called by marshal Turenne, Le Bel Anglais (1650–1722). (See MALBROUGH, p. 659.)

Marley, the partner of Scrooge, the grasping, cheating "old sinner." He was dead before the story begins, but his ghost contributes to the conversion of Scrooge.—Dickens: Christmas Carol.

Marlow (Sir Charles), the kind-hearted old friend of squire Hardcastle.

Young Marlow, son of sir Charles. "Among women of reputation and virtue he is the modestest man alive; but his acquaintances give him a very different character among women of another stamp" (act i. sc. 1). Having mistaken Hardcastle's house for an inn, and Miss Hardcastle for the barmaid, he is quite at his ease, and makes love freely. When fairly caught, he discovers that the supposed "inn" is a private house, and the supposed barmaid is the squire's daughter; but the ice of his shyness being broken, he has no longer any difficulty in loving according to his station.—Goldsmith: She Stoops to Conquer (1773).

N.B.—When Goldsmith was between 16 and 17, he set out for Edgworthstown, and finding night coming on, asked a man which was the "best house" in the town—meaning the best inn. The man pointed to the house of sir Ralph Fetherstone (or Mr. Fetherstone), and Oliver, entering the parlour, found the master of the mansion sitting at a good fire. Oliver told him he desired to pass the night there, and ordered him to bring in supper. "Sir Ralph," knowing his customer, humoured the joke, which Oliver did not discover till next day, when he called for his bill. (We are told in Notes and Queries that Ralph Fetherstone was only Mr., but his grandson was sir Thomas.)

Marmaduke Neville, the lover of Sybil Warner in lord Lytton's Last of the Barons (1843).

Marmion, "a Tale of Flodden Field." Lord Marmion was betrothed to Constance de Beverley, but he jilted her for lady Clare an heiress, who was in love with Ralph de Wilton. The lady Clare rejected lord Marmion's suit, and took refuge from him in the convent of St. Hilda, in Whitby. Constance took the veil in the convent of St. Cuthbert, in Holy Isle, but after a time she left the convent clandestinely, was captured, taken back, and buried alive in the walls of a deep cell. In the mean time, lord Marmion, being sent by Henry VIII. on an embassy to James IV. of Scotland, stopped at the hall of sir Hugh de Heron, who sent a palmer as his guide. On his return, lord Marmion commanded the abbess of St. Hilda to release the lady Clare, and place her under the charge of her kinsman, Fitzclare of Tantallon Hall. Here she met the palmer, who was Ralph de Wilton, and as lord Marmion was slain in the battle of Flodden Field, she was free to marry the man she loved.—Sir W. Scott: Marmion (1808).

Marmion (Lord), a descendant of Robert de Marmion, who obtained from William the Conqueror the manor of Scrivelby, in Lincolnshire. This Robert de Marmion was the first royal champion of England, and the office remained in the family till the reign of Edward I., when in default of male issue it passed to John Dymoke, son-in-law of Philip Marmion, in whose family it remains still.

Marner (Silas), "the weaver of Raveloe." He deems himself a waif in the world, but finds hope in a little foundling girl.—George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross): Silas Marner (1861).

Ma'ro, Virgil, whose full name was Publius Virgilius Maro (B.C. 70–19).

Oh, were it mine with sacred Maro's art
To wake to sympathy the feeling heart,
Like him the smooth and mournful verse to dress
In all the pomp of exquisite distress . . .
Then might I . . .
Falconer: The Shipwreck, iii. 5 (1756).

Mar'onites (3 syl.), a religious semi-Catholic sect of Syria, constantly at war with their near neighbours the Druses, a semi-Mohammedan sect. Both are now tributaries of the sultan, but enjoy their own laws. The Maronites number about 400,000, and the Druses about half that number. The Maronites owe their name to J. Maron, their founder; the Druses to Durzi, who led them out of Egypt into Syria. The patriarch of the Maronites resides at Kanobin; the hakem of the Druses at Deir-el-kamar. The Maronites or "Catholics of Lebanon" differ from the Roman Catholics in several points, and have their own pope or patriarch. In 1860 the Druses made on them a horrible onslaught, which called forth the intervention of Europe.

Marotte (2 syl.), footman of Gorgibus; a plain bourgeois, who hates affectation. When the fine ladies of the house try to convert him into a fashionable flunky, and teach him a little grandiloquence, he bluntly tells them he does not understand Latin.

Marotte. Voilà un laquais qui demande si vous êtes au logis, et dit que son maître, vous venir voir.
Madelon. Apprenez, sotte, à vous énoncer moins vulgairement. Dites: Voilà un nécessaire qui demande si vous êtes en commodité d'être visibles.
Marotte. Je n'entends point le Latin.—Molière: Les Précieuses Ridicules, vii. (1659).

Marphi'sa, sister of Roge'ro, and a female knight of amazing prowess. She was brought up by a magician, but being stolen at the age of seven, was sold to the king of Persia. When she was 18, her royal master assailed her honour; but she slew him, and usurped the crown. Marphisa went to Gaul to join the army of Agramant, but subsequently entered the camp of Charlemagne, and was baptized.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Marphu'rius, a doctor of the Pyrrhonian school. Sganarelle consults him about his marriage; but the philosopher replies, "Perhaps; it is possible; it may be so; everything is doubtful;" till at last Sganarelle beats him, and Marphurius says he shall bring an action against him for battery. "Perhaps," replies Sganarelle; "it is possible; it may be so," etc., using the philosopher's own words (sc. ix.).—Molière: Le Mariage Forcé (1664).

Marplot, "the busy body." A blundering, good-natured, meddlesome young man, very inquisitive, too officious by half, and always bungling whatever he interferes in. Marplot is introduced by Mrs. Centlivre in two comedies, The Busy Body and Marplot in Lisbon.

That unlucky dog Marplot . . is ever doing mischief, and yet (to give him his due) he never designs it. This is some blundering adventure, wherein he thought to show his friendship, as he calls it.—Mrs. Centlivre: The Busy Body, iii. 5 (1709).

(This was Henry Woodward's great part (1717–1777). His unappeasable curiosity, his slow comprehension, his annihilation under the sense of his dilemmas, were so diverting, that even Garrick confessed him the decided "Marplot" of the stage.—Boaden: Life of Siddons.)

N.B.—William Cavendish duke of Newcastle brought out a free translation of Molière's L'Étourdi, which he entitled Marplot.

Marprelate (Martin), the pseudonym adopted by the author or authors of a series of powerful but scurrilous tracts published in England during the reign of Elizabeth, and designed to prove the unscriptural character of the prelacy.

Marquis de Basqueville, being one night at the opera, was told by a messenger that his mansion was on fire. "Eh bien," he said to the messenger, "adressez-vous à Mme. la marquise qui est en face dans cette loge; car c'est affaire de ménage."—Chapus: Dieppe et ses Environs (1853).

Marquis d'Evrémonde (Le), an aristocratic French gentleman, cold-hearted, handsome, and selfish. There were two dints at the top of his nostrils which changed colour on any emotion.

He was the uncle of Charles Darnay.—Dickens: A Tale of Two Cities (1859).

Marrall (Jack), a mean-spirited, revengeful time-server. He is the clerk and tool of sir Giles Overreach. When Marrall thinks Wellborn penniless, he treats him like a dog; but immediately he fancies he is about to marry the wealthy dowager lady Allworth, he is most servile, and offers to lend him money. Marrall now plays the traitor to his master, sir Giles, and reveals to Wellborn the scurvy tricks by which he has been cheated of his estates. When, however, he asks Wellborn to take him into his service, Wellborn replies, "He who is false to one master will betray another;" and will have nothing to say to him.—Massinger: A New Way to Pay Old Debts (1628).

Married Clergymen. The first who took to himself a wife in Saxony was Bartholomew Bernard, curé of Kemberg, in 1521.

Married Men of Genius. The number of men of genius unhappy in their wives is very large. The following are notorious examples:—

(1) ADDISON and the countess dowager of Warwick.
(2) BACON (Lord) and Miss Barnham.
(3) BYRON and Miss Milbanke.
(4) DANTE and Gemma Donati.
(5) DICKENS and Miss Hogarth.
(6) DRYDEN and lady Elizabeth Howard.
(7) DURER (Albert) and Agnes Frey.
(8) FELLTHAM (Owen), 1610-1678.
(9) GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS and the flighty Eleonora of Brandenburg.
(10) HAYDN and the daughter of a wig-maker who gave him employment.
(11) HOOKER and Miss Churchill.
(12) JONSON (Ben).
(13) LILY (William) and his second wife.
(14) LYTTON BULWER LYTTON (Lord) and Miss Wheeler.
(15) MARLBOROUGH and Sarah Jennings.
(16) MILTON and two of his wives.
(17) MOLIERE. "Il épousé une jeune fille née de la Bréjart es d'un gentilhomme nommé Modène."—Voltaire.
(18) MORE (Sir Thomas).
(19) RACINE.
(20) SADI, the great Persian poet.
(21) SCALIGER. (This was not J. C. Scaliger, who was most happy in his marriage.)
(22) SHAKESPEARE and Anne Hathaway.
(23) SHELLEY and Harriet Westbrook, from whom he separated. Shelley was very happy with his second wife, Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin.
(24) SOCRATES and Xantippe the scold.
(25) STEELE.
(26) STERNE.
(27) WESLEY and Mrs. Vaseille, his vindictive wife.
(28) WHITFIELD and Mrs. James.
(29) WYCHERLY and the countess of Drogheda.

¶ To these add Aristotle (q.v.), Aristophanes, Boccaccio, Euripides, Periander, Pittacus, etc.

(Moore, Scott, Wordsworth, Gladstone, Browning, Beaconsfield, Benson archbishop of Canterbury, Du Maurier, and others were happy in their wives.)

No doubt the reader will be able to add to the number. As a rule, men of genius are too much courted and too much absorbed to be good domestic husbands.

Mars, divine Fortitude personified. Bacchus is the tutelary demon of the Mohammedans, and Mars the guardian potentate of the Christians.—Camoëns: The Lusiad (1569).

That Young Mars of Men, Edward the Black Prince, who with 8000 men defeated, at Poitiers, the French king Jean, whose army amounted to 60,000—some say even more (A.D. 1356).

The Mars of Men, Henry Plantagenet earl of Derby, third son of Henry earl of Lancaster, and near kinsman of Edward III. (See DERBY, p. 272.)

The Mars of Portugal, Alfonso de Alboquerque, viceroy of India (1452-1515).

Mars Wounded. A very remarkable parallel to the encounter of Diomed and Mars in the Iliad, v., occurs in Ossian. Homer says that Diomed hurled his spear against Mars, which, piercing the belt, wounded the war-god in the bowels: "Loud bellowed Mars, nine thousand men, ten thousand, scarce so loud joining fierce battle." Then Mars ascending, wrapped in clouds, was borne upwards to Olympus.

¶ Ossian, in Carric-Thura, says that Loda, the god of his foes, came like "a blast from the mountain. He came in his terror, and shook his dusky spear. His eyes were flames, and his voice like distant thunder. 'Son of night,' said Fingal, 'retire. Do I fear thy gloomy form, spirit of dismal Loda? Weak is thy shield of cloud, feeble thy meteor sword.'" Then cleft he the gloomy shadow with his sword. It fell like a column of smoke. It shrieked. Then, rolling itself up, the wounded spirit rose on the wind, and the island shook to its foundation.

Mar's Year, the year 1715, in which occurred the rebellion of the earl of Mar.

> Auld uncle John wha wedlock's joys
> Sin Mar's year did desire.
> Burns: Hallowe'en, xy.

Marseillaise. (See KUBLA KHAN, p. 583.)

Marseilles' Good Bishop, Henri François Xavier de Belsunce (1671-1775). Immortalized by his philanthropic diligence in the plague at Marseilles (1720-1728).

¶ Charles Borromēo, archbishop of Milan a century previously (1576), was equally diligent and self-sacrificing in the plague of Milan (1538–1584).

¶ Sir John Lawrence, lord mayor of London during the great plague, supported 40,000 dismissed servants, and deserves immortal honour.

(Darwin refers to Belsunce and Lawrence in his Loves of the Plants, ii. 433.)

Marshal Forwards, Blucher; so called for his dash in battle, and the rapidity of his movements, in the campaign of 1813 (1742–1819).

Marsi, a part of the Sabellian race, noted for magic, and said to have been descended from Circê.

Marsis vi quadam genitali datum, ut serpentium virulentorum domitores sint, et incantationibus herbarumque succis faciant medelarum mira.—Gellius, xvi. 11.

Marsig'lio, a Saracen king, who plotted the attack upon Roland, "under the tree on which Judas hanged himself." With a force of 600,000 men, divided into three companies, Marsiglio attacked the paladin in Roncesvallês, and overthrew him; but Charlemagne, coming up, routed the Saracen, and hanged him on the very tree under which he planned the attack.—Turpin: Chronicle (1122).

Marsilia, "who bears up great Cynthia's train," is the marchioness of Northampton, to whom Spenser dedicated his Daphnaida. This lady was Helena, daughter of Wolfgangus Swavenburgh, a Swede.

No less praiseworthy is Marsilia,
Best known by bearing up great Cynthia's train.
She is the pattern of true womanhead . . .
Worthy next after Cynthia [queen Elizabeth] to tread,
As she is next her in nobility.
Spenser: Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1595).

Mar'syas, the Phrygian flute-player. He challenged Apollo to a contest of skill. Being beaten by the god, he was flayed alive for his presumption.

Mar'tafax and Ler'mites (3 syl.), two famous rats brought up before the White Cat for treason, but acquitted. —Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1682).

Marta'no, a great coward, who stole the armour of Gryphon, and presented himself in it before king Norandi'no. Having received the honours due to the owner, Martano quitted Damascus with Origilla; but Aquilant unmasked the villain, and he was hanged (bks. viii., ix.).—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Marteau. (See HAMMER OF HERETICS, p. 465.)

Martel (Charles), Charles, natural son of Pépin d'Héristal.

N.B.—Mons. Collin de Plancy says that this "palace mayor" of France was not called "Martel" because he martelé ("hammered") the Saracens under Abd-el-Rahman in 732, but because his patron saint was Martellus (or St. Martin).—Bibliothèque des Légendes.

(Thomas Delf, in his translation of Chevereul's Principles of Harmony, etc., of Colours (1847), signs himself "Charles Martel.")

Martext (Sir Oliver), a vicar in Shakespeare's comedy of As You Like It (1600).

MARTHA, sister to "The Scornful Lady" (no name given).—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Scornful Lady (1616). (Beaumont died 1616.)

Martha, the servant-girl at Shaw's Castle.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Martha, the old housekeeper at Osbaldistone Hall.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Martha, daughter of Ralph and Louise de Lascours, and sister of Diana de Lascours. When the crew of the Urania rebelled, Martha, with Ralph de Lascours (the captain), Louise de Lascours, and Barabas, were put adrift in a boat, and cast on an iceberg in "the Frozen Sea." The iceberg broke, Ralph and Louise were drowned, Barabas was picked up by a vessel, and Martha fell into the hands of an Indian tribe, who gave her the name of Orgari'ta ("withered corn"). She married Carlos, but as he married under a false name, the marriage was illegal, and when Carlos was given up to the hands of justice, Orgarita was placed under the charge of her grandmother Mme. de Theringe, and [probably] espoused Horace de Brienne.—Stirling: The Orphan of the Frozen Sea (1856).

Martha, a friend of Margaret. She makes love to Mephistophelês with great worldly shrewdness. — Goethe: Faust (1798).

Martha, alias ULRICA, mother of Bertha who is betrothed to Hereward (3 syl.) and marries him.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Martha (The abbess), abbess of Ephe-

Nunnery. She is a kinswoman of the Glover family.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Martha (Dame), housekeeper to major Bridgenorth.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Marthe, a young orphan, in love with Frédéric Auvray, a young artist, who loves her in return, but leaves her, goes to Rome, and falls in love with another lady, Elena, sister of the duke Strozzi. Marthe leaves the Swiss pastor, who is her guardian, and travels in midwinter to Rome, dressed as a boy, and under the name of Piccolino. She tells her tale to Elena, who abandons the fickle false one, and Frédéric forbids the Swiss wanderer ever again to approach him. Marthe, in despair, throws herself into the Tiber, but is rescued. Frédéric repents, is reconciled, and marries the forlorn maiden.—Guiraud: Piccolino (an opera, 1875).

Marthon, an old cook at Arnheim Castle.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Marthon, alias RIZPAH, a Bohemian woman, attendant on the countess Hameline of Croye.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Martian Laws (not Mercian, as Wharton gives it in his Law Dictionary) are the laws collected by Martia, the wife of Guithelin great-grandson of Mulmutius who established in Britain the "Mulmutian Laws" (q.v.). Alfred translated both these codes into Saxon-English, and called the Martian code Pa Marchitle Lage. These laws have no connection with the kingdom of Mercia. —Geoffrey: British History, iii. 13 (1142)

Guynteline, . . . whose queen, . . . to show her upright mind,
To wise Mulmutius' laws her Martian first did frame.
Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1612).

Martigny (Marie la comptesse de), wife of the earl of Etherington.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

MARTIN, in Swift's Tale of a Tub, is Martin Luther; "John" is Calvin: and "Peter" the pope of Rome (1704).

(The same name occurs in Dr. Arbuthnot's History of John Bull (1712). In Dryden's Hind and Panther, "Martin" means the Lutheran party, 1687.)

Martin, the old verdurer near sir Henry Lee's lodge.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Martin, the old shepherd, in the service of the lady of Avenel.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Martin, the ape, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498).

Martin (Dame), partner of Darsie Latimer at the fishers' dance.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Martin (Sarah), the prison reformer of Great Yarmouth. This young woman, though but a poor dressmaker, conceived a device for the reformation of prisoners in her native town, and continued for twenty-four years her earnest and useful labour of love, acting as schoolmistress, chaplain, and industrial superintendent. In 1835 captain Williams, inspector of prisons, brought her plans before the Government, under the conviction that the nation at large might be benefited by their practical good sense (1791–1843).

Martin Chuzzlewit. (See CHUZZLEWIT, p. 208.)

Martin Weldeck, the miner. His story is read by Lovel to a pic-nic party at St. Ruth's ruins.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Martin's Summer (St.), halcyon days; a time of prosperity; fine weather. L'été de S. Martin, from October 9 to November 11. At the close of autumn we generally have a month of magnificent summer weather.

Assigned am I [Joan of Arc] to be the English scourge . . .
Expect St. Martin's summer, halcyon days,
Since I have entered into these wars.
Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act i. sc. 3 (1580).

(Also called "St. Luke's Summer.")

Martine, wife of Sganarelle. (See SGANARELLE.)—Molière: Le Médecin Malgré Lui (1666).

Martinmas will Come in Due Time, or, give a rogue rope enough, and he'll hang himself; every evil-doer will meet his reward. Martinmas used to be the time for killing hogs for winter store, and the Spanish proverb paraphrased is this: "As the time will certainly come when hogs will be slain, so the time will certainly come when thy sins or faults will be chastised."

Martival (Stephen de), a steward of the field at the tournament.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Martivalle (Martius Galeotti), astrologer to Louis XI. of France.—Sir W.

Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Martyr King (The), Henry VI., buried at Windsor beside Edward IV.

Here o'er the Martyr King [Henry VI.] the marble weeps,
And fast beside him once-feared Edward [IV.] sleeps;
The grave unites where e'en the grave finds rest,
And mingled lie the oppressor and th' opprest.
Pope.

Martyr King (The), Charles I. of England (1600, 1625–1649).

¶ Louis XVI. of France is also called Louis "the Martyr" (1754, 1774–1793).

Martyr of Antioch (The), a dramatic poem by dean Milman (1822).

Martyrs to Science.

Claude Louis count Berthollet, who tested on himself the effects of carbonic acid on the human frame, and died under the experiment (1748–1822).

Giordano Bruno, who was burnt alive for maintaining that matter is the mother of all things (1550–1600).

Galileo, who was imprisoned twice by the Inquisition for maintaining that the earth moved round the sun and not the sun round the earth (1564–1642).

And scores of others.

Marvellous Boy (The), Thomas Chatterton (1752–1770).

I thought of Chatterton, the marvellous boy,
The sleepless soul that perished in his pride.
Wordsworth.

Marwood (Alice), daughter of an old woman who called herself Mrs. Brown. When a mere girl, she was concerned in a burglary and was transported. Carker, manager in the firm of Dombey and Son, seduced her, and both she and her mother determined on revenge. Alice bore a striking resemblance to Edith (Mr. Dombey's second wife), and in fact they were cousins, for Mrs. Brown was "wife" of the brother-in-law of the Hon. Mrs. Skewton (Edith's mother). — Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Marwood (Mistress), jilted by Fainall and soured against the whole male sex. She says, "I have done hating those vipers—men, and am now come to despise them;" but she thinks of marrying, to keep her husband "on the rack of fear and jealousy." — Congreve: The Way of the World (1700).

Mary, the pretty housemaid of the worshipful the mayor of Ipswich (Nupkins). When Arabella Allen marries Mr. Winkle, Mary enters her service, but eventually marries Sam Weller, and lives at Dulwich as Mr. Pickwick's housekeeper.—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Mary, niece of Valentine and his sister Alice. In love with Mons. Thomas.—Fletcher: Mons. Thomas (1619).

Mary. The queen's Marys, four young ladies of quality, of the same age as Mary afterwards "queen of Scots." They embarked with her in 1548, on board the French galleys, and were destined to be her playmates in childhood, and her companions when she grew up. Their names were Mary Beaton (or Bethune), Mary Livingstone (or Leuison), Mary Fleming (or Flemyng), and Mary Seaton (Seton or Seyton).

∴ Mary Carmichael has no place in authentic history, although an old ballad says—

Yestrien the queen had four Marys;
This night she'll hae but three:
There was Mary Beaton, and Mary Seaton,
And Mary Carmichael, and me.

(One of Whyte Melville's novels is called The Queen's Marys.)

Mary Ambree. The English Joan of Arc. Noted for her valour at the siege of Ghent and often referred to by authors.

Joan of Arc and English Mall (q.v.).—S. Butler: Hudibras, pt. i, c. iii. line 366 (1664).

Mary Anne, a slang name for the guillotine; also called L'abbaye de monte-d-regret ("the mountain of mournful ascent"). (See MARIANNE, p. 674.)

Mary Anne, a generic name for a secret republican society in France. (See MARIANNE, p. 674.)—Disraeli: Lothair.

Mary Anne was the red-name for the republic years ago, and there always was a sort of myth that these secret societies had been founded by a woman.
The Mary-Anne associations, which are essentially republic, are scattered about all the provinces of France.
—Lothair.

Mary Graham, an orphan adopted by old Martin Chuzzlewit. She eventually married Martin Chuzzlewit the grandson, and hero of the tale.

"The young girl," said the old man, "is an orphan child, whom . . . I have bred and educated, or, if you prefer the word, adopted. For a year or two she has been my companion, and she is my only one. I have taken a solemn oath not to leave her a sixpence when I die; but while I live, I make her an annual allowance, not extravagant in its amount, and yet not stinted."—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit, iii. (1843).

Mary Stuart, an historical tragedy by J. Haynes (1840). The subject is the death of David Rizzio.

(Schiller has taken Mary Stuart for the subject of a tragedy. P. Lebrun turned the German drama into a French play. Sir W. Scott, in The Abbot, has taken for his subject the flight of Mary to England.)

Mary Tudor. Victor Hugo has a tragedy so called (1833), and Tennyson, in 1878, published a play called Queen Mary, an epitome of her reign.

Mary and Byron. The "Mary" of lord Byron was Miss Chaworth. Both were under the guardianship of Mr. White. Miss Chaworth married John Musters, and lord Byron married Miss Milbanke; both equally unfortunate. Lord Byron, in The Dream, refers to his love affair with Mary Chaworth. (See p. 163.)

Mary and Calais. When Calais was rescued from the English by the duc de Guise, in 1558, queen Mary was so downhearted that she said, at death the word "Calais" would be found imprinted on her heart.

¶ Montpensier said, if his body were opened at death the name of Philip (of Spain) would be found imprinted on his heart.—Motley: The Dutch Republic, pt. ii. 5.

Mary in Heaven, Highland Mary, and Mary Morison. The first of these refers to Mary Campbell, who died 1786, aged 37, ten years older than Burns. The other two refer to Mary Morison, who died young, and to whom Burns was attached before he left Ayrshire for Nithsdale. The two lines in Mary Morison—

> Those smiles and glances let me see,
> That make the miser's treasure poor;

resemble the two following in Highland Mary:—

> Still o'er those scenes my mem'ry wakes,
> And fondly broods with miser care.

Mary of Mode'na, the second wife of James II. of England, and mother of "The Pretender."

> Mamma was to assume the character and stately way of the royal "Mary of Modena."—Percy Fitzgerald: The Parvenu Family, iii. 239.

Mary queen of Scots was confined first at Carlisle; she was removed in 1568 to Bolton; 1569 she was confined at Tutbury, Wingfield, Tutbury, Ashby-de-la-Zouche, and Coventry; in 1570 she was removed to Tutbury, Chatsworth, and Sheffield; in 1577 to Chatsworth; in 1578 to Sheffield; in 1584 to Wingfield; in 1585 to Tutbury, Chartley, Tixhall, and Chartley; in 1586 (September 25) to Fotheringay.

(She is introduced by sir W. Scott in his novel The Abbot.)

N.B.—Schiller has taken Mary Stuart for the subject of his best tragedy, and P. Lebrun brought out in France a French version thereof (1729–1807).

Mary queen of Scots. The most elegant and poetical compliment ever paid to woman was paid to Mary queen of Scots, by Shakespeare, in Midsummer Night's Dream. Remember, the mermaid is "queen Mary;" the dolphin means the "dauphin of France," whom Mary married; the rude sea means the "Scotch rebels;" and the stars that shot from their spheres means "the princes who sprang from their allegiance to queen Elizabeth;" and probably the name Mary and the Latin mare (2 syl.), meaning "the sea," may have suggested the compound word "sea-maid."

> Thou remember'st
> Since once I sat upon a promontory,
> And heard a mermaid, on a dolphin's back,
> Uttering such dulcet and harmonious breath,
> That the rude sea grew civil at her song;
> And certain stars shot madly from their spheres,
> To hear the sea-maid's music.
> Act ii. sc. 2 (1592).

These "stars" were the earl of Northumberland, the earl of Westmoreland, and the duke of Norfolk.

Mary the Maid of the Inn, the delight and sunshine of the parish, about to be married to Richard, an idle, worthless fellow. One autumn night, two guests were drinking at the inn, and one remarked he should not much like to go to the abbey on such a night. "I'll wager that Mary will go," said the other, and the bet was accepted. Mary went, and, hearing footsteps, stepped into a place of concealment, when presently passed her two men carrying a young woman they had just murdered. The hat of one blew off, and fell at Mary's feet. She picked it up, flew to the inn, told her story, and then, producing the hat, found it was Richard's. Her senses gave way, and she became a confirmed maniac for life.—Southey: Mary the Maid of the Inn (from Dr. Plot's History of Staffordshire, 1686).

Mar'savan, foster-brother of the princess Badou'ra.—Arabian Nights ("Camaralzaman and Badoura").

Masaniello, a corruption of [Tom]mas Aniello, a Neapolitan fisherman, who headed an insurrection in 1647 against the duke of Arcos; and he resolved to kill the duke's son for having seduced Fenella his sister, who was deaf and dumb. The insurrection succeeded, and Masaniello was elected by his rabble "chief magistrate of Portici;" but he became intoxicated with his greatness, so the mob shot him, and flung his dead body into a ditch. Next day, however, it was taken out and interred with much ceremony and pomp. When Fenella heard of her brother's death, she threw herself into the crater of Vesuvius.

(Auber has an opera on the subject (1831), the libretto by Scribe. Caraffa had chosen the same subject for an opera previously.)

Mascarille (3 syl.), the valet of La Grange. (See LA GRANGE p. 587.)—Molière: Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659).

(Molière had already introduced the same name in two other of his comedies, L'Etourdi (1653) and Le Dépit Amoureux, 1654.)

Masetto, a rustic engaged to Zerlina; but don Giovanni intervenes before the wedding, and deludes the foolish girl into believing that he means to make her a great lady and his wife.—Mozart: Don Giovanni (libretto by L. da Ponte, 1787).

Mask'well, the "double dealer." He pretends to love lady Touchwood, but it is only to make her a tool for breaking the attachment between Mellefont (2 syl.) and Cynthia. Maskwell pretends friendship for Mellefont merely to throw dust in his eyes respecting his designs to carry off Cynthia, to whom Mellefont is betrothed. Cunning and hyprocrisy are Maskwell's substitutes for wisdom and honesty.—Congreve: The Double Dealer (1700).

Mason (William). The medallion to this poet in Westminster Abbey was by Bacon.

Mass (The). Pope CELESTINUS ordained the introit and Gloria in Excelsis.

Pope GREGORY THE GREAT ordained to say the Kyrie Eleison nine times, and the prayer.

Pope GELASIUS ordained the Epistle and Gospel; and DAMASUS, the Credo.

ALEXANDER inserted in the canon the clause, Qui pridie quam pateretur.

SEXTUS ordained the Sanctus; INNOCENT, the Pax.

LEO introduced the Orāte, Fratres, and the words in the canon, Sanctum Sacrificium, et immaculatam Hostiam.—Edward Kinesman: Lives of the Saints, p. 187 (1623).

Mast (The Tallest). The mainmast of the Merry Dun of Dover was so tall "that the boy who climbed it would be grey with extreme age before he could reach deck again."—Scandinavian Mythology.

Master (The). Goethe is called Der Meister (1749–1832).

I beseech you, Mr. Tickler, not to be so sarcastic on "The Master."—Noctes Ambrosianæ.

Master Adam, Adam Billaut, the French poet (1602–1662).

Master Humphrey's Clock. Intended for a series of tales to be told by Master Humphrey; but only two were published, viz. Barnaby Rudge, and The Old Curiosity Shop.—Dickens (1840–41).

Master Leonard, grand-master of the nocturnal orgies of the demons. He presided at these meetings in the form of a three-horned goat with a black human face.—Middle Age Demonology.

Master Matthew, a town gull.—Ben Jonson: Every Man in His Humour (1598).

We have the cheating humour in the character of "Nym," the bragging humour in "Pistol," the melancholy humour in "Master Stephen," and the quarrelling humour in "Master Matthew."—Edinburgh Review.

Master Stephen, a country gull of melancholy humour. (See MASTER MATTHEW.)—Ben Jonson: Every Man in His Humour (1598).

Master of Sentences, Pierre Lombard, author of a book called Sentences (1100–1164).

Masters (Doctor), physician to queen Elizabeth.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Masters (The Four): (1) Michael O'Clerighe (or Clery), who died 1643; (2) Cucoirighe O'Clerighe; (3) Maurice Conry; (4) Fearfeafa Conry; authors of Annals of Donegal.

Mat Misen, mate of H.M. ship Tiger. The type of a daring, reckless, dare-devil English sailor. His adventures with Harry Clifton in Delhi form the main incidents of Barrymore's melodrama, El Hyder, Chief of the Ghaut Mountains.

Mat-o'-the-Mint, a highwayman in captain Macheath's gang. Peachum says, "He is a promising, sturdy fellow, and diligent in his way. Somewhat too bold and hasty; one that may raise good contributions on the public, if he does not cut himself short by murder."—Gay: The Beggar's Opera, i. (1727).

Matabrune (3 syl.), wife of king Pierron of the Strong Island, and mother of prince Oriant one of the ancestors of Godfrey of Bouillon.—Mediæval Romance of Chivalry.

Mathematical Calculators.

(1) GEORGE PARKES BIDDER, president of the Institution of Civil Engineers (1800–).

(2) JEDEDIAH BUXTON of Elmeton, in Derbyshire. He would tell how many letters were in any one of his father's sermons, after hearing it from the pulpit. He went to hear Garrick, in Richard III., and told how many words each actor uttered (1705-1775).

(3) ZERAH COLBURN of Vermont, U.S., came to London in 1812, when he was eight years old. The duke of Gloucester set him to multiply five figures by three, and he gave the answer instantly. He would extract the cube root of nine figures in a few seconds (1804-1840).

(4) VITO MANGIAMELE, son of a Sicilian shepherd. In 1839 MM. Arago, Lacroix, Libri, and Sturm, examined the boy, then 11 years old, and in half a minute he told them the cube root of seven figures, and in three seconds of nine figures (1818–).

(5) ALFRAGAN, the Arabian astronomer, who died 820.

Mathilde (3 syl.), sister of Gessler the tyrannical governor of Switzerland. In love with Arnoldo a Swiss, who saved her life when it was imperilled by an avalanche. After the death of Gessler, she married the bold Swiss.—Rossini: Guglielmo Tell (an opera, 1829).

Mathis, a German miller, greatly in debt. One Christmas Eve a Polish Jew came to his house in a sledge, and, after rest and refreshment, started for Nantzig, "four leagues off." Mathis followed him, killed him with an axe, and burnt the body in a lime-kiln. He then paid his debts, greatly prospered, and became a highly respected burgomaster. On the wedding night of his only child, Annette, he died of apoplexy, of which he had previous warning by the constant sound of sledge-bells in his ears. In his dream he supposed himself put into a mesmeric sleep in open court, when he confessed everything, and was executed.—Ware: The Polish Jew.

(This is the character which first introduced sir H. Irving to public notice.)

Math'isen, one of the three anabaptists who induced John of Leyden to join their rebellion; but no sooner was John proclaimed "the prophet-king" than the three rebels betrayed him to the emperor. When the villains entered the banquet-hall to arrest their dupe, they all perished in the flames of the burning palace.—Meyerbeer: Le Prophète (an opera, 1849).

Matil'da, sister of Rollo and Otto dukes of Normandy, and daughter of Sophia.—Fletcher: The Bloody Brother (1639).

Matilda, daughter of lord Robert Fitzwalter, a poem of some 650 lines, by Drayton (1594).

Matilda, daughter of Rokeby, and niece of Mortham. Matilda was beloved by Wilfred, son of Oswald; but she herself loved Redmond, her father's page, who turned out to be Mortham's son.—Sir W. Scott: Rokeby (1812).

Matsys (Quintin), a blacksmith of Antwerp, son of one of the greatest of ironworkers. He fell in love with Liza the daughter of Johann Mandyn, the artist. The father declared that none but an artist should have her to wife; so Matsys relinquished his trade, and devoted himself to painting. After a while, he went into the studio of Mandyn to see his picture of the fallen angels; and on the outstretched leg of one of the figures he painted a bee. This was so life-like that, when the old man returned, he proceeded to frighten it off with his handkerchief. When he discovered the deception, and found out it was done by Matsys, he was so delighted that he at once gave Liza to him for wife.

Matthew (The Gospel of St.). One of the four Gospels, written by Matthew a collector of tolls paid for goods and passengers coming to Capernaum by the sea of Galilee. Probably written for Jews, as it is very careful to show how the life of Christ corresponded to the predictions of the Jewish prophets.

Eusebius says, "Matthew then wrote the Divine Oracles in the Hebrew dialect."—Ecclesiastical History, iii. 39.

Matthew Merrygreek, the servant of Ralph Poister Doister. He is a flesh-and-blood representative of "vice" in the old morality-plays.—Nicholas Udall: Ralph Roister Doister (the first English comedy, 1634).

Matthew's Bible, Tindal's version completed by Coverdale and Rogers, dedicated to Henry VIII. in 1537, "under the borrowed name of Thomas Matthews." — Hook: Church Dictionary (5th edit.).

N.B.—This must not be confounded with Matthew Parker's Bible, published in 1572.

Matthias de Monçada, a merchant. He is the father of Mrs. Witherington, wife of general Witherington.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Matthias de Silva (Don), a Spanish beau. This exquisite one day received a challenge for defamation soon after he had retired to bed, and said to his valet, "I would not get up before noon to make one in the best party of pleasure that was ever projected. Judge, then, if I shall rise at six o'clock in the morning to get my throat cut."—Lesage: Gil Blas, iii. 8 (1715).

(This reply was borrowed from the romance of Espinel, entitled Vida del Escudero Marcos de Obregon, 1618.)

Mattie, maidservant of Bailie Nicol Jarvie, and afterwards his wife.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Maud, a dramatic poem by Tennyson. Maud is described as a young lady—

> Faultily faultless, icily regular, splendidly null.
> Tennyson: Maud, I. ii.

Maude (1 syl.), wife of Peter Pratefast, "who loved cleanliness."

> She kepe her dishes from all foulenes;
> And when she lacked clowtes withouten fayle,
> She wyped her dishes with her dogges tayll.
> Hawes: The Passe-tyme of Pleasure, xxix. (1515).

Maugis, the Nestor of French romance. He was one of Charlemagne's paladins, a magician and champion.

∴ In Italian romance he is called "Malagigi" (q.v.).

Maugis d'Aygremont, son of duke Bevis d'Aygremont, stolen in infancy by a female slave. As the slave rested under a white-thorn, a lion and a leopard devoured her, and then killed each other in disputing over the infant. Oriande la fée, attracted to the spot by the crying of the child, exclaimed, "By the powers above, the child is mal gist ("badly nursed")!" and ever after it was called Mal-gist or Mau-gis'. When grown to manhood, he obtained the enchanted horse Bayard, and took from Anthenor (the Saracen) the sword Flamberge. Subsequently he gave both to his cousin Renaud (Renaldo).—Romance of Maugis d'Aygremont et de Vivian son Frère.

∴ In the Italian romance, Maugis is called "Malagigi," Bevis is "Buovo," Bayard is "Bayardo," Flamberge is "Fusberta," and Renaud is "Renaldo."

Maugrabin (Zamet), a Bohemian hung near Plessis lés Tours.

Hayraddin Maugrabin, the "Zingaro," brother of Zamet Maugrabin. He assumes the disguise of Rouge Sanglier, and pretends to be a herald from Liège [Le-aje].—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Mau'graby, son of Hal-il-Maugräby and his wife Yandar. Hal-il-Maugraby founded Dom-Daniel "under the roots of the ocean" near the coast of Tunis, and his son completed it. He and his son were the greatest magicians that ever lived. Maugraby was killed by prince Habed-il-Rouman, son of the caliph of Syria, and with his death Dom-Daniel ceased to exist.—Continuation of Arabian Nights ("History of Maugraby").

> Did they not say to us every day that if we were naughty, the Maugraby would take us?—Continuation of Arabian Nights, iv. 74.

Maugys, a giant who kept the bridge leading to a castle in which a lady was besieged. Sir Lybius, one of the knights of the Round Table, did battle with him, slew him, and liberated the lady.—Libeaux (a romance).

Maul, a giant who used to spoil young pilgrims with sophistry. He attacked Mr. Greatheart with a club; but Greatheart pierced him under the fifth rib, and then cut off his head.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, ii. (1684).

Maul of Monks, Thomas Cromwell, visitor-general of English monasteries, which he summarily suppressed (1490–1540).

Maulstatute (Master), a magistrate. —Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Maun'drel, a wearisome gossip, a chattering woman.

> "Haud your tongue, Maundrel," cried the surgeon, throwing the cobweb on the floor and applying a dressing.—Saxon and Gael, iii. 8.

 This word and the verb to maunder are said to be coined from the name Maundeville. Sir John Mandeville (q.v.) published a book of travels, full of idle tales and maundering gossip.

Mauprat (Adrien de), colonel and chevalier in the king's army; "the wildest gallant and bravest knight of France." He married Julie; but the king accused him of treason for so doing, and sent him to the Bastille. Being released by cardinal Richelieu, he was forgiven and made happy with the blessing of the king.—Lord Lytton: Richelieu (1839).

Maurice Beevor (Sir), a miser, and (failing the children of the countess) heir to the Arundel estates. The countess having two sons (Arthur and Percy), sir Maurice hired assassins to murder them; but his plots were frustrated, and the miser went to his grave "a sordid, spat-upon, revengeless, worthless, and rascally poor cousin."—Lord Lytton: The Sea-Captain (1839).

Mauri-Gasima, an island near Formosa, said to have been sunk in the sea in consequence of the great crimes of its inhabitants.—Kæmpfer: Japan.

¶ The cities of the plain, we are told in the Bible, were sunk under the waters of the Dead Sea for a similar reason.

Mause (Old), mother of Cuddie Headrigg, and a covenanter.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Mauso'lus, king of Caria, to whom his wife Artĕmisia erected a sepulchre which was one of the "Seven Wonders of the World" (B.C. 353).

¶ The chief mausoleums besides this are those of Augustus; Hadrian (now called the castle of St. Angelo) at Rome; Henri II., erected by Catherine de Medicis; St. Peter the Martyr in the church of St. Eustatius, by G. Balduccio; that to the memory of Louis XVI.; and the tomb of Napoleon in Les Invalides, Paris. The one erected by queen Victoria to prince Albert may also be mentioned.

Mauthe Dog, a black spectre dog that haunted the guard-room of Peeltown in the Isle of Man. One day, a drunken trooper entered the guard-room while the dog was there, but lost his speech, and died within three days.—Sir W. Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel, vi. 26 (1805).

This is a curiosity of etymology. Mauthe is the Manx for "dog," and doog for "black," but the resemblance of doog and dog has misled many. Mauthe, Gaelic madadh, "a dog," and doog, the Gaelic adjective dubh. (See Notes and Queries, February 15, 1896, p. 125, col. 2.)

Mauxalin'da, in love with Moore of Moore Hall; but the valiant combatant of the dragon deserts her for Margery, daughter of Gubbins, of Roth'ram Green.—Carey: Dragon of Wantley (1696–1743).

Mavortian, a soldier or son of Mavors (Mars).

Hew dreadfull Mavortian the poor price of a dinner.—Richard Brome: Plays (1653).

Mavournin, Irish for "darling." Erin, mavournin! ("Ireland, my darling!")

Land of my forefathers! "Erin go bragh!"
Buried and cold, when my heart stills her motion,
Green be thy fields, sweetest isle of the ocean!
And thy harp-striking bards sing aloud with devotion,
"Erin, mavournin! Erin go bragh!"
Campbell: Exile of Erin.

(Bragh = braw, to rhyme with "draw," "Erin go bragh!" i.e. "Ireland for ever!")

Mawworm, a vulgar copy of Dr. Cantwell "the hypocrite." He is a most gross abuser of his mother tongue, but believes he has a call to preach. He tells old lady Lambert that he has made several sermons already, but "always does 'em extrumpery" because he could not write. He finds his "religious vocation" more profitable than selling "grocery, tea, small beer, charcoal, butter, brickdust, and other spices," and so comes to the conclusion that it "is sinful to keep shop." He is a convert of Dr. Cantwell, and believes in him to the last.

Do despise me; I'm the prouder for it. I like to be despised.—Bickerstaff: The Hypocrite, iii. 1 (1768).

Max, a huntsman, and the best marksman in Germany. He was plighted to Agatha, who was to be his wife, if he won the prize in the annual match. Caspar induced Max to go to the wolf's glen at midnight and obtain seven charmed balls from Samiel the Black Huntsman. On the day of contest, while Max was shooting, he killed Caspar who was concealed in a tree, and the king in consequence abolished this annual fête.—Weber: Der Freischütz (an opera, 1822).

Maxime (2 syl.), an officer of the prefect Almachius. He was ordered to put to death Valirian and Tibur'cĕ, because they refused to worship the image of Jupiter; but he took pity on them, took them to his house, became converted, and was baptized. When Valirian and Tiburcê were afterwards martyred, Maxime said he saw angels come and carry them to heaven, whereupon Almachius caused him to be beaten with rods "til he his lif gan lete."—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("Second Nun's Tale," 1388).

∴ This is based on the story of "Cecilia" in the Legenda Aurea; and both are imitations of the story of Paul and the jailer of Philippi (Acts xvi. 19–34).

Maximil'ian (son of Frederick III.), the hero of the Teuerdank, the Orlando Furioso of the Germans, by Melchior Pfinzing.

. . . [here] in old heroic days,
Sat the poet Melchior, singing kaiser Maximilian's praise.
Longfellow: Nuremberg.

Maximin, a Roman tyrant.—Dryden: Tyrannic Love or The Royal Martyr.

Maximus (called by Geoffrey, "Maximian"), a Roman senator, who, in 381, was invited to become king of Britain. He conquered Armorica (Bretagne), and "published a decree for the assembling togither there of 100,000 of the common people of Britain, to colonize the land, and 30,000 soldiers to defend the colony." Hence Armorica was called, "The other Britain" or "Little Britain."—Geoffrey: British History, v. 14 (1142).

Got Maximus at length the victory in Gaul,
. . . where, after Gratian's fall,
Armorica to them the valiant victor gave . . .
Which colony . . . is "Little Britain" called.
Drayton: Polyolbion, ix. (1612).

Maxwell, deputy chamberlain at Whitehall.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Maxwell (Mr. Pate), laird of Summertrees, called "Pate in Peril;" one of the papist conspirators with Redgauntlet.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Maxwell (The Right Hon. William), lord Evandale, an officer in the king's army.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

May, a girl who married January a Lombard baron 60 years old. (See the MERCHANT'S TALE.)—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (1388).

May unlucky for Brides. This was an old Roman superstition; in this month were held the festivals of Bona Dea (the goddess of chastity), and the feasts of the dead called Lemuralia. Mary queen of Scotland married Bothwell, the murderer of her husband lord Darnley, on May 12.

Mense malum Maio nubere vulgus ait.
Ovid: Fastorum, v.

May-Day (Evil), May 1, 1517, when the London apprentices rose up against the foreign residents and did incalculable mischief. This riot began May 1, and lasted till May 22. (See VORTIGERN, etc.)

May Queen (The), a poem in three parts by Tennyson (1842). Alice, a bright-eyed, merry child, was chosen May queen, and, being afraid she might oversleep herself, told her mother to be sure to call her early.

I sleep so sound all night, mother, that I shall never wake,
If you do not call me loud when the day begins to break:
But I must gather knots of flowers, and buds and garlands gay,
For I'm to be queen o' the May, mother, I'm to be queen o' the May.

The old year passed away, and the black-eyed, rustic maiden was dying. She hoped to greet the new year before her eyes closed in death, and bade her mother once again to be sure to call her early; but it was not now because she slept so soundly. Alas! no.

Good night, sweet mother: call me before the day is born.
All night I lie awake, but I fall asleep at morn;
But I would see the sun rise upon the glad New Year,
So, if you're waking, call me, call me early, mother dear.

The day rose and passed away, but Alice lingered on till March. The snowdrops had gone before her, and the violets were in bloom. Robin had dearly loved the child, but the thoughtless village beauty, in her joyous girlhood, tossed her head at him, and never thought of love; but now that she was going to the land of shadows, her dying words were—

And say to Robin a kind word, and tell him not to fret;
There's many a worthier than I, would make him happy yet.
If I had lived—I cannot tell—I might have been his wife;
But all these things have ceased to be, with my desire of life.

Maye (The), that subtile and abstruse sense which the goddess Maya inspires. Plato, Epicharmos, and some other ancient philosophers refer it to the presence of divinity. "It is the divinity which stirs within us." In poetry it gives an inner sense to the outward word, and in common minds it degenerates into delusion or second sight. Maya is an Indian deity, and personates the "power of creation."

Hartmann possède la Mâye, . . . il laisse pénétrer dans ses écrits les sentiments, et les pensées dont son âme est remplie, et cherche sans cesse à resoudre les antithèses.
Weber's Histoire de la Littérature Allemande.

Mayeux, a stock name in France for a man deformed, vain, and licentious, but witty and brave. It occurs in a large number of French romances and caricatures.

Mayflower, a ship of 180 tons, which, in December, 1620, started from Plymouth, and conveyed to Massachusetts, in North America, 102 puritans, called the "Pilgrim Fathers," who named their settlement New Plymouth.

. . . the Mayflower sailed from the harbour [Plymouth],
Took the wind on her quarter, and stood for the open Atlantic,
Borne on the sand of the sea, and the swelling hearts of the pilgrims.
Longfellow: Courtship of Miles Standish, v. (1858).

Men of the Mayflower, the Pilgrim Fathers, who went out in the Mayflower to North America in 1620.

Mayflower (Phœbe), servant at sir Henry Lee's lodge.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstoock (time, Commonwealth).

Maylie (Mrs.), the lady of the house attacked burglariously by Bill Sikes and others. Mrs. Maylie is mother of Harry Maylie, and aunt of Rose Fleming who lives with her.

She was well advanced in years, but the high-backed oaken chair in which she sat was not more upright than she. Dressed with the utmost nicety and precision in a quaint mixture of bygone costume, with some slight concessions to the prevailing taste, which rather served to point the old style pleasantly than to impair its effect, she sat in a stately manner, with her hands folded before her.—Dickens: Oliver Twist ch. xxix.

Harry Maylie, Mrs. Maylie's son. He turned a clergyman and married his cousin Rose Fleming.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Mayor of Garratt (The). Garratt is between Wandsworth and Tooting. The first mayor of this village was elected towards the close of the eighteenth century, and the election came about thus: Garratt Common had often been encroached on, and in 1780 the inhabitants associated themselves together to defend their rights. The chairman was called Mayor, and as it happened to be the time of a general election, the society made it a law that a new "mayor" should be elected at every general election. The addresses of these mayors, written by Foote, Garrick, Wilks, and others, are satires and political squibs. The first mayor of Garratt was "sir" John Harper, a retailer of brickdust; and the last was "sir" Harry Dimsdale, a muffin-seller (1796). In Foote's farce so called, Jerry Sneak, son-in-law of the landlord, is chosen mayor (1763).

Mayors (Lord) who have founded noble houses—

	Lord Mayor.
AVELAND (Lord), from sir Gilbert Heathcote	1711
BACON (Lord), from sir Thomas Cooke, draper	1557
BATH (Marquis of), from sir Rowland Heyward, cloth-worker	1570
BRAYBROOKE (Lord), from sir John Gresham, grocer	1547
BROOKE (Lord), from sir Samuel Dashwood, vintner	1708
BUCKINGHAM (Duke of), from sir John Gresham, grocer	1547
COMPTON (Lord), from sir Wolston Dixie, skinner	1585
CRANBOURNE (Viscount), from sir Christopher Gascoigne	1753
DENBIGH (Earl of), from sir Godfrey Fielding, mercer	1452
DONNE (Viscount), from sir Gilbert Heathcote	1711
FITZWILLIAM (Earl of), from sir Thomas Cooke, draper	1567
PALMERSTON (Lord), from sir John Houblon, grocer	1695
SALISBURY (Marquis of), from sir Thomas Cooke, draper	1587
WARWICK (Earl of), from sir Samuel Dashwood, vintner	1708
WILTSHIRE (Earl of), from sir Godfrey Boleine (queen Elizabeth was his granddaughter)	1457

Maypole (The), the nickname given to Erangard Melosine de Schulemberg, duchess of Kendal, the mistress of George I., on account of her leanness and height (1719, died 1743).

Mazagran, in Algeria. Ever since the capture of this town by the French, black coffee diluted with cold water for a beverage has been called un Mazagran.

Mazarin of Letters (The), D'Alembert (1717-1783).

Mazarine (A), a common councilman of London; so called from the mazarine-blue silk gown worn by this civil functionary.

Maseppa (Jan), a hetman of the Cossacks, born of a noble Polish family in Podolia. He was a page in the court of Jan Casimir king of Poland, and while in this capacity intrigued with Theresia the young wife of a Podolian count, who discovered the amour, and had the young page lashed to a wild horse, and turned adrift. The horse rushed in mad fury, and dropped down dead in the Ukraine, where Mazeppa was released by a Cossack, who nursed him carefully in his own hut. In time the young page became a prince of the Ukraine, but fought against Russia in the battle of Pultowa. Lord Byron (1819) makes Mazeppa tell his tale to Charles XII. after the battle (1640-1709).

(Bulgarin has made this story the subject of a novel; and Horace Vernet of two paintings.)

"Muster Richardson" had a fine appreciation of genius, and left the original "Mazeppa" at Astley's a handsome legacy [1760-1836].—Mark Lemon.

M. B. Waistcoat, a clerical waistcoat. M. B. means "Mark [of the] Beast;" so called because, when these waistcoats were first worn by protestant clergymen (about 1830), they were stigmatized as indicating a popish tendency.

He smiled at the folly which stigmatized an M. B. waistcoat.—Mrs. Oliphant: Phœbe, Junr., ii. 1.

Meadows (Sir William), a kind country gentleman, the friend of Jack Eustace and father of young Meadows.

Young Meadows left his father's home because the old gentleman wanted him to marry Rosetta, whom he had never seen. He called himself Thomas, and entered the service of justice Woodcock as gardener. Here he fell in love with the supposed chamber-maid, who proved to be Rosetta, and their marriage fulfilled the desire of all the parties interested.—Bickerstaff: Love in a Village.

Charles Dignum made his début at Drury Lane, in 1784, in the character of "Young Meadows." His voice was so clear and full-toned, and his manner of singing so judicious, that he was received with the warmest applause.—Dictionary of Musicians.

Meagles (Mr.), an eminently "practical man," who, being well off, travelled over the world for pleasure. His party consisted of himself, his daughter Pet, and his daughter's servant called Tattycoram. A jolly man was Mr. Meagles; but clear-headed, shrewd, and persevering.

Mrs. Meagles, wife of the "practical man," and mother of Pet.—Dickens: Little Dorrit (1857).

Meal-Tub Plot, a fictitious conspiracy concocted by Dangerfield for the purpose of cutting off those who opposed the succession of James duke of York, afterwards James II. The scheme was concealed in a meal-tub in the house of Mrs. Cellier (1685).

Measure for Measure. There was a law in Vienna that made it death for a man to live with a woman not his wife; but the law was so little enforced that the mothers of Vienna complained to the duke of its neglect. So the duke deputed Angelo to enforce it; and, assuming the dress of a friar, absented himself awhile, to watch the result. Scarcely was the duke gone, when Claudio was sentenced to death for violating the law. His sister Isabel went to intercede on his behalf, and Angelo told her he would spare her brother if she would become his Phrynê. Isabel told her brother he must prepare to die, as the conditions proposed by Angelo were out of the question. The duke, disguised as a friar, heard the whole story, and persuaded Isabel to "assent in words," but to send Mariana (the divorced "wife" of Angelo) to take her place. This was done; but Angelo sent the provost to behead Claudio, a crime which "the friar" contrived to avert. Next day, the duke returned to the city, and Isabel told her tale. The end was, the duke married Isabel, Angelo took back his wife, and Claudio married Juliet whom he had seduced.—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure (1603). (See MARIANA, p. 673.)

(This story is from Whetstone's comedy of Promos and Cassandra (1578). A similar story is given also in Giraldi Cinthio's third decade of stories.)

Medam'othi, the island at which the fleet of Pantag'ruel landed on the fourth day of their voyage. Here many choice curiosities were bought, such as "the picture of a man's voice," an "echo drawn to life," "Plato's ideas," some of "Epicuros's atoms," a sample of "Philome'la's needlework," and other objects of virtu to be obtained nowhere else.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, iv. 3 (1545).

(Medamothi is a compound Greek word, meaning "never in any place." So Utopia is a Greek compound, meaning "no place;" Kennaquhair is a Scotch compound, meaning "I know not where;" and Kennakhwhar is Anglo-Saxon for the same. All these places are in 91° north lat. and 180° 1′ west long., in the Niltalê Ocean.)

Medea, a famous sorceress of Colchis, who married Jason the leader of the Argonauts, and aided him in getting possession of the golden fleece. After being married ten years, Jason repudiated her for Glaucê; and Medea, in revenge, sent the bride a poisoned robe, which killed both Glaucê and her father. Medea then tore to pieces her two sons, and fled to Athens in a chariot drawn by dragons.

(The story has been dramatized in Greek, by Euripidês; in Latin, by Seneca and by Ovid; in French, by Corneille Médée, 1635), Longepierre (1695), and Legouve (1849); in English, by Glover, 1761.)

Mrs Yates was a superb "Medea."—Campbell.

N.B.—Ovid, in his Heroïdes (4 syl.), has an hypothetical letter, in Latin verse, supposed to be written by Medea to Jason after his marriage with Creüsa (daughter of king Creon), reminding him of all she had done for him, and reproving him for his infidelity. It is well known that Medea sent the bride a poisoned robe, which caused her death; and, after a time, Jason himself was killed by the mast of the Argo falling on his head.

Mede'a and Absyr'tus. When Medea fled with Jason from Colchis (in Asia), she murdered her brother Absyrtus, and, cutting the body into several pieces, strewed the fragments about, that the father might be delayed in picking them up, and thus be unable to overtake the fugitive.

Meet I an infant of the duke of York,
Into as many gobbets will I cut it
As wild Medea young Absyrtus did.
Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI. act v. sc. 2 (1591).

Mede'a's Kettle. Medea the sorceress cut to pieces an old ram, threw the parts into her caldron, and by her incantations changed the old ram into a young lamb. The daughters of Pelias thought they would have their father restored to youth, as Æson had been. So they killed him, and put the body in Medea's caldron; but Medea refused to utter the needful incantation, and so the old man was not restored to life. (See VRAN.)

Change the shape, and shake off age. Get thee Medea's kettle, and be boiled anew.—Congreve: Love for Love, iv. (1695).

Médecin Malgré Lui (Le), a comedy by Molière (1666). The "enforced doctor" is Sganarelle, a faggot-maker, who is called in by Géronte to cure his daughter of dumbness. (The rest of the tale is given under GERONTE, No. 2.)

(In 1733 Fielding produced a farce called The Mock Doctor, which was based on this comedy. The doctor he calls "Gregory," and Géronte "sir Jasper." Lucinde, the dumb girl, he calls "Charlotte," and Anglicizes her lover Léandre into "Leander.")

Medham ("the keen"), one of Mahomet's swords.

Medicine. So the alchemists called the matter (whatever it might be) by which they performed their transformations: as, for example, the "philosopher's stone," which was to transmute whatever it touched into gold; "the elixir of life," which was to renew old age to youth.

How much unlike art thou, Mark Antony!
Yet, coming from him, that great medicine hath
With his tinct gilded thee.
Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, act I. sc. 5 (1608).

The Father of Medicine, Aretæos of Cappadocia (second and third centuries).

¶ Also Hippoc'ratês of Cos (B.C. 460–357).

Medi'na, the Golden Mean personified. Step-sister of Elissa (parsimony) and Perissa (extravagance). The three sisters could never agree on any subject. —Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. (1590).

Meditations among the Tombs, a prose work of a similar order to Sturm's Reflections, and Young's Night Thoughts; by Hervey (1746).

Mediterranean Sea (The Key of the), the fortress of Gibraltar.

Medley (Matthew), the factotum of sir Walter Waring. He marries Dolly, daughter of Goodman Fairlop the woodman.—Dudley: The Woodman (1771).

Medo'ra, the beloved wife of Conrad the corsair. When Conrad was taken captive by the pacha Seyd, Medora sat day after day expecting his return, and feeling the heart-anguish of hope deferred. Still he returned not, and Medora died. In the mean time, Gulnare, the favourite concubine of Seyd, murdered the pacha, liberated Conrad, and sailed with him to the corsair's island home. When, however, Conrad found Medora was dead, he quitted the island, and went no one knew whither. The sequel of the story forms the poem called Lara.—Byron: The Corsair (1814).

Medo'ro, a Moorish youth of extraordinary beauty, but of humble race; page to Agramante. Being wounded, Angelica dressed his wounds, fell in love with him, married him, and retired with him to Cathay, where, in right of his wife, he became king. This was the cause of Orlando's madness.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

When don Roldan [Orlando] discovered in a fountain proofs of Angelica's dishonourable conduct with Medoro, it distracted him to such a degree that he tore up huge trees by the roots, sullied the purest streams, destroyed flocks, slew shepherds, fired their huts, pulled houses to the ground, and committed a thousand other most furious exploits worthy of being reported in fame's register.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iii. 11 (1605).

Medulla Theologiæ, a controversial treatise by William Ames (1623).

Medulla Theologica, a theological work by Louis Abelli bishop of Rhodes (1604–1691). It is alluded to by Boileau, in the Lutrin, iv. (1683).

Medu'sa (The Soft), Mary Stuart queen of Scots (1542–1587).

> Rise from thy bloody grave,
> Thou soft Medusa of the "Fated Line,"
> Whose evil beauty looked to death the brave!
> Lord Lytton: Ode, i. (1839).

Meeta, the "maid of Mariendorpt," a true woman and a true heroine. She is the daughter of Mahldenau, minister of Mariendorpt, whom she loves almost to idolatry. Her betrothed is major Rupert Roselheim. Hearing of her father's captivity at Prague, she goes thither on foot to crave his pardon.—Knowles: The Maid of Mariendorpt (1838).

Meg, a pretty, bright, dutiful girl, daughter of Toby Veck, and engaged to Richard, whom she marries on New Year's Day.—Dickens: The Chimes (1844).

Meg Dods, the old landlady at St. Ronan's Well.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Meg Merrilies, a half-crazy sibyl, the ruler of the gipsy race. She was the nurse of Harry Bertram.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

 In Terry's dramatized version of Guy Mannering, Miss Cushman was an inimitable Meg Merrilies. It was one of the finest pieces of acting I ever saw (1818–1876). The words of her part were poor stuff, but her look, her gestures, her tone of voice, her coming on and going off, were all eloquent.

Meg Murdochson, an old gipsy thief, mother of Madge Wildfire.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Megid'don, the tutelar angel of Simon the Canaanite. This Simon, "once a shepherd, was called by Jesus from the field, and feasted Him in his hut with a lamb."—Klopstock: The Messiah, iii. (1748).

Megingjard, the belt of Thor, whereby his strength was doubled.

Megissog'won ("the great pearl-feather"), a magician, and the Manîto of wealth. It was Megissogwon who sent the fiery fever on man, the white fog, and death. Hiawatha slew him, and taught man the science of medicine. This great Pearl-Feather slew the father of Niko'mis (the grandmother of Hiawatha). Hiawatha all day long fought with the magician without effect; at nightfall the woodpecker told him to strike at the tuft of hair on the magician's head, the only vulnerable place; accordingly, Hiawatha discharged his three remaining arrows at the hair-tuft, and Megissogwon died.

> Honour be to Hiawatha!
> He hath slain the great Pearl-Feather;
> Slain the mightiest of magicians—
> Him that sent the fiery fever, . . .
> Sent disease and death among us.
> Longfellow: Hiawatha, ix. (1855).

Megnoun. (See MEJNOUN.)

Meg'ra, a lascivious lady in the drama called Philaster or Love Lies a-bleeding, by Beaumont and Fletcher (1608).

Meigle, in Strathmore, the place where Guinever, Arthur's queen, was buried.

Meiklehose (Isaac), one of the elders of Roseneath parish.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Meiklewham (Mr. Saunders), "the man of law," in the managing committee of the Spa hotel.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Meister (Wilhelm), the hero and title of a novel by Goethe, the object of which is to show that man, despite his errors and shortcomings, is led by a guiding hand, and reaches some higher aim at last (1821).

Meistersingers, or minstrel tradesmen of Germany. An association of master tradesmen, to revive the national minstrelsy, which had fallen into decay with the decline of the minnesingers or love-minstrels (1350–1523). Their subjects were chiefly moral or religious, and constructed according to rigid rules. The three chief were Hans Rosenblüt (armorial painter, born 1450), Hans Folz (surgeon, born 1479), and Hans Sachs (cobbler, 1494–1574). The next best were Heinrich von Mueglen, Konrad Harder, Master Altschwert, Master Barthel Regenbogen (the blacksmith), Muscablut (the tailor), and Hans Blotz (the barber).

Mej'noun and Lei'lah (a syl.), a Persian love tale, the Romeo and Juliet of Eastern romance. They are the most beautiful, chaste, and impassionate of lovers; the models of what lovers would be if human nature were perfect.

When he sang the loves of Megnôun and Leileh . . . tears insensibly overflowed the cheeks of his auditors. —Beckford. Vathek (1786).

Melan'chates (4 syl.), the hound that killed Actæon, and was changed into a hart.

Melanchates, that hound
That plucked Acteon to the grounde,
Gaue him his mortal wound, . . .
Was chaunged to a harte.
Skelton: Philip Sparrow (time, Henry VIII.).

Melancholy (The Anatomy of), a book full of quotations, Greek, Latin, German, Italian, French, and English. It treats of philosophy, medicine, poetry, astrology, music, etc. It first shows what melancholy means, then branches off into its seat, varieties, causes, symptoms, cure; it first takes melancholy generally, and then descends to special kinds of melancholy. It is one of the most erudite books ever published, and is a mine of wealth to authors and orators. —Robert Burton (1621).

(Dr. T. Bright wrote a Treatise on Melancholy (1586); and Thomas Wharton a poem on The Pleasures of Melancholy, 1745.)

Nothing so dainty sweet as lovely melancholy.
Beaumont and Fletcher.

Melantius, a rough, honest soldier, who believes every one is true till convicted of crime, and then is he a relentless punisher. Melantius and Diph'ilus are brothers of Evadnê.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Maid's Tragedy (1610).

 The master scene between Antony and Ventidius in Dryden's All for Love is copied from The Maid's Tragedy. "Ventidius" is in the place of Melantius.

Melchior, one of the three kings of Cologne. He was the "Wise Man of the East" who offered to the infant Jesus gold, the emblem of royalty. The other two were Gaspar and Balthazar. Melchior means "king of light."

Melchior, a monk attending the black priest of St. Paul's.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Melchior (i.e. Melchior Pfinzing), a German poet who wrote the Teuerdank, an epic poem which has the kaiser Maximilian (son of Frederick III.) for its hero. This poem was the Orlando Furioso of the Germans.

Sat the poet Melchior, singing kaiser Maximilian's praise.
Longfellow: Nuremberg.

Melea'ger, son of Althæa, who was doomed to live while a certain log remained unconsumed. Althæa kept the log for several years, but being one day angry with her son, she cast it on the fire, where it was consumed. Her son died at the same moment.—Ovid: Metam., viii. 4.

 Sir John Davies uses this to illustrate the immortality of the soul. He says that the life of the soul does not depend on the body as Meleager's life depended on the fatal brand.

Again, if by the body's prop she stand—
If on the body's life her life depend,
As Meleager's on the fatal brand;
The body's good she only would intend.
Reason, iii. (1622).

Melesig'enes (5 syl.). Homer is so called from the river Melês (2 syl.), in Asia Minor, on the banks of which some say he was born.

. . . various-measured verse,
Æolian charms and Dorian lyric odes,
And his who gave them breath, but higher sung,
Blind Melesigênês, thence Homer called,
Whose poem Phœbus challenged for his own.
Milton: Paradise Regained (1671).

Me'li (Giovanni), a Sicilian, born at Palermo; immortalized by his eclogues and idylls. Meli is called "The Sicilian Theocritus" (1740–1815).

Much it pleased him to peruse
The songs of the Sicilian Muse—
Bucolic songs by Meli sung.
Longfellow: The Wayside Inn (prelude, 1863).

Meliades (4 syl.), an anagram of Miles a De[o], "God's Soldier." So prince Henry (son of James I.) called himself; and, at his death, W. Drummond wrote an elegy, called Tears on the Death of Meliades (1613).

(Froissart compiled the verses written by the duke of Brabant, and added some of his own. He called the collection Meliador, or The Knight of the Golden Sun, about 1390.)

Meliadus, father of sir Tristan; prince of Lyonnesse, and one of the heroes of Arthurian romance.—Tristan de Leonois (1489).

 Tristan, in the History of Prince Arthur, compiled by sir T. Malory (1470), is called "Tristram;" but the old minne singers of Germany (twelfth century) called the name "Tristan."

Meli'be (3 syl.), a rich young man married to Prudens. One day, when Melibê was in the fields, some enemies broke into his house, beat his wife, and wounded his daughter Sophie in her feet, hands, ears, nose, and mouth. Melibê was furious and vowed vengeance, but Prudens persuaded him "to forgive his enemies, and to do good to them who despitefully used him." So he called together his enemies, and forgave them, to the end that "God of His endeles mercie wole at the tyme of our deyinge forgive us oure giltes that we have trespased to Him in this wreeched world." —Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (1388).

(This prose tale is a literal translation of a French story, called Livre de Melibée et de dame Prudence, which is a free translation of the Latin story of Albertano de Brescia.—See MS. Reg., xix. 7; and MS. Reg., xix. 11, British Museum.)

Melibee, a shepherd, and the reputed father of Pastorella. Pastorella married sir Calidore.—Spenser; Faërie Queene, vi. 9 (1596).

("Melibee" is sir Francis Walsingham. In the Ruins of Time Spenser calls him "Melibœ." Sir Philip Sidney (the "sir Calidore" of the Faërie Queene) married his daughter Frances. Sir Francis Walsingham died in 1590, so poor that he did not leave enough to defray his funeral expenses.)

Melibœ'an Dye, a rich purple. So called because Melibœa of Thessaly was famous for the ostrum, a fish used in dying purple.

> A military vest of purple flowed,
> Livelier than Melibœan.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, xi. 242 (1665).

Melibœus, one of the shepherds in Eclogue i. of Virgil.

Spenser, in the Ruins of Time (1591), calls sir Francis Walsingham "the good Melibœ;" and in the last book of the Faërie Queene he calls him "Melibee."

Melin'da, cousin of Sylvia. She loves Worthy, whom she pretends to dislike, and coquets with him for twelve months. Having driven her modest lover to the verge of distraction, she relents, and consents to marry him.—Farquhar: The Recruiting Officer (1705).

Mel'ior, a lovely fairy, who carried off in her magic bark, Parthen'opex of Blois to her secret island.—Parthenopex de Blois (a French romance, twelfth century).

Melisen'dra (The princess), natural daughter of Marsilio, and the "supposed daughter of Charlemagne." She eloped with don Gayferos. The king Marsilio sent his troops in pursuit of the fugitives. Having made Melisendra his wife, don Gayferos delivered her up captive to the Moors at Saragossa. This was the story of the puppet-show of Master Peter, exhibited to don Quixote and his 'squire at "the inn beyond the hermitage."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. ii. 7 (1615).

Melissa, a prophetess who lived in Merlin's cave. Bradamant gave her the enchanted ring to take to Roge'ro; so, under the form of Atlantês, she went to Alcina's isle, delivered Rogêro, and disenchanted all the captives in the island.

In bk. xix. Melissa, under the form of Rodŏmont, persuaded Agramant to break the league which was to settle the contest by single combat, and a general battle ensued.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

¶ This incident of bk. xix. is similar to that in Homer's Iliad, iii., iv., where Paris and Menelāos agree to settle the contest by single combat; but Minerva persuades Pandāros to break the truce, and a general battle ensues.

(There is a Melissa in Tennyson's Princess, 1847.)

Me'lita (now Malta). The point to which the vessel that carried St. Paul was driven was the "Porto de San Paolo," and according to tradition the cathedral of Citta Vecchia stands on the site of the house of Publius the Roman governor. St. Paul's grotto, a cave in the vicinity, is so named in honour of the great apostle.

Meli'tus, a gentleman of Cyprus, in the drama called The Laws of Candy, by Beaumont and Fletcher (1647).

Melixyus, king of Thessaly, in the golden era of Saturn. He was the first to tame horses for the use of man.

> In whose time reigned also in Thessayle (a cyte),
> A parte of Grece, the kyng Melizyus,
> That was right strong and fierce in battaile;
> By whose labours, as the storye sheweth us,
> He brake first horses, wilde and rigorous,
> Teaching his men on them right wel to ryde;
> And he himselfe did first the horse bestride.
> Hawes: The Passe-tyme of Pleasure, l. (1515).

Meliz'yus (King) held his court in the Tower of Chivalry, and there knighted Graunde Amoure, after giving him the following advice:—

> And first Good Hope his legge harneyes should be;
> His habergion, of Perfect Ryghteousnes,
> Gird first with the girdle of Chastitie;
> His rich placarde should be good busines,
> Brodred with Alms . . .
> The helmet Mekenes, and the sheilde Good Fayth,
> His swerde God's Word, as St. Paule sayeth.
> Hawes: The Passe-tyme of Pleasure, xxviii. (1515).

Mell (Mr.), the poor, down-trodden second master at Salem House, the school of Mr. Creakles. Mr. Mell played the flute. His mother lived in an almshouse, and Steerforth used to taunt Mell with this "degradation," and indeed caused him to be discharged. Mell emigrated to Australia, and succeeded well in the new country.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Melle'font (a syl.), in love with Cynthia daughter of sir Paul Pliant. His aunt, lady Touchwood, had a criminal fondness for him, and because he repelled her advances she vowed his ruin. After passing several hair-breadth escapes from the "double dealing" of his aunt and his "friend" Maskwell, he succeeded in winning and marrying the lady of his attachment. — Congreve: The Double Dealer (1700).

Mellifluous Doctor (The), St. Bernard, whose writings were called "a river of paradise" (1091-1153).

Melnotte (Claude), a gardener's son, in love with Pauline "the Beauty of Lyons," but treated by her with contempt. Beauseant and Glavis, two other rejected suitors, conspired with him to humble the proud fair one. To this end, Claude assumed to be the prince of Como, and Pauline married him, but was indignant when she discovered how she had been duped. Claude left her to join the French army, and, under the name of Morier, rose in two years and a half to the rank of colonel. He then returned to Lyons, and found his father-in-law on the eve of bankruptcy, and Pauline about to be sold to Beauseant to pay the creditors. Claude paid the money required, and claimed Pauline as his loving and truthful wife.—Lord Lytton: Lady of Lyons (1838).

Melo (Juan de), born at Castile in the fifteenth century. A dispute having arisen at Esalo'na upon the question whether Achillês or Hector were the braver warrior, the marquis de Ville'na called out, "Let us see if the advocates of Achillês can fight as well as prate." At the word, there appeared in the assembly a gigantic fire-breathing monster, which repeated the same challenge. Every one shrank back except Juan de Melo, who drew his sword and placed himself before king Juan II. to protect him, "tide life, tide death." The king appointed him alcaydê of Alcala la Real, in Grana'da, for his loyalty.—Chronica de Don Alvaro de Luna.

Melrose (Violet), an heiress, who marries Charles Middlewick. This was against the consent of his father, because Violet had the bad taste to snub the retired tradesman, and considered vulgarity as the "unpardonable sin."

Mary Melrose, Violet's cousin, but without a penny. She marries Talbot Champneys; but his father, sir Geoffry, wanted him to marry Violet the heiress.—H. J. Byron: Our Boys (a comedy, 1875).

Melusi'na, the most famous of the fées of France. Having enclosed her father in a mountain for offending her mother, she was condemned to become a serpent every Saturday. When she married the count of Lusignan, she made her husband vow never to visit her on that day, but the jealousy of the count made him break his vow. Melusina was, in consequence, obliged to leave her mortal husband, and roam about the world as a ghost till the day of doom. Some say the count immured her in the dungeon wall of his castle.—Jean d'Arras (fourteenth century).

 The cry of despair given by the fée when she discovered the indiscreet visit of her husband, is the origin of the phrase, Un cri de Mélusine ("A shriek of despair").

Melvil (Sir John), a young baronet, engaged to be married to Miss Sterling, the elder daughter of a City merchant, who promises to settle on her £80,000. A little before the marriage, sir John finds that he has no regard for Miss Sterling, but a great love for her younger sister Fanny, to whom he makes a proposal of marriage. His proposal is rejected; and it is soon brought to light that Miss Fanny has been clandestinely married to Lovewell for four months.—Colman and Garrick: The Clandestine Marriage (1766).

MELVILLE (Major), a magistrate at Cairnvreckan village.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Melville (Sir Robert), one of the embassy from the privy council to Mary queen of Scots.—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Melville, the father of Constantia.—Macklin: The Man of the World (1764).

Melville (Julia), a truly noble girl, in love with Faulkland, who is always jealous of her without a shadow of cause. She receives his innuendoes without resentment, and treats him with sincerity and forbearance (see act i. 2).—Sheridan: The Rivals (1775).

Melyhalt (The lady), a powerful subject of king Arthur, whose domains sir Galiot invaded; notwithstanding which, the lady chose sir Galiot as her fancy knight and chevalier.

MEMNON, king of the Ethiopians. He went to the assistance of his uncle Priam, and was slain by Achillês. His mother Eos, inconsolable at his death, weeps for him every morning, and her tears constitute what we call dew.

Memnon, the black statue of king Amen'ophis III. at Thebes, in Egypt, which, being struck with the rays of the morning sun, gives out musical sounds. Kircher says these sounds are due to a sort of clavecin or Æolian harp enclosed in the statue, the cords of which are acted upon by the warmth of the sun. Cambyses, resolved to learn the secret, cleft the statue from head to waist; but it continued to utter its morning melody notwithstanding.

> . . . old Memnon's image, long renowned
> By fabling Nilus; to the quivering touch
> Of Titan's ray, with each repulsive string
> Consenting, sounded thro' the warbling air
> Unbidden strains.
> Akenside: Pleasures of Imagination, i. (1744).

Memnon, "the mad lover," general of As'torax king of Paphos.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Mad Lover (1617).

Memnon, the title of a novel by Voltaire, the object of which is to show the folly of aspiring to too much wisdom.

Memnon's Sister, He'mera, mentioned by Dictys Cretensis.

> Black, but such as in esteem
> Prince Memnon's sister might beseem.
> Milton: Il Penseroso (1638).

Memoirs of P.P., a "parish clerk," written by Dr. Arbuthnot, in ridicule of Burnet's History of My Own Times (1723-1734). The parish clerk is pompous, wordy, pugnacious, and conceited.

Memorable (The Ever-), John Hales of Eton (1584-1656).

Memory. The persons most noted for their memory are—

(1) MAGLIABECHI of Florence, called "The Universal Index and Living Cyclopædia" (1633-1714).

(2) P. J. BERONICIUS, the Greek and Latin improvisator, who knew by heart Horace, Virgil, Cicero, Juvenal, both the Plinys, Homer, and Aristophănês. He died at Middleburgh, in 1676.

(3) ANDREW FULLER, after hearing 500 lines twice, could repeat them without a mistake. He could also repeat verbatim a sermon or speech; could tell either backwards or forwards every shop sign from the Temple to the extreme end of Cheapside, and the articles displayed in each of the shops.

(4) "Memory" WOODFALL could carry in his head a debate, and repeat it a fortnight afterwards.

(5) "Memory" THOMPSON could repeat the names, trades, and particulars of every shop from Ludgate Hill to Piccadilly.

(6) WILLIAM RADCLIFF, the husband of the novelist, could repeat a debate the next morning.

Garrick could repeat his part by reading it once over. I have more than once heard Woodham, a Fellow of Jesus, repeat a column of the Times after reading it once over.

(See PANJANDRUM.)

Memory (The Bard of), Samuel Rogers, author of the Pleasures of Memory (1762-1855).

(Tennyson wrote an Ode to Memory, 1830.)

Men of Prester John's Country. Prester John, in his letter to Manuel Comnēnus, says his land is the home of men with horns; of one-eyed men (the eye being in some cases before the head, and in some cases behind it); of giants forty ells in height (i.e. 120 feet); of the phœnix, etc.; and of ghouls who feed on premature children. He gives the names of fifteen different tributary states, amongst which are those of Gog and Magog (now shut in behind lofty mountains); but at the end of the world these fifteen states will overrun the whole earth.

Menalcas, any shepherd or rustic. The name occurs in the Idylls of Theoc'ritos, the Eclogues of Virgil, and the Shepheardes Calendar of Spenser.

Men'cia of Mosquera (Donna) married don Alvaro de Mello. A few days after the marriage, Alvaro happened to quarrel with don An'drea de Baesa and kill him. He was obliged to flee from Spain, leaving his bride behind, and his property was confiscated. For seven years she received no intelligence of his whereabouts (for he was a slave most of the time), but when seven years had elapsed the report of his death in Fez reached her. The young widow now married the marquis of Guardia, who lived in a grand castle near Burgos; but walking in the grounds one morning she was struck with the earnestness with which one of the under-gardeners looked at her. This man proved to be her first husband, don Alvaro, with whom she now fled from the castle; but on the road a gang of robbers fell upon them. Alvaro was killed, and the lady taken to the robbers' cave, where Gil Blas saw her and heard her sad tale. The lady was soon released, and sent to the castle of the marquis of Guardia. She found the marquis dying from grief, and indeed he died the day following, and Mencia retired to a convent.—Lesage: Gil Blas, i. 11-14 (1715).

Mendo'za, a Jew prize-fighter, who held the belt at the close of the eighteenth century; and in 1791 opened the Lyceum in the Strand, to teach "the noble art of self-defence."

I would have dealt the fellow that abused you such a recompense in the fifth button, that my friend Mendoza should not have placed it better.—Cumberland: Shiva the Jew, iv. 2 (1776).

There is a print often seen in old picture shops, of Humphreys and Mendoza sparring, and a queer angular exhibition it is. What that is to the modern art of boxing, Quick's style of acting was to Dowton's. —Records of a Stage Veteran.

Mendoza (Isaac), a rich Jew, who thinks himself monstrously wise, but is duped by every one. (See under ISAAC, p. 529.)—Sheridan: The Duenna (1775).

John Kemble (1757-1823) once designed to play "Macheath" [Beggar's Opera, by Gay], a part about as much suited to him as "Isaac Mendoza." It is notorious that he persisted in playing "Charles Surface" in the School for Scandal [Sheridan], till some wag said to him, "Mr. Kemble, you have often given us 'Charles's martyrdom,' when shall we have his restoration?"—W. G. Russell: Representative Actors, 143.

Menech'mians, persons exactly like each other, as the brothers Dromio. So called from the Menœchmi of Plautus.

Menec'rates (4 syl.), a physician of Syracuse, of unbounded vanity and arrogance. He assumed to himself the title of Jupiter, and in a letter to Philip king of Macedon he began thus: "Menecratês Jupiter to king Philip greeting." Being asked by Philip to a banquet, the physician was served only with frankincense, like the gods; but Menecratês was greatly offended, and hurried home.

Such was Menecratês of little worth,
Who Jove, the saviour, to be called presumed,
To whom of incense Philip made a feast,
And gave pride scorn and hunger to digest.
Brooke: Inquisition upon Fame, etc. (1554-1608).

Mene'via, St. David's, in Wales. A corruption of Henemenew, its old British name.

Mengs (John), the surly innkeeper at Kirchhoff village.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Menippee (Satyre), a famous political satire, written during the time of what is called in French history the Holy League, the objects of which were to exterminate the huguenots, to confine the king (Henri III.) in a monastery, and to crown the duc de Guise. The satire is partly in verse, and partly in prose; and its object is to expose the perfidious intentions of Philip of Spain and the culpable ambition of the Guises.

It is divided into two parts, the first of which is entitled Catholicon d'Espagne, by Pierre Leroy (1593), exposing those who had been corrupted by the gold of Spain; the second part is entitled Abrégé des Etats de la Ligue, by Gillot, Pithou, Rapin, and Passerat, published 1594.

 Menippus was a cynic philosopher and poet of Gadara, in Phœnicia, who wrote twelve books of satires in prose and verse.

(Varro wrote in Latin a work called The Satires of Menippus (Satyræ Menippeæ).)

Menteith (The earl of), a kinsman of the earl of Montrose. He marries Annot Lyle, the heroine.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Mentor, a wise and faithful adviser or guide. So called from Mentor, a friend of Ulyssês, whose form Minerva assumed when she accompanied Telemachos in his search for his father.—Fénelon: Télémaque (1700).

Mephistoph'eles (5 syl.), the sneering, jeering, leering attendant demon of Faust in Goethe's drama of Faust, and Gounod's opera of the same name. Marlowe calls the name "Mephostophilis" in his drama entitled Dr. Faustus. Shakespeare, in his Merry Wives of Windsor, writes the name "Mephostophilus;" and in the opera he is called "Mefistofele" (5 syl.). In the old demonology, Mephistophelês was one of the seven chief devils, and second of the fallen archangels.

Mephostophilis, the attendant demon of Faustus, in Marlowe's tragedy of Dr. Faustus (1589).

There is an awful melancholy about Marlowe's "Mephostophilis," perhaps more expressive than the malignant mirth of that fiend in the renowned work of Goethe.—Hallam.

Mephostophilus, the spirit or familiar of sir John Faustus or [Dr.]

John Faust (Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, 1596). Subsequently it became a term of reproach, about equal to "imp of the devil."

Mercer (Major), at the presidency of Madras.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Merchant of Venice (The), Anthonio, who borrowed 3000 ducats for three months of Shylock a Jew. The money was borrowed to lend to a friend named Bassanio, and the Jew, "in merry sport," instead of interest, agreed to lend the money on these conditions: If Anthonio paid it within three months, he should pay only the principal; if he did not pay it back within that time, the merchant should forfeit a pound of his own flesh, from any part of his body the Jew might choose to cut it off. As Anthonio's ships were delayed by contrary winds, he could not pay the money, and the Jew demanded the forfeiture. On the trial which ensued, Portia, in the dress of a law doctor, conducted the case, and, when the Jew was going to take the forfeiture, stopped him by saying that the bond stated "a pound of flesh," and that therefore he was to shed no drop of blood, and he must cut neither more nor less than an exact pound, on forfeit of his life. As these conditions were practically impossible, the Jew was nonsuited and fined for seeking the life of a citizen.—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice (1598).

¶ The story is in the Gesta Romanorum, the tale of the bond being ch. xlviii., and that of the caskets ch. cix.; but Shakespeare took his plot from a Florentine novelette called Il Pecorone, written in the fourteenth century, but not published till the sixteenth.

¶ There is a ballad on the subject, the date of which has not been determined. The bargain runs thus—

> "No penny for the loane of it,
> For one year shall you pay—
> You may doe me a good turne,
> Before my dying day;
> But we will have a merry jest,
> For to be talkéd long:
> You shall make a bond," quoth he,
> "That shall be large or strong.
> And this shall be the forfeyture,
> Of your owne fleshe a pound;
> If you agree, make you the bond,
> And there's a hundred crownes.

(The Jew is called "Gernutus.")

¶ Loki laid a wager with Brock, and lost. He wagered his head; but saved himself by the plea that Brock might take his head, but might not touch his neck.—Skaldd 35 (Simrock's Edda, p. 305).

Merchant's Tale (The), in Chaucer, is substantially the same as the first Latin metrical tale of Adolphus (1315), and is not unlike a Latin prose tale given in the appendix of T. Wright's edition of Æsop's fables. The tale is this—

A girl named May married January, an old Lombard baron 60 years of age, but entertained the love of Damyan, a young squire. She was detected in familiar intercourse with Damyan, but persuaded her husband that his eyes had deceived him, and he believed her, for what is better than "a fruitful wife and a confiding spouse"?—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (1388).

∴ The tale has been modernized by Ogle and Pope.

Mercian Laws. (See MARTIAN, p. 681.)

Mercilla, a "maiden queen of great power and majesty, famous through all the world, and honoured far and nigh." Her kingdom was disturbed by a soldan, her powerful neighbour, stirred up by his wife Adicia. The "maiden queen" is Elizabeth; the "soldan," Philip of Spain; and "Adicia" is injustice, presumption, or the bigotry of popery.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. (1596).

Mercurial Finger (The), the little finger.

> The thumb, in chiromancy, we give Venus;
> The fore-finger to Jove; the midst to Saturn;
> The ring to Sol; the least to Mercury.
> Ben Jonson: The Alchemist, I. 2 (1610).

Mercu'tio, kinsman of prince Escalus, and Romeo's friend. An airy, sprightly, elegant young nobleman, so full of wit and fancy that Dryden says Shakespeare was obliged to kill him in the third act, lest the poet himself should have been killed by Mercutio.—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet (1598).

> Mercutio's wit, gaiety, and courage will always procure him friends that wish him a longer life; but his death is not precipitated—he has lived out the time allotted him in the construction of the play.—Dr. Johnson.
> The light and fanciful humour of Mercutio serves to enhance and illustrate the romantic and passionate character of Romeo.—Sir W. Scott: The Drama.
> William Lewis (1748-1811) was the "Mercutio" of the age, in every sense of the word "mercurial." His airy, breathless voice, thrown to the audience before he appeared, was the signal of his winged animal spirits; and when he gave a glance of his eye, or touched with his finger at another's ribs, it was the very punctum saliens of playfulness and lumenade.—Hunt: The Town (1848).

Mercutio of Actors (The), William Lewis (1748–1811).

Mr. Lewis displayed in acting a combination rarely to be found—that of the fop and the real gentleman. With a voice, a manner, and a person, all equally graceful and airy, and features at once whimsical and genteel, he played on the top of his profession like a plume.—Hunt: The Town (1848).

Mercy, a young pilgrim, who accompanied Christiana in her walk to Zion. When Mercy got to the Wicket Gate, she swooned from fear of being refused admittance. Mr. Brisk proposed to her, but, being told that she was poor, left her, and she was afterwards married to Matthew, the eldest son of Christian.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, ii. (1684).

Merdle (Mr.), banker, a skit on the directors of the Royal British Bank, and on Mr. Hudson "the railway king." Mr. Merdle, of Harley Street, was called the "Master Mind of the Age." He became insolvent, and committed suicide. Mr. Merdle was a heavily made man, with an obtuse head, and coarse, mean, common features. His chief butler said of him, "Mr. Merdle never was a gentleman, and no ungentlemanly act on Mr. Merdle's part would surprise me." The great banker was "the greatest forger and greatest thief that ever cheated the gallows."

Lord Decimus [Barnacle] began waving Mr. Merdle about . . . as Gigantic Enterprise, The Wealth of England, Credit, Capital, Prosperity, and all manner of blessings.—Bk. ii. 24.

Mrs. Merdle, wife of the bank swindler. After the death of her husband, society decreed that Mrs. Merdle should still be admitted among the sacred few; so Mrs. Merdle was still received and patted on the back by the upper ten.—Dickens: Little Dorrit (1857).

MEREDITH (Mr.), one of the conspirators with Redgauntlet.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Meredith (Mr. Michael), "the man of mirth," in the managing committee of the Spa hotel.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Meredith (Sir), a Welsh knight.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Meredith (Owen), pseudonym of lord Lytton's son, who succeeded to the title in 1873.

(George Meredith, novelist and poet, born in 1828, must not be confounded with Owen Meredith.)

Me'rida (Marchioness), betrothed to count Valantia.—Inchbald: Child of Nature.

Meridarpax, the pride of mice.

Now nobly towering o'er the rest, appears
A gallant prince that far transcends his years
Pride of his sire, and glory of his house,
And more a Mars in combat than a mouse;
His action bold, robust his ample frame,
And Meridarpax his resounding name.
Parnell: The Battle of the Frogs and Mice, iii. (about 1722).

Meridies or "Noonday Sun," one of the four brothers who kept the passages of Castle Perilous. So Tennyson has named him; but in the History of Prince Arthur he is called "sir Permonès, the Red Knight."—Tennyson: Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette"); sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 129 (1470).

Merlin (Ambrose), prince of enchanters. His mother was Matilda, a nun, who was seduced by a "guileful sprite" or incubus, "half angel and half man, dwelling in mid-air betwixt the earth and moon." Some say his mother was the daughter of Pubidius lord of Mathtraval, in Wales; and others make her a princess, daughter of Demetius king of Demet'ia. Blaise baptized the infant, and thus rescued it from the powers of darkness.

 Merlin died spell-bound, but the author and manner of his death are given differently by different authorities. Thus, in the History of Prince Arthur (sir T. Malory, 1470) we are told that the enchantress Nimue or Ninive enveigled the old man, and "covered him with a stone under a rock." In the Morte d' Arthur it is said "he sleeps and sighs in an old tree, spell-bound by Vivien." Tennyson, in his Idylls ("Vivien"), says that Vivien induced Merlin to take shelter from a storm in a hollow oak tree, and left him spell-bound. Others say he was spell-bound in a hawthorn bush, but this is evidently a blunder. (See MERLIN THE WILD.)

 Merlin made "the fountain of love," mentioned by Bojardo in Orlando Innamorato, i. 3.

Ariosto, in Orlando Furioso, says he made "one of the four fountains" (ch. xxvi.).

He also made the Round Table at Carduel for 150 knights, which came into the possession of king Arthur on his marriage with queen Guinever; and brought from Ireland the stones of Stonehenge on Salisbury Plain.

(Allusion is made to him in the Faërie Queene; in Ellis's Specimens of Early English Metrical Romances; in Drayton's Polyolbion; in Kenilworth, by sir W. Scott, etc. T. Heywood has attempted to show the fulfilment of Merlin's prophecies.)

Of Merlin and his skill what region doth not hear! . . .
Who of a British nymph was gotten, whilst she played
With a seducing sprite . . . .
But all Demetia thro' there was not found her peer.
Drayton: Polyolbion, v. (1612).

The English Merlin, W. Lilly, the astrologer, who assumed the name of "Mer'linus Anglicus" (1602–1681).

Merlin the Wild, a native of Caledonia, who lived in the sixteenth century, about a century after the great Ambrose Merlin the sorcerer. Fordun, in his Scotichronicon, gives particulars about him. It was predicted that he would die by earth, wood, and water, which prediction was fulfilled thus: A mob of rustics hounded him, and he jumped from a rock into the Tweed, and was impaled on a stake fixed in the river-bed. His grave is still shown beneath an aged hawthorn bush at Drummelzier, a village on the Tweed.

Merlin's Cave, in Dynevor near Carmarthen, noted for its ghastly noises of rattling iron chains, brazen caldrons, groans, strokes of hammers, and ringing of anvils. The cause is this: Merlin set his spirits to fabricate a brazen wall to encompass the city of Carmarthen, and, as he had to call on the Lady of the Lake, bade them not slacken their labour till he returned; but he never did return, for Vivian by craft got him under the enchanted stone, and kept him there. Tennyson says he was spell-bound by Vivien in a hollow oak tree, but the History of Prince Arthur (sir T. Malory) gives the other version.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 3 (1590).

Merop's Son, a nobody, a terræ filius, who thinks himself somebody. Thus Phaëton (Merop's son), forgetting that his mother was an earthborn woman, thought he could drive the horses of the sun, but, not being able to guide them, nearly set the earth on fire. Many presume, like him, and think themselves capable or worthy of great things, forgetting all the while that they are only "Merop's son."

Why, Phaëton (for thou art Merop's son),
Wilt thou aspire to guide the heavenly car,
And with thy daring folly burn the world?
Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona, act iii. sc. 1 (1594).

Merrilies (Meg). (See MEG MERRILIES, p. 692.)

Merry Andrew, Andrew Borde, physician to Henry VIII. (1500–1549).
(Prior has a poem on Merry Andrew.)

Merry Monarch (The), Charles II. of England (1630, 1660–1685).

Merry Wives of Windsor (The), a comedy by Shakespeare (1596). The plot is this: Sir John Falstaff makes love to Mrs. Ford, but Mrs. Ford and Mrs. Page, the "merry wives," befool him to the top of their bent. They play him three tricks: (1) In his love-making he is interrupted by the approach of Ford, so they cram him into a buck-basket, cover him with foul linen, and toss him into the Thames. (2) Being invited again to visit Mrs. Ford, he is again interrupted by the approach of Mr. Ford, and he is disguised as Old Mother Prat. Ford hates Old Mother Prat, and, meeting sir John thus disguised, beats him black and blue. (3) He is next invited to meet the "merry wives" in Windsor Park, disguised as Herne the Hunter, with a buck's head. Here pretended fairies burn him with "trial-fire," and pinch him without mercy. Mrs. Ford, Mrs. Page, and Mr. Ford make him their laughing-stock, and the moral is that women may make themselves merry and have their jokes, and yet remain virtuous and true.

Mer'rylegs, a highly trained performing dog, belonging to signor Jupe, clown in Sleary's circus. This dog leaves the circus when his master disappears, but several years afterwards finds his way back and dies.—Dickens: Hard Times (1854).

Merse (1 syl.), Berwick, the mere or frontier of England and Scotland.

Merthyr Tydvil (Welsh). The English version of the name is Martyr St. Tidfil, a Welsh martyr-princess.

Merton (Tommy), one of the chief characters in Sandford and Merton, a tale for boys, by Thomas Day (1783–9).

Merton (Tristram). Thomas Babington lord Macaulay so signs the ballads and sketches which he inserted in Knight's Quarterly Magazine.

Mertoun (Basil), alias VAUGHAN, formerly a pirate.
Mordaunt Mertoun, son of Basil Mertoun. He marries Brenda Troil.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Merveilleuse [Mair-vay'-use], the sword of Doolin of Mayence. It was so sharp that, if placed edge downwards on a block of wood, it would cut through it.

Mervett (Gustavus de), in Charles XII., an historical drama by J. R. Planché (1826).

Mervinia, Merionethshire. On the Mervin Hills the British found security when driven by the Saxons out of England. Here the Welsh laws were retained longest. This part of Wales is peculiarly rich in mountains, meres, and springs.

Mervinia for her hills . . . especial audience craves.
Drayton: Polyolbion, ix. (1612).

Mervyn (Mr. Arthur), guardian of Julia Mannering.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Mesopota'mia or Cubitopolis, the district about Warwick and Eccleston Squares, in London, mainly built by Cubit.

Messali'na, wife of the emperor Claudius of Rome. Her name is a by-word for incontinency (A.D. *-48).

She is not one of those Messalinas who, belying the pride of birth, humble their affections even to the dust, and dishonour themselves without a blush.—Lesage: Gil Blas, iv. 1 (1724).

Oh thou epitomé of thy virtuous sex, Madam Messalina II., retire to thy apartment!—Dryden: The Spanish Fryar, iii. 1 (1680).

When I meet a Messalina, tired and unsated in her foul desires,—a Clytemnestra, bathed in her husband's blood,—an impious Tullia, whirling her chariot over her father's breathless body,—horror invades my faculties.—Cibber: Love Makes a Man (1700).

The Modern Messalina, Catherine II. of Russia (1729-1796).

Messalina of Germany, Barbary of Cilley, second wife of kaiser Sigismund of Germany (fifteenth century).

Messiah (The), an epic poem in fifteen books, by F. G. Klopstock. The first three were published in 1748, and the last in 1773. The subject is the last days of Jesus, His crucifixion and resurrection. Bk. i. Jesus ascends the Mount of Olives, to spend the night in prayer. Bk. ii. John the Beloved failing to exorcise a demoniac, Jesus goes to his assistance; and Satan, rebuked, returns to hell, where he tells the fallen angels his version of the birth and ministry of Christ, whose death he resolves on. Bk. iii. Messiah sleeps for the last time on the Mount of Olives; the tutelar angels of the twelve apostles, and a description of the apostles are given. Satan gives Judas a dream, and then enters the heart of Caiaphas. Bk. iv. The council in the palace of Caiaphas decree that Jesus must die; Jesus sends Peter and John to prepare the Passover, and eats His Last Supper with His apostles. Bk. v. The three hours of agony in the garden. Bk. vi. Jesus, bound, is taken before Annas, and then before Caiaphas. Peter denies his Master. Bk. vii. Christ is brought before Pilate; Judas hangs himself; Pilate sends Jesus to Herod, but Herod sends Him again to Pilate, who delivers Him to the Jews. Bk. viii. Christ nailed to the cross. Bk. ix. Christ on the cross. Bk. x. The death of Christ. Bk. xi. The vail of the temple rent, and the resurrection of many from their graves. Bk. xii. The burial of the body, and death of Mary the sister of Lazarus. Bk. xiii. The resurrection and suicide of Philo. Bk. xiv. Jesus shows Himself to His disciples. Bk. xv. Many of those who had risen from their graves show themselves to others. Conclusion.

(English versions: In prose, by Collyer in 1763, and by Raffles in 1815; in verse, by Egestorff in 1821.)

Messiah, an oratorio by Handel (1749). The libretto was by Charles Jennens, nicknamed "Soliman the Magnificent."

Messiah (The), a sacred eclogue." Pope, in imitation of Virgil's Polio (1712).

Metamorphoses, a series of tales in Latin verse by Ovid, chiefly mythological (B.C. 43-A.D. 18). They are hexameters, in fifteen books. The Latin begins with the creation of the world and ends with the deification of Cæsar and the reign of Augustus. English version in rhymes, bks. i., iii. by Addison, bk. iv. by Eusden, bk. v. by Mainwaring, bks. vi. and xi. by Croxall, bk. vii. by Tate and Stonestreet, bk. ix. by Gay and others, bk. x. by Congreve and others, bk. xiv. by Garth. The rest by Dryden, viz. bks. i. and xii., and by Dryden and others bks. viii., xiii., xv. All collected into a single volume (1716). Versions by Golding (1565), by Sandys (1626).

Metanoi'a, Repentance personified, by William Browne in Britannia's Pastorals, v. (Greek, mĕtanoia, "repentance.")

Faire Metanoia is attending
To crowne thee with those joys that know no ending.
Pastorals, v. 1 (1613).

Metasta'sio. The real name of this Italian poet was Trapassi (death). He was brought up by Gravina, who Grecized the name (1698-1782).

 So "Melancthon" is the Greek form of Schwarzerde ("black earth"); "Œcolampadius" is the Greek form of the German name Hausschein; "Desiderius Erasmus" is Gheraerd Gheraerd (the first "Gheraerd" is Latinized into Desiderius, and the latter is Grecized into Erasmus).

Meteoric Stones. In the museum of Carlton (Melbourne) is preserved a huge meteoric stone twenty-five tons in weight. It fell on a large plain between Melbourne and Kilmore in 1860, with such force that it sank six feet in the ground. Some said it must have been shot from a crater of the moon.

∴ The largest in the world is in Brazil, and exceeds thirty tons. There is another in the Imperial Museum at St. Petersburg, of unusual dimensions; and one is preserved in Paris.

Meth'os, Drunkenness personified. He is twin-brother of Gluttony, their mother being Caro (fleshly lust). In the battle of Mansoul, Methos is slain by Agneia (wifely chastity) spouse of Encrateës (temperance) and sister of Parthenia (maiden chastity). (Greek, methē or methus is "drunkenness.")—Fletcher: The Purple Island, vii., xi. (1633).

Mistophis, the corrupt chief minister of Sesostris.

Il savait l'ame aussi corrumpue et aussi artificieuse que Sesostris était sincère et généreux.—Fénelon: Télémaque (1700).

Mexitli, chief god and idol of the Aztecas. He leaped full-grown into life, and with a spear slew those who mocked his mother Coatlan'tona (4 syl.).

Already at [his mother's breast] the blow was aimed,
When forth Mexitli leapt, and in his hand
The angry spear.
Southey: Madoc, ii. 21 (1805).

¶ Of course, it will be remembered that Minerva, like Mexitli, was born full-grown and fully armed.

Meynard, in Boucicault's Corsican Brothers (1848). In Dumas' novel, Dumas himself fills the rôle of Meynard.

Mezen'tius, king of the Tyrrhenians, who put criminals to death by tying them face to face with dead bodies.—Virgil: Æneid, viii. 485.

This is like Mezentius in Virgil . . . Such critics are like dead coals; they may blacken, but cannot burn.—Broome: Preface to Poems (1730).

Mezentius and Lausus, an episode in Virgil's Æneid. Ænēas attacked Mezentius, but his son Lausus interposed and was slain. Mezentius takes to flight, but when he finds that Lausus is dead, he mounts his horse Phœbus and defies the Trojan. Ænēas kills the horse, and Mezentius slays himself.—Æneid, bk. x. (the latter part).

The death of the horse is 891–894.

Mezzora'mia, an earthly paradise in Africa, accessible by only one road. Gaudentio di Lucca discovered the road, and lived at Mezzoramia for twenty-five years.—Berington: Gaudentio di Lucca.

M. F. H., Master [of the] Fox-hounds.

"He can't stand long before 'em at this pace," said the M. F. H., coming up with his huntsman.—Whyte Melville: Uncle John.

Micawber (Mr. Wilkins), a most unpractical, half-clever man, a great speechifier, letter-writer, projector of bubble schemes, and, though confident of success, never succeeding. Having failed in everything in the old country, he migrated to Australia, and became a magistrate at Middlebay.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

N.B.—This truly amiable, erratic genius is a portrait of Dickens's own father, "David Copperfield" being Dickens, and "Mrs. Nickleby" (one can hardly believe it) is said to be Dickens's mother.

Mice (King of the), Troartes (gnaw-loaf) τρώω, to gnaw, ἄρτος, a loaf (of bread).

Mi'chael (2 syl.), the special protector and guardian of the Jews. This archangel is messenger of peace and plenty.—Sale's Korân, ii. notes.

∴ That Michael was really the protector and guardian angel of the Jews we know from Dan. x. 13, 21; xii. 1.

(Milton makes Michael the leader of the heavenly host in the war in heaven. Gabriel means "God's power." He was next in command to the archangel Michael.)

Go, Michael, of celestial armies prince.
Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 44 (1665).

N.B.—Longfellow, in his Golden Legend, says that Michael is the presiding spirit of the planet Mercury, and brings to man the gift of prudence ("The Miracle-Play," iii., 1851).

Michael, the "trencher favourite" of Arden of Feversham, in love with Maria sister of Mosby. A weak man, who both loves and honours Arden, but is inveigled by Mosby to admit ruffians into Arden's house to murder him.—Lillo: Arden of Feversham (1592).

Michael god of Wind (St.). At the promontory of Malea is a chapel built to St. Michael, and the sailors say when the wind blows from that quarter, it is occasioned by the violent motion of St. Michael's wings. Whenever they sail by that promontory, they pray St. Michael to keep his wings still.

St. Michael's Chair. It is said that any woman who has sat on Michael's chair (on St. Michael's Mount, Cornwall), will rule her husband ever after. (See KEYNE, ST., p. 566.)

Michael Angelo of Battle-Scenes (The), Michael Angelo Cerquozzi of Rome (1600–1660).

Michael Angelo of France, Jean Cousin (1500–1590).

Michael Angelo de Kermesses, Peter van Laar, called Le Bamboche, born at Laaren (1613–1673).

Or Michel-Ange des Bamboches.

Michael Angelo of Music, Johann Christoph von Glück (1714–1787).

Michael Angelo of Sculptors, Pierre Puget (1623–1694).

Réné Michael Slodtz is also called the same (1705–1764).

Michael Angelo of the Lyre, Palestrina (1529–1594).

Michael Angelo Titmarsh, one of the pseudonyms under which Thackeray contributed to Fraser's Magazine (1811–1863).

Michael Armstrong, "the factory boy." The hero and title of a novel by Mrs. Trollope (1839). The object of this novel is to expose what the authoress considered to be the evils of the factory system.

Michael Perez, the copper captain. (See PEREZ.)

Michael the Stammerer, born at Armorium, in Phrygia, mounted the throne as emperor of Greece in A.D. 820. He used all his efforts to introduce the Jewish sabbath and sacrifice.

I think I have proved . . .
The error of all those doctrines so vicious . . .
That are making such terrible work in the Churches
By Michel the Stammerer.
Longfellow: The Golden Legend (1851).

Michal, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Catharine the wife of Charles II.

Michal, that ne'er was cruel e'en in thought;
The best of queens, and most obedient wife,
Impeached of curst designs on David's [Charles II.] life,—
His life, the theme of her eternal prayer,
'Tis scarce so much his Guardian Angel's care;
Not Summer's morn such mildness could disclose,
The Hermon lily, nor the Sharon rose.
Pt. ii. 51–68.

Michelot, an unprincipled, cowardly, greedy man, who tries to discover the secret of "the gold-mine." Being procurator of the president of Lyons, his office was "to capture and arrest" those charged with civil or criminal offences.—Stirling: The Gold-Mine or Miller of Grenoble (1854).

Micom'icon, the pretended kingdom of Dorothea (daughter of Cleonardo of Andalusi'a), a hundred days' journey from Meo'tis, and a nine years' voyage from Carthagēna.

Micomicon'a, the pretended queen of Micomicon. Don Quixote's adventure to Micomiconnia comes to nothing, for he was taken home in a cage, almost as soon as he was told of the wonderful enchantments.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iv. 2 (1605).

Mi'cromeg'as ("the little-great"), the hero of Voltaire's imitation of Gulliver's Travels.

N.B.—Micromegas is a native of a planet revolving round Sirius. He is 120,000 feet high. Treading over the Alps, he picks up, by the aid of a microscope, a ship; and discovers by observation that the earth is inhabited. He enters into conversation with some of earth's inhabitants, although they were too small to be discovered by him.

Mi'das (Justice), appointed to adjudge a musical contest between Pol and Pan. He decides in favour of Pan, whereupon Pol throws off his disguise, appears as the god Apollo, and, being indignant at the decision, gives Midas "the ears of an ass."—Kane O'Hara: Midas (1764).

(Edward Shuter (1728–1776) was pronounced by Garrick "the greatest comic actor;" and C. Dibdin says, "Nothing on earth could have been superior to his 'Midas.'")

Midas's Ears. The servant who used to cut the king's hair, discovering the deformity, was afraid to whisper the secret to any one; but, being unable to contain himself, he dug a hole in the earth, and, putting his mouth into it, cried out, "King Midas has ass's ears!" He then filled up the hole, and felt relieved.

Tennyson makes the barber a woman—

No liveller than the dame
That whispered "Asses' ears" [sic] among the sedge.
Tennyson: The Princess, ii.

Middle India, Abyssinia, the country of Prester John.—Jordanus.

Middleburgh (Mr. James), an Edinburgh magistrate.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Middlemarch, "a study of provincial life," by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross) (1872). The heroine is Dorothea Brooke, first married to Cassaubon, and afterwards to Will Ladislaw the artist. It is an excellent novel.

Middlemas (Mr. Matthew), a name assumed by general Witherington.

Mrs. Middlemas, wife of the general (born Zelia de Monçada).

Richard Middlemas, alias Richard Tresham, a foundling, apprenticed to Dr. Gray. He discovers that he is the son of general Witherington, and goes to India, where he assumes the character of Sadoc, a black slave in the service of Mme. Montreville. He delivers Menie Gray by treachery to Tippoo Saib, and Hyder Ali gives him up to be crushed to death by an elephant.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Middlewick (Mr. Perkyn), a retired butterman, the neighbour of sir Geoffry Champneys, and the father of Charles. The butterman is innately vulgar, drops his h's and inserts them out of place, makes the greatest geographical and historical blunders, has a tyrannical temper, but a tender heart. He turns his son adrift for wishing to marry Violet Melrose an heiress, who snubbed the plebeian father. When Charles is reduced to great distress, the old butterman goes to his squalid lodgings, and relents. So all ends happily.

Charles Middlewick, son of the retired butterman, well educated and a gentleman. His father wanted him to marry Mary Melrose, a girl without a penny, but he preferred her cousin Violet an heiress.—H. J. Byron: Our Boys (a comedy, 1875).

Midge, the miller's son, one of the companions of Robin Hood. (See MUCH.)

> Then stepped forth brave Little John
> And Midge the miller's son.
> Robin Hood and Allin-a-Dale.

Midian Mara, the Celtic mermaid.

They whispered to each other that they could hear the song of Midian Mara.—The Dark Colleen, I. 2.

Midlo'thian (The Heart of), a tale of the Porteous riot, in which the incidents of Effie and Jeanie Deans are of absorbing interest. Effie was seduced by Geordie Robertson (alias George Staunton), while in the service of Mrs. Saddletree. She was supposed to have murdered her child, but, although she pleaded not guilty, she was not believed, and was condemned to death. The child was really stolen by gipsies, and grew up an untamed, wild boy of the woods. Her half-sister Jeanie went to London, pleaded her cause before the queen, and obtained her pardon. Jeanie, on her return to Scotland, married Reuben Butler; and Geordie Robertson (then sir George Staunton) married Effie. Sir George was shot by a gipsy boy, Effie's child really, although she never found this out, the secret being only known to Jeanie, who set the boy free to resume his savage life. Effie (i.e. lady Staunton) retired to a convent on the Continent.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Midsummer Moon. Dogs suffer from hydrophobia during the heat of midsummer; hence the term "Midsummer moon" means madness. It will be found amongst Ray's proverbs, and Olivia (in Twelfth Night) says to Malvolio, "Why, this is very midsummer madness!"

> What's this midsummer moon? Is all the world gone a-madding?—Dryden: Amphitryon, Iv. 1 (1690).

Midsummer Night's Dream (A). Shakespeare says there was a law in Athens, that if a daughter refused to marry the husband selected for her by her father, she might be put to death. Egēus (3 syl.), an Athenian, promised to give his daughter Hermia in marriage to Demētrius; but, as the lady loved Lysander, she refused to marry the man selected by her father, and fled from Athens with her lover. Demetrius went in pursuit of her, followed by Helĕna, who doted on him. All four came to a forest, and fell asleep. In their dreams a vision of fairies passed before them, and on awaking, Demetrius resolved to forego Hermia who disliked him, and to take to wife Helena who sincerely loved him. When Egeus was informed thereof, he readily agreed to give his daughter to Lysander, and the force of the law was not called into action (1592).

 Several of the incidents of this comedy are borrowed from the Diana of Montemayor, a Spaniard (sixteenth century).

Midwife of Men's Thoughts. So Socrătes termed himself (B.C. 468–399).

> No other man ever struck out of others so many sparks to set light to original thought.—Grote: History of Greece (1846–56).

Miggs (Miss), the handmaiden and "comforter" of Mrs. Varden. A tall, gaunt young woman, addicted to pattens; slender and shrewish, of a sharp and acid visage. She held the male sex in utter contempt, but had a secret exception in favour of Sim Tappertit, who irreverently called her "scraggy." Miss Miggs always sided with madam against master, and made out that she was a suffering martyr, and he an inhuman Nero. She called ma'am "mim;" said her sister lived at "twenty-sivin;" Simon she called "Simmun." She said Mrs. Varden was "the mildest, amiablest, forgivingest-sperited, longest-sufferingest female in existence." Baffled in all her matrimonial hopes, she was at last appointed female turnkey to a county Bridewell, which office she held for thirty years, when she died.—Dickens: Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Miss Miggs, baffled in all her schemes . . . and cast upon a thankless, undeserving world, turned very sharp and sour . . . but the justices of the peace for Middlesex . . . selected her from 124 competitors to the office of turnkey for a county Bridewell, which she held till her decease, more than thirty years afterwards, remaining single all that time.—Last chapter.

Mign'on, a beautiful, dwarfish, fairy-like Italian girl, in love with Wilhelm her protector. She glides before us in the mazy dance, or whirls her tambourine like an Ariel. Full of fervour, full of love, full of rapture, she is overwhelmed with the torrent of despair at finding her love is not returned, becomes insane, and dies.—Goethe: Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship (1794–6).

 Sir W. Scott drew his "Fenella," in Peveril of the Peak, from this character; and Victor Hugo has reproduced her in his Notre Dame, under the name of "Esmeralda."

Migonnet, a fairy king, who wished to marry the princess brought up by Violenta the fairy mother.

Of all dwarfs he was the smallest. His feet were like an eagle's and close to the knees, for legs he had none. His royal robes were not above half a yard long, and trailed one-third part upon the ground. His head was as big as a peck, and his nose long enough for twelve birds to perch on. His beard was bushy enough for a canary's nest, and his ears reached a foot above his head.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1682).

Mika'do of Japan, the spiritual supreme or chief pontiff. The temporal supreme is called the koubo, segoon, or tycoon.

But thou, Micado, thou hast spoken
The word at which all locks are broken.
St. Paul's (January, 1873).

Mil'an (The duke of), an Italian prince, an ally of the Lancastrians.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

(Massinger has an excellent tragedy called The Duke of Millaine (1623). The duke is Sforza (fifteenth century). His speech before the emperor is admirable.)

Milan Decree, a decree of Napoleon Bonaparte, dated Milan, December 27, 1807, declaring "the whole British empire to be in a state of blockade; and prohibiting all countries from trading with Great Britain or using any article made therein."

 As Britain was the best customer of the very nations forbidden to deal with her, this very absurd decree was a two-edged sword, cutting both ways.

Mildendo, the metropolis of Lilliput, the wall of which was two feet and a half high and eleven inches thick. The city was an exact square, and divided into four quarters. The emperor's palace, called Belfab'orac, stood in the centre of the city.—Swift: Gulliver's Travels ("Lilliput," iv., 1726).

Mildmay. (See FRANK MILDMAY, p. 392.)

Mile'sia Crimĭna, amatory offences. Venus was worshipped at Milētus, and hence the loose amatory tales of Antonius Diogenês were entitled Milesiæ Fabulæ.

Mile'sian Fables (Milesiæ Fabulæ), very wanton and ludicrous tales. Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton (lord Lytton) published six of the Lost Tales of Milētus in rhymeless verse. He says he borrowed them from the scattered remnants preserved by Apollodo'rus and Conon, contained in the pages of Pausa'nias and Athenæus, or dispersed throughout the Scholiasts. The Milesian tales were, for the most part, in prose; but Ovid tells us that Aristi'dês rendered some of them into verse, and Sisenna into Latin.

Junxit Aristides Milesia carmina secum
Pulsus Aristides nec tamen urba sua est.

N.B.—The original tales by Antonius Diog'enês are described by Photius. It appears that they were great favourites with the luxurious Sybarites. A compilation was made by Aristīdês, by whom (according to Ovid) some were versified also. The Latin translation by Sisenna was made about the time of the civil wars of Ma'rius and Sylla. Parthen'ius Nice'nus, who taught Virgil Greek, borrowed thirty-six of the tales, which he dedicated to Cornelius Gallus, and on titled Erōtikōn Pathēmatōn ("love stories").

Mile'sians, the "ancient" Irish. The legend is that Ireland was once peopled by the Fir-bolg or Belgæ from Britain, who were subdued by Milesians from Asia Minor, called the Gaels of Ireland.

My family, by my father's side, are all the true ould Milesians, and related to the O'Flahertys, and O'Shaughnesses, and the M'Lauchlins, the O'Dannaghans, O'Callaghans, O'Geoghghans, and all the thick blood of the nation; and I myself am an O'Brallaghan, which is the ouldest of them all.—Macklin: Love à-la-Mode (1779).

Pat's Milesian blood being roused.
Very Far West Indeed.

Milford (Colonel), a friend of sir Geoffrey Peveril.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Milford (Jack), a natural son of Widow Warren's late husband. He was the chum of Harry Dornton, with whom he ran "the road to ruin." Jack had a fortune left him, but he soon scattered it by his extravagant living, and was imprisoned for debt. Harry then promised to marry Widow Warren if she would advance him £6000 to pay off his friend's debts. When Harry's father heard of this bargain, he was so moved that he advanced the money himself; and Harry, being set free from his bargain, married the widow's daughter instead of the widow. Thus all were rescued from "the road to ruin."—Holcroft: The Road to Ruin (1792).

Milk-Pail (The), which was to gain a fortune. (See PERRETTE.)

Milk Street (London), the old Milk-market. Here sir Thomas More was born.

Mill Pond, Southwark, formerly called "Folly Ditch," a creek or inlet from the Thames, and which can be filled at high water by opening the sluices at Mill Lane.

Mill on the Floss (The), a novel by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross) (1860). The heroine is Maggie Tulliver, the miller's daughter. Mr. and Mrs. Tulliver, with their daughter Maggie and her brother Tom, live at the mill-house. Maggie grows up into a clever and beautiful young woman, devoted to her brother. Philip, the deformed son of lawyer Wakeham, falls in love with her, but the two fathers disagree and the lovers are parted. Maggie subsequently meets with Stephen Guest, the lover of her cousin Lucy Deane, and Maggie and Stephen fall deeply in love with each other; however, Maggie acts imprudently, and difficulties arise. To end the story, a tidal wave breaks into the mill, Maggie and Tom try to save themselves by the boat, but a part of the mill falls on them and they are both drowned.

Millamant, the prétendue of Edward Mirabell. She is a most brilliant girl, who says she "loves to give pain because cruelty is a proof of power; and when one parts with one's cruelty, one parts with one's power." Millamant is far gone in poetry, and her heart is not in her own keeping. Sir Wilful Witwould makes love to her, but she detests "the superannuated lubber."—Congreve: The Way of the World (1700).

There never was a more perfect representation of feminine vivacity than Miss M. Tree's "Millamant" or "lady Townly"—a vivacity flowing from the lightheartedness of an intelligent and gentle girl.—Talfourd (1821).

Miller (James), the "tiger" of the Hon. Mr. Flammer. James was brought up in the stable, educated on the turf and pavé, polished and completed in the fives-court. He was engaged to Mary Chintz, the maid of Miss Bloomfield.—Selby: The Unfinished Gentleman.

Miller (Joe), James Ballantyne, author of Old Joe Miller, by the Editor of New J. M., three vols. (1801).

¶ Mottley compiled a jest-book in the reign of James II., entitled Joe Miller's Jests. The phrase, "That's a Joe Miller," means "That's a stale jest" or "That's a jest from Mottley's book."

Miller (Maximilian Christopher), the Saxon giant; height, eight feet. His hand measured a foot; his second finger was nine inches long; his head unusually large. He wore a rich Hungarian jacket and a huge plumed cap. This giant was exhibited in London in the year 1733. He died aged 60; was born at Leipsic (1674–1734).

Miller of Mansfield (The), John Cockle, a miller and keeper of Sherwood Forest. (See MANSFIELD, p. 667.)—Dodsley: The King and the Miller of Mansfield (1737).

Miller of Trompington (The), Simon Simkin, an arrant thief. Two scholars undertook to see that a sack of corn was ground for "Solar Hall College" without being tampered with; so one stood at the hopper, and the other at the trough below. In the mean time, Simon Simkin let loose the scholars' horse; and while they went to catch it he purloined half a bushel of the flour, which was made into cakes, and substituted meal in its stead. But the young men had their revenge; they not only made off with the flour, meal, and cakes without payment, but left the miller well trounced also.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Reeve's Tale," 1388).

A trick something like that played off on the Miller of Trumpington.—Review of Kirkton, xix. 253.

Miller on the Dee. "There was a Jolly Miller once lived on the River Dee," is a song by Isaac Bickerstaff, introduced in Love in a Village, i. 1 (1763).

Miller's Tale (The), in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. (See NICHOLAS.)

Million (Mrs.), a lady of enormous wealth, in Vivian Grey, a novel by Disraeli (lord Beaconsfield) (1826-27).

Mills (Miss), the bosom friend of Dora. Supposed to have been blighted in early life in some love affair. Hence she looks on the happiness of others with a calm, supercilious benignity, and talks of herself as being "in the desert of Sahara."—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Millstone. The saint who crossed the sea on a millstone was St. Piran, the patron of tinners.

Millwood (Sarah), the courtezan who enticed George Barnwell to rob his master and murder his uncle. Sarah Millwood spent all the money that George Barnwell obtained by these crimes, then turned him out of doors, and impeached against him. Both were hanged.—Lillo: George Barnwell (1732).

David Ross [1728-1790] was once sent for to see a dying man, who said to him, "Mr. Ross, some forty years ago, like 'George Barnwell,' I wronged my master to supply the extravagance of a 'Millwood.' I took her to see your performance of 'George Barnwell,' which so shocked me that I vowed to break off the connection and return to the path of virtue. I kept my resolution, replaced the money I had stolen, and found a 'Maria' in my master's daughter . . . I have bequeathed you £1000. Would it were a larger sum! Farewell!"—Pelham: Chronicles of Crime.

Milly, the wife of William Swidger. She is the good angel of the tale.—Dickens: The Haunted Man (1848).

Milner (Miss), the heroine of Mrs. Inchbald's novel called A Simple Story. The graceful, frivolous girl is in love with Mr. Dorriforth, a handsome young catholic priest, who is her guardian, and who is represented as grave, virtuous, and wilful (1791).

Miss Milner . . . has a quick tongue, a warm heart, and a wayward will of her own, which is ever leading her to the verge of wrong.—Miss Kavanagh.

Milo, an athlete of Croto'na, noted for his amazing strength. He could carry on his shoulders a four-year-old heifer. When old, Milo attempted to tear in twain an oak tree, but the parts, closing on his hands, held him fast, till he was devoured by wolves.

The English Milo, Thomas Topham of London (1710-1752).

Milton, introduced by sir Walter Scott in Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

The Milton of Germany, Frederick Gottlieb Klopstock, author of The Messiah, an epic poem (1724-1803).

A very German Milton indeed.
Coleridge.

Milton's Monument, in Westminster Abbey, was by Rysbrack.

Milvey (The Rev. Frank), a "young man expensively educated and wretchedly paid, with quite a young wife and half a dozen young children. He was under the necessity of teaching . . . to eke out his scanty means, yet was generally expected to have more time to spare than the idlest person in the parish, and more money than the richest."

Mrs. Milvey (Margaretta), a pretty, bright little woman, emphatic and impulsive, but "something worn by anxiety. She had repressed many pretty tastes and bright fancies, and substituted instead schools, soup, flannel, coals, and all the week-day cares and Sunday coughs of a large population, young and old."—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1864).

Minagro'bis, admiral of the cats in the great sea-fight of the cats and rats. Minagrobis won the victory by devouring the admiral of the rats, who had made three voyages round the world in very excellent ships, in which he was neither one of the officers nor one of the crew, but a kind of interloper.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1682).

Min'cing, lady's-maid to Millamant. She says mem, for "ma'am" fit for "fought," la'ship for "ladyship," etc.—Congreve: The Way of the World (1700).

Mincing Lane (London), a corruption of Minicen Lane. So called from the Minicens or nuns of St. Helen, who had tenements in Bishopsgate Street.

Min'cius, a Venetian river which falls into the Po. Virgil was born at Andês, on the banks of this river.

Thou honoured flood,
Smooth-sliding Mincius, crowned with vocal reeds.
Milton: Lycidas, 85 (1638).

Minerva Press (The), Leadenhall Street, London, noted for its trashy literature, in the eighteenth and early part of the nineteenth centuries.

Miniature Painters (British).
(1) Nicholas Hilliard (time, queen Elizabeth), Isaac and Peter Oliver, Samuel Cooper.
(2) John Hoskyns, Richard Cosway (eighteenth century), Ozias Humphrey, Andrew Robertson, sir William Ross.
(3) Henry C. Heath, Henry Edridge, Charles Turrell, Thorburn, Edward Taylor, Edward Moira.

Minikin (Lord), married to a cousin of sir John Trotley, but, according to bon ton, he flirts with Miss Tittup; and Miss Tittup, who is engaged to colonel Tivy, flirts with a married man.

Lady Minikin, wife of lord Minikin. According to bon ton, she hates her husband, and flirts with colonel Tivy; and colonel Tivy, who is engaged to Miss Tittup, flirts with a married woman. It is bon ton to do so.—Garrick: Bon Ton (1760).

Minjekah'wun, Hiawatha's mittens, made of deer-skin. When Hiawatha had his mittens on, he could smite the hardest rocks asunder.

He [Hiawatha] had mittens, Minjekahwun,
Magic mittens made of deer-skin;
When upon his hands he wore them,
He could smite the rocks asunder.
Longfellow: Hiawatha, iv. (1855).

Minna and Brenda, two beautiful girls, the daughters of Magnus Troil the old udaller of Zetland. Minna was stately in form, with dark eyes and raven locks; credulous and vain, but not giddy; enthusiastic, talented, and warm-hearted. She loved captain Clement Cleveland; but Cleveland was killed in an encounter on the Spanish main. Brenda had golden hair, a bloom on her cheeks, a fairy form, and a serene, cheerful disposition. She was less the heroine than her sister, but more the loving and confiding woman. She married Mordaunt Mertoun (ch. iii.).—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Minnehaha ["the laughing water"], daughter of the arrow-maker of Daco'tah, and wife of Hiawatha. She was called Minnehaha from the waterfall of that name between St. Anthony and Fort Snelling.

From the waterfall, he named her,
Minnehaha, Laughing Water.
Longfellow: Hiawatha, iv. (1855).

Minnesingers, the troubadours of Germany during the Hohenstaufen period (1138–1294). The word minnesingers means "love-singers," and these minstrels were so called because their usual subject was love, either of woman or nature. The names of about three hundred are known, the most famous being Dietmar von Aist, Ulrich von Lichtenstein, Heinrich von Frauenlob, and above all Walther von der Vogelweide (1168–1230). Wolfram von Eschenbach, Gottfried von Strasburg, Heinrich von Offerdingen, and Hartmann von der Aue are also classed among the minnesingers, but their fame rests on metrical romance rather than on love-songs.

Minns and his Cousin (Mr.), the first of the Sketches by Boz. It was published in the Old Monthly Magazine (1836).

My first effusion, dropped stealthily one evening at twilight, with fear and trembling, into a dark letter-box, in a dusk office, up a dark court in Fleet Street.—Dickens.

Mino'na, a Gaelic bard, "the soft-blushing daughter of Torman."

Minona came forth in her beauty, with downcast look and tearful eye. Her hair flew slowly on the blast that rushed unfrequent from the hill. The souls of the heroes were sad when she raised the tuneful voice.—Ossian: The Songs of Selma.

Minor (The), a comedy by Samuel Foote (1760). Sir George Wealthy, "the minor," was the son of sir William Wealthy, a retired merchant. He was educated at a public school, sent to college, and finished his training in Paris. His father, hearing of his extravagant habits, pretended to be dead, and, assuming the guise of a German baron, employed several persons to dodge the lad, some to be winners in his gambling, some to lend money, some to cater to other follies, till he was apparently on the brink of ruin. His uncle, Mr. Richard Wealthy, a City merchant, wanted his daughter Lucy to marry a wealthy trader, and, as she refused to do so, he turned her out of doors. This young lady was brought to sir George as a fille de joie, but she touched his heart by her manifest innocence, and he not only relieved her present necessities, but removed her to an asylum where her "innocent beauty would be guarded from temptation, and her deluded innocence would be rescued from infamy." The whole scheme now burst as a bubble. Sir George's father, proud of his son, told him he was his father, and that his losses were only fictitious; and the uncle melted into a better mood, gave his daughter to his nephew, and blessed the boy for rescuing his discarded child.

Minotti, governor of Corinth, when under the power of the doge. In 1715 the city was stormed by the Turks; and during the siege one of the magazines in the Turkish camp blew up, killing 600 men. Byron says it was Minotti himself who fired the train, and that he perished in the explosion.—Byron: Siege of Corinth (1816).

Minstrel (The), an unfinished poem, in Spenserian metre, by James Beattie. Its design was to trace the progress of a poetic genius, born in a rude age, from the first dawn of fancy to the fulness of poetic rapture. The first canto (1771) is descriptive of Edwin the minstrel; canto ii. (1774) is dull philosophy, and there, happily, the poem ends. It is a pity it did not end with the first canto.

> And yet poor Edwin was no vulgar boy,
> Deep thought oft seemed to fix his infant eye.
> Dainties he heeded not, nor gaude, nor toy.
> Save one short pipe of rudest minstrelsy;
> Silent when sad, affectionate, tho' shy;
> And now his look was most demurely sad;
> And now he laughed aloud, yet none knew why.
> The neighbours stared and sighed, yet blessed the lad;
> Some deemed him wondrous wise, and some believed him mad.
> Canto I. 16.

Minstrel (Lay of the Last). (See LAY OF THE LAST MINSTREL, p. 599.)

Minstrel of the Border, sir W. Scott; also called "The Border Minstrel" (1771–1832).

> My steps the Border Minstrel led.
> Wordsworth: Yarrow Revisited.
> Great Minstrel of the Border.
> Wordsworth.

Minstrel of the English Stage (The Last), James Shirley, last of the Shakespeare school (1594–1666).

∴ Then followed the licentious French school, headed by John Dryden.

Minstrel's Song (The), in the tragedy called Ælla by Chatterton (1777). It is in imitation of the antique. The first verse ends thus—

> My love is dead,
> Gone to her death-bed,
> All under the willow-tree.

Minstrels (Royal Domestic).

Of William I., Berdic, called Regis Jocula'tor.

Of Henry I., Galfrid and Royer or Raher.

Of Richard I., Blondel.

Miol'ner (3 syl.), Thor's hammer. (See MJOLNER.)

> This is my hammer, Miölner the mighty;
> Giants and sorcerers cannot withstand it.
> Sæmund Sigfusson: Edda (1220).

Miquelets (Les), soldiers of the Pyrenees, sent to co-operate with the dragoons of the Grand Monarque against the Camisards of the Cevennes.

Mir'abel, the "wild goose," a travelled Monsieur, who loves women in a loose way, but abhors matrimony, and especially dislikes Oria'na; but Oriana "chases" the "wild goose" with her woman's wiles, and catches him.—John Fletcher: The Wild-goose Chase (1652).

Mirabel (Old). He adores his son, and wishes him to marry Oria'na. As the young man shilly-shallies, the father enters into several schemes to entrap him into a declaration of love; but all his schemes are abortive.

Young Mirabel, the son, called "the inconstant." A handsome, dashing young rake, who loves Oriana, but does not wish to marry. Whenever Oriana seems lost to him, the ardour of his love revives; but immediately his path is made plain, he holds off. However, he ultimately marries her.—Farquhar: The Inconstant (1702).

Mirabell (Edward), in love with Millamant. He liked her, "with all her faults; nay, liked her for her faults, . . . which were so natural that (in his opinion) they became her."—Congreve: The Way of the World (1700).

> Not all that Drury Lane affords
> Can paint the rakish "Charles" so well,
> Or give such life to "Mirabell"
> (As Montague Talbot, 1778–1831).
> Croftan Croker.

Mirabella, "a maiden fair, clad in mourning weeds, upon a mangy jade, unmeetly set with a lewd fool called Disdain" (canto 6). Timias and Serena, after quitting the hermit's cell, met her. Though so sorely clad and mounted, the maiden was "a lady of great dignity and honour, but scornful and proud." Many a wretch did languish for her through a long life. Being summoned to Cupid's judgment-hall, the sentence passed on her was that she should "ride on a mangy jade, accompanied by a fool, till she had saved as many lovers as she had slain" (canto 7). Mirabella was also doomed to carry a leaky bottle which she was to fill with tears, and a torn wallet which she was to fill with repentance; but her tears and her repentance dropped out as fast as they were put in, and were trampled under foot by Scorn (canto 8).—Spenser: Faërie Queene, vi. 6-8 (1596).

("Mirabella" is supposed to be meant for Rosalind, who jilted Spenser, and who is called by the poet "a widow's daughter of the glen, and poor.")

Mirab'ilis Doctor, Roger Bacon (1214-1292).

Mir'amont, brother of justice Brisac, and uncle of the two brothers Charles (the scholar) and Eustace (the courtier). Miramont is an ignorant, testy old man, but a great admirer of learning and scholars.—John Fletcher: The Elder Brother (1637).

Miran'da, daughter of Prospero the exiled duke of Milan, and niece of Anthonio the usurping duke. She is brought up on a desert island, with Ariel the fairy spirit and Cal'iban the monster as her only companions. Ferdinand, son of the king of Naples, being shipwrecked on the island, falls in love with her, and marries her.—Shakespeare: The Tempest (1609).

> Identifying herself with the simple yet noble-minded Miranda in the isle of wonder and enchantment.—Sir W. Scott.

Miranda, an heiress, the ward of sir Francis Gripe. (See GRIPE, Sir Francis, p. 451.)—Mrs. Centlivre: The Busy Body (1709).

Mir'ja, one of the six Wise Men of the East, led by the guiding star to Jesus. Mirja had five sons, who followed his holy life.—Klopstock: The Messiah, v. (1771).

Mirror (Alasnam's), a mirror which showed Alasnam if "a beautiful girl was also chaste and virtuous." The mirror was called "the touchstone of virtue."—Arabian Nights ("Prince Zeyn Alasnam").

Cambuscan's Mirror, a mirror sent to Cambuscan' king of Tartary by the king of Araby and Ind. It showed those who consulted it if any adversity was about to befall them; if any individual they were interested in was friend or foe; and if a person returned love for love or not.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Squire's Tale," 1388).

 Sometimes, but incorrectly, called "Canacé's Mirror."

Kelly's Mirror, Dr. Dee's speculum. Kelly was the doctor's speculator or seer. The speculum resembled a "piece of polished cannel coal."

> Kelly did all his feats upon
> The devil's looking-glass, a stone.
> S. Butler: Hudibras (1663-78).

Lao's Mirror, a looking-glass which reflected the mind as well as the outward form.—Goldsmith: Citizen of the World, xlv. (1759).

Merlin's Magic Mirror or Venus's looking-glass, fabricated in South Wales, in the days of king Ryence. It would show to those who looked therein anything which pertained to them, anything that a friend or foe was doing. It was round like a sphere, and was given by Merlin to king Ryence—

> That never foes his kingdom might invade
> But he it knew at home before he heard
> Tidings thereof.

(Britomart, who was king Ryence's daughter and heiress, saw in the mirror her future husband, and also his name, which was sir Artegal.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 2, 1590.)

Prester John's Mirror, a mirror which possessed similar virtues to that made by Merlin. Prester John could see therein whatever was taking place in any part of his dominions.

N.B.—Dr. Dee's speculum was also spherical, and possessed a similar reputed virtue.

(In Rider Haggard's She, the heroine was able to see reflected on the surface of a liquid all that transpired in her kingdom. This mirror had also the power of reproducing vivid images of anything which the mind clearly remembered.)

Reynard's Wonderful Mirror. This mirror existed only in the brain of Master Fox. He told the queen lion that whoever looked therein could see what was being done a mile off. The wood of the frame was part of the same block out of which Crampart's magic horse was made.—Reynard the Fox, xii. (1498).

Venus's Mirror, generally called "Venus's looking-glass," the same as Merlin's magic mirror (q.v.).

Vulcan's Mirror. Vulcan made a mirror which showed those who looked into it the past, present, and future. Sir John Davies says that Cupid handed this mirror to Antin'ous when he was in the court of Ulysses, and Antinous gave it to Penel'opê, who beheld therein the court of queen Elizabeth and all its grandeur.

> Vulcan, the king of fire, that mirror wrought . . .
> As there did represent in lively show
> Our glorious English court's divine image
> As it should be in this our golden age.
> Sir John Davies: Orchestra (1615).

Mirror of Human Salvation (Speculum Humanæ Salvationis), a picture Bible, with the subjects of the pictures explained in rhymes.

Mirror of king Ryence, a mirror made by Merlin. It showed those who looked into it whatever they wished to see.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. (1590).

Mirror of Knighthood, a romance of chivalry It was one of the books in don Quixote's library, and the curé said to the barber—

> "In this same Mirror of Knighthood we meet with Rinaldo de Montalban and his companions, with the twelve peers of France, and Turpin the historian. These gentlemen we will condemn only to perpetual exile, as they contain something of the famous Bojardo's invention, whence the Christian poet Ariosto borrowed the groundwork of his ingenious compositions; to whom I should pay little regard if he had not written in his own language [Italian]."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. i. 6 (1605).

Mirror of all Martial Men, Thomas earl of Salisbury (died 1428).

Mirrour for Magistraytes, begun by Thomas Sackville, and intended to be a poetical biography of remarkable Englishmen. Sackville wrote the "Induction," and furnished one of the sketches, that of Henry Stafford duke of Buckingham (the tool of Richard III.). Baldwynne, Ferrers, Churchyard, Phair, etc., added others. Subsequently, John Higgins, Richard Nichols, Thomas Blenerhasset, etc., supplied additional characters; but Sackville alone stands out pre-eminent in merit. In the "Induction," Sackville tells us he was conducted by Sorrowe into the infernal regions. At the porch sat Remorse and Dread, and within the porch were Revenge, Miserie, Care, and Slepe. Passing on, he beheld Old Age, Maladie, Famine, and Warre. Sorrowe then took him to Achĕron, and ordered Charon to ferry them across. They passed the three-headed Cerbĕrus and came to Pluto, where the poet saw several ghosts, the last of all being the duke of Buckingham, whose "complaynt" finishes the part written by Thomas Sackville (1557). (See BUCKINGHAM, p. 157.)

N.B.—Henry Stafford duke of Buckingham must not be mistaken for George Villiers duke of Buckingham 150 years later.

Mirza (The Vision of). Mirza, being at Grand Cairo on the fifth day of the moon, which he always kept holy, ascended a high hill, and, falling into a trance, beheld a vision of human life. First, he saw a prodigious tide of water rolling through a valley with a thick mist at each end—this was the river of time. Over the river were several bridges, some broken, and some containing three score and ten arches, over which men were passing. The arches represented the number of years the traveller lived before he tumbled into the river. Lastly, he saw the happy valley, but when he asked to see the secrets hidden under the dark clouds on the other side, the vision was ended, and he only beheld the valley of Bagdad, with its oxen, sheep, and camels grazing on its sides.—Steele: Vision of Mirza (Spectator, 159).

Misanthrope (The). According to Seward, the duc de Montausier was the original of Molière's Misanthrope.—Anecdotes, vol. ii. p. 244.

Misbegot (Malcolm), natural son of Sybil Knockwinnock, and an ancestor of sir Arthur Wardour.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Miser (The), a comedy by H. Fielding, a réchauffé of Molière's comedy L'Avare. Lovegold is "Harpagon," Frederick is "Cléante," Mariana is "Mariane," and Ramilie is "La Flétche." (For the plot, see LOVEGOLD, p. 632.)

Misers. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 843.)

Miserere (The) sung on Good Fridays in Catholic churches, is the composition of Gregorio Allegri, who died in 1640.

Mishe-Mok'wa, the great bear slain by Mudjekeewis. —Longfellow: Hiawatha, ii. (1855).

Mishe-Nah'ma, the great sturgeon, "king of fishes," subdued by Hiawatha. With this labour, the "great teacher" taught the Indians how to make oil for the winter. When Hiawatha threw his line for the sturgeon, that king of fishes first persuaded a pike to swallow the bait and try to break the line, but Hiawatha threw it back into the water. Next, a sun-fish was persuaded to try the bait, with the same result. Then the sturgeon, in anger, swallowed Hiawatha and canoe also; but Hiawatha smote the heart of the sturgeon with his fist, and the king of fishes swam to the shore and died. Then the sea-gulls opened a rift in the dead body, out of which Hiawatha made his escape.

> "I have slain the Mishé-Nahma, > Slain the king of fishes," said he.
> Longfellow: Hiawatha, viii. (1855).

Misnar, sultan of India, transformed by Ulin into a toad. "He was disenchanted by the dervise Shemshel'nar, the most "pious worshipper of Alla amongst all the sons of Asia." By prudence and piety, Misnar and his vizier Horam destroyed all the enchanters which filled India with rebellion, and, having secured peace, married Heni'junah, daughter of Zebenezer sultan of Cassimir, to whom he had been betrothed when he was known only as the prince of Georgia.—Sir C. Morell [J. Ridley]: Tales of the Genii, vi., vii. (1751).

Misog'onus, by Thomas Rychardes, the third English comedy (1560). It is written in rhyming quatrains, and not in couplets like Ralph Roister Doister and Gammer Gurton's Needle.

Miss in Her Teens, a farce by David Garrick (1753). Miss Biddy Bellair is in love with captain Loveit, who is known to her only by the name of Rhodophil; but she coquets with captain Flash and Mr. Fribble, while her aunt wants her to marry an elderly man by the name of Stephen Loveit, whom she detests. When the captain returns from the wars, she sets captain Flash and Mr. Fribble together by the ears; and while they stand fronting each other but afraid to fight, captain Loveit enters, recognizes Flash as a deserter, takes away his sword, and dismisses Fribble as beneath contempt.

Mississippi Bubble, the "South Sea scheme" of France, projected by John Law, a Scotchman. So called because the projector was to have the exclusive trade of Lousiana, on the banks of the Mississippi, on condition of his taking on himself the National Debt (incorporated 1717, failed 1720).

∴ The debt was 208 millions sterling. Law made himself sole creditor of this debt, and was allowed to issue ten times the amount in paper money, and to open "the Royal Bank of France" empowered to issue this paper currency. So long as a 20-franc note was worth 20 francs, the scheme was a prodigious success, but immediately the paper money was at a discount, a run on the bank set in, and the whole scheme burst.

Mistaken Identity. (See COMEDY OF ERRORS and WARBECK, where several examples are referred to.)

Mistletoe Bough (The). The song so called is by Thomas Haynes Bayley, who died 1839. The tale is this: Lord Lovel married a young lady, a baron's daughter, and on the wedding night the bride proposed that the guests should play "hide-and-seek." The bride hid in an old oak chest, and the lid, falling down, shut her in, for it went with a spring-lock. Lord Lovel sought her that night and sought her next day, and so on for a week, but nowhere could he find her. Some years after, the old oak chest was sold, which, on being opened, was found to contain the skeleton of the bride.

¶ Samuel Rogers has introduced this story in his Italy (pt. i. 18, 1822). He says the bride was Ginevra, only child of Orsini "an indulgent father;" and that the bridegroom was Francesco Doria, "her playmate from birth, and her first love." The chest, he says, was an heirloom, "richly carved by Antony of Trent, with Scripture stories from the life of Christ." It came from Venice, and had "held the ducal robes of some old ancestor." After the accident, Francesco, weary of life, flew to Venice, and "flung his life away in battle with the Turk;" Orsini went deranged, and spent the life-long day "wandering in quest of something he could not find." It was fifty years afterwards that the skeleton was discovered in the chest.

¶ Collet, in his Relics of Literature, has a similar story.

¶ Another is inserted in the Causes Célèbres.

¶ Marwell Old Hall (near Winchester), once the residence of the Seymours, and afterwards of the Dacre family, has a similar tradition attached to it, and (according to the Post-Office Directory for the district) "the very chest is now the property of the Rev. J. Haygarth, who was rector of Upham" (which joins Marwell).

¶ Bramshall, Hampshire, has a similar tale and chest.

¶ The great house at Malsanger, near Basingstoke, also in Hampshire, has a similar tradition connected with it.

Mistresses of Men of Note. (See LOVERS, p. 633.)

Mi'ta, sister of Aude. She married sir Miton de Rennes, and became the mother of Mitaine. (See next article.)—Croquemitaine, xv.

Mitaine, daughter of Mita and Miton, and godchild of Charlemagne. She went in search of Fear Fortress, and found that it existed only in the imagination; for as she boldly advanced towards it, the castle gradually faded into thin air. Charlemagne made Mitaine, for this achievement, Roland's 'squire, and she fell with him in the memorable attack at Roncesvallês. (See previous article.)—Croquemitaine, iii.

Mite (Sir Matthew), a returned East Indian merchant, dissolute, dogmatical, ashamed of his former acquaintances, hating the aristocracy, yet longing to be acknowledged by them. He squanders his wealth on toadies, dresses his livery servants most gorgeously, and gives his chairmen the most costly exotics to wear in their coats. Sir Matthew is for ever astonishing weak minds with his talk about rupees, lacs, jaghires, and so on.—Foote: The Nabob (1772).

Lady Oldham says, "He comes amongst us preceded by all the pomp of Asia, profusely scattering the spoils of conquered provinces, corrupting the virtue and alienating the affections of all the old friends of the family."

Sir John Malcolm gives us a letter worthy of sir Matthew Mite, in which Clive orders "200 shirts, the best and finest that can be got for love or money."—Macaulay.

Mithra or Mithras, a supreme divinity of the ancient Persians, confounded by the Greeks and Romans with the sun. He is the personification of Ormuzd, representing fecundity and perpetual renovation. Mithra is represented as a young man with a Phrygian cap, a tunic, a mantle on his left shoulder, and lunging a sword into the neck of a bull. Scaliger says the word means "greatest" or "supreme." Mithra is the middle of the triplasian deity: the Mediator, Eternal Intellect, and Architect of the world.

Her towers, where Mithra once had burned,
To Moslem shrines—oh, shame!—were turned;
Where slaves, converted by the sword,
Their mean apostate worship poured,
And cursed the faith their sires adored.
Moore: Lalla Rookh ("The Fire-Worshippers," 1817).

Mith'ridate (3 syl.), a medicinal confection, invented by Damoc'ratês, physician to Mithrida'tês king of Pontus, and supposed to be an antidote to all poisons and contagion. It contained seventy-two ingredients. Any panacea is called a "mithridate."

Their kinsman garlic bring, the poor man's mithridate.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xx. (1622).

Mithridate (3 syl.), a tragedy by Racine (1673). "Monime" (2 syl.), in this drama, was one of Mlle. Rachel's great characters.

Mithrida'tes (4 syl.), surnamed "the Great." Being conquered by the Romans, he tried to poison himself, but poison had no effect on him, and he was slain by a Gaul. Mithridatês was active, intrepid, indefatigable, and fruitful in resources; but he had to oppose such generals as Sulla, Lucullus, and Pompey. His ferocity was unbounded, his perfidy was even grand.

(Racine has written a French tragedy on the subject, called Mithridate (1673); and N. Lee brought out his Mithridatês in English about the same time.)

Mitra, the Persian sun-god, whom they worship in a cave. His statue has a lion's head crowned with a tiara, and he holds with his two hands a struggling heifer. Statius refers to him when Adrastus asks Apollo by what name he should address him, whether Titan, Phœbus, Osiris, or Mitra to whom the Persians pay their adorations.—Bk. i. the end.

Mivers (Chillingly), a cynical journalist in lord Lytton's novel of Kenelm Chillingly (1873).

Mixit (Dr.), the apothecary at the Black Bear inn at Darlington.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Mjolner, Thor's hammer, which crushes all that it strikes and then returns to his hand again.

M. M. Sketch (An), a memorandum sketch.

"Stay just a minute," said Kelly, who was making an M. M. sketch of the group.—B. H. Buxton: Jennie of the Prince's, l. 156.

Mne'me (2 syl.), a well-spring of Bœo'tia, which quickens the memory. The other well-spring in the same vicinity, called Lê'thê, has the opposite effect, causing blank forgetfulness.—Pliny.

N.B.—Dantê calls this river Eu'noê. It had the power of calling to the memory all the good acts done, all the graces bestowed, all the mercies received, but no evil.—Dante: Purgatory, xxxiii. (1308).

Mo'ath, a well-to-do Bedouin, father of Onei'za (3 syl.) the beloved of Thal'aba. Oneiza, having married Thalaba, died on the bridal night, and Moath arrived just in time to witness the mad grief of his son-in-law.—Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, ii., viii. (1797).

Mocc'asins, an Indian buskin.

He laced his mocasins [sic] in act to go.
Campbell. Gertrude of Wyoming, i. 24 (1809).

Mochingo, an ignorant servant of the princess Ero'ta.—Fletcher: The Laws of Candy (1647).

Mock Doctor (The), a farce by H. Fielding (1733), epitomized from Le Médecin Malgré Lui of Molière (1666). Sir Jasper wants to make his daughter marry a Mr. Dapper; but she is in love with Leander, and pretends to be dumb. Sir Jasper hears of a dumb doctor, and sends his two flunkies to fetch him. They ask one Dorcas to direct them to him, and she points them to her husband Gregory, a faggot-maker; but tells them he is very eccentric, and must be well beaten, or he will deny being a physician. The faggot-maker is accordingly beaten into compliance, and taken to the patient. He soon learns the facts of the case, and employs Leander as apothecary. Leander makes the lady speak, and completes his cure with "pills matrimoniac." Sir Jasper takes the joke in good part, and becomes reconciled to the alliance.

Mocking-Bird. "During the space of a minute, I have heard it imitate the woodlark, chaffinch, blackbird, thrush, and sparrow. . . . Their few natural notes resemble those of the nightingale, but their song is of greater compass and more varied."—Ashe: Travels in America, ii. 73.

Moolas, a famous Arabian robber, whose name is synonymous with "thief." (See ALMANZOR, the caliph, p. 29.)

Mode (Sir William), in Mrs. Centlivre's drama The Beau's Duel (1703).

Mode'love (Sir Philip), one of the four guardians of Anne Lovely the heiress. Sir Philip is an "old beau, that has May in his fancy and dress, but December in his face and his heels. He admires all new fashions . . . loves operas, balls, and masquerades" (act i. 1). Colonel Freeman personates a French fop, and obtains his consent to marry his ward, the heiress.—Mrs. Centlivre: A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717).

Modely, a man of the world, gay, fashionable, and a libertine. He had scores of "lovers," but never loved till he saw the little rustic lass named Aura Freehold, a farmer's daughter, to whom he proposed.—J. P. Kemble: The Farmhouse.

Modish (Lady Betty), really in love with lord Morelove, but treats him with assumed scorn or indifference, because her pride prefers "power to ease." Hence she coquets with lord Foppington (a married man), to mortify Morelove and arouse his jealousy. By the advice of sir Charles Easy, lord Morelove pays her out in her own coin, by flirting with lady Graveairs, and assuming an air of indifference. Ultimately, lady Betty is reduced to common sense, and gives her heart and hand to lord Morelove.—Cibber: The Careless Husband (1704).

(Mrs. Oldfield excellently acted "lady Betty Modish" (says Walpole); and T. Davies says of Mrs. Pritchard (1711-1768), "She conceived accurately and acted pleasantly 'lady Townly,' 'lady Betty Modish,' and 'Maria' in The Non-juror." Mrs. Blofield is called "lady Betty Modish" in The Tatler, No. x.)

Modo, the fiend that urges to murder, and one of the five that possessed "poor Tom."—Shakespeare: King Lear, act iv. sc. 1 (1605).

Modred, son of Lot king of Norway and Anne own sister of king Arthur (pt. viii. 21; ix. 9). He is always called "the traitor." While king Arthur was absent, warring with the Romans, Modred was left regent; but he usurped the crown, and married his aunt the queen (pt. x. 13). When Arthur heard thereof, he returned, and attacked the usurper, who fled to Winchester (pt. xi. 1). The king followed him, and Modred drew up his army at Cambula, in Cornwall, where another battle was fought. In this engagement Modred was slain, and Arthur also received his death-wound (pt. xi. 2). The queen, called Guanhuma'ra (but better known as Guen'ever), retired to a convent in the City of Legions, and entered the order of Julius the Martyr (pt. xi. 1).—Geoffrey: British History (1142).

 This is so very different to the accounts given in Arthurian romance of Mordred, that it is better to give the two names as if they were different individuals.

Modred (Sir), nephew of king Arthur. He hated sir Lancelot, and sowed discord among the knights of the Round Table

Tennyson says that Modred "tampered with the lords of the White Horse," the brood that Hengist left. Geoffrey of Monmouth says he made a league with Cheldric the Saxon leader in Germany, and promised to give him all that part of England which lies between the Humber and Scotland, together with all that Hengist and Horsa held in Kent, if he would aid him against king Arthur. Accordingly, Cheldric came over with 800 ships, filled "with pagan soldiers" (British History, xi. 1).

§ When the king was in Brittany, whither he had gone to chastise sir Lancelot for adultery with the queen, he left sir Modred regent, and sir Modred raised a revolt. The king returned, drew up his army against the traitor, and in this "great battle of the West" Modred was slain, and Arthur received his death-wound.—Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("Guinevere," 1858).

 This version is in accordance neither with Geoffrey of Monmouth (see previous article) nor with Arthurian romance (see MORDRED), and is, therefore, given separately.

Modu, the prince of all devils that take possession of a human being.

Maho was the chief devil that had possession of Sarah Williams; but ... Richard Mainy was molested by a still more considerable fiend called Modu, ... the prince of all other devils.—Harsnett: Declaration of Popish Impostures, 1688.

Modus, cousin of Helen; a "musty library, who loved Greek and Latin;" but cousin Helen loved the bookworm, and taught him how to love far better than Ovid could with his Art of Love. Having so good a teacher, Modus became an apt scholar, and eloped with cousin Helen.—Knowles: The Hunchback (1831).

Mœ'chus, Adultery personified; one of the four sons of Caro (fleshly lust). His brothers were Pornei'us (fornication), Acath'arus, and Asel'gês (lasciviousness). In the battle of Mansoul, Mœchus is slain by Agnei'a (wifely chastity), the spouse of Encra'tês (temperance) and sister of Parthen'ia (maidenly chastity). (Greek, moichos, "an adulterer.")—Phineas Fletcher: The Purple Island, xi. (1633).

Moli'ades (4 syl.). Under this name William Drummond signalized Henry prince of Wales, eldest son of James I., in the monody entitled Tears on the Death of Mœliadês. The word is an anagram of Milès a Deo. The prince, in his masquerades and martial sports, used to call himself "Mœliadês of the Isles."

Mœliadês, bright day-star of the West.
Drummond: Tears on the Death of Mœliadês (1612)

The burden of the monody is—

Mœliadês sweet courtly nymphs deplore,
From Thulé to Hydaspês pearly shore.

Moffat (Mabel), domestic of Edward Redgauntlet.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Mogg (Peter), a barrister who contests with Frank Vane in the election of an English borough. As Frank Vane runs away with Anne the heroine, the election is left free for Mogg.—J. Sterling: The Election (a poem in about 2000 verses).

And who was Mogg? O Muse, the man declare
How excellent his worth, his parts how rare;
A younger son, he learnt in Oxford's halls
The spheral harmonies of billiard balls;
Drank, hunted, drove, and hid from Virtue's frown
His venial follies in a doctor's gown.

Moha'di (Mahommed), the twelfth imaum, whom the Orientals believe is not dead, but is destined to return and combat Antichrist before the consummation of all things.

¶ Prince Arthur, Merlin, Charlemagne, Barbarossa, dom Sebastian, Charles V., Elijah Mansur, Desmond of Kilmallock, etc., are traditionally not dead, but only sleeping till the fulness of time, when each will awake and effect most wondrous restorations.

Mohair (The Men of), the citizens of France.

The men of mohair, as the citizens were called.—Asylum Christi, viii.

Moha'reb, one of the evil spirits of Dom-Daniel, a cave "under the roots of the ocean." It was given out that these spirits would be extirpated by one of the family of Hodei'rah (3 syl.), so they leagued against the whole race. First, Okba was sent against the obnoxious race, and succeeded in killing eight of them, Thal'aba alone having escaped alive. Next, Abdaldar was sent against Thalaba, but was killed by a simoom. Then Loba'ba was sent to cut him off, but perished in a whirlwind. Lastly, Mohareb undertook to destroy him. He assumed the guise of a warrior, and succeeded in alluring the youth to the very "mouth of hell;" but Thalaba, being alive to the deceit, flung Mohareb into the abyss.—Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, v. (1797).

Mohicans (Last of the), Uncas the Indian chief, son of Chingachook, and called "Deerfoot."—F. Cooper: The Last of the Mohicans (a novel, 1826).

(The word ought to be pronounced Mo-hek'-kans, but is usually called Mo'-he.kans.)

Mohocks, a class of ruffians who at one time infested the streets of London. So called from the Indian Mohocks. At the Restoration, the street bullies were called Muns and Tityre Tūs; they were next called Hectors and Scourers; later still, Nickers and Hawcubites; and lastly, Mohocks or Mohawks.

> Now is the time that rakes their revels keep,
> Kindlers of riot, enemies of sleep:
> His scattered pence the flying Nicker flings,
> And with the copper shower the casement rings;
> Who has not heard the Scowrer's midnight fame?
> Who has not trembled at the Mohock's name?
> Gay: Trivia, iii. 321, etc. (1713).

Mohun (Lord), the person who joined captain Hill in a dastardly attack on the actor Mountford on his way to Mrs. Bracegirdle's house, in Howard Street. Captain Hill was jealous of Mountford, and induced lord Mohun to join him in this "valiant exploit." Mountford died next day, captain Hill fled from the country, and Mohun was tried but acquitted.

¶ The general features of this cowardly attack are very like that of the count Koningsmark on Thomas Thynne of Lingleate Hill. Count Koningsmark was in love with Elizabeth Percy (widow of the earl of Ogle), who was contracted to Mr. Thynne; but before the wedding day arrived, the count, with some hired ruffians, assassinated his rival in his carriage as it was passing down Pall Mall.

N.B.—Elizabeth Percy, within three months of the murder, married the duke of Somerset.

Moidart (John of), captain of the clan Ronald, and a chief in the army of Montrose.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Moi'na (2 syl.), daughter of Reutha'-mir the principal man of Balclu'tha, a town on the Clyde, belonging to the Britons. Moina married Clessammor (the maternal uncle of Fingal), and died in childbirth of her son Carthon, during the absence of her husband.—Ossian: Carthon.

Mokanna, the name given to Hakem ben Haschem, from a silver gauze veil worn by him "to dim the lustre of his face," or rather to hide its extreme ugliness. The history of this impostor is given by D'Herbelot in his Bibliothèque Orientale (1697).

∴ Mokanna forms the first story of Lalla Rookh ("The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan"), by Thomas Moore (1817).

Mokattam (Mount), near Cairo (Egypt), noted for the massacre of the caliph Hakem B'amr-ellah, who was given out to be incarnate deity and the last prophet who communicated between God and man (eleventh century). Here, also, fell in the same massacre his chief prophet, and many of his followers. In consequence of this persecution, Durzi, one of the "prophet's" chief apostles, led the survivors into Syria, where they settled between the Libanus and Anti-Libanus, and took the name of Durzis, corrupted into Druses.

> As the khalif vanished erst,
> In what seemed death to uninstructed eyes,
> On red Mokattam's verge.
> R. Browning: The Return of the Druses, i.

Molay (Jacques), grand-master of the Knights Templars. As he was led to the stake he summoned the pope (Clement V.) within forty days, and the king (Philippe IV.) within forty weeks, to appear before the throne of God to answer for his death. They both died within the stated periods. (See SUMMONS TO DEATH.)

Molière, the great French poet of comedy (1622–1671).

The Italian Molière, Charlo Goldoni (1707–1793).

The Spanish Molière, Leandro Fernandez Moratin (1760–1828).

Moll Cutpurse, Mary Frith, who once attacked general Fairfax on Hounslow Heath.

Moll Flanders, a woman of great beauty, born in the Old Bailey. She was twelve years a courtezan, five years a wife, twelve years a thief, eight years a convict in Virginia; but ultimately grew rich, and died a penitent in the reign of Charles II.

(Daniel Defoe wrote her life and adventures, which he called The Fortunes of Moll Flanders, 1722.)

Molly, Jaggers's housekeeper. A mysterious, scared-looking woman, with a deep scar across one of her wrists. Her antecedents were full of mystery, and Pip suspected her of being Estella's mother.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

Molly Maggs, a pert young housemaid, in love with Robin. She hates Polyglot the tutor of "Master Charles," but is very fond of Charles. Molly tries to get "the tuterer Polypot" into a scrape, but finds, to her consternation, that master Charles is in reality the party to be blamed.—Poole: The Scapegoat (about 1840).

Molly Maguires, stout, active young men dressed up in women's clothes, with faces blackened or otherwise disguised. This secret society was organized in 1843, to terrify the officials employed by Irish landlords to distrain for rent, either by grippers (bumbailiffs), process-servers, keepers, or drivers (persons who impound cattle till the rent is paid). — Trench: Realities of Irish Life, 82.

Molly Mog, an innkeeper's daughter at Oakingham, Berks. Molly Mog was the toast of all the gay sparks in the former half of the eighteenth century; but died a spinster at the age of 67 (1699–1766).

(Gay has a ballad on this Fair Maid of the Inn. Mr. Standen of Arborfield, the "enamoured swain," died in 1730. Molly's sister was quite as beautiful as "the fair maid" herself. A portrait of Gay still hangs in Oakingham inn.)

Molmu'tius. (See MULMUTIUS.)

Mo'loch (ch = k), the third in rank of the Satanic hierarchy, Satan being first, and Beëlzebub second. The word means "king." The rabbins say the idol was of brass, with the head of a calf. Moloch was the god of the Am'monites (3 syl.), and was worshipped in Rabba, their chief city.

> First Moloch, horrid king, besmeared with blood
> Of human sacrifice, and parents' tears,
> Though, for the noise of drums and timbrels loud,
> Their children's cries unheard, that passed thro' fire
> To his grim idol. Him the Ammonite
> Worshipped in Rabba.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 392, etc. (1665).

Mo'ly (Greek, môlu), mentioned in Homer's Odyssey. A herb with a black root and white blossom, given by Hermês to Ulysses, to counteract the spells of Circê. (See HÆMONY, p. 452.)

> . . . that Môly
> That Hermês once to wise Ulysses gave.
> Milton: Comus (1634).
>
> The root was black,
> Milk-white the blossom; Môly is its name
> In heaven.
> Homer: Odyssey, x. (Cowper's trans.).

Mommur, the capital of the empire of Oberon king of the fairies. It is here he held his court.

Momus's Lattice. Momus, son of Nox, blamed Vulcan, because, in making the human form, he had not placed a window in the breast for the discerning of secret thoughts.

> Were Momus' lattice in our breasts,
> My soul might brook to open it more widely
> Than theirs [i.e. the nobles].
> Byron: Werner, iii. 1 (1822).

Mon or Mona, Anglesea, the residence of the druids. Suetonius Paulinus, who had the command of Britain in the reign of Nero (from A.D. 59 to 62), attacked Mona, because it gave succour to the rebellious. The frantic inhabitants ran about with fire-brands, their long hair streaming to the wind, and the druids invoked vengeance on the Roman army. (See Drayton, Polyolbion, viii., 1612.)

"Mona" is the Latinized form of the British word môn-au ("remote isle"). The "Isle of Man" is Môn-au or mona ("remote isle") corrupted by misconception of the meaning of the word.

Mon'aco (The king of), noted because whatever he did was never right in the opinion of his people, especially in that of Rabagas the demagogue: If he went out, he was "given to pleasure;" if he stayed at home, he was "given to idleness;" if he declared war, he was "wasteful of the public money;" if he did not, he was "pusillanimous;" if he ate, he was "self-indulgent;" if he abstained, he was "priest-ridden."—Sardon: Rabagas (1872).

Monaco. Proud as a Monegasque. A French phrase. The tradition is that Charles Quint ennobled every one of the inhabitants of Monaco.

Monarch of Mont Blanc, Albert Smith; so called because for many years he amused a large London audience, night after night, by relating "his ascent up Mont Blanc" (1816–1860).

Monarque (Le Grand), Louis XIV. of France (1638, 1643–1715).

Monastery (The), a novel by sir W. Scott (1820). The Abbot appeared the same year. These two stories are tame and very defective in plot; but the character of Mary queen of Scots, in The Abbot, is a correct and beautiful historical portrait. The portrait of queen Elizabeth is in Kenilworth.

The plot of the novel: The hero and heroine of the novel are Halbert Glendenning and lady Mary Avenel, who become converts to the reformed religion and marry each other. The crux is about a Bible which belonged to lady Alice Avenel, a widow, and which the abbot of St. Mary's Monastery tried to get hold of. He first sent father Philip to see what he could do. Father Philip succeeded in capturing the book, but in crossing a ford on his mule, the White Lady pushed him into the water, and captured his prize. The abbot next sent the sub-prior, who found that the book had been mysteriously restored, and that the lady Alice was dead; so he took possession of the Bible; but in crossing the ford he also was pushed into the water, and lost it. Halbert Glendenning now implored the White Lady to inform him where it was. She conveyed him through the earth, and showed it him on a "flaming altar." He took possession of it. Both Halbert Glendenning and lady Mary Avenel now became converts to the reformed religion, and their marriage ends the tale.

Monçada (Matthias de), a merchant, stern and relentless. He arrests his daughter the day after her confinement of a natural son.

Zilia de Monçada, daughter of Matthias, and wife of general Witherington.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Moncaster. Newcastle, in Northumberland, was so called from the number of monks settled there in Saxon times. The name was changed, in 1080, to New-castle, from the castle built by Robert (son of the Conqueror), to defend the borderland from the Scotch.

Monda'min, maize or Indian corn (mon-da-min, "the Spirit's grain").

> Sing the mysteries of mondamin,
> Sing the blessing of the corn-fields.
> Longfellow: Hiawatha, xiii. (1855).

Mone'ses (3 syl.), a Greek prince, betrothed to Arpasia, whom for the nonce he called his sister. Both were taken captive by Baj'azet. Bajazet fell in love with Arpasia, and gave Monēsēs a command in his army. When Tamerlane overthrew Bajazet, Monēsēs explained to the Tartar king how it was that he was found in arms against him, and said his best wish was to serve Tamerlane. Bajazet now hated the Greek; and, as Arpasia proved obdurate, thought to frighten her into submission by having Monesēs bow-strung in her presence; but the sight was so terrible that it killed her.—Rowe: Tamerlane (1702).

Money, a drama by lord Lytton (1840). Alfred Evelyn, a poor scholar, was secretary and factotum of sir John Vesey, but received no wages. He loved Clara Douglas, a poor dependent of lady Franklin, proposed to her, but was not accepted, "because both were too poor to keep house." A large fortune being left to the poor scholar, he proposed to Georgina, the daughter of sir John Vesey; but Georgina loved sir Frederick Blount, and married him. Evelyn, who loved Clara, pretended to have lost his fortune, and, being satisfied that she really loved him, proposed a second time, and was accepted.

Moneytrap, husband of Araminta, but with a tendre for Clarissa the wife of his friend Gripe.—Vanbrugh: The Confederacy (1695).

> None who ever saw Parsons [1736–1795] . . . can forget his effective mode of exclaiming, while representing the character of the amorous old "Moneytrap," "Eh! how long will it be, Flippanta!"—Dibdin.

Monflathers (Miss), mistress of a boarding and day establishment, to whom Mrs. Jarley sent little Nell, to ask her to patronize the wax-work collection. Miss Monflathers received the child with frigid virtue, and said to her, "Don't you think you must be very wicked to be a wax-work child? Don't you know it is very naughty to be a wax child when you might have the proud consciousness of assisting, to the extent of your infant powers, the noble manufactures of your country?" One of the teachers here chimed in with "How doth the little——;" but Miss Monflathers remarked, with an indignant frown, that "the little busy bee" applied only to genteel children, and the "works of labour and of skill" to painting and embroidery, not to vulgar children and wax-work shows.—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop, xxxi. (1840).

Monford, the lover of Charlotte Whimsey. He plans various devices to hoodwink her old father, in order to elope with the daughter.—J. Cobb: The First Floor (1756–1818).

Monime (2 syl.), in Racine's tragedy of Mithridate. This was one of Mlle. Rachel's great characters, first performed by her in 1838.

Monim'ia, "the orphan," sister of Chamont and ward of lord Acasto. Monimia was in love with Acasto's son Castalio, and privately married him. Polydore (the brother of Castalio) also loved her, but his love was dishonourable love. By treachery, Polydore obtained admission to Monimia's chamber, and passed the bridal night with her, Monimia supposing him to be her husband; but when next day she discovered the deceit, she poisoned herself; and Polydore, being apprised that Monimia was his brother's wife, provoked a quarrel with him, ran on his brother's sword, and died.—Otway: The Orphan (1680).

More tears have been shed for the sorrows of "Belvidêra" and "Monimia," than for those of "Juliet" and "Desdemona."—Sir W. Scott: The Drama.

Monimia, in Smollett's novel of Count Fathom (1754). Also the heroine of Mrs. Smith's novel called The Old Manor House (1793).

Moniplies (Richie), the honest, self-willed Scotch servant of lord Nigel Olifaunt of Glenvarloch.—Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Monk (General), introduced by Scott in Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Monk (The Bird Singing to a). The monk is Felix, who listened to a bird for a hundred years, and thought the time only an hour.—Longfellow: The Golden Legend, ii. (1851).

Monk (The), a novel, by Matthew G. Lewis (1795).

Monk Lewis, Matthew Gregory Lewis; so called from his novel (1773-1818). (See above.)

Monk of Bury, John Lydgate, poet, who wrote the Siege of Troy, the Story of Thebes, and the Fall of Princes (1375-1460).

Nothynge I am experte in poetry,
As the monke of Bury, floure of eloquence.
Hawes: The Passe-tyme of Plesure (1515).

Monk of Westminster, Richard of Cirencester, the chronicler (fourteenth century).

N.B.—This chronicle, On the Ancient State of Britain, was first brought to light in 1747, by Dr. Charles Julius Bertram, professor of English at Copenhagen; but the original being no better known than that of Thomas Rowley's poems, published by Chatterton, grave suspicions exist that Dr. Bertram was himself the author of the chronicle. (See FORGERS AND FORGERIES, p. 382.)

Monk's Tale (The). The subject of this tale is the uncertainty of fortune. Instanced with seventeen examples—

6 from Scripture: Lucifer, Adam, and Samson; Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, Holofernês (from the Book of Judith).

3 Greek and Roman History: Alexander the Great, Julius Cæsar, and Nero.

7 other Histories: Crœsus, Hugolin of Pisa, Pedro of Spain, Pierre de Lusignan king of Cyprus, Visconti (Bernardo) duke of Milan, and Zenobia.

1 from Mythology: Hercules.

Monks (The Father of), Ethelwold of Winchester (*-984).

Monks, alias Edward Leeford, a violent man, subject to fits. Edward Leeford, though half-brother to Oliver Twist and Rose (Maylie), was in collusion with Bill Sikes to ruin him. Failing in this, he retired to America, and died in jail.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Nancy said of Monks, "He is tall and a strongly made man, but not stout; he has a lurking walk; and, as he walks, constantly looks over his shoulder, first on one side and then on the other. . . . His eyes are sunk in his head much deeper than other men's. . . . His face is dark, like his hair and eyes; and, although he can't be more than six or eight and twenty, withered and haggard. His lips are often discoloured and disfigured with the marks of his teeth. . . . Upon his throat is a broad red mark like a burn."

Monkbarns (Laird of), Mr. Jonathan Oldbuck, the antiquary.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Mon'ker and Nakir [Na-keer], the two examiners of the dead, who put questions to departed spirits respecting their belief in God and Mahomet; and award their state in after-life according to their answers.—Al Korân.

"Do you not see those spectres that are stirring the burning coals? Are they Monkir and Nakir come to throw us into them?"—Beckford: Vathek (1786).

Monmouth, the surname of Henry V. of England, who was born in that town (1388, 1413-1422).

∴ Mon-mouth is the mouth of the Monnow.

Monmouth (The duke of), commander-in-chief of the royal army.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

∴ The duke of Monmouth was nicknamed "The Little Duke," because he was diminutive in size. Having no name of his own, he took that of his wife, "Scott," countess of Buccleuch. Pepys says, "It is reported that the king will be tempted to set the crown on the Little Duke" (Diary, seventeenth century).

Monmouth Caps. "The best caps" (says Fuller, in his Worthies of Wales, 50) "were formerly made at Monmouth, where the Cappen's Chapel doth still remain."

> The soldiers that the Monmouth wear,
> On castle top their ensigns rear.
> Reed. The Caps (1661).

Monmouth Street (London), called after the duke of Monmouth, natural son of Charles II., executed for rebellion in 1685. It is now called Dudley Street.

Mon'nema, wife of Quia'ra, the only persons of the whole of the Guārani race who escaped the small-pox plague which ravaged that part of Paraguay. They left the fatal spot, and settled in the Mondai woods. Here they had one son Yerūti, and one daughter Mooma, but Quiāra was killed by a jagŭar before the latter was born. Monnĕma left the Mondai woods, and went to live at St. Joăchin, in Paraguay, but soon died from the effects of a house and city life.—Southey: A Tale of Paraguay (1814).

Monomot'apa, an empire of South Africa, joining Mozambique.

> Ah, sir, you never saw the Gangês;
> There dwell the nation of Quidnunkis
> (So Monomotapa calls monkeys).
> Gay: The Quidnunkis.

Mononia, Munster, in Ireland.

> Mononia, when nature embellished the tint
> Of thy fields and thy mountains so fair,
> Did she ever intend that a tyrant should print
> The footstep of slavery there?
> Moore: Irish Melodies, i. ("War Song," 1814).

Monsieur, Philippe duc d'Orléans, brother of Louis XIV. (1674–1723).

 Other gentlemen were Mons. A or Mons. B, but the regent was Mons. without any adjunct.

Similarly, the daughter of the duc de Chartres (the regent's grandson) was Mademoiselle.

Monsieur le Coadjuteur, Paul de Gondi, afterwards cardinal de Retz (1614–1679).

Monsieur le duc, Louis Henri de Bourbon, eldest son of the prince de Condé (1692–1740).

Monsieur Thomas, a drama by Beaumont and Fletcher (1619).

Monsieur Tonson, a farce by Moncrieff. Jack Ardourly falls in love with Adolphine de Courcy in the street, and gets Tom King to assist in ferreting her out. Tom King discovers that his sweeting lives in the house of a French refugee, a barber, named Mon. Morbleu: but not knowing the name of the young lady, he inquires for Mr. Thompson, hoping to pick up information. Mon. Morbleu says no Mon. Tonson lives in the house, but only Mme. Bellegarde and Mlle. Adolphine de Courcy. The old Frenchman is driven almost crazy by different persons inquiring for Mon. Tonson; but ultimately Jack Ardourly marries Adolphine, whose mother is Mrs. Thompson after all.

(Taylor wrote a drama of the same title in 1767.)

Monster (The), Renwick Williams, a wretch who used to prowl about London by night, armed with a double-edged knife, with which he mutilated women. He was condemned July 8, 1790.

A century later (about 1888–1889) similar atrocities were committed in the East end of London by a person calling himself Jack the Ripper. He escaped detection.

Mont Dieu, a solitary mound close to Dumfermline. It owes its origin, according to story, to some unfortunate monks who, by way of penance, carried the sand in baskets from the sea-shore at Inverness.

¶ At Linton is a fine conical hill attributed to two sisters, nuns, who were compelled to pass the whole of the sand through a sieve, by way of penance, to obtain pardon for some crime committed by their brother.

Mont Rognon (Baron of), a giant of enormous strength and insatiable appetite. He was bandy-legged, had an elastic stomach, and four rows of teeth. The baron was a paladin of Charlemagne, and one of the four sent in search of Croquemitaine and Fear Fortress.—Croquemitaine.

Mont St. Jean or WATERLOO. So-and-so was my Mont St. Jean, means it was my coup de grace, my final blow, the end of the end.

> Juan was my Moscow [turning-point], and Failero [Fa.lee'.ro]
> My Leipsic [down/all], and my Mont St. Jean seems Cain.
> Byron: Don Juan, xi. 56 (1824).

Mont St. Michel, in Normandy. Here nine druidesses used to sell arrows to sailors to charm away storms. The arrows had to be discharged by a young man 25 years of age. (See MICHAEL, p. 702.)

¶ The Laplanders drove a profitable trade by selling winds to sailors. Even so late as 1814, Bessie Millie, of Pomona (Orkney Islands), helped to eke out a livelihood by selling winds for sixpence.

¶ Eric king of Sweden could make the winds blow from any quarter he liked by a turn of his cap. Hence he was nicknamed "Windy Cap."

Mont Trésor, in France; so called by Gontran "the Good," king of Burgundy (sixteenth century). One day, weary with the chase, Gontran laid himself down near a small river, and fell asleep. The 'squire, who watched his master, saw a little animal come from the king's mouth, and walk to the stream, over which the 'squire laid his sword, and the animal, running across, entered a hole in the mountain. When Gontran was told of this incident, he said he had dreamt that he crossed a bridge of steel, and, having entered a cave at the foot of a mountain, entered a palace of gold. Gontran employed men to undermine the hill, and found there vast treasures, which he employed in works of charity and religion. In order to commemorate this event, he called the hill Mont Trésor.—Claud Paradin: Symbola Heroica.

∴ This story has been ascribed to numerous persons.

Mon'tague (3 syl.), head of a noble house in Verona, at feudal enmity with the house of Capulet. Romeo belonged to the former, and Juliet to the latter house.

Lady Montague, wife of lord Montague, and mother of Romeo.—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet (1598).

Montalban, now called Montauban (a contraction of Mons Alba'nus), in France, in the department of Tarn-et-Garonne.

> Jousted in Aspramont or Mon'talban'.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 583 (1665).

Don Kyrie Elyson de Montalban, a hero of romance, in the History of Tirante the White.

Thomas de Montalban, brother of don Kyrie Elyson, in the same romance of chivalry.

Rinaldo de Montalban, a hero of romance, in the Mirror of Knighthood, from which work both Bojardo and Ariosto have largely borrowed.

Montalban (The count), in love with Volanté (3 syl.) daughter of Balthazar. In order to sound her, the count disguised himself as a father confessor; but Volanté detected the trick instantly, and said to him, "Come, come, count, pull off your lion's hide, and confess yourself an ass." However, as Volanté really loved him, all came right at last.—Tobin The Honeymoon (1804).

Montanto (Signor), a master of fence and a great braggart.—Ben Jonson: Every Man in His Humour (1598).

Montargis (The Dog of), named Dragon. It belonged to captain Aubri de Montdidier, and is especially noted for his fight with the chevalier Richard Macaire. The dog was called Montargis, because the encounter was depicted over the chimney of the great hall in the castle of Montargis. It was in the forest of Bondi, close by this castle, where Aubri was assassinated.

(Guilbert de Pixerecourt dramatized this tale in his play called Le Chien de Montargis, 1814.)

Montenay (Sir Philip de), an old English knight.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Montenegro. The natives say, "When God was distributing stones over the earth, the bag that held them burst over Montenegro," which accounts for the stoniness of the land.

Montesi'nos, a legendary hero, who received some affront at the French court, and retired to La Mancha, in Spain. Here he lived in a cavern, some sixty feet deep, called "The Cavern of Montesinos." Don Quixote descended part of the way down this cavern, and fell into a trance, in which he saw Montesinos himself, Durandarté and Belerma under the spell of Merlin, Dulcin'ea del Toboso enchanted into a country wench, and other visions, which he more than half believed to be realities.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. ii. 5, 6 (1615).

∴ This Durandarté was the cousin of Montesinos, and Belerma the lady he served for seven years. When he fell at Roncesvallés, he prayed his cousin to carry his heart to Belerma.

Montespan (The marquis de), a conceited court fop, silly and heartless. When Louis XIV. took Mme. de Montespan for his concubine, he banished the marquis, saying—

> Your strange and countless follies—
> The scenes you make—your loud domestic brawls—
> Bring scandal on our court. Decorum needs
> Your banishment. . . . Go!

And for your separate household, which entails
A double cost, our treasure shall accord you
A hundred thousand crowns.
Act iv. 2.

The foolish old marquis says, in his self-conceit—

A hundred thousand crowns for being civil
To one another! Well now, that's a thing
That happens but to marquises. It shows
My value in the state. The king esteems
My comfort of such consequence to France,
He pays me down a hundred thousand crowns,
Rather than let my wife disturb my temper!
Act v. 2.

Madame de Montespan, wife of the marquis. She supplanted La Vallière in the base love of Louis XIV. La Vallière loved the man, Montespan the king. She had wit to warm but not to burn, energy which passed for feeling, a head to check her heart, and not too much principle for a French court. Mme. de Montespan was the protégée of the duke de Lauzun, who used her as a stepping-stone to wealth; but when in favour, she kicked down the ladder by which she had climbed to power. However, Lauzun had his revenge; and when La Vallière took the veil, Mme. de Montespan was banished from the court. — Lord Lytton: The Duchess de la Vallière (1836).

Montfaucon (The lady Calista of), attendant of queen Berengaria.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Mont-Fitchet (Sir Conrade), a preceptor of the Knights Templars.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Montfort (De), the hero and title of a tragedy, intended to depict the passion of hate, by Joanna Baillie (1798). The object of De Montfort's hatred is Rezenvelt, and his passion drives him on to murder.

 De Montfort was probably the suggestive inspiration of Byron's Manfred (1817).

Montgomery (Mr.), lord Godolphin, lord high treasurer of England in the reign of queen Anne. The queen called herself "Mrs. Morley," and Sarah Jennings duchess of Marlborough was "Mrs. Freeman."

Monthermer (Guy), a nobleman, and the pursuivant of king Henry II.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Months (Symbols of the), frequently carved on church portals, misericords (as at Worcester), ceilings (as at Salisbury), etc.

1. Pocula Janus amat.
2. Et Februus algeo clamat.
3. Martius arva fodit.
4. Aprilis florida nutrit.
5. Ros et flos nemorum Maio sunt fomes amorum.
6. Dat Junius fena.
7. Julio resecatur avena.
8. Augustus spicas.
9. September conterit uvas.
10. Seminat October.
11. Spoliat virgulta November.
12. Querit habere cibum porcum mactando December.

Utrecht Missal (1515), and the Breviary of St. Alban's.

Montjoie, chief herald of France.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Montorio, the hero of a novel, who persuades his "brother's sons" to murder their father by working on their fears, and urging on them the doctrines of fatalism. When the deed was committed, Montorio discovered that the young murderers were not his nephews, but his own sons. — Maturin: Fatal Revenge (1807).

Montreal d'Albano, called "Fra Moriale," knight of St. John of Jerusalem, and captain of the Grand Company in the fourteenth century. When sentenced to death by Rienzi, he summoned his judge to follow him within the month. Rienzi was killed by the fickle mob within the stated period. (See SUMMONS TO DEATH.)

Montreville (Mme. Adela), or the Begum Mootee Mahul, called "the queen of Sheba."—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Montrose (The duke of), commander-in-chief of the king's army.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy, xxxii. (time, George I.).

Montrose (The marquis of).—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Montrose (James Grahame, earl of), the king's lieutenant in Scotland. He appears first disguised as Anderson, servant of the earl of Menteith.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Montserrat (Conrade marquis of), a crusader.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Moody (John), the guardian of Peggy Thrift an heiress, whom he brings up in the country, wholly without society. John Moody is morose, suspicious, and unsocial. When 50 years of age, and Peggy 19, he wants to marry her, but is outwitted by "the country girl," who prefers Belville, a young man of more suitable age.

Alithea Moody, sister of John. She jilts Sparkish a conceited fop, and marries Harcourt.—The Country Girl (Garrick, altered from Wycherly).

Mooma, younger sister of Yerūti. Their father and mother were the only persons of the whole Guarāni race who escaped a small-pox plague which ravished that part of Paraguay. They left the fatal spot and lived in the Mondai woods, where both their children were born. Before the birth of Mooma, her father was eaten by a jagŭar, and the three survivors lived in the woods alone. When grown to a youthful age, a Jesuit priest persuaded them to come and live at St. Joachin (3 syl.); so they left the wild woods for a city life. Here the mother soon flagged and died. Mooma lost her spirits, was haunted with thick-coming fancies of good and bad angels, and died. Yeruti begged to be baptized, received the rite, cried, "Ye are come for me! I am ready;" and died also.—Southey: A Tale of Paraguay (1814).

Moon (The) increases with horns towards the east, but wanes with horns towards the west.

The Moon. Dantê makes the moon the first planetary heaven, "the tardiest sphere of all the ten," and assigned to those whose vows "were in some part neglected and made void" (canto iii.).

> It seemed to me as if a cloud had covered us,
> Translucent, solid, firm, and polished bright
> Like adamant which the sun's beam had smit,
> Within itself the ever-during pearl [the moon]
> Received us, as the wave a ray of light
> Receives, and rests unbroken.
> Dante: Paradise, ii. (1321).

Moon (Blue). "Once in a blue moon," very occasionally; longo intervallo.

> "Does he often come of an evening?" asks Jennie. "Oh, just once in a blue moon, and then always with a friend."—Buxton: Jennie of the Prince's, ii. 140.

Moon (Man in the). (See MAN . . .)

Spots in the Moon. Dantê makes Beatrice say that these spots are not due to diversity of density or rarity, for, if so, in eclipses of the sun, the sun would be seen through the rare portions of the moon more or less distinctly. She says the spots are wholly due to the different essences of the "planet," which reflect in different ways the effluence of the heaven, "which peace divine inhabits."

> From hence proceeds that which from light to light
> Seems different, and not from dense to rare.
> Dante: Paradise, ii. (1321).

Milton makes Raphael tell Adam that the spots on the moon are due to clouds and vapours "not yet into the moon's substance turned," that is, undigested aliment.

> For know whatever was created, needs
> To be sustained and fed. Of elements,
> The grosser feeds the purer,—earth the sea—
> Earth and the sea feed air—the air those fires
> Ethereal—and as lowest, first the moon;
> Whence, in her visage round, those spots—unpurged
> Vapours not yet into her substance turned.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, v. 415, etc.; see also viii. 145, etc. (1665).

The Emperor of the Moon, Irdonozur.—Dominique Gonzales: L'Homme dans la Lune (1648).

Minions of the Moon, thieves or highwaymen. (See MOON'S MEN.)

Moon and Mahomet. Mahomet made the moon perform seven circuits round Caaba or the holy shrine of Mecca, then enter the right sleeve of his mantle and go out at the left. At its exit, it split into two pieces, which reunited in the centre of the firmament. This miracle was performed for the conversion of Hahab the Wise.

Moon-Calf, an inanimate, shapeless human mass, said by Pliny to be engendered of woman only.—Nat. Hist., v. 64.

Moon Depository. Astolpho found the moon to be the great depository of misspent time, wasted wealth, broken vows, unanswered prayers, fruitless tears, abortive attempts, unfulfilled desires and intentions, etc. Bribes, he tells us, were hung on gold and silver hooks; princes' favours were kept in bellows; wasted talent was stored away in urns; but every article was duly labelled.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, xviii. (1516).

Moon-Drop (in Latin, virus lunare), a vaporous drop supposed to be shed by the moon on certain herbs and other objects, when powerfully influenced by incantations. Lucan says, Erictho used it: Virus large lunare ministrat.

> Hecate. Upon the corner of the moon
> There hangs a vaporous drop, profound;
> I'll catch it ere it come to ground.
> Shakespeare: Macbeth, act iii. sc. 5 (1606).

Moon of Bright Nights, a synonym for April; the moon of leaves, a synonym for May; the moon of strawberries is June; the moon of falling leaves is September; and the moon of snow-shoes is the synonym for November.—Longfellow: Hiawatha (1855).

Moon's Men, thieves or highwaymen, who ply their vocation by night.

The fortune of us that are but moon's men doth ebb and flow like the sea.—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. act i. sc. 2 (1597).

Moonshine (Saunders), a smuggler. —Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Moor, the brigand, in Schiller's drama called The Robbers (1781).

Moore (Mr. John), of the Pestle and Mortar, Abchurch Lane, immortalized by his "worm-powder," and called the "Worm Doctor."

O learnèd friend of Abchurch Lane,
Who set'st our entrails free!
Vain is thy art, thy powder vain,
Since worms shall eat e'en thee.
Pope: To Mr. John Moore (1733).

Moorfields. Here stood Bethlehem Hospital, or Bedlam, at one time.

Subtle. Remember the feigned madness I have taught thee. . . .
Tricksey. Fear not, he shall think me fresh slipped from the regions of Moorfields.—Ben Jonson: The Alchemist, i. (1610).

Moors. The Moors of Aragon are called Tangarins; those of Granāda are Mudajares; and those of Fez are called Elches. They are the best soldiers of the Spanish dominions. In the Middle Ages all Mohammedans were called Moors; and hence Camoëns, in the Lusiad, viii., calls the Indians so.

Mopes (Mr.), the hermit who lived on Tom Tiddler's Ground. He was dirty, vain, and nasty, "like all hermits," but had landed property, and was said to be rich and learned. He dressed in a blanket and skewer, and, by steeping himself in soot and grease, soon acquired immense fame. Rumour said he murdered his beautiful young wife, and abandoned the world. Be this as it may, he certainly lived a nasty life. Mr. Traveller tried to bring him back into society, but a tinker said to him, "Take my word for it, when iron is thoroughly rotten, you can never botch it, do what you may." —Dickens: A Christmas Number ("Tom Tiddler's Ground," 1861).

Mopsus, a shepherd, who, with Menalcas, celebrates the funeral eulogy of Daphnis.—Virgil: Eclogue v.

Mora, a hill in Ulster, on the borders of a heath called Moi-lena.—Ossian: Temora.

(Near Upsa'la is what is called "The Mora Stone," where the Swedes used of old to elect their kings.)

Mora, the betrothed of Oscar who mysteriously disappears on the bridal eve, and is long mourned for as dead. His younger brother Allan, hoping to secure the lands and fortune of Mora, proposes marriage, and is accepted. At the wedding banquet, a stranger demands "a pledge to the lost Oscar," and all accept it except Allan, who is there and then denounced as the murderer of his brother. The stranger then vanishes, and Allan dies.—Byron: Oscar of Alva.

Moradbak, daughter of Fitead a widower. She undertook to amuse Hudjudge with tales, and married him. (See HUDJADGE, p. 509.)—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales (1743).

Morakan'abad, grand vizier of the caliph Vathek.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Moral Philosophy (The Father of), Thomas Aquinas (1227-1274).

Moral Tales, translated from the French by Marmontel (1761).

Moran Son of Fithil, one of the scouts in the army of Swaran king of Lochlin (Denmark).—Ossian: Fingal.

Moran's Collar, a collar for magistrates, which had the supernatural power of pressing the neck of the wearer if his judgments deviated from strict justice. It strangled him if he persisted in wrongdoing. Moran, surnamed "the Just," was the wise counsellor of Feredach an early king of Ireland.

Morat, in Aurungzebe, a drama by Dryden (1675).

Edward Kynaston [1619-1687] shone with uncommon lustre in "Morat" and "Muley Moloch." In both these parts he had a fierce, lion-like majesty in his port and utterance, that gave the spectators a kind of trembling admiration.—Colley Cibber.

Morat, in Switzerland, famous for the battle fought there in 1476, in which the Swiss defeated Charles le Téméraire, of Burgundy.

Morat and Marathon twin names shall stand.
Byron; Childe Harold, iii. 64 (1816).

Morbleu! This French oath is a corrupt contraction of Mau'graby; thus, maugre bleu, mau'bleu. Maugraby was the great Arabian enchanter, and the word means "barbarous," hence a barbarous man or a barbarian. The oath is common in Provence, Languedoc, and Gascoigne. I have often heard it used by the medical students at Paris.

(Probably it is a punning corruption of Mort de Dieu.)

Mordaunt, the secretary at Aix of queen Margaret the widow of Henry VI. of England.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Mor'decai (Beau), a rich Italian Jew, one of the suitors of Charlotte Goodchild; but, supposing the report to be true that the lady had lost her fortune, he called off and retired.—Macklin: Love à-la-Mode (1779).

The part that first brought John Quick [1748-1831] into notice was "Beau Mordecai," in which he appeared as far back as 1770.—Records of a Stage Veteran.

Mordent, father of Joanna by a former wife. In order to marry lady Anne, he "deserts" Joanna and leaves her to be brought up by strangers. Joanna is placed under Mrs. Enfield a crimp, and Mordent consents to a proposal of Lennox to run off with her. Mordent is a spirit embittered with the world—a bad man, with a goading conscience. He sins and suffers the anguish of remorse; does wrong, and blames Providence because when he "sows the storm he reaps the whirlwind."

Lady Anne, the wife of Mordent, daughter of the earl of Oldcrest, sister of a viscount, niece of lady Mary, and one of her uncles is a bishop. She is wholly neglected by her husband, but, like Grisilda (q.v.), bears it without complaint.—Holcroft: The Deserted Daughter (1784, altered into The Steward).

Mordred (Sir), son of Margawse (sister of king Arthur) and Arthur her brother, while she was the wife of Lot king of Orkney (pt. i. 2, 35, 36). The sons of Lot himself and his wife were Gaw'ain, Agravain, Ga'heris, and Gareth, all knights of the Round Table. Out of hatred to sir Launcelot, Mordred and Agravain accuse him to the king of too great familiarity with queen Guenever, and induce the king to spend a day in hunting. During his absence, the queen sends for sir Launcelot to her private chamber, and Mordred and Agravain, with twelve other knights, putting the worst construction on the interview, clamorously assail the chamber, and call on sir Launcelot to come out. This he does, and kills Agravain with the twelve knights, but Mordred makes his escape and tells the king, who orders the queen to be burnt alive. She is brought to the stake, but is rescued by sir Launcelot, who carries her off to Joyous Guard, near Carlisle, which the king besieges. While lying before the castle, king Arthur receives a bull from the pope, commanding him to take back his queen. This he does, but as he refuses to be reconciled to sir Launcelot, the knight betakes himself to Benwick, in Brittany. The king lays siege to Benwick, and during his absence leaves Mordred regent. Mordred usurps the crown, and tries, but in vain, to induce the queen to marry him. When the king hears thereof, he raises the siege of Benwick, and returns to England. He defeats Mordred at Dover and at Barondown, but at Salisbury (Camlan) Mordred is slain fighting with the king, and Arthur receives his death-wound. The queen then retires to a convent at Almesbury, is visited by sir Launcelot, declines to marry him, and dies.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 143-174 (1470).

N.B.—The wife of Lot is called "Anne" by Geoffrey of Monmouth (British History, viii. 20, 21); and "Bellicent" by Tennyson, in Gareth and Lynette.

(This tale is so very different to those of Geoffrey of Monmouth and Tennyson, that all three are given. See MODRED, p. 714.)

Mor'dure (2 syl.), son of the emperor of Germany. He was guilty of illicit love with the mother of sir Bevis of Southampton, who murdered her husband and then married sir Mordure. Sir Bevis, when a mere lad, reproved his mother for the murder of his father, and she employed Saber to kill him; but the murder was not committed, and young Bevis was brought up as a shepherd. One day, entering the hall where Mordure sat with his bride, Bevis struck at him with his axe. Mordure slipped aside, and the chair was "split to shivers." Bevis was then sold to an Armenian, and was presented to the king, who knighted him and gave him his daughter Josian in marriage.—Drayton: Polyolbion, ii. (1612).

Mor'dure (2 syl.), Arthur's sword, made by Merlin. No enchantment had power over it, no stone or steel was proof against it, and it would neither break nor bend. (The word means "hard biter.")—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 8 (1590).

More (Margareta), Miss Anne Manning, authoress of Household of Sir Thomas More (1851).

More of More Hall, a legendary hero, who armed himself with armour full of spikes; and, concealing himself in the cave where the dragon of Wantley dwelt, slew the monster by kicking it in the mouth, where alone it was mortal.

 In the burlesque of H. Carey, entitled The Dragon of Wantley, the hero is called "Moore of Moore Hall," and he is made to be in love with Gubbins's daughter, Margery of Roth'ram Green (1696–1743).

Morecraft, at first a miser, but after losing most of his money he became a spendthrift.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Scornful Lady (1616).

 "Luke," in Massinger's City Madam, is the exact opposite. He was at first a poor spendthrift, but coming into a fortune he turned miser.

(Beaumont died 1616.)

Morell (Sir Charles), the pseudonym of the Rev. James Ridley, affixed to some of the early editions of The Tales of the Genii, from 1764.

More'love (Lord), in love with lady Betty Modish, who torments him almost to madness by an assumed indifference, and rouses his jealousy by coquetting with lord Foppington. (For the rest, see MODISH, p. 714.)—Cibber: The Careless Husband (1704).

Morë'no (Don Antonio), a gentleman of Barcelona, who entertained don Quixote with mock-heroic hospitality.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iv. 10 (1615).

Morfin (Mr.), a cheerful bachelor in the office of Mr. Dombey, merchant. He calls himself "a creature of habit," has a great respect for the head of the house, and befriends John Carker when he falls into disgrace by robbing his employer. Mr. Morfin is a musical amateur, and finds in his violoncello a solace for all cares and worries. He marries Harriet Carker, the sister of John and James.—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Morgan, a feigned name adopted by Belarius a banished lord.—Shakespeare: Cymbeline (1605).

Morgan, one of the soldiers of prince Gwenwyn of Powys-land.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Morgan la Fée, one of the sisters of king Arthur (pt. i. 18); the others were Margawse, Elain, and Anne (Bellicent was his half-sister). Morgan calls herself "queen of the land of Gore" (pt. i. 103). She was the wife of king Vrience (pt. i. 63), the mother of sir Ew'ain (pt. i. 73), and lived in the castle of La Belle Regard (pt. ii. 122).

On one occasion, Morgan la Fée stole her brother's sword "Excalibur," with its scabbard, and sent them to sir Accolon of Gaul, her paramour, that he might kill her brother Arthur in mortal combat. If this villainy had succeeded, Morgan intended to murder her husband, marry sir Accolon, and "devise to make him king of Britain;" but sir Accolon, during the combat, dropped the sword, and Arthur, snatching it up, would have slain him had he not craved mercy and confessed the treasonable design (pt. i. 70). After this, Morgan stole the scabbard, and threw it into the lake (pt. i. 73). Lastly, she tried to murder her brother by means of a poisoned robe; but Arthur told the messenger to try it on, that he might see it, and when he did so he dropped down dead, "being burnt to a coal" (pt. i. 75).—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur (1470).

(W. Morris, in his Earthly Paradise ("August"), makes Morgan la Fée the bride of Ogier the Dane, after his earthly career was ended.)

Morgane (2 syl.), a fay, to whose charge Zephyr committed young Passelyon and his cousin Bennucq. Passelyon fell in love with the fay's daughter, and the adventures of these young lovers are told in the romance of Perceforest, iii. (1220).

Morgante (3 syl.), a ferocious giant, converted to Christianity by Orlando. After performing the most wonderful feats, he died at last from the bite of a crab.—Pulci: Morgante Maggiore (1488).

He [don Quixote] spoke favourably of Morgante, who, though of gigantic race, was most gentle in his manners.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. l. 1 (1605).

Morgany, Glamorgan.

Not a brook of Morgany.
Drayton. Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

Morgause or MARGAWSE, wife of king Lot. Their four sons were Gaw'ain, Agravain, Ga'heris, and Gareth (ch. 36); but Morgause had another son by prince Arthur, named Mordred. Her son Gaheris, having caught his mother in adultery with sir Lamorake, cut off her head.

King Lot had wedded king Arthur's sister, but king Arthur had . . . by her Mordred, therefore king Lot held against king Arthur (ch. 35).—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, I. 35, 36 (1470).

Morgia'na, the female slave, first of Cassim, and then of Ali Baba, "crafty, cunning, and fruitful in inventions." When the thief marked the door of her master's house with white chalk in order to recognize it, Morgiana marked several other doors in the same manner; next day, she observed a red mark on the door, and made a similar one on others, as before. A few nights afterwards, a merchant with thirty-eight oil-jars begged a night's lodging; and as Morgiana wanted oil for a lamp, she went to get some from one of the leather jars. "Is it time?" asked a voice. "Not yet," replied Morgiana, and going to the others, she discovered that a man was concealed in thirty-seven of the jars. From the last jar she took oil, which she made boiling hot, and with it killed the thirty-seven thieves. When the captain discovered that all his men were dead, he decamped without a moment's delay. Soon afterwards, he settled in the city as a merchant, and got invited by Ali Baba to supper, but refused to eat salt. This excited the suspicion of Morgiana, who detected in the pretended merchant the captain of the forty thieves. She danced awhile for his amusement, playfully sported with his dagger, and suddenly plunged it into his heart. When Ali Baba knew who it was that she had slain, he not only gave the damsel her liberty, but also married her to his own son.—Arabian Nights ("Ali Baba, or the Forty Thieves").

"Morgiana," said Ali Baba, "these two packets contain the body of your master [Cassim], and we must endeavour to bury him as if he died a natural death. Let me speak to your mistress."—Ali Baba, or the Forty Thieves.

Morglay, the sword of sir Bevis of Hamptoun, i.e. Southampton, given to him by his wife Josian, daughter of the king of Armenia.—Drayton: Polyolbion, ii. (1612).

You talk of Morglay, Excalibur [Arthur's sword], and Durindana [Orlando's sword], or so. Tut! I lend no credit to that is fabled of 'em.—Ben Jonson: Every Man in His Humour, iii. 1 (1598).

Morgue la Faye, a fée who watched over the birth of Ogier the Dane, and, after he had finished his earthly career, restored him to perpetual youth, and took him to live with her in everlasting love in the isle and castle of Av'alon.—Ogier le Danois (a romance).

Mor'lee (Gil or Child), the natural son of lady Barnard, "brought forth in her father's house wi' mickle sin and shame." One day Gil Morice sent Willie to the baron's hall, with a request that lady Barnard would go at once to Greenwood to see the child. Lord Barnard, fancying the "child" to be some paramour, forbade his wife to leave the hall, and went himself to Greenwood, where he slew Gil Morice, and sent his head to lady Barnard. On his return, the lady told her lord he had slain her son, and added, "Wi' that same spear, oh, pierce my heart, and put me out o' pain!" But the baron repented of his hasty deed, and cried, "I'll ay lament for Gil Morice, as gin he were mine ain."—Percy: Reliques, etc. (last ballad of bk. i.).

Morisco, a Moorish dance, a kind of hornpipe.

Mor'land, in Lend Me Five Shillings, by J. Maddison Morton (1838).

Morland (Henry), "the heir-at-law" of baron Duberly. It was generally supposed that he had perished at sea; but he was cast on cape Breton, and afterwards returned to England, and married Caroline Dormer an orphan.—Colman: The Heir-at-Law (1797).

Mr. Beverley behaved like a father to me [B. Webster], and engaged me as a walking gentleman for his London theatre, where I made my first appearance as "Henry Morland," in The Heir-at-Law, which, to avoid legal proceedings, he called The Lord's Warming-pan.—Peter Paterson.

Morley (Mrs.), the name under which queen Anne corresponded with Mrs. Freeman (the duchess of Marlborough).

Morna, daughter of Cormac king of Ireland. She was in love with Câthba, youngest son of Torman. Duchômar, out of jealousy, slew his rival, and then asked Morna to be his bride. She replied, "Thou art dark to me, O Duchômar, and cruel is thine arm to Morna." She then begged him for his sword, and when "he gave it to her she thrust it into his heart." Duchômar fell, and begged the maid to pull out the sword that he might die, but when she did so he seized it from her and plunged it into her side. Whereupon Cuthullin said—

"Peace to the souls of the heroes! Their deeds were great in fight. Let them ride around me in clouds. Let them show their features of war. My soul shall then be firm in danger, mine arm like the thunder of heaven. But be thou on a moonbeam, O Morna! near the window of my rest, when my thoughts are at peace, when the din of arms is past."—Ossian: Fingal, i.

> Bishop Ken (1674).

Morning Star of Song (The), Chaucer (1328–1400). Campbell and Tennyson both use the phrase.

Morning Star of the Reformation, John Wycliffe (1324–1384).

> Wycliffe will ever be remembered as a good and great man. . . . May he not be justly styled, "The Morning Star of the Reformation"?—Eadie.

Morocco or MAROCCUS, the performing horse, generally called "Bankes's Horse." Among other exploits, we are told that "it went up to the top of St. Paul's." Both horse and man were burnt alive at Rome, by order of the pope, as magicians.—Don Zara del Fogo, 114 (1660).

∴ Among the entries at Stationers' Hall is the following:—Nov. 14, 1595: A Ballad showing the Strange Qualities of a Young Nagg called Morocco.

In 1595 was published the pamphlet Maroccus Extaticus or Bankes's Horse in a Trance.

Morocco Men, agents of lottery assurances. In 1796 the great State lottery employed 7500 morocco men. Their business was to go from house to house among the customers of the assurances, or to attend in the back parlours of public-houses, where the customers came to meet them.

Morolt (Dennis), the old 'squire of sir Raymond Berenger.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Morose (2 syl.), a miserly old hunks, who hates to hear any voice but his own. His nephew, sir Dauphine, wants to wring out of him a third of his property, and proceeds thus: He gets a lad to personate "a silent woman," and the phenomenon so delights the old man, that he consents to a marriage. No sooner is the ceremony over, than the boy-wife assumes the character of a virago of loud and ceaseless tongue. Morose is half mad, and promises to give his nephew a third of his income if he will take this intolerable plague off his hands. The trick being revealed, Morose retires into private life, and leaves his nephew master of the situation.—Ben Jonson: Epicœne, or The Silent Woman (1609).

> Benjamin Johnson [1665–1742] seemed to be proud to wear the poet's double name, and was particularly great in all that author's plays that were usually performed, viz. "Wasp," "Corbaccio," "Morose," and "Ananias."—Chetwood.

("Wasp" in Bartholomew Fair, "Corbaccio" in The Fox, and "Ananias" in The Alchemist.)

Moroug, the monkey mistaken for the devil. A woman of Cambalu died, and Moroug, wishing to imitate her, slipped into her bed, and dressed himself in her night-clothes, while the body was carried to the cemetery. When the funeral party returned, and began the usual lamentations for the dead, pug stretched his night-capped head out of the bed and began moaning and grimacing most hideously. All the mourners thought it was the devil, and scampered out as fast as they could run. The priests assembled, and resolved to exorcise Satan; but pug, noting their terror, flew on the chief of the bonzes, and bit his nose and ears most viciously. All the others fled in disorder; and when pug had satisfied his humour, he escaped out of the window. After a while, the bonzes returned, with a goodly company well armed, when the chief bonze told them how he had fought with Satan, and prevailed against him. So he was canonized, and made a saint in the calendar for ever.—Gueulette: Chinese Tales ("The Ape Moroug," 1723).

Morrel or Morell, a goat-herd who invites Thomalin, a shepherd, to come to the higher grounds, and leave the low-lying lands. He tells Thomalin that many hills have been canonized, as St. Michael's Mount, St. Bridget's Bower in Kent, and so on; then there was mount Sinah and mount Parnass, where the Muses dwelt. Thomalin replies, "The lowlands are safer, and hills are not for shepherds." He then illustrates his remark by the tale of shepherd Algrind, who sat like Morrel on a hill, when an eagle, taking his white head for a stone, let on it a shell-fish in order to break it, and all-to cracked his skull. [Æschylus was killed by a tortoise dropped on his head by an eagle.]—Spenser, Shepheardes Calendar, vii.

(This is an allegory of the high and low church parties. Morel is an anagram of Elmer or Aylmer bishop of London, who "sat on a hill," and was the leader of the high-church party. Algrind is Grindal archbishop of Canterbury, head of the low-church party, who in 1578 was sequestrated for writing a letter to the queen on the subject of puritanism. Thomalin represents the puritans. This could not have been written before 1578, unless the reference to Algrind was added in some later edition.)

MORRIS, a domestic of the earl of Derby.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Morris (Mr.), the timid fellow-traveller of Frank Osbaldistone, who carried the portmanteau. Osbaldistone says, concerning him, "Of all the propensities which teach mankind to torment themselves, that of causeless fear is the most irritating, busy, painful, and pitiable."—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Morris (Dinah), a Methodist field preacher, in Adam Bede, a novel by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross) (1859).

Morris (Peter), the pseudonym of John G. Lockhart, in Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk (1819).

Morris-Dance, a comic representation of every grade of society. The characters were dressed partly in Spanish and partly in English costume. Thus, the huge sleeves were Spanish, but the laced stomacher English. Hobby-horse represented the king and all the knightly order; Maid Marian, the queen; the friar, the clergy generally; the fool, the court jester. Other characters represented were a franklin or private gentleman, a churl or farmer, and the lower grades represented by a clown. The Spanish costume is to show the origin of the dance.

(A representation of a morris-dance may still be seen at Betley, in Staffordshire, in a window placed in the house of George Tollet, Esq., in about 1620.)

Morrison (Hugh), a Lowland drover, the friend of Robin Oig.—Sir W. Scott: The Two Drovers (time, George III.).

Mortality (Old), a religious itinerant, who frequented country churchyards and the graves of the covenanters. He was first discovered in the burial-ground at Gandercleugh, clearing the moss from the grey tombstones, renewing with his chisel the half-defaced inscriptions, and repairing the decorations of the tombs.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.). (For the plot of the novel, see OLD MORTALITY.)

 "Old Mortality" is said to be meant for Robert Patterson.

Morta'ra, the boy who died from being covered all over with gold-leaf by Leo XII., to adorn a pageant.

Mortcloke (Mr.), the undertaker at the funeral of Mrs. Margaret Bertram of Singleside.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Morte d'Arthur, a compilation of Arthurian tales, called on the title-page The History of Prince Arthur, compiled from the French by sir Thomas Malory, and printed by William Caxton in 1470. It is divided into three parts. The first part contains the birth of king Arthur, the establishment of the Round Table, the romance of Balin and Balan, and the beautiful allegory of Gareth and Linet'. The second part is mainly the romance of sir Tristram. The third part is the romance of sir Launcelot, the quest of the holy graal, and the deaths of Arthur, Guenever, Tristram, Lamorake, and Launcelot (all which see).

 The difference of style in the third part is very striking. The end of ch. 44, pt. i. is manifestly the close of a romance. It is a pity that each romance is not marked by some formal indication, thus, pt. i. bk. I, etc.; and each book might be subdivided into chapters.

This book was finished the ninth year of the reign of king Edward IV. by sir Thomas Malory, knight. Thus endeth this noble and joyous book, entitled La Morte d'Arthur, notwithstanding it treateth of the birth, life, and acts of the said king Arthur, and of his noble knights of the Round Table . . . and the achieving of the holy Sangreall, and in the end the dolorous death and departing out of the world of them all.—Concluding paragraph.

Morte d'Arthur, by Tennyson. The poet supposes Arthur (wounded in the great battle of the West) to be borne off the field by sir Bedivere. The wounded monarch directed sir Bedivere to cast Excalibur into the mere. Twice the knight disobeyed the command, intending to save the sword; but the dying king detected the fraud, and insisted on being obeyed. So sir Bedivere cast the sword into the mere, and "an arm, clothed in white samite, caught it by the hilt, brandished it three times, and drew it into the mere." Sir Bedivere then carried the dying king to a barge, in which were three queens, who conveyed him to the island-valley of Avil'ion, "where falls not hail, or rain, or any snow, nor ever wind blows loudly." Here was he taken to be healed of his grievous wound; but whether he lived or died we are not told.

The idyll called The Passing of Arthur is verbatim like the Morte d'Arthur, with an introduction tacked on; but from "So all day long . . ." (twelfth paragraph) to the line, "So on the mere the wailing died away" (about 270 lines), the two are identical.

∴ This idyll is merely chs. 167, 168 (pt. iii.) of the History of Prince Arthur compiled by sir T. Malory, put into metre, much being a verbatim rendering. (See Notes and Queries, July 13, 1878, where the parallels are shown paragraph by paragraph.)

Mortemar (Alberick of), an exiled nobleman, alias Theodorick the hermit of Engaddi, the enthusiast.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Mor'timer (Mr.), executor of lord Abberville, and uncle of Frances Tyrrell. "He sheathed a soft heart in a rough case." Externally, Mr. Mortimer seemed unsympathetic, brusque, and rugged; but in reality he was most benevolent, delicate, and tender-hearted. "He did a thousand noble acts without the credit of a single one." In fact, his tongue belied his heart, and his heart his tongue.—Cumberland: The Fashionable Lover (1780).

Mor'timer (Sir Edward), a most benevolent man, oppressed with some secret sorrow. In fact, he knew himself to be a murderer. The case was this: Being in a county assembly, the uncle of lady Helen insulted him, struck him down, and kicked him. Sir Edward rode home to send a challenge to the ruffian; but meeting him on the road drunk, he murdered him, was tried for the crime, but was honourably acquitted. He wrote a statement of the case, and kept the papers connected with it in an iron chest. One day, Wilford, his secretary, whose curiosity had been aroused, saw the chest unlocked, and was just about to take out the documents when sir Edward entered, and threatened to shoot him; but he relented, made Wilford swear secrecy, and then told him the whole story. The young man, unable to live under the jealous eye of sir Edward, ran away; but sir Edward dogged him, and at length arrested him on the charge of robbery. The charge broke down, Wilford was acquitted, sir Edward confessed himself a murderer, and died.—Colman: The Iron Chest (1796).

∴ This is the novel of Caleb Williams by Godwin (1794), dramatized.

Mortimer Lightwood, solicitor, employed in the "Harmon murder" case. He was the great friend of Eugene Wrayburn, barrister-at-law, and it was the ambition of his life to imitate the nonchalance and other eccentricities of his friend. At one time he was a great admirer of Bella Wilfer. Mr. Veneering called him "one of his oldest friends;" but Mortimer was never in the merchant's house but once in his life, and resolved never to enter it again.—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1864).

Mortimer Street (London); so called from Harley, earl of Oxford and Mortimer, and baron of Wigmore, in Herefordshire.

MORTON, a retainer of the earl of Northumberland.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. (1598).

Morton (Henry), a leader in the covenanters' army with Balfour. While abroad, he is major-general Melville. Henry Morton marries Miss Eden Bellenden.

Morton (The earl of), in the service of Mary queen of Scots, and a member of the privy council of Scotland.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery and The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Morton (The Rev. Mr.), the presbyterian pastor of Cairnvreckan village.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Mortsheugh (Johnie), the old sexton of Wolf's Hope village.—Sir W. Scott: The Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Morven ("a ridge of high hills"), all the north-west of Scotland; called in Ossian "windy Morven," "resounding Morven," "echoing Morven," "rocky Morven." Fingal is called indifferently "king of Selma" and "king of Morven." Selma was the capital of Morven. Probably it was Argyllshire extended north and east.

Morvi'dus, son of Danius by his concubine Tangustĕla. In his reign there "came from the Irish coast a most cruel monster, which devoured the people continually; but as soon as Morvidus heard thereof, he ventured to encounter it alone. When all his darts were spent, the monster rushed upon him, and swallowed him up like a small fish."—Geoffrey: British History, iii. 15 (1142).

. . . that valiant bastard . . .
Morvidus (Danius' son), who with that monster fought,
His subjects that devoured.
Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1612

(Morvidus is erroneously printed "Morindus" in Drayton, but has been corrected in the quotation given above.)

Mosby, an unmitigated villain. He seduced Alicia, the wife of Arden of Feversham. Thrice he tried to murder Arden, but was baffled, and then frightened Alicia into conniving at a most villainous scheme of murder. Pretending friendship, Mosby hired two ruffians to murder Arden while he was playing a game of draughts. The villains, who were concealed in an adjacent room, were to rush on their victim when Mosby said, "Now I take you." The whole gang were apprehended and executed.—Arden of Feversham (1592), altered by George Lillo (1739).

Mosca, the knavish confederate of Vol'pone (2 syl.) the rich Venetian "fox."—Ben Jonson: Volpone or The Fox (1605).

If your mother, in hopes to ruin me, should consent to marry my pretended uncle, he might, like "Mosca" in The Fox, stand upon terms.—Congreve: The Way of the World, ii. 1 (1700).

Mosce'ra, a most stately convent built by the abbot Rodulfo, on the ruins of a dilapidated fabric. On the day of opening, an immense crowd assembled, and the abbot felt proud of his noble edifice. Amongst others came St. Gualber'to (3 syl.) who, when the abbot showed him the pile and the beauty thereof, said in prayer, "If this convent is built for God's glory, may it abide to the end of time; but if it is a monument of man's pride, may that little brook which flows hard by overwhelm it with its waters." At the word, the brook ceased to flow, the waters piled up mountain high; then, dashing on the convent, overthrew it, nor left one stone upon another, so complete was the ruin. —Southey: St. Gualberto.

Moscow. So-and-so was my Moscow, that is, the turning-point of my good fortune, leading to future "shoals and misery." The reference is to Napoleon Bonaparte's disastrous Russian expedition, when his star hastened to its "set."

Juan was my Moscow [the ruin of my reputation and fame].
Byron: Don Juan, xi. 56 (1824).

Mo'ses, the Jew money-lender in The School for Scandal, by Sheridan (1777).

Moses' Clothes. The Korân says, "God cleared Moses from the scandal which was rumoured against him" (ch. xxxiii.). The scandal was that his body was not properly formed, and therefore he would never bathe in the presence of others. One day he went to bathe, and laid his clothes on a stone, but the stone ran away with them into the camp. Moses went after it as fast as he could run, but the Israelites saw his naked body, and perceived the untruthfulness of the common scandal.—Sale: Al Korân, xxxiii. notes.

Moses' Horns. The Vulgate gives quod cornuta esset facies sua, for what our version has translated, "he wist not that the skin of his face shone." The Hebrew word used means both a "horn" and an "irradiation." Michael Angelo followed the Vulgate.

Moses' Rod.

While Moses was living with Re'uĕl [Jithro] the Midianite, he noticed a staff in the garden, and he took it to be his walking-stick. This staff was Joseph's, and Re'uel carried it away when he fled from Egypt. This same staff Adam carried with him out of Eden. Noah inherited it, and gave it to Shem. It passed into the hands of Abraham, and Abraham left it to Isaac; and when Jacob fled from his brother's anger into Mesopotamia, he carried it in his hand, and gave it at death to his son Joseph.—The Talmud, vi.

Moses Slow of Speech. The tradition is this: One day, Pharaoh was carrying Moses in his arms, when the child plucked the royal beard so roughly that the king, in a passion, ordered him to be put to death. Queen Asia said to her husband, the child was only a babe, and was so young he could not discern between a ruby and a live coal. Pharaoh put it to the test, and the child clapped into its mouth the burning coal, thinking it something good to eat. Pharaoh's anger was appeased, but the child burnt its tongue so severely that ever after it was "slow of speech."—Shalshel: Hakkabala, II.

 The account given in the Talmud is somewhat different. It is therein stated that Pharaoh was sitting one day with Moses on his lap, when the child took the crown from the king's head and placed it on his own. The "wise men" of Egypt persuaded Pharaoh that this act was treasonable, and that the child should be put to death. Jithro [sic] the priest of Midian said it was the act of a child who knew no better. "Let two plates," said he, "be set before the child, one containing gold and the other live coals, and you will presently see that he will choose the coals in preference to the gold." The advice of Jithro being followed, the boy Moses snatched at the coals, and, putting one of them into his mouth, burnt his tongue so severely that ever after he was "heavy of speech."—The Talmud, vi.

Most Christian King (Le Roy Tres-Christien). The king of France used to be so called by others, either with or without his proper name; but he never styled himself so in any letter, grant, or rescript.

In St. Remigius' or Remy's Testament, king Clovis is called Christianissimus Ludovicus. (See Flodard: Historia Remensis, i. 18, A.D. 940.)

Motallab (Abdal), one of the four husbands of Zesbet the mother of Mahomet. He was not to know her as a wife till he had seen Mahomet in his pre-existing state. Mahomet appeared to him as an old man, and told him he had chosen Zesbet for her virtue and beauty to be his mother.—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("History of Abdal Motallab," 1743).

Mo'tar ("one doomed or devoted to sacrifice"). So prince Assad was called, when he fell into the hands of the old fire-worshipper, and was destined by him to be sacrificed on the fiery mountain.—Arabian Nights ("Amgiad and Assad").

Moth, page to don Adriano de Arma'do the fantastical Spaniard. He is cunning and versatile, facetious and playful.—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost (1594).

Moth, one of the fairies.—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

Moths and Candles. The moths fell in love with the night-fly; and the night-fly, to get rid of their importunity, maliciously bade them to go and fetch fire for her adornment. The blind lovers flew to the first flame to obtain the love-token, and few escaped injury or death.—Kæmpfer: Account of Japan, vii. (1727).

Mother Ann, Ann Lee, the "spiritual mother" of the shakers (1734–1784).

∴ Mother Ann is regarded as the female form, and Jesus as the male form, of the Messiah.

Mother Bunch, a celebrated ale-wife in Dekker's Satiro-mastix (1602).

∴ In 1604 was published Pasquil's Jests, mixed with Mother Bunch's Merriments. In 1760 was published, in two parts, Mother Bunch's Closet newly Broke Open, etc., by a "Lover of Mirth and Hater of Treason."

Mother Bunch's Fairy Tales are known in every nursery.

Mother Carey's Chickens. The fish-fags of Paris in the first Great Revolution were so called, because, like the "stormy petrel," whenever they appeared in force in the streets of Paris, they always forboded a tumult or political storm.

Mother Carey's Goose, the great black petrel or gigantic fulmar of the Pacific Ocean.

Mother Douglas, a noted crimp, who lived at the north-east corner of Covent Garden. Her house was superbly furnished. She died 1761.

∴ Foote introduces her in The Minor as "Mrs. Cole" (1760); and Hogarth in his picture called "The March to Finchley."

Mother Goose, in French Contes de Ma Mère l'Oye, by Charles Perrault (1697).

∴ There are ten stories in this book, seven of which are from the Pentamerone.

Mother Goose, a native of Boston, in Massachusetts, authoress of nursery rhymes. Mother Goose used to sing her rhymes to her grandson, and Thomas Fleet, her brother-in-law, of Pudding Lane (now Devonshire Street), printed and published the first edition, entitled Songs for the Nursery or Mother Goose's Melodies, in 1719.

(Dibdin wrote a pantomime entitled Mother Goose.)

Mother Hubbard, an old lady whose whole time and attention were taken up by her dog, who was most wilful; but the dame never lost her temper nor forgot her politeness. After running about all day, vainly endeavouring to supply Master Doggie—

The dame made a curtsey, the dog made a bow;
The dame said, "Your servant!" the dog said, "Bow, wow!"
A Nursery Tale in Rhyme.

 This tale is comparatively modern, certainly subsequent to the introduction of clay pipes in the seventeenth century; for on one occasion the dame found her dog "smoking his pipe." Probably it is not earlier than the middle of the eighteenth century, when smoking pipes had become pretty common. It may be a political skit, as so many of our nursery songs are, the "bull-dog" being William Pitt, and the dame the French, who tried to win him over and even made a curtsey, but the "dog" cried Bow-wow!

Mother Hubberd, the supposed narrator of a tale called The Fox and the Ape, related to the poet Spenser to beguile the weary hours of sickness. Several persons told him tales, but

Amongst the rest a good old woman was Hight Mother Hubberd, who did far surpass
The rest in honest mirth that seemed her well;
She, when her turn was come her tale to tell,
Told of a strange adventure that betided
Betwixt a fox and ape by him misguided;
The which, for that my sense it greatly pleased, ...
I'll write it as she the same did say.
Spenser.

Mother Hubberd's Tale. A fox and an ape determined to travel about the world as chevaliers de l'industrie. First, Ape dressed as a broken-down soldier, and Fox as his servant. A farmer agreed to take them for his shepherds; but they devoured all his lambs and then decamped. They next "went in for holy orders." Reynard contrived to get a living given him, and appointed the ape as his clerk; but they soon made the parish too hot to hold them, and again sheered off. They next tried their fortune at court; the ape set himself up as a foreigner of distinction, with Fox for his groom. They played the part of rakes, but being found to be desperate rogues, had to flee with all despatch, and seek another field of action. As they journeyed on, they saw a lion sleeping, and Master Fox persuaded his companion to steal the crown, sceptre, and royal robes. The ape, arrayed in these, assumed to be king, and Fox was his prime minister; but so ill did they govern that Jupiter interfered, the lion was restored, and the ape was docked of his tail and had his ears cropt.

Since which, all apes but half their ears have left,
And of their tails are utterly bereft.
So Mother Hubberd her discourse did end.
Spenser: Mother Hubberd's Tale.

Mother Shipton, T. Evan Preece, of South Wales, a prophetess, whose predictions (generally in rhymes) were at one time in everybody's mouth in South Wales, especially in Glamorganshire.

 She predicted the death of Wolsey, lord Percy, and others. Her prophecies are still extant. That of "the end of the world in eighteen hundred and eighty-one" is a forgery.

Mother of the People (The), Marguerite of France la Mère des Peuples, daughter of François I. (1523-1574).

Mother's Three Joys (A). "The three holydays allowed to the fond mother's heart," passing by the ecstasy of the birth of her child, are—

1. When first the white blossoms of his teeth appear, breaking the crimson buds that did encase them; that is a day of joy.
2. Next, when from his father's arms he runs without support, and clings, laughing and delighted, to his mother's knee; that is the mother's heart's next holyday.
3. And sweeter still the third, whenever his little stammering tongue shall utter the grateful sound of "father," "mother;" oh, that is the dearest joy of all! —Sheridan: Pizarro (altered from Kotzebue, 1799).

Mould (Mr.), undertaker. His face had a queer attempt at melancholy, sadly at variance with a smirk of satisfaction which might be read between the lines. Though his calling was not a lively one, it did not depress his spirits, as in the bosom of his family he was the most cheery of men, and to him the "tap, tap" of coffin-making was as sweet and exhilarating as the tapping of a woodpecker.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Mouldy (Ralph), "a good-limbed fellow, young, strong, and of good friends." Ralph was pricked for a recruit in sir John Falstaff's regiment. He promised Bardolph forty shillings "to stand his friend." Sir John, being told this, sent Mouldy home, and when justice Shallow remonstrated, saying that Ralph "was the likeliest man of the lot," Falstaff replied, "Will you tell me, Master Shallow, how to choose a man? Care I for the limb, the thews, the stature, bulk, and big assemblance of a man? Give me the spirit, Master Shallow."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV. act iii. sc. 2 (1598).

Moullahs, Mohammedan lawyers, from which are selected the judges.

Mount of Transfiguration. The two most popular opinions are that it was either Mount Tabor or one of the peaks of Mount Hermon. The great objection to the former is that Mount Tabor was fortified at the time. Tennyson considered the latter suggestion the most feasible, and it seems more likely, as Christ and His disciples were at the time in the vicinity of Cæsarea Philippi.

Mount Zion, the Celestial City.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress (1678).

Mountain (The). A name given in the French Revolution to a faction which sat on the benches most elevated in the Hall of Assembly. The Girondins sat in the centre or lowest part of the hall, and were nicknamed the "plain." The "mountain" for a long time was the dominant part; it utterly overthrew the "plain" on August 31, 1793; but was in turn overthrown at the fall of Robespierre (9 Thermidor ii. or July 27, 1794).

Mountain (The Old Man of the), the imaum Hassan ben Sabbah el Homairi. The sheik Al Jebal was so called. He was the prince of the Assassins.

 In Rymer's Fœdera (vol. i.) Dr. Clarke, the editor, has added two letters of this sheik; but the doctor must be responsible for their genuineness.

Mountain Brutus (The), William Tell (1282–1350).

Mountain-Monarch of Europe, mont Blanc.

Mountain of Flowers, the site of the palace of Violenta, the mother fairy who brought up the young princess afterwards metamorphosed into "The White Cat."—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1682).

Mountain of Miseries. Jupiter gave permission for all men to bring their grievances to a certain plain, and to exchange them with any others that had been cast off. Fancy helped them; but, though the heap was so enormous, not one single vice was to be found amongst the rubbish. Old women threw away their wrinkles, and young ones their mole-spots; some cast on the heap poverty; many their red noses and bad teeth; but no one his crimes. Now came the choice. A galley-slave picked up gout, poverty picked up sickness, care picked up pain, snub noses picked up long ones, and so on. Soon all were bewailing the change they had made; and Jupiter sent Patience to tell them they might, if they liked, resume their own grievances again. Every one gladly accepted the permission, and Patience helped them to take up their own bundle, and bear it without a murmur.—Addison: The Spectator (1711, 1712, 1714).

Mountains (Prince of German), Schneekoppe (5235 feet), in Eastern Prussia.

Mourning. In Colman's Heir-at-Law (1797) every character is in mourning: the Dowlases as relatives of the deceased lord Duberly; Henry Morland as heir of lord Duberly; Steadfast as the chief friend of the family; Dr. Pangloss as a clergyman; Caroline Dormer for her father recently buried; Zekiel and Cicely Homespun for the same reason; Kenrick for his deceased master.—J. Smith: Memoirs (1840).

Mourning Bride (The), a drama by W. Congreve (1697). "The mourning bride" is Alme'ria daughter of Manuel king of Grana'da, and her husband was Alphonso prince of Valentia. On the day of their espousals they were shipwrecked, and each thought the other had perished; but they met together in the court of Granada, where Alphonso was taken captive under the assumed name of Osmyn. Osmyn, having effected his escape, marched to Granada at the head of an army, found the king dead, and "the mourning bride" became his joyful wife.

 This play is noted for the introductory lines—

> Music hath charms to soothe the savage breast,
> To soften rocks, and bend a knotted oak.

And Dr. Johnson extravagantly praises the description of a cathedral in the play, beginning—

> How reverend is the face of this tall pile!

Mouse (The Country and the City) (1687), a travesty, by Prior, of Dryden's Hind and the Panther (1687).

Mouse-Tower (The), on the Rhine. It was here that bishop Hatto was devoured by mice. (See HATTO, p. 474.)

 Mauth is a toll or custom-house, and the mauth or toll-house for collecting duty on corn, being very unpopular, gave rise to the tradition.

Moussa, Moses.

Mowbray (Mr. John), lord of the manor of St. Ronan's.

Clara Mowbray, sister of John Mowbray. She was betrothed to Frank Tyrrel, but married Valentine Bulmer.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Mowbray (Sir Miles), a dogmatical, self-opinionated old man, who fancied he could read character, and had a natural instinct for doing the right thing; but he would have been much wiser if he had paid more heed to the proverb, "Mind your own business and not another's."

Frederick Mowbray, his eldest son, a young man of fine principles, and greatly liked. His "first love" was Clara Middleton, who, being poor, married the rich lord Ruby. His lordship soon died, leaving all his substance to his widow, who bestowed it with herself on Frederick Mowbray, her first and only love.

David Mowbray, younger brother of Frederick. He was in the navy, and was a fine open-hearted, frank, and honest British tar.

Lydia Mowbray, sister of Frederick and David, and the wife of Mr. Wrangle.—Cumberland: First Love (1796).

Mow'cher (Miss), a benevolent little dwarf, patronized by Steerforth. She is full of humour and common vulgarity. Her chief occupation is that of hair-dressing.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Mowis, the bridegroom of snow, who woed and won a beautiful bride, but at dawn melted into the sun. The bride hunted for him night and day, but never saw him more.—American-Indian Legend.

Mowis, the bridegroom of snow, who won and wedded a maiden,
But when the morning came, arose and passed from the wigwam,
Fading and melting away, and dissolving into the sunshine,
Till she beheld him no more, tho' she followed far into the forest.
Longfellow: Evangeline, ii. 4 (1849).

Mozaide (2 syl.), the Moor who befriended Vasco de Gama when he first landed on the Indian continent.

The Moor attends, Mozaide, whose zealous care
To Gama's eyes revealed each treacherous snare.
Camoëns: Lusiad, ix. (1569).

Mozart, of Germany. The composer of Don Giovanni, Nozze di Figaro, Zauberflöte (operas), and the famous Requiem, etc. (1756–1792).

The English Mozart, sir Henry Bishop (1780–1855).

The Italian Mozart, Cherubini of Florence (1760–1842).

Much, the miller's son, the bailiff or "acater" of Robin Hood. (See MIDGE, p. 704.)

Robyn stode in Barnysdale,
And lened hym to a tree;
And by hym stode Lytell Johan,
A good yemen was he;
And also dyde good Scathelock,
And Much the miller's sone.
Ritson: Robin Hood Ballads, t. 1 (1594).

Much, the Miller's Son, in the morris-dance. His feat was to bang, with an inflated bladder, the heads of gaping spectators. He represented the fool or jester.

Much Ado about Nothing, a comedy by Shakespeare (1600). Hero, the daughter of Leonato, is engaged to be married to Claudio of Aragon; but don John, out of hatred to his brother Leonato, determines to mar the happiness of the lovers. Accordingly, he bribes the waiting-maid of Hero to dress in her mistress's clothes, and to talk with him by moonlight from the chamber balcony. The villain tells Claudio that Hero has made an assignation with him, and invites him to witness it. Claudio is fully persuaded that the woman he sees is Hero, and when next day she presents herself at the altar, he rejects her with scorn. The priest feels assured there is some mistake, so he takes Hero apart, and gives out that she is dead. Then don John takes to flight, the waiting-woman confesses, Claudio repents, and by way of amendment (as Hero is dead) promises to marry her cousin, but this cousin turns out to be Hero herself.

¶ Another occurs in the Faërie Queene, by Spenser, bk. ii. 4, 38, etc. (1590).

¶ George Turberville's Geneura (1576) is still more like Shakespeare's tale. Belleforest and Bandello have also similar tales (see Hist., xviii.).

Mucklebackit (Saunders), the old fisherman at Musselcrag.

Old Elspeth Mucklebackit, mother of Saunders, and formerly servant to lady Glenallan.

Maggie Mucklebackit, wife of Saunders.

Steenie Mucklebackit, eldest son of Saunders. He is drowned.

Little Jennie Mucklebackit, Saunders's child.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Mucklethrift (Bailie), ironmonger and brazier of Kippletringan, in Scotland.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Mucklewrath (Habakkuk), a fanatic preacher.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Mucklewrath (John), smith at Cairnvreckan village.

Dame Mucklewrath, wife of John. A terrible virago.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Muckworm (Sir Penurious), the miserly old uncle and guardian of Arbella. He wants her to marry squire Sapskull, a raw Yorkshire tike; but she loves Gaylove, a young barrister, and, of course, Muckworm is outwitted.—Carey: The Honest Yorkshireman (1736).

Mudarra, son of Gonçalo Bustos de Salas de Lara, who murdered his uncle Rodri'go while hunting, to avenge the death of his seven half-brothers. The tale is that Rodrigo Velasquez invited his seven nephews to a feast, when a fray took place in which a Moor was slain; the aunt, who was a Moorish lady, demanded vengeance, whereupon the seven boys were allured into a ravine and cruelly murdered. Mudarra was the son of the same father as "the seven sons of Lara," but not of the same mother.—Romance of the Eleventh Century.

Muddle, the carpenter under captain Savage and lieutenant O'Brien.—Marryat: Peter Simple (1833).

Muddlewick (Triptolemus), in Charles XII., an historical drama by Planché (1826).

Mudjekee'wis, the father of Hiawatha, and subsequently potentate of the winds. He gave all the winds but one to his children to rule; the one he reserved was the west wind, which he himself ruled over. The dominion of the winds was given to Mudjekeewis because he slew the great bear called the Mishê-Mokwa.

> Thus was slain the Mishê-Mokwa . . .
> "Honour be to Mudjekeewis!
> Henceforth he shall be the west wind,
> And hereafter, e'en for ever,
> Shall he hold supreme dominion
> Over all the winds of heaven."
> Longfellow: Hiawatha, ii. (1855).

Muff (Sir Harry), in The Rival Candidates (a musical interlude) by Dudley (1774). Muff is not only unsuccessful in his election, he also finds his daughter's affections are engaged during his absence.

Mug (Matthew), a caricature of the duke of Newcastle.—Foote: The Mayor of Garratt (1763).

Mugby Junction, a Christmas number in All the Year Round (1866), Dickens wrote Barbox Brothers, The Boy at Mugby, and The Signalman.

Mugello, the giant slain by Averardo de Medici, a commander under Charlemagne. This giant wielded a mace from which hung three balls, which the Medici adopted as their device.

∴ Three balls have been adopted by pawnbrokers as a symbol of their trade.

Muggins (Dr.), a sapient physician, who had the art "to suit his physic to his patients' taste;" so when king Artaxaminous felt a little seedy after a night's debauch, the doctor prescribed to his majesty "to take a morning whet."—Rhodes: Bombastes Furioso (1790).

Muhldenau, the minister of Mariendorpt, and father of Meeta and Adolpha. When Adolpha was an infant, she was lost in the siege of Magdeburg; and Muhldenau, having reason to suppose that the child was not killed, went to Prague in search of her. Here Muhldenau was seized as a spy, and condemned to death. Meeta, hearing of his capture, walked to Prague to beg him off, and was introduced to the governor's supposed daughter, who, in reality, was Meeta's sister Adolpha. Rupert Roselheim, who was betrothed to Meeta, stormed the prison and released Muhldenau.—Knowles: The Maid of Mariendorpt (1838).

Mulatto, a half-caste. Strictly speaking, Zambo is the issue of an Indian and a Negress; Mulatto, of a Whiteman and a Negress; Terzeron, of a Whiteman and a Mulatto woman; Quadroon, of a Terzeron and a White.

Mul'ciber, Vulcan, who was blacksmith, architect, and god of fire.

> In Ausonian land
> Men called him Mulciber; and how he fell
> From heaven, they fabled, thrown by angry Jove
> Sheer o'er the crystal battlements; from morn
> To noon he fell, from noon to dewy eve,
> A summer's day; and with the setting sun
> Dropt from the zenith like a falling star,
> On Lemnos, the Ægean ile.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, 739, etc. (1665).

Muley Bugentuf, king of Morocco, a blood-and-thunder hero. He is the chief character of a tragedy of the same name, by Thomas de la Fuenta.

> In the first act, the king of Morocco, by way of recreation, shot a hundred Moorish slaves with arrows; in the second, he beheaded thirty Portuguese officers, prisoners of war; and in the third and last act, Muley, mad with his wives, set fire with his own hand to a detached palace, in which they were shut up, and reduced them all to ashes. . . . This conflagration, accompanied with a thousand shrieks, closed the piece in a very diverting manner.—Lesage: Gil Blas, ii. 9 (1715).

Muléykeh, a beautiful mare which belonged to an Arab called Hóseyn.

One night she was stolen by Duhl, who galloped away on her. Hóseyn followed the thief on the sister mare Buhéyseh, and gained so fast that the horses were soon "neck by croup." Then it flashed across Hóseyn's mind that his darling was being beaten, and he shouted instructions to Duhl to urge her on. The mare obeyed her master's voice, bounded forward, and was soon out of sight and lost to him for ever.—An old Arabian Story.

(Browning has a poem called Mulèykeh.)

Mull Sack. John Cottington, in the time of the Commonwealth, was so called, from his favourite beverage. John Cottington emptied the pockets of Oliver Cromwell when lord protector; stripped Charles II. of £1500; and stole a watch and chain from lady Fairfax.

∴ Mull sack is spiced sherry negus.

Mulla. Thomas Campbell, in his poem on the Spanish Parrot, calls the island of Mull "Mulla's Shore."

Mulla's Bard, Spenser, author of the Faërie Queene. The Mulla (Awbeg) is a tributary of the Blackwater, in Ireland, and flowed close by the spot where the poet's house stood. He was born and died in London (1553–1599).

> . . . it irks me while I write,
> As erst the bard of Mulla's silver stream,
> Oft as he told of deadly dolorous plight,
> Sighed as he sung, and did in tears indite.
> Shenstone: The Schoolmistress (1758).

Mullet (Professor), the "most remarkable man" of North America. He denounced his own father for voting on the wrong side at an election for president, and wrote thunderbolts, in the form of pamphlets, under the signature of "Suturb," or "Brutus" reversed.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Mul'mutine Laws, the code of Dunvallo Mulmutius, sixteenth king of the Britons (about B.C. 400). This code was translated by Gildas from British into Latin, and by Alfred into English. The Mulmutine laws obtained in this country till the Conquest.—Holinshed: History of England, etc., iii. 1 (1577).

> Mulmutius made our laws,
> Who was the first of Britain which did put
> His brows within a golden crown, and call'd
> Himself a king.
> Shakespeare: Cymbeline, act iii. sc. 1 (1605).

Mulmutius (Dunwallo), son of Cloten king of Cornwall. "He excelled all the kings of Britain in valour and gracefulness of person." In a battle fought against the allied Welsh and Scotch armies, Mulmutius tried the very scheme which Virgil (Æneid, ii.) says was attempted by Æneas and his companions—that is, they dressed in the clothes and bore the arms of the enemy slain; and, thus disguised, committed very great slaughter. Mulmutius, in his disguise, killed both the Cambrian and Albanian kings, and put the allied army to thorough rout.—Geoffrey: British History, ii. 17 (1142).

> Mulmutius this land in such estate maintained
> As his great belsire Brute.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1612).

Mulready Envelope. (See ENVELOPE, p. 325.)

Multon (Sir Thomas de), of Gilsland. He is lord de Vaux, a crusader, and master of the horse to Richard I.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Mumblasen (Master Michael), the old herald, a dependent of sir Hugh Robsart.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Mumbo Jumbo, an African bogie, hideous and malignant, the terror of women and children.

Mumps (Tib), keeper of the "Mumps' Ha' ale-hous'," on the road to Charlie's Hope farm.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Munchan'sen (The baron), a hero of most marvellous adventures.—Rudolf Erich Raspe (a German, but storekeeper of the Dolcoath mines, in Cornwall, 1792).

∴ The name is said to refer to Hieronymus Karl Friedrich von Münchhausen, a German officer in the Russian army, noted for his marvellous stories (1720–1797). It is also supposed to be an implied satire on the travellers' tales of baron de Tott, in Mémoires sur les Turcs et Tartares (1784), and those of James Bruce "The African Traveller" in Travels to Discover the Sources of the Nile (1790).

Munchausen (The baron). The French Munchausen is represented by M. de Crac, the hero of a French operetta.

Mundungus. So Sterne, in his Sentimental Journey, calls Dr. S. Sharp, who published his continental tour, containing scurrilous remarks on Italian ladies (1768).

Mu'nera, daughter of Pollentê the Saracen, to whom he gave all the spoils he could lay his hands on. Munera was beautiful and rich exceedingly; but Talus, having chopped off her golden hands and silver feet, tossed her into the moat.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 2 (1596)

Mungo, a black slave of don Diego.

Dear heart, what a terrible life am I led!
A dog has a better dat's sheltered and fed . . .
Mungo here, Mungo dere,
Mungo everywhere . . .
Me wish to de Lord me was dead.
Bickerstaff: The Padlock (1768).

Mungo (St.), that is St. Kentigern. Mungo = lovable friend, and is a pet name.

Murat (The Russian), Michael Miloradowitch (1770-1820).

Murdstone (Edward), the second husband of Mrs. Copperfield. His character was "firmness," that is, an unbending self-will, which rendered the young life of David intolerably wretched.

Jane Murdstone, sister of Edward, as hard and heartless as her brother. Jane Murdstone became the companion of Dora Spenlow, and told Mr. Spenlow of David's love for Dora, hoping to annoy David. At the death of Mr. Spenlow, Jane returned to live with her brother.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Murray or Moray (The bonnie earl of), was son-in-law of James Stuart. He is called the "Good Regent," and was named Moray by special creation, in right of his wife. The Regent, born 1531, was a natural son of James V. of Scotland by Margaret daughter of John lord Erskine. He joined the reform party in 1556, was an accomplice in the murder of Rizzio, and was himself assassinated, in 1570, at Linlithgow, by Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh. His son-in-law, the bonnie earl, was, according to an ancient ballad, "the queen's love," i.e. queen Anne of Denmark, daughter of Frederick II., and wife of James I. of England. It is said that James, being jealous of the handsome earl, instigated the earl of Huntly to murder him (1592).

* Introduced by Scott in The Monastery and The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Murray (John), of Broughton, secretary to Charles Edward, the Young Pretender. He turned king's evidence, and revealed all the circumstances which gave rise to the rebellion, and the persons most active in its organization.

If crimes like these hereafter are forgiven,
Judas and Murray both may go to heaven.
Jacobite Relics, ii. 374.

Murray (Dolly), who dies playing cards.—Crabbe: Borough (1810).

Museus, the poet (B.C. 1410), author of the elegant tale of Leander and Hero. Virgil places him in the Elysian fields, attended by a vast multitude of ghosts, Musæus being taller by a head than any of them (Æneid, vi. 677).

Swarm . . . as the infernal spirits
On sweet Musæus when he came to hell.
Marlow: Dr. Faustus (1590).

Muscadins of Paris, Paris exquisites, who aped the London cockneys in the first French Revolution. Their dress consisted of top-boots with thick soles, knee-breeches, a dress-coat with long tails and high stiff collar, and a thick cudgel called a constitution. It was thought John Bull-like to assume a huskiness of voice, a discourtesy of manners, and a swaggering vulgarity of speech and behaviour.

Cockneys of London! Muscadins of Paris!
Byron: Don Juan, viii. 124 (1824).

Mus'carol, king of flies, and father of Clarion the most beautiful of the race.—Spenser: Muiopotmos or The Butterfly's Fate (1590).

Muse (The Tenth), Marie Lejars de Gournay, a French writer (1566-1645).

ANTOINETTE DESHOULIERES; also called "The French Calliope." Her best work is an allegory called Les Moutons (1633-1694).

MLLE. SCUDÉRI was preposterously so called (1607-1701).

Also DELPHINE GAY, afterwards Mme. Emile de Girardin. She assumed the name of "vicomte de Launay." Béranger sang of "the beauty of her shoulders," and Châteaubriand of "the charms of her smile" (1804-1855).

Muse-Mother, Mnemos'ynê, goddess of memory and mother of the Muses.

Memory,
That sweet Muse-mother.
R. Browning: Prometheus Bound (1850).

Muses (Symbols of the).

(1) CAL'LIOPE [Kăl'-ly-o-pe], the epic Muse. Her symbols are a tablet and stylus; sometimes a scroll.

(2) CLIO, Muse of history. Her symbol is a scroll, or an open chest of books.

(3) ER'ATO, Muse of love ditties. Her symbol is a lyre.

(4) EUTER'PĒ, Muse of lyric poetry, whose symbol is a flute.

(5) MELPOM'ENĒ, Muse of tragedy: a tragic mask, the club of Hercules, or a sword. She wears the cothurnus, and her head is wreathed with vine leaves.

(6) POL'YHYM'NIA, Muse of sacred poetry. She sits pensive, but has no attribute, because deity is not to be represented by any visible symbol.

(7) TERPSIC'HORĒ [Terp-sick'-o-re]

Muse of choral song and dance. Her symbols are a lyre and the plectrum.

(8) THALI'A, Muse of comedy and idyllic poetry. Her symbols are a comic mask, a shepherd's staff, or a wreath of ivy.

(9) URAN'IA, Muse of astronomy. She carries a staff pointing to a globe.

Museum (A Walking), Longinus, author of a work on The Sublime (213-273).

Musgrave (Sir Richard), the English champion who fought with sir William Deloraine the Scotch champion, to decide by combat whether young Scott, the heir of Branksome Hall, should become the page of king Edward or be delivered up to his mother. In the combat, sir Richard was slain, and the boy was delivered over to his mother.—Sir W. Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel (1805).

Musgrave (Sir Miles), an officer in the king's service under the earl of Montrose.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Musgrave and Lady Barnard (Little), an old ballad, which is often quoted and referred to by mediæval writers. Lady Barnard invited Little Musgrave to pass the night with her at her country house in Bucklesford-bury. He consented to do so, but her page, who overheard the assignation, went and told lord Barnard. Lord Barnard disbelieved the page, but nevertheless went to his country house, and found that the page had spoken the truth. He commanded Little Musgrave to dress himself, and then handing him a sword, they fought, and Musgrave fell. Lord Barnard then cut off the two breasts of his wife, and left her to bleed to death.—Percy: Reliques, series iii. bk. 1, xi.

Music. Amphion is said to have built the walls of Thebes by the music of his lyre. Ilium and the capital of Arthur's kingdom were also built to divine music. The city of Jericho was destroyed by music (Josh. vi. 20).

> They were building still, seeing the city was built
> To music.
> Tennyson.

The Father of Music, Giovanni Battista Pietro Aloisio da Palestri'na (1529-1594).

The Father of Greek Music, Terpander (fl. B.C. 676).

Music and Madness. Persons bitten by the tarantula are said to be cured by music. (See Burton: Anatomy of Melancholy, ii. 2, 1624.)

Music and Men of Genius.

(1) The following had no ear for music: Byron, Hume, Dr. Johnson, and sir Walter Scott.

(2) The following were actually averse to it: Burke, Fox, Daniel O'Connell, sir Robert Peel, Pitt, and Southey.

(3) To Rogers the poet it gave actual discomfort; and even the smooth-versifier Pope preferred a street barrel-organ to Handel's oratorios.

Music's First Martyr. Menaphon says that when he was in Thessaly he saw a youth challenge the birds in music; and a nightingale took up the challenge. For a time the contest was uncertain; but then the youth, "in a rapture," played so cunningly, that the bird, despairing, "down dropped upon his lute, and brake her heart."

∴ This beautiful tale by Strada (in Latin) has been translated in rhyme by R. Crashaw, in his Delights of the Muses (1646). Versions have been given by Ambrose Philips and others; but none can compare with the exquisite relation of John Ford, in his drama entitled The Lover's Melancholy (1628).

Musical Small-Coal Man, Thos. Britton, who used to sell small coals, and keep a musical club (1654-1714).

Musicians (Prince of), Giovanni Battista Pietro Aloisio da Palestri'na (1529-1594).

Musidora, the dame du cœur of Damon. Damon thought her coyness was scorn; but one day he caught her bathing, and his delicacy on the occasion so enchanted her that she at once accepted his proffered love.—Thomson: Seasons ("Summer," 1727).

Musido'rus, prince of Thessalia, in love with Pamela. He is the hero whose exploits are told by sir Philip Sidney, in his Arcadia (1581).

Musketeer, a soldier armed with a musket, but specially applied to a company of gentlemen who were a mounted guard in the service of the king of France from 1651.

They formed two companies, the grey and the black; so called from the colour of their hair. Both were clad in scarlet, and hence their quarters were called the Maison rouge. In peace they followed the king in the chase to protect him; in war they fought either on foot or horseback. They were suppressed in 1791; restored in 1814, but only for a few months; and after the restoration of Louis XVIII. we hear no more of them. Many Scotch gentlemen enrolled themselves among these dandy soldiers, who went to war with curled hair, white gloves, and perfumed like milliners.

(A. Dumas has a novel called The Three Musketeers (1844), the first of a series; the second is Twenty Years Afterwards; the third, Viconte de Bragelonne.)

Muslin, the talkative, impertinent, intriguing suivante of Mrs. Lovemore. Mistress Muslin is sweet upon William the footman; and loves cards.—Murphy: The Way to Keep Him (1760).

Muspelheim, the Scandinavian hell. There is a poem so called, the subject of which is the "Last Judgment." In this poem Surtur is antichrist, who at the end of the world will set fire to all creation. The poem (which is based on a legend of the fourth century) is in alliterative verse, and shows both imagination and poetic talent.

Mussel, a fountain near the waterless sea, which purges from transgression. So called because it is contained in a hollow stone like a mussel-shell. It is mentioned by Prester John in his letter to Manuel Comnēnus emperor of Constantinople. Those who test it enter the water, and, if they are true men, it rises till it covers their heads three times.

Mus'tafa, a poor tailor of China, father of Aladdin, killed by illness brought on by the idle vagabondism of his son.—Arabian Nights ("Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp").

Mutton, a courtezan, sometimes called a "laced mutton." "Mutton Lane," in Clerkenwell, was so called because it was a suburra or quarter for harlots. The courtezan was called a "mutton" even in the reign of Henry III., for Bracton speaks of them as oves. —De Legibus, etc., ii. (1185-1267).

Mutton (Who Stole the)? This was a common street jeer flung at policemen when the force was first organized, and rose thus: The first case the force had to deal with was the thief of a leg of mutton; but they wholly failed to detect the thief, and the laugh turned against them.

Mutton-Eating King (The), Charles II. of England (1630, 1659-1685).

> Here lies our mutton-eating king,
> Whose word no man relies on;
> He never said a foolish thing,
> And never did a wise one'.
> Earl of Rochester.

Mutual Admiration Society, the nickname popularly given in Paris to the Société Observation Médicale. In England the term is of more general application, and is used with reference to persons who are themselves lavish of compliments from a desire to be repaid in kind.

Mutual Friend (Our), a novel by Charles Dickens (1864). The "mutual friend" is John Harmon, the mutual friend of Mr. Boffin and the Wilfers (see chap. ix.). The tale is this: John Harmon was the son of a hard-hearted, bad old dust contractor, who had made his fortune "in dust." The old man turned his only daughter out of doors, and when the son, a boy of 14, pleaded for his sister, the unnatural father cursed him and sent him adrift. The Boffins worked under the dust contractor, and had always been kind to the boy; they gave him money to go abroad, and he disappeared for fourteen years. When the story opens, the father has just died, leaving his immense property to his son, on condition of his marrying Bella Wilfer; if the son dies or the conditions are unfulfilled, the money is to go to the Boffins. The son, is erroneously supposed to have been murdered on his homeward journey, and as he much disliked the idea of marrying an unknown person, he allowed the idea to prevail, assumed the name of John Rokesmith, and became the secretary of Mr. Boffin "the golden dustman," residuary legatee of old John Harmon, by which he became the possessor of £100,000. Boffin knew Rokesmith, but concealed his knowledge for a time. At Boffin's house, John Harmon (as Rokesmith) met Bella Wilfer, and fell in love with her. Mr. Boffin, in order to test Bella's love, pretended to be angry with Rokesmith for presuming to love Bella; and as Bella married him, he cast them both off "for a time," to live on John's earnings. A babe was born, and then the husband took the young mother to a beautiful house, and told her he was John Harmon, that the house was their house, that he was the possessor of £100,000 through the disinterested conduct of Mr. Boffin; and the young couple live happily with Mr. and Mrs. Boffin, in wealth and luxury.

My-Book (Dr.). Dr. John Abernethy (1765-1830) was so called, because he used to say to his patients, "Read my book" (On Surgical Observations).

My Novel, by lord Lytton (1853). His best novel, but Sterne's Tristram Shandy apparently gave lord Lytton the original idea.

Myrebeau (Le sieure de), one of the committee of the states of Burgundy.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Myri'ne (3 syl.), sister of Pygmalion, in love with Leucippê (3 syl.), a soldier.—Gilbert: Pygmalion and Galatea (1871).

Myris, priest of Isis.—Dryden: All for Love (1678).

Myro, a statuary of Eleu'thĕræ, who carved a cow so true to nature that even bulls mistook it for a living animal. (See HORSE PAINTED.)

E'en Myro's statues, which for art surpass
All others, once were but a shapeless mass.
Ovid: Art of Love, iii.

Myrob'alan Comfits (Greek, muron balanon, "myrrh fruit"), dried fruits of various kinds, sometimes used as purgatives. The citrins resemble the French "prunes de Mirabelle;" the belerins have a noyau flavour; the indis are acidulated. There are several other varieties.

She is sweeter to me than the myrabolan [sic] comfit.
Beckford: Vathek (1786).

Myrra, an Ionian slave, and the beloved concubine of Sardanapa'lus the Assyrian king. She roused him from his indolence to resist Arba'cês the Mede, who aspired to his throne, and when she found his cause hopeless, induced him to mount a funeral pile, which she fired with her own hand, and then, springing into the flames, she perished with the tyrant.—Byron: Sardanapalus (1819).

At once brave and tender, enamoured of her lord, yet yearning to be free; worshipping at once her distant land and the soft barbarian. . . . The heroism of this fair Ionian is never above nature, yet always on the highest verge. The proud melancholy that mingles with her character, recalling her fatherland; her warm and generous love, without one tinge of self; her passionate desire to elevate the nature of Sardanapa'lus,—are the result of the purest sentiment and the noblest art.—Lord Lytton.

Mysie, the female attendant of lady Margaret Bellenden of the Tower of Tillietudlem.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Mysie, the old housekeeper at Wolf's Crag Tower.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Mysis, the scolding wife of Sile'no, and mother of Daph'nê and Nysa. It is to Mysis that Apollo sings that popular song, "Pray, Goody, please to moderate the rancour of your tongue" (act i. 3).—Kane O'Hara: Midas (1764).

Mysteries of Udolpho (The), a romance by Mrs. Radcliffe (1794).

Mysterious Husband (The), a tragedy by Cumberland (1783). Lord Davenant was a bigamist. His first wife was Marianne Dormer, whom he forsook in three months to marry Louisa Travers. Marianne, supposing her husband to be dead, married Sir Davenant's son; and Miss Dormer, her mother was the betrothed of the second lady Davenant before her marriage with his lordship, but was told that he had proved faithless and had married another. The report of lord Davenant's death and the marriage of captain Dormer were both false. When the villainy of lord Davenant could be concealed no longer, he destroyed himself.

N.

Nab, the fairy that addressed Orpheus in the infernal regions, and offered him for food a roasted ant, a flea's thigh, butterflies' brains, some sucking mites, a rainbow tart, etc., to be washed down with dew-drops and beer made from seven barleycorns—a very heady liquor.—King: Orpheus and Eurydice (1730–1805).

Nab-man (The), a sheriff's officer.

Old Dornton has sent the nab-man after him at last.—Guy Mannering, ii. 3.

(This is the dramatized version of sir W. Scott's novel by Terry, 1816.)

Nacien, the holy hermit who introduced Galahad to the "Siege Perilous," the only vacant seat in the Round Table. This seat was reserved for the knight who was destined to achieve the quest of the holy graal. Nacien told the king and his knights that no one but a virgin knight could achieve that quest.—Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. (1470).

Nadab, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for lord Howard of Esrick, a profligate, who laid claim to great piety. As Nadab offered incense with strange fire and was slain, so lord Howard, it is said, mixed the consecrated wafer with some roast apples and sugar.

And casting Nadab last oblivion damn,
Who made new porridge for the Paschal Lamb.
Part I. 575, 576 (1682).

Na'dalet, a peculiar peal rung at Christmas-time by the church-bells of Languedoc.

Christmas is come . . . a coming which is announced on all sides of us . . . by our charming nadalet.—Cornhill Magazine (Eugénie de Guérin, 1863).

Nadgett, a man employed by Montague Tigg (manager of the "Anglo-Bengalee Company") to make private inquiries. He was a dry, shrivelled old man. Where he lived, how he lived, nobody knew; but he was always to be seen waiting for some one whenever appeared; and he would glide along apparently taking no notice of any one.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Nag's Head Consecration, a scandal perpetuated by Pennant on the dogma of "apostolic succession." The "high-church clergy" assert that the ceremony called holy orders has been transmitted without interruption from the apostles. Thus, the apostles laid hands on certain persons, who (say they) became ministers of the gospel; these persons "ordained" others in the same manner; and the succession has never been broken. Pennant says, at the Reformation the bishops came to a fix. There was only one bishop, viz. Anthony Kitchen of Llandaff, and Bonner would not allow him to perform the ceremony. In this predicament, the fourteen candidates for episcopal ordination rummaged up Story, a deposed bishop, and got him to "lay hands" on Parker, as archbishop of Canterbury. As it would have been profanation for Story to do this in a cathedral or church, the ceremony was performed in a tavern called the Nag's Head, corner of Friday Street, Cheapside. Strype refutes this tale in his Life of Archbishop Parker, and so does Dr. Hook; but it will never be stamped out.

Naggleton (Mr. and Mrs.), types of a nagging husband and wife. They are for ever nagging about trifles and wilful misunderstandings.—Punch (1864-5).

Naked Bear (The). Hush! the naked bear will hear you! a threat and reproof to unruly children in North America. The naked bear, says the legend, was larger and more ferocious than any of the species. It was quite naked, save and except one spot on its back, where was a tuft of white hair.—Heckewelder: Transactions of the American Phil. Soc., iv. 260.

Thus the wrinkled old Nokomis
Nursed the little Hiawatha,
Rocked him in his linden cradle,
Stilled his fretful wail by saying,
"Hush! the naked bear will get thee!"
Longfellow: Hiawatha, iii. (1855).

(Even to the present hour the threat, "I'll look over your head and see your naked nose!" is used occasionally in England to quiet fretful and unruly children. I have myself heard it scores of times.)

Nakir', Nekir, or Nakeer. (See MONKER AND NAKIR, p. 719.)

Nala, a legendary king of India, noted for his love of Damayanti, and his subsequent misfortunes. This legendary king has been the subject of numerous poems.

(Dean Milman has translated into English the episode from the Mahâbhârata; and W. Yates has translated the Nalodaya of the great Sanskrit poem.)

Nama, a daughter of man, beloved by the angel Zaraph. Her wish was to love intensely and to love holily; but as she fixed her love on a seraph, and not on God, she was doomed to abide on earth, "unchanged in heart and frame," so long as the earth endureth; but at the great consummation both Nama and her seraph will be received into those courts of love, where "love never dieth."—Moore: Loves of the Angels, ii. (1822).

Namancos, Numantia, a town of Old Castile, in Spain. Milton says the "guarded mount looks towards Namancos," that is, the fortified mount called St. Michael, at the Land's End, faces Old Castile.—Milton. Lycidas, 161 (1638).

Namby (Major), a retired officer, living in the suburbs of London. He had been twice married; his first wife had four children, and his second wife three. Major Namby, though he lived in a row, always transacted his domestic affairs by bawling out his orders from the front garden, to the annoyance of his neighbours. He used to stalk half-way down the garden path, with his head high in the air, his chest stuck out, and flourishing his military cane. Suddenly he would stop, stamp with one foot, knock up the hinder brim of his hat, begin to scratch the nape of his neck, wait a moment, then wheel round, look at the first-floor window, and roar out, "Matilda!" (the name of his wife) "don't do so-and-so;" or "Matilda! do so-and-so." Then would he bellow to the servants to buy this, or not to let the children eat that, and so on.—Wilkie Collins: Pray Employ Major Namby (a sketch).

Namby-Pamby. So Henry Carey called the lines of Ambrose Philips (on the infant child of lord Carteret). "Namby" is a baby way of pronouncing Ambrose, and the "P" of Philips suggested the jingle. It now signifies babyish literature.

N.B.—This is not John Philips, who wrote the Splendid Shilling.

Name. To tell one's name to an enemy about to challenge you to combat was deemed by the ancient Scotch heroes a mark of cowardice; because, if the predecessors of the combatants had shown hospitality, no combat could ensue. Hence "to tell one's name to an enemy" was an ignominious synonym of craven or coward.

"I have been renowned in battle," said Cless'ammor, "but I never told my name to a foe."—Ossian: Carthon.

Names of Terror. The following, amongst others, have been employed as bogie-names to frighten children with:—

(1) ATTILA was a bogie-name to the later Romans.

(2) BEFANA (q.v.). To tell Befana implies that she will bring only dust and ashes instead of a pretty toy on Christmas Eve.

(3) BO or BOH, son of Odin, was a fierce Gothic captain. His name was used by his soldiers when they would fight or surprise the enemy.—Sir W. Temple.

Warton tells us that the Dutch scared their children with the name of Boh.

(4) BONAPARTE, at the close of the eighteenth and beginning of the nineteenth centuries, was a bogie-name.

(5) BOURBON (Le connétable de). Muratori tells us that of all names of terror none equals this.

(6) CORVI'NUS (Mathias) the Hungarian, was a scare-name to the Turks.

(7) LILIS or LILITH was a bogie-name used by the ancient Jews to unruly children. The rabbinical writers tell us that Lilith was Adam's wife before the creation of Eve. She refused to submit to him, and became a horrible night-spectre, especially hostile to young children.

(8) LUNSFORD, a name employed to frighten children in England. Sir Thomas Lunsford, governor of the Tower, was a man of most vindictive temper, and the dread of every one.

Made children with your tones to run for't,
As bad as Bloody-bones or Lunsford.
S. Butler: Hudibras, fit. 2, line 1112 (1678).

(9) NARSES (a eyl.) was the name used by Assyrian mothers to scare children with.

The name of Narses was the formidable sound with which the Assyrian mothers were accustomed to terrify their infants.—Gibbon: Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, viii. 219 (1776–88).

(10) RAWHEAD and BLOODY-BONES were at one time bogie-names.

Servants awe children and keep them in subjection by telling them of Rawhead and Bloody-bones.—Locke.

(11) RICHARD I., "Cœur de Lion." This name, says Camden (Remains), was employed by the Saracens as a "name of terror and terror."

His tremendous name was employed by the Syrian mothers to silence their infants; and if a horse suddenly started from the way, his rider was wont to exclaim, "Dost thou think king Richard is in the bush?"—Gibbon: Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, xi. 146 (1776–88).

(12) SEBASTIAN (Dom), a name of terror once used by the Moors.

Nor shall Sebastian's formidable name
Be longer used to still the crying babe.
Dryden: Don Sebastian (1690).

(13) TALBOT (John), a name used in France in terrorem to unruly children.

They in France to feare their young children crye,
"The Talbot cometh!"—Hall: Chronicles (1548).

Here (said they) is the terror of the French,
The scarecrow that affrights our children so.
Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act i. sc. 4 (1589).

Is this the Talbot so much feared abroad,
That with his name the mothers still their babes?
Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act iv. sc. 5 (1589).

(14) TAMERLANE, a name used by the Persians in terrorem.

(15) TARQUIN, a name of terror in Roman nurseries.

The nurse, to still her child, will tell my story,
And fright her crying babe with Tarquin's name.
Shakespeare: Rape of Lucrece (1594).

(16) VICTOR EMMANUEL, after the promulgation of the law of conscription.

I heard a Roman father the other day stilling the cries of a peevish child with the threat, "Take care, Vittor 'Manuel will soon be here, . . . and then I'll give you to him."—Roman Correspondent ('Westminster Gazette,' April, 1871).

(See also MAUGRABY, p. 686; NAKED BEAR, p. 742.)

Nameless City (The). This term is sometimes used of ancient Rome, fabled to have had a prior name which could not be pronounced without risk of death. This mysterious name is said to have been Valentia, Grecized into Ῥώμη.

Namo, duke of Bavaria, and one of Charlemagne's twelve paladins.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Namou'na, an enchantress. Though first of created beings, she is still young and beautiful as ever.—Persian Mythology.

Namou'na, a poem by Alfred de Musset.

Namous, the envoy of Mahomet in paradise.

NANCY, servant to Mrs. Pattypan. A pretty little flirt, who coquets with Tim Tartlet and young Whimsey, and helps Charlotte Whimsey in her "love affairs." —Cobb: The First Floor (1756–1818).

Nancy, a poor misguided girl, who really loved the villain Bill Sikes (1 syl.). In spite of her surroundings, she had still some good feelings, and tried to prevent a burglary planned by Fagin and his associates. Bill Sikes, in a fit of passion, struck her twice upon the face with the butt-end of a pistol, and she fell dead at his feet.—Dickens: Oliver Twist (1837).

Nancy, the sailor's fancy. At half-past four he parted from her; at eight next morn he bade her adieu. Next day a storm arose, and when it lulled the enemy appeared; but when the fight was hottest, the jolly tar "put up a prayer for Nancy."—Dibdin: Sea Songs (1790).

Nancy (Miss), Mrs. Anna Oldfield, a celebrated actress, buried in Westminster Abbey. She died in 1730, and lay in state, attended by two noblemen. Mrs. Oldfield was buried in a "very fine Brussels lace head-dress, a new pair of kid gloves, and a robe with lace ruffles and a lace collar." (See NARCISSA.)

Nancy Dawson, a famous actress, who took London by storm. Her father was a poster in Clare Market (1728–1767).

> Her easy mien, her shape so neat,
> She foots, she trips, she looks so sweet;
> I die for Nancy Dawson.

Nancy Lammeter, in George Eliot's (Mrs. J. W. Cross) novel of Silas Marner. She eventually marries Godfrey Cass (1861).

Nancy or Nan of the Vale, a village maiden, who preferred Strephon to the gay lordlings who sought her hand in marriage.—Shenstone: A Ballad (1554).

Nannie, Miss Fleming, daughter of a farmer in the parish of Tarbolton, in Ayrshire. Immortalized by R. Burns.

Nan'tolet, father of Rosalura and Lillia-Bianca.—Fletcher: The Wild-goose Chase (1652).

Napoleon I., called by the Germans "kaiser Klits" (q.v.).

"M" is curiously coupled with the history of Napoleon I. and III. (See M., p. 644.)

N.B.—The following is a curious play on the word "Napoleon":—

Napoleon apoleon poleon oleon leon eon
Napoleon Apollyon cities destroying a-lion going-about on [being]. That is—
Napoleon-Apollyon [being] is a lion going about destroying cities.

David's Picture of Napoleon. The picture of Napoleon galloping up the Alps on a rampant war-charger, is by David. The war-horse is a poetical representation of a patient mule trudging wearily up the steep ascent. The cocked hat and cut-away coat, which the emperor wore on gala days, are poetical representations of the fur cap pulled over his ears, and the thick great coat, "close-buttoned to the chin," during his passage over the mountains.

Napoleonic Idolatry is called Chauvinism, from Chauvin, in Charlet's Conscrit Chauvin.

Napoleon III. His Nicknames.

ARRENBERG (Comte d'). So he called himself after his escape from the fortress of Ham.

BADINGUET, the name of the man he shot in his Boulogne escapade.

BOUSTRAPA, a compound of Bou[logne], Stra[sbourg], and Pa[ris], the places of his noted escapades.

CONSCIENCE TRANQUILLE.

GROSBEC. So called from the rather unusual size of his nose.

MAN OF DECEMBER. So called because December was his month of glory. Thus, he was elected president December 11, 1848; made his coup d'état December 2, 1851; and was created emperor December 2, 1852.

MAN OF SEDAN or SEDANTAIRE. So called because at Sedan he surrendered his sword to the king of Prussia (September, 1870). Also L'homme Sedantaire.

MAN OF SILENCE, because he listened to what others said, but made few replies or remarks, as whatever he said flew through Europe and affected the funds.

RATIPOLE, same as the West of England RANTIPOLE, a harum-scarum, half idiot, half madcap. I myself in 1856 saw a man forbidden to remain a single night in Paris, because he addressed his dog as "Ratipole." We were dining at the same table.

THE LITTLE. Victor Hugo gave him this title; but the hatred of Hugo to Napoleon was a monomania.

VERHUEL, the name of his supposed father.

(The prince imperial was called "Lulu;" and prince Napoleon "Plon-Plon.")

Napoleon's Number. The second of the month was Louis Napoleon's day. It was also one of the days of his uncle, the other being the fifteenth.

The coup d'état was December 2; he was made emperor December 2, 1852; the Franco-Prussian war opened at Saarbrück, August 2, 1870; he surrendered his sword to William of Prussia, September 2, 1870.

Napoleon I. was crowned December 2, 1804; and the victory of Austerlitz was December 2, 1805.

Numerical Curiosities. 1. 1869, the last year of Napoleon's glory; the next year was that of his downfall. As a matter of curiosity, it may be observed that if the day of his birth, or the day of the empress's birth, or the date of the capitulation of Paris, be added to that of the coronation of Napoleon III., the result always points to 1869. Thus, he was crowned 1852; he was born 1808; the empress Eugénie was born 1826; the capitulation of Paris was 1871. Whence—

1852		1852		1852	coronation.

0	Napoleon.	2	Eugénie.	7	of Paris.
8		6		1
1869		1869		1869

2. 1870, the year of his downfall. By adding the numerical values of the birth-date either of Napoleon or Eugénie to the date of their marriage, we get their fatal year of 1870. Thus, Napoleon was born 1808; Eugénie, 1826; married, 1853.

1853		1853	year of marriage.

3. Empereur. The votes for the president to be emperor were 7,119,791; those against him were 1,119,000. If, now, the numbers 7119791/1119 be written on a piece of paper, and held up to the light, the reverse side will show the word empereur. (The dash is the dividing mark, and forms the long stroke of the "p.")

Napoleon and Talleyrand. Napoleon I. one day entered a roadside inn, and called for breakfast. There was nothing in the house but eggs and cider (which Napoleon detested). "What shall we do?" said the emperor to Talleyrand. In answer to this, the grand chambellan improvised the rhymes following:—

Le bon roi Dagobert
Aimait le bon vin au dessert.
Le grand St. Eloi
Lui dit, "O mon roi,
Le droit réuni
L'a bien renchéri."
"Eh bien!" lui dit le roi . . .

But he could get no further. Whereupon Napoleon himself instantly capped the line thus—

"Je boirai du cidre avec toi."
Chapus: Dieppe, etc (1853).

Our royal master Dagobert
Good wine loved at his dessert.
But St. Eloi
Once said, "Mon roi,
We here prepare
No dainty fare."
"Well," cried the king, "so let it be,
Cider to-day I'll drink with thee."
E. C. B.

The Napoleon of the Drama. Alfred Bunn, lessee of Drury Lane Theatre (1819–1826) was so called; and so was Robert William Elliston, his predecessor (1774–1826, died 1831).

The Napoleon of Mexico, the emperor Augusto Iturbidê (1784–1824).

The Napoleon of Oratory, W. E. Gladstone (1809–).

The Napoleon of Peace, Louis Philippe of France (1773, reigned 1830–1848, died 1850).

Narcissa, meant for Elizabeth Lee (Mrs. Temple), the step-daughter of Dr. Young. In Night ii. the poet says she was clandestinely buried at Montpellier, because she was a protestant. "Philander" is meant for Mrs. Temple's husband.—Dr. Young: Night Thoughts (1742–6).

Narcissa, Mrs. Oldfield the actress, who insisted on being rouged and dressed in Brussels lace when she was "laid out." (See NANCY, p. 744.)

"Odious! In woollen! 'Twould a saint provoke!"
Were the last words that poor Narcissa spoke.
"No, let a charming chintz and Brussels lace
Wrap my cold limbs and shade my lifeless face;
One would not, sure, be frightful when one's dead!
And, Betty, give this cheek a little red."
Pope: Moral Essays, i. (1732).

Narcissus, a flower. According to Grecian fable, Narcissus fell in love with his own reflection in a fountain, and, having pined away because he could not kiss it, was changed into the flower which bears his name.—Ovid: Metamorphoses, iii. 346, etc.

N.B.—Echo was in love with Narcissus, and died of grief because he would not return her love.

Narcissus fair,
As o'er the fabled fountain hanging still.
Thomson: The Seasons ("Spring," 1728).

(Glück, in 1779, produced an opera called Echo et Narcisse.)

Narren-Schiff (" the ship of fools "), a satirical poem in German, by Brandt (1491), lashing the follies and vices of the period. Brandt makes knowledge of one's self the beginning of wisdom; maintains the equality of man; and speaks of life as a brief passage only. The book at one time enjoyed unbounded popularity.

Narses (2 syl.), a Roman general against the Goths; the terror of children.

The name of Narses was the formidable sound with which the Assyrian mothers were accustomed to terrify their infants.—Gibbon: Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, viii. 219 (1776–88).

Narses, a domestic slave of Alexius Comnēnus emperor of Greece.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Nasnâs, an ape which the Arabs maintain was once a human being. (See MAN, p. 662.)

Naso, Ovid the Roman poet, whose full name was Publius Ovidus Naso. (Naso means " nose.") Hence the pun of Holofernes—

And why Naso, but for smelling out the odoriferous flowers of fancy?—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, act iv. sc. 2 (1594).

Nathan the Wise, the title and chief character of a drama in verse by Lessing. The prototype of Nathan was Moses Mendelssohn.

Nathaniel (Sir), the grotesque curate of Holofernês. Though grotesque, he is sharp, witty, and sententious.—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost (1594).

Nathos, one of the three sons of Usnoth lord of Etha (in Argyllshire), made commander of the Irish army at the death of Cuthullin. For a time he propped up the fortune of the youthful Cormac, but the rebel Cairbar increased in strength and found means to murder the young king. The army under Nathos then deserted to the usurper, and Nathos with his two brothers was obliged to quit Ireland. Dar'-Thula, the daughter of Colla, went with them to avoid Cairbar, who persisted in offering her his love. The wind drove the vessel back to Ulster, where Cairbar lay encamped, and the three young men, being overpowered, were slain. As for Dar-Thula, she was pierced with an arrow, and died also.—Ossian: Dar-Thula.

Nation of Gentlemen (A). The Scotch were so called by George IV., when he visited Scotland in 1822.

Nation of Shopkeepers. The English were so called by Napoleon I.

National Airs. Four series, each containing twelve lyrics, or words adapted to national airs of divers nations. Thus: " A Temple to Friendship " (series i. 1) is adapted to a Spanish air; " Flow on, thou Shining River," to a Portuguese air; " All that's Bright must fade," to an Indian air; " Oh, come to me when Daylight sets," to a Venetian air; " Oft in the Stilly Night," to a Scotch air. And so on through the forty-eight lyrics.

(These airs are among the best of Moore's popular songs.)

National Assembly. (1) The French deputies which met in the year 1789. The states-general was convened, but the clergy and nobles refused to sit in the same chamber with the commons, so the commons or deputies of the tiers état withdrew, constituted themselves into a deliberative body, and assumed the name of the Assemblée Nationale. (2) The democratic French parliament of 1848, consisting of 900 members elected by manhood suffrage, was so called also.

National Convention, the French parliament of 1792. It consisted of 721 members, but was reduced first to 500, then to 300. It succeeded the National Assembly.

Natty Bumppo, called " Leather-stocking." He appears in five of F. Cooper's novels: (1) The Deerslayer; (2) The Pathfinder; (3) " The Hawk-eye," in The Last of the Mohicans; (4) " Leather-stocking " in The Pioneers; and (5) " The Trapper," in The Prairie, in which he dies.

Natural History of Enthusiasm (The), by Isaac Taylor (1829).

Natural Theology, popularly called Paley's Evidences. An attempt to prove the existence, wisdom, and omnipotence of God from evidences of design in the works of nature. This book was once extremely popular, but is now partly obsolete.

Nature abhors a Vacuum. This was an axiom of the peripatetic philosophy, and was repeated by Galileo as an explanation of the rise of water for about thirty-two feet in wells, etc.

Nature and Art, a novel by Mrs. Inchbald (1796). (1) The two brothers, William and Henry Norwynn, are the opposites of each other in fortune and disposition. (2) The fates of William the seducer and Hannah whom he seduces are very different; William rises to the judicial bench: but Hannah sinks into infamy. The trial of Hannah is admirably told.

Nausic'aa (4 syl.), daughter of Alcinous king of the Phœa'cians, who conducted Ulysses to the court of her father when he was shipwrecked on the coast.

> Nausicaa, as she had gone down through the orchards and the olive gardens to the sea, holding the golden cruse of oil in one hand, with her feet bare so that she might wade in the waves, and in her eyes the great soft wonder that must have come there when Odysseus awoke.—Ouida: Ariadné, i. 10.

Navigation (The Father of), don Henrique duke of Viseo, one of the greatest men that Portugal has produced (1394–1460).

The Father of British Inland Navigation, Francis Egerton, duke of Bridgewater (1736–1803).

Naviget Anticyram (Horace: Sat., ii. 3, 166), Anticyra, in Thessaly, famous for hellebore, a remedy for madness; hence, when a person acted foolishly, he was told to go to Anticyra, as we should say, "to get his simples cut."

Naxian Groves. Naxos (now Naxia), an island of the Ægēan Sea or the Archipelago, was noted for its wines.

> fair Baccantés,
> Wild from Naxian groves.
> Longfellow: Drinking Song.

Neæra, a fancy name used by Horace, Virgil, and Tibullus, as a synonym of sweetheart.

> To sport with Amaryllis in the shade,
> Or with the tangles of Neæra's hair.
> Milton: Lycidas (1638).

Neal'liny (4 syl.), a suttee, the young widow of Ar'valan son of Keha'ma.—Southey: Curse of Kehama, l. 11 (1809).

Nebuchadnezzar [Ne-boch-ad-ne-Tzar], in Russian, means "there is no God but the czar."—Notes and Queries (July 21, 1877).

Necessity. Longfellow, in The Wayside Inn (1863), says the student—

> Quoted Horace, where he sings
> The dire Necessity of things,
> That drives into the roof sublime
> Of new-built houses of the great,
> The adamantine nails of Fate.

He refers to—

> Si figit adamantinos
> Summis verticibus dira Necessitas
> Clavos.
> Horace: Odes, 3. 24.

Neck. Calig'ula the Roman emperor used to say, "Oh that the Roman people had but one neck, that I might cut it off at a blow!"

> I love the sex, and sometimes would reverse
> The tyrant's wish, that "mankind only had
> One neck, which he with one fell stroke might pierce.
> Byron: Don Juan, vi. 27 (1824).

Neck or Nothing, a farce by Garrick (1766). Mr. Stockwell promises to give his daughter in marriage to the son of sir Harry Harlowe of Dorsetshire, with a dot of £10,000; but it so happens that the young man is privately married. The two servants of Mr. Belford and sir Harry Harlowe try to get possession of the money, by passing off Martin (Belford's servant) as sir Harry's son; but it so happens that Belford is in love with Miss Stockwell, and, hearing of the plot through Jenny, the young lady's-maid, he arrests the two servants as vagabonds. Old Stockwell gladly consents to his marriage with Nancy, and thinks himself well out of a terrible scrape.

Neckan (The), a water-spirit who married a human bride whom he carried to his deep-sea home. She soon regretted that Neckan was not a Christian knight, so he came to earth to be baptized into the Christian faith. A priest said to him, "Sooner shall my staff bud than Neckan go to heaven." The words were scarcely uttered when the staff budded. "Ah!" said Neckan, "there is mercy everywhere except in the heart of a monk."—Matthew Arnold: The Neckan (a ballad).

Nectaba'nus, the dwarf at the cell of the hermit of Engaddi.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Nectar, the beverage of the gods. It was white as cream, for when Hebê spilt some of it, the white arch of heaven, called the Milky Way, was made. The food of the gods was ambrosia.

Ned (Lying), "the chimney-sweeper of Savoy," that is, the duke of Savoy, who joined the allied army against France in the war of the Spanish Succession.—Dr. Arbuthnot: History of John Bull (1712).

Negro'ni, a princess, the friend of Lucrezia di Borgia. She invited the notables who had insulted the Borgia to a banquet, and killed them with poisoned wine.—Donizetti: Lucrezia di Borgia (an opera, 1834).

Ne'gus, sovereign of Abyssinia, Erco'co or Erquico on the Red Sea marks the north-east boundary of this empire.

> The empire of Negus to his utmost port,
> Ercoco.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, xi. 397 (1665).

Nehemiah (The Book of), one of the historic books of the Old Testament. Ezra had been appointed governor of Judæa, and this book tells us what he did during his rule of about thirty years.

Nehemiah Holdenough, a presbyterian preacher.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Neilson (Mr. Christopher), a surgeon at Glasgow.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Neibelungen Lied. (See NIBELUNGEN . . .)

Neim'heid (2 syl.) employed four architects to build him a palace in Ireland; and, that they might not build another like it or superior to it for some other monarch, had them all secretly put to death.—O'Halloran: History of Ireland.

¶ A similar story is told of Nôman-al-Aôuar king of Hirah, who employed Senna'mar to build him a palace. When finished, he cast the architect headlong from the highest tower, to prevent his building another to rival it.—D'Herbelot: Bibliothèque Orientale (1697).

Nekayah, sister of Rasselas prince of Abyssinia. She escapes with her brother from the "happy valley," and wanders about with him to find what condition or rank of life is the most happy. After roaming for a time, and finding no condition of life free from its drawbacks, the brother and sister resolve to return to the "happy valley."—Dr. Johnson: Rasselas (1759).

Nell, the meek and obedient wife of Jobson; taught by the strap to know who was lord and master. Lady Loverule was the imperious, headstrong bride of sir John Loverule. The two women, by a magical hocus-pocus, were changed for a time, without any of the four knowing it. Lady Loverule was placed with Jobson, who soon brought down her turbulent temper with the strap, and when she was reduced to submission, the two women were restored again to their respective husbands.—Coffey: The Devil to Pay (1731).

The merit of Mrs. Clive [1711–1785] as an actress first showed itself in "Nell" the cobbler's wife.—T. Davies.

Nell (Little) or NELLY TRENT, a sweet, innocent, loving child of 14 summers, brought up by her old miserly grandfather, who gambled away all his money. Her days were monotonous and without youthful companionship, her evenings gloomy and solitary; there were no child-sympathies in her dreary home, but dejection, despondence akin to madness, watchfulness, suspicion, and imbecility. The grandfather being wholly ruined by gaming, the two went forth as beggars, and ultimately settled down in a cottage adjoining a country churchyard. Here Nelly died, and the old grandfather soon afterwards was found dead upon her grave.—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop (1840).

 The solution of the grandfather's story is given in ch. lxix.

Nelly, the servant-girl of Mrs. Dinmont.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Nelson. The Death of Nelson. The words are by S. J. Arnold (not Dr. Samuel Arnold), and the music by Braham.

Nelson's Ship, the Victory.

Now from the fleet of the foemen past
Ahead of the Victory,
A four-decked ship, with a flagless mast,
An Anak of the sea.
His gaze on the ship lord Nelson cast;
"Oh, oh! my old friend!" quoth he,
"Since again we have met, we must all be glad To pay our respects to the Trinidad."
So, full on the bow of the giant foe,
Our gallant Victory runs;
Thro' the dark'ning smoke the thunder broke
O'er her deck from a hundred guns.
Lord Lytton: Ode, lii. 9 (1859).

Nem'ean Lion, a lion of Argŏlis, slain by Herculês.

In this word Shakespeare has preserved the correct accent: "As hardy as the Nem'ean lion's nerve" (Hamlet, act i. sc. 5); but Spenser incorrectly throws the accent on the second syllable, which is e short: "Into the great Neme'an lion's grove" (Faërie Queene, v. 1).

Ere Neměa's boast resigned his shaggy spoils.
Statius: The Thebaid, i.

Nem'esis, the Greek personification of retribution, or that punishment for sin which sooner or later overtakes the offender.

. . . and some great Nemesis
Break from a darkened future.
Tennyson: The Princess, vi. (1847).

Ne'mo, the name by which captain Hawdon was known at Krook's. He had once won the love of the future lady Dedlock, by whom he had a child called Esther Summerson; but he was compelled to copy law-writings for daily bread, and died a miserable death from an overdose of opium.—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Nepen'the (3 syl.) or Nepenthes, a care-dispelling drug, which Polydamna, wife of Tho'nis king of Egypt gave to Helen (daughter of Jove and Leda). A drink containing this drug "changed grief to mirth, melancholy to joyfulness, and hatred to love." The water of Ardenne had the opposite effects. Homer mentions the drug nepenthê in his Odyssey, iv. 228.

> That nepenthês which the wife of Thone
> In Egypt gave to Jove-born Helena.
> Milton: Comus, 675 (1634).

> Nepenthê is a drink of sovereign grace,
> Devisèd by the gods for to assuage
> Heart's grief, and bitter gall away to chase
> Which stirs up anger and contentious rage;
> Instead thereof sweet peace and quietage
> It doth establish in the troubled mind . . .
> And such as drink, eternal happiness do find.
> Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 2 (1596).

Neph'elo-Coccyg'ia, the cloudland of air castles. The word means "cuckoo cloudland." The city of Nephelo-Coccygia was built by cuckoos and gulls, and was so fortified by clouds that the gods could not meddle with the affairs of its inhabitants.—Aristophanês: The Birds.

∴ The name occurs also in Lucian's Veræ Historiæ.

> Without flying to Nephelo-Coccygia, or to the court of queen Mab, we can meet with sharpers, bullies, . . . impudent debauchees, and women worthy of such paramours.—Macaulay.

Nep'omuk or Nepo'muck (St. John), canon of Prague. He was thrown from a bridge in 1381, and drowned by order of king Wenceslaus, because he refused to betray the secrets confided to him by the queen in the holy rite of confession. The spot whence he was cast into the Moldau is still marked by a cross with five stars on the parapet, indicative of the miraculous flames seen flickering over the dead body for three days. Nepomuk was canonized in 1729, and became the patron saint of bridges. His statue in stone usually occupies a similar position on bridges as it does at Prague.

> Like St. John Nep'omuck in stone,
> Looking down into the stream.
> Longfellow: The Golden Legend (1851).

(The word is often accented on the second syllable.)

Neptune (Old Father), the ocean or sea-god.

Nerestan, son of Guï Lusignan D'Outremer king of Jerusalem, and brother of Zara. Nerestan was sent on his parole to France, to obtain ransom for certain Christians who had fallen into the hands of the Saracens. When Osman, the sultan, was informed of his relationship to Zara, he ordered all Christian captives to be at once liberated "without money and without price."—Hill: Zara (adapted from Voltaire's tragedy).

Ne'reus (2 syl.), father of the water-nymphs. A very old prophetic god of great kindliness. The scalp, chin, and breast of Nereus were covered with sea-weed instead of hair.

> By hoary Nêreus' wrinkled look.
> Milton: Comus, 871 (1634).

Neri'nê, Doto, and Nysê, the three nereids who guarded the fleet of Vasco da Gama. When the treacherous pilot had run Vasco's ship upon a sunken rock, these three sea-nymphs lifted up the prow and turned it round.

> The lovely Nysê and Nerinê spring
> With all the vehemence and speed of wing.
> Camoëns: Lusiad, ii. (1569).

Nerissa, the clever confidential waiting-woman of Portia the Venetian heiress. Nerissa is the counterfeit of her mistress, with a fair share of the lady's elegance and wit. She marries Gratiano a friend of the merchant Anthonio.—Shakespeare: The Merchant of Venice (1698).

Nero, a Roman emperor. A name synonymous with tyranny, persecution, and wickedness (37, 54–68).

Nero's Friend. When all the statues of Nero were thrown down by order of the senate, some unknown friend strewed the grave with violets.

The Nero of the North, Christian II. of Denmark (1480, reigned 1534–1558, died 1559).

Nesle (Blondel de), the favourite minstrel of Richard Cœur de Lion [Nesle = Neel].—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Nessus's Shirt. Nessos (in Latin, Nessus) the centaur carried the wife of Herculês over a river, and, attempting to run away with her, was shot by Herculês. As the centaur was dying, he told Deïani'ra (5 syl.) that if she steeped in his blood her husband's shirt, she would secure his love for ever. This she did, but when Herculês put the shirt on, his body suffered such agony, that he rushed to mount Œta, collected together a pile of wood, set it on fire, and, rushing into the midst of the flames, was burnt to death.

¶ When Creüsa (3 syl.), the daughter of king Creon, was about to be married to Jason, Medêa sent her a splendid wedding robe; but when Creusa put it on, she was burnt to death in excruciating pain.

¶ Morgan le Fay, hoping to kill king Arthur, sent him a superb royal robe. Arthur told the messenger to try it on, that he might see its effect; but no sooner had the messenger done so, than he dropped down dead, "burnt to mere coal."—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 75 (1470).

Eros, ho! the shirt of Nessus is upon me [i.e. I am in agony].
Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, act iv. sc. 10 (1608).

Nestor (A), a wise old man. Nestor of Pylos was the oldest and most experienced of all the Greek chieftains who went to the siege of Troy.—Homer: Iliad.

Nestor of the Chemical Revolution. Dr. Black is so called by Lavoisier (1728–1799).

Nestor of Europe, Leopold king of Belgium (1790, 1831–1865).

Neuha, a native of Toobouai, one of the Society Islands. It was at Toobouai that the mutineers of the Bounty landed, and Torquil married Neuha. When a vessel was sent to capture the mutineers, Neuha conducted Torquil to a secret cave, where they lay perdu till all danger was over, when they returned to their island home.—Byron: The Island.

(The character of Neuha is given in canto ii. 7.)

Never (Synonyms for).

On the Greek Kalends. (There are no Greek Kalends.) When the Spanish ambassador announced in Latin the terms on which queen Elizabeth might hope to avert the threatened invasion, her majesty replied—

Ad Græcas, bone rex, fient mandata calendas.

On St. Tibs's eve. (There is no such saint as Tibs.)
On the 31st of June, 1897 (or any other impossible date).
At latter Lammas. (There is no such time.) Fuller thus renders the speech of the Spanish ambassador—

These to you are our commands;
Send no help to th' Netherlands;
Of the treasure ta'en by Drake
Restitution you must make;
And those abbeys build anew
Which your father overthrew.

The queen's reply—

Worthy king, know this: Your will
At latter Lammas we'll fulfil.

On the year of the coronation of Napoleon III.
In the reign of queen Dick.
Once in a blue moon.
When two Sundays meet.
When the Yellow River runs clear (Chinese).
In that memorable week which had three Thursdays.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, ii. 1.
The year when the middle of August was in May.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, ii. 1.
The year of the great medlars, three of which would fill a bushel.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, ii. 1.
At the coming of the Cockilcranes (3 syl.).—Rabelais: Gargantua, 49.
Cum multis aliis.

Nevers (Comte de), to whom Valenti'na (daughter of the governor of the Louvre) was affianced, and whom she married in a fit of jealousy. The count having been shot in the Bartholomew slaughter, Valentina married Raoul [Rawl] her first love, but both were killed by a party of musketeers commanded by the governor of the Louvre.—Meyerbeer: Les Huguenots (opera, 1836).

N.B.—The duke [not count] de Nevers, being asked by the governor of the Louvre to join in the Bartholomew Massacre, replied that his family contained a long list of warriors, but not one assassin.

Neville (Major), an assumed name of lord Geraldin, son of the earl of Geraldin. He first appears as Mr. William Lovell.

Mr. Geraldin Neville, uncle to lord Geraldin.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Neville (Miss), the friend and confidante of Miss Hardcastle. A handsome coquettish girl, destined by Mrs. Hardcastle for her son Tony Lumpkin, but Tony did not care for her, and she dearly loved Mr. Hastings; so Hastings and Tony plotted together to outwit madam, and of course won the day.—Goldsmith: She Stoops to Conquer (1773).

Neville (Sir Henry), chamberlain of Richard Cœur de Lion.—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

New Atlantis (The), an imaginary island in the middle of the Atlantic. Bacon, in his allegorical fiction so called, supposes himself wrecked on this island, where he finds an association for the cultivation of natural science and the promotion of arts.—Bacon: The New Atlantis (1626).

 Called the New Atlantis to distinguish it from Plato's Atlantis, an imaginary island of fabulous charms.

New Bath Guide (The), a series of letters in verse, describing the life at Bath. Full of wit and humour, and abounding in odd rhymes, by Christopher Anstey (1760).

New Timon (The), a politico-satirical poem by lord Lytton (1845), containing several sketches of the men of the time. Tennyson's poetry he calls—

A jingling medley of purloined conceits,
Out-babying Wordsworth, and out-glittering Keats.

(Tennyson replied, but there is too much personality in his rejoinder. Thus he speaks of Lytton wearing stays, curling his hair, priding himself on his spotless shirts, dapper boots, and dainty hands. No doubt he was extremely vain, but he was a man of considerable talent.)

New Way to Pay Old Debts, a drama by Philip Massinger (1625). Wellborn, the nephew of sir Giles Overreach, having run through his fortune and got into debt, induces lady Allworth, out of respect and gratitude to his father, to give him countenance. This induces sir Giles to suppose that his nephew was about to marry the wealthy dowager. Feeling convinced that he will then be able to swindle him of all the dowager's property, as he had ousted him out of his paternal estates, sir Giles pays his nephew's debts, and supplies him liberally with ready money, to bring about the marriage as soon as possible. Having paid Wellborn's debts, the overreaching old man is compelled, through the treachery of his clerk, to restore the estates also, for the deeds of conveyance are found to be only blank sheets of parchment, the writing having been erased by some chemical acids.

New Zealander. It is Macaulay who said the time might come when some "New Zealand artist shall, in the midst of a vast solitude, take his stand on a broken arch of London bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's."

∴ Shelley was before Macaulay in the same conceit. (See Dedication of Peter Bell the Third.)

Newcastle (The duchess of), in the court of Charles II.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles I.).

Newcastle (The marquis of), a royalist in the service of Charles I.—Sir W. Scott: Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Newcastle Apothecary (The), Mr. Bolus of Newcastle used to write his prescriptions in rhyme. A bottle bearing the couplet, "When taken to be well shaken," was sent to a patient, and when Bolus called next day to inquire about its effect, John told the apothecary his master was dead. The fact is, John had shaken the sick man instead of the bottle, and had shaken the life out of him.—Colman.

Newcome (Clemency), about 30 years old, with a plump and cheerful face, but twisted into a tightness that made it comical. Her gait was very homely, her limbs seemed all odd ones; her shoes were so self-willed that they never wanted to go where her feet went. She wore blue stockings, a printed gown of hideous pattern and many colours, and a white apron. Her sleeves were short, her elbows always grazed, her cap anywhere but in the right place; but she was scrupulously clean, and "maintained a kind of dislocated tidiness." She carried in her pocket "a handkerchief, a piece of wax-candle, an apple, an orange, a lucky penny, a cramp-bone, a padlock, a pair of scissors, a handful of loose beads, several balls of worsted and cotton, a needle-case, a collection of curl-papers, a biscuit, a thimble, a nutmeg-grater, and a few miscellaneous articles." Clemency Newcome married Benjamin Britain, her fellow-servant at Dr. Jeddler's, and opened a country inn called the Nutmeg-Grater, a cozy, well-to-do place as any one could wish to see, and there were few married people so well assorted as Clemency and Ben Britain.—Dickens: The Battle of Life (1846).

Newcome (Sir Barnes), the beau-ideal of nineteenth-century worldliness.

Clive Newcome, the hero of Thackeray's novel, The Newcomes. An artist, in love with Ethel Newcome, his cousin, whom he marries as his second wife.

Colonel Newcome, a widower, distinguished for the moral beauty of his life. He loses his money and enters the Charter House.

Ethel Newcome, both clever and good. She is the niece of colonel Newcome, and loves her cousin Clive, who returns her affection.—Thackeray: The Newcomes (1855).

(The Newcomes is one of the best of Thackeray's novels.)

Newcome (Johnny), any raw youth when he first enters the army or navy.

Newgate Fashion (To March), two and two, as the prisoners were at one time conveyed to Newgate two and two together.

> Falstaff. Must we all march?
> Bardolph. Yea, two and two, Newgate fashion.
> Shakespeare: Henry IV. act iii. sc. 3 (1597).

Newgate Fringe, a beard worn only under the chin, as the hangman's rope is fastened round the neck of those about to be hanged. Sometimes called the Newgate Frill, and sometimes the Tyburn Collar.

The Newgate Knocker, a lock of hair worn especially by costermongers, twisted towards the ear. It is supposed to remind one of the knocker on the prison door of Newgate. The cow-lick is a curl worn on the temples.

Newland (Abraham), one of the governors of the Bank of England, to whom, in the early part of the nineteenth century, all Bank of England notes were made payable. A bank-note was called an "Abraham Newland;" and hence the popular song, "I've often heard say, sham Ab'ram you may, but must not sham Abraham Newland."

Trees are notes issued from the bank of nature, and as current as those payable to Abraham Newland.—Colman: The Poor Gentleman, i. 2 (1802).

Newspapers (The Oldest).

Stamford Mercury, 1695. The editor says that No. 6833, July 7, 1826, means that the paper had arrived at the 6833rd week of issue, or the 131st year of its existence.

Nottingham Journal, 1710.

Northampton Mercury, 1720.

Gloucester Journal, 1722.

∴ Chalmers says that the first English newspaper was called the English Mercury, 1588; but Mr. Watts has proved that the papers so called, now in the British Museum, are forgeries, because they bear the paper-mark of George I. The English Mercuries consist of seven distinct articles, three printed, and four in MS.

Newton.

Newton . . . declared, with all his grand discoveries recent,
That he himself felt only "like a youth
Picking up shells by the great ocean, truth."
Byron: Don Juan, vii. 5 (1824).

Newton discovered the prismatic colours of light, and explained the phenomenon by the emission theory. This theory is not now accepted; the wave theory of Dr. Young has superseded it.

Nature and Nature's laws lay hid in night.
God said, "Let Newton be;" and all was light.
Pope: Epitaph, intended for Newton's Monument in Westminster Abbey (1727).

Newton is called by Campbell "The Priest of Nature."—Pleasures of Hope, i. (1799).

Newton and the Apple. It is said that Newton was standing in his mother's garden at Woolsthorpe, Lincolnshire, in the year 1665, when an apple fell from a tree and set him thinking. From this incident he ultimately developed his theory of gravitation.

When Newton saw an apple fall, he found,
In that slight startle from his contemplation, . . .
A mode of proving that the earth turned round,
In a most natural whirl called gravitation.
Byron: Don Juan, x. 1 (1824).

Newton's mother had married the Rev. B. Smith, and had returned to the manor-house of Woolsthorpe, where Newton was born. Mr. Conduit, who succeeded Newton at the Mint, was the husband of Catherine Barton, granddaughter of Mrs. Smith (Newton's mother).

Newton and his Dog. One winter's morning, while attending early service in Trinity College, Newton inadvertently left his dog Diamond shut up in his room. On returning from chapel, he found that the little pet had upset the candle on his table, and several important papers were burnt. On perceiving this irreparable loss, he exclaimed, "Oh, Diamond, Diamond, thou little knowest the mischief thou hast done!"—Diffusion of Useful Knowledge ("Life of Newton," p. 26, col. 2).

¶ When Ainsworth was finishing the letter "S" of his Latin Dictionary, his wife, in a pet, threw the whole manuscript of the dictionary into the fire, but by marvellous perseverance he set to work at once to repair the loss.

When Mr. Ainsworth was engaged in the laborious work of his Dictionary of the Latin Language, and had reached the letter "S," his wife in a fit of ill nature . . . committed the whole MS. to the flames . . . the persevering industry of Ainsworth repaired the loss . . . by his assiduous industry.—Cyclopædia of Literary and Scientific Anecdots (Griffin and Co.).

Nibelung, a mythical king of Nibelungenland (Norway). He had twelve paladins, all giants. Siegfried [Segefreed], prince of the Netherlands, slew the giants, and made Nibelungenland tributary.—Nibelungen Lied, iii. (1210).

Nibelungen Hoard, a mythical mass of gold and precious stones, which Siegfried [Sege-freed], prince of the Netherlands, took from Nibelungenland and gave to his wife as a dowry. The hoard filled thirty-six waggons. After the murder of Siegfried, Hagan seized the hoard, and, for concealment, sank it in the "Rhine at Lockham," intending to recover it at a future period, but Hagan was assassinated, and the hoard was lost for ever.—Nibelungen Lied, xix.

Nibelungen Lied [Ne.by-lung.'n leed], the German Iliad (1210). It is divided into two parts, and thirty-two lieds or cantos. The first part ends with the death of Siegfried, and the second part with the death of Kriemhild.

Siegfried, the youngest of the kings of the Netherlands, went to Worms, to crave the hand of Kriemhild in marriage. While he was staying with Günther king of Burgundy (the lady's brother), he assisted him to obtain in marriage Brunhild queen of Issland.

who announced publicly that he only should be her husband who could beat her in hurling a spear, throwing a huge stone, and in leaping. Siegfried, who possessed a cloak of invisibility, aided Günther in these three contests, and Brunhild became his wife. In return for these services, Günther gave Siegfried his sister Kriemhild in marriage. After a time, the bride and bridegroom went to visit Günther, when the two ladies disputed about the relative merits of their respective husbands, and Kriemhild, to exalt Siegfried, boasted that Günther owed to him his victories and his wife. Brunhild, in great anger, now employed Hagan to murder Siegfried, and this he did by stabbing him in the back while he was drinking from a brook.

Thirteen years elapsed, and the widow married Etzel king of the Huns. After a time, she invited Brunhild and Hagan to a visit. Hagan, in this visit, killed Etzel's young son, and Kriemhild was like a fury. A battle ensued, in which Günther and Hagan were made prisoners, and Kriemhild cut off both their heads with her own hand. Hildebrand, horrified at this act of blood, slew Kriemhild; and so the poem ends.—Authors unknown (but the story was pieced together by the minnesingers).

∴ The Völsunga Saga is the Icelandic version of the Nibelungen Lied. This saga has been translated into English by William Morris.

The Nibelungen Lied has been ascribed to Heinrich von Oftendingen, a minnesinger; but it certainly existed before that epoch, if not as a complete whole, in separate lays, and all that Heinrich von Oftendingen could have done was to collect the floating lays, connect them, and form them into a complete story.

F. A. Wolf, in 1795, wrote a learned book to prove that Homer did for the Iliad and Odyssey what Oftendingen did for the Nibelungen Lied.

The Nibelungen Lied was translated into English verse (12-syl.) by Lettsom, in 1850. Richard Wagner composed, in 1850, an opera called Die Niebelungen.

Nibelungen Nôt, the second part of the Nibelungen Lied, containing the marriage of Kriemhild with Etzel, the visit of the Burgundians to the court of the Hun, and the death of Günther, Hagan, Kriemhild, and others. This part contains eighty-three four-line stanzas more than the first part. The number of lines in the two parts is 9836; so that the poem is almost as long as Milton's Paradise Lost.

Nibelungers, whoever possessed the Nibelungen hoard. When it was in Norway, the Norwegians were so called: when Siegfried [Sege-freed] got possession of it, the Netherlanders were so called; and when the hoard was removed to Burgundy, the Burgundians were the Nibelungers.

Nic. Frog, the Dutch, as a nation; as the English are called John Bull.—Dr. Arbuthnot: History of John Bull (1712).

Nica'nor, "the Protospathaire," a Greek general.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Nice (Sir Courtly), the chief character and title of a drama by Croune (1685).

NICHOLAS, a poor scholar, who boarded with John, a rich old miserly carpenter. The poor scholar fell in love with Alison, his landlord's young wife, who joined him in duping the foolish old carpenter. Nicholas told John that such a rain would fall on the ensuing Monday as would drown every one in "less than an hour;" and he persuaded the old fool to provide three large tubs, one for himself, one for his wife, and the other for his lodger. In these tubs, said Nicholas, they would be saved; and when the flood abated, they would then be lords and masters of the whole earth. A few hours before the time of the "flood," the old carpenter went to the top chamber of his house to repeat his pater nosters. He fell asleep over his prayers, and was roused by the cry of "Water! water! Help! help!" Supposing the rain had come, he jumped into his tub, and was let down by Nicholas and Alison into the street. A crowd soon assembled, were delighted at the joke, and pronounced the old man an idiot and fool.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Miller's Tale," 1388).

Nicholas, the barber of the village in which don Quixote lived.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. (1605).

Nicholas (Brother), a monk at St. Mary's Convent.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Nicholas (St.), patron saint of boys, parish clerks, sailors, thieves, and of Aberdeen, Russia, etc.

Nicholas (St.). The legend is, that an angel told him a certain father was so poor that he was about to raise money by the prostitution of his three daughters. On hearing this, St. Nicholas threw in at the cottage window three bags of money, sufficient to portion off each of the three damsels.

> The gift
> Of Nicholas, which on the maidens he > Bounteous bestowed, to save their youthful prime > Unblemished.

> Dante: Purgatory, xx. (1308).

Nicholas Nickleby, the title and chief character of a novel by C. Dickens (1838). Nicholas Nickleby is the son of a poor country gentleman, and has to make his own way in the world. He first goes as usher to Mr. Squeers, schoolmaster at Dotheboys Hall, in Yorkshire; but leaves in disgust with the tyranny of Squeers and his wife, especially to a poor boy named Smike. Smike runs away from the school to follow Nicholas, and remains his humble follower till death. At Portsmouth, Nicholas joins the theatrical company of Mr. Crummles, but leaves the profession for other adventures. He falls in with the brothers Cherryble, who make him their clerk; and in this post he rises to become a merchant, and ultimately marries Madeline Bray.

Mrs. Nickleby, mother of Nicholas, and a widow. She is an enormous talker, fond of telling long stories with no connection. Mrs. Nickleby is a weak, vain woman, who imagines an idiot neighbour is in love with her because he tosses cabbages and other articles over the garden wall. In conversation, Mrs. Nickleby rides off from the main point at every word suggestive of some new idea. As a specimen of her sequence of ideas, take the following example: "The name began with 'B' and ended with 'g,' I am sure. Perhaps it was Waters" (ch. xxi.). (See also AIRCASTLE, p. 17.)

> "The original of 'Mrs. Nickleby,'" says John Forster, "was the mother of Charles Dickens."—Life of Dickens, iii. 8.

Kate Nickleby, sister of Nicholas; beautiful, pure-minded, and loving. Kate works hard to assist in the expenses of housekeeping, but shuns every attempt of Ralph and others to allure her from the path of virgin innocence. She ultimately marries Frank, the nephew of the Cheeryble brothers.

Ralph Nickleby, of Golden Square (London), uncle to Nicholas and Kate. A hard, grasping money-broker, with no ambition but the love of saving, no spirit beyond the thirst of gold, and no principle except that of fleecing every one who comes into his power. This villain is the father of Smike, and ultimately hangs himself, because he loses money, and sees his schemes one after another burst into thin air.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Nicholas of the Tower (The), the duke of Exeter, constable of the Tower.

> He was encountered with a shippe of warre appertelnyng to the duke of Exeter, the constable of the Towre of London, called The Nicholas of the Towre. —Hall: Chronicle (1542).

Nicholas's Clerks, highwaymen; so called by a pun on the phrase Old Nick and St. Nicholas who presided over scholars.

> I think yeader come, prancing down the hill from Kingston, a couple of St. Nicholas's clerks.—Rowley: Match at Midnight (1633).

St. Nicholas's Clerks, scholars; so called because St. Nicholas was the patron of scholars. The statutes of Paul's School require the scholars to attend divine service on St. Nicholas's Day.—Knight: Life of Dean Colet, 362 (1726).

Nickie-Ben, a familiar Scotch name for the devil. (See Burns's Address to the Deil.)

Nicneven, a gigantic malignant hag of Scotch superstition.

(Dunbar, the Scotch poet, describes her in his Flyting of Dunbar and Kennedy, 1508.)

Nicode'mus, one of the servants of general Harrison.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Nicodemus'd into Nothing; i.e. the prospects of one's life being spoiled by a silly name. "Give a dog a bad name and hang him." (The evil influence of a silly name on the bearer of it.)

> How many Cæsars and Pompeys . . . by mere inspiration of the names, have been made worthy of them! and how many . . . might have done . . . well . . . had they not been Nicodemus'd into nothing!—Sterne: Tristram Shandy, vol. i. 19.

Nicol, Anglo-Norman for Lincoln.

> The eight counties of Lincoln—
> Nichole e Hamton [Northampton],
> Hereford [Hertford] e Huntedune,
> Leicestre e Bedefurd,
> Bucklnham e Oxnefford.

Nicole (2 syl.), a female servant of M. Jourdain, who sees the folly of her master, and exposes it in a natural and amusing manner.—Molière: Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme (1670).

Nidhögg, the dragon or adder that gnaws the fabled ash tree yggdrasil (q.v.) in old Scandinavian mythology.

Niflheim, the region of cold and darkness into which one of the roots of the ash tree yggdrasil (q.v.) descends.—Scandinavian Mythology.

Nigel. (See FORTUNES OF NIGEL, p. 387.)

Night or Nox. So Tennyson calls sir Peread, the Black Knight of the Black Lands, one of the four brothers who kept the passages to Castle Perilous.—Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("Gareth and Lynette"); sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 126 (1470).

Night and Morning, a novel by lord Lytton (1841).

Night Side of Nature (The), a collection of ghost stories by Mrs. Crowe (1848).

Night Thoughts, a series of poems in blank verse by Dr. Young. The first eight books were published in 1742, the ninth book in 1745.

Night 1, on Life, Death, and Immortality.
Night 2, on Time, Death, and Friendship.
Night 3, Narcissa.
Night 4, The Christian Triumph.
Night 5, The Relapse.
Nights 6 and 7, The Infidel reclaimed (in a parts).
Night 8, Virtue's apology, or the Man of the World answered.
Night 9, Consolations.

The great defect of the Night Thoughts is the want of continuity. The nine nights are full of detached bursts of passion and poetic fancy, but even Lorenzo excites in us no interest. There is plenty of epigram, some pathos, much emotion, and several fine reflections; but the book should not be read through at once, or it would pall the appetite. I know of no book more fitted for "select beauties" and judicious extracts.

Nightingale (The). It is said that this bird is unknown in Wales, Ireland, and Scotland; that it does not visit Cornwall, nor even the west of Devon.

The Arcadian Nightingale, an ass.

The Cambridgeshire Nightingale, the edible frog, once common in the fen district; also called the "Whaddon organ."

The Fen Nightingale, the edible frog.

The Italian Nightingale, Angelica Catala'ni; also called "The Queen of Song" (1782–1849).

The Liège Nightingale, the edible frog.

The Swedish Nightingale, Jenny Lind, afterwards Mme. Goldschmidt. She appeared in London 1847, and retired 1851 (1821–1886).

The Nightingale of Wittenberg. Martin Luther is so called by Sachs, one of the minnesingers (1483–1546).

Nightingale and the Lutist. The tale is that a lute-master challenged a nightingale in song. The bird, after sustaining the contest for some time, feeling itself outdone, fell on the lute, and died broken-hearted.

∴ This tale is from the Latin of Strada, translated by Richard Crashaw, and called Music's Duel (1650). It is most beautifully told by John Ford, in his drama entitled The Lover's Melancholy, where Men'aphon is supposed to tell it to Ame'thus (1628).

Nightingale and the Thorn.

As it fell upon a day
In the merry month of May,
Sitting in a pleasant shade
Which a grove of myrtles made—
Beasts did leap, and birds did sing,
Trees did grow, and plants did spring,
Everything did banish moan,
Save the nightingale alone;
She, poor bird, as all forlorn,
Leaned her breast up-till a thorn.
Barnfield: Address to the Nightingale (1594).

So Philomel, perched on an aspen sprig,
Weeps all the night her lost virginity,
And sings her sad tale to the merry twig,
That dances at such joyful mysery.
No ever lets sweet rest invade her eye,
But leaning on a thorn her dainty chest,
For fear soft sleep should steal into her breast,
Expresses in her song grief not to be expressed.
G. Fletcher: Christ's Triumph over Death (1610).

The nightingale that sings with the deep thorn
Which fable places in her breast.
Byron: Don Juan, vi. 87 (1824).

Nightmare of Europe (The), Napoleon Bonaparte (1769, reigned 1804–1814, died 1821).

Nightshade (Deadly). We are told that the berries of this plant so intoxicated the soldiers of Sweno the Danish king, that they became an easy prey to the Scotch, who cut them to pieces.

∴ Called "deadly," not from its poisonous qualities, but because it was used at one time for blackening the eyes in mourning.

Nihil. Ex nihilo nihil fit ("Nothing can come out of nothing"). The axiom of Xenoph'anês (4 syl.), founder of the Eleatic school.

Nimrod, pseudonym of Charles James Apperley, author of The Chase, The Road, The Turf (1777–1843).

Nim'ue, a "damsel of the lake," who cajoled Merlin in his dotage to tell her the secret "whereby he could be rendered powerless;" and then, like Delilah, she overpowered him, by "confining him under a stone."

Then after these quests, Merlin fell in a dotage on . . . one of the damsels of the lake, hight Nimue, and Merlin would let her have no rest, but always he would be with her in every place. And she made him good cheer till she had learned of him what she desired. . . . And Merlin shewed to her in a rock, whereas was a great wonder . . . which went under a stone. So by her subtle craft, she made Merlin go under that stone . . . and he never came out, for all the craft that he could do.—Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 60 (1470).

Without doubt the name Nimue is a clerical error for Nineve or Ninive. It occurs only once in the three volumes. (See NINEVE.)

N.B.—Tennyson makes Vivien the seductive betrayer of Merlin, and says she enclosed him "in the four walls of a hollow tower;" but the History says "Nimue put him under the stone" (pt. i. 60).

Nina-Thoma, daughter of Tor-Thoma (chief of one of the Scandinavian islands). She eloped with Uthal (son of Larthmor a petty king of Berrathon, a neighbouring island); but Uthal soon tired of her, and, having fixed his affections on another, confined her in a desert island. Uthal, who had also dethroned his father, was slain in single combat by Ossian, who had come to restore the deposed monarch to his throne. When Nina-Thoma heard of her husband's death, she languished and died, "for, though most cruelly entreated, her love for Uthal was not abated."—Ossian: Berrathon.

Nine. "It is by nines that Eastern presents are given, when they would extend their magnificence to the highest degree." Thus, when Dakiānos wished to ingratiate himself with the shah—

He caused himself to be preceded by nine superb camels. The first was loaded with nine suits of gold adorned with jewels; the second bore nine sabres, the hilts and scabbards of which were adorned with diamonds; upon the third camel were nine suits of armour; the fourth had nine suits of horse furniture; the fifth had nine cases full of sapphires; the sixth had nine cases full of rubies; the seventh nine cases full of emeralds; the eighth had nine cases full of amethysts; and the ninth had nine cases full of diamonds.—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("Dakianos and the Seven Sleepers," 1743).

Nine Gods (The) of the Etruscans: Juno, Minerva, and Tin'ia (the three chief). The other six were Vulcan, Mars, Saturn, Herculēs, Summa'nus, and Vedius. (See NOVENSILES, p. 763.)

Lars Por'sēna of Clusium,
By the nine gods he swore
That the great house of Tarquin
Should suffer wrong no more.
By the nine gods he swore it,
And named a trysting day . . .
To summon his array.
Macaulay: Lays of Ancient Rome ("Horatius," i., 1842).

Nine Orders of Angels (The): (1) Seraphim, (2) Cherubim (in the first circle); (3) Thrones, (4) Dominions (in the second circle); (5) Virtues, (6) Powers, (7) Principalities, (8) Archangels, (9) Angels (in the third circle).

In heaven above
The effulgent bands in triple circles move.
Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, xi. 13 (1575).

Novem vero angelorum ordines dicimus; . . . scimus (1) Angelos, (2) Archangelos, (3) Virtutes, (4) Potestates, (5) Principatus, (6) Dominationes, (7) Thronos, (8) Cherubim, (9) Seraphim.—Gregory: Homily, 34 (A.D. 381).

Nine Planets (The): Mercury, Venus, the Earth, Mars, the Planetoids, Jupiter, Saturn, Urānus, and Neptune.

∴ According to the Ptolemaic system, there are only seven planets, or, more strictly speaking, "planetary heavens," viz. the Moon, Mercury, Venus, the Sun, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn. Beyond these were three other spheres, that of the fixed stars, the primum mobile, and the empyrēan. This is the system Dantē follows in his Paradise.

Nine Worthies (The). Three were pagans: Hector, Alexander, and Julius Cæsar. Three were Jews: Joshua, David, and Judas Maccabæus. Three were Christians: Arthur, Charlemagne, and Godfrey of Bouillon.

Nine Worthies (privy councillors to William III.). Four were Whigs: Devonshire, Dorset, Monmouth, and Edward Russell. Five were Tories: Caermarthen, Pembroke, Nottingham, Marlborough, and Lowther.

Nine Worthies of London (The): sir William Walworth, sir Henry Pritchard, sir William Sevenoke, sir Thomas White, sir John Bonham, Christopher Croker, sir John Hawkwood, sir Hugh Caverley, and sir Henry Maleverer.

(The chronicles of these nine worthies are written in prose and verse by Richard Johnson (1592), author of The Seven Champions of Christendom.)

Nineteenth Century (The), a monthly periodical started in 1877.

Nineve (2 syl.), the Lady of the Lake, in Arthurian romance.

Then the Lady of the Lake, that was always friendly unto king Arthur, understood by her subtle crafts that he was like to have been destroyed; and so the Lady of the Lake, that hight Nineve, came into the forest to seek sir Launcelot du Lake.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 57 (1470).

. This name occurs three times in the Morte d'Arthur—once as "Nimue," once as "Nineve," and once as "Ninive." Probably "Nimue" (q.v.) is a clerical error, as we also find Nynyue.

Nineveh (The Fall of), an historic poem by Edwin Atherstone, in thirty books. Six were published in 1825, seven more in 1830, and the rest in 1847.

Ninon de Lenclos, a beautiful Parisian, rich, spirituelle, and an atheist, who abandoned herself to epicurean indulgence, and preserved her charms to a very advanced age. Ninon de Lenclos renounced marriage, and had numberless lovers. Her house was the rendezvous of all the most illustrious persons of the period, as Molière, St. Evremont, Fontenelle, Voltaire, and so on (1615–1705).

> Some never grow
> Ugly; for instance, Ninon de Lenclos.
> Byron: Don Juan, v. 98 (1820).

Niobe [Ne'-o-by], the beau-ideal of grief. After losing her twelve children, she was changed into a stone, from which ran water.

. The group of "Niobe and her Children in Florence," discovered at Rome in 1583, was the work either of Praxit'elês or Scopas.

> She followed my poor father's body,
> Like Niobê, all tears.
> Shakespeare: Hamlet, act i. sc. 2 (1596).

Niobe of Nations (The). Rome is so called by Byron.—Childe Harold, iv. 79 (1817).

Nipha'tes (3 syl.), a mountain on the borders of Mesopotamia. It was on this mountain that Satan lighted when he came from the sun to visit our earth.

> . . . toward the coast of earth beneath,
> Down from the ecliptic, sped with hoped success . . .
> Nor stayed till on Niphates' top he lights.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 739, etc. (1665).

Nipper (Susan), generally called "Spitfire," from her snappish disposition. She was the nurse of Florence Dombey, to whom she was much attached. Susan Nipper married Mr. Toots (after he had got over his infatuation for Florence).

> Susan Nipper says, "I may wish to take a voyage to Chaney, but I mayn't know how to leave the London Docks."—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Nippotate (4 syl.), "a live lion stuffed with straw," exhibited in a raree-show. So called from the body of a tame hedgehog exhibited by Old Harry, a notorious character in London at the beginning of the eighteenth century (died 1710).

> Of monsters stranger than can be expressed,
> There's Nippotatê lies amongst the rest.
> Sutton Nicholls.

Niquee [Ne'-kay], the sister of Anasterax, with whom she lived in incest. The fairy Zorphee was her godmother, and enchanted her, in order to break off this connection.—Vasco de Lobeira: Amadis de Gaul (thirteenth century).

Nisroch [Niz'-rok], "of principalities the prince." A god of the Assyrians. In the book of Kings the "Seventy" call him "Meserach," and in Isaiah "Nasarach." Josephus calls him "Araskês." One of the rebel angels in Milton's Paradise Lost.

> Sense of pleasure we may well
> Spare out of life, perhaps, and not repine,
> But live content, which is the calmest life;
> But pain is perfect misery, the worst
> Of evils, and, excessive, overturns
> All patience.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 459, etc. (1665).

Nirva'na, elemental ens, abstract existence, that is existence stripped of will, passion, pleasure, pain, etc. Life is not nirvana, because life is a compound; and death is not nirvana, but death is the cessation of existence.

Nisus and Eury'alus, an episode in Virgil's Æneid. They were two young Trojans who accompanied Ænēas from Troy, and won great distinction in the war with Turnus. They entered the enemy's camp at dead of night, but, being detected by the Rutulians, Eury'alus was slain, and Nisus (trying to save his friend) perished also (bk. ix.).

(This is given as an example of friendship, q.v.)

Nit, one of the attendants of queen Mab.

> Hop, and Mop, and Drap so clear,
> Pip, and Trip, and Skip, that were
> To Mab their sovereign dear—
> Her special maids of honour.
> Fib, and Tib, and Pinck, and Pin,
> Tick, and Quick, and Jill, and Jin,
> Tit, and Nit, and Wap, and Win—
> The train that wait upon her.
> Drayton: Nymphidia (1563–1631).

Nixon (Christal), agent to Mr. Edward Redgauntlet the Jacobite.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Nixon (Martha), the old nurse of the earl of Oxford.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

No Cross no Crown, a discourse by W. Penn, written in prison (1669). (See PRISON LITERATURE.)

No One (Cæsar or). Julius Cæsar said, "Aut Cæsar aut nullus." And again, "I would sooner be first in a village than second at Rome."

Milton makes Satan say, "Better to reign in hell than serve in heaven."

Jonathan Wild used to say, "I'd rather stand on the top of a dunghill than at the bottom of a hill in paradise."

Tennyson says, "All in all or not at all."—Idylls ("Vivien").

"Six thrice or three dice" (aces were called dice, and did not count).

No Song no Supper, a musical drama by Prince Hoare, F.S.A. (1790). Crop the farmer has married a second wife called Dorothy, who has an amiable weakness for a rascally lawyer named Endless. During the absence of her husband, Dorothy provides a supper for Endless, consisting of roast lamb and a cake; but just as the lawyer sits down to it, Crop, with Margaretta, knocks at the door. Endless is concealed in a sack, and the supper is carried away. Presently, Robin the sweetheart of Margaretta arrives, and Crop regrets there is nothing but bread and cheese to offer him. Margaretta now volunteers a song, the first verse of which tells Crop there is roast lamb in the house, which is accordingly produced; the second verse tells him there is a cake, which is produced also; and the third verse tells him that Endless is concealed in a sack. Had there been no song there would have been no supper, but the song produced the roast lamb and new cake.

No Thoroughfare, a Christmas tale by Dickens and Collins, in All the Year Round (1867). Dramatized by the authors.

Noah's Flood, a poem by Drayton (1627).

Noah's Raven. (For a remarkable parallel, see RAVEN.)

Noah's Wife, Wâîla (3 syl.), who endeavoured to persuade the people that her husband was distraught.

> The wife of Noah [Wâîla] and the wife of Lot [Wâhela] were both unbelievers . . . and deceived their husbands . . . and it shall be said to them at the last day, "Enter ye into hell fire."—Sale: Al Korân, lxvi.

Nobbs, the horse of "Dr. Dove of Doncaster."—Southey: The Doctor (1834).

Noble (The), Charles III. of Navarre (1361, 1387–1425).

Soliman, Tchelibi, the Turk (died 1410).

 Khosrou or Chosroës I. was called "The Noble Soul" (*, 531–579).

Noctes (2 syl.), a series of seventy-one hypothetical conversations contributed to Blackwood's Magazine between 1822 and 1835. About half were by professor Wilson. The conversations were supposed to take place in the "blue parlour" of an inn, kept by one Ambrose, and hence were called Noctes Ambrosianæ.

Nodel, the lion, in the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox. Nodel, the lion, represents the regal element of Germany; Isengrin, the wolf, represents the baronial element; and Reynard, the fox, the Church element (1498).

Noel (Eusebe), schoolmaster of Bout du Monde. "His clothes are old and worn, and his manner vacant" (act i. 2).—Stirling: The Gold-Mine or Miller of Grenoble (1854).

Noggs (Newman), Ralph Nickleby's clerk. A tall man of middle age, with two goggle eyes (one of which was fixed), a rubicund nose, a cadaverous face, and a suit of clothes decidedly the worse for wear. He had the gift of distorting and cracking his finger-joints. This kind-hearted, dilapidated fellow "kept his hunter and hounds once," but ran through his fortune. He discovered a plot of old Ralph, which he confided to the Cheeryble brothers, who frustrated it and then provided for Newman.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Noko'mis, mother of Weno'nah, and grandmother of Hiawatha. Nikomis was the daughter of the Moon. While she was swinging one day, some of her companions, out of jealousy, cut the ropes, and she fell to earth in a meadow. The same night her first child, a daughter, was born, and was named Wenonah.

> There among the terns and mosses . . .
> Fair Nokomis bore a daughter,
> And she called her name Wenonah.
> Longfellow: Hiawatha, iii. (1855).

Non Mi Ricordo, the usual reply of the Italian courier and other Italian witnesses when on examination at the trial of queen Charlotte (the wife of George IV.), in 1820.

> The Italian witnesses often created amusement, when under examination, by the frequent answer, "Non mi ricordo."—Cassell's History of England, VII. iv. 26 (1863).

¶ "Lord Flint," in Such Things Are, by Mrs. Inchbald (1786), when asked a question he wished to evade, used to reply,

"My people know, no doubt, but I cannot recollect."

¶ "Pierre Choppard," in The Courier of Lyons, by Edward Stirling (1852), when asked an ugly question, always answered, "I'll ask my wife, my memory's so slippery."

¶ The North American society called the "Know Nothings," founded in 1853, used to reply to every question about themselves, "I know nothing about it."

Nona'cris' Stream, the river Styx, in Arcadia. Cassander says he has in a phial some of this "horrid spring," one drop of which, mixed with wine, would act as a deadly poison. To this Polyperchon replies—

> I know its power, for I have seen it tried.
> Pains of all sorts thro' every nerve and artery
> At once it scatters,—burns at once and freezes,—
> Till, by extremity of torture forced,
> The soul consents to leave her joyless home.
> Lee: Alexander the Great, iv. 1 (1678).

Nonentity (Dr.), a metaphysician, and thought by most people to be a profound scholar. He generally spreads himself before the fire, sucks his pipe, talks little, drinks much, and is reckoned very good company. You may know him by his long grey wig, and the blue handkerchief round his neck.

> Dr. Nonentity, I am told, writes indexes to perfection, makes essays, and reviews any work with a single day's warning.—Goldsmith: A Citizen of the World, xxix. (1759).

Nones and Ides (each 1 syl.).

> On March the 7th, June, July,
> October, too, the Nones you spy;
> Except in these, those Nones appear
> On the 5th day of all the year.
> If to the Nones you add an 8,
> Of all the Ides you'll find the date.
> E. C. B.

Hence we have the 15th for the Ides of March, June, July, and October; and the 13th for every other month.

Nongtongpaw, a comic ballad by Charles Dibdin (1745–1814).

Nonsense (Foote's farrago of). (See PANJANDRUM.)

Norbert (Father), Pierre Parisot Norbert, the French missionary (1697–1769).

Norfolk Street (Strand), with Arundel, Surrey, and Howard Streets, occupy the site of the house and grounds of the Howards (earls of Arundel and Surrey).

Norland (Lord), father of lady Eleanor Irwin, and guardian of lady Ramble (Miss Maria Wooburn). He disinherited his daughter for marrying against his will, and left her to starve; but subsequently he relented, and relieved her wants and those of her young husband.—Mrs. Inchbald: Every One has His Fault (1794).

Norma, a vestal who had been seduced, and discovers her paramour trying to seduce a sister vestal. In despair, she contemplates the murder of her base-born children.—Bellini: Norma (1831); libretto by Romani.

Norman, forester of sir William Ashton lord-keeper of Scotland.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Norman, a "sea-captain," in love with Violet the ward of lady Arundel. It turns out that this Norman is her ladyship's son by her first husband, and heir to the title and estates; but lady Arundel, having married a second husband, had a son named Percy, whom she wished to make her heir. Norman's father was murdered, and Norman, who was born three days afterwards, was brought up by Onslow, a village priest. At the age of 14 he went to sea, and became captain of a man-of-war. Ten years later, he returned to Arundel, and though at first his mother ignored him, and Percy flouted him, his noble and generous conduct disarmed hostility, and he not only reconciled his half-brother, but won his mother's affection, and married Violet his heart's "sweet sweeting."—Lord Lytton: The Sea-Captain (1839).

Norman-nan-Ord or Norman of the Hammer, one of the eight sons of Torquil of the Oak.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Normandy (The Gem of), Emma, daughter of Richard I. (died 1052).

Norna of the Fitful Head, "The Reimkennar." Her real name was Ulla Troil, but after her seduction by Basil Mertoun (Vaughan), and the birth of a son named Clement Cleveland (the future pirate), she changed her name. Towards the end of the novel, Norna gradually recovered her senses. She was the aunt of Minna and Brenda Troil.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

 She thought that Mordaunt Mertoun was her son, but her son was really Cleveland the pirate. Basil Mertoun, the natural father of Cleveland, afterwards married, and Mordaunt was the son of this marriage. (For Norna's mistake, see ch. xxxiii.; for the explanation, see ch. xli.)

[One]'cannot fail to trace in Norna—the victim of remorse and insanity, and the dupe of her own imposture, her mind too flooded with all the wild literature and extravagant superstitions of the north—something distinct from the Dumfriesshire gipsy, whose pretensions to supernatural powers are not beyond those of a Norwood prophetess.—The Pirate (introduction, 1821).

Norris, a family to whom Martin Chuzzlewit was introduced while he was in America. They were friends of Mr. Bevan, rabid abolitionists, and yet hankering after titles as the gilt of the gingerbread of life.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Norris (Black), a dark, surly man and a wrecker. He wanted to marry Marian, "the daughter" of Robert (also a wrecker); but Marian was betrothed to Edward, a young sailor. Robert, being taken up for murder, was condemned to death; but Norris told Marian he would save his life if she would promise to marry him. Marian consented, but was saved by the arrest of Black Norris for murder.—Knowles: The Daughter (1836).

North (Christopher), pseudonym of John Wilson, professor of moral philosophy, Edinburgh. He contributed to Blackwood's Magazine thirty-nine of the "Noctes Ambrosianæ." (1785–1854.)

North (Lord), one of the judges in the State trial of Geoffrey Peveril, Julian, and the dwarf, for being concerned in the popish plot.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

North Britain, Scotland.

The North Britain, a radical periodical, conducted by John Wilkes. The celebrated number of this serial was No. 45, published April 23, 1763, in which the ministers are charged "with putting a lie in the king's mouth."

Northampton, a contraction of North-Avon-town (Northavonton), the town on the north of the Avon (Nen). As Drayton says, "Nen was Avon called."—Polyolbion, xxiii. (1622).

Northamptonshire Poet (The), John Clare (1793–1864).

Northern Farmer (The), two poems in Yorkshire dialect by Tennyson. One is called "Old Style," and the other "New Style." In the latter the tramp of the horse sounds like "property, property, property!"

Northern Harlot (The), Elizabeth Petrowna, empress of Russia; also called "The Infamous" (1709–1761).

Northern Waggoner, Ursa Major or Charles's waggon, a corruption of the chârl's waggon. It contains seven large stars, designated by the Greek letters, $\alpha, \beta, \gamma, \delta, \epsilon, \zeta, \eta$. The first four form the waggon and the rest the pole or shaft. The driver of the team is Boötès.

By this the northern wagoner has set
His sevenfold team behind the steadfast star [the pole-star]
That was in ocean waves yet never wet,
But firm is fixed, and sendeth light from far
To all that on the wide deep wandering are.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, I. ii. x (1590).

Norumbe'ga, a province of North America.

Now from the north
Of Norumbega and the Samoed shore . . .
Boreas and Cæcias, and Argestès loud,
And Thrascias rend the woods, and seas upturn.
Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 695 (1665).

("Samoed shore," the shore contiguous to the frozen ocean; "Boreas," north wind; "Cæcias," north-west wind; "Argestès," north-east wind; "Thrascias," wind from Thrace.)

Norval (Old), a shepherd, who brings up lady Randolph's son (Douglas) as his own. He was hidden and exposed at birth in a basket, because sir Malcolm hated the child, which was the offspring of Douglas and his daughter, who afterwards married lord Randolph. The child, being found by old Norval, was brought up as his own; but the old man discovered that the foundling was "sir Malcolm's heir and Douglas's son." When 18 years old, the foster-son saved the life of lord Randolph. Lady Randolph took great interest in the young man, and when old Norval told her his tale, she instantly perceived that the young hero was in fact her own son.

Pathos rendered the voice of William Bensley [1738–1817] in "Old Norval" rugged as well as repulsive; and he never, as to his feet, either stood or walked with the character of age. His helpless action had a character of restrained vigour; he implored pity in the noisy shout of defiance.—Boaden.

Young Norval, the infant exposed, and brought up by the old shepherd as his own son. He turned out to be sir Malcolm's heir. His mother was lady Randolph, and his father lord Douglas, her first husband. Young Norval, having saved the life of lord Randolph, was given by him a commission in the army. Glenalvon, the heir-presumptive of lord Randolph, hated the new favourite, and persuaded his lordship that the young man was too familiar with lady Randolph. Being waylaid, Norval was attacked, slew Glenalvon, but was in turn slain by lord Randolph. After the death of Norval, lord Randolph discovered that he had killed the son of his wife by a former marriage. The mother, in her distraction, threw herself headlong from a lofty precipice, and lord Randolph went to the war then raging between Denmark and Scotland.—Home: Douglas (1757).

(This was a favourite character with John Kemble, 1757–1823.)

Henry Johnston selected "Young Norval" for his maiden part. His youthful form and handsome expressive countenance won for him universal approbation. Previously the young shepherd had been dressed in the trews and Scotch jacket; but when Johnston appeared in full Highland costume, kilt, breastplate, shield, claymore, and bonnet, the whole house rose en masse, and such a reception was never witnessed within the walls of a provincial theatre before.—Donaldson: Recollections.

Norway (The Fair Maid of), Margaret, granddaughter of Alexander III. of Scotland. She died (1290) of seasickness on her passage from Norway to Scotland. Her father was Eric II. king of Norway, and her mother was Margaret only daughter of Alexander III.

Norwynn (William and Henry). (See NATURE AND ART, p. 746.)

Nose (Golden), Tycho Brahê, the Danish astronomer. Having lost his nose in a duel with one Passberg, he adopted a golden one, and attached it to his face by a cement which he carried about with him.

That eminent man who had a golden nose, Tycho Brahê, lost his nose in a duel, and a golden one was supplied, which gave him the appearance of a wizard. —Marryat: Jutland and the Danish Isles, 305.

Nosebag (Mrs.), wife of a lieutenant in the dragoons. She is the inquisitive travelling companion of Waverley when he travels by stage to London.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Nosey (Play up)! This exclamation was common in our theatres in the days of Macklin, etc. M. Nozay was the leader of the orchestra in Covent Garden Theatre.

∴ Some persons affirm that "Old Nosey" was Cervetto, the violoncello player at Drury Lane (1753), and say that he was so called from his long nose.

Napoleon III. was nicknamed Grasbec ("Nosey").

Nosnot-Bocai [Bo'-ky], prince of purgatory.

Sir, I last night received command
To see you out of Fairy-land
Into the realm of Nosnot-Bocai.
King: Orpheus and Eurydice.

Nostrada'mus (Michael), an astrologer of the sixteenth century, who published an annual Almanac and a Recueil of Prophecies, in verse (1503–1566).

Nostrada'mus of Portugal, Gonçalo Annês Bandarra, a poet-cobbler, whose career was stopped, in 1556, by the Inquisition.

Notes and Queries, a weekly periodical for literary criticism and information; started by W. J. Thoms, in 1849.

Nottingham (The countess of), a quondam sweetheart of the earl of Essex, and his worst enemy when she heard that he had married the countess of Rutland. The queen sent her to the Tower to ask Essex if he had no petition to make, and the earl requested her to take back a ring, which the queen had given him as a pledge of mercy in time of need. As the countess out of jealousy forbore to deliver it, the earl was executed.—H. Jones: The Earl of Essex (1745).

Nottingham Lambs (The), the Nottingham roughs.

Nottingham Poet (The), Philip James Bailey, the author of Festus, etc. (1816–).

No'tus, the south wind; Afer is the south-west wind.

Notus and Afer, black with thundrous clouds.
Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 702 (1665).

Noukhail, the angel of day and night.

The day and night are trusted to my care. I hold the day in my right hand, and the night in my left; and I maintain the just equilibrium between them, for if either were to overbalance the other, the universe would either be consumed by the heat of the sun, or would perish with the cold of darkness.—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("History of Abdal Motallab," 1743).

Nouman (Sidi), an Arab who married Aminê, a very beautiful woman, who ate her rice with a bodkin. Sidi, wishing to know how his wife could support life and health without more food than she partook of in his presence, watched her narrowly, and discovered that she was a ghoul, who went by stealth every night and feasted on the fresh-buried dead. When Sidi made this discovery, Aminê changed him into a dog. After he was restored to his normal shape, he changed Aminê into a mare, which every day he rode almost to death.—Arabian Nights ("History of Sidi Nouman").

Your majesty knows that ghouls of either sex are demons which wander about the fields. They commonly inhabit ruinous buildings, whence they issue suddenly on unwary travellers, whom they kill and devour. If they fail to meet with travellers, they go by night into burying-grounds, and dig up dead bodies, on which they feed.—History of Sidi Nouman.

Noureddin, son of Khacan (vizier of Zinebi king of Balsora). He got possession of the "beautiful Persian" purchased for the king. At his father's death he soon squandered away his patrimony in the wildest extravagance, and fled with his beautiful slave to Bagdad. Here he encountered Haroun-al-Raschid in disguise, and so pleased the caliph, that he was placed in the number of those courtiers most intimate with his majesty, who also bestowed on him so plentiful a fortune, that he lived with the "beautiful Persian" in affluence all the rest of his life.—Arabian Nights ("Noureddin and the Beautiful Persian").

Nour'eddin' Ali, younger son of the vizier of Egypt. "He was possessed of as much merit as can fall to the lot of man." Having quarrelled with his elder brother, he travelled to Baso'ra, where he married the vizier's daughter, and succeeded his father-in-law in office. A son was born to him in due time, and on the very same day the wife of his elder brother had a daughter. Noureddin died when his son was barely twenty and unmarried.—Arabian Nights ("Noureddin Ali," etc.).

Nourgehan's Bracelet. Nourgehan emperor of the Moguls had a bracelet which had the property of discovering poison, even at a considerable distance. When poison was anywhere near the wearer, the stones of the bracelet seemed agitated, and the agitation increased as the poison approached them.—Comte de Caylus: Oriental Tales ("The Four Talismans," 1743).

Nour'jahad, a sleeper, like Rip van Winkle, Epimen'ides, etc. (See SLEEPERS.) A romance by Mrs. Sheridan (1767).

Nourjeham ["light of the world"]. So the sultana Nourmahal' was subsequently called.—Moore: Lalla Rookh ("The Light of the Haram," 1817).

Nour-jehan, the widow of Shere Afgun. Her name was "Mher ul Nissa" (the sun of women). Selim slew Shere Afgun, in order to obtain possession of Nour-jehan, as David morally slew Uriah the Hittite in order to make Bathsheba his wife. In both cases the woman was but too willing to pander to royal lust.—Percy: Anecdotes, p. 246.

Nourmahal' (The sultana), i.e. "Light of the Haram," afterwards called Nourjeham ("light of the world"). She was for a season estranged from the sultan, till he gave a grand banquet, at which she appeared in disguise as a lute-player and singer. The sultan was so enchanted with her performance, that he exclaimed, "If Nourmahal had so played and sung, I could forgive her all;" whereupon the sultana threw off her mask, and Selim "caught her to his heart."—Moore: Lalla Rookh ("The Light of the Haram," 1817).

Nouron'ihar, daughter of the emir Fakreddin; a laughing, beautiful girl, full of fun and pretty mischief, dotingly fond of Gulchenrouz, her cousin, a boy of 13. She married the caliph Vathek, with whom she descended into the abyss of Eblis, whence she never after returned to the light of day.

The trick she played Bababalouk was this: Vathek the caliph was on a visit to Fakreddin the emir', and Bababalouk his chief eunuch intruded into the bath-room, where Nouronihar and her damsels were bathing. Nouronihar induced the old eunuch to rest himself awhile on the swing, when the girls set it going with all their might. The cords broke, the eunuch fell into the bath, the girls made off with their lamps, and left the meddlesome old fool to flounder about till morning, when assistance came, but not before he was half dead.—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Nouroun'nihar, niece of a sultan of India who had three sons all in love with her. The sultan said he would give her to him who, in twelve months, gave him the most valuable present. The three princes met in a certain inn at the expiration of the time, when one prince looked through a tube, which showed Nourounnihar at the point of death; another of the brothers transported all three instantaneously on a magic carpet to the princess's chamber; and the third brother gave her an apple to smell of, which effected an instant cure of any malady. It was impossible to decide which of these presents was the most valuable; so the sultan said that that son should have her who shot an arrow to the greatest distance. The eldest (Houssain) shot first; Ali overshot the arrow of his elder brother; but that of the youngest brother (Ahmed) could nowhere be found (the fairy Pari-Banou had conveyed it beyond recovery). So the award was given to Ali.—Arabian Nights ("Ahmed and Pari-Banou").

Novel (Father of the English). Henry Fielding is so called by sir W. Scott (1707-1754).

Novels by Eminent Hands, a series of parodies by Thackeray. Amongst the parodies are those on Fenimore Cooper, Disraeli (Beaconsfield), Mrs. Gore, James, Lever, lord Lytton, etc.

Novembor or Blot-monath, i.e. "blood month," meaning the month in which oxen, sheep, and swine were slaughtered, and afterwards salted down for winter use. Some idea may be formed of the enormous stores provided, from the fact that the elder Spencer, in 1327, when the season was over, had a surplus, in May, of "80 salted beeves, 500 bacons, and 600 muttons." In Chichester the October fair is called "Slo-fair," i.e. the fair when beasts were sold for the slaughter of Blot-monath (Old English, slêan slôh, "to slaughter").

Noven'dial Ashes, the ashes of the dead just consigned, or about to be consigned, to the grave. The Romans kept the body seven days, burnt it on the eighth, and buried the ashes on the ninth.

A Noven'dial holiday, nine days set apart by the Romans, in expiation of a shower of stones.

Noven'siles (4 syl.), the nine Sabine gods: viz. Herculês, Romulus, Esculapius, Bacchus, Ænêas, Vesta, Santa, Fortuna, and Fidês or Faith. (See NINE GODS of the Etruscans.)

Novit (Mr. Nichil), the lawyer of the old laird of Dumbiedikes.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Novius, the usurer, famous for the loudness of his voice.

> . . . at hic si plaustra ducenta
> Concurrantque foro tria funera magna sonabit
> Cornua quod vincatque tubas.
> Horace: Satires, I. vi.

These people seem to be of the race of Novius, that Roman banker, whose voice exceeded the noise of carmen.—Lesage: Gil Blas, vii. 13 (1735).

Now-now (Old Anthony), an itinerant fiddler. The character is a skit on Anthony Munday, the dramatist.—Chettle: Kindheart's Dream (1592).

Nuath (a syl.), father of Lathmon and Oith'ona (q.v.).—Ossian: Oithona.

Nubbles (Mrs.), a poor widow woman, who was much given to going to Little Bethel.

Christopher or Kit Nubbles, her son, the servant in attendance on little Nell, whom he adored. After the death of little Nell, Kit married Barbara, a fellow-servant.—Dickens: The Old Curiosity Shop (1840).

Nudio'si, small stones, which prevent the sight of those who carry them about their person from waxing dim. They will even restore the sight after it is lost or impaired. The more these stones are gazed on, the keener will be the gazer's vision. Prester John, in his letter to Manuel Comne'nus emperor of Constantinople, says they are found in his country.

Nugget. The largest ever found—

1. The Sarah Sands nugget, found at Ballarat. It weighed 130 lbs. troy or 1560 ozs. This, at £4 per ounce, would be worth £6240.

2. The Blanche Barkly nugget, dug up at Kingower. It weighed 145 lbs., and was worth £6960.

3. The Welcome nugget, found at Ballarat. It weighed 184 lbs., and was sold for £10,000. This was the largest ever found.

∴ The first nugget was discovered in New South Wales, in 1851; the next in Victoria, in 1852. The former of these two weighed a hundredweight, and was purchased of a shepherd for £10.

Nulla Fides Fronti.

> There is no art
> To find the mind's construction in the face.
> Shakespeare: Macbeth, act i. sc. 4 (1606).

Number Nip, the name of the gnome king of the Giant Mountains.—Musæus: Popular Tales (1782).

(Musæus was a German, uncle of Kotzebue, died 1788.)

Numbers (The Book of). An English translation of the Greek title of the fourth book of the Old Testament. It is called by Jews In the Wilderness. As the first six words are like those of Leviticus, the next three are taken instead. It tells us the number of persons in each of the twelve tribes, both at the beginning and at the end of their sojourn in the wilderness (chs. i.-iv. and xxvi.). It also tells us how the people were provided with food, and how they were punished for disobedience.

Leviticus begins, "And the Lord called unto Moses." Numbers begins, "And the Lord spake unto Moses in the wilderness."

Numbers. The symbolism of the first thirteen numbers—

1 is that sacred Unity, before the world began;
2 is the mystic union of Christ both God and man;
3 is the Holy Trinity—a perfect Three-in-one;
4 are the evangelists of God's incarnate Son;
5 are the wounds of Christ—in hands, and feet, and side;
6 the days when heaven was made, the earth, and all beside;
God rested on the 7th day, and so from work should we;
And 7 words the Saviour spake from the "accurséd tree."
8 are the Beatitudes; the heavenly orders 9;
10 the commandments given to man, writ by the hand Divine;
11 were the faithful left, after the traitor's fall;
12 was the college all complete; and 13 with St. Paul.

E. C. B.

Nûn, the fish on which the faithful feed in paradise. The lobes of its liver will suffice for 70,000 men. The ox provided for them is called Balâm.

Nun's Priest's Tale (The), the tale of the cock and the fox. One day, dan Russell, the fox, came into the poultry-yard, and told Master Chanteclere he could not resist the pleasure of hearing him sing, for his voice was so divinely ravishing. The cock, pleased with this flattery, shut his eyes, and began to crow most lustily; whereupon dan Russell seized him by the throat, and ran off with him. When they got to the wood, the cock said to the fox, "I would recommend you to eat me at once, for I think I can hear your pursuers." "I am going to do so," said the fox; but when he opened his mouth to reply, off flew the cock into a tree, and while the fox was deliberating how he might regain his prey, up came the farmer and his men with scythes, flails, and pitchforks, with which they despatched the fox without mercy. — Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (1388).

(This fable is one of those by Marie of France, called Don Coc and Don Werpil.)

The Second Nun's Tale. This is the tale about Maxime and the martyrs Valirian and Tiburcê. The prefect ordered Maxime (2 syl.) to put Valirian and Tiburcê to death, because they refused to worship the image of Jupiter; but Maxime showed kindness to the two Christians, took them home, became converted, and was baptized. When Valirian and Tiburcê were put to death, Maxime declared that he saw angels come and carry them up to heaven, whereupon the prefect caused him to be beaten to death with whips of lead. — Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (1388).

(This tale is very similar to that of St. Cecilia in the Legenda Aurea. See also Acts xvi. 25–34.)

Nupkins, mayor of Ipswich, a man who has a most excellent opinion of himself, but who, in all magisterial matters, really depends almost entirely on Jinks, his half-starved clerk. — Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Nush'ka [i.e. "look!"], the cry of young men and maidens of North American Indian tribes when they find a red ear of maize, the symbol of wedlock.

And whene'er some lucky maiden
Found a red ear in the husking. . . .
"Nushka!" cried they altogether;
"Nushka!" you shall have a sweetheart,
You shall have a handsome husband!"

Longfellow: Hiawatha, xiii. (1855).

Nut-Brown Maid (The), the maid wooed by the "banished man." The "banished man" describes to her the hardships she would have to undergo if she married him; but finding that she accounted these hardships as nothing compared with his love, he revealed himself to be an earl's son, with large hereditary estates in Westmoreland, and he married her. — Percy: Reliques, series ii. bk. i. 6.

(This ballad is based on the legendary history of lord Henry Clifford, called "The Shepherd Lord." It was modernized by Prior, who called his version of the story Henry and Emma. The oldest form of the ballad extant is contained in Arnolde's Chronicle, 1502.)

Nutshell (The Iliad in a). George P. Marsh tells us he had seen the whole Korân in Arabic inscribed on a piece of parchment four inches wide and half an inch in diameter. In any photographer's shop may be seen a page of the Times newspaper reduced to about an inch long, and three-quarters of an inch in breadth, or even to smaller dimensions. Charles Toppan, of New York, engraved on a plate one-eighth of an inch square 12,000 letters. The Iliad contains 501,930 letters, and would, therefore, require forty-two such plates, both sides being used. Huet, bishop of Avranches, wrote eighty verses of the Iliad on a space equal to that occupied by a single line of this dictionary. Thus written, 2000 lines more than the entire Iliad might be contained in one page. The Toppan engraving would require only one of these columns for the entire Iliad.

So that when Pliny (Natural History, vii. 21) says the whole Iliad was written on a parchmeht which might be put into a nutshell, we can credit the possibility, as by the Toppan process, the entire Iliad might be engraved on less than half a column of this dictionary, provided both sides were used. See ILIAD, p. 519.)

Nym, corporal in the army under captain sir John Falstaff, introduced in The Merry Wives of Windsor and in Henry V., but not in Henry IV. It seems that lieutenant Peto had died, and given a step to the officers under him. Thus ensign Pistol becomes lieutenant, corporal Bardolph becomes ensign, and Nym takes the place of Bardolph. He is an arrant rogue, and both he and Bardolph are hanged (Henry V.). The word means "to pilfer."

It would be difficult to give any other reply save that of corporal Nym—it was the author's humour or caprice.—Sir W. Scott.

Nymphid'ia, a mock-heroic by Drayton. The fairy Pigwiggen is so gallant to queen Mab as to arouse the jealousy of king Oberon. One day, coming home and finding his queen absent, Oberon vows vengeance on the gallant, and sends Puck to ascertain the whereabouts of Mab and Pigwiggen. In the mean time, Nymphidia gives the queen warning, and the queen, with all her maids of honour, creep into a hollow nut for concealment. Puck, coming up, sets foot in the enchanted circle which Nymphidia had charmed, and, after stumbling about for a time, tumbles into a ditch. Pigwiggen seconded by Tomalin, encounters Oberon seconded by Tom Thum, and the fight is "both fast and furious." Queen Mab, in alarm, craves the interference of Proserpine, who first envelopes the combatants in a thick smoke, which compels them to desist; and then gives them a draught "to assuage their thirst." The draught was from the river Lethê; and immediately the combatants had tasted it, they forgot not only the cause of the quarrel, but even that they had quarrelled at all.—Drayton: Nymphidia (1593).

Nysa, daughter of Silēno and My'sis, and sister of Daphnê. Justice Mi'das is in love with her; but she loves Apollo, her father's guest.—Kane O'Hara: Midas (1764).

Nysê, Doto, and Neri'ne, the three nereids who went before the fleet of Vasco de Gama. When the treacherous pilot steered the ship of Vasco towards a sunken rock, these three sea-nymphs lifted up the prow and turned it round.—Camoëns: Lusiad, ii. (1569).

O.

O (Our Lady of). The Virgin Mary is so called in some old Roman rituals, from the ejaculation at the beginning of the seven anthems preceding the Magnificat, as: "O when will the day arrive . . . ?" "O when shall I see . . . ?" "O when . . . ?" and so on.

Oak. The Romans gave a crown of oak leaves to him who saved the life of a citizen.

To a cruel war I sent him; from whence he returned, his brows bound with oak.—Shakespeare: Coriolanus, act i. sc. 3 (1609).

Oak (Byron). On his first arrival at Newstead Abbey, in 1798, Byron planted an oak in the garden, and cherished the fancy that as the tree flourished so would he. When he revisited the spot some years later he found the young tree choked with weeds and nearly destroyed. The sight called forth the poem To an Oak at Newstead (1807). When colonel Wildman took possession, it narrowly escaped being cut down; but ultimately it grew into a fine tree, and became known as the Byron Oak.

Oakly (Major), brother to Mr. Oakly, and uncle to Charles. He assists his brother in curing his "jealous wife."

Mr. Oakly, husband of the "jealous wife." A very amiable man, but deficient in that strength of mind which is needed to cure the idiosyncrasy of his wife; so he obtains the assistance of his brother, the major.

Mrs. Oakly, "the jealous wife" of Mr. Oakly. A woman of such suspicious temper, that every remark of her husband is distorted into a proof of his infidelity. She watches him like a tiger, and makes both her own and her husband's life utterly wretched.

Charles Oakly, nephew of the major. A fine, noble-spirited young fellow, who would never stand by and see a woman insulted; but a desperate debauchee and drunkard. He aspires to the love of Harriot Russet, whose influence over him is sufficiently powerful to reclaim him.—Colman: The Jealous Wife (1761).

Oates (Dr. Titus), the champion of the popish plot.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Forth came the notorious Dr. Oates, rustling in the full silken canonicals of priesthood, for . . . he affected no small dignity of exterior decoration and deportment. . . . His exterior was portentous. A fleece of white periwig showed a most uncouth visage, of great length, having the mouth . . . placed in the very centre of the countenance, and exhibiting to the astonished spectator as much chin below as there was nose and brow above it. His pronunciation was after a conceited fashion of his own, in which he accented the vowels in a manner altogether peculiar to himself. —Ch. xli.

Oaths (Strange). (See ISABELLA, p. 530.)

Oaths used by Men of Note:—

(1) ANGUS (earl of), when incensed, used to say, By the might of God! but at other times his oath was, By St. Bride of Douglas!—Godscroft, 275.
(2) BAYARD (The Chevalier), By God's Holy-day!
(3) CHARLES II. of England, Ods fish! a corruption of "God's flesh."
(4) CHARLES VIII. of France, By God's light!
(5) EDWARD THE CONFESSOR, By God and His Mother!
(6) ELIZABETH, By God! God's death! God's wounds! softened afterwards into Zounds! and Zouterkins!
(7) FRANCOIS I., On the word of a gentleman!

(24) SIMON DE MONTFORT, the great patriot in the reign of Henry III., By the arm of St. James!
(25) WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR, By the splendour of God!
(26) WILLIAM RUFUS, Par sanke vouli de Lucques! ("By the holy face of Lucca!" or "By Lucca's holy face!"). Lucca was a great crucifix in Lucca Cathedral.—Albert Butler: Lives of the Saints April 27), p. 494, col. 1. (See LUCCA, p. 695.)
(27) WINFRID (St.) or Boniface, By St. Peter's tomb!

¶ In the reign of Charles II., fancy oaths were in fashion. (For specimens, see FOPPINGTON, p. 381.)

¶ The most common oaths of the ancient Romans were By Hercules! (Mehercule!); Roman women, By Castor! and both men and women, By Pollux!

Viri per Herculem, mulieres per Castorem, utrique per Pollucem, jurare solíti.—Aulus Gellius: Noctes Atticæ, ii. 6.

N.B.—In the early part of the nineteenth century, oaths were exceedingly common, both among men and women; they were rarely heard in good society towards the close of the century.

Obad'don, the angel of death. This is not the same angel as Abbad'ona, one of the fallen angels and once the friend of Ab'diel (bk. vi.).

My name is Ephod Obadden or Sevenfold Revenge. I am an angel of destruction. It was I who destroyed the first-born of Egypt. It was I who slew the army of Sennacherib.—Klopstock: The Messiah, xiii. (1772).

Obadi'ah, a household servant, in Sterne's novel of Tristram Shandy (1759).

There is an Obadiah in Fielding's Tom Jones.

Obadiah, clerk to justice Day. A nincompoop, fond of drinking, but with just a shade more brains than Abel Day, who is "a thorough ass" (act i. sc. 1).—Knight: The Honest Thieves (died 1820).

 This farce is a mere réchauffé of The Committee (1670), a comedy by the Hon. sir R. Howard, the names and much of the conversation being identical. Colonel Blunt is called in the farce "captain Manly."

Every play-goer must have seen Munden (1758-1832) in "Obadiah," in The Committee or Honest Thieves; if not, they are to be pitied.—Mrs. C. Mathews: Tea-Table Talk.

Munden was one night playing "Obadiah," and Jack Johnstone, as "Teague," was plying him with liquor from a black bottle. The grimaces of Munden were so irresistibly comical, that not only did the house shriek with laughter, but Johnstone himself was too convulsed to proceed. When "Obadiah" was borne off, he shouted, "Where's the villain that filled that bottle? Lamp oil! lamp oil! every drop of it!" The fact is, the property-man had given the bottle of lamp oil instead of the bottle filled with sherry and water. Johnstone asked Munden why he had not given him a hint of the mistake, and Munden replied, "There was such a glorious roar at the faces I made, that I had not the heart to spoil it."—Theatrical Anecdotes.

Obadiah Prim, a canting, knavish hypocrite; one of the four guardians of Anne Lovely the heiress. Colonel Feignwell personates Simon Pure, and obtains the quaker's consent to his marriage with Anne Lovely.—Mrs. Centlivre: A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717).

Obermann, the impersonation of high moral worth without talent, and the tortures endured by the consciousness of this defect.—Etienne Pivert de Senancour: Obermann (1804).

Oberon, king of the fairies. He quarrelled with his wife Titania about a "changeling" which Oberon wanted for a page, but Titania refused to give up. Oberon, in revenge, anointed her eyes in sleep with the extract of "Love in Idleness," the effect of which was to make the sleeper in love with the first object beheld on waking. Titania happened to see a country bumpkin whom Puck had dressed up with an ass's head. Oberon came upon her while she was fondling the clown, sprinkled on her an antidote, and she was so ashamed of her folly that she readily consented to give up the boy to her spouse for his page.—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

Oberon the Fay, king of Mommur, a humpty dwarf, three feet high, of angelic face. He told sir Huon that the Lady of the Hidden Isle (Cephalonia) married Neptanebus king of Egypt, by whom she had a son named Alexander "the Great." Seven hundred years later she had another son, Oberon, by Julius Cæsar, who stopped in Cephalonia on his way to Thessaly. At the birth of Oberon, the fairies bestowed their gifts on him. One was insight into men's thoughts, and another was the power of transporting himself instantaneously to any place. At death, he made Huon his successor, and was borne to paradise.—Huon de Bordeaux (a romance).

Oberthal (Count), lord of Dordrecht, near the Meuse. When Bertha, one of his vassals, asked permission to marry John of Leyden, the count withheld his consent, as he designed to make Bertha his mistress. This drove John into rebellion, and he joined the anabaptists. The count was taken prisoner by Gio'na, a discarded servant, but was liberated by John. When John was crowned prophet-king, the count entered the banquet-hall to arrest him, and perished with him in the flames of the burning palace.—Meyerbeer: Le Prophète (opera, 1849).

Obi. Among the negroes of the West Indies, "Obi" is the name of a magical power, supposed to affect men with all the curses of an "evil eye."

Obi-Woman (An), an African sorceress, a worshipper of Mumbo Jumbo.

Obi'dah, a young man who meets with various adventures and misfortunes allegorical of human life.—Dr. Johnson: The Rambler (1750–52).

Obid'icut, the fiend of lust, and one of the five which possessed "poor Tom."—Shakespeare: King Lear, act iv. sc. 1 (1605).

O'Brallaghan (Sir Callaghan), "a wild Irish soldier in the Prussian army. His military humour makes one fancy he was not only born in a siege, but that Bellona had been his nurse, Mars his schoolmaster, and the Furies his playfellows" (act i. 1). He is the successful suitor of Charlotte Goodchild.—Macklin: Love à-la-Mode (1759).

O'Brien, the Irish lieutenant under captain Savage.—Marryat: Peter Simple (1833).

Observant Friars, those friars who observe the rule of St. Francis—to abjure books, land, house, and chapel; to live on alms, dress in rags, feed on scraps, and sleep anywhere.

Obsid'ian Stone, the lapis Obsidia'nus of Pliny (Nat. Hist., xxxvi. 67 and xxxvii. 76). A black diaphanous stone, discovered by Obsidius in Ethiopia.

For with Obsidian stone 'twas chiefly lined.
Davenant: Gondibert, ii. 6 (died 1668).

Obstinate, an inhabitant of the City of Destruction, who advised Christian to return to his family, and not run on a wild-goose chase.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, i. (1678).

Obstinate as a Breton, a French proverbial phrase.

Occasion, the mother of Furor; an ugly, wrinkled old hag, lame of one foot, Her head was bald behind, but in front she had a few hoary locks. Sir Guyon seized her, gagged her, and bound her.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 4 (1590).

Oce'ana, an ideal republic, on the plan of Plato's Atlantis. It represents the author's notion of a model commonwealth.—Harrington: Oceana (1656).

Ochiltree (Old Edie), a king's bedesman or blue-gown. Edie is a garrulous, kind-hearted, wandering beggar, who assures Mr. Lovel that the supposed ruins of a Roman camp are no such thing. The old bedesman delighted "to daunder down the burnsides and green shaws." He is a well-drawn character.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Ocnus (The Rope of), profitless labour. Ocnus is represented as twisting with unwearied diligence a rope, which an ass eats as fast as it is made. The allegory signifies that Ocnus worked hard to earn money, which his wife spent by her extravagance.

O'Connell's Tail, the nickname given to the party of the Irish agitator Daniel O'Connell (1775-1847), after the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832.

Octa, a mountain from which the Latin poets say the sun rises.

Octave (2 syl.), the son of Argante (2 syl.). During the absence of his father, Octave fell in love with Hyacinthe daughter of Géronte, and married her, supposing her to be the daughter of signior Pandolphe of Tarentum. His father wanted him to marry the daughter of his friend Géronte, but Octave would not listen to it. It turned out, however, that the daughter of Pandolphe and the daughter of Géronte were one and the same person, for Géronte had assumed the name of Pandolphe while he lived in Tarentum, and his wife and daughter stayed behind after the father went to live at Naples.—Molière: Les Fourberies de Scapin (1671).

(In the English version, called The Cheats of Scapin, by Thomas Otway, Octave is called "Octavian," Argante is called "Thrifty," Hyacinthe is called "Clara," and Géronte is "Gripe.")

Octavia, wife of Mark Antony, Cæsar's sister.—Dryden: All for Love (1678).

Octavian, the lover of Floranthé. He goes mad because he fancies that Floranthé loves another; but Roque, a blunt, kind-hearted old man, assures him that doña Floranthé is true to him, and induces him to return home.—Colman: The Mountaineers (1793).

Octavian, the English form of "Octave" (2 syl.), in Otway's Cheats of Scapin. (See OCTAVE.)

Octa'vio, the supposed husband of Jacintha. This Jacintha was at one time contracted to don Henrique, but Violante (4 syl.) passed for don Henrique's wife.—Fletcher: The Spanish Curate (1622).

Octavio, the betrothed of donna Clara.—Jephson: Two Strings to your Bow (1792).

Octer, a sea-captain in the reign of king Alfred, who traversed the Norwegian mountains, and sailed to the Dwina in the north of Russia.

> The Saxon swaying all, in Alfred's powerful reign,
> Our English Octer put a fleet to sea again.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xix. (1622).

O'Cutter (Captain), a ridiculous Irish captain, befriended by lady Freelove and lord Trinket. He speaks with a great brogue, and interlards his speech with sea terms.—Colman: The Jealous Wife (1761).

Oc'ypus, son of Podalirius and Astasia, noted for his strength, agility, and beauty. Ocypus used to jeer at the gout, and the goddess of that disease caused him to suffer from it for ever.—Lucian.

Oda, the dormitory of the sultan's seraglio.

> It was a spacious chamber (Oda is > The Turkish title), and ranged round the wall
> Were couches.
> Byron: Don Juan, vi. 51 (1824).

Odalisque, in Turkey, one of the female slaves in the sultan's harem (odalik, Arabic, "a chamber companion," oda, "a chamber").

> He went forth with the lovely odalisques.
> Byron: Don Juan, vi. 29 (1824).

Odd Numbers. Among the Chinese, heaven is odd, earth is even; heaven is round, earth is square. The numbers 1, 3, 5, 7, 9, belong to yang ("heaven"); but 2, 4, 6, 8, 10, belong to yin ("earth").—Rev. Mr. Edkins.

Ode (Prince of the), Pierre de Ronsard (1524-1585).

Odoar, the venerable abbot of St. Felix, who sheltered king Roderick after his dethronement.—Southey: Roderick, Last of the Goths, iv. (1814).

 Southey sometimes makes the word Odoar' [O'.dor], and sometimes O'doar (3 syl.), e.g.—

> Odoar', the venerable abbot, sat (2 syl.). . . .
> Odoar' and Urban eyed him while he spake. . . .
> The lady Adosinda, O'doar cried (3 syl.). . . .
> Tell him in O'doar's name the hour is come!

O'Doh'erty (Sir Morgan), a pseudonym of W. Maginn, LL.D., in Blackwood's Magazine (1819-1842).

O'Donohue's White Horses. The boatmen of Killarney so call those waves which, on a windy day, come crested with foam. The spirit of O'Donohue is supposed to glide over the lake of Killarney every May-day on his favourite white horse, to the sound of unearthly music.

Odori'co, a Biscayan, to whom Zerbi'no commits Isabella. He proves a traitor, and tries to defile her, but is interrupted in his base endeavour. Almonio defies him to single combat, and he is delivered bound to Zerbino, who condemns him, in punishment, to attend on Gabrina for twelve months, as her 'squire. He accepts the charge, but hangs Gabrina on an elm, and is himself hung by Almonio to the same tree.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Odour of Sanctity. To die "in the odour of sanctity" did not mean simply in "good repute." It was a prevalent notion that the dead body of a saint positively emitted a sweet-smelling savour, and the dead body of the unbaptized an offensive smell. When good persons die, catholic priests attend, and use incense freely, which naturally adds a sweet savour to the body.

Then he smote off his head; and therewithall came a stench out of the body when the soul departed, so that there might nobody abide the savour. So was the corpse had away and buried in a wood, because he was a panim. . . . Then the haughty prince said unto sir Palimedes, "Here have ye seen this day a great miracle by sir Corsabrin, what savour there was when the soul departed from the body, therefore we require you for to take the holy baptism upon you (that when you die, you may die in the odour of sanctity, and not, like sir Corsabrin, in the disedour of the unbaptized)."—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ii. 133 (1470).

When sir Bors and his fellows came to sir Launcelot's bed, they found him stark dead, . . . and the sweetest savour about him that ever they smelled. (This was the odour of sanctity.)—History of Prince Arthur, iii. 175.

∴ In Shakespeare's Pericles Prince of Tyre, Antiochus and his daughter, whose wickedness abounded, were killed by lightning, and the poet says—

A fire from heaven came, and shrivell'd up
Their bodies, e'en to loathing; for they so stunk
That all those eyes ador'd them ere their fall
Scorn now their hand should give them burial.
Act ii. sc. 4.

Odours for Food. Plutarch, Pliny, and divers other ancients tell us of a nation in India that lived only upon pleasing odours. Democ'ritos lived for several days together on the mere effluvia of hot bread.—Dr. Wilkins (1614-1672).

O'Dowd, the hero of a play adapted by Boucicault, in 1880, from the French Les crochets du Père Martin, by Corman and Grangé (1850), from which John Oxenford also drew his Porter's Knot. The O'Dowd is an old Irishman who having by hard work scraped together a fortune, the whole of which he destined for his only son, finds that by educating that son above his station he has ruined him. To screen the youth from dishonour and infamy, he yields up all his savings, and begins again with a fish-barrow to earn his daily bread.

∴ In Oxenford's version the man begins again as a porter.

In Thackeray's Vanity Fair there is an Irishwoman called Mrs. O'Dowd.

O'Dowd (Cornelius), the pseudonym of Charles James Lever, in Blackwood's Magazine (1809-1872).

Odyssey. Homer's epic, recording the adventures of Odysseus (Ulysses) in his voyage home from Troy.

Book I. The poem opens in the island of Calypso, with a complaint against Neptune and Calypso for preventing the return of Odysseus (3 syl.) to Ithaca.

II. Telemachos, the son of Odysseus, starts in search of his father, accompanied by Pallas in the guise of Mentor.

III. He goes to Pylos, to consult old Nestor, and

IV. Is sent by him to Sparta, where he is told by Menelāos that Odysseus is detained in the island of Calypso.

V. In the mean time, Odysseus leaves the island, and, being shipwrecked, is cast on the shore of Phæācia,

VI. Where Nausicāa, the king's daughter, finds him asleep, and

VII. Takes him to the court of her father Alcinöos, who

VIII. Entertains him hospitably.

IX. At a banquet, Odysseus relates his adventures since he started from Troy. Tells about the Lotus-eaters and the Cyclops, with his adventures in the cave of Polyphēmos. He tells how

X. The wind-god gave him the winds in a bag. In the island of Circê, he says, his crew were changed to swine, but Mercury gave him a herb called mōly, which disenchanted them.

XI. He tells the king how he descended into hadês;

XII. Gives an account of the syrens; of Scylla and Charybdis; and of his being cast on the island of Calypso.

XIII. Alcinoös gives Odysseus a ship which conveys him to Ithăca, where he assumes the disguise of a beggar, XIV. And is lodged in the house of Eumœos, a faithful old domestic.

XV. Telemachos, having returned to Ithaca, is lodged in the same house,

XVI. And becomes known to his father.

XVII. Odysseus goes to his palace, is recognized by his dog Argos; but XVIII. The beggar Iros insults him, and Odysseus breaks his jaw-bone.

XIX. While bathing, the returned monarch is recognized by a scar on his leg;

XX. And when he enters his palace, becomes an eye-witness to the disorders of the court, and to the way in which

XXI. Penelopê is pestered by suitors. To excuse herself, Penelopê tells her suitors he only shall be her husband who can bend Odysseus's bow. None can do so but the stranger, who bends it with ease. Concealment is no longer possible or desirable;

XXII. He falls on the suitors hip and thigh;

XXIII. Is recognized by his wife;

XXIV. Visits his old father Laertês; and the poem ends.

(For English translations in verse, see under HOMER.)

The German Odyssey. The Kudrun, in three parts, called The Hagen, The Hilde (2 syl.), and The Hedel.

Œa'grian Harpist (The), Orpheus son of Œa'gros and Cal'liôpê.

> . . . can no lesse,
> Tame the fierce walkers of the wildernesse,
> Than that Œagrian harpist, for whose lay
> Tigers with hunger pined and left their prey.
> Brown: Britannia's Pastorals, v. (1613).

Œ'dipos (in Latin Œdipus), son of Laïus and Jocasta. The most mournful tale of classic story.

(This tale has furnished the subject-matter of several tragedies. In Greek we have Œdipus Tyrannus and Œdipus at Colônus, by Soph'oclês. In French, Œdipe, by Corneille (1659); Œdipe, by Voltaire (1718); Œdipe chez Admète, by J. F. Ducis (1778); Œdipe Roi and Œdipe à Colone, by Chénier; etc. In English, Œdipus, by Dryden and Lee.)

Œno'ne (3 syl.), a nymph of mount Ida, who had the gift of prophecy, and told her husband, Paris, that his voyage to Greece would involve him and his country (Troy) in ruin. When the dead body of old Priam's son was laid at her feet, she stabbed herself.

> Hither came at noon
> Mournful Œnônê, wandering forlorn
> Of Paris, once her playmate on the hills [Ida].
> Tennyson: Œnone (1892).

(Kalkbrenner, in 1804, made this the subject of an opera.)

N.B.—Ovid, in his Heroïdes (4 syl.), has an hypothetical letter, in verse, supposed to be written by Œnone to Paris, dissuading him from going to Troy, and upbraiding him for his love of Helen the wife of Menelâos.

Œno'pian, father of Mer'opê, to whom the giant Orion made advances. Œnopian, unwilling to give his daughter to him, put out the giant's eyes in a drunken fit.

> Orion . . .
> Reeled as of yore beside the sea,
> When blinded by Œnopion.
> Longfellow: The Occultation of Orion

Œte'an Knight (The). Her'culês is so called, because he burnt himself to death on mount Œta or Œtæa, in Thessaly.

> So also did that great Œtean knight
> For his love's sake his lion's skin undight.
> Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 8 (1596).

Offa, king of Mercia, was the son of Thingferth, and the eleventh in descent from Woden. Thus: Woden, (1) his son Wihtlæg, (2) his son Wærmund, (3) Offa I., (4) Angeltheow, (5) Eomær, (6) Icel, (7) Pybba, (8) Osmod, (9) Enwulf, (10) Thingferth, (11) Offa, whose son was Egfert who died within a year of his father. His daughter, Eadburga, married Beïtric king of the West Saxons; and after the death of her husband, she went to the court of king Charlemagne. Offa reigned thirty-nine years (755–794).

Offa's Dyke, a dyke from Beachley to Flintshire, repaired by Offa king of Mercia, and used as a rough boundary of his territory. Asser, however, says—

> There was in Mercia (A.D. 855) a certain valiant king who was feared by all the kings and neighbouring states around. His name was Offa. He it was who had the great rampart made from sea to sea between Britain and Mercia.—Life of Alfred (ninth century).

> Offa, . . . to keep the Britons back,
> Cast up that mighty mound of eighty miles in length,
> Athwart from sea to sea.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, ix. (1612).

O'Flaherty (Dennis), called "major O'Flaherty." A soldier, says he, is "no livery for a knave," and Ireland is "not the country of dishonour." The major pays court to old lady Rusport, but when he detects her dishonest purposes in bribing her lawyer to make away with sir Oliver's will, and cheating Charles Dudley of his fortune, he not only abandons his suit, but exposes her dishonesty.—Cumberland: The West Indian (1771).

Og, king of Basan. Thus saith the rabbis—

> The height of his stature was 33,033 cubits [nearly six miles]. He used to drink water from the clouds, and toast fish by holding them before the orb of the sun. He asked Noah to take him into the ark, but Noah would not. When the flood was at its deepest, it did not reach to the knees of this giant. Og lived 3000 years, and then he was slain by the hand of Moses.

Moses was himself ten cubits in stature [fifteen feet], and he took a spear ten cubits long, and threw it ten cubits high, and yet it only reached the heel of Og. . . . When dead, his body reached as far as the river Nile, in Egypt.

Og's mother was Enac, a daughter of Adam. Her fingers were two cubits long [one yard], and on each finger she had two sharp nails. She was devoured by wild beasts.—Maracci.

In the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, Thomas Shadwell, who was a very large man, is called "Og."

> Og from a treason tavern rolling home
> Round as the globe. . . .
> With all this bulk there's nothing lost in Og,
> For every inch, that is not fool, is rogue.
> Pt. ii. 458, etc

Ogdoistes (4 syl.) or Ogdoists, the eight heretical writers which St. Jerome so vigorously assailed (345-420); viz. (1) the Montanists, (2) Helvetius, (3) Jovinian, (4) Rufinus, (5) the Origenists, (6) the Luciferians, (7) Vigilantius, and (8) Pelagius.

Ogier the Dane, one of the paladins of the Charlemagne epoch. When 100 years old, Morgue the fay took him to the island of Av'alon, "hard by the terrestrial paradise;" gave him a ring which restored him to ripe manhood, a crown which made him forget his past life, and introduced him to king Arthur. Two hundred years afterwards, she sent him to defend France from the paynims, who had invaded it; and, having routed the invaders, he returned to Avalon again.—Ogier le Danois (a romance).

In a pack of French cards, Ogier the Dane is knave of spades. His exploits are related in the Chansons de Geste; he is introduced by Ariosto in Orlando Furioso, and by Morris in his Earthly Paradise ("August").

Ogier's Swords, Curtāna ("the cutter") and Sauvagine.

Ogier's Horse, Papillon.

Ogle (Miss), friend of Mrs. Racket. She is very jealous of young girls, and even of Mrs. Racket, because she was some six years her junior.—Mrs. Cowley: The Belle's Stratagem (1780).

O'gleby (Lord), an old fop, vain to excess, but good-natured withal, and quite the slave of maidens young and fair. At the age of 70, his lordship fancied himself an Adonis, notwithstanding his qualms and his rheumatism. He required a great deal of "brushing, oiling, screwing, and winding up before he appeared in public," but, when fully made up, was game for the part of "lover, rake, or fine gentleman." Lord Ogleby made his bow to Fanny Sterling, and promised to make her a countess; but the young lady had been privately married to Lovewell for four months.—Colman and Garrick: The Clandestine Marriage (1766).

No one could deliver such a dialogue as is found in "lord Ogleby" and in "sir Peter Teazle" [School for Scandal, Sheridan] with such point as Thomas King [1730-1805].—Life of Sheridan.

O'gri, giants who fed on human flesh.

O'Groat (John), with his two brothers, Malcolm and Gavin, settled in Caithness in the reign of James IV. The families lived together in harmony for a time, and met once a year at John's house. On one occasion a dispute arose about precedency—who was to take the head of the table, and who was to go out first. The old man said he would settle the question at the next annual muster; accordingly he made as many doors to his house as there were families, and placed his guests at a round table.

(The legend is sometimes told somewhat differently. See JOHN O'GROAT, p. 552.)

O'Hara Family (Tales of the), by John and Michael Branim (1825-26). They are tales of rebellion, violent passion, turbulence, and crime.

Oig M'Combich (Robin) or M'Gregor, a Highland drover, who quarrels with Harry Wakefield an English drover, about a pasture-field, and stabs him. Being tried at Carlisle for murder, Robin is condemned to death.—Sir W. Scott: The Two Drovers (time, George III.).

Oil on Troubled Waters. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 911.)

Oina-Morul, daughter of Mal-Orchol king of Fuirfed (a Scandinavian island). Ton-Thormod asked her in marriage, and, being refused by the father, made war upon him. Fingal sent his son Ossian to the aid of Mal-Orchol, and he took Ton-Thormod prisoner. The king now offered Ossian his daughter to wife, but the warrior-bard discovered that the lady had given her heart to Ton-Thormod; whereupon he resigned his claim, and brought about a happy reconciliation.—Ossian: Oina-Morul.

Oith'ona, daughter of Nuäth, betrothed to Gaul son of Morni, and the day of their marriage was fixed; but before the time arrived, Fingal sent for Gaul to aid him in an expedition against the Britons. Gaul promised Oithona, if he survived, to return by a certain day. Lathmon, the brother of Oithona, was called away from home at the same time, to attend his father on an expedition; so the damsel was left alone in Dunlathmon. It was now that Dunrommath lord of Uthal (one of the Orkneys) came and carried her off by force to Trom'athon, a desert island, where he concealed her in a cave. Gaul returned on the day appointed, heard of the rape, sailed for Trom'athon, and found the lady, who told him her tale of woe; but scarcely had she ended when Dunrommath entered the cave with his followers. Gaul instantly fell on him, and slew him. While the battle was raging, Oithona, arrayed as a warrior, rushed into the thickest of the fight, and was slain. When Gaul had cut off the head of Dunrommath, he saw what he thought a youth dying of a wound, and, taking off the helmet, perceived it was Oithona. She died, and Gaul returned disconsolate to Dunlathmon.—Ossian: Oithona.

O. K., all correct.

"You are quite safe now, and we shall be off in a minute," says Harry. "The door is locked, and the guard O. K."—Buxton: Jennie of the Prince's, iii. 302.

Okba, one of the sorcerers in the caves of Dom-Daniel "under the roots of the ocean." It was decreed by fate that one of the race of Hodei'rah (3 syl.) would be fatal to the sorcerers; so Okba was sent forth to kill the whole race both root and branch. He succeeded in cutting off eight of them, but Thal'aba contrived to escape. Abdaldar was sent to hunt down the survivor, but was himself killed by a simoom.

"Curse on thee, Okba!" Khawla cried. . . .
"Okba, wert thou weak of heart?
Okba, wert thou blind of eye?
Thy fate and ours were on the lot. . . .
And thou hast let slip the reins of Destiny.
Curse thee, curse thee, Okba!"
Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, ii. 7 (1797).

O'Kean (Lieutenant), a quondam admirer of Mrs. Margaret Bertram of Singleside.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Olave, brother of Norna, and grandfather of Minna and Brenda Troil.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Old Age restored to Youth. The following means are efficacious:—

The fontaine de jouvence, "cil fit rajovenir la gent;" the water of life (q.v.); the fountain of Bi'mini; the river of juvescence at the foot of Olympus; the dancing water, presented by prince Chery to Fairstar; the water of the river Sybaris (q.v.); the broth of Medea. (See MEDEA'S KETTLE, p. 691.)

(For instances, see YOUTH RESTORED.)

Old Armchair (The), a poem by Eliza Cook (1840).

Old Bags. John Scott, lord Eldon; so called because he carried home with him in sundry bags the cases pending his judgment (1751-1838).

Old Bona Fide (2 syl.), Louis XIV. (1638, 1643-1715).

Old Court Suburb (The), an historical account of Kensington and its celebrities by Leigh Hunt (1855).

Old Curiosity Shop (The), a tale by C. Dickens (1840). An old man, having run through his fortune, opened a curiosity shop in order to earn a living, and brought up a granddaughter named Nell [Trent], 14 years of age. The child was the darling of the old man; but, deluding himself with the hope of making a fortune by gambling, he lost everything, and went forth, with the child, a beggar. Their wanderings and adventures are recounted till they reach a quiet country village, where the old clergyman gives them a cottage to live in. Here Nell soon dies, and the grandfather is found dead upon her grave. The main character next to Nell is that of a lad named Kit [Nubbles], employed in the curiosity shop, who adored Nell as "an angel." This boy gets into the service of Mr. Garland, a genial, benevolent, well-to-do man, in the suburbs of London; but Quilp hates the lad, and induces Brass, a solicitor of Bevis Marks, to put a £5 bank-note in the boy's hat, and then accuse him of theft. Kit is tried, and condemned to transportation, but the villainy being exposed by a girl-of-all-work nicknamed "The Marchioness," Kit is liberated and restored to his place; and Quilp is drowned.

Old Cutty Soames (1 syl.), the fairy of the mine.

Old Ebony, a punning synonym of Black-wood, editor of Blackwood's Magazine (1777-1834).

Old English Baron (The), a tale by Clara Reeve (1777).

Old Fox (The), marshal Soult; so called from his strategic abilities and never-failing resources (1769-1851).

Old Gib. [Jib], Gibraltar Rock.

Old Glory, sir Francis Burdett; so called by the radicals, because at one time he was their leader. In his latter years sir Francis joined the tories (1770-1844).

Old Grog, admiral Edward Vernon; so called from his wearing a grogram coat in foul weather (1684-1757).

Old Harry, the devil. The Hebrew seirim ("hairy ones") is translated "devils" in Lev. xvii. 7, probably meaning "he-goats."

Old Hickory. General Andrew Johnson was so called in 1813. He was first called "Tough," then "Tough as Hickory," then "Hickory," and lastly "Old Hickory."

Old Humphrey, the pseudonym of George Mogridge of London (died 1854).

Old Lady of Threadneedle Street, a cant-name for the Bank of England.

Old Maid (The), a farce by Murphy (1761). Miss Harlow is the "old maid," aged 45, living with her brother and his bride a beautiful young woman of 23. A young man of fortune, having seen them at Ranelagh, falls in love with the younger lady; and, inquiring their names, is told they are "Mrs. and Miss Harlow." He takes it for granted that the elder lady is the mother, and the younger the daughter; so asks permission to pay his addresses to "Miss Harlow." The request is granted, but it turns out that the young man meant Mrs. Harlow, and the worst of the matter is, that the elder spinster was engaged to be married to captain Cape, but turned him off for the younger man. When the mistake was discovered, the old maid was left, like the last rose of summer, to "pine on the stem," for neither felt inclined to pluck and wear the flower.

Old Maid (An), the signature adopted by Miss Phillipps (1841).

Old Maids, a comedy by S. Knowles (1841). The "old maids" are lady Blanche and lady Anne, two young ladies who resolve to die old maids. Their resolutions, however, are but ropes of sand, for lady Blanche falls in love with colonel Blount, and lady Anne with sir Philip Brilliant.

Old Man (An), sir Francis Bond Head, bart., published his Bubbles from the Brunnen of Nassau under this signature (1793-1875).

Old Man Eloquent (The), Isocratês the orator. The defeat of the Athenians at Cheronæ'a had such an effect on his spirits, that he languished and died within four days, in the 99th year of his age.

> . . . that dishonest victory
> At Cheronæa, fatal to liberty,
> Killed with report that Old Man Eloquent.
> Milton: Sonnet, ix.

Old Man of Hoy (The), a tall pillar of old red conglomerate in the island of Hoy. The softer parts have been washed away by the action of the waves.

Old Man of the Mountain, Hassan-ben Sabah, sheik al Jebal; also called subah of Nishapour, the founder of the band (1090). Two letters are inserted in Rymer's Fœdera by Dr. Adam Clarke, the editor, said to be written by this sheik.

∴ Aloaddin, "prince of the Assassins" (thirteenth century).

Old Man of the Sea (The), a monster which contrived to get on the back of Sinbad the sailor, and refused to dismount. Sinbad at length made him drunk, and then shook him off.—Arabian Nights ("Sinbad the Sailor," fifth voyage).

Old Man of the Sea (The), Phorcus. He had three daughters, with only one eye and one tooth between 'em.—Greek Mythology.

Old Manor-House (The), a novel by Charlotte Smith. Mrs. Rayland is the lady of the manor; but Orlando and Monimia are the hero and heroine (1793).

Old Moll, the beautiful daughter of John Overie or Audery (contracted into Overs) a miserly ferryman. "Old Moll" is a standing toast with the parish officers of St. Mary Overs.

Old Mortality, one of the best of Scott's novels (1816). Morton is the best of his young heroes, and serves as an excellent foil to the fanatical and gloomy Burley. The two classes of actors, viz. the brave and dissolute cavaliers, and the resolute oppressed covenanters, are drawn in bold relief. The most striking incidents are the terrible encounter with Burley in his rocky fastness; the dejection and anxiety of Morton on his return from Holland; and the rural comfort of Cuddie Headrigg's cottage on the banks of the Clyde, with its thin blue smoke among the trees, "showing that the evening meal was being made ready."

Old Mortality always appeared to me the "Marmion" of Scott's novels.—Chambers: English Literature, ii. 587.

Old Mortality, an itinerant antiquary, whose craze is to clean the moss from gravestones, and keep their letters and effigies in good condition.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

∴ The prototype of "Old Mortality" was Robert Patterson.

Old Noll, Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658).

Old Noll's Fiddler, sir Roger Lestrange, who played the bass-viol at the musical parties held at John Hingston's house, where Oliver Cromwell was a constant guest.

Old Rowley, Charles II.; so called from his favourite race-horse (1630, 1660–1685).

N.B.—A portion of Newmarket racecourse is still called "Rowley mile."

Old Stone, Henry Stone, statuary and painter (died 1653).

Old Tom, cordial gin. So called from Tom Chamberlain (one of the firm of Messrs. Hodges' gin distillery), who first concocted it.

Oldboy (Colonel), a manly retired officer, fond of his glass, and not averse to a little spice of the Lothario spirit.

Lady Mary Oldboy, daughter of lord Jessamy and wife of the colonel. A sickly nonentity, "ever complaining, ever having something the matter with her head, back, or legs." Afraid of the slightest breath of wind, jarred by a loud voice, and incapable of the least exertion.

Diana Oldboy, daughter of the colonel. She marries Harman.

Jessamy Oldboy, son of the colonel and lady Mary. An insufferable prig.—Bickerstaff: Lionel and Clarissa (1768).

Oldbuck (Jonathan), the antiquary, devoted to the study and accumulation of old coins and medals, etc. He is sarcastic, irritable, and a woman-hater; but kind-hearted, faithful to his friends, and a humorist.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

An excellent temper, with a slight degree of subacid humour; learning, wit, and drollery, the more poignant that they were a little marked by the peculiarities of an old bachelor; a soundness of thought, rendered more forcible by an occasional quaintness of expression,—these were the qualities in which the creature of my imagination resembled my benevolent and excellent old friend.—Sir W. Scott.

The merit of The Antiquary as a novel rests on the inimitable delineation of Oldbuck, that model of black-letter and Roman-camp antiquaries, whose oddities and conversation are rich and racy as any of the old crusted port that John of the Girnel might have held in his monastic cellars.—Chambers: English Literature, ii. 586.

Oldcastle (Sir John), a drama by Anthony Munday (1600). This play appeared with the name of Shakespeare on the title-page.

Oldcastle (Humphrey), the assumed name of Henry St. John, viscount Bolingbroke (1678–1751).

Oldham (Sir John), in the Nabob by Foote (1772). A local squire, whose ancestors had for ages controlled their family borough, opposed by sir Matthew Mite, who had risen from the ranks.

Lady Oldham, his wife.

Oldstyle (Jonathan), a name assumed by Washington Irving (1785–1859).

Oldworth, of Oldworth Oaks, a wealthy squire, liberally educated, very hospitable, benevolent, humorous, and whimsical. He brings up Maria "the maid of the Oaks" as his ward, but she is his daughter and an heiress.—Burgoyne: The Maid of the Oaks (1779).

Olifant, the horn of Roland or Orlando. This horn and the sword "Durinda'na" were buried with the hero. Turpin tells us in his Chronicle that Charlemagne heard the blare of this horn at the distance of eight miles.

Olifant (Basil), a kinsman of lady Margaret Bellenden, of the Tower of Tillietudlem.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Olifaunt (Lord Nigel), of Glenvarloch. On going to court to present a petition to king James I., he aroused the dislike of the duke of Buckingham. Lord Dalgarno gave him the cut direct, and Nigel struck him, but was obliged to seek refuge in Alsatia. After various adventures, he married Margaret Ramsay, the watchmaker's daughter, and obtained the title-deeds of his estates.—Sir W. Scott: The Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Olimpia, the wife of Bireno, uncompromising in love, and relentless in hate.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Olim'pia, a proud Roman lady of high rank. When Rome was sacked by Bourbon, she flew for refuge to the high altar of St. Peter's, where she clung to a golden cross. On the advance of certain soldiers in the army of Bourbon to seize her, she cast the huge cross from its stand, and as it fell it crushed to death the foremost soldier. Others then attempted to seize her, when Arnold dispersed them and rescued the lady; but the proud beauty would not allow the foe of her country to touch her, and flung herself from the high altar on to the pavement. Apparently lifeless, she was borne off; but whether she recovered or not we are not informed, as the drama was never finished.—Byron: The Deformed Transformed (1821).

Olindo, the lover of Sophronia. Aladine king of Jerusalem, at the advice of his magicians, stole an image of the Virgin, and set it up as a palladium in the chief mosque. During the night it was carried off, and the king, unable to discover the thief, ordered all his Christian subjects to be put to death. To prevent this massacre, Sophronia delivered up herself as the perpetrator of the deed, and Olindo, hearing thereof, went to the king and declared Sophronia innocent, as he himself had stolen the image. The king commanded both to be put to death, but by the intercession of Clorinda they were both set free.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, ii. (1575).

Oliphant or Ollyphant, the twin-brother of Argan'tê the giantess. Their father was Typhæus, and their mother Earth.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 7, 11 (1590).

Olive, emblem of peace. In Greece and Rome, those who desired peace used to carry an olive branch in their hand (see Gen. viii. 11).

> Peace sitting under her olive, and slurring the days gone by.
> Tennyson: Maud, I. i. 9 (1855).

Olive Tree (The), emblem of Athens, in memory of the famous dispute between Minerva (the patron goddess of Athens) and Neptune. Both deities wished to found a city on the same spot; and referred the matter to Jove. The king of gods and men decreed that the privilege should be granted to whichever would bestow the most useful gift on the future inhabitants. Neptune struck the earth with his trident, and forth came a war-horse; Minerva produced an olive tree, emblem of peace; and Jove gave the verdict in favour of Minerva.

Oliver, the elder son of sir Rowland de Boys [Bwor], left in charge of his younger brother Orlando, whom he hated and tried indirectly to murder. Orlando, finding it impossible to live in his brother's house, fled to the forest of Arden, where he joined the society of the banished duke. One morning, he saw a man sleeping, and a serpent and lioness bent on making him their prey. He slew both the serpent and the lioness, and then found that the sleeper was his brother Oliver. Oliver's disposition from this moment underwent a complete change, and he loved his brother as much as he had before hated him. In the forest, the two brothers met Rosalind and Celia. The former, who was the daughter of the banished duke, married Orlando; and the latter, who was the daughter of the usurping duke, married Oliver.—Shakespeare: As You Like It (1598).

Oliver and Rowland (or Roland), the two chief paladins of Charlemagne. Shakespeare makes the duke of Alençon say—

> Froissart, a countryman of ours, records,
> England all Olivers and Rowlands bred
> During the time Edward the Third did reign.
> Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act i. sc. 2 (1596).

Oliver's Horse, Ferrant d'Espagne.
Oliver's Sword, Haute-claire.

Oliver le Dain or Oliver le Diable, court barber, and favourite minister of Louis XI. Introduced by sir W. Scott in Quentin Durward and Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Oliver Twist, a novel by C. Dickens (1838). Oliver was born in a parish workhouse, and his mother died soon after his birth. When he was 9 years old he was deputed by the workhouse boys to go and ask the master for a little more gruel. This was thought by Mr. Bumble, the parish beadle, so great an offence, that the board of directors gave Mr. Sowerberry, the coffin-maker, £5 to take him off their hands. Mrs. Sowerberry, her servant Charlotte, and Noah Claypole behaved to him so insolently and cruelly that he ran away to London, seventy miles off, and there fell into the hands of John Dawkins (the Artful Dodger), who introduced him to Fagin, a Jew, who kept a gang of pickpockets, thieves, and house breakers. Going out under the charge of two boys, he saw them pick the pocket of Mr. Brownlow and run away. A hue and cry arose; Oliver ran in the opposite direction, was caught, and taken before Mr. Fang the magistrate, but fainted in the dock. Mr. Brownlow had compassion on him, took him to his house, and treated him so kindly that Oliver was most grateful and attached. One day Mr. Brownlow sent him on an errand, to return a parcel of books and pay a small bill; he was seen by some of Fagin's gang and taken to the Jew's den. Some time rolled on, when Bill Sikes planned to break into Mrs. Maylie's mansion at Chertsey, and Oliver was sent to get through a small lattice and open the front door. Instead of doing so, he alarmed the house, and one of the men-servants, firing a gun, wounded him in the arm. Sikes drew him up, and, running off, left him in a ditch. Next day, faint with fright, fatigue, and loss of blood, he applied at the mansion for relief, was taken in, and most tenderly treated by Mrs. Maylie and her "niece" Rose. Ultimately it was discovered that Rose was his own sister. He came into a small property left by his father; and when Rose married the son of Mrs. Maylie, Mr. Brownlow adopted Oliver as his heir.

OLIV'IA, a rich countess, whose love was sought by Orsino duke of Illyria; but, having lost her brother, Olivia lived for a time in entire seclusion, and in no wise reciprocated the duke's love; in consequence of which Viola nicknamed her "Fair Cruelty." Strange as it may seem, Olivia fell desperately in love with Viola, who was dressed as the duke's page, and sent her a ring. Mistaking Sebastian (Viola's brother) for Viola, she married him out of hand.—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night (1614).

Never were Shakespeare's words more finely given than by Miss M. Tree [1805–1865] in the speech to "Olivia," beginning, "Make me a willow cabin at thy gate."—Talfourd (1821).

Oliv'ia, a female Tartuffe (2 syl.), and consummate hypocrite of most unblushing effrontery.—Wycherly: The Plain Dealer (1677).

(The duc de Montausier was the prototype of Wycherly's "Mr. Manly" the "plain dealer," and of Molière's "Misanthrope.")

Oliv'ia, daughter of sir James Woodville, left in charge of a mercenary wretch, who, to secure to himself her fortune, shut her up in a convent in Paris. She was rescued by Leontine Croaker, brought to England, and became his bride.—Goldsmith: The Good-natured Man (1768).

Oliv'ia, the tool of Ludovico. She loved Vicentio, but Vicentio was plighted to Evadne sister of Colonna. Ludovico induced Evadne to substitute the king's miniature for that of Vicentio, which she was accustomed to wear. When Vicentio returned, and found Evadne with the king's miniature, he believed what Ludovico had told him, that she was the king's wanton, and he cast her off. Olivia repented of her duplicity, and explained it all to Vicentio, whereby a reconciliation took place, and Vicentio married his troth-plighted lady "more sinned against than sinning."—Shiel: Evadne or The Statue (1820).

Olivia, "the rose of Aragon," was the daughter of Ruphi'no, a peasant, and bride of prince Alonzo of Aragon. The king refused to recognize the marriage, and, sending his son to the army, compelled the cortez to pass an act of divorce. This brought to a head a general revolt. The king was dethroned, and Almagro made regent. Almagro tried to make Olivia marry him; ordered her father to the rack, and her brother to death. Meanwhile the prince returned at the head of his army, made himself master of the city, put down the revolt, and had his marriage duly recognized. As for Almagro, he took poison and died.—Knowles: The Rose of Aragon (1842).

Olivia [PRIMROSE], the elder daughter of the vicar of Wakefield. She was a sort of Hebê in beauty, open, sprightly, and commanding. Olivia Primrose "wished for many lovers," and eloped with squire Thornhill. Her father went in search of her, and, on his return homeward, stopped at a roadside inn, called the Harrow, and there found her turned out of the house by the landlady. It was ultimately discovered that she was legally married to the squire.—Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield (1765).

Olivia de Zuniga, daughter of don Cæsar. She fixed her heart on having Julio de Melessina for her husband, and so behaved to all other suitors as to drive them away. Thus to don Garcia she pretended to be a termagant; to don Vincentio, who was music mad, she professed to love a Jew's-harp above every other instrument. At last Julio appeared, and her "bold stroke" obtained as its reward "the husband of her choice."—Mrs. Cowley: A Bold Stroke for a Husband (1782).

Olla, bard of Cairbar. These bards acted as heralds.—Ossian.

Ol'lapod (Cornet), at the Galen's Head. An eccentric country apothecary, "a jumble of physic and shooting." Dr. Ollapod is very fond of "wit," and when he has said what he thinks a smart thing, he calls attention to it, with "He! he! he!" and some such expression as "Do you take, good sir? do you take?" But when another says a smart thing, he titters, and cries, "That's well! that's very well! Thank you, good sir, I owe you one!" He is a regular rattle-pate; details all the scandal of the village; boasts of his achievements or misadventures; is very mercenary, and wholly without principle.—Colman: The Poor Gentleman (1802).

Ol'lomand, an enchanter, who persuaded Abu'bal, the rebellious brother of Misnar sultan of Delhi, to try by bribery to corrupt the troops of the sultan. By an unlimited supply of gold, he soon made himself master of the southern provinces, and Misnar marched to give him battle. Ollomand, with 5000 men, went in advance and concealed his company in a forest; but Misnar, apprized thereof by spies, set fire to the forest, and Ollomand was shot by the discharge of his own cannons, fired spontaneously by the flames: "For enchantment has no power except over those who are first deceived by the enchanter."—Sir C. Morell [J. Ridley]: Tales of the Genii ("The Enchanter's Tale," vi., 1751).

Olney Doctrine (The), an extension of the "Monroe Doctrine;" expounded in 1895 in the United States; that "No European Power has a right to intervene forcibly in the affairs of the New World; and that the United States, owing to its superior size and power, is the natural protector and champion of all American nations; and that permanent political union between a European and American State is unnatural and inexpedient." Mr. Olney was secretary of state when Mr. Cleveland was president.

How does this apply to Canada and British Columbia?

Olney Hymns, by Cowper and the Rev. J. Newton. Cowper and Newton lived adjoining, at Olney, Bucks (1779).

Olof (Sir), a bridegroom who rode late to collect guests to his wedding. On his ride, the daughter of the erl-king met him, and offered him a pair of gold spurs, a silk doublet, and gold, if he would dance with her; when he refused, she struck him "with an elf-stroke." On the morrow, when the bridal party were assembled, sir Olof was found dead in a wood.—A Danish Legend (Herder).

Olympia, countess of Holland and wife of Bire'no. Being deserted by Bireno, she was bound naked to a rock by pirates, but was delivered by Orlando, who took her to Ireland, where she married king Oberto (bks. iv., v.).—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Olym'pia, sister to the great-duke of Muscovia.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Loyal Subject (1618).

Olympus, of Greece, was on the confines of Macedonia and Thessaly. Here the court of Jupiter was held.

Olympus, in the dominions of Prester John, was "three days' journey from paradise." A corrupt form of Alumbo, the same as Colombo, in Ceylon.

Omar Kháyyám, the Persian astronomer-poet of Nishapur. Full name, Ghiyath-ud-Din Abu-l-Fath Omar ibn Ibrahim-al-Khayyami. Born in 11th century. He wrote ten works, the chief being The Rubáiyát. This was translated by Edward Fitzgerald (1857), who did not give a literal translation, but represented the poet's thoughts upon the subjects touched on.

Omawhaws [Om'-a waws] or Om'-ahas, an Indian tribe of Dacota (United States).

Ombre'lia, the rival of Smilinda for the love of Sharper; "strong as the footman, as the master sweet."—Pope: Eclogues ("The Basset Table," 1715).

Omnipresence of the Deity (The), a poem by Robert Montgomery (1823).

Omnium (Jacob), the name assumed by Matthew J. Higgins in the Times.

One Side. All on one side, like the Bridgenorth election. Bridgenorth was a pocket borough of the Apley family.

One Thing at a Time, This was De Witt's great maxim (Spectator).

O'Neal (Shan), leader of the Irish insurgents in 1567. Shan O'Neal was notorious for profligacy.

Onei'za (3 syl.), daughter of Moath a well-to-do Bedouin, in love with Thal'aba "the destroyer" of sorcerers. Thalaba, being raised to the office of vizier, married Oneiza, but she died on the bridal night.—Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, ii., vii. (1797).

Oneyda Warrior (The), Outalissi (q.v.).—Campbell: Gertrude of Wyoming (1809).

Only (The), Johann Paul Friedrich Richter, called by the Germans Der Einzige, from the unique character of his writings.

Not without reason have his panegyrists named him Jean Paul der Einzige, "Jean Paul the Only." . . . for surely, in the whole circle of literature, we look in vain for his parallel.—Carlyle.

¶ The Italians call Bernardo Accolti, an Italian poet of the sixteenth century, "Aretino the Only," or L'Unico Aretino.

Open, Ses'amê! (3 syl.), the magic words which caused the cave door of the "forty thieves" to open of itself. "Shut, Sesamê!" were the words which caused it to shut. Sesamê is a grain, and hence Cassim, when he forgot the word, cried, "Open, Wheat!" "Open, Rye!" "Open, Barley!" but the door obeyed no sound but "Open, Sesamê!"—Arabian Nights ("Ali Baba, or the Forty Thieves").

Opening a handkerchief, in which he had a sample of sesamê, he showed it me, and inquired how much a large measure of the grain was worth. . . . I told him that, according to the present price, it would be worth one hundred drachms of silver.—Arabian Nights ("The Christian Merchant's Story").

Ophe'lia, the young, beautiful, and pious daughter of Polo'nius lord chamberlain to the king of Denmark. Hamlet fell in love with her, but, finding marriage inconsistent with his views of vengeance against "his murderous, adulterous, and usurping uncle," he affected madness; and Ophelia was so wrought upon by his strange behaviour to her, that her intellect gave way. In an attempt to gather flowers from a brook, the branch of a tree she was holding snapped, and, falling into the water, she was drowned.—Shakespeare: Hamlet (1596).

(Tate Wilkinson, speaking of Mrs. Cibber (Dr. Arne's daughter, 1710-1766), says, "Her features, figure, and singing, made her the best 'Ophelia' that ever appeared either before or since.")

Ophiuchus [Of'-i-ū'-kus], the constellation Serpentarius. Ophiuchus is a man who holds a serpent (Greek, ophis) in his hands. The constellation is situated to the south of Hercules; and the principal star, called "Ras Alhague," is in the man's head. (Ras Alhague is from the Arabic, rás-al-hawwá, "the serpent-charmer's head.")

Satan stood
Unterrified, and like a comet burned,
That fires the length of Ophiuchus huge
In the Arctic sky.
Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 709, etc. (1665).

Ophiu'sa, island of serpents near Crete; called by the Romans Colubra'ria. The inhabitants were obliged to quit it, because the snakes were so abundant. Milton refers to it in Paradise Lost, x. 528 (1665).

Opium-Eater (The English), Thomas de Quincey, who published Confessions of an English Opium-Eater (1785-1859).

O. P. Q., Robert Merry (1755-1798); object of Gifford's satire in the Baviad and Mæviad; and of Byron's in his English Bards and Scotch Reviewers. He married Miss Brunton, the actress.

And Merry's metaphors appear anew,
Chained to the signature of O. P. Q.
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Opus Magnus, by Roger Bacon; dedicated to pope Clement IV. (1267).

Opus Minus, by the same author (posthumous).

Opus Tertium, by the same author (posthumous).

(Roger Bacon lived 1214-1292.)

Oracle (To Work the), to raise money by some dodge. The "Oracle" was a factory established at Reading, by John Kendrick, in 1624. It was designed for returned convicts and any one out of employment. So when a workman "had no work to do," he would say, "I must go and work the Oracle," i.e. I must go to the Oracle for work. (See EQUIVOKES, p. 327.)

Oracle of the Church (The), St. Bernard (1091-1153).

Oracle of the Holy Bottle (The), an oracle sought for by Rabelais, to solve the knotty point "whether Panurge (2 syl.) should marry or not." The question had been put to sibyl and poet, monk and fool, philosopher and witch, but none could answer it. The oracle was ultimately found in Lantern-land.

. This, of course, is a satire on the celibacy of the clergy and the withholding of the cup from the laity. Shall the clergy marry or not?—that was the moot point; and the "Bottle of Tent Wine," or the clergy, who kept the bottle to themselves, alone could solve it. The oracle and priestess of the bottle were called Bacbuc (Hebrew for "bottle").—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, iv., v. (1545).

Oracle of the Sieve and Shears (The), a method of divination known to the Greeks. The modus operandi in the Middle Ages was as follows:—The points of a pair of shears were stuck in the rim of a sieve, and two persons supported the shears with their finger-tips. A verse of the Bible was then read aloud, and while the names of persons suspected were called over, the sieve was supposed to turn when the right name was suggested. (See KEY AND BIBLE, p. 565.)

Searching for things lost with a sieve and shears.—Ben Jonson: The Alchemist, i. 2 (1610).

Oracle of Truth, the magnet.

And by the oracle of truth below,
The wondrous magnet, guides the wayward prow.
Falconer: The Shipwreck, ii. 2 (1756).

Oracles. (See EQUIVOKES, p. 327.)

Orange (Prince of), a title given to the heir-apparent of the king of Holland. "Orange" is a petty principality in the territory of Avignon, in the possession of the Nassau family.

Orania, the lady-love of Am'adis of Gaul.—Lobeira: Amadis of Gaul (fourteenth century).

Orator Henley, the Rev. John Henley, who for about thirty years delivered lectures on theological, political, and literary subjects (1692–1756).

'.' Hogarth has introduced him into several of his pictures; and Pope says of him—

Imbround with native bronze, lo! Henley stands,
Tuning his voice, and balancing his hands.
How fluent nonsense trickles from his tongue!
How sweet the periods, neither said nor sung!...
Oh, great restorer of the good old stage,
Preacher at once and zany of thy age!
Oh, worthy thou of Egypt's wise abodes;
A decent priest where monkeys were the gods!
Pope: The Dunciad, iii. 199, etc. (1742).

Orator Hunt, the great demagogue in the time of the Wellington and Peel administrations. Henry Hunt, M.P., used to wear a grey hat, and these hats were for the time a badge of democratic principles, and called "radical hats" (1773–1835).

Orbaneja, the painter of Ube'da, who painted so preposterously that he inscribed under his objects what he meant them for.

Orbaneja would paint a cock so wretchedly designed, that he was obliged to inscribe under it, "This is a cock."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. i. 3 (1615).

Orbilius, the schoolmaster who taught Horace. The poet calls him "the flogger" (plagōsus).—Ep., ii. 71.

'.' The Orbilian Stick is a birch rod or cane.

Ordeal (A Fiery), a sharp trial or test. In England there were anciently two ordeals—one of water and the other of fire. The water ordeal was for the laity, and the fire ordeal for the nobility. If a noble was accused of a crime, he or his deputy was tried by ordeal thus: He had either to hold in his hand a piece of red-hot iron, or had to walk blindfold and barefoot over nine red-hot ploughshares laid lengthwise at unequal distances. If he passed the ordeal unhurt, he was declared innocent; if not, he was accounted guilty. This method of punishment arose from the notion that "God would defend the right," even by miracle, if needs be.

Ordella, the wife of Thierry king of France, in the tragedy of Thierry and Theodoret, by J. Fletcher.

Fletcher's "Ordella" and Ford's "Calantha" (q.v.) are the most perfect women in the whole range of fiction.

Ordigale, the otter, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox, i. (1498).

Ordovi'ces (4 syl.), people of Ordovicia, that is, Flintshire, Denbighshire, Merionethshire, Montgomeryshire, Carnarvonshire, and Anglesey. (In Latin the i is short: Ordovicēs.)

The Ordovices now which North Wales people be.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xvi. (1613).

Or'dovies (3 syl.), the inhabitants of North Wales. (In Latin North Wales is called Ordovic'ia.)

Beneath his [Agricola's] fatal sword the Ordovies to fall
(Inhabiting the west), those people last of all
... withstood.
Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1612).

Or'ead (3 syl.), a mountain-nymph. Tennyson calls "Maud" an oread, because her hall and garden were on a hill.

I see my Oread coming down.
Maud, I. xvi. 1 (1855)

Oreäd. Echo is so called.

Ore'ades (4 syl.) or O'reads (3 syl.), mountain-nymphs.

Ye Cambrian [Welsh] shepherds then, whom these our mountains please,
And ye our fellow-nymphs, ye light Oreädes.
Drayton: Polyolbion, ix. (1612)

Orel'io, the favourite horse of king Roderick the last of the Goths.

> 'Twas Orelio
> On which he rode, Roderick's own battle-horse,
> Who from his master's hand was wont to feed
> And with a glad docility obey
> His voice familiar.
> Southey: Roderick, etc., XXV. (1814).

Ores'tes (3 syl.), son of Agamemnon, betrothed to Hermi'onê (4 syl.) daughter of Menela'os (4 syl.) king of Sparta. At the downfall of Troy, Menelāos promised Hermionê in marriage to Pyrrhos king of Epīros, but Pyrrhos fell in love with Androm'achê the widow of Hector, and his captive. An embassy, led by Orestês, was sent to Epiros, to demand that the son of Andromachê should be put to death, lest as he grew up he might seek to avenge his father's death. Pyrrhos refused to comply. In this embassage, Orestês met Hermionê again, and found her pride and jealousy roused to fury by the slight offered her. She goaded Orestês to avenge her insults, and the ambassadors fell on Pyrrhos and murdered him. Hermionê, when she saw the dead body of the king borne along, stabbed herself, and Orestês went raving mad.—Philips: The Distressed Mother (1712).

> All the parts in which I ever saw [W. C. Macready], such as "Orestes," "Mirandola," "William Tell," "Rob Roy," and "Claude Melnotte," he certainly had made his own.—Rev. F. Young: Life of C. M. Young.

Orfeo and Heuro'dis, the tale of Orpheus and Eurydicê, with the Gothic machinery of elves and fairies.

(Glück has an opera called Orfeo; the libretto, by Calzabigi, based on a dramatic piece by Poliziano, 1764.)

Orgari'ta, "the orphan of the Frozen Sea," and heroine of the drama. (See MARTHA, p. 680.)—Stirling: The Orphan of the Frozen Sea (1856).

Or'gilus, the betrothed lover of Penthe'a, by the consent of her father; but at the death of her father, her brother Ith'oclês compelled her to marry Bass'anês, whom she hated. Ithoclês was about to marry the princess of Sparta, but a little before the event was to take place, Penthea starved herself to death, and Orgilus was condemned to death for murdering Ithoclês.—Ford: The Broken Heart (1633).

Orgoglio [Or-gole'-yo], a hideous giant, as tall as three men, son of Earth and Wind. Finding the Red Cross Knight at the fountain of Idleness, he beats him with a club, and makes him his slave. Una informs Arthur of it, and Arthur liberates the knight and slays the giant (Rev. xiii. 5, 7, with Dan. vii. 21, 22).—Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. (1590).

 Arthur first cut off Orgoglio's left arm, i.e. Bohemia was cut off first from the Church of Rome; then he cut off the giant's right leg, i.e. England.

Orgon, brother-in-law of Tartuffe (2 syl.). His credulity and faith in Tartuffe, like that of his mother, can scarcely be shaken even by the evidence of his senses. He hopes against hope, and fights every inch of ground in defence of the religious hypocrite.—Molière: Tartuffe (1664).

ORIA'NA, daughter of Lisuarte king of England, and spouse of Am'adis of Gaul (bk. ii. 6). The general plot of this series of romances bears on this marriage, and tells of the thousand and one obstacles from rivals, giants, sorcerers, and so on, which had to be overcome before the consummation could be effected. It is in this unity of plot that the Amadis series differs from its predecessors—the Arthurian romances, and those of the paladins of Charlemagne, which are detached adventures, each complete in itself, and not bearing to any common focus.—Amadis de Gaul (fourteenth century).

¶ Queen Elizabeth is called "the peerless Oriana," especially in the madrigals entitled The Triumphs of Oriana (1601). Ben Jonson applies the name to the queen of James I. (Oriens Anna).

Oria'na, the nursling of a lioness, with whom Esplandian fell in love, and for whom he underwent all his perils and exploits. She was the gentlest, fairest, and most faithful of her sex.—Lobeira: Am'adis of Gaul (fourteenth century).

Orian'a, the fair, brilliant, and witty "chaser" of the "wild goose" Mirabel, to whom she is betrothed, and whose wife she ultimately becomes.—Fletcher: The Wild-goose Chase (1652).

Orian'a, the ward of old Mirabel, and bound by contract to her guardian's son whom she loves. Young Mirabel shilly-shallies, till he gets into trouble with Lamorce (2 syl.), and is in danger of being murdered, when Oriana, dressed as a page, rescues him. He then declares that his "inconstancy has had a lesson," and he marries the lady.—Farquhar: The Inconstant (1702).

Orian'a, in Tennyson's ballad so called, "stood on the castle wall," to see her spouse, a Norland chief, fight. A foeman went between "the chief and the wall," and discharged an arrow, which, glancing aside, pierced the lady's heart and killed her. The ballad is the lamentation of the chief on the death of his bride (1830).

O'riande (3 syl.), a fay who lived at Rosefleur, and brought up Maugis d'Aygremont. When her protégé grew up, she loved him, "d'un si grand amour, qu'elle doute fort qu'il ne se departe d'avecques elle."—Romance de Maugis d'Aygremont et de Vivian son Frère.

O'riel, a fairy, whose empire lay along the banks of the Thames, when king Oberon held his court in Kensington Gardens.—Tickell: Kensington Gardens (1686–1740).

Oriental Tales, by le comte de Caylus (1740): French. There is an English version.

Oriflamme, the banner of St. Denis. When the counts of Vexin became possessed of the abbey, the banner passed into their hands; and when, in 1082, Philippe I. united Vexin to the crown, the oriflamme or sacred banner belonged to France. In 1119 it was first used as a national banner. It consists of a crimson silk flag, mounted on a gilt staff (un glaive tout doré où est atachié une banière vermeille). The loose end is cut into three wavy vandykes, to represent tongues of flame, and a silk tassel is hung at each cleft. In war the display of this standard indicates that no quarter will be given. The English standard of no quarter was the "burning dragon."

 Raoul de Presle says the oriflamme was used in the time of Charlemagne, being the gift of the patriarch of Jerusalem. We are told that all infidels were blinded who looked on it. Froissart says it was displayed at the battle of Rosbecq, in the reign of Charles VI., and "no sooner was it unfurled, than the fog cleared away, and the sun shone on the French alone."

> I have not reared the Oriflamme of death.
> . . . me it behoves
> To spare the fallen foe.
> Southey: Joan of Arc, viii. 621, etc. (1837).

Origilla, the lady-love of Gryphon brother of Aquilant. But the faithless fair one took up with Martano, a most impudent boaster and a coward. Being at Damascus during a tournament in which Gryphon was the victor, Martano stole the armour of Gryphon, arrayed himself in it, took the prizes, and then decamped with the lady. Aquilant happened to see them, bound them, and took them back to Damascus, where Martano was hanged, and the lady kept in bondage for the judgment of Lucina.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Origin of Species (The), by "Means of Natural Selection," by Charles R. Darwin (1859). The object is to show the preservation of the strongest in the struggle of life. Those animals die off which are unable to bear up against this struggle, and those animals continue their species which are best able to overcome the difficulties of the battle of life. From birth there is in many cases a considerable difference, and if this difference is perpetuated it constitutes a species.

> There can be no doubt that such an animal as the fox owes its species to the dog and some other animal. Many of the bird tribe are manifestly cross-breeds.

Orillo, a magician and robber, who lived at the mouth of the Nile. He was the son of an imp and fairy. When any one of his limbs was lopped off, he had the power of restoring it; and when his head was cut off, he could take it up and replace it. When Astolpho encountered this magician, he was informed that his life lay in one particular hair; so instead of seeking to maim him, he cut off the magic hair, and the magician fell lifeless at his feet.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Orinda "the incomparable," Mrs. Katherine Philipps, who lived in the reign of Charles II. and died of small-pox.

 Her praises were sung by Cowley, Dryden, and others.

> We allowed you beauty, and we did submit . .
> Ah, cruel sex, will you depose us too in wit?
> Orinda does in that too reign.
> Cowley: On Orinda's Poems (1647).

O'riole (3 syl.). In America, the "Baltimore bird" is often so called; but the oriole is of the thrush family, and the Baltimore bird is a starling. Its nest is a pendulous cylindrical pouch, some six inches long, usually suspended from two twigs at the extremity of a branch, and therefore liable to swing backwards and forwards by the force of the wind. Hence Longfellow compares a child's swing to an oriole's nest—

> . . . like an oriole's nest,
> From which the laughing birds have taken wing;
> By thee abandoned hangs thy vacant swing.
> Longfellow: To a Child.

ORI'ON, a giant of great beauty, and a famous hunter, who cleared the island of Chios of wild beasts. While in the island, Orion fell in love with Merŏpê, daughter of king Œnop'ion; but one day, in a drunken fit, having offered her violence, the king put out the giant's eyes and drove him from the island. Orion was told if he would travel eastwards, and expose his sockets to the rising sun, he would recover his sight. Guided by the sound of a Cyclops' hammer, he reached Lemnos, where Vulcan gave him a guide to the abode of the sun. In due time his sight returned to him, and at death he was made a constellation. The lion's skin was an emblem of the wild beasts which he slew in Chios, and the club was the instrument he employed for the purpose.

He [Orion]
Reeled as of yore beside the sea,
When, blinded by Œnopion,
He sought the blacksmith at the forge,
And, climbing up the mountain gorge,
Fixed his blank eyes upon the sun.
Longfellow. The Occultation of Orion.

Orion and the Blacksmith. The reference is to the blacksmith mentioned in the preceding article, whom Orion took on his back to act as guide to the place where the rising sun might be best seen.

Orion's Dogs were Arctophŏnus ("the bear-killer") and Ptoophăgos ("the glutton of Ptoon," in Bœotia).

Orion's Wife, Sidê.

Ori'on. After Orion has set in the west, Aurīga (the Charioteer) and Gem'ini (Castor and Pollux) are still visible. Hence Tennyson says—

. . . the Charioteer
And starry Gemini hang like glorious crowns
Over Orion's grave low down in the west.
Maud, III. vi. 1 (1855).

Ori'on, a seraph, the guardian angel of Simon Peter.—Klopstock: The Messiah, iii. (1748).

Ori'on, an "epic" poem, by Richard H. Horne, price one farthing (1843). Several editions were sold. Of course the price was a satire on the present day's estimation of modern poetry.

Orith'yia or Orith'ya, daughter of Erectheus, carried off by Boreas to Thrace.

Such dalliance as alone the North wind hath with her,
Orithya not enjoyed, from [I to] Thrace when he her took.
And in his sally plumes the trembling virgin shook.
Drayton: Polyolbion, x. (1612).

 Phineas Fletcher calls the word "Orithy'a"—

None knew mild zephyrs from cold Eurus' mouth,
Nor Orithÿa's lover's violence [North wind].
Fletcher: Purple Island, i. (1633).

ORLANDO, the younger son of sir Rowland de Boys [Bwor]. At the death of his father, he was left under the care of his elder brother Oliver, who was charged to treat him well; but Oliver hated him, wholly neglected his education, and even tried by many indirect means to kill him. At length Orlando fled to the forest of Arden', where he met Rosalind and Celia in disguise. They had met before at a wrestling-match, when Orlando and Rosalind fell in love with each other. The acquaintance was renewed in the forest, and ere many days had passed the two ladies resumed their proper characters, and both were married, Rosalind to Orlando, and Celia to Oliver the elder brother.—Shakespeare: As You Like It (1598).

Orlando (in French ROLAND, q.v.), one of the paladins of Charlemagne, whose nephew he was. Orlando was confiding and loyal, of great stature, and possessed unusual strength. He accompanied his uncle into Spain, but on his return was waylaid in the valley of Roncesvallês (in the Pyrenees) by the traitor Ganelon, and perished with all his army, A.D. 778. His adventures are related in Turpin's Chronique; in the Chanson de Roland, attributed to Théroulde. He is the hero of Bojardo's epic, Orlando Innamorato; and of Ariosto's continuation, called Orlando Furioso ("Orlando mad"). Robert Greene, in 1594, produced a drama which he called The History of Orlando. Rhode's farce of Bombastês Furioso (1790) is a burlesque of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso.

Orlando's Ivory Horn, Olifant, once the property of Alexander the Great. Its bray could be heard for twenty miles.

Orlando's Horse, Brigliadoro ("golden bridle").

Orlando's Sword, Durinda'na or Durandana, which once belonged to Hector, is "preserved at Rocamadour, in France; and his spear is still shown in the cathedral of Pa'via, in Italy."

Orlando was of middling stature, broad-shouldered, crooked legged, brown-visaged, red-bearded, and had much hair on his body. He talked but little, and had a very surly aspect, although he was perfectly good-humoured.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. i. 1 (1615).

Orlando's Vulnerable Part. Orlando was invulnerable except in the sole of his foot, and even there nothing could wound him but the point of a large pin; so that when Bernardo del Carpio assailed him at Roncesvallês, he took him in his arms and squeezed him to death, in imitation of Herculês, who squeezed to death the giant Antæ'us (3 syl.).—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. ii. 13 (1615).

Orlando, the hero of Mrs. Smith's novel, The Old Manor House (1793). "Handsome, generous, brave, and ardent." He falls in love with the heroine Monimia, and ultimately marries her.

Orlando, the hero of Ariosto's poem. (See below.) He is intended to be a model knight, high-minded, generous, compassionate, and valiant." He falls in love with Angelica. (See below.)

Orlando Furioso, a continuation of Bojardo's story, with the same hero. Bojardo leaves Orlando in love with Angelica, whom he fetched from Cathay and brought to Paris. Here, says Ariosto, Rinaldo fell in love with her, and, to prevent mischief, the king placed the coquette under the charge of Namus. But she contrived to escape her keeper, and fled to the island of Ebūda, where Rogēro found her exposed to a sea-monster, and liberated her. In the mean time, Orlando went in search of his lady, was decoyed into the enchanted castle of Atlantês, but was liberated by Angelica, who again succeeded in effecting her escape to Paris. Here she arrived just after a great battle between the Christians and pagans; and, finding Medōra a Moor wounded, took care of him, fell in love with him, and eloped with him to Cathay. When Orlando found himself jilted, he was driven mad with jealousy and rage, or rather his wits were taken from him for three months by way of punishment, and deposited in the moon. Astolpho went to the moon in Elijah's chariot, and St. John gave him "the lost wits" in an urn. On reaching France, Astolpho bound the madman, then, holding the urn to his nose, the wits returned to their nidus, and the hero was himself again. After this, the siege was continued, and the Christians were wholly successful. (See ORLANDO INNAMORATO.)—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

 This romance in verse extends to forty-six cantos. Hoole, in his translation (1783), compressed the forty-six cantos into twenty-four books; but the original number has been retained by Harrington in 1591; by Croker in 1755; and by Rose in 1823. The adventures of Orlando, under the French form "Roland," are related by Turpin in his Chronicle, and by Théroulde in his Chanson de Roland.

 The true hero of Ariosto's romance is Rogēro, and not Orlando. It is with Rogero's victory over Rodomont that the poem ends. The concluding lines are—

> Then at full stretch he [Rogero] raised his arm above
> The furious Rodomont, and the weapon drove > Thrice in his gaping throat—so ends the strife,
> And leaves secure Rogero's fame and life.

Orlando Innamora'to, or Orlando in Love, in three books, by count Bojardo of Scandiano, in Italy (1495). Bojardo supposes Charlemagne to be warring against the Saracens in France, under the walls of Paris. He represents the city as besieged by two infidel hosts—one under Agramantê emperor of Africa, and the other under Gradasso king of Serica'na. His hero is Orlando, whom he supposes (though married at the time to Aldabella) to be in love with Angelica, a fascinating coquette from Cathay, whom Orlando had brought to France. (See ORLANDO FURIOSO.)

(Bojardo's poem was incomplete, and in 1531 three more books were added by Agostini; and the whole was remodelled by Berni. Tofte, in 1598, produced an English version. Berni of Tuscany, in 1538, published a burlesque in verse on the same subject.)

Orleans, a most passionate innamorato, in love with Agripy'nar.—Dekker: Old Fortunatus 1600).

> Orleans talks "pure Biron and Romeo;" he is almost as poetical as they, quite as philosophical, only a little madder.—Lamb.

("Biron," in Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost; "Romeo," in his Romeo and Juliet.)

Orleans (Gaston duke of), brother of Louis XIII. He heads a conspiracy to assassinate Richelieu and dethrone the king. If the plot had been successful, Gaston was to have been made regent; but the conspiracy was discovered, and the duke was thwarted in his ambitious plans.—Lord Lytton: Richelieu (1839).

Orleans (Louis duc d'), to whom the princess Joan (daughter of Louis XI.) is affianced.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Orlick (Dolge), usually called "Old Orlick," though not above five and twenty, journeyman to Joe Gargery, blacksmith. Obstinate, morose, broad-shouldered, loose-limbed, swarthy, of great strength, never in a hurry, and always slouching. Being jealous of Pip, he allured him to a cave in the marshes, bound him to a ladder, and was about to shoot him, when, being alarmed by approaching steps, he fled. Subsequently he broke into Mr. Pumblechook's house, was arrested, and confined in the county jail. This surly, ill-conditioned brute was in love with Biddy, but Biddy married Joe Gargery.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

Orloff Diamond (The), the third largest cut diamond in the world, set in the top of the Russian sceptre. The weight of this magnificent diamond is 194 carats, and its size is that of a pigeon's egg. It was once one of the eyes of the idol Sheringham, in the temple of Brahma; came into the hands of the shah Nadir; was stolen by a French grenadier and sold to an English sea-captain for £2000; the captain sold it to a Jew for £12,000; it next passed into the hands of Shafras; and in 1775 Catherine II. of Russia gave for it £90,000. (See DIAMONDS, p. 277.)

Or'mandine (3 syl.), the necromancer who threw St. David into an enchanted sleep for seven years, from which he was reclaimed by St. George.—R. Johnson: The Seven Champions of Christendom, i. 9 (1617).

Orme (Victor), a poor gentleman in love with Elsie.—Wybert Reeve: Parted.

Ormond (The duke of), a privy councillor of Charles II.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

(Maria Edgeworth published, in 1817, two novels together, one called Harrington and the other Ormond. The title Harrington and Ormond is misleading.)

Ormston (Jock), a sheriff's officer at Fairport.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Ormus (Wealth of), diamonds. The island Ormus, in the Persian Gulf, is a mart for these precious stones.

> High on a throne of royal state, which far
> Outshone the wealth of Ormus.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 1 (1665).

Ornithology (The father of), George Edwards (1693–1773).

Oroma'zes (4 syl.), the principle of good in Persian mythology. Same as Vezad (q.v.).

Oroonda'tes (5 syl.), only son of a Scythian king, whose love for Statira (widow of Alexander the Great) led him into numerous dangers and difficulties, which, however, he surmounted.—La Calprenède: Cassandra (a romance).

Oroono'ko (Prince), son and heir of the king of Angola, and general of the forces. He was decoyed by captain Driver aboard his ship; his suite of twenty men were made drunk with rum; the ship weighed anchor; and the prince, with all his men, were sold as slaves in one of the West Indian Islands. Here Oroonoko met Imoin'da (3 syl.), his wife, from whom he had been separated, and who he thought was dead. He headed a rising of the slaves, and the lieutenant-governor tried to seduce Imoinda. The result was that Imoinda killed herself, and Oroonoko (3 syl.) slew first the lieutenant-governor and then himself. Mrs. Aphra Behn became acquainted with the prince at Surinam, and made the story of his life the basis of a novel, which Thomas Southern dramatized (1696).

> Jack Bannister [1760–1836] began his career in tragedy. . . . Garrick . . asked him what character he wished to play next. "Why," said Bannister, "I was thinking of 'Oroonoko.' "Eh, eh!" exclaimed David, staring at Bannister, who was very thin; "you will look as much like 'Oroonoko' as a chimney-sweeper in consumption."—Campbell.

Orozem'bo, a brave and dauntless old Peruvian. When captured and brought before the Spanish invaders, Orozembo openly defied them, and refused to give any answer to their questions (act i. 1).—Sheridan: Pizarro (altered from Kotzebue, 1799).

Orpas, once archbishop of Sev'ille. At the overthrow of the Gothic kingdom in Spain, Orpas joined the Moors and turned Moslem. Of all the renegades "the foulest and the falsest wretch was he that e'er renounced his baptism." He wished to marry Florinda, daughter of count Julian, in order to secure "her wide domains;" but Florinda loathed him. In the Moorish council, Orpas advised Abulcacem to cut off count Julian, "whose power but served him for fresh treachery, false to Roderick first, and to the caliph now." This advice was acted on; but as the villain left the tent, Abulcacem muttered to himself, "Look for a like reward thyself; that restless head of wickedness in the grave will brood no treason."—Southey: Roderick, etc., xx., xxii. (1814).

Orphan of China (The), a drama by Murphy. Zaphimri, the sole survivor of the royal race of China, was committed in infancy to Zamti the mandarin, that he might escape from the hand of Ti'murkan', the Tartar conqueror. Zamti brought up Zaphimri as his son, and sent Hamet, his real son, to Corea, where he was placed under the charge of Morat. Twenty years afterwards, Hamet led a band of insurgents against Timurkan, was seized, and ordered to be put to death under the notion that he was "the orphan of China." Zaphimri, hearing thereof, went to the Tartar and declared that he, not Hamet, was the real prince; whereupon Timurkan ordered Zamti and his wife Mandânê, with Hamet and Zaphimri, to be seized. Zamti and Mandanê were ordered to the torture, to wring from them the truth. In the interim, a party of insurgent Chinese rushed into the palace, killed the king, and established "the orphan of China" on the throne of his fathers (1759).

Orphan of the Frozen Sea, Martha, the daughter of Ralph de Lascours (captain of the Uran'ia) and his wife Louise. The crew having rebelled, the three, with their servant Bar'abas, were cast adrift in a boat, which ran on an iceberg in the Frozen Sea. Ralph thought it was a small island, but the iceberg broke up, both Ralph and his wife were drowned, but Barabas and Martha escaped. Martha was taken by an Indian tribe, which brought her up and named her Orgari'ta ("withered wheat"), from her white complexion. In Mexico she met with her sister Diana and her grandmother Mme. de Theringe (a syl.), and probably married Horace de Brienne.—Stirling: Orphan of the Frozen Sea (1856).

Orphan of the Temple, Marie Thérèse Charlotte duchesse d'Angoulême, daughter of Louis XVI.; so called from the Temple, where she was imprisoned. She was called "The Modern Antig'onê" by her uncle Louis XVIII.

Orpheus. (For a parallel fable, see WAINAMOINEN.)

¶ Odin was an Orpheus and Ari'on.

Odin was eminently skilled in music, and could sing airs so tender and melodious that the rocks would expand with delight; while the spirits of inferior regions would stand motionless around him, attracted by the sweetness of his strains.—Crichton and Wheaton: Scandinavia, vol. i. p. 81.

Orpheus and Eurydice (4 syl.), Glück's best opera (Orfeo). Libretto by Calzabigi, who also wrote for Glück the libretto of Alceste (1767). King produced an English version of Orpheus and Eurydice.

 The tale is introduced by Pope in his St. Cecilia's Ode.

Of Orpheus now no more let poets tell,
To bright Cecilia greater power is given:
His numbers raised a shade from hell,
Hers lift the soul to heaven.
Pope: St. Cecilia's Day (1709).

Orpheus of Highwaymen, John Gay, author of The Beggar's Opera (1688–1732).

Orpheus of the Green Isle (The), Furlough O'Carolan, poet and musician (1670–1738).

Or'raca (Queen), wife of Affonso II. The legend says that five friars of Morocco went to her, and said, "Three things we prophesy to you: (1) we five shall all suffer martyrdom; (2) our bodies will be brought to Coimbra; and (3) whichever sees our relics first, you or the king, will die the same day." When their bodies were brought to Coimbra, the king told queen Orraca she must join the procession with him. She pleaded illness, but Affonso replied the relics would cure her; so they started on their journey. As they were going, the queen told the king to speed on before, as she could not travel so fast; so he speeded on with his retinue, and started a boar on the road. "Follow him!" cried the king, and they went after the boar and killed it. In the mean time, the queen reached the procession, fully expecting her husband had joined it long ago; but, lo! she beheld him riding up with great speed. That night the king was aroused at midnight with the intelligence that the queen was dead. —Southey: Queen Orraca (1838); Francisco Manoel da Esperança: Historia Serafica (eighteenth century).

Orrock (Puggie), a sheriff's officer at Fairport.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Orsin, one of the leaders of the rabble rout that attacked Hudibras at the bear-baiting.—S. Butler: Hudibras (1663).

(The prototype of this rabble leader was Joshua Gosling, who kept the Paris Bear-Garden, in Southwark.)

Orsi'ni (Maffio), a young Italian nobleman, whose life was saved by Genna'ro at the battle of Rim'ini. Orsini became the fast friend of Gennaro, but both were poisoned by the princess Negroni at a banquet.—Donizetti: Lucrezia di Borgia (opera, 1834).

Orsi'no, duke of Illyria, who sought the love of Olivia a rich countess; but Olivia gave no encouragement to his suit, and the duke moped and pined, leaving manly sports for music and other effeminate employments. Viola entered the duke's service as a page, and soon became a great favourite. When Olivia married Sebastian (Viola's brother), and the sex of Viola became known, the duke married her and made her duchess of Illyria.—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night (1614).

Orson, twin-brother of Valentine, and son of Bellisant. The twin-brothers were born in a wood near Orleans, and Orson was carried off by a bear, which suckled him with its cubs. When he grew up, he became the terror of France, and was called "The Wild Man of the Forest." Ultimately, he was reclaimed by his brother Valentine, overthrew the Green Knight, and married Fezon daughter of the duke of Savary, in Aquitaine.—Valentine and Orson (fifteenth century).

Orson and Ellen. Young Orson was a comely young farmer from Taunton, stout as an oak, and very fond of the lasses, but he hated matrimony, and used to say, "The man who can buy milk is a fool to keep a cow." While still a lad, Orson made love to Ellen, a rustic maiden; but, in the fickleness of youth, forsook her for a richer lass, and Ellen left the village, wandered far away, and became waiting-maid to old Boniface the innkeeper. One day, Orson happened to stop at this very inn, and Ellen waited on him. Five years had passed since they had seen each other, and at first neither knew the other. When, however, the facts were known, Orson made Ellen his wife, and their marriage feast was given by Boniface himself.—Peter Pindar [Dr. Wolcot]: Orson and Ellen (1809).

Ortel'lius (Abraham), a Dutch geographer, who published, in 1570, his Theatrum Orbis Terræ or Universal Geography (1527–1598).

> I more could tell to prove the place our own,
> Than by his spacious maps are by Ortellius shown.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, vi. (1613).

Orthodoxy. When lord Sandwich said "he did not know the difference between orthodoxy and heterodoxy," Warburton bishop of Gloucester replied, "Orthodoxy, my lord, is my doxy, and heterodoxy is another man's doxy."

Orthodoxy (The Father of), Athanasius (296–373).

Orthrus, the two-headed dog of Euryt'ion the herdsman of Geryon'eo. It was the progeny of Typha'on and Echidna.

> With his two-headed dogge that Orthrus hight,
> Orthrus begotten by great Typhaon
> And foule Echidna in the house of Night.
> Spenser: Faëria Queene, v. 10, 10 (1596).

Ortwine (2 syl.), knight of Metz, sister's son of sir Hagan of Trony, a Burgundian. — The Nibelungen Lied (eleventh century).

Or'ville (Lord), the amiable and devoted lover of Evelina, whom he ultimately marries. He is represented as "handsome, gallant, polite, and ardent, —he dressed handsomely," and was altogether irresistible.—Miss Burney: Evelina (1778).

Osbaldistone (Mr.), a London merchant.

Frank Osbaldistone, his son, in love with Diana Vernon, whom he marries.

Sir Hildebrand Osbaldistone, of Osbaldistone Hall, uncle of Frank, his heir.

His Sons were: Percival, "the sot;" Thorncliff, "the bully;" John, "the gamekeeper;" Richard, "the horse-jockey;" Wilfred, "the fool;" and Rashleigh, "the scholar," a perfidious villain, killed by Rob Roy.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

(Rob Roy Macgregor was dramatized by Pocock.)

Osborne (Mr.), a hard, money-loving, purse-proud, wealthy London merchant, whose only gospel was that "according to Mammon." He was a widower, and his heart of hearts was to see his son, captain George, marry a rich mulatto. While his neighbour Sedley was prosperous, old Osborne encouraged the love-making of George and Miss Sedley; but when old Sedley failed, and George dared to marry the bankrupt's daughter, to whom he was engaged, the old merchant disinherited him. Captain George fell on the field of Waterloo, but the heart of old Osborne would not relent, and he allowed the widow to starve in abject poverty. He adopted, however, the widow's son, George, and brought him up in absurd luxury and indulgence. A more detestable cad than old Osborne cannot be imagined.

Maria and Jane Osborne, daughters of the merchant, and of the same mould. Maria married Frederick Bullock, a banker's son.

Captain George Osborne, son of the merchant; selfish, vain, extravagant, and self-indulgent. He was engaged to Amelia Sedley while her father was in prosperity, and captain Dobbin induced him to marry her after the father was made a bankrupt. Happily, George fell on the field of Waterloo, or one would never vouch for his conjugal fidelity.—Thackeray: Vanity Fair (1848).

Oscar, son of Ossian and grandson of Fingal. He was engaged to Malvi'na, daughter of Toscar, but before the day of marriage arrived, he was slain in Ulster, fighting against Cairbar, who had treacherously invited him to a banquet and then slew him, A.D. 296. Oscar is represented as most brave, warm-hearted, and impetuous, most submissive to his father, tender to Malvina, and a universal favourite.

"O Oscar," said Fingal, "bend the strong in arm, but spare the feeble hand. Be thou a stream of many tides against the foes of thy people, but like the gale that moves the grass to those who ask thine aid. . . . Never search for battle, nor shun it when it comes."—Ossian: Fingal, iii.

Cairbar shrinks before Oscar's sword He creeps in darkness behind a stone. He lifts the spear in secret; he pierces Oscar's side. Oscar falls forward on his shield; his knee sustains the chief, but still the spear is in his hand. See! gloomy Cairbar falls. The steel pierced his forehead, and divided his red hair behind. He lay like a shattered rock . . . but never more shall Oscar arise.—Ossian: Temora, i.

Oscar Roused from Sleep. "Caolt took up a huge stone and hurled it on the hero's head. The hill for three miles round shook with the reverberation of the blow, and the stone, rebounding, rolled out of sight. Whereon Oscar awoke, and told Caolt to reserve his blows for his enemies."

Gun 'thog Caoilte a chlach, nach gàn,
Agus a n' aighai' chiean gun bhuail;
Tri mil an tulloch gun chri.
Gaelic Romances.

Oscar of Alva, the hero and title of a poem by lord Byron. Oscar and Allan were the sons of Angus a Scottish chieftain. Both equally brave, Oscar "owned a hero's soul," while Allan was self-contained and of smooth words. When grown to man's estate, Mora, "Glenalvon's blue-eyed daughter," arrived as Oscar's bride; but on the nuptial day Oscar could not be found. They searched everywhere, and for three years they waited, hoping his return, without avail. Arrangements were then made for the marriage of Mora and Allan. At the festivities appeared a stranger chief, in a dark robe and a "plume of gory red," who invited the guests to drink to the memory of the departed Oscar. All present complied excepting Allan, who turned a ghastly hue, dashed the goblet to the ground, while a voice was heard proclaiming him the murderer of his brother; the feast broke up in the midst of a terrific thunderstorm, and Allan died.

The catastrophe of this tale was suggested by the story of "Jeronyme and Lorenzo" in vol. i. of Schiller's Armenian, or the Ghost Seer. It also bears some resemblance to a scene in the third act of Macbeth.

Os'ewald (3 syl.), the reeve, of "the carpenteres craft," an old man.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (1388).

Oseway (Dame), the ewe, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498).

O'Shanter (Tam), a farmer, who, returning home from Ayr very late and well soaked with liquor, had to pass the kirk of Alloway. Seeing it was illuminated, he peeped in, and saw there the witches and devils dancing, while old Clootie was blowing the bagpipes. Tam got so excited that he roared out to one of the dancers, "Weel done, Cutty Sark! Weel done!" In a moment all was dark. Tam now spurred his "grey mare Meg" to the top of her speed, while all the fiends chased after him. The river Doon was near, and Tam just reached the middle of the bridge when one of the witches, whom he called Cutty Sark, touched him; but it was too late—he had passed the middle of the stream, and was out of the power of the crew. Not so his mare's tail—that had not yet passed the magic line, and Cutty Sark, clinging thereto, dragged it off with an infernal wrench.—Burns: Tam O'Shanter.

Osi'ris, judge of the dead, brother and husband of Isis. Osiris is identical with Adonis and Thammuz. All three represent the sun, six months above the equator, and six months below it. Adonis passed six months with Aphroditê in heaven, and six months with Persephônê in hell. So Osiris in heaven was the beloved of Isis; but in the land of darkness was embraced by Nepthys.

Osi'ris, the sun; Isis, the moon.

They [the priests] wore rich mitres shaped like the moon,
To show that Isis doth the moon portend,
Like as Osiris signifies the sun.
Spenser: Fairie Queene, v. 7 (1596).

Osi'ris, the personification of that part of man which survives death, and (according to Egyptian mythology) is absorbed in deity. Also "the sacrifice by whom we are justified" (p. 37), metaphorically the grave.

Now he's an Osiris . . . but an hour ago he was an everyday mortal like you or me.—H. Rider Haggard: Cleopatra, ch. ii.

Some few were wanting, having been gathered to Osiris.—Ch. v.

Osman, sultan of the East, the great conqueror of the Christians, a man of most magnanimous mind and of noble generosity. He loved Zara, a young Christian captive, and was by her beloved with equal ardour and sincerity. Zara was the daughter of Lusignan d'Outremer, a Christian king of Jerusalem; she was taken prisoner by Osman's father, with her elder brother Nerestan, then four years old. After twenty years' captivity, Nerestan was sent to France for ransom, and on his return presented himself before the sultan, who fancied he perceived a sort of intimacy between the young man and Zara, which excited his suspicion and jealousy. A letter, begging that Zara would meet him in a "secret passage" of the seraglio, fell into the sultan's hands, and confirmed his suspicions. Zara went to the rendezvous, where Osman met her and stabbed her to the heart. Nerestan was soon brought before him, and told him he had murdered his sister, and all he wanted of her was to tell her of the death of her father, and to bring her his dying benediction. Stung with remorse, Osman liberated all his Christian captives, and then stabbed himself.—Aaron Hill: Zara (1735).

(This tragedy is an English adaptation of Voltaire's Zaire, 1733.)

Osmand, a necromancer who, by enchantment, raised up an army to resist the Christians. Six of the champions were enchanted by Osmand, but St. George restored them. Osmand tore off his hair in which lay his spirit of enchantment, bit his tongue in two, embowelled himself, cut off his arms, and died.—R. Johnson: Seven Champions of Christendom, i. 19 (1617).

Osmond, an old Varangian guard.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Osmyn, alias ALPHONSO, son of Anselmo king of Valentia, and husband of Alme'ria daughter of Manuel king of Grana'da. Supposed to have been lost at sea, but in reality cast on the African coast, and tended by queen Zara, who falls in love with him. Both are taken captive by Manuel, and brought to Granada. Here Manuel falls in love with Zara, but Zara retains her passionate love for Alphonso. Alphonso makes his escape, returns at the head of an army to Granada, finds both the king and Zara dead, but Almeria being still alive becomes his acknowledged bride.—Congreve: The Mourning Bride (1697).

("Osman" was one of John Kemble's characters, Mrs. Siddons taking the rôle of "Zara.")

Osnaburghs, the cloths so called; a corruption of Osnabrück, in Hanover, where these coarse linens were first produced.

Osprey. When fish see the osprey, the legend says, they are so fascinated that they "swoon," and, turning on their backs, yield themselves an easy prey to the bird. Rattlesnakes exercise the same fascination over birds.

The osprey . . . the fish no sooner do espy,
But . . . turning their bellies up, as tho' their death they saw,
They at his pleasure lie, to stuff his gluttonous maw.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxv. (1622).

Osrick, a court fop, contemptible for his affectation and finical dandyism. He is made umpire by king Claudius, when Laertês and Hamlet "play" with rapiers in "friendly" combat.—Shakespeare. Hamlet (1596).

Osse'o, son of the Evening Star, whose wife was O'weenee. In the Northland there were once ten sisters of surpassing beauty; nine married beautiful young husbands, but the youngest, named Oweenee, fixed her affections on Osseo, who was "old, poor, and ugly," but "most beautiful within." All being invited to a feast, the nine set upon their youngest sister, taunting her for having married Osseo; but forthwith Osseo leaped into a fallen oak, and was transformed to a most handsome young man, his wife to a very old woman, "wrinkled and ugly," but his love changed not. Soon another change occurred: Oweenee resumed her former beauty, and all the sisters and their husbands were changed to birds, who were kept in cages about Osseo's wigwam. In due time a son was born, and one day he shot an arrow at one of the caged birds, and forthwith the nine, with their husbands, were changed to pygmies.

From the story of Osseo
Let [us] learn the fate of jesters.
Longfellow: Hiawatha, xii. (1855).

Ossian, the warrior-bard. He was son of Fingal (king of Morven) and his first wife Ros-crana (daughter of Cormac king of Ireland).

His wife was Evir-Allen, daughter of Branno (a native of Ireland); and his son was Oscar.

Ostrich (The) is said, in fable, not to brood over her eggs, but to hatch them by gazing on them intently. Both birds are employed, for if the gaze is suspended for only one moment, the eggs are addled. —Vanslebe.

(This is an emblem of the ever watchful eye of Providence.)

Such a look . . .
The mother ostrich fixes on her egg,
Till that intense affection
Kindles its light of life.
Southey: Thalaba the Destroyer, lii. 24 (1797).

Ostrich Egg. Captain F. Barnaby saw an ostrich egg hung by a silver chain from the ceiling of the principal mosque of Sivas, and was told it was a warning to evil-doers.

The ostrich always looks at the eggs she lays, and breaks those that are bad. So God will break evil-doers as the ostrich her worthless eggs.—Burnaby: On Horseback through Asia Minor, xxix. (1877).

Oswald, steward to Goneril daughter of king Lear.—Shakespeare: King Lear (1605).

Oswald, the cup-bearer to Cedric the Saxon, of Rotherwood.—Sir W. Scott: Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.).

Oswald (Prince), being jealous of Gondibert, his rival for the love of Rhodalind (the heiress of Aribert king of Lombardy), headed a faction against him. A battle was imminent, but it was determined to decide the quarrel by four combatants on each side. In this combat, Oswald was slain by Gondibert.—Davenant: Gondibert, i. (died 1668).

Othello, the Moor, commander of the Venetian army. Iago was his ensign or ancient. Desdemona, the daughter of Brabantio the senator, fell in love with the Moor, and he married her; but Iago, by his artful villainy, insinuated to him such a tissue of circumstantial evidence of Desdemona's love for Cassio, that, Othello's jealousy being aroused, he smothered her with a pillow, and then killed himself.—Shakespeare: Othello (1611).

The fiery openness of Othello, magnanimous, guileless, and credulous, boundless in his confidence, ardent in his affection, inflexible in his resolution, and obdurate in his revenge. . . . The gradual progress which Iago makes in the Moor's conviction, and the circumstances which he employs to inflame him, are so artfully natural . . . that we cannot but pity him.—Dr. Johnson.

(The story of this tragedy is taken from the novelletti of Giovanni Giraldi Cinthio, who died 1573.)

 Addison says of Thomas Betterton (1635-1710), "The wonderful agony which he appeared in when he examined the circumstance of the handkerchief in the part of 'Othello,' and the mixture of love that intruded on his mind at the innocent answers of 'Desdemona,' . . . were the perfection of acting." Donaldson, in his Recollections, says that Spranger Barry (1719-1777) was the beau-ideal of an "Othello;" and C. Leslie, in his Autobiography, says the same of Edmund Kean (1787-1833).

In my opinion, from the insinuation of Iago that Cassio played false to the close of the play, Edmund Kean's acting was perfection.

Otho, the lord at whose board count Lara was recognized by sir Ezzelin. A duel was arranged for the next day, and the contending parties were to meet in lord Otho's hall. When the time of meeting arrived, Lara presented himself, but no sir Ezzelin put in his appearance; whereupon Otho, vouching for the knight's honour, fought with the count, and was wounded. On recovering from his wound, lord Otho became the inveterate enemy of Lara, and accused him openly of having made away with sir Ezzelin. Lara made himself very popular, and headed a rebellion; but lord Otho opposed the rebels, and shot him.—Byron: Lara (1814).

(Keats, in conjunction with Brown, wrote a tragedy called Otho the Great, but it was never acted, 1795-1820.)

Otnit, a legendary emperor of Lombardy, who gains the daughter of the soldan for wife, by the help of Elberich the dwarf.—The Heldenbuch (twelfth century). (See GÜNTHER, p. 458.)

Otranto (Ernest of), page of the prince of Otranto.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Otranto (The Castle of), a romance by Horace Walpole (1769).

O'Trigger (Sir Lucius), a fortune-hunting Irishman, ready to fight every one, on any matter, at any time.—Sheridan: The Rivals (1775).

"Sir Lucius O'Trigger," "Callaghan O'Brallaghan," "major O'Flaherty," "Teague," and "Dennis Brulgruddery," were portrayed by Jack Johnstone (1750-1808) in most exquisite colours.—The New Monthly Magazine (1829).

("Callaghan O'Brallaghan," in Love à-la-Mode (Macklin); "major O'Flaherty," in The West Indian (Cumberland); "Teague," in The Committee (Hon. sir R. Howard); "Dennis Brulgruddery," in Colman's John Bull.)

Otta'vio (Don), the lover of donna Anna, whom he was about to make his wife, when don Giovanni seduced her and killed her father (the commandant of the city) in a duel.—Mozart: Don Giovanni (opera, 1787).

Otterbourne or Otterburne (The Battle of), a ballad between Henry lord Percy (Hotspur) and James earl Douglas of Scotland (1388), by Richard Sheale. Douglas had made a raid on England, advancing as far as Newcastle, but was driven back by Hotspur. A battle ensued at Otterburne, in which Douglas was slain, and Hotspur with his brother was taken prisoner.—Froissart: Chronicle (fourteenth century).

The "Battle of Otterburne" should not be confounded with "Chevy Chase," which is quite another affair, and arose from quite another cause. In the border-lands those on one side could not go hunting on the other side without permission; Percy, out of bravado, went hunting on the Scotch side, and Douglas resisted. This is the short and long of the more modern ballad.

Otto, duke of Normandy, the victim of Rollo called "The Bloody Brother."—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Bloody Brother (1639).

(Beaumont died 1616.)

Ot'uel (Sir), a haughty and presumptuous Saracen, miraculously converted. He was a nephew of Ferragus or Ferracute, and married a daughter of Charlemagne. The romance was in verse, but only fragments remain.

Ouida, an infantine corruption of Louisa. Her full name is Louise de la Ramée, authoress of Under Two Flags (1867), and many other novels.

Our Boys, a comedy by H. J. Byron (1878). (It had a marvellous run of four years and three months.)

Our Mutual Friend. (See MUTUAL FRIEND, p. 740.)

Ouran'abad, a monster represented as a fierce flying hydra. It belongs to the same class as (1) the Rakshe, whose ordinary food was serpents and dragons; (2) the Soham, which had the head of a horse, four eyes, and the body of a fiery dragon; (3) the Syl, a basilisk, with human face, but so terrible that no eye could look on it and live; (4) the Ejder.—Richardson's Dictionary ("Persian and Arabic").

In his hand, which thunder had blasted, he [Eblis] swayed the iron sceptre that causes the monster Ouranabad, the afrits, and all the powers of the abyss to tremble.—Beckford: Vathek (1786).

Outalissi, eagle of the Indian tribe of Oney'da, the death-enemies of the Hurons. When the Hurons attacked the fort under the command of Waldegrave (2 syl.), a general massacre was made, in which Waldegrave and his wife were slain. But Mrs. Waldegrave, before she died, committed her boy Henry to the charge of Outalissi, and told him to place the child in the hands of Albert of Wy'oming, her friend. This Outalissi did. After a lapse of fifteen years, one Brandt, at the head of a mixed army of British and Indians, attacked Oney'da, and a general massacre was made; but Outalissi, wounded, escaped to Wyoming, just in time to give warning of the approach of Brandt. Scarcely was this done, when Brandt arrived. Albert and his daughter Gertrude were both shot, and the whole settlement was extirpated.—Campbell: Gertrude of Wyoming (1809).

Outis (Greek for "nobody"), a name assumed by Odysseus (Ulysses) in the cave of Polypheme (3 syl.). When the monster roared with pain from the loss of his eye, his brother giants demanded who was hurting him. "Outis" (Nobody) thundered out Polypheme, and his companions never came to his help.—Homer: Odyssey.

Outram (Lance), park-keeper to sir Geoffrey Peveril.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Overdees (Rowley), a highwayman.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

O'verdo (Justice), in Ben Jonson's Bartholomew Fair (1614).

Overdone (Mistress), a bawd.—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure (1603).

Overie (John), a ferryman, who used to ferry passengers from Southwark to the City, and accumulated a considerable hoard of money by his savings. On one occasion, to save the expense of board, he simulated death, expecting his servants would fast till he was buried; but they broke into his larder and cellar, and held riot. When the old miser could bear it no longer, he started up, and belaboured his servants right and left; but one of them struck the old man with an oar, and killed him.

Mary Overie, the beautiful daughter of the ferryman. Her lover, hastening to town, was thrown from his horse, and died. She then became a nun, and founded the church of St. Mary Overy on the site of her father's house.

Overreach (Sir Giles), Wellborn's uncle. An unscrupulous, hard-hearted rascal, grasping and proud. He ruined the estates both of Wellborn and Allworth, and by overreaching grew enormously rich. His ambition was to see his daughter Margaret marry a peer; but the overreacher was overreached. Thinking Wellborn was about to marry the rich dowager Allworth, he not only paid all his debts, but supplied his present wants most liberally, under the delusion "if she prove his, all that is hers is mine." Having thus done, he finds that lady Allworth does not marry Wellborn but lord Lovell. In regard to Margaret, fancying she was sure to marry lord Lovell, he gives his full consent to her marriage; but finds she returns from church not lady Lovell but Mrs. Allworth.—Massinger: A New Way to Pay Old Debts (1628).

(The prototype of "sir Giles Overreach" was sir Giles Mompesson, a usurer outlawed for his misdeeds.)

When Kemble played "sir Giles Overreach," he was anxious to represent the part as Henderson [1747–1785] had done it, and wrote to Mrs. Inchbald to know "what kind of a hat Mr. Henderson wore; what kind of wig, cravat, ruffles, clothes, stockings with or without clocks, square or round-toed shoes. I shall be uneasy if I have not an idea of his dress, even to the shape of his buckles and what rings he wore on his hands. Moroseness and cruelty seem the groundwork of this monstrous figure; but I am at a loss to know whether, in copying it, I should draw the lines that express his courtesy to lord Lovel [sic] with an exaggerated strength or not. . . ." Mrs. Inchbald's answer is unfortunately lost.—W. C. Russell: Representative Actors.

I saw Kemble play "sir Giles Overreach" last night; but he came not within a hundred miles of G. F. Cooke [1756–1812], whose terrible visage, and short, abrupt utterance, gave a reality to that atrocious character. Kemble was too handsome, too plausible, and too smooth.—Sir W. Scott.

Overton (Colonel), one of Cromwell's officers.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Ovid, a Latin poet in the time of Augustus. He wrote the poetical fables called Metamorphoses, but he is far more often identified as the model of elegiac poetry (B.C. 43–18).

The French Ovid, Du Bellay; also called "The Father of Grace and Elegance" (1524–1560).

Ovid and Corinna. Corinna was Julia, daughter of Augustus the emperor, and the paramour of Ovid. She was noted for her beauty, talent, and licentiousness. Some say Corinna was Livia the wife of Augustus.—Amor., i. 5.

So was her heavenly body comely raised
On two faire columnes; those that Ovid praised
In Julia's borrowed name.

Ovo. Ab ovo usque ad mala ("from the egg to the apple"), from the beginning to the end of a feast or meal. The Romans began their entertainments with eggs, and ended with fruits.—Horace: 1 Satires, iii. 6; Cicero: Fam., ix. 20.

Ow'ain (Sir), the Irish knight of king Stephen's court, who passed through St. Patrick's purgatory by way of penance.—Henry of Saltrey: The Descent of Owain (1153).

O'weenee, the youngest of ten sisters, all of surpassing beauty. She married Osseo, who was "old, poor, and ugly," but "most beautiful within." (See Osseo, p. 788.)—Longfellow: Hiawatha, xii. (1855).

Owen (Sam), groom of Darsie Latimer, i.e. sir Arthur Darsie Redgauntlet.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Owen, confidential clerk of Mr. Osbaldistone, senior.—Sir W. Scott: Rob Roy (time, George I.).

Owen (Sir) passed in dream through St. Patrick's purgatory. He passed the convent gate, and the warden placed him in a coffin. When the priests had sung over him the service of the dead, they placed the coffin in a cave, and sir Owen made his descent. He came first to an ice desert, and received three warnings to retreat, but the warnings were not heeded, and a mountain of ice fell on him. "Lord, Thou canst save!" he cried as the ice fell, and the solid mountain became like dust, and did sir Owen no harm. He next came to a lake of fire, and a demon pushed him in. "Lord, Thou canst save!" he cried, and angels carried him to paradise. He woke with ecstasy, and found himself lying before the cavern's mouth.—Southey: St. Patrick's Purgatory (from the Fabliaux of Mon. le Grand).

Owen Meredith, Robert Bulwer Lytton, afterwards lord Lytton, son of the poet and novelist (1831–1891).

Owl (The), sacred to Minerva, was the emblem of Athens.

Owls hoot in B ♭ and G ♭, or in F ♯ and A ♭.—Rev. G. White: Natural History of Selborne, xlv. (1789).

Owl a Baker's Daughter (The). Our Lord once went into a baker's shop to ask for bread. The mistress instantly put a cake in the oven for Him, but the daughter, thinking it to be too large, reduced it to half the size. The dough, however, swelled to an enormous bulk, and the daughter cried out, "Heugh! heugh! heugh!" and was transformed into an owl.

Well, God 'ield you! They say the owl was a baker's daughter.—Shakespeare: Hamlet (1596)

Owl-glass. (See EULENSPIEGEL, p. 343.)

Own Times (My). Burnet, bishop of Salisbury, published, in 1724, a work called History of My Own Times. It is chit-chatty, but one-sided. He was a strong anti-Jacobite, and intimate with William III., whose accession to the throne he strenuously defended. Of course, the Jacobites violently attacked the book.

Ox (The Dumb), St. Thomas Aquinas; so named by his fellow-students on account of his taciturnity (1224–1274).

To gather in piles the pitiful chaff
That old Peter Lombard thrashed with his brain,
To have it caught up and tossed again
On the horns of the Dumb Ox of Cologne.
Longfellow: The Golden Legend.

An ox once spoke as learned men deliver.—J. Fletcher: Rule a Wife and Have a Wife, iii. 1 (1640).

St. Thomas was also called "The Great Sicilian Ox."—Alban Butler: Lives of the Saints.

We call him the "Dumb Ox," but he will give one day such a bellow as shall be heard from one end of the world to the other.—Alban Butler (Albertus).

Ox. The black ox hath trod on his foot, he has married and is hen-pecked; calamity has befallen him. The black ox was sacrificed to the infernals, and was consequently held accursed. When Tusser says the best way to thrive is to get married, the objector says—

Why, then, do folk this proverb put,
"The black ox near trod on thy foot,"
If that way were to thrive?
Wiving and Thriving, lvii. (1557).

The black oxe had not trode on his or her foote;
But ere his branch of blesse could reach any roote,
The flowers so faded, that in fifteen weekes
A man might copy the change in the cheekes
Both of the poore wretch and his wife.
Heywood (1640).

Oxford (John earl of), an exiled Lancastrian. He appears with his son Arthur as a travelling merchant, under the name of Philipson.

∴ The son of the merchant Philipson is sir Arthur de Vere.

The countess of Oxford, wife of the earl.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Oxford (The young earl of), in the court of queen Elizabeth.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Oxford Blues (The), the Royal Horse Guards.

Oxford University Boat Crew. Colours: dark blue.

Oxford Sausage (The), a collection of scraps and anecdotes connected with Oxford, by J. Warton (1764).

Oxford University, said to have been founded by king Alfred, in 886.

. . . religious Alfred . . .
Renowned Oxford built to Apollo's learned brood;
And on the hallowed bank of Isis' goodly flood,
Worthy the glorious arts, did gorgeous bowers provide.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xi. (1613).

Oyster. Pistol says, "The world's mine oyster, which I with sword will open." He alludes to the proverb, "The mayor of Northampton opens oysters with his dagger," for, Northampton being some eighty miles from the sea, oysters were so stale before they reached the town (before railroads or even coaches were known), that the "mayor" would be loth to bring them near his nose.

Oysters. Those most esteemed by the Romans were the oysters of Cyzicum, in Bithynia, and of Lucrinum, in Apulia, upon the Adriatic Sea. The best in Britain used to be the oysters of Walfleet, near Colchester.

Think you our oysters here unworthy of your praise?
Pure Walfleet . . . as excellent as those . . .
The Cyzic shells, or those on the Lucrinian coast.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xix. (1622).

(The oysters most esteemed by Englishmen are the Whitstable, which fetch a fabulous price. Colchester oysters (natives) in 1878 were sold at 4*s.* a dozen. Stiffkey (called Stu-ky) oysters, were at one time very highly esteemed. Stiffkey is near Wells, in Norfolk.)

Ozair (a syl.), a prophet. One day, riding on an ass by the ruins of Jerusalem, after its destruction by the Chaldeans, he doubted in his mind whether God could raise the city up again.

Whereupon God caused him to die, and he remained dead a hundred years, but was then restored to life. He found the basket of figs and cruse of wine as fresh as when he died, but his ass was a mass of bones. While he still looked, the dry bones came together, received life, and the resuscitated ass began to bray; whereupon the prophet no longer doubted the power of God to raise up Jerusalem from its ruins.—Al Korân, ii. (Sale's notes).

(This legend is based on Neh. ii. 12–20.)

P.

P. Placentius the dominican wrote a poem of 253 Latin hexameters, called Pugna Porcorum per P. Porcium poetam every word of which begins with the letter p (died 1548). It begins thus—

Plaudite, Porcelli, porcorum pigra propago
Progreditur . . . etc.

Praise Paul's prize pig's prolific progeny.
E. C. B.

¶ There are three rather celebrated poems, every word of which begins with c.

(1) Henry Harder, for example, wrote 100 Latin hexameter verses on the contest of Cats and Dogs. Its title is, Canem cum Catis certâmen carmine compositum currente calâmo C. Catulli Caninii.

The first line of this poem is as follows :—

Cattorum canimus certamina clara canumque.

Come, chant Cod's collie conquering Cato's cat.
E. C. B.

(2) Hucbald's poem in honour of Charles le Chauve contains more than 100 Latin hexameters. The last two lines are—

Convenlet claras claustris componere cannas
Completur claris carmen cantabile CALVIS.

(3) Hamconius wrote a similar poem on the Controversy of Catholics and Calvinists. The title is, Certâmen Catholicum cum Calvinistis.

¶ In the Materia more Magistrâlis every word begins with m.

¶ The following distich on cardinal Wolsey is excellent :—

Begot by butchers, but by bigots bred,
How high his honour holds his haughty head.

¶ Tusser has a poem of twelve lines in rhyme, every word of which begins with t. The subject is on Thrift. (See T.) Tusser died 1850.

The best-known alliterative poem in English is the following :—

An Austrian army, awfully arrayed,
Bravely by battery besieged Belgrade.
Cossack commanders, cannonading, come,
Dealing destruction's devastating doom;
Every endeavour engineers essay
For fame, for fortune, forming furious fray.
Gaunt gunners grapple, giving gashes good;
Heaves high his head heroic hardihood.
Ibraham, Islam, Ismael, imps in ill,
Jostle John, Jarovlitz, Jem, Joe, Jack, Jill;
Kick kindling Kutusoff, kings' kinsmen kill;
Labour low levels loftiest, longest lines;
Men march 'mid moles, 'mid mounds, 'mid murderous mines.
Now nightfall's nigh, now needful nature nods,
Opposed, opposing, overcoming odds.
Poor peasants, partly purchased, partly pressed,
Quite quaking, "Quarter! Quarter!" quickly quest.
Reason returns, recalls redundant rage,
Sees sinking soldiers, softens signiors sage.
Truce, Turkey, truce! truce, treacherous Tartar train!
Unwise, unjust, unmerciful Ukraine!
Vanish, vile vengeance! vanish, victory vain!
Wisdom wails war—wails warring words. What were Xerxes, Xantippé, Ximenês, Xavier?
Yet Yassy's youth, ye yield your youthful yest.
Zealously, zanies, zealously, zeal's zest.

From H. Southgate: Many Thoughts on Many Things.

N. B.—This alliterative poem is attributed to Alaric Watts (1820); but is generally assigned to the Rev. B Poulter, prebendary of Winchester.

¶ There is another beginning—

About an age ago, as all agree,
Beauteous Belinda, brewing best Bohea, and so on, by no means difficult.

P's (The Five), William Oxberry, printer, poet, publisher, publican, and player (1784–1824).

P's (Four). (See PLAY CALLED THE FOUR P's, p. 853.)

Pacchiarotto (Giacomo) was a painter of Siena. His story is to be found in the Commentary on the Life of Sodoma, by the editors of Vasari; Florence, 1855.

Browning has a poem called Pacchiarotto, and how he worked in Distemper.

Pache (J. Nicolas), a Swiss by birth. He was minister of war in 1792, and maire de Paris 1793. Pache hated the Girondists, and at the fall of Danton was imprisoned. After his liberation, he retired to Thym-le-Moutiers (in the Ardennes), and died in obscurity (1740–1823).

Swiss Pache sits sleek-headed, frugal, the wonder of his own ally for humility of mind. . . . Sit there, Tartuffe, till wanted.—Carlyle.

Pacific (The), Amadeus VIII. count of Savoy (1383, 1391–1439, abdicated and died 1451).

Frederick III. emperor of Germany (1415, 1440–1493).
Olaus III. of Norway (*, 1030–1093).

Pac'olet, a dwarf, "full of great sense and subtle ingenuity." He had an enchanted horse, made of wood, with which he carried off Valentine, Orson, and Clerimond from the dungeon of Ferrăgus. This horse is often alluded to. "To ride Pacolet's horse" is a phrase for going very fast.—Valentine and Orson (fifteenth century).

Pac'olet, a familiar spirit.—Steele: The Tatler (1709).

Pac'olet or NICK STRUMPFER, the dwarf servant of Norna "of the Fitful Head."—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Pacomo (St.), an Egyptian, who lived in the fourth century. It is said that he could walk among serpents unhurt; and when he had occasion to cross the Nile, he was carried on the back of a crocodile.

The hermit fell on his knees before an image of St. Pacomo, which was glued to the wall.—Lesage: Gil Blas, iv. 9 (1724).

Pacto'lus (now called Bagouly), a river of Lydia, in Asia Minor, which was said to flow over golden sand.

Pad'alon, the Hindû hell, under the earth. It has eight gates, each of which is guarded by a gigantic deity. Described by Southey, in cantos xxii., xxiii. of The Curse of Kehama (1809).

Paddington (Harry), one of Macheath's gang of thieves. Peachum describes him as a "poor, petty-larceny rascal, without the least genius. That fellow," he says, "though he were to live for six months, would never come to the gallows with credit" (act i. 1).—Gay: The Beggar's Opera (1727).

Paddington Fair, a public execution. Tyburn is in the parish of Paddington. Public executions were abolished in 1868.

Paddy, an Irishman. A corruption of Padhrig, Irish for Patrick.

Padlock (The), a comic opera by Bickerstaff. Don Diego (2 syl.), a wealthy lord of 60, saw a country maiden named Leonora, to whom he took a fancy, and arranged with the parents to take her home with him and place her under the charge of a duenna for three months, to see if her temper was as sweet as her face was pretty; and then either "to return her to them spotless, or make her his lawful wife." At the expiration of the time, the don went to arrange with the parents for the wedding, and locked up his house, giving the keys to Ursula the duenna. To make surance doubly sure, he put a padlock on the outer door, and took the key with him. Leander, a young student smitten with the damsel, laughed at locksmiths and duennas; and, having gained admission into the house, was detected by don Diego, who returned unexpectedly. The old don, being a man of sense, at once perceived that Leander was a more suitable bridegroom than himself, so he not only sanctioned the alliance, but gave Leonora a handsome wedding dowry (1768).

Pæan, the physician of the immortals.

Pæa'na, daughter of Corflambo, "fair as ever yet saw living eye," but "too loose of life and eke too light." Pæana fell in love with Amias, a captive in her father's dungeon; but Amias had no heart to give away. When Placidas was brought captive before Pæana, she mistook him for Amias, and married him. The poet adds, that she thenceforth so reformed her ways "that all men much admired the change, and spake her praise."—Spenser Faërie Queene, iv. 9 (1596).

Pagan, a fay who loved the princess Imis; but Imis rejected his suit, as she loved her cousin Philax. Pagan, out of revenge, shut them up in a superb crystal palace, which contained every delight except that of leaving it. In the course of a few years, Imis and Philax longed as much for a separation as, at one time, they had wished to be united.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Palace of Revenge," 1682). (See PERDRIX, PERDRIX, TOUJOURS PERDRIX!)

Page (Mr.), a gentleman living at Windsor. When sir John Falstaff made love to Mrs. Page, Page himself assumed the name of Brook, to outwit the knight. Sir John told the supposed Brook his whole "course of wooing," and how nicely he was bamboozling the husband. On one occasion, he says, "I was carried out in a buck-basket of dirty linen before the very eyes of Page, and the deluded husband did not know it." Of course, sir John is thoroughly outwitted and played upon, being made the butt of the whole village.

Mrs. Page, wife of Mr. Page, of Windsor. When sir John Falstaff made love to her, she joined with Mrs. Ford to dupe him and punish him.

Anne Page, daughter of the above, in love with Fenton. Slender calls her "the sweet Anne Page."

William Page, Anne's brother, a schoolboy. —Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor (1596).

Page (Sir Francis), called "The Hanging Judge" (1661-1741).

> Slander and poison dread from Delia's rage;
> Hard words or hanging if your judge be Page.
> Pope.

Paget (The Lady), one of the ladies of the bedchamber in queen Elizabeth's court.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Painted Chamber (The), an apartment in the old Royal Palace of Westminster, the walls of which were painted chiefly with battle-scenes, in six bands, somewhat similar to the Bayeaux tapestry (q.v., p. 98).

Painted Mischief, playing cards.

> There are plenty of ways of gambling . . . without recourse to the "painted mischief," which was not invented for the benefit of king Charles VI. of France.—Daily News, March 8, 1879.

Painter of Nature. Remi Belleau, one of the Pleiad poets (1528-1577).

(The Shepheardes Calendar, by Spenser. It is largely borrowed from Belleau's Song of April.)

Painter of the Graces, Andrea Appiani (1754-1817).

Painters (Prince of). Parrhasios and Apellês are both so called (fourth century B.C.).

Painters, Characteristics of some—

(1) ANGELICO (Fra): Il Beato, or the blessed painter: angels, saints, Saviour and Virgin; grouping and draping full of grace, even of splendour. Rich gold ornaments and backgrounds, and gay delicate flowers "like spring flowers." Drawing often defective, from the want of human knowledge. The faces of his heavenly beings are full of serenity, and of a perfect radiance of expression (1387-1455). (See ANACHRONISMS, p. 40.)

(2) ANGELO (Michael), painter, sculptor, architect, engineer, poet, and musician. His power lay in the mastery of form and the display of the human figure. The sibyls painted on the ceiling or the Sistine Chapel are most characteristic of Michael Angelo. "They exactly fitted his standard of art, not always sympathetic nor comprehensible to the average human mind, of which the grand in form and the abstract in expression were the first and last conditions."—Lady Eastlake: History of our Lord. He is the Æschylos of painters (1475-1564). (See ERRORS, p. 331.)

(3) BOTTICELLI (Sandro Filipepi, called Botticelli): "vehement and impetuous, full of passion and poetry, seeking to express movement." The most dramatic painter of his school (1447-1515).—Sarah Tytler: The Old Masters, etc.

(4) CARRACCI: eclectic artists, who picked out and pieced together parts taken from Correggio, Raphael, Titian, and other great artists. If Michael Angelo is the Æschylos of artists, and Raphael the Sophoclês, the Carracci may be called the Euripidês of painters. I know not why in England the name is spelt with only one r.

(5) CORREGGIO (Antonio Allegri): wonderful foreshortenings, magnificent light and shade. Pictures are full of motion and stir. He is said to have delighted "in the buoyance of childish glee, the bliss of earthly, the fervour of heavenly love." Chiaro-scuro so perfect that "you seem to look through Correggio's shadows, and to see beyond them the genuine texture of the flesh" (Mrs. Jameson). (1494-1534.)

(6) CUYP (Albert), the Dutch Claude: landscapes which show the painter's love of nature. Skies with their "clearness and coolness," and the "expression of yellow sunlight" (1605; date of death uncertain, about 1638).

(7) DAVID: noted for his stiff, dry, pedantic, "highly classic" style, according to the interpretation of the phrase by the French in the first Revolution (1748-1825).

(8) DOLCE (Carlo): famous for his Madonnas, which are all finished with most extraordinary delicacy (1616-1686).

(9) GUIDO (Reni): student in the Carracci school. His characteristic was a refined sense of beauty, which had a tendency to develop into "empty grace" without soul (1575-1642).

(10) HOLBEIN (Hans): characterized by the living truthfulness of his likenesses, and the "inimitable bloom" imparted to his pictures, which he "touched till not a touch became discernible." He used a peculiar green for the backgrounds of his larger portraits, a blue background for his miniatures (1494 or 1495-1543).

(11) LORRAINE (Claude Gelée). He was fond of painting scenes on the Tiber and in the Roman Campagna. His landscapes are suffused with a golden haze, so that the expression "a mellow" or a "sunny Claude" is used in relation to his work (1600-1682).

(12) MURILLO (Bartolomé Esteban). A great religious painter, eminently Spanish; his Virgins are dark eyed and olive-complexioned; the Holy Child is a Spanish babe (1618-1682).

(13) OMMEGANCK: sheep (1775-1826).

(14) PERUGINO (Pietro): "At his best he had luminous colour, grace, softness, and enthusiastic earnestness." "His defects were monotony and formality." He had some tiresome affectations and mannerisms, which are found in his upturned heads, etc.—Sarah Tytler: The Old Masters, etc. (1446-1524.)

(15) POUSSIN (Nicholas): famous for his classic style. Reynolds says, "No works of any modern have so much the air of antique painting as those of Poussin" (1593-1665).

(16) POUSSIN (Gaspar): a landscape painter, the very opposite of Claude Lorraine. He seems to have drawn his inspiration from Hervey's Meditations among the Tombs, Blair's Grave, Young's Night Thoughts, and Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy. (1613-1675.)

(17) RAPHAEL. The Sophoclês of painters. The head of the Roman school. He painted the loveliest Madonnas and Child Christs: his portraits are perfect. Angelo's figures are all gigantesque and ideal like those of Æschylos; Raphael's are perfect human beings (1483-1520).

(18) REMBRANDT (Van Rhyn): his characteristics are fire-light, camp-light, and torch-light scenes, with the deep black shadows belonging to these artificial lights (1606-1669).

(19) REYNOLDS: a portrait-painter. He presents his portraits in bel masqué, not always suggestive either of the rank or character of the person represented. There is about the same analogy between Watteau and Reynolds as between Claude Lorraine and Gaspar Poussin (1723-1792). (See ERRORS, p. 331.)

(20) ROSA (Salvator): dark, inscrutable pictures, relieved by dabs of the palette-knife. He is fond of savage scenery, broken rocks, wild caverns, blasted heaths, and so on (1615-1673).

(21) RUBENS (Peter Paul). According to sir Joshua Reynolds, Rubens was "perhaps the greatest master in the mechanical part of the art, the best workman with his tools that ever exercised a pencil." His excellence lay in his execution and wonderful colouring. His choice of subjects from Grecian mythology was very characteristic of him. He was renowned for the beauty and grace of his paintings of children (1577-1640).

(22) STEEN (Jan): great as a genre painter. He generally painted tavern scenes; the motifs frequently eating, drinking, card-playing, etc. (1626–1679).

(23) TINTORETTO (Il), i.e. the little dyer; real name, Jacopo Robusti. He was called "Il Furioso" from the rapidity and recklessness of his manner of painting. His contemporaries said of him that he "used three pencils—one gold, one silver, one lead." His magnificent painting was often spoilt by the inequality of his slovenly, careless work (1512–1594). (See ERRORS, p. 331.)

(24) TITIAN: the greatest painter of the Venetian school. A glorious colourist, great as a landscape, and magnificent as a portrait painter. He was noted for his broad shades of divers gradations (1477–1576).

(25) TURNER (R. A.): his special characteristic is scenes in a mist (1775–1851).

(26) VERONESE (Paul): the most magnificent of the Venetian painters; in fact, magnificence is his great characteristic. He painted all his sacred and historical scenes as if they had happened in his own day and city, giving even the humblest the pomp and splendour which was the fashion of that time (1530–1588). (See ERRORS, p. 331.)

(27) WATTEAU (Antoine): noted for his fêtes galantes, fancy-ball costumes, charming groups of ladies in sacques, and cavaliers in lace cravats and flowing hats. His exquisite fans were a great characteristic (1684–1721).

The colouring of Titian, the expression of Rubens, the grace of Raphael, the purity of Domenichino, the correggioscity of Correggio, the learning of Poussin, the airs of Guido, the taste of the Carrachi [sic], the grand contour of Angelo, . . . the brilliant truth of a Watteau, the touching grace of a Reynolds.—Sterne.

I have found Sarah Tytler's book, The Old Masters and their Pictures, very helpful in preparing this list.

Painters True to Nature.

(1) A Bee. Quintin Matsys, the Dutch painter, painted a bee so well that the artist Mandyn thought it a real bee, and proceeded to brush it away with his handkerchief (1450–1529).

(2) A Cow. Myron carved a cow so true to nature that bulls mistook it for a living animal (B.C. 431). (See Gibbon, vol. ii. p. 92.)

(3) A Curtain. Parrhasios painted a curtain so admirably that even Zeuxis, the artist, mistook it for real drapery (B.C. 400).

(4) A Fly. George Alexander Stevens says, in his Lectures on Heads—

I have heard of a connoisseur who was one day in an auction-room where there was an inimitable piece of painting of fruits and flowers. The connoisseur would not give his opinion of the picture till he had first examined the catalogue; and finding it was done by an Englishman, he pulled out his eye-glass. "Oh, sir," says he, "those English fellows have no more idea of genius than a Dutch skipper has of dancing a cotillion. The dog has spoiled a fine piece of canvas; he is worse than a Harp Alley sign-post dauber. There's no keeping, no perspective, no foreground. Why, there now, the fellow has actually attempted to paint a fly upon that rosebud. Why, it is no more like a fly than I am like ——;" but, as he approached his finger to the picture, the fly flew away (1772).

(5) Grapes. Zeuxis (2 syl.), a Grecian painter, painted some grapes so well that birds came and pecked at them, thinking them real grapes (B.C. 400).

(6) A Horse. Apellês painted Alexander's horse Bucephalos so true to life that some mares came up to the canvas neighing, under the supposition that it was a real animal (about B.C. 334).

(7) A Man. Velasquez painted a Spanish admiral so true to life that when king Felipe IV. entered the studio, he mistook the painting for the man, and began reproving the supposed officer for neglecting his duty, in wasting his time in the studio, when he ought to have been with his fleet (1590–1660).

¶ Accidental effects in painting.

Apellês, being at a loss to paint the foam of Alexander's horse, dashed his brush at the picture in a fit of annoyance, and did by accident what his skill had failed to do (about B.C. 334).

∴ The same tale is told of Protog'enês, who dashed his brush at a picture, and thus produced "the foam of a dog's mouth," which he had long been trying in vain to represent (about B.C. 332).

Paix des Dames (La), the treaty of peace concluded at Cambray in 1529, between François I. of France and Karl V. emperor of Germany. So called because it was mainly negotiated by Louise of Savoy (mother of the French king) and Margaret the emperor's aunt.

Palace of Art (The), an allegorical poem by Tennyson (1830).

Its object is to show that dwelling even in the palace of art will not render happiness, or that love of art will not alone suffice to make man happy.

Paladore, a Briton in the service of the king of Lombardy. One day, in a boar-hunt, the boar turned on the princess Sophia, and, having gored her horse to death, was about to attack the lady, but was slain by the young Briton. Between these two young people a strong attachment sprang up; but the duke Bire'no, by an artifice of false impersonation, induced Paladore to believe that the princess was a wanton, and had the audacity to accuse her as such to the senate. In Lombardy, the punishment for this offence was death, and the princess was ordered to execution. Paladore, having learned the truth, accused the duke of villainy. They fought, and Bireno fell. The princess, being cleared of the charge, married Paladore.—Jephson: The Law of Lombardy (1779).

Palame'des (4 syl.), son of Nauplios, was, according to Suidas, the inventor of dice. (See ALEA, p. 22.)

Tabula nomen ludi; hanc Palamedès ad Græci exercitus delectationem magna eruditione atque ingenio invenit. Tabula enim est mundus terrestris, duodenarius numerus est Zodiacus, ipsa vero area et septem in ea grana sunt septem stellæ planetarum. Turris est altitudo cœli, ex qua omnibus bona et mala rependuntur.—Suidas (Wolf's trans.).

Palame'des (Sir) or sir Palamede (3 syl.), a Saracen, who adored Isolde the wife of king Mark of Cornwall. Sir Tristrem also loved the same lady, who was his aunt. The two "lovers" fought, and sir Palamedes, being overcome, was compelled to turn Christian. He was baptized, and sir Tristrem stood his sponsor at the font.—Thomas of Erseldoune (called "The Rhymer"): Sir Tristrem (thirteenth century).

Palame'des of Lombardy, one of the allies of the Christian army in the first crusade. He was shot by Corinda with an arrow (bk. xi.).—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Pal'amon and Arcite (2 syl.), two young Theban knights, who fell into the hands of duke Theseus (2 syl.), and were by him confined in a dungeon at Athens. Here they saw the duke's sister-in-law Emily, with whom both fell in love. When released from captivity, the two knights told the duke their tale of love; and the duke promised that whichever proved the victor in single combat should have Emily for his prize. Arcite prayed to Mars "for victory," and Palamon to Venus that he might "obtain the lady," and both their prayers were granted. Arcite won the victory, according to his prayer, but, being thrown from his horse, died; so Palamon, after all, "won the lady," though he did not win the battle. —Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Knight's Tale," 1388).

This tale is taken from the Le Teseide of Boccaccio.

¶ The Black Horse, a drama by John Fletcher, is the same tale.

(Richard Edwards, in 1566, produced a comedy called Palamon and Arcyte. Dryden has modernized Chaucer's tale.)

Pale (The) or THE ENGLISH PALE, a part of Ireland, including Dublin, Meath, Carlow, Kilkenny, and Louth.

Pale Faces. So the American Indians call the European settlers.

Pale'mon, son of a rich merchant. He fell in love with Anna, daughter of Albert master of one of his father's ships. The purse-proud merchant, indignant at this, tried every means to induce his son to abandon such a "mean connection," but without avail; so at last he sent him in the Britannia (Albert's ship) "in charge of the merchandise." The ship was wrecked near cape Colonna, in Attica; and although Palēmon escaped, his ribs were so broken that he died almost as soon as he reached the shore.

> A gallant youth, Palemon was his name,
> Charged with the commerce hither also came;
> A father's stern resentment doomed to prove,
> He came, the victim of unhappy love.
> Falconer: The Shipwreck, i. 2 (1756).

Pale'mon and Lavinia, a poetic version of Boaz and Ruth. "The lovely young Lavinia" went to glean in the fields of young Palemon "the pride of swains;" and Palemon, falling in love with the beautiful gleaner, both wooed and won her.—Thomson: The Seasons ("Autumn," 1730).

Pales (2 syl.), god of shepherds and their flocks.—Roman Mythology.

> Pomōna loves the orchard;
> And Liber loves the vine;
> And Palēs loves the straw-built shed,
> Warm with the breath of kine
> Macaulay: Lays of Ancient Rome ("Prophecy of Capys," 1842).

Pal'inode (3 syl.), a shepherd in Spenser's Eclogues. In ecl. v. Palinode represents the catholic priest. He invites Piers (who represents the protestant clergy) to join in the fun and pleasures of May. Piers then warns the young man of the vanities of the world, and tells him of the great degeneracy of pastoral life—at one time simple and frugal, but now discontented and licentious. He concludes with the fable of the kid and her dam.

The fable is this: A mother-goat, going abroad for the day, told her kid to keep at home, and not to open the door to strangers. She had not been gone long, when up came a fox, with head bound from "headache," and foot bound from "gout," and carrying a ped of trinkets. The fox told the kid a most piteous tale, and showed her a little mirror. The kid, out of pity and vanity, opened the door; but while stooping over the ped to pick up a little bell, the fox clapped down the lid, and carried her off.

¶ In ecl. vii. Palinode is referred to by the shepherd Thomalin as "lording it over God's heritage," feeding the sheep with chaff, and keeping for himself the grains.—Spenser: Shepheardes Calendar (1572).

Pal'inode (3 syl.), a poem in recantation of a calumny. Stesich'oros wrote a bitter satire against Helen, for which her brothers, Castor and Pollux, plucked out his eyes. When, however, the poet recanted, his sight was restored to him again.

> The bard who libelled Helen in his song,
> Recanted after, and redressed the wrong
> Ovid: Art of Love, iii.

Horace's 1 Odes, xvi. is a palinode. Samuel Butler has a palinode, in which he recanted what he said in a previous poem of the Hon. Edward Howard. Dr. Watts recanted in a poem the praise he had previously bestowed on queen Anne.

Palinu'rus, the pilot of Æne'as. Palinurus, sleeping at the helm, fell into the sea, and was drowned. The name is employed as a generic word for a steersman or pilot, and sometimes for a chief minister.

> More had she spoke, but yawned. All nature nods . . .
> E'en Palinurus nodded at the helm.
> Pope: The Dunciad, iv. 614 (1742).

Palisse (La), a sort of M. Prudhomme; a pompous utterer of truisms and moral platitudes.

Palla'dio (Andrea), the Italian classical architect (1518-1580).

The English Palladio, Inigo Jones (1573-1653).

Palla'dium.

(1) Of Ceylon, the deláda or tooth of Buddha, preserved in the Malegawa temple at Kandy. Natives guard it with great jealousy, from a belief that whoever possesses it acquires the right to govern Ceylon. When, in 1815, the English obtained possession of the tooth, the Ceylonese submitted to them without resistance.

(2) Of Eden Hall, a drinking-glass, in the possession of sir Christopher Musgrave, bart., of Edenhall, Cumberland.

(3) Of Jerusalem. Aladine king of Jerusalem stole an image of the Virgin, and set it up in a mosque, that she might no longer protect the Christians, but become the palladium of Jerusalem. The image was rescued by Sophronia, and the city taken by the crusaders.

(4) Of Meg'ara, a golden hair of king Nisus. Scylla promised to deliver the city into the hands of Minos, and cut off the talismanic lock of her father's head while he was asleep.

(5) Of Rome, the ancilê or sacred buckler which Numa said fell from heaven, and was guarded by priests called Salii. Ænēas also introduced "Venus" as a palladium.

(6) Of Scotland, the great stone of Scone, near Perth, which was removed by Edward I. to Westminster, and is still there, preserved in the coronation chair.

(7) Of Troy, a colossal wooden statue of Pallas Minerva, which "fell from heaven." It was carried off by Ulysses and Diomede, by whom the city was taken and burned to the ground.

Pallet, a painter, "without any reverence for the courtesies of life." In Smollett's novel of Peregrine Pickle (1751).

The absurdities of Pallet are painted an inch thick, and by no human possibility could such an accumulation of comic disasters have befallen the characters of the tale.

Palm Sunday (Sad), March 29, 1461, the day of the battle of Towton, the most fatal of any domestic war ever fought. It is said that 37,000 Englishmen fell on this day.

> Whose banks receiv'd the blood of many thousand men
> On "sad Palm Sunday" slain, that Towton field we call . . .
> The bloodiest field betwixt the White Rose and the Red.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, xxviii. (1622).

Palmer (Roundell), earl of Selborne, of Mixbury, in Oxfordshire (1812-1894). His Memorials (part i.), 1896, were edited by lady Sophia Palmer.

Pal'merin of England, the hero and title of a romance in chivalry. There is also an inferior one entitled Palmerin de Oliva.

> The next two books were Palmerin de Oliva and Palmerin of England. "The former," said the curé, "shall be torn in pieces and burnt to the last ember; but Palmerin of England shall be preserved as a relique of antiquity, and placed in such a chest as Alexander found amongst the spoils of Darius, and in which he kept the writings of Homer. This same book is valuable for two things: first, for its own especial excellency, and next, because it is the production of a Portuguese monarch, famous for his literary talents. The adventures of the castle of Miraguarda therein are finely imagined, the style of composition is natural and elegant, and the utmost decorum is preserved throughout."
> —Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. i. 6 (1605).

Palmi'ra, daughter of Alcānor chief of Mecca. She and her brother Zaphna were taken captives in infancy, and brought up by Mahomet. As they grew in years, they fell in love with each other, not knowing their relationship; but when Mahomet laid siege to Mecca, Zaphna was appointed to assassinate Alcanor, and was himself afterwards killed by poison. Mahomet then proposed marriage to Palmīra, but to prevent such an alliance, she killed herself.—James Miller: Mahomet the Impostor (1740).

Palmyra of the Deccan, Bijapur, in the Poonah district.

Palmyra of the North, St. Petersburg.

Pal'myrene (The), Zenobia queen of Palmyra, who claimed the title of "Queen of the East." She was defeated by Aurelian, and taken prisoner (A.D. 273). Longinus lived at her court, and was put to death on the capture of Zenobia.

The Palmyrene that fought Aurelian.
Tennyson: The Princess, ll. (1849).

Pal'omides (Sir), son and heir of sir Astlabor. His brothers were sir Safire and sir Segwar'idês. He is always called the Saracen, meaning "unchristened." Next to the three great knights (sir Launcelot, sir Tristram, and sir Lamorake), he was the strongest and bravest of the fellowship of the Round Table. Like sir Tristram, he was in love with La Belle Isond wife of king Mark of Cornwall; but the lady favoured the love of sir Tristram, and only despised that of the Saracen knight. After his combat with sir Tristram, sir Palomides consented to be baptized by the bishop of Carlisle (pt. iii. 26).

He was well made, cleanly, and bigly, and neither too young nor too old. And though he was not christened, yet he believed in the best manners, and was faithful and true to his promise, and also well conditioned. He made a vow that he would never be christened unto the time that he achieved the beast Glatisaint. . . . And also he avowed never to take full christendom unto the time that he had done seven battles within the lists.—Malory: History of Prince Arthur, ll. 149 (1470).

Pam, Henry John Temple, viscount Palmerston (1784-1865). Knave of clubs is called "Pam" in the game of "loo."

Pam'ela. Lady Edward Fitzgerald is so called (*-1831).

Pam'ela [ANDREWS], a simple, unsophistical country girl, the daughter of two aged parents, and maidservant of a rich young squire, called B, who tries to seduce her. She resists every temptation, and at length marries the young squire and reforms him. Pamela is very pure and modest, bears her afflictions with much meekness, and is a model of maidenly prudence and rectitude. The story is told in a series of letters which Pamela sends to her parents.—Richardson: Pamela or Virtue Rewarded (1740).

The pure and modest character of the English maiden [Pamela] is so well maintained, . . . her sorrows and afflictions are borne with so much meekness; her little intervals of hope . . . break in on her troubles so much like the specks of blue sky through a cloudy atmosphere,—that the whole recollection is soothing, tranquillizing, and doubtless edifying.—Sir W. Scott.

Pamela is a work of much humbler pretensions than Clarissa Harlowe. . . A simple country girl, whom her master attempts to seduce, and afterwards marries. . . . The wardrobe of poor Pamela, her gown of sad-coloured stuff, and her round-eared caps; her various attempts at escape, and the conveyance of her letters; the hateful character of Mrs. Jewkes, and the fluctuating passions of her master before the better part of his nature obtains ascendancy,—these are all touched with the hand of a master.—Chambers: English Literature, ll. 161.

 Pope calls the word "Pamëla"—

The gods, to curse Pamëla with her prayers,
Gave the gilt coach and dappled Flanders mares,
The shining robes, rich jewels, beds of state,
And, to complete her bliss, a fool for mate.
She glares in balls, front boxes, and the ring,
A vain, unquiet, glittering, wretched thing;
Pride, pomp, and state, but reach her outward part,—
She sighs, and is no duchess at her heart.
Epistles ("To Mrs. Blount, with the work of Voiture," 1709).

Pami'na and Tami'no, the two lovers who were guided by "the magic flute" through all worldly dangers to the knowledge of divine truth (or the mysteries of Isis).—Mozart: Die Zauberflöte (1790).

Pamphlet (Mr.), a penny-a-liner. His great wish was "to be taken up for sedition." He writes on both sides, for, as he says, he has "two hands, ambo dexter."

"Time has been," he says, "when I could turn a penny by an earthquake, or live upon a jail distemper, or dine upon a bloody murder; but now that's all over—nothing will do now but roasting a minister, or telling the people they are ruined. The people of England are never so happy as when you tell them they are ruined."—Murphy: The Upholsterer, ll. 1 (1758).

PAN, Nature personified, especially the vital crescent power of nature.

Universal Pan,
Knit with the Graces and the Hours in dance,
Led on the eternal spring.
Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 266, etc. (1665).

Pan, in Spenser's ecl. iv., is Henry VIII., and "Syrinx" is Anne Boleyn. In ecl. v. "Pan" stands for Jesus Christ in one passage, and for God the Father in another. — Spenser: Shepheardes Calendar (1572).

Pan (The Dead), a poem by Mrs. Browning (1844), founded on the legend that when Christ died on the cross a cry swept across the sea that "Great Pan is dead!"

Pan (The Great), François M. A. de Voltaire; also called "The Dictator of Letters" (1694-1778).

Panaceas.

(1) Ahmad's apple, or the apple of Samarcand. (See p. 16.)
(2) Aladdin's ring was a preservative against all the ills that flesh is heir to. (See p. 18.)
(3) Balsam of Fierabras (The). (See p. 85.)
(4) Panthera's horne (q.v.).
(5) Unguent of Prometheus (The) rendered the body invulnerable.

¶ Thetis dipped Achilles in the river Styx, and every part of his body which the water touched was rendered invulnerable. (See ACHILLES' HEEL, p. 5; PRIAMUS, p. 870.)

∴ Then there were the Youth Restorers; the healers of wounds, such as Achilles' spear, and the spear of Telephus (see SPEAR), Gilbert's sword and cere-cloth (see GILBERT, p. 422) (see OLD AGE RESTORED TO YOUTH, 772); and many others.

Pancaste (3 syl.) or CAMPASPE, one of the concubines of Alexander the Great. Apellês fell in love with her while he was employed in painting the king of Macedon, and Alexander, out of regard to the artist, gave her to him for a wife. Apellês selected for his "Venus Rising from the Sea" (usually called "Venus Anadyomênê") this beautiful Athenian woman, together with Phrynê another courtezan.

(Phrynê was also the academy figure for the "Cnidian Venus" of Praxitêlês.)

Pancha Tantra, a collection of Hindû fables (sixth century B.C.).

Pancks, a quick, short, eager, dark man, with too much "way." He dressed in black and rusty iron grey; had jet-black beads for eyes, a scrubby little black chin, wiry black hair striking out from his head in prongs like hair-pins, and a complexion that was very dingy by nature, or very dirty by art, or a compound of both. He had dirty hands, and dirty, broken nails, and looked as if he had been in the coals. He snorted and sniffed, and puffed and blew, and was generally in a perspiration. It was Mr. Pancks who "moled out" the secret that Mr. Dorrit, imprisoned for debt in the Marshalsea prison, was heir-at-law to a great estate, which had long lain unclaimed, and was extremely rich (ch. xxxv.). Mr. Pancks also induced Clennam to invest in Merdle's bank shares, and demonstrated by figures the profit he would realize; but, the bank being a bubble, the shares were worthless.—Dickens: Little Dorrit (1857).

Pancrace, a doctor of the Aristotelian school. He maintained that it was improper to speak of the "form of a hat," because form "est la disposition extérieure des corps qui sont animés;" and therefore we should say the "figure of a hat," because figure "est la disposition extérieure des corps qui sont inanimés." And because his adversary could not agree, he called him "un ignorant, un ignorantissime, ignorantifiant, et ignorantifié" (sc. viii.). — Molière: Le Mariage Forcé (1664).

Pancras (The earl of), one of the skilful companions of Barlow the famous archer; another was called "the marquis of Islington;" while Barlow himself was mirthfully created by Henry VIII. "duke of Shoreditch."

Pancras (St.), patron saint of children, martyred by Diocletian at the age of 14 (A.D. 304).

Pan'darus, the Lycian, one of the allies of Priam in the Trojan war. He is drawn under two widely different characters: In classic story he is depicted as an admirable archer, slain by Diomed, and honoured as a hero-god in his own country; but in mediæval romance he is represented as a despicable pimp, insomuch that the word pander is derived from his name. Chaucer in his Troilus and Cresseide, and Shakespeare in his drama of Troilus and Cressida, represent him as procuring for Troilus the good graces of Cressid, and in Much Ado about Nothing, it is said that Troilus "was the first employer of pandars."

> Let all pitiful goers-between be called to the world's end after my name; call them all "Pandars." Let all constant men be "Troiluses," all false women "Cressids."—Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, act iii. sc. 2 (1602).

Pandemo'nium, "the high capital of Satan and his peers." Here the infernal parliament was held, and to this council Satan summoned the fallen angels to consult with him upon the best method of encompassing the "fall of man." Satan ultimately undertook to visit the new world; and, in the disguise of a serpent, he tempted Eve to eat of the forbidden fruit.—Milton: Paradise Lost ii. (1665).

Pandi'on, king of Athens, father of Procnê and Philome'la.

> None take pity on thy pain;
> Senseless trees, they cannot hear thee;
> Ruthless beasts, they will not cheer thee;
> King Pandion he is dead;
> All thy friends are lapped in lead.
> Barnfield: Address to the Nightingale (1594).

Pandolf (Sir Harry), the teller of whole strings of stories, which he repeats at every gathering. He has also a stock of bon-mots. "Madam," said he, "I have lost by you to-day." "How so, sir Harry?" replies the lady. "Why, madam," rejoins the baronet, "I have lost an excellent appetite." "This is the thirty-third time that sir Harry hath been thus arch."

We are constantly, after supper, entertained with the Glastonbury Thorn. When we have wondered at that a little, "Father," saith the son, "let us have the Spirit in the Wood." After that, "Now tell us how you served the robber." "Alack!" saith sir Harry, with a smile, "I have almost forgotten that; but it is a pleasant conceit, to be sure;" and accordingly he tells that and twenty more in the same order over and over again.—Steele.

Pandolfe (2 syl.), father of Lélie.—Molière: L'Etourdi (1653).

Pando'ra, the "all-gifted woman." So called because all the gods bestowed some gift on her to enhance her charms. Jove sent her to Prometheus for a wife, but Hermês gave her in marriage to his brother Epime'theus (4 syl.). It is said that Pandora enticed the curiosity of Epimetheus to open a box in her possession, from which flew out all the ills that flesh is heir to. Luckily the lid was closed in time to prevent the escape of Hope.

More lovely than Pandora, whom the gods
Endowed with all their gifts, . . . to the unwiser sent
Of Japhet brought by Hermês, she insnared
Mankind with her fair looks, to be avenged
On him [Promêtheus] who had stole Jove's . . . fire.
Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 714, etc. (1665).

("Unwiser son" is a Latinism, and means "not so wise as he should have been;" so audacior, timidior, vehementior, iracundior, etc.)

Pandosto or The Triumph of Time, a tale by Robert Greene (1588), the quarry of the plot of The Winter's Tale by Shakespeare.

Panel (The), by J. Kemble, is a modified version of Bickerstaff's comedy 'Tis Well 'tis no Worse. It contains the popular quotation—

Perhaps it was right to dissemble your love;
But why do you kick me downstairs?

Pangloss (Dr. Peter), an LL.D. and A.S.S. He began life as a muffin-maker in Milk Alley. Daniel Dowlas, when he was raised from the chandler's shop in Gosport to the peerage, employed the doctor "to larn him to talk English;" and subsequently made him tutor to his son Dick, with a salary of £300 a year. Dr. Pangloss was a literary prig of ponderous pomposity. He talked of a "locomotive morning," of one's "sponsorial and patronymic appellations," and so on; was especially fond of quotations, to all of which he appended the author, as "Lend me your ears,—Shakespeare. Hem!" or "Verbum sat,—Horace. Hem!" He also indulged in an affected "He! he!"—Colman: The Heir-at-Law (1797).

N.B.—A.S.S. stands for Artium Societatis Socius ("Fellow of the Society of Arts").

Pangloss, an optimist philosopher. (The word means "All Tongue.")—Voltaire: Candide.

Panjam, a male idol of the Oroungou tribes of Africa; his wife is Alêka, and his priests are called panjans. Panjam is the special protector of kings and governments.

Panjandrum (The Grand), any village potentate or Brummagem magnate. The word occurs in Foote's farrago of nonsense, which he wrote to test the memory of old Macklin, who said in a lecture "he had brought his own memory to such perfection that he could learn anything by rote on once hearing it."

He was the Great Panjandrum of the place.—Fitzgerald.

 The squire of a village is the Grand Panjandrum, and the small gentry the Picninnies, Joblillies, and Garyulies.

Foote's nonsense lines are these—

So she went into the garden to cut a cabbage leaf to make an apple pie; and at the same time a great she-bear, coming up the street, pops its head into the shop. "What! no soap!" So he died, and she very imprudently married the barber; and there were present the Picninnies, and the Joblillies, and the Garyulies, and the Grand Panjandrum himself, with the little round button at top, and they all fell to playing the game of catch as catch can, till the gunpowder ran out at the heel of their boots.—Foote: The Quarterly Review, xcv. 516, 517 (1854).

Pan'ope (3 syl.), one of the nereids. Her "sisters" are the sea-nymphs. Panopê was invoked by sailors in storms.

Sleek Panope with all her sisters played.
Milton: Lycidas, 95 (1638).

Pantag'ruel', king of the Dipsodes (2 syl.), son of Gargantua, and last of the race of giants. His mother Badebec died in giving him birth. His paternal grandfather was named Grangousier. Pantagruel was a lineal descendant of Fierabras, the Titans, Goliath, Polypheme (3 syl.), and all the other giants traceable to Chalbrook, who lived in that extraordinary period noted for its "week of three Thursdays." The word is a hybrid, compounded of the Greek panta ("all") and the Hagarene word gruel ("thirsty"). His immortal achievement was his "quest of the oracle of the Holy Bottle."—Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel, ii. (1533).

(The romance, originally written in French, was translated into English by Urquhart and Motteux in 1653.)

Pantag'ruel's Course of Study. Pantagruel's father, Gargantua, said in a letter to his son—

"I intend and insist that you learn all languages perfectly; first of all Greek, in Quintilian's method; then Latin, then Hebrew, then Arabic and Chaldee. I wish you to form your style of Greek on the model of Plato, and of Latin on that of Cicero. Let there be no history you have not at your fingers' ends, and study thoroughly cosmography and geography. Of liberal arts, such as geometry, mathematics, and music, I gave you a taste when not above five years old, and I would have you now master them fully. Study astronomy, but not divination and judicial astrology, which I consider mere vanities. As for civil law, I would have thee know the digests by heart. You should also have a perfect knowledge of the works of Nature, so that there is no sea, river, or smallest stream, which you do not know for what fish it is noted, whence it proceeds, and whither it directs its course; all fowls of the air, all shrubs and trees whether forest or orchard, all herbs and flowers, all metals and stones, should be mastered by you. Fail not at the same time most carefully to peruse the Talmudists and Cabalists, and be sure by frequent anatomies to gain a perfect knowledge of that other world called the microcosm, which is man. Master all these in your young days, and let nothing be superficial; as you grow into manhood you must learn chivalry, warfare, and field manœuvres."—Rabelais: Pantagruel, ii. 8 (1533).

Pantag'ruel's Tongue. It formed shelter for a whole army. His throat and mouth contained whole cities.

Then did they [the army] put themselves in close order, and stood as near to each other as they could, and Pantagruel put out his tongue half-way, and covered them all, as a hen doth her chickens.—Rabelais: Pantagruel, ii. 32 (1533).

Pantagruelian Lawsuit (The). This was between lord Busqueue and lord Suckfist, who pleaded their own cases. The writs, etc., were as much as four asses could carry. After the plaintiff and defendant had stated their cases, Pantagruel gave judgment, and the two suitors were both satisfied, for no one understood a word of the pleadings, or the tenor of the verdict.—Rabelais: Pantagruel, ii. (1533).

Pantagrue'lion, a herb (hemp), symbolical of persecution. Rabelais says Pantag'ruel' was the inventor of a certain use for which this herb served. It was, he says, exceedingly hateful to felons, who detested it as much as strangle-weed.

The figure and shape of the leaves of pantagruelion are not much unlike those of the ash tree or the agrimony; indeed, the herb is so like the eupatorio that many herbalists have called it the domestic eupatorio, and sometimes the eupatorio is called the wild pantagruelion.—Rabelais: Pantagruel, etc., iii. 49 (1545).

Pantaloon. In the Italian comedy, Il Pantalo'ne is a thin, emaciated old man, and the only character that acts in slippers.

The sixth age shifts
Into the lean and slippered Pantaloon.
Shakespeare: As You Like It, act ii. sc. 7 (1600).

Panthea, the heroine of Beaumont and Fletcher's King and No King. An innocent creature enough, but only milk-and-water (1619).

Panther (The), symbol of pleasure. When Dante began the ascent of fame, this beast met him, and tried to stop him.

Scarce the ascent
Began, when lo! a panther, nimble, light,
And covered with a speckled skin, appeared,
. . . and strove to check my onward going.
Dante: Hell, i. (1300).

Panther (The Spotted), the Church of England. The "milk-white hind" is the Church of Rome.

The panther, sure the noblest next the hind,
The fairest creature of the spotted kind;
Oh, could her inborn stains be washed away,
She were too good to be a beast of prey.
Dryden: The Hind and the Panther, i. (1687).

Pan'thera, a hypothetical beast which lived "in the East." Reynard affirmed that he sent her majesty, the lioness, a comb made of panthera bone, "more lustrous than the rainbow, more odoriferous than any perfume, a charm against every ill, and a universal panacea."—Reynard the Fox (1498). (See PANACEAS, p. 799.)

Panthino, servant of Anthonio (the father of Protheus, one of the two heroes of the play).—Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona (1594).

Panton, a celebrated punster in the reign of Charles II.

And Panton waging harmless war with words.
Dryden: MacFlecknoe (1682).

Pantschatantra, a collection of Sanskrit fables.

Panurge, a young man, handsome and of good stature, but in very ragged apparel when Pantag'ruel' first met him on the road leading from Charenton Bridge. Pantagruel, pleased with his person and moved with pity at his distress, accosted him, when Panurge replied, first in German, then in Arabic, then in Italian, then in Biscayan, then in Bas-Breton, then in Low Dutch, then in Spanish. Finding that Pantagruel knew none of these languages, Panurge tried Danish, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, with no better success. "Friend," said the prince, "can you speak French?" "Right well," answered Panurge, "for I was born in Touraine, the garden of France." Pantagruel then asked him if he would join his suite, which Panurge most gladly consented to do, and became the fast friend of Pantagruel. His great forte was practical jokes. Rabelais describes him as of middle stature, with an aquiline nose, very handsome, and always moneyless. Pantagruel made him governor of Salmygondin.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, iii. 2 (1545).

Panurge throughout is the πανουργια ("the wisdom"), i.e. the cunning of the human animal—the understanding, as the faculty of means to purposes without ultimate ends, in the most comprehensive sense, and including art, sensuous fancy, and all the passions of the understanding.—Coleridge.

Panyer's Alley (London). So called from a stone built into the wall of one of the houses. The stone, on which is rudely chiselled a pannier surmounted by a boy, contains this distich—

When you have sought the city round,
Yet still this is the highest ground.

Panza (Sancho), of Adzpetia, the 'squire of don Quixote de la Mancha; "a little squat fellow, with a tun belly and spindle shanks" (pt. I. ii. 1). He rides an ass named Dapple. His sound common sense is an excellent foil to the knight's craze. Sancho is very fond of eating and drinking; and is perpetually asking the knight when he is to be put in possession of the promised island. He salts his speech with most pertinent proverbs, and even with wit of a racy, though sometimes of a somewhat vulgar savour.—Cervantes: Don Quixote (1605).

 The wife of Sancho is called "Joan Panza" in pt. I., and "Teresa Panza" in pt. II. "My father's name," she says to Sancho, "was Cascajo, and I, by being your wife, am now called Teresa Panza, though by right I should be called Teresa Cascajo" (pt. II. i. 5).

Paolo (3 syl.), the brother of count Guido Franceschi'ni. Paolo advised him to marry an heiress, in order to repair his fortune.

. . . a shrewd younger poorer brother yet,
The Abate Paolo, a regular priest.
R. Browning: The King and the Book, ii. 290.

Paper King (The), John Law, projector of the South Sea bubble (1671-1729).

The basis of Law's project was the idea that paper money may be multiplied to any extent, provided there be security in fixed stock.—Rich.

Paphian Mimp, a certain plie of the lips, considered needful for "the highly genteel." Lady Emily told Miss Alscrip "the heiress" that it was acquired by placing one's self before a looking-glass, and repeating continually the words "nimini pimini;" "when the lips cannot fail to take the right plie."—Burgoyne: The Heiress, iii. 2 (1781).

(C. Dickens has made Mrs. General tell Amy Dorrit that the pretty plie is given to the lips by pronouncing the words, "papa, potatoes, poultry, prunes, and prism.")

Papillon, a broken-down critic, who earned four shillings a week for reviews of translations "without knowing one syllable of the original," and of "books which he had never read." He then turned French valet, and got well paid. He then fell into the service of Jack Wilding, and was valey, French marquis, or anything else to suit the whims of that young scapegrace.—Foote: The Liar (1761).

Papimany, the kingdom of the Papimans. Any priest-ridden country, as Spain. Papiman is compounded of two Greek words, papa mania ("pope-madness").—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, iv. 45 (1545).

Papy'ra, goddess of printing and literature; so called from papyrus, a substance once used for books, before the invention of paper.

Till to astonished realms Papyra taught
To paint in mystic colours sound and thought,
With Wisdom's voice to print the page sublime,
And mark in a lamant the steps of Time.
Darwin: Loves of the Plants, ii. (1781).

Pa'quin, Pekin, a royal city of China. Milton says, "Paquin [the throne] of Sinæan kings."—Paradise Lost, xi. 390 (1665).

Paracelsus is said to have kept a small devil prisoner in the pommel of his sword. He favoured for medicines metallic substances, while Galen preferred herbs. His full name was Philippus Aure'olus Theophrastus Paracelsus, but his family name was Bombastus (1493-1541).

Paracelsus, at the age of 20, thinks knowledge the summum bonum, and at the advice of his two friends, Festus and Michal, retires to a seat of learning in quest thereof. Eight years later, being dissatisfied, he falls in with Aprile, an Italian poet, and resolves to seek the summum bonum in love. Again he fails, and, when dying in a cell in the hospital of St. Sebastion, deserted by all but Festus, he declares the summum bonum to be, love and power. "To see good in evil, and a hope in ill-success."—R. Browning: Paracelsus.

Par'adine (3 syl.), son of Astolpho, and brother of Dargonet, both rivals for the love of Laura. In the combat provoked by prince Oswald against Gondibert, which was decided by four combatants on each side, Hugo "the Little" slew both the brothers.—Davenant: Gondibert, i. (died 1668).

Paradisa'ica ["the fruit of paradise"]. So the banana is called. The Mohammedans aver that the "forbidden fruit" was the banana or Indian fig, and cite in confirmation of this opinion that our first parents used fig leaves for their covering after their fall.

Paradise, in thirty-three cantos, by Dantê (1311). Paradise is separated from Purgatory by the river Lethê; and Dantê was conducted through nine of the spheres by Beatrice, who left him in the sphere of "unbodied light," under the charge of St. Bernard (canto xxxi.). The entire region is divided into ten spheres, each of which is appropriated to its proper order. The first seven spheres are the seven planets, viz. (1) the Moon for angels, (2) Mercury for archangels, (3) Venus for virtues, (4) the Sun for powers, (5) Mars for principalities, (6) Jupiter for dominions, (7) Saturn for thrones. The eighth sphere is that of the fixed stars for the cherubim; the ninth is the primum mobîlê for the seraphim; and the tenth is the empyre'an for the Virgin Mary and the triune deity. Beatrice, with Rachel, Sarah, Judith, Rebecca, and Ruth, St. Augustin, St. Francis, St. Benedict, and others, were enthroned in Venus the sphere of the virtues. The empyrean, he says, is a sphere of "unbodied light," "bright effluence of bright essence, uncreate." This is what the Jews called "the heaven of the heavens."

Paradise was placed, in the legendary maps of the Middle Ages, in Ceylon; but Mahomet placed it "in the seventh heaven." The Arabs have a tradition that when our first parents were cast out of the garden, Adam fell in the isle of Ceylon, and Eve in Joddah (the port of Mecca).—Al Korân, ii.

Paradise of Central Africa, Fatiko.—Baker: Exploration of the Nile Sources (1866).

Paradise of Bohemia, the district round Leitmeritz.

The Dutch Paradise, the province of Gelderland, in South Holland.

The Portuguese Paradise, Cintra, north-west of Lisbon.

Paradise of Fools (Limbus Fatuorum), the limbo of all vanities, idiots, madmen, and those of mature age not accountable for their ill deeds.

> Then might ye see
> Cowls, hoods, and habits, with their wearers, tost
> And fluttered into rags; then relics, beads,
> Indulgences, dispenses, pardons, bulls,
> The sport of winds: all these, upwhirled aloft,
> Fly . . . into a limbo large and broad, since called
> "The Paradise of Fools."
> Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 489 (1665).

Paradise and the Pe'ri. A peri was told she would be admitted into heaven if she would bring thither the gift most acceptable to the Almighty. She first brought a drop of a young patriot's blood, shed on his country's behalf; but the gates would not open for such an offering. She next took thither the last sigh of a damsel who had died nursing her betrothed, who had been stricken by the plague; but the gates would not open for such an offering. She then carried up the repentant tear of an old man converted by the prayers of a little child. All heaven rejoiced, the gates were flung open, and the peri was received with a joyous welcome.—Moore: Lalla Rookh ("Second Tale," 1817).

Paradise Lost. Satan and his crew, still suffering from their violent expulsion out of heaven, are roused by Satan's telling them about a "new creation;" and he calls a general council to deliberate upon their future operations (bk. i.). The council meet in the Pandemonium hall, and it is resolved that Satan shall go on a voyage of discovery to this "new world" (bk. ii.). The Almighty sees Satan, and confers with His Son about man. He foretells the Fall, and arranges the scheme of man's redemption. Meantime, Satan enters the orb of the sun, and there learns the route to the "new world" (bk. iii.). On entering Paradise, he overhears Adam and Eve talking of the one prohibition (bk. iv.). Raphael is now sent down to warn Adam of his danger, and he tells him who Satan is (bk. v.); describes the war in heaven, and the expulsion of the rebel angels (bk. vi.). The angel visitant goes on to tell Adam why and how this world was made (bk. vii.); and Adam tells Raphael of his own experience (bk. viii.). After the departure of Raphael, Satan enters into a serpent, and, seeing Eve alone, speaks to her. Eve is astonished to hear the serpent talk, but is informed that it had tasted of "the tree of knowledge," and had become instantly endowed with both speech and wisdom. Curiosity induces Eve to taste the same fruit, and she persuades Adam to taste it also (bk. ix.). Satan now returns to hell, to tell of his success (bk. x.). Michael is sent to expel Adam and Eve from the garden (bk. xi.); and the poem concludes with the expulsion, and Eve's lamentation (bk. xii.).—Milton (1665).

(Paradise Lost was first published by Matthias Walker of St. Dunstan's. He gave for it £5 down; on the sale of 1300 copies, he gave another £5. On the next two impressions, he gave other like sums. For the four editions, he therefore paid £20. The agreement between Walker and Milton is preserved in the British Museum.)

∴ It must be remembered that the wages of an ordinary workman was at the time about 3*d.* a day, and we now give 3*s.*; so that the price given was equal to about £250, according to the present value of money. Goldsmith tells us that the clergyman of his "deserted village" was "passing rich" with £40 a year = £500 present value of money.

Paradise Regained, in four books. The subject is the Temptation. Eve, being tempted, lost paradise; Christ, being tempted, regained it.

Book I. Satan presents himself as an old peasant; and, entering into conversation with Jesus, advises him to satisfy His hunger by miraculously converting stones into bread. Jesus gives the tempter to know that He recognizes him, and refuses to follow his suggestion.

II. Satan reports progress to his ministers, and asks advice. He returns to the wilderness, and offers Jesus wealth, as the means of acquiring power, but the suggestion is again rejected.

III. Satan shows Jesus several of the kingdoms of Asia, and points out to Him their military power. He advises Him to seek alliance with the Parthians, and promises his aid. He says by such alliance He might shake off the Roman yoke, and raise the kingdom of David to a first-class power. Jesus rejects the counsel, and tells the tempter that the Jews were for the present under a cloud for their sins, but that the time would come when God would put forth His hand on their behalf.

IV. Satan shows Jesus Rome, with all its greatness, and says, "I can easily dethrone Tiberius, and seat Thee on the imperial throne." He then shows Him Athens, and says, "I will make Thee master of their wisdom and high state of civilization, if Thou wilt fall down and worship me." "Get thee behind Me, Satan!" was the indignant answer; and Satan, finding all his endeavours useless, tells Jesus of the sufferings prepared for Him, takes Him back to the wilderness, and leaves Him there; but angels come and minister unto Him. —Milton (1671).

Paraguay (A Tale of), by Southey, in four cantos, Spenserian metre (1814). The small-pox, having broken out amongst the Guarānis, carried off the whole tribe except Quiāra and his wife Monnĕma, who then migrated from the fatal spot to the Mondai woods. Here a son (Yerūti) and afterwards a daughter (Mooma) were born; but before the birth of the latter, the father was eaten by a jagŭar. When the children were of a youthful age, a Jesuit priest induced the three to come and live at St. Joăchin (3 syl.); so they left the wild woods for a city life. Here, in a few months, the mother flagged and died. The daughter next drooped, and soon followed her mother to the grave. The son, now the only remaining one of the entire race, begged to be baptized, received the rite, cried, "Ye are come for me! I am ready;" and died also.

Parallel. "None but itself can be its parallel," from The Double Falsehood, iii. 1, by Theobald (1721). Massinger, in The Duke of Milan, iv. 3 (1662), makes Sforza say of Marelia—

> Her goodness does disdain comparison,
> And, but herself, admits no parallel.

It had been previously said of John Lilburn—

> None but himself himself can parallel.
> Anagram on John Lilburn (1658).

Parc aux Cerfs ["the deer park"], a mansion in Versailles, to which girls were inveigled for the licentious pleasure of Louis XV. An Alsatia.

> Boulogne may be proud of being the parc aux cerfs to those whom remorseless greed drives from their island homes.—Saturday Review.

Par'cinus, a young prince in love with his cousin Irolit'a, but beloved by Az'ira. The fairy Danamo was Azira's mother, and resolved to make Irolita marry the fairy Brutus, but Parcinus, aided by the fairy Favourable, surmounted all obstacles, married Irolita, and made Brutus marry Azira.

> Parcinus had a noble air, a delicate shape, a fine head of hair admirably white. . . . He did everything well, danced and sang to perfection, and gained all the prizes at tournaments, whenever he contended for them.—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Perfect Love," 1682).

Par'dalo, the demon-steed given to Iniguex Guerra by his gobelin mother, that he might ride to Tolēdo and liberate his father, don Diego Lopez lord of Biscay, who had fallen into the hands of the Moors.—Spanish Story.

Par'diggle (Mrs.), a formidable lady, who conveyed to one the idea "of wanting a great deal of room." She devoted herself to good works done in the most offensive and disagreeable manner, and made her family of small boys contribute all their pocket money to the cause of missions.—Dickens: Bleak House (1853).

Pardoner's Tale (The), in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, is "Death and the Rioters." Three rioters agree to hunt down Death, and kill him. An old man directs them to a tree in a lane, where, as he said, he had just left him. On reaching the spot, they find a rich treasure, and cast lots to decide who is to go and buy food. The lot falls on the youngest, and the other two, during his absence, agree to kill him on his return. The rascal sent to buy food poisons the wine, in order to secure to himself the whole treasure. Now comes the catastrophe: The two set on the third and slay him, but die soon after of the poisoned wine; so the three rioters find death under the tree, as the old man said, paltering in a double sense (1388).

Parian Chronicle, a register of the chief events in the history of ancient Greece for 1318 years, beginning with the reign of Cecrops and ending with the archonship of Diognētus. It is one of the Arundelian Marbles, and was found in the island of Paros.

Parian Verse; ill-natured satire; so called from Archil'ochus, a native of Paros.

Pari-Ba'nou, a fairy who gave prince Ahmed a tent, which would fold into so small a compass that a lady might carry it about as a toy; but, when spread, it would cover a whole army.—Arabian Nights ("Prince Ahmed and Pari-Banou").

Paridel is a name employed in the Dunciad for an idle libertine,—rich, young, and at leisure. The model is sir Paridel, in the Faërie Queene.

> Thee, too, my Paridel, she marked thee there,
> Stretched on the rack of a too-easy chair,
> And heard thy everlasting yawn confess
> The pains and penalties of idleness.
> Pope: The Dunciad, iv. 341 (1742).

Par'idel (Sir), descendant of Paris, Paris's son Parius settled in Paros, and left his kingdom to his son Par'idas, from whom Paridel descended. Having gained the hospitality of Malbecco, sir Paridel eloped with his wife Dame Hel'inore (3 syl.), but soon quitted her, leaving her to go whither she would. "So had he served many another one" (bk. iii. 10). In bk. iv. 1 sir Paridel is discomfited by sir Scudamore.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iii. 10; iv. 1 (1590, 1596).

("Sir Paridel" is meant for Charles Nevil, sixth and last of the Nevils earls of Westmoreland. He joined the Northumberland rebellion of 1569 for the restoration of Mary queen of Scots; and, when the plot failed, made his escape to the Continent, where he lived in poverty and obscurity. The earl was quite a Lothario, whose delight was to win the love of women, and then to abandon them.)

PARIS, a son of Priam and Hecŭba, noted for his beauty. He married Œnōnē, daughter of Cebren the river-god. Subsequently, during a visit to Menelāos king of Sparta, he eloped with queen Helen, and this brought about the Trojan war. Being wounded by an arrow from the bow of Philoctētēs, he sent for his wife, who hastened to him with remedies; but it was too late—he died of his wound, and Œnonē hung herself.—Homer: Iliad.

Paris was appointed to decide which of the three goddesses (Juno, Pallas, or Minerva) was the fairest fair, and to which should be awarded the golden apple thrown "to the most beautiful." The three goddesses tried by bribes to obtain the verdict: Juno promised him dominion if he would decide in her favour; Minerva promised him wisdom; but Venus said she would find him the most beautiful of women for wife, if he allotted to her the apple. Paris handed the apple to Venus.

> Not Cytherea from a fairer swain
> Received her apple on the Trojan plain.
> Falconer: The Shipwreck, L. 3 (1756).

Paris, a young nobleman, kinsman of prince Es'calus of Verona, and the unsuccessful suitor of his cousin Juliet.—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet (1598).

Paris (Notre Dame de), by Victor Hugo (1831). (See ESMERALDA and QUASIMODO.)

Paris in France. The French say, Il n'y a que Paris ("There is but one city in the world worth seeing, and that is Paris"). The Neapolitans have a similar phrase, Voir Naples et mourir.

The Paris of Japan, Osāka, south-west of Miako.—Gibson: Gallery of Geography, 926 (1872).

Little Paris. Brussels is so called. So is the "Galleria Vittorio Emanuele" of Milan, on account of its brilliant shops, its numerous cafés, and its general gaiety.

Paris Garden, a bear-garden on the south bank of the Thames; so called from Robert de Paris, whose house and garden were there in the time of Richard II.

Do you take the court for Paris Garden?—Shakespeare: Henry VIII. act v. sc. 4 (1601).

Parisina, wife of Azo chief of Ferrara. She had been betrothed before her marriage to Hugo, a natural son of Azo, and after Azo took her for his bride, the attachment of Parisina and Hugo continued, and had freer scope for indulgence. One night, Azo heard Parisina in sleep confess her love for Hugo, whereupon he had his son beheaded, and, though he spared the life of Parisina, no one ever knew what became of her.—Byron: Parisina (1816).

 Such is Byron's version; but history says Niccolo III. of Ferrara (Byron's "Azo") had for his second wife Parisina Malatesta, who showed great aversion to Ugo, a natural son of Niccolo, whom he greatly loved. One day, with the hope of lessening this strong aversion, he sent Ugo to escort her on a journey, and the two fell in love with each other. After their return, the affection of Parisina and Ugo continued unabated, and a servant named Zoe'se (3 syl.) having told the marquis of their criminal intimacy, he had the two guilty ones brought to open trial. They were both condemned to death, Ugo was beheaded first, then Parisina. Some time after, Niccolo married a third wife, and had several children.—Frissi: History of Ferrara.

Parish Register (The), a poem by Crabbe, in heroic metre, including the story of Phœbe Dawson (1807).

Parisian Wedding (The). The reference is to the massacre of St. Bartholomew, which took place during the wedding festivities of Henri of Navarre and Marguerite of France.

Charles IX., although it was not possible for him to recall to life the countless victims of the Paris Wedding, was ready to explain those murders to every unprejudiced mind.—Motley: Dutch Republic, iii. 9.

Parisme'nos, the hero of the second part of Parismus (q.v.). This part contains the adventurous travels of Parismenos, his deeds of chivalry, and love for the princess Angelica, "the Lady of the Golden Tower."—Foord: Parismenos (1598).

Paris'mus, a valiant and renowned prince of Bohemia, the hero of a romance so called. This "history" contains an account of his battles against the Persians, his love for Laurana daughter of the king of Thessaly, and his strange adventures in the Desolate Island. The second part contains the exploits and love affairs of Parisme'nos. — Foord: Parismus (1598).

Pariza'de (4 syl.), daughter of Khosrou-schah sultan of Persia, and sister of Bahman and Perviz. These three, in infancy, were sent adrift, each at the time of birth, through the jealousy of their two maternal aunts, who went to nurse the sultana in her confinement; but they were drawn out of the canal by the superintendent of the sultan's gardens, who brought them up. Parizadê rivalled her brothers in horsemanship, archery, running, and literature. One day, a devotee who had been kindly entreated by Parizadê, told her the house she lived in wanted three things to make it perfect: (1) the talking bird, (2) the singing tree, and (3) the gold-coloured water. Her two brothers went to obtain these treasures, but failed. Parizadê then went, and succeeded. The sultan paid them a visit, and the talking bird revealed to him the story of their birth and bringing up. When the sultan heard the infamous tale, he commanded the two sisters to be put to death; and Parizadê, with her two brothers, were then proclaimed the lawful children of the sultan.—Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters," the last story).

¶ The story of Chery and Fairstar, by the comtesse D'Aulnoy, is an imitation of this tale; and introduces the "green bird," the "singing apple," and the "dancing water."

Parley (Peter), Samuel Griswold Goodrich, an American. Above seven millions of his books were in circulation in 1859 (1793–1860).

 Several piracies of this popular name have appeared. Thus, S. Kettell of America pirated the name in order to sell under false colours; Darton and Co. issued a Peter Parley's Annual (1841–1855); Simkins, a Peter Parley's Life of Paul (1845); Bogue, a Peter Parley's Visit to London, etc. (1844); Tegg, several works under the same name; Hodson, a Peter Parley's

Bible Geography (1839); Clements, a Peter Parley's Child's First Step (1839). None of which works were by Goodrich, the real "Peter Parley."

(William Martin was the writer of Darton's "Peter Parley series." George Mogridge wrote several tales under the name of Peter Parley. How far such "false pretences" are justifiable, public opinion must decide.)

Parleyings with Certain People of Importance in their Way. A series of poems by Robert Browning (1887). The "people" are Bernard de Mandeville, Daniel Bartoli, Christopher Smart, George Bubb Dodington, Francis Furini, Gerard de Lairesse, and Charles Avison. The poems are introduced by a prologue, "Apollo and the Fates," and concluded by "A Dialogue between John Fust and his Friends."

Parliament (The Black), a parliament held by Henry VIII. in Bridewell.

(For Addled parliament, Barebone's parliament, the Devil's parliament, the Drunken parliament, the Good parliament, the Long parliament, the Mad parliament, the Pensioner parliament, the Rump parliament, the Running parliament, the Unmerciful parliament, the Useless parliament, the Wonder-making parliament, the parliament of Dunces, etc., see Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 943.)

Parliament of Bees (The), an allegorical masque in rhyme. The characters are all bees with suitable names.—John Day (1640).

Parnassus (in Greek Parnassos), the highest part of a range of mountains north of Delphi, in Greece, chief seat of Apollo and the Muses. Called by poets "double-headed," from its two highest summits, Tithor'ea and Lycor'a. On Lycorea was the Corycian cave, and hence the Muses are called the Corycian nymphs.

> Conquer the severe ascent
> Of high Parnassus.
> Akenside: Pleasures of Imagination, i. (1744).

The Parnassus of Japan, Fusiyama ("rich scholar's peak"). — Gibson's Gallery of Geography, 921 (1872).

Parnelle (Mme.), the mother of Mon. Orgon, and an ultra-admirer of Tartuffe, whom she looks on as a saint. In the adaptation of Molière's comedy by Isaac Bickerstaff, Mme. Parnelle is called "old lady Lambert;" her son, "sir John Lambert;" and Tartuffe, "Dr. Cantwell."—Molière: Tartuffe (1664); Bickerstaff. The Hypocrite (1768).

(The Nonjuror, by Cibber (1706), was the quarry of Bickerstaff's play.)

Parody (Father of), Hippo'nax of Ephesus (sixth century B.C.).

Parol'les (3 syl.), a boastful, cowardly follower of Bertram count of Rousillon. His utterances are racy enough, but our contempt for the man smothers our mirth, and we cannot laugh. In one scene the bully is taken blindfold among his old acquaintances, who he is led to suppose are his enemies, and he vilifies their characters to their faces in most admired foolery. — Shakespeare: All's Well that Ends Well (1598).

> He [Dr. Parr] was a mere Parolles in a pedagogue's wig.—Noctes Ambrosianæ.

¶ For similar tongue-doughty heroes, see BASILISCO, BESSUS, BLUFF, BOBADIL, BOROUGHCLIFF, BRAZEN, FLASH, PISTOL, PYRGO POLINICES, SCARAMOUCH, THRASO, VINCENT DE LA ROSA, etc.

Parpaillons (King of the), the father of Gargamelle "a jolly pug and well-mouthed wench." Gargamelle (3 syl.) married Grangousier "in the vigour of his age," and she became mother of Gargantua.—Rabelais: Gargantua, i. 3 (1533).

Parr (Old). Thomas Parr, we are told, lived in the reign of ten sovereigns. He married his second wife when he was 120 years old, and had a child by her. He was a husbandman, born at Salop, in 1483, and died 1635, aged 152. (See LONGEVITY.)

Parricide (The Beautiful), Beatrice Cenci, who is said to have murdered her father for the incestuous brutality with which he had treated her (died 1599).

(Shelley has a tragedy on the subject, called The Cenci, 1819.)

Parsley Peel, the first sir Robert Peel. So called from the great quantity of printed calico with the parsley-leaf pattern manufactured by him (1750–1830).

Parson Adams, a simple-minded country clergyman of the eighteenth century. At the age of 50 he was provided with a handsome income of £23 a year (nearly £300 of our money).—Fielding: Joseph Andrews (1742).

 Timothy Burrell, Esq., in 1715, bequeathed to his nephew Timothy the sum of £20 a year, to be paid during his residence at the university, and to be continued to him till he obtained some preferment worth at least £30 a year.—Sussex Archæological Collections, iii. 172.

¶ Goldsmith says the clergyman of his "deserted village" was "passing" or exceedingly rich, for he had £40 a year (equal to £500 now). In Norway and Sweden, to this day, the clergy are paid from £20 to £40 a year; in France, £40 is the usual stipend of the working clergy.

Parson Balwhidder. (See BALWHIDDER, p. 86.)

¶ Of St. Yves it is said (1251-1303)—

Il distribuait, avec une sainte profusion, aux pauvres, les revenus de son bénéfice et ceux de son patrimone qui étaient de £60 de rente, alors une somme très notable, particulièrement en Basse Bretagne.—Dom Lobineau: Lives of the Saints of Great Britain.

Parson Bate, a stalwart, choleric, sporting parson, editor of the Morning Post in the latter half of the eighteenth century. Afterwards sir Henry Bate Dudley, bart.

When sir Henry Bate Dudley was appointed an Irish dean, a young lady of Dublin said, "Och! how I long to see our dane! They say . . . he fights like an angel."—Cassell's Magazine ("London Legends," iii.).

Parson Blattergrowl. (See BLATTERGROWL, p. 126.)

Parson Lot, a name under which Charles Kingsley published his Cheap Clothes and Nasty (1850).

Parson Runo (A), a simple-minded clergyman, wholly unacquainted with the world; a Dr. Primrose, in fact. It is a Russian household phrase, having its origin in the singular simplicity of the Lutheran clergy of the Isle of Runo.

Parson Trulliber, a fat clergyman, slothful, ignorant, and intensely bigoted. —Fielding: Joseph Andrews (1742).

(See also BOANERGES, CHADBRAND, DALE, etc.)

Parson's Tale (The), one of the two tales in prose in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. A kind of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, comparing the life of a Christian to a journey from earth to heaven.

(The other prose tale is that of the host, and called "Melibeus" or "Melibe," q.v.)

Parsons (Walter), the giant porter of king James I. (died 1622).—Fuller: Worthies (1622).

Parsons' Kaiser (The), Karl IV. of Germany, who was set up by pope Clement VI., while Ludwig IV. was still on the throne. The Germans called the pope's protégé, "pfaffen kaiser." Parthe'nia, the mistress of Argălus. —Sir P. Sidney: Arcadia (1580).

Parthen'ia, Maidenly Chastity personified. Parthenia is sister of Agnei'a (3 syl.) or wifely chastity, the spouse of Encra'tês or temperance. Her attendant is Er'ythre or modesty. (Greek, parthĕnia, "maidenhood.")—Phineas Fletcher: The Purple Island, x. (1633).

Parthen'ope (4 syl.), one of the three syrens. She was buried at Naples. Naples itself was anciently called Parthenopê, a name changed to Neap'olis ("the new city") by a colony of Cumæans.

By dead Parthenope's dear tomb.
Milton: Comus, 879 (1634).

Loitering by the sea
That laves the passionate shores of soft Parthenopé.
Lord Lytton: Ode, iii. 2 (1839).

(The three syrens were Parthen'opê, Ligĕa, and Leucos'ia not Leucoth'ea, q.v.).

Parthen'ope (4 syl.), the damsel beloved by prince Volscius. — Duke of Buckingham: The Rehearsal (1671).

Parthen'ope of Naples. Sannazaro the Neapolitan poet, called "The Christian Virgil." Most of his poems were published under the assumed name of Actius Sincerus (1458-1530).

At last the Muses . . scattered . . .
Their blooming wreaths from fair Valclusa's bowers [Petrarch]
To Arno [Dante and Boccaccio] . . . and the shore
Of soft Parthenope.
Akenside: Pleasures of Imagination, ii. (1744).

Parthenope'an Republic, Naples (1799).

Partington (Mrs.) an old lady of amusing affectations and ridiculous blunders of speech. Sheridan's "Mrs. Malaprop" and Smollett's "Tabitha Bramble" are similar characters.—B. P. Shillaber (an American humorist).

I do not mean to be disrespectful; but the attempt of the lords to stop the progress of reform reminds me very forcibly of the great storm of Sidmouth, and the conduct of the excellent Mrs. Partington on that occasion. In the winter of 1824, there set in a great flood upon that town; the tide rose to an incredible height; the waves rushed in upon the houses; and everything was threatened with destruction. In the midst of this sublime storm, Dame Partington, who lived upon the beach, was seen at the door of her house with mop and pattens, trundling her mop, squeezing out the sea-water, and vigorously pushing away the Atlantic Ocean. The Atlantic was roused; Mrs. Partington's spirit was up; but I need not tell you that the contest was unequal. The Atlantic beat Mrs. Partington. She was excellent at a slop or puddle, but should never have meddled with a tempest.—Sydney Smith: Speech at Taunton (1831).

Partlet, the hen, in "The Nun's Priest's Tale," and in the famous beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498).—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (1388).

Sister Partlet with her hooded head, the cloistered community of nuns; the Roman Catholic clergy being the "barn-door fowls."—Dryden: Hind and Panther (1687).

Partridge. Talus was changed into a partridge.

Partridge, cobbler, quack, astrologer, and almanac-maker. He died 1708. Dean Swift wrote an elegy on him.

> Here, five feet deep, lies on his back,
> A cobler, starmonger, and quack,
> Who, to the stars in pure good will,
> Does to his best look upward still.
> Weep, all you customers that use
> His pills, his almanacs, or shoes.

Partridge, the attendant of Tom Jones, as Strap is of Smollett's "Roderick Random." Faithful, shrewd, and of child-like simplicity. He is half barber and half schoolmaster. His excitement in the play-house when he went to see Garrick in "Hamlet" is charming.—Fielding: The History of Tom Jones (1749).

The humour of Smollett, although genuine and hearty, is coarse and vulgar. He was superficial where Fielding showed deep insight; but he had a rude conception of generosity, of which Fielding seems incapable. It is owing to this that "Strap" is superior to "Partridge."—Hazlitt: Comic Writers.

Partridge's Day (Saint), September 1, the first day of partridge shooting. So August 12 is called "St. Grouse's Day."

Parvenue. One of the O'Neals, being told that Barrett of Castlemone had only been 400 years in Ireland, replied, "I hate the upstart, which can only look back to yesterday."

Parvis ("victorious"), surname of Khosrou II. of Persia. He kept 15,000 female musicians, 6000 household officers, 20,500 saddle-mules, 960 elephants, 200 slaves to scatter perfumes when he went abroad, and 1000 sekabers to water the roads before him. His horse, Shibdiz, was called "the Persian Bucephalus."

∴ The reigns of Khosrou I. and II. were the golden period of Persian history.

Parzival, the hero of a metrical romance, by Wolfram von Eschenbach (twelfth century). Parzival was brought up by a widowed mother in solitude, but when grown to manhood, two wandering knights persuaded him to go to the court of king Arthur. His mother, hoping to deter him, consented to his going if he would wear the dress of a common jester. This he did, but soon achieved such noble deeds that Arthur made him a knight of the Round Table. Sir Parzival went in quest of the holy graal, which was kept in a magnificent castle called Graalburg, in Spain, built by the royal priest Titurel. He reached the castle, but, having neglected certain conditions, was shut out, and, on his return to court, the priestess of Graal-burg insisted on his being expelled the court and degraded from knighthood. Parzival then led a new life of abstinence and self-abnegation, and a wise hermit became his instructor. At length he reached such a state of purity and sanctity that the priestess of Graal-burg declared him worthy to become lord of the castle, having been "made perfect by suffering" (Rev. vii. 14; Heb. ii. 10).

∴ This, of course, is an allegory of a Christian giving up everything in order to be admitted a priest and king in the city of God, and becoming a fool in order to learn true wisdom (see 1 Cor. iii. 18).

Pascal. Frederick von Hardenberg ("Novalis") (1770–1801) is so called by Carlyle.

Pasquin, a Roman cobbler in the latter half of the fifteenth century, whose shop stood in the neighbourhood of the Braschi palace near the Piazza Navoni. He was noted for his caustic remarks and bitter sayings. After his death, a mutilated statue near the shop was called by his name, and made the repository of all the bitter epigrams and satirical verses of the city; hence called pasquinades (3 syl.).

Sir Archy M'Sarcasm—the common Pasquin of the town.—Macklin: Love à-la-Mode, I. 1 (1779).

Passamonte (Gines de), the galley-slave set free by don Quixote. He returned the favour by stealing Sancho's wallet and ass. Subsequently he reappeared as a puppet-showman.—Cervantes: Don Quixote (1605–15).

Passatore (Il), a title assumed by Belli'no, an Italian bandit chief, who died 1851.

Passebrewell, the name of sir Tristram's horse.—History of Prince Arthur, ii. 68.

Passe-Lourdaud (3 syl.), a great rock near Poitiers, where there is a very narrow hole on the edge of a precipice, through which the university freshmen are made to pass to "matriculate" them. (Passe-Lourdaud means "lubber-pass.")

¶ The same is done at Mantua, where the freshmen are made to pass under the arch of St. Longinus.

Passel'yon, a young foundling brought up by Morgan la Fée. He was detected in an intrigue with Morgan's daughter. The adventures of this amorous youth are related in the romance called Perceforest, iii.

Passe-tyme of Plesure, an allegorical poem in forty-six capitulos and in seven-line stanzas, by Stephen Hawes (1515). The poet supposes that while Graunde Amoure was walking in a meadow, he encountered Fame, "enuyroned with tongues of fyre," who told him about La bell Pucell, a ladye fair, living in the Tower of Musike; and then departed, leaving him under the charge of Gouernaunce and Grace who conducted him to the Tower of Doctrine. Countenaunce, the portress, showed him over the tower, and lady Science sent him to Gramer. Afterwards he was sent to Logyke, Rethorike, Inuention, Arismetrike, and Musike. In the Tower of Musike he met La bell Pucell, pleaded his love, and was kindly entreated; but they were obliged to part for the time being, while Graunde Amoure continued his "passe-tyme of plesure." On quitting La bell Pucell, he went to Geometrye, and then to Dame Astronomy. Then, leaving the Tower of Science, he entered that of Chyualry. Here Mynerue introduced him to kyng Melyzyus, after which he went to the temple of Venus, who sent a letter on his behalf to La bell Pucell. Meanwhile, the giant False Report (or Godfrey Gobilyue) met him, and put him to great distress in the house of Correction; but Perceueraunce at length conducted him to the manour-house of Dame Comfort. After sundry trials, Graunde Amoure married La bell Pucell, and, after many a long day of happiness and love, he was arrested by Age, who took him before Policye and Auarice. Death, in time, came for him, and Remembraunce wrote his epitaph.

Paston Letters, letters chiefly written to or by the Paston family, in Norfolk. Charles Knight calls them "an invaluable record of the social customs of the fifteenth century." Two volumes appeared in 1787, entitled Original Letters Written During the Reigns of Henry VI., Edward IV., and Richard III., by Various Persons of Rank. Three extra volumes were subsequently printed.

(Some doubt has been raised respecting the authenticity of these letters.)

Pastor Fi'do (Il), a pastoral by Giovanni Battista Guari'ni of Ferrara (1585).

Pastoral Romance (The Father of), Honoré d'Urfé (1567-1625).

Pastorella, the fair shepherdess (bk. vi. 9), beloved by Corydon, but "neither for him nor any other did she care a whit." She was a foundling, brought up by the shepherd Melibee. When sir Calidore (3 syl.) was the shepherd's guest, he fell in love with the fair foundling, who returned his love. During the absence of sir Calidore in a hunting expedition, Pastorella, with Melibee and Corydon, were carried off by brigands. Melibee was killed, Corydon effected his escape, and Pastorella was wounded. Sir Calidore went to rescue his shepherdess, killed the brigand chief, and brought back the captive in safety (bk. vi. 11). He took her to Belgard Castle, and it turned out that the beautiful foundling was the daughter of lady Claribel and sir Bellamour (bk. vi. 12).—Spenser: Fairie Queene, vi. 9-12 (1596).

 "Pastorella" is meant for Frances Walsingham, daughter of sir Francis Walsingham, whom sir Philip Sidney ("sir Calidore") married. After Sidney's death, the widow married the earl of Essex (the queen's favourite). Sir Philip being the author of a romance called Arcadia, suggested to the poet the name Pastorella.

Patago'nians. This word means "large foot," from the Spanish patagón ("a large, clumsy foot"). The Spaniards so called the natives of this part of South America, from the unusual size of the human foot-prints in the sand. It appears that these foot-prints were due to a large clumsy shoe worn by the natives, and were not the impressions of naked feet.

Patam'ba, a city of the Az'tecas, south of Missouri, utterly destroyed by earthquake and overwhelmed.

> The tempest is abroad. Fierce from the north
> A wind uptears the lake, whose lowest depths
> Rock, while convulsions shake the solid earth.
> Where is Patamba? . . . The mighty lake
> Hath burst its bounds, and yon wide valley roars,
> A troubled sea, before the rolling storm.
> Southey: Madoc (1805).

Patch, the clever, intriguing waiting-woman of Isabinda daughter of sir Jealous Traffick. As she was handing a love-letter in cipher to her mistress, she let it fall, and sir Jealous picked it up.

He could not read it, but insisted on knowing what it meant. "Oh," cried the ready wit, "it is a charm for the tooth-ache!" and the suspicion of sir Jealous was diverted (act iv. 2).—Mrs. Centlivre: The Busy Body (1709).

Patch (Clause), king of the beggars. He died in 1730, and was succeeded by Bampfylde Moore Carew.

Patche (1 syl.), cardinal Wolsey's jester. When the cardinal felt his favour giving way, he sent Patche as a gift to the king, and Henry VIII. considered the gift a most acceptable one.

We call one Patche or Cowlson, whom we see to do a thing foolishly, because these two in their time were notable fools.—Wilson: Art of Rhetorique (1553).

Patched-up Peace (The), a treaty of peace between the duc d'Orléans and John of Burgundy (1409).

¶ Sometimes the treaty between Charles IX. and the huguenots, concluded at Longjumeau in 1568, is so called (La Paix Fourrée).

Patelin (2 syl.), the hero of an ancient French comedy. He contrives to obtain on credit six ells of cloth from William Josseaume, by artfully praising the tradesman's father. Any subtle, crafty fellow, who entices by flattery and insinuating arts, is called a Patelin.—Blanchet: L'Avocat Patelin (1459–1519).

On lui attribue, mais à tort, la farce de L'Avocat Patelin, qui est plus ancienne que lui.—Bouillet: Dictionary Universel d'Histoire, etc. (article "Blanchet").

"Consider, sir, I pray you, how the noble Patelin, having a mind to extol to the third heavens the father of William Josseaume, said no more than this: he did lend his goods freely to those who were desirous of them.—Rabelais: Pantagruel, lib. 4 (1545).

(D. A. de Brueys reproduced this comedy in 1706.)

Pater Patrum. St. Gregory of Nyssa is so called by the council of Nice (332–395).

Paterson (Pate), serving-boy to Bryce Snailsfoot the pedlar.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

Pathfinder (The), Natty Bumppo; also called "The Deerslayer," "The Hawk-eye," and "The Trapper."—Fenimore Cooper (five novels called The Pathfinder, The Pioneers, The Deerslayer, The Last of the Mohicans, and The Prairie).

Pathfinder of the Rocky Mountains (The), major-general John Charles Fremont, who conducted four exploring expeditions across the Rocky Mountains in 1842.

Patient Griselda or Grisildis, the wife of Wautier marquis of Saluces. Boccaccio says she was a poor country lass, who became the wife of Gualtiere marquis of Saluzzo. She was robbed of her children by her husband, reduced to abject poverty, divorced, and commanded to assist in the marriage of her husband with another woman; but she bore every affront patiently, and without complaint.—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Clerk's Tale," 1388); Boccaccio: Decameron, x. 10 (1352).

(The tale is allegorical of that text, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord," Job i. 21.)

N.B.—A comedy called Patient Grissell was written by Chettle and Dekker in 1603.

Patin, brother of the emperor of Rome. He fights with Am'adis of Gaul, and has his horse killed under him.—Vasco de Lobeira: Amadis of Gaul (thirteenth century).

Patison, sir Thomas More's licensed jester. Hans Holbein has introduced this jester in his famous picture of the lord chancellor.

Patriarch of Dorchester, John White of Dorchester, a puritan divine (1574–1648).

Patriarchs (The Last of the). So Christopher Casby of Bleeding-heart Yard was called. "So grey, so slow, so quiet, so impassionate, so very bumpy in the head, that patriarch was the word for him." Painters implored him to be a model for some patriarch they designed to paint. Philanthropists looked on him as famous capital for a platform. He had once been town agent in the Circumlocution Office, and was well-to-do.

His face had a bloom on it like ripe wall-fruit, and his blue eyes seemed to be the eyes of wisdom and virtue. His whole face teemed with the look of benignity. Nobody could say where the wisdom was, or where the virtue was, or where the benignity was, but they seemed to be somewhere about him. . . . He wore a long wide-skirted bottle-green coat, and a bottle-green pair of trousers, and a bottle-green waistcoat. The patriarchs were not dressed in bottle-green broadcloth, and yet his clothes looked patriarchal.—Dickens: Little Dorrit (1857).

Patrick, an old domestic at Shaw's Castle.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Patrick (St.), the tutelar saint of Ireland. Born at Kirk Patrick, near Dumbarton. His baptismal name was "Succeath" ('valour in war") changed by Milcho, to whom he was sold as a slave, into "Cotharig" (four families or four masters, to whom he had been sold). It was pope Celestine who changed the name to "Patricius," when he sent him to convert the Irish.

N.B.—Certainly the most marvellous of all the miracles ascribed to the saints is that recorded of St. Patrick. "He swam across the Shannon with his head in his mouth!"

St. Patrick and king O'Neil. One day, the saint set the end of his crozier on the foot of O'Neil king of Ulster, and, leaning heavily on it, hurt the king's foot severely; but the royal convert showed no indication of pain or annoyance whatsover.

¶ A similar anecdote is told of St. Areed, who went to show the king of Abyssinia a musical instrument which he had invented. His majesty rested the head of his spear on the saint's foot, and leaned with both his hands on the spear while he listened to the music. St. Areed, though his great toe was severely pierced, showed no sign of pain, but went on playing as if nothing was the matter.

St. Patrick and the Serpent. St. Patrick cleared Ireland of vermin. One old serpent resisted, but St. Patrick overcame it by cunning. He made a box, and invited the serpent to enter in. The serpent insisted it was too small; and so high the contention grew that the serpent got into the box to prove that he was right, whereupon St. Patrick slammed down the lid, and cast the box into the sea.

¶ This tradition is marvellously like an incident of the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. A fisherman had drawn up a box or vase in his net, and on breaking it open a genius issued therefrom, and threatened the fisherman with immediate destruction because he had been enclosed so long Said the fisherman to the genius, "I wish to know whether you really were in that vase." "I certainly was," answered the genius. "I cannot believe it," replied the fisherman, "for the vase could not contain even one of your feet." Then the genius, to prove his assertion, changed into smoke, and entered into the vase, saying, "Now, incredulous fisherman, dost thou believe me?" But the fisherman clapped the leaden cover on the vase, and told the genius he was about to throw the box into the sea, and that he would build a house on the spot to warn others not to fish up so wicked a genius. —Arabian Nights ("The Fisherman," one of the early tales).

(St. Patrick, I suspect, had read the Arabian Nights, and stole a leaf from the fisherman's book.)

¶ For other similar tales, see VIRGIL THE ENCHANTER.

St. Patrick a Gentleman.

> Oh, St. Patrick was a gintleman,
> Who came of dacent people. . . .

(This song was written by Messrs. Bennet and Toleken, of Cork, and was first sung by them at a masquerade in 1814. It was afterwards lengthened for Webbe, the comedian, who made it popular.)

St. Patrick's Purgatory, lough Derg, in Ireland. At the end of the fifteenth century, the purgatory of lough Derg was destroyed, by order of the pope, on St. Patrick's Day, 1497.

(Calderon has a drama entitled The Purgatory of St. Patrick, 1600–1681.)

Patriot King (The), Henry St. John viscount Bolingbroke (1678–1751). He hired Mallet to traduce Pope after his decease, because the poet refused to give up certain copies of a work which the statesman wished to have destroyed.

> Write as if St. John's soul could still inspire,
> And do from hate what Mallet did for hire.
> Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Patriot of Humanity. Henry Grattan (1750–1820) is so called by Byron. (See Don Juan, preface to canto vi., etc., 1824.)

Patron (The), a farce by S. Foote (1764). The patron is sir Thomas Lofty, called by his friends, "sharp-judging Adriel, the Muse's friend, himself a Muse," but by those who loved him less, "the modern Midas." Books without number were dedicated to him, and the writers addressed him as the "British Pollio, Atticus, the Mæcēnas of England, protector of arts, paragon of poets, arbiter of taste, and sworn appraiser of Apollo and the Muses." The plot is very simple: Sir Thomas Lofty has written a play called Robinson Crusoe, and gets Richard Bever to stand godfather to it. The play is damned past redemption, and, to soothe Bever, sir Thomas allows him to marry his niece Juliet.

 Horace Walpole, earl of Oxford, is the original of "sir Thomas Lofty" (1717–1797).

Patronage, a novel by Maria Edgeworth (1812).

Patten, according to Gay, is so called from Patty, the pretty daughter of a Lincolnshire farmer, with whom the village blacksmith fell in love. To save her from wet feet when she went to milk the cows, he mounted her clogs on a cleat of iron in the form of a ring.

> The patten now supports each frugal dame,
> Which from the blue-eyed Patty takes its name.
> Guy: Trivia, i. (1712).

(Of course, the word is the French patin, "a skate or high-heeled shoe," from the Greek, patein, "to walk.")

Pattieson (Mr. Peter), in the introduction of The Heart of Midlothian, by sir W. Scott; and again in the introduction of The Bride of Lammermoor. He is a hypothetical assistant teacher at Gandercleuch, and the feigned author of The Tales of My Landlord, which sir Walter Scott pretends were published by Jedediah Cleishbotham, after the death of Pattieson.

Patty, "the maid of the mill," daughter of Fairfield the miller. She was brought up by the mother of lord Aimworth, and was promised by her father in marriage to Farmer Giles; but she refused to marry him, and became the bride of lord Aimworth. Patty was very clever, very pretty, very ingenuous, and loved his lordship to adoration.—Bickerstaff: The Maid of the Mill (1765).

Pattypan (Mrs.), a widow who keeps lodgings, and makes love to Tim Tartlet, to whom she is ultimately engaged.

> By all accounts, she is just as loving now as she was thirty years ago.—Cobb: The First Floor, i. 2 (1756-1818).

Patullo (Mrs.), waiting-woman to lady Ashton.—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.).

Pau-Puk-Keewis, a cunning mischief-maker, who taught the North American Indians the game of hazard, and stripped them by his winnings of all their possessions. In a mad freak, Pau-Puk-Keewis entered the wigwam of Hiawatha, and threw everything into confusion; so Hiawatha resolved to slay him. Pau-Puk-Keewis, taking to flight, prayed the beavers to make him a beaver ten times their own size. This they did; but when the other beavers made their escape at the arrival of Hiawatha, Pau-Puk-Keewis was hindered from getting away by his great size; and Hiawatha slew him. His spirit, escaping, flew upwards, and prayed the storm-fools to make him a "brant" ten times their own size. This was done, and he was told never to look downwards, or he would lose his life. When Hiawatha arrived, the "brant" could not forbear looking at him; and immediately he fell to earth, and Hiawatha transformed him into an eagle.

> Now in winter, when the snowflakes
> Whirl in eddies round the lodges. . . .
> "There," they cry, "comes Pau-Puk-Keewis;
> He is dancing thro' the village,
> He is gathering in his harvest."
> Longfellow: Hiawatha, xvii. (1855).

PAUL, the love-child of Margaret, who retired to port Louis, in the Mauritius, to bury herself, and bring up her only child. Hither came Mme. de la Tour, a widow, and was confined of a daughter, whom she named Virginia. Between these neighbours a mutual friendship arose, and the two children became playmates. As they grew in years, their fondness for each other developed into love. When Virginia was 15, her mother's aunt adopted her, and begged she might be sent to France to finish her education. She was above two years in France; and as she refused to marry a count of the "aunt's" providing, she was disinherited, and sent back to her mother. When within a cable's length of the island, a hurricane dashed the ship to pieces, and the dead body of Virginia was thrown upon the shore. Paul drooped from grief, and within two months followed her to the grave.—Bernardin de St. Pierre: Paul et Virgine (1788).

(In Cobb's dramatic version, Paul's mother (Margaret) is made a faithful domestic of Virginia's parents. Virginia's mother dies, and commits her infant daughter to the care of Dominique, a faithful old negro servant; and Paul and Virginia are brought up in the belief that they are brother and sister. When Virginia is 15 years old, her aunt Leonora de Guzman adopts her, and sends don Antonio de Guardes to bring her to Spain, and make her his bride. She is taken by force on board ship; but scarcely has the ship started, when a hurricane dashes it on rocks, and it is wrecked. Alhambra, a runaway slave, whom Paul and Virginia had befriended, rescues Virginia, who is brought to shore and married to Paul; but Antonio is drowned.

Paul (Father), Paul Sarpi (1552-1628).

Paul (St.). The very sword which cut off the head of this apostle is preserved at the convent of La Lisla, near Tolēdo, in Spain. If any one doubts the fact, he may, for a gratuity, see a "copper sword, twenty-five inches long, and three and a half broad, on one side of which is the word MUCRO ('a sword'), and on the other PAULUS . . . CAPITE." Can anything be more convincing?

Paul (The Second St.), St. Remi or Remigius, "The Great Apostle of the French." He was made bishop of Rheims when only 22 years old. It was St. Remi who baptized Clovis, and told him that henceforth he must worship what he hitherto had hated, and abjure what he had hitherto adored (439-535).

(The cruse employed by St. Remi in the baptism of Clovis was used through the French monarchy in the anointing of all the kings.)

Paul and Virginia, in French, by St. Pierre, 1788. (See PAUL.) There is an English version of this very pretty story.

Paul at Damascus. (See SAUL . . .)

Paul Pry, an idle, inquisitive, meddlesome fellow, who has no occupation of his own, and is for ever poking his nose into other people's affairs. He always comes in with the apology, "I hope I don't intrude."—Poole: Paul Pry (1825).

∴ Thomas Hill, familiarly called "Tommy Hill," was the original of this character, and also of "Gilbert Gurney," by Theodore Hook. Planché says of Thomas Hill—

His specialité was the accurate information he could impart on all the petty details of the domestic economy of his friends, the contents of their wardrobes, their pantries, the number of pots of preserve in their store-closets, and of the table-napkins in their linen-presses, the dates of their births and marriages, the amounts of their tradesmen's bills, and whether paid weekly or quarterly. He had been on the press, and was connected with the Morning Chronicle. He used to drive Matthews crazy by ferreting out his whereabouts when he left London, and popping the information in some paper.—Recollections, i. 131, 132.

Paul's Pigeons. So the boys of St. Paul's School, London, used to be called.

Paul's Walkers, loungers who frequented the middle of St. Paul's in the time of the Commonwealth, as they did Bond Street during the regency. (See Ben Jonson's Every Man out of His Humour (1599), and Harrison Ainsworth's Old St. Paul's, 1843.)

Pauletti (The lady Erminia), ward of Master George Heriot the king's goldsmith.—Sir W. Scott: The Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Pauli'na, the noble-spirited wife of Antig'onus a Sicilian lord, and the kind friend of queen Hermi'onē. When Hermionē gave birth in prison to a daughter, Paulina undertook to present it to king Leontēs, hoping that his heart would be softened at the sight of his infant daughter; but he commanded the child to be cast out on a desert shore, and left there to perish. The child was drifted to the "coast" of Bohemia, and brought up by a shepherd, who called it Perdĭta. Florizel, the son of king Polixĕnēs, fell in love with her, and fled with her to Sicily, to escape the vengeance of the angry king. The fugitives being introduced to Leontēs, it was soon discovered that Perdita was the king's daughter, and Polixenēs consented to the union he had before forbidden. Paulina now invited Leontēs and the rest to inspect a famous statue of Hermionē, and the statue turned out to be the living queen herself.—Shakespeare: The Winter's Tale (1604).

Paulina is clever, generous, strong-minded, and warm-hearted, fearless in asserting the truth, firm in her sense of right, enthusiastic in all her affections, quick in thought, resolute in word, and energetic in action, but heedless, hot-tempered, impatient, loud, bold, voluble, and turbulent of tongue.—Mrs. Jameson.

Pauline, "The Beauty of Lyons," daughter of Mon. Deschappelles, a Lyonese merchant; "as pretty as Venus and as proud as Juno." (For the rest, see MELNOTTE, p. 695.)—Lord Lytton: The Lady of Lyons (1838).

Pauline (Mademoiselle) or MONNA PAULA, the attendant of lady Erminia Pauletti the goldsmith's ward.—Sir W. Scott: The Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Pauli'nus of York christened 10,000 men, besides women and their children, in one single day in the Swale. (Altogether some 50,000 souls, i.e. 104 every minute, 6250 every hour, supposing he worked eight hours without stopping.)

When the Saxons first received the Christian faith,
Paulinus of old York, the zealous bishop then,
In Swale's abundant stream christened ten thousand men,
With women and their babes, a number more beside,
Upon one happy day.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xxviii. (1622).

Paupiah, the Hindû steward of the British governor of Madras.—Sir W. Scott: The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Pausa'nias (The British), William Camden (1551–1623). Sometimes called "the British Strabo."

Pauvre Jacques. When Marie Antoinette had her artificial Swiss village in the "Little Trianon," a Swiss girl was brought over to heighten the illusion. She was observed to pine, and was heard to sigh out, pauvre Jacques! This little romance pleased the queen, who sent for Jacques, and gave the pair a wedding portion; while the marchioness de Travanet wrote the song called Pauvre Jacques which created at the time quite a sensation. The first and last verses ran thus—

Pauvre Jacques, quand j'etais près de toi,
Je ne sentais pas ma misère;
Mais à présent que tu vis loin de moi,
Je manque de tout sur la terre.
Poor Jack, while I was near to thee,
Tho' poor, my bliss was unalloyed;
But now thou dwell'st so far from me,
The world appears a lonesome void.
E. C. B.

Pa'via (Battle of). François I. of France is said to have written to his mother these words after the loss of this battle, "Madame, tout est perdu hors l'honneur;" but what he really wrote was, "Madame . . . de toutes choses ne m'est demeuré pas que l'honneur et la vie.'

And with a noble siege revolted Pavia took.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xviii. (1613).

Pavilion of prince Ahmed. This pavilion was so small that it might be held and covered by the hand, and yet so large when pitched that a whole army could encamp beneath it. Its size, however, was elastic, being always proportionate to the army to be covered by it.—Arabian Nights ("Ahmed and Pari-Banou").

Pavillon (Meinheer Hermann), the syndic at Liège [Le-aje].

Mother Mabel Pavillon, wife of meinheer Hermann.

Trudchen or Gertrude Pavillon, their daughter, betrothed to Hans Glover.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Pawkins (Major), a huge, heavy man, "one of the most remarkable of the age." He was a great politician and great patriot, but generally under a cloud, wholly owing to his distinguished genius for bold speculations, not to say "swindling schemes." His creed was "to run a moist pen slick through everything, and start afresh."—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Pawnbrokers' Balls. Every one knows that these balls are the arms of the Medici family, but it is not so well known that they refer to an exploit of Averardo de Medici, a commander under Charlemagne. This bold warrior slew the giant Mugello, whose club he bore as a trophy. This mace or club had three iron balls, which the family adopted as their device.—Roscoe: Life of Lorenzo de' Medici (1796).

Paynim Harper (The), referred to by Tennyson in the Last Tournament, was Orpheus.

Swine, goats, rams, and geese
Trooped round a paynim harper once, . . .
Then were swine, goats, asses, geese
The wiser fools, seeing the paynim bard
Had such a mastery of his mystery
That he could harp his wife up out of hell.
Tennyson: The Last Tournament (1859).

Peace (Prince of), don Manuel Godoy, born at Badajoz. So called because he concluded the "peace of Basle" between the French and Spanish nations in 1795 (1767–1851).

The Father of Peace, Andrea Doria (1469–1560).

Peace (The Perpetual), a peace concluded between England and Scotland, a few years after the battle of Flodden Field (January 24, 1502).

Peace (The Surest Way to). Fox, afterwards bishop of Hereford, said to Henry VIII., The surest way to peace is a constant preparation for war. The Romans had the axiom, Si vis pacem, para bellum. It was said of Edgar, surnamed "the Peaceful," king of England, that he preserved peace in those turbulent times "by being always prepared for war" (reigned 959–975).

Peace at any Price. Mézeray says of Louis XII., that he had such detestation of war, that he rather chose to lose his duchy of Milan than burden his subjects with a war-tax.—Histoire de France (1643).

Peace of Antal'cidas, the peace concluded by Antalcidas the Spartan and Artaxerxes (B.C. 387).

Peace of God, a peace enforced by the clergy on the barons of Christendom, to prevent the perpetual feuds between baron and baron (1035).

Peace to the Souls. (See MORNA, p. 727.)

Peach'um, a pimp, patron of a gang of thieves, and receiver of their stolen goods. His house is the resort of thieves, pickpockets, and villains of all sorts. He betrays his comrades when it is for his own benefit, and even procures the arrest of captain Macheath.

The quarrel between Peachum and Lockit was an allusion to a personal collision between Walpole and his colleague lord Townsend.—R. Chambers: English Literature, i. 571.

Mrs. Peachum, wife of Peachum. She recommends her daughter Polly to be "somewhat nice in her deviations from virtue."

Polly Peachum, daughter of Peachum. (See POLLY.)—Gay: The Beggar's Opera (1727).

Peacock's Feather Unlucky (A). The peacock's feather is the emblem of an evil eye, an ever-vigilant false friend or traitor. The tale is this: Argus was the chief minister of Osiris king of Egypt. When the king started on his Indian expedition, he left queen Isis regent, with Argus for her chief adviser. Argus, with his hundred eyes (or rather secret spies), soon made himself powerful, shut up the queen-regent in a strong castle, and proclaimed himself king. Mercury marched against him, took him prisoner, and cut off his head. Whereupon, Juno metamorphosed him into a peacock, and set his hundred eyes in his tail.

Pearl. It is said that Cleopatra swallowed a pearl of more value than the whole of the banquet she had provided in honour of Antony. This she did when she drank to his health.

¶ The same sort of extravagant folly is told of Æsopus son of Clodius Æsopus the actor.—Horace: Satires, iii. vers. 239.

¶ A similar act of vanity and folly is ascribed to sir Thomas Gresham, when queen Elizabeth dined at the City banquet, after her visit to the Royal Exchange.

Here £15,000 at one clap gues
Instead of sugar; Gresham drinks the pearl
Unto his queen and mistress.
Heywood.

Pearl of Ireland (The), St. Bridget or Brigette (1302–1373).

Pearl of the Antilles (The), Cuba, which belongs to Spain.

Pearson (Captain Gilbert), officer in attendance on Cromwell.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Peasant-Bard (The), Robert Burns (1759–1796).

Peasant-Boy Philosopher (The), James Ferguson (1710–1776).

Peasant-Painter of Sweden, Hörberg. His chief paintings are altar-pieces.

The altar-piece painted by Hörberg.
Longfellow: The Children of the Lord's Supper.

Peasant-Poet of Northamptonshire, John Clare (1793–1864).

Peasant of the Danube (The), Louis Legendre, a member of the French National Convention (1755–1797); called in French Le Paysan du Danube, from his "éloquence sauvage."

Peasants' War (The), a revolt of the German peasantry in Swabia and Franconia, and subsequently in Saxony, Thuringia, and Alsace, occasioned by the oppression of the nobles and the clergy (1500–1525).

Peaseblossom, a fairy in Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream. Other of the fairies are Cobweb, Moth, and Mustardseed (1592).

Peau de Chagrin, a story by Balzac. The hero becomes possessed of a magical wild ass's skin, which yielded him the means of gratifying every wish; but for every wish thus gratified the skin shrank somewhat, and at last vanished, having been wished entirely away. The hero died at the moment the skin disappeared. Life is a peau d'ane, for every vital act diminishes its force, and when all its force is gone, life is spent (1834).

Peckover, the butcher, and leader of the "Blue Lambs."—Tom Taylor: The Contested Election (1860).

Niver a j'int of meat distributed among the poor of the borough; and me that has known an election make a difference of a score of bullocks in a month. Oh, it is mean! it is mean!

Peck'sniff, "architect and land surveyor," at Salisbury. He talks homilies even in drunkenness, prates about the beauty of charity and the duty of forgiveness, but is altogether a canting humbug. Ultimately he is so reduced in position that he becomes "a drunken, begging, squalid, letter-writing man," out at elbows, and almost shoeless. Pecksniff's speciality was the "sleek, smiling, crawling abomination of hypocrisy."

If ever man combined within himself all the mild qualities of the lamb with a considerable touch of the dove, and not a dash of the crocodile, or the least possible suggestion of the very mildest seasoning of the serpent, that man was Mr. Pecksniff, "the messenger of peace."—Ch. iv.

Charity and Mercy Pecksniff, the two daughters of the "architect and land surveyor." Charity is thin, ill-natured, and a shrew, eventually jilted by a weak young man, who really loves her sister. Mercy Pecksniff, usually called "Merry," is pretty and true-hearted. Though flippant and foolish as a girl, she becomes greatly toned down by the troubles of her married life.—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1843).

Pedant, an old fellow set up to personate Vincentio in Shakespeare's comedy called The Taming of the Shrew (1695).

Pedlington (Little), an imaginary borough in which quackery, cant, hypocrisy, and humbug abound. John Poole wrote, in 1839, a satire called Little Pedlington and the Pedlingtonians.

Pèdre (Don), a Sicilian nobleman, who has a Greek slave of great beauty named Isidore (3 syl.). This slave is loved by Adraste (2 syl.), a French gentleman, who gains access to the house under the guise of a portrait-painter. (For the rest, see ADRASTE, p. 10.) —Molière: Le Sicilien ou L'Amour Peintre (1667).

Pedrillo, the tutor of don Juan. After the shipwreck, the men in the boat, being wholly without provisions, cast lots to know which should be killed as food for the rest, and the lot fell on Pedrillo, but those who feasted on him most ravenously went mad.

His tutor, the licentiate Pedrillo,
Who several languages did understand.
Byron: Don Juan, ii. 25; see 76-79 (1819).

PE'DRO, "the pilgrim," a noble gentleman, servant to Alinda (daughter of lord Alphonso).—Fletcher: The Pilgrim (1621).

Pedro (Don), prince of Arragon.—Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing (1600).

Pedro (Don), father of Leonora.—Jephson: Two Strings to your Bow (1792).

Pedro (Don), a Portuguese nobleman, father of donna Violante.—Centlivre: The Wonder (1714).

Pedro (Dr.), whose full name was Dr. Pedro Rezio de Aguero, court physician in the island of Barataria. He carried a whalebone rod in his hand, and whenever any dish of food was set before Sancho Panza the governor, he touched it with his wand, that it might be instantly removed, as unfit for the governor to eat. Partridges were "forbidden by Hippocrates," olla podridas were "most pernicious," rabbits were "a sharp-haired diet," veal might not be touched, but "a few wafers and a thin slice or two of quince" might not be harmful.

The governor, being served with some beef hashed with onions, . . . fell to with more avidity than if he had been set down to Milan godwits, Roman pheasants, Sorrento veal, Moron partridges, or green geese of Lavajos; and turning to Dr. Pedro, he said, "Look you, signor doctor, I want no dainties, . . . for I have been always used to beef, bacon, pork, turnips, and onions."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iii. 10, 12 (1615).

DR. SANGRADO seems to be copied in some measure from this character. His panacea was hot water and stewed apples. —Lesage: Gil Blas (1715-35).

DR. HANCOCK (a real character) prescribed cold water and stewed prunes.

Peebles (Peter), the pauper litigant. He is vain, litigious, hard-hearted, and credulous; a liar, a drunkard, and a pauper. His "ganging plea" is Hogarthian comic.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Peecher (Miss), a schoolmistress, in the flat country where Kent and Surrey meet. "Small, shining, neat methodical, and buxom was Miss Peecher; cherry-checked and tuneful of voice. A little pincushion, a little hussif, a little book, a little work-box, a little set of tables and weights and measures, and a little woman, all in one. She could write a little essay on any subject exactly a slate long, and strictly according to rule. If Mr. Bradley Headstone had proposed marriage to her, she would certainly have replied 'yes,' for she loved him;" but Mr. Headstone did not love Miss Peecher—he loved Lizzie Hexam, and had no love to spare for any other woman.—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend, ii. 1 (1864).

Peel-the-Causeway (Old), a smuggler.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Peeler (Sir), any crop which greatly impoverishes the ground. To peel is to impoverish soil, as "oats, rye, barley, and grey wheat," but not peas (xxxiii. 51).

Wheat doth not well,
Nor after sir Peeler he loveth to dwell.
Tusser: Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, xviii. 12 (1557).

Peelers, the constabulary of Ireland, appointed under the Peace Preservation Act of 1814, proposed by sir Robert Peel. The name was subsequently given to the new police of England, who are also called "Bobbies" from sir Robert Peel.

Peelites (2 syl.), those who remained faithful to sir Robert Peel on the second reading of the Corn Law Bill. In 1846 about two-fifths of the Tory party revolted, and 248 of them voted against sir Robert on the second reading of the Corn Law Bill. Of these revolters 80, under the leadership of lord George Bentinck and Benjamin Disraeli, joined the Liberals, defeated the Irish Coercion Bill, and turned out the Government. Between 1847–1852 those who followed Peel were called Peelites; but in 1852, under the coalition Government the name disappeared.

Peep-o'-Day Boys, Irish insurgents of 1784, who prowled about at daybreak, searching for arms.

Peeping Tom of Coventry. (See GODIVA, p. 432.)

Peerage of the Saints. In the preamble of the statutes instituting the Order of St. Michael, founded by Louis XI. in 1469, the archangel is styled "my lord," and created a knight. The apostles had been already ennobled and knighted. We read of "the earl Peter," "count Paul," "the baron Stephen," and so on. Thus, in the introduction of a sermon upon St. Stephen's Day, we have these lines—

> Entendes toutes a chest sermon,
> Et clair et lai tules environ;
> Contes vous vueil lela pation
> De St. Estieul le baron.

The apostles were gentlemen of bloude, and manye of them descended from that worthy conqueror Judas Mackabēus, though, through the tract of time and persecution of wars, poverty oppressed the kindred, and they were constrayned to servile works. Christ was also a gentleman on the mother's side, and might, if He had esteemed of the vayne glorye of this world, have borne coat armour.—The Blason of Gentrie (quarto).

Peerce (1 syl.), a generic name for a farmer or ploughman. Piers the plowman is the name assumed by Robert or William Langland, in a historico-satirical poem so called.

> And yet, my priests, pray you to God for Peerce . . .
> And if you have a "pater noster" spare,
> Then shal you pray for saylers.
> Gascoigne: The Steele Glas (dated 1577).

Peery (Paul), landlord of the Ship, Dover.

Mrs. Peery, Paul's wife.—Colman: Ways and Means (1788).

Peerybingle (John), a carrier, "lumbering, slow, and honest; heavy, but light of spirit; rough upon the surface, but gentle at the core; dull without, but quick within; stolid, but so good. O mother Nature, give thy children the true poetry of heart that hid itself in this poor carrier's breast, and we can bear to have them talking prose all their life long!"

Mrs. [Mary] Peerybingle, called by her husband "Dot." She was a little chubby, cheery, young wife, very fond of her husband, and very proud of her baby; a good housewife, who delighted in making the house snug and cozy for John, when he came home after his day's work. She called him "a dear old darling of a dunce," or "her little goosie." She sheltered Edward Plummer in her cottage for a time, and thereby placed herself under a cloud; but the marriage of Edward with May Fielding cleared up the mystery, and John loved his little Dot more fondly than ever.—Dickens: The Cricket on the Hearth (1845).

Peg, sister of John Bull; meant for the Presbyterian Church. Peter is the Catholic party. Martin [Luther] the Lutheran party, and John [Calvin] the Calvinistic party.

> What think you of my sister Peg [Scotland], that faints at the sound of an organ, and yet will dance and frisk at the noise of a bagpipe?—Dr. Arbuthnot: History of John Bull (1712).

Peg. Drink to your peg. King Edgar ordered that "pegs should be fastened into drinking-horns at stated distances, and whoever drank beyond his peg at one draught should be obnoxious to a severe punishment."

> I had lately a peg-tankard in my hand. It had on the inside a row of eight pins, one above another, from bottom to top. It held two quarts, so that there was a gill of liquor between peg and peg. Whoever drank short of his pin or beyond it, was obliged to drink to the next, and so on till the tankard was drained to the bottom.—Sharpe: History of the Kings of England.

Peg-a-Ramsey, the heroine of an old song. Percy says it was an indecent ballad. Shakespeare alludes to it in his Twelfth Night, act ii. sc. 3 (1614).

> James I. had been much struck with the beauty and embarrassment of the pretty Peg-a-Ramsey, as he called her.—Sir W. Scott.

Peg'asus, the winged horse of the Muses. It was caught by Bellerophon, who mounted thereon, and destroyed the Chimæra; but when he attempted to ascend to heaven, he was thrown from the horse, and Pegasus mounted alone to the skies, where it became the constellation of the same name.

To break Pegasus's neck, to write halting poetry.

Some, free from rhyme or reason, rule or check,
Break Priscian's head, and Pegasus's neck.
Pope: The Dunciad, iii. 161 (1728).

N.B.—To "break Priscian's head" is to write bad grammar. Priscian was a great grammarian of the fifth century.

Pegg (Katharine), one of the mistresses of Charles II. She was the daughter of Thomas Pegg, Esq., of Yeldersey, in Derbyshire.

Peggot'ty (Clara), servant-girl of Mrs. Copperfield, and the faithful old nurse of David Copperfield. Her name "Clara" was tabooed, because it was the name of Mrs. Copperfield. Clara Peggotty married Barkis the carrier.

Being very plump, whenever she made any little exertion after she was dressed, some of the buttons on the back of her gown flew off.—Ch. ii.

Dan'el Peggotty, brother of David Copperfield's nurse. Dan'el was a Yarmouth fisherman. His nephew Ham Peggotty, and his brother-in-law's child "little Em'ly," lived with him. Dan'el himself was a bachelor, and a Mrs. Gummidge (widow of his late partner) kept house for him. Dan'el Peggotty was most tender-hearted, and loved little Em'ly dearly.

Ham Peggotty, nephew of Dan'el Peggotty of Yarmouth, and son of Joe, Dan'el's brother. Ham was in love with little Em'ly, daughter of Tom (Dan's brother-in-law); but Steerforth stepped in between them, and stole Em'ly away. Ham Peggotty is represented as the very beau-ideal of an uneducated, simple-minded, honest, and warm-hearted fisherman. He was drowned in his attempt to rescue Steerforth from the sea.

Em'ly Peggotty, daughter of Dan's brother-in-law Tom. She was engaged to Ham Peggotty; but being fascinated with Steerforth, ran off with him. She was afterwards reclaimed, and emigrated to Australia with Dan'el and Mrs. Gummidge.—Dickens: David Copperfield (1849).

Peggy, grandchild of the old widow Maclure a covenanter.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Peggy, the laundry-maid of colonel Mannering at Woodburne.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Peggy [Thrift], the orphan daughter of sir Thomas Thrift of Hampshire, and the ward of Moody, who brings her up in perfect seclusion in the country. (For the rest of the tale, see MOODY)—The Country Girl (Garrick, altered from Wycherly's Country Wife, 1675).

Mrs. Jordan [1762–1816] made her first appearance in London at Drury Lane in 1785. The character she selected was "Peggy," her success was immediate, her salary doubled, and she was allowed two benefits.—W. C. Russell: Representative Actors.

Pegler (Mrs.), mother of Josiah Bounderby, Esq., banker and mill-owner, called "The Bully of Humility." The son allows the old woman £30 a year to keep out of sight.—Dickens: Hard Times (1854).

Pek'uah, the attendant of princess Nekayah, of the "happy valley." She accompanied the princess in her wanderings, but refused to enter the great pyramid. While the princess was exploring the chambers, Pekuah was carried off by some Arabs; but was afterwards ransomed for 200 ounces of gold.—Dr. Johnson: Rasselas (1759).

Pelay'o (Prince), son of Favil'a, founder of the Spanish monarchy after the overthrow of Roderick last of the Gothic kings. Prince Pelayo united, in his own person, the royal lines of Spain and of the Goths.

In him the old Iberian blood,
Of royal and remotest ancestry
From undisputed source, flowed undefiled . . .
He, too, of Chindasuintho's regal line
Sole remnant now, drew after him the love
Of all true Goths.
Southey: Roderick, etc., viii. (1814).

Pelham, the hero of a novel by lord Lytton, entitled Pelham or The Adventures of a Gentleman (1828).

Pelham (M.), one of the many aliases of sir R. Phillips, under which he published The Parent's and Tutor's First Catechism. In the preface he calls the writer authoress. Some of his other names are Rev. David Blair, Rev. C. C. Clarke, Rev. J. Goldsmith.

Pe'lian Spear (The), the lance of Achillês which wounded and cured Te'lephos. So called from Peleus the father of Achillês.

Such was the cure the Arcadian hero found—
The Pelian spear that wounded, made him sound.
Ovid: Remedy of Love.

Pelican Island (The), a poem in blank verse, extending over nine cantos, by James Montgomery (1827).

Canto i. Disembodied soul, with vital imagination, longing for companionship.
Canto ii. The first era of creation, the period of fishes, when the coral built reefs which became dry lands.

Canto iii. The third period of creation saw the reefs made fertile with all the variety of the vegetable world; then came insects innumerable, reptiles, and lastly monsters. A cataplasm swept over the earth, and every plant and animal was destroyed.

Canto iv. Surviving germs of the preceding world resuscitate and fill the earth with vegetables of smaller growth, flowers, insects, reptiles; and pelicans domi nate both seas and land.

Canto v. Coral reefs increase in number and in size. The period was the Age of Birds, chiefly amphibious, but still the pelican ruled supreme, and lived out its hundred years.

Canto vi. Animals of all sorts increase. The dreamer is then transferred to a spot where he sees man; but it is man in his most savage state, cannibal man, untutored and savage. He tyrannizes over woman, as the weaker vessel, but in his lowest state retains one spark of deity—love.

Canto vii. Man dies, and what becomes of him? No particle remains to tell us, but we feel assured there is a rest, and everlasting rest, especially for those who lived yet knew no sin.

Canto viii. God has given man intelligence to enjoy and improve his condition; conscience to rebuke him for wrong-doing; a revelation to lead him into truth, and a redeemer to ransom him; but, alas! one looks abroad, and the question arises, "Lord God, why hast Thou made all men in vain?"

Canto ix. Nothing on earth can satisfy man's aspirations. Heaven and earth may pass away, but that which thinks within us can never cease to be.

Peli'des (3 syl.), Achillês, son of Peleus (2 syl.), chief of the Greek warriors at the siege of Troy.—Homer: Iliad.

When, like Pelidês, bold beyond control,
Homer raised high to heaven the loud impetuous song.
Beattie: The Minstrel (1773-4).

Pe'lion ["mud-sprung"], one of the frog chieftains.

A spear at Pelion, Troglodytês cast
The missive spear within the bosom past
Death's sable shades the fainting frog surround,
And life's red tide runs ebbing from the wound.
Parnell: Battle of the Frogs and Mice, iii. (about 1712).

Pell (Solomon), an attorney in the Insolvent Debtors' Court. He has the very highest opinions of his own merits, and by his aid Tony Weller contrives to get his son Sam sent to the Fleet for debt, that he may be near Mr. Pickwick to protect and wait upon him.—Dickens: The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Pelleas (Sir), lord of many isles, and noted for his great muscular strength. He fell in love with lady Ettard, but the lady did not return his love. Sir Gaw'ain promised to advocate his cause with the lady, but played him false. Sir Pelleas caught them in unseemly dalliance with each other, but forbore to kill them. By the power of enchantment, the lady was made to dote on sir Pelleas; but the knight would have nothing to say to her, so she pined and died. After the lady Ettard played him false, the Damsel of the Lake "rejoiced him, and they loved together during their whole lives."—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 79-82 (1470).

N.B.—Sir Pelleas must not be confounded with sir Pelles (q.v.).

(One of the Idylls of lord Tennyson is called "Pelleas and Etarre.")

Pellegrin, the pseudonym of De la Motte Fouqué (1777-1843).

Pelles (Sir), of Corbin Castle, "king of the foragn land and nigh cousin of Joseph of Arimathy." He was father of sir Eliazar, and of the lady Elaine who fell in love with sir Launcelot, by whom she became the mother of sir Galahad "who achieved the quest of the holy graal." This Elaine was not the "lily maid of Astolat."

While sir Launcelot was visiting king Pelles, a glimpse of the holy graal was vouchsafed them—

For when they went into the castle to take their repast . . there came a dove to the window, and in her bill was a little censer of gold, and there withall was such a savour as though all the spicery of the world had been there . . . and a damsel, passing fair, bare a vessel of gold between her hands, and thereto the king kneeled devoutly and said his prayers. . . . "Oh mercy!" said sir Launcelot, "what may this mean?" . . "This," said the king, "is the holy Sancgreall which ye have seen."—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, iii. 2 (1470).

Pellinore (Sir), one of the knights of the Round Table, and called the "Knight of the Stranger Beast." Sir Pellinore slew king Lot of Orkeney, but was himself slain ten years afterwards by sir Gawaine one of Lot's sons (pt. i. 35). Sir Pellinore (3 syl.) had, by the wife of Aries the cowherd, a son named sir Tor, who was the first knight of the Round Table created by king Arthur (pt. i. 47, 48); one daughter, Elein, by the Lady of Rule (pt. iii. 10); and three sons in lawful wedlock: viz. sir Aglouale (sometimes called Aglavale, probably a clerical error), sir Lamorake Dornar (also called sir Lamorake de Galis), and sir Percivale de Galis (pt. ii. 108). The widow succeeded to the throne (pt. iii. 10).—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur (1470).

Milton calls the name "Pellenore" (2 syl.). In fact each of the names in the last line of the following quotation is a dissyllable: Lance-lot', or Pelle-as, or Pelle-nore.

Fair damsels, met in forests wide
By knights of Logres or of Lyones,
Lancelot, or Pelleas, or Pellenore.
Milton

Pelob'ates (4 syl.), one of the frog champions. The word means "mud-wader." In the battle he flings a heap of mud against Psycarpax the Hector of the mice, and half blinds him; but the warrior mouse heaves a stone "whose bulk would need ten degenerate mice of modern days to lift," and the mass, falling on the "mud-wader," breaks his leg.—Parnell: Battle of the Frogs and Mice, iii. (about 1712).

Pel'ops' Shoulder, ivory. The tale is that Demēter ate the shoulder of Pelops when it was served up by Tan'talos for food. The gods restored Pelops to life by putting the dismembered body into a caldron, but found that it lacked a shoulder; whereupon Demeter supplied him with an ivory shoulder, and all his descendants bore this distinctive mark.

N.B.—It will be remembered that Pythag'oras had a golden thigh.

> Your forehead high,
> And smooth as Pelops' shoulder.
> J. Fletcher: The Faithful Shepherdess, ii. 1 (1610).

Pelo'rus, Sicily; strictly speaking, the north-east promontory of that island, called Capo di Fero, from a pharos or lighthouse to Poseidon, which once stood there.

> So reels Pelo'rus with convulsive throes,
> When in his veins the burning earthquake glows;
> Hoarse thro' his entrails roars th' infernal flame,
> And central thunders rend his groaning frame.
> Falconer: The Shipwreck, ii. 4 (1756).

Pelos, father of Physigna'thos king of the frogs. The word means "mud."—Parnell: Battle of the Frogs and Mice (about 1712).

Pembroke (The earl of), uncle to sir Aymer de Valence.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Pembroke (The Rev. Mr.), chaplain at Waverley Honour.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Pen, Philemon Holland, translator-general of the classics. Of him was the epigram written—

> Holland, with his translations doth so fill us,
> He will not let Suetonius be Tranquillus.

(The point of which is, of course, that the name of the Roman historian was C. Suetonius Tranquillus.)

Many of these translations were written from beginning to end with one pen, and hence he himself wrote—

> With one sole pen I writ this book,
> Made of a grey goose-quill;
> A pen it was when I took,
> And a pen I leave it still.

Pen Mightier than the Sword. (See JOURNALISTS, p. 555.)

Pencilling by the Way, gossips about men and places of note, by N. P. Willis (1835). (See PEOPLE I HAVE MET.)

Pendennis, a novel by Thackeray (1849), in which much of his own history and experience is recorded with a novelist's licence. The hero, Arthur Pendennis, reappears in the Adventures of Philip, and is represented as telling the story of The Newcomes. Arthur Pendennis stands in relation to Thackeray as David Copperfield does to Charles Dickens.

Arthur Pendennis, a young man of ardent feelings and lively intellect, but self-conceited and selfish. He has a keen sense of honour, and a capacity for loving, but altogether he is not an attractive character.

Laura Pendennis. This is one of the best of Thackeray's characters.

Major Pendennis, a tuft-hunter, who fawns on his patrons for the sake of wedging himself into their society.—Thackeray: The History of Pendennis (1850).

In this novel "Clavering" is Ottery St. Mary, in Devonshire, where Thackeray spent his holidays between 1823 and 1828. "Chatteris" is Exeter; and "Bagmouth" is Sidmouth.

Pendrag'on, probably a title meaning "chief leader in war." Dragon is Welsh for a "leader in war," and pen for "head" or "chief." The title was given to Uther, brother of Constans, and father of prince Arthur. Like the word "Pharaoh," it is used as a proper name without the article.—Geoffrey: Chronicle, vi. (1142).

> Once I read
> That stout Pendragon in his litter, sick,
> Came to the field and vanquished his foes.
> Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI. act iii. sc. 2 (1589).

Penel'ope's Web, a work that never progresses. Penelopê, the wife of Ulysses, being importunated by several suitors during her husband's long absence, made reply that she could not marry again, even if Ulysses were dead, till she had finished weaving a shroud for her aged father-in-law. Every night she unravelled what she had woven during the day, and thus the shroud made no progress towards completion.—Greek Mythology. (See VORTIGERN'S TOWER.)

(The French say of a work "never ending, still beginning," c'est l'ouvrage de Pénélope.)

Ovid, in his Heroïdes (4 syl.), has an hypothetical letter supposed to have been written by Penelopê (4 syl.) to Ulysses, telling him that the Greeks had returned from Troy, and imploring him to hasten home. She tells him how weary she is at his long absence, and at being so pestered for her hand and kingdom.

Penel'ophon, the beggar maid loved by king Cophetua. Shakespeare calls the name Zenelophon in Love's Labour's Lost, act iv. sc. 1 (1594).—Percy: Reliques, I. ii. 6 (1765).

Penelva (The Exploits and Adventures of), part of the series called Le Roman des Romans, pertaining to "Am'adis of Gaul." This part was added by an anonymous Portuguese (fifteenth century).

Penfeather (Lady Penelope), the lady patroness at the Spa.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Pengwern (The Torch of), prince Gwenwyn of Powys-land.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Pengwinion (Mr.), from Cornwall; a Jacobite conspirator with Mr. Redgauntlet.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Peninsular War (The), the war carried on by sir Arthur Wellesley against Napoleon in Portugal and Spain (1808–1814).

(Southey wrote a History of the Peninsular War, 1822–32.)

Penitents of Love (Fraternity of the), an institution established in Languedoc in the thirteenth century, consisting of knights and esquires, dames and damsels, whose object was to prove the excess of their love by bearing, with invincible constancy, the extremes of heat and cold. They passed the greater part of the day abroad, wandering about from castle to castle, wherever they were summoned by the inviolable duties of love and gallantry; so that many of these devotees perished by the inclemency of the weather, and received the crown of martyrdom to their profession. See Warton: History of English Poetry (1781).

Pen'lare (Richard), a cheerful man, both frank and free, but married to Rebecca a terrible shrew. Rebecca knew if she once sat in St. Michael's chair (on St. Michael's Mount, in Cornwall), that she would rule her husband ever after; so she was very desirous of going to the mount. It so happened that Richard fell sick, and both vowed to give six marks to St. Michael if he recovered. Richard did recover, and they visited the shrine; but while Richard was making the offering, Rebecca ran to seat herself in St. Michael's chair. No sooner, however, had she done so, than she fell from the chair, and was killed in the fall.—Southey: St. Michael's Chair (a ballad, 1798).

Penniless (The). Kaiser Maximilian I. (1459, 1493–1519) was called in Italian Massimilliano Pochidanario.

Walter the Penniless. Gautier sans avoir of Burgundy, joint leader of the First Crusade with Peter the Hermit, in 1096.

Sir Walter Scott, writing to his son, offered to give him £20 if he could tell him who Walter the Penniless was, and where he marched to.

Penny (Jock), a highwayman.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Penruddock (Roderick), a "philosopher," or rather a recluse, who spent his time in reading. By nature gentle, kind-hearted, and generous, but soured by wrongs. Woodville, his trusted friend, although he knew that Arabella was betrothed to Roderick, induced her father to give her to him, because he was the richer man; and Roderick's life was blasted. Woodville had a son, who reduced himself to positive indigence by gambling, and sir George Penruddock was the chief creditor. Sir George dying, all his property came to his cousin Roderick, who now had ample means to glut his revenge on his treacherous friend; but his heart softened. First, he settled all "the obligations, bonds, and mortgages, covering the whole Woodville property," on Henry Woodville, that he might marry Emily Tempest; and next, he restored to Mrs. Woodville "her settlement, which, in her husband's desperate necessity, she had resigned to him;" lastly, he sold all his own estates, and retired again to a country cottage to his books and solitude.—Cumberland: The Wheel of Fortune (1779).

Who has seen J. Kemble [1757–1823] in "Penruddock," and not shed tears from the deepest sources? His tenderly putting away the son of his treacherous friend, . . . examining his countenance, and then exclaiming, in a voice which developed a thousand mysterious feelings, "You are very like your mother;" was sufficient to stamp his excellence in the pathetic line of acting.—Mrs. R. Trench: Remains (1822).

Pentap'olin, "with the naked arm," king of the Garaman'teans, who always went to battle with his right arm bare. Alifanfaron emperor of Trap'oban wished to marry his daughter, but, being refused, resolved to urge his suit by the sword. When don Quixote saw two flocks of sheep coming along the road in opposite directions, he told Sancho

Panza they were the armies of these two puissant monarchs met in array against each other.—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iii. 4 (1605).

Pentecôte Vivante (La), cardinal Mezzofanti, who was the master of fifty or fifty-eight languages (1774–1849).

Penthe'a, sister of Ith'oclês, betrothed to Or'gilus by the consent of her father. At the death of her father, Ithoclês compelled her to marry Bass'anes whom she hated, and she starved herself to death.—Ford: The Broken Heart (1633).

Penthesile'a, queen of the Amazons, slain by Achilles. S. Butler calls the name "Penthes'ilê."

> And laid about in fight more busily
> Than th' Amazonian dame Penthesile.

Pen'theus (3 syl.), a king of Thebes, who tried to abolish the orgies of Bacchus, but was driven mad by the offended god. In his madness he climbed into a tree to witness the rites, and being descried was torn to pieces by the Bacchantes.

> As when wild Pentheus, grown mad with fear,
> Whole troops of hellish hags about him spies.
> Giles Fletcher: Christ's Triumph over Death (1610).

Pen'theus (2 syl.), king of Thebes, resisted the introduction of the worship of Dyon'sos (Bacchus) into his kingdom, in consequence of which the Bacchantes pulled his palace to the ground; and Pentheus, driven from the throne, was torn to pieces on mount Cithæron by his own mother and her two sisters.

> He the fate [may sing]
> Of sober Pentheus.
> Akenside: Hymn to the Naiads (1767).

Pentweazel (Alderman), a rich City merchant of Blowbladder Street. He is wholly submissive to his wife, whom he always addresses as "Chuck."

Mrs. Pentweazel, the alderman's wife, very ignorant, very vain, and very conceitedly humble. She was a Griskin by birth, and "all her family by the mother's side were famous for their eyes." She had an aunt among the beauties of Windsor, "a perdigious fine woman. She had but one eye, but that was a piercer, and got her three husbands. We was called the gimlet family." Mrs. Pentweazel says her first likeness was done after "Venus de Medicis the sister of Mary de Medicis."

Sukey Pentweazel, daughter of the alderman, recently married to Mr. Deputy Dripping of Candlewick Yard.

Carel Pentweazel, a schoolboy, who had been under Dr. Jerks, near Doncaster, for two years and a quarter, and had learnt all As in Præsenti by heart. The terms of this school were £10 a year for food, books, board, clothes, and tuition.—Foote: Taste (1753).

Peon'ia or Pæon'ia, Macedonia; so called from Pæon son of Endymion.

> Made Macedon first stoop, then Thessaly and Thrace;
> His soldiers there enriched with all Peonia's spoil.
> Drayton: Polyolbion, viii. (1612).

People (Man of the), Charles James Fox (1749–1806).

People I have Met, sketches by N. P. Willis (1850). (See PENCILLINGS BY THE WAY.)

Pepin (William), a White friar and most famous preacher at the beginning of the sixteenth century. His sermons, in eight volumes quarto, formed the grand repertory of the preachers of those times.

> Qui nescit Pepinare, nescit prædicare.—Proverb.

Pepper Gate, a gate on the east side of the city of Chester. It is said that the daughter of the mayor eloped, and the mayor ordered the gate to be closed. Hence the proverb, When your daughter is stolen, close Pepper Gate; or, in other words, Lock the stable door when the steed is stolen.—Albert Smith: Christopher Tadpole, i.

Pepperpot (Sir Peter), a West Indian epicure, immensely rich, conceited, and irritable.—Foote: The Patron (1764).

Peppers. (See WHITE HORSE OF THE PEPPERS.)

Peps (Dr. Parker), a court physician who attended the first Mrs. Dombey on her death-bed. Dr. Peps always gave his patients (by mistake, of course) a title, to impress them with the idea that his practice was exclusively confined to the upper ten thousand.—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Pepys's Diary. Pepys died in 1703, but his Diary was not published till 1825. It is in shorthand, and is a record of his personal doings and sayings from January, 1600, to May, 1669.

> Lord Jeffrey says: He [Pepys] finds time to go to every play, to every execution, to every procession, fire, concert, riot, trial, review, city feast, and picture gallery, that he can hear of. Nay, there seems scarcely to have been a school examination, a wedding, christening, charity sermon, bull-baiting, philosophical meeting, or private merry-making in his neighbourhood, at which he is not sure to make his appearance. . . . He is the first to hear all the court scandal and all the public news, to observe the changes of fashion and the downfall of parties,—to pick up funny gossip and to detail philosophical intelligence,—to criticize every new house and carriage that is built,—every new book or new beauty that appears,—every measure the king adopts, and every mistress he discards.

Perceforest (King), the hero of a prose romance "in Greek." The MS. is said to have been found by count William of Hainault in a cabinet at "Burtimer" Abbey, on the Humber; and in the same cabinet was deposited a crown, which the count sent to king Edward. The MS. was turned into Latin by St. Landelain, and thence into French under the title of La Tres Elegante Delicieux Melliflue et Tres Plaisante Hystoire du Tres Noble Roy Perceforest (printed at Paris in 1528).

(Of course, this pretended discovery is only an invention. An analysis of the romance is given in Dunlop's History of Fiction.)

 He was called "Perceforest" because he dared to pierce, almost alone, an enchanted forest, where women and children were most evilly entreated. Charles IX. of France was especially fond of this romance.

Perch, messenger in the house of Mr. Dombey, merchant, whom he adored, and plainly showed by his manner to the great man: "You are the light of my eyes," "You are the breath of my soul." —Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Perche Notary (A), a lawyer who sets people together by the ears, one who makes more quarrels than contracts. The French proverb is, Notaire du Perche, qui passe plus d'échalliers que de contrat.

Le Perche, qui se trouve partagé entre les départements de l'Orne et d'Eure-et-Loir, est un contrée fort boisée, dans laquelle la plupart des champs sont entourés de haies, dans lesquelles sont ménagées certaines ouvertures propres à donner passage aux piétons seulement, et que l'on nomme échalliers. —Hilairs le Gai.

Percinet, a fairy prince, in love with Graciosa. The prince succeeds in thwarting the malicious designs of Grognon, the step-mother of the lovely princess.—Percinet and Graciosa (a fairy tale).

Percival (Sir), the third son of sir Pellinore king of Wales. His brothers were sir Aglavale and sir Lamorake Dornar, usually called sir Lamorake de Galis (Wales). Sir Tor was his half-brother. Sir Percival caught a sight of the holy graal after his combat with sir Ector de Maris (brother of sir Launcelot), and both were miraculously healed by it. Crétien de Troyes wrote the Roman de Perceval (before 1200), and Menessier produced the same story in a metrical form (See PARZIVAL, p. 810.)

Sir Percivale had a glimmering of the Sancgreall and of the maiden that bare it, for he was perfect and clean. And forthwith they were both as whole of limb and hide as ever they were in their life days. "Oh mercy! said sir Percivale, "what may this mean?" . . . "I wot well," said sir Ector . . . "it is the holy vessel, wherein is a part of the holy blood of our blessed Saviour; but it may not be seen but by a perfect man."—Pt. iii. 14.

 Sir Percival was with sir Bors and sir Galahad when the visible Saviour went into the consecrated wafer which was given them by the bishop. This is called the achievement of the quest of the holy graal (pt. iii. 101, 102).—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur (1470).

Percy Anecdotes (The), nominally by Sholto and Reuben Percy, but really by J. C. Robinson and Thomas Byerley (1820–1823).

Percy Arundel lord Ashdale, son of lady Arundel by her second husband. A hot, fiery youth, proud and overbearing. When grown to manhood, a "sea-captain," named Norman, made love to Violet, lord Ashdale's cousin. The young "Hotspur" was indignant and somewhat jealous, but discovered that Norman was the son of lady Arundel by her first husband, and the heir to the title and estates. In the end, Norman agreed to divide the property equally, but claimed Violet for his bride.—Lord Lytton: The Sea-Captain (1839).

The derivation of Percy from Pierce-eye is, of course, philologically worthless. The legend that the founder of the race lost an eye in a sally has not one iota of truth for its support. The incident was made up to support a false etymology.

Per'dita, the daughter of the queen Hermionê, born in prison. Her father, king Leontês, commanded the infant to be cast on a desert shore, and left to perish there. Being put to sea, the vessel was driven by a storm to the "coast" of Bohemia, and the infant child was brought up by a shepherd, who called its name Perdîta. Flor'izel, the son of the Bohemian king, fell in love with Perdita, and courted her under the assumed name of Doriclês; but the king, having tracked his son to the shepherd's hut, told Perdita that if she did not at once discontinue this foolery, he would command her and the shepherd too to be put to death.

Florizel and Perdita now fled from Bohemia to Sicily, and being introduced to the king, it was soon discovered that Perdita was Leontês's daughter. The Bohemian king, having tracked his son to Sicily, arrived just in time to hear the news, and gave his joyful consent to the union which he had before forbidden.—Shakespeare: The Winter's Tale (1604).

Per'dita, Mrs. Mary Robinson (born Darby), the victim of George IV. while prince of Wales. She first attracted his notice while acting the part of "Perdita," and the prince called himself "Florizel." George prince of Wales settled a pension for life on her, £500 a year for herself, and £200 a year for her daughter. She caught cold one winter, and, losing the use of her limbs, could neither walk nor stand (1758–1799, not 1800 as is given usually).

She was unquestionably very beautiful, but more so in the face than in the figure; and she had a remarkable facility in adapting her deportment to dress. . . . To-day she was a paysanne with a straw hat tied at the back of her head . . . yesterday she had been the dressed belle of Hyde Park, trimmed, powdered, patched, painted to the utmost power of rouge and white lead; to-morrow she would be the cravated Amazon of the riding-house: but be she what she might, the hats of the fashionable promenaders swept the ground as she passed. When she rode forth in her high phaeton, three candidates and her husband were outriders.—Mrs. Hawkins: Memoirs (1800).

Perdrix, toujours Perdrix! Walpole tells us that the confessor of one of the French kings, having reproved the monarch for his conjugal infidelities, was asked what dish he liked best. The confessor replied, "Partridges;" and the king had partridges served to him every day, till the confessor got quite sick of them. "Perdrix, toujours perdrix!" he would exclaim, as the dish was set before him. After a time, the king visited him, and hoped his favourite dish had been supplied him. "Mais oui," he replied, "toujours perdrix, toujours perdrix!" "Ah, ah!" said the amorous monarch, "and one mistress is all very well, but not perdrix, toujours perdrix!" (See Notes and Queries, 337, October 23, 1869.)

The story is at least as old as the Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles, compiled between 1450–1461, for the amusement of the dauphin of France, afterwards Louis XI. (Notes and Queries, November 27, 1869.)

 Farquhar parodies the French expression into, "Soup for breakfast, soup for dinner, soup for supper, and soup for breakfast again."—Farquhar: The Inconstant, iv. 2 (1702).

Père Duchesne (Le), Jacques René Hébert; so called from the Père Duchesne, a newspaper of which he was the editor (1755–1794).

Pread (Sir), the Black Knight of the Black Lands. Called by Tennyson, "Night" or "Nox." He was one of the four brothers who kept the passages to Castle Perilous, and was overthrown by sir Gareth.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 126 (1470); Tennyson: Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette").

Peredur (Sir), son of Evrawc, called "sir Peredur of the Long Spear," one of the knights of the Round Table. He was for many years called "The Dumb Youth," from a vow he made to speak to no Christian till Angharad of the Golden Hand loved him better than she loved any other man. His great achievements were: (1) the conquest of the Black Oppressor, who oppressed every one and did justice to no one; (2) killing the Addanc of the Lake, a monster that devoured daily some of the sons of the king of Tortures: this exploit he was enabled to achieve by means of a stone which kept him invisible; (3) slaying the three hundred heroes privileged to sit round the countess of the Achievements: on the death of these men, the seat next the countess was freely given to him; (4) the achievement of the Mount of Mourning, where was a serpent with a stone in its tail which would give inexhaustible wealth to its possessor: sir Peredur killed the serpent, but gave the stone to his companion, earl Etlym of the east country. These exploits over, sir Peredur lived fourteen years with the empress Cristinobyl the Great.

 Sir Peredur is the Welsh name for sir Perceval of Wales.—The Mabinogion (from the Red Book of Hergest, twelfth century).

Per'egrine (3 syl.), a sentimental prig, who talks by the book. At the age of 15, he runs away from home, and Job Thornberry lends him ten guineas, "the first earnings of his trade as a brazier." After thirty years' absence, Peregrine returns, just as the old brazier is made a bankrupt "through the treachery of a friend." He tells the bankrupt that his loan of ten guineas has by honest trade grown to 10,000, and these he returns to Thornberry as his own by right. It turns out that Peregrine is the eldest brother of sir Simon Rochdale, J.P., and when sir Simon refuses justice to the old brazier, Peregrine asserts his right to the estate, etc. At the same time, he hears that the ship he thought was wrecked has come safe into port, and has thus brought him £100,000.—Colman: John Bull (1805).

Peregrine Pickle, the hero of a novel entitled The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle, by Smollett (1751). Peregrine Pickle is a savage, ungrateful spendthrift, fond of practical jokes, and suffering with evil temper the misfortunes brought about by his own wilfulness.

"The Memoirs of a Lady of Quality" included in this novel are those of lady Vane, whose gallantries were matters of common talk.

Peregri'nus Proteus, a cynic philosopher, born at Parium, on the Hellespont. After a youth spent in debauchery and crimes, he turned Christian; and, to obliterate the memory of his youthful ill practices, divided his inheritance among the people. Ultimately he burned himself to death in public at the Olympic games, A.D. 165. Lucan has held up this immolation to ridicule in his Death of Peregrinus.

(C. M. Wieland has an historic romance in German entitled Peregrinus Proteus, 1733-1813.)

Per'es (Gil), a canon, and the eldest brother of Gil Blas's mother. Gil was a little punchy man, three feet and a half high, with his head sunk between his shoulders. He lived well, and brought up his nephew and godchild Gil Blas. "In so doing, Perês taught himself also to read his breviary without stumbling." He was the most illiterate canon of the whole chapter.—Lesage: Gil Blas, i. (1715).

Peres (Michael), the "copper captain." A brave Spanish soldier, duped into marrying Estifania, a servant of intrigue, who passed herself off as a lady of property. Being reduced to great extremities, Estifania pawned the clothes and valuables of her husband; but these "valuables" were but of little worth—a jewel which sparkled as the "light of a dark lanthorn," a "chain of whitings' eyes" for pearls, and as for his clothes, she tauntingly says to her husband—

Put these and them [his jewels] on, and you're a man of copper,
A copper, copper captain.
Fletcher: Rule a Wife and Have a Wife (1640).

Perfidious Albion. Great Britain was so called by Napoleon I.

Peri, plu. Peris, gentle, fairy-like beings of Eastern mythology, offspring of the fallen angels, and constituting a race of beings between angels and men. They direct with a wand the pure-minded the way to heaven, and dwell in Shadu'kiam' and Am'bre-abad, two cities subject to Eblis. (See PARADISE AND THE PERI, p. 804.)

Are the peries coming down from their spheres?
Beckford: Vathek (1786).

Pe'richole, the heroine of Offenbach's comic operetta. She is a street singer of Lima, in Peru.

Perichole (La), the chère amie of the late viceroy of Peru. She was a foreigner, and gave great offence by calling, in her bad Spanish, the creole ladies pericholas, which means "flaunting and bedizened creatures." They, in retaliation, nicknamed the favourite La Perichole.

Pericles, the Athenian who raised himself to royal supremacy (died B.C. 429). On his death-bed he overheard his friends recalling his various merits, and told them they had forgotten his greatest of all: "that he had caused no Athenian through his administration to put on mourning," i.e. he had caused no one to be put to death.

Peri'cles was a famous man of warre . . .
Yet at his death he rather did rejoice
In clemencie. . . . "Be still," quoth he, "you grave Athenians"
(Who whisperèd and told his valiant acts);
"You have forgot my greatest glorie got:
For yet by me nor mine occasion
Was never sene a mourning garment worn."
Gascoigne: The Steele Glas (died 1577).

Per'icles prince of Tyre, a voluntary exile, in order to avert the calamities which Anti'ochus emperor of Greece vowed against the Tyrians. Periclês, in his wanderings, first came to Tarsus, which he relieved from famine, but was obliged to quit the city to avoid the persecution of Antiochus. He was then shipwrecked, and cast on the shore of Pentap'olis, where he distinguished himself in the public games, and being introduced to the king, fell in love with the princess Thaïs'a and married her. At the death of Antiochus, he returned to Tyre; but his wife, supposed to be dead in giving birth to a daughter (Marina), was thrown into the sea. Periclês entrusted his infant child to Cleon (governor of Tarsus) and his wife Dionysia, who brought her up excellently well. But when she became a young woman, Dionysia employed a man to murder her, and when Periclês came to see her, he was shown a splendid sepulchre which had been raised to her honour. On his

The best work of Benvenuto Cellini is a bronze statue of Perseus, in the Loggia del Lanzi, of Florence.

Perseus's Horse, a ship. Perseus, having cut off Medusa's head, made the ship Pegasê, the swiftest ship hitherto known, and generally called "Perseus's flying horse."

> The thick-ribbed bark thro' liquid mountains cut . . .
> Like Perseus' horse.
> Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, act I. sc. 3 (1602).

Persian Creed (The). Zoroaster supposes there are two gods or spirit-principles—one good and the other evil. The good is Yezad, and the evil Ahriman.

> Les mages reconnaissaient deux principes, un bon et un mauvais: le premier, auteur de tout bien; et l'autre, auteur de tout mal. . . . Ils nommaient le bon principe "Yezad" ou "Yezdam," ce que les Grecs, ont traduit par Oromazes; et le mauvais "Ahriman," en Grec Arimannis.—Noël: Dict. de la Fable, article "Arimane."

> And that same . . . doctrine of the Persian
> Of the two principles, but leaves behind
> As many doubts as any other doctrine.
> Byron: Don Juan, xiii. 41 (1824).

Persian Letters, or, according to the proper title, "Letters from a Persian in England to his Friend in Ispahan," by lord Lyttelton (1735).

Persian Tales, translated from the French by Ambrose Philips (1709).

Perth (The Fair Maid of), Catharine or Katie Glover, "universally acknowledged to be the most beautiful young woman of the city or its vicinity." Catharine was the daughter of Simon Glover (the glover of Perth), and married Henry Smith the armourer.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

(For the plot of the novel, see FAIR MAID, p. 352.)

Pertinax (Sir). (See MACSYCOPHANT.)

Pertolope (Sir), the Green Knight. One of the four brothers who kept the passages to Castle Perilous. He was overthrown by sir Gareth. Tennyson calls him "Evening Star" or "Hesperus."—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 127 (1470); Tennyson: Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette").

∴ It is evidently a blunder to call the Green Knight "Evening Star" and the Blue Knight "Morning Star." In the original tale the combat with the "Green Knight" was at dawn, and with the "Blue Knight" at sunset. The error arose from not recollecting that day began in olden times with the preceding eve, and ended at sunset.

Perviz (Prince), son of the sultan Khrosrou-schar of Persia. At birth he was taken away by the sultana's sisters, and set adrift on a canal, but was rescued and brought up by the superintendent of the sultan's gardens. When grown to manhood, "the talking bird" told the sultan that Perviz was his son, and the young prince, with his brother and sister, were restored to their rank and position in the empire of Persia.—Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters," the last tale).

Prince Pervis's String of Pearls. When prince Perviz went on his exploits, he gave his sister Parizādê a string of pearls, saying, "So long as these pearls move readily on the string, you will know that I am alive and well; but if they stick fast and will not move, it will signify that I am dead."—Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters," the last tale).

¶ Birtha's emerald ring, and prince Bahman's knife gave similar warnings. (See BIRTHA and BAHMAN.)

Pescec'ola, the famous swimmer drowned in the pool of Charybdis. The tale tells us how Pescecola dived once into the pool and came up safe; but king Frederick then threw into the pool a golden cup, which Pescecola dived for, and was never seen again.—Schiller: The Diver (1781).

Pest (Mr.), a barrister.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Pet, a fair girl with rich brown hair hanging free in natural ringlets. A lovely girl, with a free, frank face, and most wonderful eyes—so large, so soft, so bright, and set to perfection in her kind, good face. She was round, and fresh, and dimpled, and spoilt, most charmingly timid, most bewitchingly self-willed. She was the daughter of Mr. Meagles, and married Henry Gowan.—Dickens: Little Dorrit (1857).

Petaud (King), a king whose subjects are all his equals; all talkers and no hearers, all masters and no subjects.

Pétaud (King), king of the beggars. (Latin, peto, "I beg.")

> "It is an old saying," replied the abbé Huet, "Pétaud being derived from the Latin peto, 'I beg.'"—Asylum Christi, ii.

The court of king Pétaud, a disorderly assembly, a place of utter confusion, a bear-garden.

> On n'y respecte rien, chacun y parle haut,
> Et c'est tout justement la cour du roi Pétaud.
> Molière: Tartuffe, i. 1 (1664).

La cour du roi Pétaud, où chacun est maître.—French Proverb.

Petella, the waiting-woman of Rosalura and Lillia-Bianca, the two daughters of Nantolet.—Fletcher: The Wild-goose Chase (1652).

Peter, the stupid son of Solomon butler of the count Wintersen. He grotesquely parrots in an abridged form whatever his father says. Thus: Sol. "We are acquainted with the reverence due to exalted personages." Pet. "Yes, we are acquainted with exalted personages." Again: Sol. "Extremely sorry it is not in my power to entertain your lordship." Pet. "Extremely sorry." Sol. "Your lordship's most obedient, humble, and devoted servant." Pet. "Devoted servant."—B. Thompson: The Stranger (1797).

Peter, the pseudonym of John Gibson Lockhart, in a work entitled Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk (1819).

Peter (Lord), the pope of Rome.—Swift: Tale of a Tub (1704); and Dr. Arbuthnot's History of John Bull (1713).

Peter Boats, fishing-boats on the Thames and Medway. So named from St. Peter, the patron saint of fishermen. The keys of St. Peter form a part of the armorial bearings of the Fishmongers' Company.—Smyth: Sailor's Word-book.

Peter Botte, a steep, almost perpendicular "mountain" in the Mauritius, more than 2800 feet in height. It is so called from Peter Botte, a Dutch sailor, who scaled it and fixed a flag on its summit, but lost his life in coming down.

Peter Paragraph. In Foote's comedy The Orators. It is a caricature of George Faulkner, who (like Foote) was lame. Faulkner was proprietor of the Dublin Journal, and published Swift's works. He lived in Parliament Street, Dublin.

The word is sometimes spelt Faulkener.

Peter Parley, the assumed name of Samuel G. Goodrich. (See PARLEY.)

Peter Peebles, a litigious, hard-hearted drunkard, noted for his lawsuit. —Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Peter Pindar, the pseudonym of Dr. John Wolcot, of Dodbroke, Devonshire (1738–1819).

Peter Plymley's Letters, attributed to the Rev. Sydney Smith (1769–1845).

Peter Porcupine, William Cobbett, when he was a tory. He brought out Peter Porcupine's Gazette, The Porcupine Papers, etc. (1762–1835).

Peter Simple, a sea-story, by captain Marryat (1834).

Peter Wilkins, the hero of a tale of adventures, by Robert Pultock, of Clifford's Inn. His "flying women" (gawreys) suggested to Southey the "glêndoveer" in The Curse of Kehama.

Peter of Provence and the Fair Magalo'na, the chief characters of a French romance so called. Peter comes into possession of Merlin's wooden horse.

Peter the Great of Egypt, Mehemet Ali (1768–1848).

Peter the Hermit, a gentleman of Amiens, who renounced the military life for the religious. He preached up the first crusade, and put himself at the head of 100,000 men, all of whom, except a few stragglers, perished at Nicea.

(He is introduced by Tasso in Jerusalem Delivered (1575); and by sir W. Scott in Count Robert of Paris, a novel laid in the time of Rufus. A statue was erected to him at Amiens in 1854.)

Peter the Wild Boy. (See WILD BOY.)

Peter's Gate (St.), the gate of purgatory, guarded by an angel stationed there by St. Peter. Virgil conducted Dantê through hell and purgatory; and Beatrice was his guide through the planetary spheres. Dantê says to the Mantuan bard—

> . . . lead me,
> That I St. Peter's gate may view . . .
> Onward he [Virgil] moved, I close his steps pursued.
> Dante: Hell, i. (1300).

Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk. Sketches of Scotch society, by Lockhart (1819).

Peterborough, in Northamptonshire; so called from Peada (son of Pendar king of Mercia), who founded here a monastery in the seventh century. In 1541 the monastery (then a mitred abbey) was converted by Henry VIII. into a cathedral and bishop's see. Before Peada's time, Peterborough was a village called Medhamsted. — Drayton: Polyolbion, xxiii. (1622).

Peterloo (The Field of), an attack of the military on a reform meeting held in St. Peter's Field, at Manchester, August 16, 1819. Of course the word is a skit on that of "Waterloo."

Peterson, a Swede, who deserts from Gustavus Vasa to Christian II. king of Denmark. — Brooke: Gustavus Vasa (1730).

Petit André, the executioner.—Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.).

Petit Perroquet, a king's gardener, with whom the king's daughter fell in love. It so happened that a prince was courting the lady, and, being jealous of Petit Perroquet, said to the king that the young man boasted he could bring hither Tartaro's horse. Now, Tartaro was a huge giant and a cannibal. Petit Perroquet, however, made himself master of the horse. The prince next told the king that the young gardener boasted he could get possession of the giant's diamond. This he also contrived to obtain. The prince then told the king that the young man boasted he could bring hither the giant himself; and the way he accomplished the feat was to cover himself first with honey, and then with feathers and horns. Thus disguised, he told the giant to get into the coach he was driving, and he drove him to the king's court, and then married the princess.—Rev. W. Webster: Basque Legends (1877).

Pe'to, lieutenant of "captain" sir John Falstaff's regiment. Pistol was his ensign or ancient, and Bardolph his corporal.—Shakespeare: 1 and 2 Henry IV. (1597–8).

Petow'ker (Miss Henrietta), of the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane. She marries Mr. Lillyvick, the collector of water-rates, but elopes with an officer.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Petrarch (The English). Sir Philip Sidney (1554–1586) is so called by sir Walter Raleigh.

Petrarch and Laura. Laura was a lady of Avignon, the wife of Hugues de Sade, née Laura de Noves, the mistress of the poet Petrarch. (See LAURA AND PETRARCH, p. 597.)

Petrarch of Spain, Garcilaso de la Vega, born at Toledo (1530–1568, or according to others, 1503–1536).

Petrified City (The), Ishmonie, in Upper Egypt. So called from the number of statues seen there, and traditionally said to be men, women, children, and dumb animals turned into stone.—Kircher: Mundus Subterraneus (1664).

Petro'nius (C. or T.), a kind of Roman "beau Brummell" in the court of Nero. He was a great voluptuary and profligate, whom Nero appointed Arbiter Elegantiæ, and considered nothing comme il faut till it had received the sanction of this dictator-in-chief of the imperial pleasures. Tigellinus accused him of treason, and Petronius committed suicide by opening his veins (A.D. 66).

> Behold the new Petronius of the day,
> The arbiter of pleasure and of play.
> Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Petruccio = Pe-truch'-e-o, governor of Bologna. — Fletcher: The Chances (1620).

Petru'chio, a gentleman of Vero'na, who undertakes to tame the haughty Katharina, called "the Shrew." He marries her, and without the least personal chastisement reduces her to lamb-like submission. Being a fine compound of bodily and mental vigour, with plenty of wit, spirit, and good-nature, he rules his subordinates dictatorially, and shows he will have his own way, whatever the consequences.—Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew (1594).

(C. Leslie says Henry Woodward (1717–1777) was the best "Petruchio," "Copper Captain," "captain Flash," and "Bobadil.")

¶ John Fletcher wrote a comedy called The Tamer Tamed, in which Petruchio is supposed to marry a second wife, by whom he is hen-pecked (1647).

Petticoat Lane, Whitechapel. It was previously called "Hog Lane," and is now called "Middlesex Street."

Petty Cury, in Cambridge, is not petit écurie, but "parva cokeria;" petit curary, from curāre, "to cook or cure meat."

Pet'ulant, an "odd sort of small wit," "without manners or breeding." In controversy he would bluntly contradict, and he never spoke the truth. When in his "club," in order to be thought a man of intrigue, he would steal out quietly, and then in disguise return and call for himself, or leave a letter for himself. He not unfrequently mistook impudence and malice for wit; and he looked upon a modest blush in woman as a mark of "guilt or ill-breeding."—Congreve: The Way of the World (1700).

Peu-à-Peu. So George IV. called prince Leopold. Stein, speaking of the prince's vacillating conduct in reference to the throne of Greece, says of him, "He has no colour," i.e. no fixed plan of his own, but is blown about by every wind.

Peveril (William), natural son of William the Conqueror, and ancestor of Peveril of the Peak.

Sir Geoffrey Peveril, a cavalier, called "Peveril of the Peak."

Lady Margaret Peveril, wife of sir Geoffrey.

Julian Peveril, son of sir Geoffrey; in love with Alice Bridgenorth. He was named by the author after Julian Young, son of the famous actor.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

"Whom is he called after?" said Scott. "It is a fancy name," said Young; "in memoriam of his mother, Julia Ann." "Well, it is a capital name for a novel, I must say," he replied. In the very next novel by the author of Waverley, the hero's name is "Julian." I allude, of course, to Peveril of the Peak.—J. Young: Memoirs, 19.

Peveril of the Peak, the longest of all sir W. Scott's novels, and the most heavy (1823). It contains 108 characters, besides courtiers, officers, etc.

 The hero of this novel is Julian Peveril a cavalier, and the heroine is Alice Bridgenorth, daughter of major Bridgenorth a Roundhead. And the main subject of the novel is the "Popish Plot." Of course the hero and heroine marry.

The novel is crowded with well-known historic characters; amongst them are Charles II., his brother James duke of York, prince Rupert, Antony Cooper earl of Shrewsbury, lord Rochester, George Villiers duke of Buckingham, sir Edmondbury Godfrey, Hudson the dwarf, colonel Blood, Titus Oates, Settle the poet, etc.

Amongst the women are the widow of Charles I., the wife of Charles II., with his mistresses, Nell Gwynne and Louise Querouaille, etc.

Phædra, daughter of Minos, and second wife of Theseus. (See PHEDRE.)

(E. Smith wrote a tragedy called Phædra and Hippolytus (1708); Racine wrote a famous tragedy called Phèdre in 1677; and Pradon a tragedy called Phèdre et Hippolyte in 1677.)

Phædra, waiting-woman of Alcme'na (wife of Amphit'ryon). A type of venality of the lowest and grossest kind. Phædra is betrothed to judge Gripus, a stupid magistrate, ready to sell justice to the highest bidder. Neither Phædra nor Gripus forms any part of the dramatis personæ of Molière's Amphitryon (1668).—Dryden: Amphitryon (1690).

Phædria, the impersonation of wantonness. She is handmaid of the enchantress Acrasia, and sails about Idle Lake in a gondola. Seeing sir Guyon, she ferries him across the lake to the floating island, where he is set upon by Cymoch'les. Phædria interposes, and ferries sir Guyon (the knight Temperance) over the lake again.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. (1590).

Phædrus's Fables, in Latin, about A.D. 25. Translated into English verse by Christopher Smart, in 1765.

Pha'eton (3 syl.), son of Helios and Clymĕnê. He obtained leave to drive his father's sun-car for one day, but was overthrown, and nearly set the world on fire. Jove or Zeus (1 syl.) struck him with a thunderbolt for his presumption, and cast him into the river Po.

Phal'aris, tyrant of Agrigentum, in Sicily. (For the tale of the "Brazen Bull," see PERILLOS, p. 828.)

Letters of Phalaris, certain apocryphal letters ascribed to Phalaris the tyrant, and published at Oxford, in 1718, by Charles Boyle. There was an edition in 1777 by Walckenaer; another in 1823 by G. H. Schæfer, with notes by Boyle and others. Bentley maintained that the letters were forgeries, and no doubt he was right.

Phaleg, James Forbes, a Scotchman, who had been travelling tutor to the family of the duke of Ormond; and was accused of repaying his patron's favours by a scandalous intrigue.—Absalom and Achitophel by Dryden and Tate.

Here Phaleg, the lay Hebronite [Scotchman], is come,
'Cause, like the rest, he could not live at home. . . .
Slim Phaleg . . . at the table fed,
Returned the grateful product to the bed.
Part ii. 329–350 (1682).

Phallas, the horse of Heraclius. (Greek, phalios, "a grey horse.")

Phantom Ship (The), Carlmilhan or Carmilhan, the phantom ship on which the kobold of the Cape sits, when he appears to doomed vessels.

. . . that phantom ship, whose form
Shoots like a meteor thro' the storm . . .
And well the doomed spectators know
'Tis harbinger of wreck and woe.
Sir W. Scott: Rokeby, ii. 11 (1813).

Pha'on, a young man who loved Claribel, but, being told that she was unfaithful to him, watched her. He saw, as he thought, Claribel holding an assignation with some one he supposed to be a groom. Returning home, he encountered Claribel herself, and "with wrathfull hand he slew her innocent." On the trial for murder, "the lady" was proved to be Claribel's servant. Phaon would have slain her also, but while he was in pursuit of her he was attacked by Furor.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 4, 28, etc. (1590).

¶ Shakespeare's Much Ado about Nothing is a similar story. Both are taken from a novel by Belleforest, copied from one by Bandello. Ariosto, in his Orlando Furioso, has introduced a similar story (bk. v.), and Turbervil's Gencura is the same tale.

Pharamond, king of the Franks, who visited, incognito, the court of king Arthur, to obtain by his exploits a place among the knights of the Round Table. He was the son of Marcomir, and father of Clodion.

(Calprenède has an heroic romance so called, which (like his Cleopatra and Cassandra) is a Roman de Longue Haleine, 1612–1666.)

Phar'amond, prince of Spain, in the drama called Philaster or Love Lies a-bleeding, by Beaumont (?) and Fletcher (date uncertain, probably about 1662).

Beaumont died 1616.

Pharaoh, the titular name of all the Egyptian kings till the time of Solomon, as the Roman emperors took the titular name of Cæsar. After Solomon's time, the titular name Pharaoh never occurs alone, but only as a forename: as Pharaoh Necho, Pharaoh Hophra, Pharaoh Shishak. After the division of Alexander's kingdom, the kings of Egypt were all called Ptolemy, generally with some distinctive aftername, as Ptolemy Philadelphos, Ptolemy Euergetês, Ptolemy Philopător, etc.—Selden: Titles of Honour, v. 50 (1614).

(1) Pharaohs before Solomon (mentioned in the Old Testament)—

1. Pharaoh contemporary with Abraham (Gen. xii. 15). I think this was Osirtesen I. (dynasty xii.).

2. The good Pharaoh who advanced Joseph (Gen. xli.). I think this was Apōphis (one of the Hyksos).

3. The Pharaoh who "knew not Joseph" (Exod. i. 8). I think this was Amen'ophis I. (dynasty xviii.). There seem to have been great political changes even before Joseph's death: evidently his power was considerably less, and the honoured strangers in Goshen were apparently beginning to feel the effects of the change, for Joseph comforts them with the promise that they shall surely be "visited" (Gen. l. 24), and begs them to take his bones with them when they are brought up out of the land—no grand funeral would be his.

4. The Pharaoh at the flight of Moses, I think, was Thothmes II.

5. The Pharaoh drowned in the Red Sea. As this was at least eighty years after the persecutions began, most probably this was another king. Some say it was Menephthes son of Ram'eses II., but it seems quite impossible to reconcile the account in Exodus with any extant historical account of Egypt (Exod. xiv. 28). (?) Was it Thothmes II.?

6. The Pharaoh who protected Hadad (1 Kings xi. 19).

7. The Pharaoh whose daughter Solomon married (1 Kings iii. 1; ix. 16). I think this was Psusennes I. (dynasty xxi.).

(2) Pharaohs after Solomon's time (mentioned in the Old Testament)—

1. Pharaoh Shishak, who warred against Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 25, 26; 2 Chron. xii. 2).

2. The Pharaoh called "So" king of Egypt, with whom Hoshea made an alliance (2 Kings xvii. 4).

3. The Pharaoh who made a league with Hezekiah against Sennacherib. He is called Tirhākah (2 Kings xviii. 21; xix. 9).

4. Pharaoh Necho, who warred against Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 29, etc.).

5. Pharaoh Hophra, the ally of Zedekiah. Said to be Pharaoh Apries, who was strangled, B.C. 569–525 (Jer. xliv. 30).

(Bunsen's solution of the Egyptian dynasties cannot possibly be correct.)

(3) Pharaohs noted in romance—

1. Cheops or Suphis I., who built the great pyramid (dynasty iv.).

2. Cephrenês or Suphis II. his brother, who built the second pyramid.

3. Mencherês, his successor, who built the most beautiful, though not the largest, of the pyramids.

4. Memnon or A-menophis III., whose musical statue is so celebrated (dynasty xviii.).

5. Sethos I. the Great, whose tomb was discovered by Belzoni (dynasty xix.).

6. Sethos II., called "Proteus," who detained Helen and Paris in Egypt (dynasty xix.).

7. Phuōris or Thuōris, who sent aid to Priam in the siege of Troy.

8. Rampsinitus or Rameses Nēter, the miser, mentioned by Herodotos (dynasty xx.).

9. Osorthon IV. (or Osorkon), the Egyptian Hercules (dynasty xxiii.).

Pharaoh's Daughter. The daughter of Pharaoh who brought up Moses was, according to the Talmud, Bathia. (Bithiah, see 1 Chron. iv. 18.) Josephus says her name was Thumuthia.

Bathia, the daughter of Pharaoh, came attended by her maidens, and entering the water she chanced to see the box of bulrushes, and, pitying the infant, she rescued him from death.—The Talmud, vi.

Pharaoh's Wife, Asia daughter of Mozāhem. Her husband cruelly tormented her because she believed in Moses. He fastened her hands and feet to four stakes, and laid a millstone on her as she lay in the hot sun with her face upwards; but angels shaded off the sun with their wings, and God took her, without dying, into paradise.—Sale: Al Korân, lxvi. note.

Among women, four have been perfect: Asia, wife of Pharaoh; Mary, daughter of Imrân; Khadijah, daughter of Khowailed, Mahomet's first wife; and Fātima, Mahomet's daughter.—Attributed to Mahomet.

 There is considerable doubt respecting the Pharaoh meant—whether the Pharaoh whose daughter adopted Moses, or the Pharaoh who was drowned in the Red Sea. The tale suits the latter king far better than it does the first.

Pharian Fields, Egypt; so called from Pharos, an island on the Egyptian coast, noted for its lighthouse.

And passed from Pharian fields to Canaän land.
Milton: Psalms cxiv. (1623).

Pharsa'lia (The), a Latin historic poem in ten books, by Lucan, the subject being the fall and death of Pompey. It opens with the passage of Cæsar across the Rubicon. This river formed the boundary of his province, and his crossing it was virtually a declaration of war (bk. i.). Pompey is appointed by the senate general of the army to oppose him (bk. v.); Cæsar retreats to Thessaly; Pompey follows (bk. vi.), and both prepare for war. Pompey, being routed in the battle of Pharsalia, flees (bk. vii.), and, seeking protection in Egypt, is met by Achillas the Egyptian general, who murders him, cuts off his head, and casts his body into the sea (bk. viii.). Cato leads the residue of Pompey's army to Cyrēnê, in Africa (bk. ix.); and Cæsar, in pursuit of Pompey, landing at Alexandria, is hospitably entertained by Cleopatra (bk. x.). While here, he tarries in luxurious dalliance, the palace is besieged by Egyptians, and Cæsar with difficulty escapes to Pharos. He is closely pursued, hemmed in on all sides, and leaps into the sea. With his imperial robe held between his teeth, his commentaries in his left hand, and his sword in his right, he buffets with the waves. A thousand javelins are hurled at him, but touch him not. He swims for empire, he swims for life; 'tis Cæsar and his fortunes that the waves bear on. He reaches his fleet, and is received by his soldiers with thundering applause. The stars in their courses fought for Cæsar. The sea-gods were with him, and Egypt with her host was a by-word and a scorn.

 Bk. ix. contains the account of the African serpents, by far the most celebrated passage of the whole poem. The following is a pretty close translation of the serpents themselves. It would occupy too much room to give their onslaught also:—

Here all the serpent deadly brood appears:
First the dull Asp its swelling neck uprears;
The huge Hemorrhois, vampire of the blood;
Chersyders, too, that poison field and flood;
The Water serpent, tyrant of the lake;
The hooded Cobra; and the Plantain snake;
Here with distended jaws the Prēster strays;
And Seps, whose bite both flesh and bone decays
The Amphisbæna with its double head,
One on the neck, and one of tail instead;
The horned Cerastês; and the Hammodyte,
Whose sandy hue might balk the keenest sight;
A feverish thirst betrays the Dipsas' sting;
The Scytâla, its slough that casts in spring;
The Natrix here the crystal stream pollutes;
Swift thro' the air the venomed Javelin shoots;
Here the Pareas, moving on its tail,
Marks in the sand its progress by its trail;
The speckled Cenchris darts its devious way,
Its skin with spots as Theban marble gay:
The hissing Sibila; and Basilisk,
With whom no living thing its life would risk,
Where'er it moves none else would dare remain,
Tyrant alike and terror of the plain.

E. C. B.

Amphisbæna, one that walks both ways (Greek, amphis baino).
Chersyder, one that lives on land or in water (Greek, chersos hudor).
Dipsas, one that provokes thirst (Greek, dipsa).
Natrix, the swimmer (Latin, nato).
Prēster, one that burns you (Greek, prēthō).
Seps, one that provokes thirst (Greek, sēpō).
Sibila, the hisser (Latin, sibilo).

(In this battle Pompey had 45,000 legionaries, 7000 horse, and a large number of auxiliaries. Cæsar had 22,000 legionaries, and 1000 horse. Pompey's battle cry was, Herculês invictus! That of Cæsar was, Venus victrix! Cæsar won the battle.)

Translations of the Pharsalia—
GORGE, in 1614, translated bk. i. into English verse.
MARLOWE translated the Pharsalia into blank verse in 1600; and this translation abounds in grand lines.
MAY, in 1627–1633, made a translation.
ROWE, in 1728, published an excellent translation.

Pheasant. So called from Phasis, a stream of the Black Sea.

There was formerly at the fort of Poti a preserve of pheasants, which birds derive their European name from the river Phasis (the present Rion).—Monteith.

Phebe (2 syl.), a shepherdess beloved by the shepherd Silvius. While Rosalind was in boy's clothes, Phebe fell in love with the stranger, and made a proposal of marriage; but when Rosalind appeared in her true character, and gave her hand to Orlando, Phebe was content to accept her old love Silvius.—Shakespeare: As You Like It (1600).

Phedre (or PHÆDRA), daughter of Minos king of Crete, and wife of Theseus. She conceived a criminal love for Hippolytos her step-son, and, being repulsed by him, accused him to her husband of attempting to dishonour her. Hippolytos was put to death, and Phædra, wrung with remorse, strangled herself.

(This has been made the subject of tragedy by Eurip'idês in Greek, Sen'eca in Latin, Racine in French (1677). "Phédre" was the great part of Mlle. Rachel; she first appeared in this character in 1838.)

N.B.—Pradon, under the patronage of the duchesse de Bouillon and the duc de Nevers, produced, in 1677, his tragedy of Phédre in opposition to that of Racine. The duke even tried to hiss down Racine's play, but the public judgment was more powerful than the duke; and while it pronounced decidedly for Racine's chef d'œuvre, it had no tolerance for Pradon's production.

Phelis "the Fair," wife of sir Guy earl of Warwick. Also spelt Felice.

Phid'ias (The French), (1) Jean Goujon; also called "The Correggio of Sculptors." He was slain in the St. Bartholomew Massacre (1510–1572). (2) J. B. Pigalle (1714–1785).

Phil (Little), the lad of John Davies the old fisherman.—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Philaminte (3 syl.), wife of Chrysale the bourgeois, and mother of Armande, Henriette, Ariste, and Bélise.—Molière: Les Femmes Savantes (1672).

Philan'der, of Holland, was a guest at the house of Arge'o baron of Servia, and the baron's wife Gabri'na fell in love with him. (For the rest of the tale, see GABRINA, p. 399.)—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Philan'der, a male coquet; so called from Philander the Dutch knight, who coquetted with Gabrina. To "philander" is to wanton or make licentious love to a woman.

Yes, I'll baste you together, you and your Philander.—Congreve: The Way of the World (1700).

Philan'der, prince of Cyprus, passionately in love with the princess Ero'ta.—Fletcher: The Laws of Candy (1647).

Philanthropist (The), John Howard (1726–1790).

Philario, an Italian, at whose house Posthu'mus made his silly wager with Iachimo. (See POSTHUMUS.)—Shakespeare: Cymbeline (1605).

Phila'rio, an Italian improvisatore, who remained faithful to Fazio even in disgrace.—Dean Milman: Fazio (1815).

Philaster (Prince), heir to the crown of Messi'na. Euphra'sia, who was in love with Philaster, disguised herself as a boy, and, assuming for the nonce the name of Bellario, entered the prince's service. Philaster, who was in love with the princess Arethu'sa, transferred Bellario to her service, and then grew jealous of Arethusa's love for the young page.—Fletcher: Philaster or Love Lies a-bleeding (? 1622).

(There is considerable resemblance between Euphrasia and "Viola" in Twelfth Night, by Shakespeare, 1614.)

Philax, cousin of the princess Imis. (For the tale, see IMIS, p. 520.)—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Palace of Revenge," 1682).

Phile'mon (3 syl.), an aged rustic, who, with his wife Baucis, hospitably received Jupiter and Mercury, after every one else had refused to receive them. (For the rest, see BAUCIS, p. 97.)—Greek Mythology.

Philinte (2 syl.), friend of Alceste (2 syl.).—Molière: Le Misanthrope (1666).

PHILIP, father of William Swidger.

His favourite expression was, "Lord, keep my memory green. I am 87."—Dickens: The Haunted Man (1848).

Philip, the butler of Mr. Peregrine Lovel; a hypocritical, rascally servant, who pretends to be most careful of his master's property, but who in reality wastes it most recklessly, and enriches himself with it most unblushingly. Being found out, he is summarily dismissed.—Townley: High Life Below Stairs (1759).

Philip (Father), sacristan of St. Mary's.—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (time, Elizabeth).

Philip (Adventures of) "on his way through the world, showing who robbed him, who helped him, and who passed him by." On the lines of Gil Blas.—Thackeray (1860).

Philip Augustus, king of France, introduced by sir W. Scott in The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Philip II. of Spain, a name hated by the English, was not an immoral man, but a very bigoted one. He had no personal doubt that the religious views of the catholics were right, and those of protestants were wrong; and he acted on the principle, "Do I not hate them, O Lord, that hate Thee? . . . Yea, I hate them with a perfect hatred, and treat them as mine enemies" (Ps. cxxxix. 21, 22). It is not true that he died in agony of mind, for his end was peace.

Philip Nye, brought up for the Anglican Church; but he became a presbyterian, and afterwards an independent. He was noted for the cut of his beard.

> This reverend brother, like a goat,
> Did wear a tail upon his throat,
> But set in such a curious frame,
> As if 'twere wrought in filograin,
> And cut so even, as if 't had been > Drawn with a pen upon his chin.

S. Butler: On Philip Nye's Thanksgiving Beard (1652).

Philip Quarl, a castaway sailor, who becomes a hermit. His "man Friday" is a chimpanzee.—Philip Quarl (1727).

Philip Wakeham, in love with Maggie Tulliver; but the connection was broken off by the parents of the two parties.—George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross): The Mill on the Floss (1860).

Philip's Four Daughters. We are told, in Acts xxi. 9, that Philip the deacon or evangelist had four daughters which did prophesy.

> Helen, the mother of great Constantine,
> Nor yet St. Philip's daughters were like thee [Joan of Arc].
> Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. act i. sc. 2 (1589).

Philippe, a parched and haggard wretch. Though infirm and bent beneath a pile of years, yet was he shrewd and cunning, greedy of gold, malicious, and was looked on by the common people as an imp of darkness. It was this old villain who told Thancmar that the provost of Bruges was the son of a serf on Thancmar's estates.—Knowles: The Provost of Bruges (1836).

Philippe Egalité (4 syl.), Louis Philippe duc d'Orléans (1747-1793).

Philipson (The elder), John earl of Oxford, an exiled Lancastrian, who goes to France disguised as a merchant.

Arthur Philipson, sir Arthur de Vere, son of the earl of Oxford, whom he accompanies to the court of king René of Provence.—Sir W. Scott: Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Philisides (3 syl.), sir Philip Sidney (1554-1586).

N.B.—The accent is sometimes on the first syllable, and sometimes on the second: as—

> It was the harp of Phil'isides, now dead . . .
> And now in heaven a sign it doth appear,
> The Harp well known beside the Northern Bear.
> Spenser: The Ruins of Time (1591).

But bishop Hall writes—

> He knew the grace of that new elegance
> That sweet Philis'ides fetched of late from France.

∴ Phili[p] Sid[ney], with the Greek termination, makes Phili-sides.

Philistines, the vulgar rich, the pretentiously genteel not in "society," the social snobs, distinguished for their much jewellery and loud finery.

> Demonstrative and offensive whiskers, which are the special inheritance of the British Philistines.—Mrs. Oliphant: Phœbe, Junr., i. 2.

During the æsthetic craze, Philistine was the name given to those who were not in sympathy with the new ideas.

> The Philistine or the Proletarian still finds undiluted satisfaction in the old and oldest forms of art and poetry, if he knows himself unwatched by the scornful eye of the votary of fashion.—Max Nordau: Degeneration, p. 7.

Phillips (Jessie), the title and chief character of a novel by Mrs. Trollope, the object being an attack on the new poor-law system (1843).

Phillis, a drama written in Spanish by Lupercio Leonardo of Argensola.—Cervantes: Don Quixote (1605-15).

Phillis, a pastoral name for a maiden.

> Where Corydon and Thyrsis, met,
> Are at their savoury dinner set,
> Of herbs and other country messes,
> Which the neat-handed Phillis dresses.
> Milton: L'Allegro (1638).

Phillis, "the Exigent," asked "Damon thirty sheep for a kiss;" next day, she promised him "thirty kisses for a sheep;" the third day, she would have given "thirty sheep for a kiss;" and the fourth day, Damon bestowed his kisses for nothing on Lizette.—Dufresny: La Coquette de Village (1715).

Philo, a Pharisee, one of the Jewish sanhedrim, who hated Caiaphas the high priest for being a Sadducee. Philo made a vow in the judgment-hall, that he would take no rest till Jesus was numbered with the dead. In bk. xiii. he commits suicide, and his soul is carried to hell by Obaddon the angel of death.—Klopstock: The Messiah, iv. (1771).

Philoclea, that is, lady Penelopê Devereux, with whom sir Philip Sidney was in love. The lady married another, and sir Philip transferred his affections to Frances Walsingham, eldest daughter of sir Francis Walsingham.

Philocte'tes (4 syl.), one of the Argonauts, who was wounded in the foot while on his way to Troy. An oracle declared to the Greeks that Troy could not be taken "without the arrows of Herculês," and as Herculês at death had given them to Philoctêtês, the Greek chiefs sent for him, and he repaired to Troy in the tenth and last year of the siege.

> All dogs have their day, even rabid ones. Sorrowful, incurable Philoctetes Marat, without whom Troy cannot be taken.—Carlyle.

Philomel, daughter of Pandîon king of Attica. She was converted into a nightingale.

> And the mute Silence hist along,
> 'Less Philomel will deign a song
> In her sweetest, saddest plight,
> Smoothing the rugged brow of night. . . .
> Sweet bird, that shunn'st the noise of folly,
> Most musical, most melancholy.
> Milton: Il Penseroso (1638).

Philopolimarchides (Philo-polli-mark'-i-dees), the braggart in Plautus.

Philosopher (The). Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, the Roman emperor, was so called by Justin Martyr (121, 161–180).

Leo VI. emperor of the East (866, 886–911).

Porphyry, the Neoplatonist (223–304).

Alfred or Alured, surnamed "Anglicus," was also called "The Philosopher" (died 1270).

Philosopher Prince (The). Frederick II. of Prussia was so called by Voltaire (1712, 1740–1786).

The Philosopher of China, Confucius (B.C. 551–479).

The Philosopher of Ferney, Voltaire, who lived at Ferney, near Geneva, for the last twenty years of his life (1694–1778).

The Philosopher of Malmesbury, Thomas Hobbes, author of Leviathan. He was born at Malmesbury (1588–1679).

The Philosopher of Persia, Abou Ebn Sina of Shiraz (died 1037).

The Philosopher of Sans Souci, Frederick the Great of Prussia (1712, 1740–1786).

∴ Frederick elector of Saxony was called "The Wise" (1463, 1544–1554).

The Philosopher of Wimbledon, John Horne Tooke, author of the Diversions of Purley. He lived at Wimbledon, near London (1736–1812).

(For the philosophers of the different Greek sects, as the Cynic, Cyrenaic, Eleac, Eleatic, Epicurean, Heraclitian, Ionic, Italic, Megaric, Peripatetic, Sceptic, Socratic, Stoic, etc., see Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 971.)

Philosopher's Stone (The), a red powder of amalgam, to drive off the impurities of baser metals. The word stone, in this expression, does not mean the mineral so called, but the substratum or article employed to produce a certain effect. (See ELIXIR VITÆ, p. 320.)

Philosophers (The Five English): (1) Roger Bacon, author of Opus Majus (1214–1292); (2) sir Francis Bacon, author of Novum Orgănum (1561–1626); (3) the Hon. Robert Boyle (1627–1691); (4) John Locke, author of a treatise on the Human Understanding and Innate Ideas (1632–1704); (5) sir Isaac Newton, author of Princip'ia (1642–1727).

Philosophy (The Father of), (1) Albrecht von Haller of Berne (1708–1777). (2) Roger Bacon is also so called (1214–1292).

The Father of Inductive Philosophy, Francis Bacon lord Verulam (1561–1626).

The Father of Roman Philosophy, Cicero the orator (B.C. 106–43).

The Nursing Mother of Philosophy, Mme. de Boufflers was so called by Marie Antoinette.

Phil'ostrate (3 syl.), master of the revels to Theseus (2 syl.) king of Athens. —Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream (1592).

Philo'tas, son of Parmenio, and commander of the Macedonian cavalry. He was charged with plotting against Alexander the Great. Being put to the rack, he confessed his guilt, and was stoned to death.

The king may doom me to a thousand tortures,
Ply me with fire, and rack me like Philotas,
Ere I will stoop to idolize his pride.
Lee: Alexander the Great, i. 1 (1678).

Philot'ime (4 syl., "love of glory"), daughter of Mammon, whom the money-god offers to sir Guyon for a wife; but the knight declines the honour, saying he is bound by love-vows to another.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 7 (1590).

Philot'imus, Ambition personified. (Greek, philo-timos, "ambitious, covetous of honour.")—Phineas Fletcher: The Purple Island, viii. (1633).

Philot'imus, steward of the house in the suite of Gargantua.—Rabelais: Gargantua, i. 18 (1533).

Philox'enos, an epicure who wished he had the neck of a crane, that he might enjoy the taste of his food longer before swallowing it.—Aristotle: Ethics, iii. 10.

Philpot (senior), an avaricious old hunks, and father of George Philpot. The old City merchant cannot speak a sentence without bringing in something about money. "He wears square-toed shoes with little tiny buckles, a brown coat with small brass buttons. . . . His face is all shrivelled and pinched with care, and he shakes his head like a mandarin upon a chimney-piece" (act i. 1).

When I was very young, I performed the part of "Old Philpot," at Brighton, with great success, and next evening I was introduced into a club-room full of company. On hearing my name announced, one of the gentlemen laid down his pipe, and, taking up his glass, said, "Here's to your health, young gentleman, and to your father's too. I had the pleasure of seeing him last night in the part of 'Philpot,' and a very nice clever old gentleman he is. I hope, young sir, you may one day be as good an actor as your worthy father."—Munden.

George Philpot. The profligate son of old Philpot, destined for Maria Wilding, but the betrothal is broken off, and Maria marries Beaufort. George wants to pass for a dashing young blade, but is made the dupe of every one. "Bubbled at play; duped by a girl to whom he paid his addresses; cudgelled by a rake; laughed at by his cronies; snubbed by his father; and despised by every one."—Murphy: The Citizen (1757 or 1761).

Philtra, a lady of large fortune, betrothed to Bracidas; but, seeing the fortune of Amidas daily increasing, and that of Bracidas getting smaller and smaller, she forsook the declining fortune of her first lover, and attached herself to the more prosperous younger brother.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 4 (1596).

Phineus [Fi'-nuce], a blind sooth-sayer, who was tormented by the harpies. Whenever a meal was set before him, the harpies came and carried it off. The Argonauts delivered him from these pests in return for his information respecting the route they were to take in order to obtain the golden fleece. (See TIRESIAS.)

Tiresias and Phineus, prophets old.
Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 36 (1665).

Phiz, the pseudonym of Hablot K. Browne, who illustrated the Pickwick Papers (1836), Nicholas Nickleby, and most of Charles Dickens's works of fiction. He also illustrated the Abbotsford edition of the Waverley Novels.

Phleg'ethon (3 syl.), one of the five rivers of hell. The word means the "river of liquid fire." (Greek, phlĕgo, "to burn.") The other rivers are Styx, Ach'eron, Cocy'tus, and Le'thê. (See STYX.)

Fierce Phlegethon,
Whose waves of torrent fire inflame with rage.
Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 580 (1665).

Phleg'rian Size, gigantic. Phlegra or the Phlegræ'an plain, in Macedon, is where the giants attacked the gods, and were defeated by Hercŭlês. Drayton makes the diphthong æ a short i—

Whose only love surprised those of the Phlegrian size,
The Titanois, that once against high heaven durst rise.
Drayton: Polyolbion, vi. (1612).

Phobbs. Captain and Mrs. Phobbs, with Mrs. major Phobbs a widow, sister-in-law to the captain, in Lend Me Five Shillings, by J. M. Morton.

Pho'cion, husband of Euphra'sia "the Grecian daughter."—Murphy: The Grecian Daughter (1772).

Pho'cyas, general of the Syrian army in the siege of Damascus. Phocyas was in love with Eudo'cia, daughter of Eu'menês the governor, but when he asked the governor's consent, Eumenês sternly refused to give it. After gaining several battles, Phocyas fell into the hands of the Arabs, and consented to join their army to revenge himself on Eumenês. The Arabs triumphed, and Eudocia was taken captive, but she refused to wed a traitor. Ultimately, Phocyas died, and Eudocia entered a convent.—Hughes: Siege of Damascus (1720).

Phœbus, the sun-god. Phœbe (2 syl.), the moon-goddess.—Greek Mythology.

Phœbus's Son. Pha'ëton obtained permission of his father to drive the sun-car for one day, but, unable to guide the horses, they left their usual track, the car was overturned, and both heaven and earth were threatened with destruction. Jupiter struck Phaeton with his thunderbolt, and he fell headlong into the Po.

. . . like Phœbus' fayrest child,
That did presume his father's fiery wayne,
And flaming mouths of steeds unwonted wilde,
Thro' highest heaven with weaker hand to rayne; . . .
He leaves the welkin way most beaten playne,
And, wrapt with whirling wheels, inflames the skyen
With fire not made to burne, but fayrely for to shyne.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, i. 4, 10 (1596).

Phœbus. Gaston de Foix was so called, from his great beauty (1488–1512).

Phœbus (Captain), the betrothed of Fleur de Marie. He also entertains a base love for Esmeralda, the beautiful gipsy girl.—Victor Hugo: Notre Dame de Paris (1831).

Phœnix (The) is said to live 500 (or 1000) years, when it makes a nest of spices, burns itself to ashes, and comes forth with renewed life for another similar period. There never was but one phœnix.

The bird of Arabye . . . Can never dye,
And yet there is none, But only one,
A phenix. . . . Plinni showeth al In his Story Naturel,
What he doth finde Of the phenix kinde.
Skelton: Philip Sparow (time, Henry VIII.).

Phœnix Theatre (The), now called Drury Lane.

Phœnix Tree, the rasin, an Arabian tree. Floro says, "There never was but one, and upon it the phœnix sits."—Dictionary (1598).

 Pliny thinks the tree on which the phœnix was supposed to perch is the date tree (called in Greek phoinix), adding that "the bird died with the tree, and revived of itself as the tree revived."—Nat. Hist., xiii. 4.

Now I will believe
That there are unicorns; that in Arabia
There is one tree, the phœnix' throne; one phœnix
At this hour reigning there.
Shakespeare: The Tempest, act iii. sc. 3 (1609).

Phorcus, "the old man of the sea." He had three daughters, with only one eye and one tooth between 'em.—Greek Mythology.

This is not "the old man of the sea" mentioned in the Arabian Nights ("Sinbad the sailor").

Phor'mio, a parasite, who is "all things to all men."—Terence: Phormio.

Phosphor, the light-bringer or morning star; also called Hesperus, and by Homer and Hesiod Heös-phoros.

Bright Phosphor, fresher for the night,
Sweet Hesper-Phosphor, double name.
Tennyson: In Memoriam, cxxi. (1850).

Phos'phorus, a knight called by Tennyson "Morning Star," but, in the History of Prince Arthur, "sir Persaunt of India or the Blue Knight." One of the four brothers who kept the passages to Castle Perilous.—Tennyson: Idylls of the King ("Gareth and Lynette"); sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 131 (1470).

 It is evidently a blunder to call the Blue Knight "Morning Star" and the Green Knight "Evening Star." In the old romance, the combat with the "Green Knight" is at dawn, and with the "Blue Knight" at nightfall. The error arose from not bearing in mind that our forefathers began the day with the preceding eve, and ended it at sunset.

Phraortes (3 syl.), a Greek admiral.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Phrat, the Eu-phrat-es, now called Forat or Frat.

Phry'ne (2 syl.), an Athenian courtezan of surpassing beauty. Apellês's celebrated picture of "Venus Anadyoměnê" was drawn from Phrynê, who entered the sea with hair dishevelled for a model. The "Cnidian Venus" of Praxitêlês was also taken from the same model.

(Some say Campaspê was the academy figure of the "Venus Anadyomenê." Pope has a poem called Phryne.)

Phunky (Mr.), serjeant Snubbins's junior in the defence of Pickwick, in the suit of Mrs. Bardell v. Pickwick.—Dickens: Pickwick Papers (1836).

Phyllis, a Thracian who fell in love with Demoph'oön. After some months of mutual affection, Demophoon was obliged to sail for Athens, but promised to return within a month. When a month had elapsed, and Demophoon did not put in an appearance, Phyllis so mourned for him that she was changed into an almond tree, hence called by the Greeks Phylia. In time, Demophoon returned, and, being told the fate of Phyllis, ran to embrace the tree, which, though bare and leafless at the time, was instantly covered with leaves, hence called Phylla by the Greeks.

Let Demophoon tell
Why Phyllis by a fate untimely fell.
Ovid: Art of Love, iii.

Phyllis, a country girl in Virgil's third and fifth Eclogues. Hence, a rustic maiden. Also spelt Phillis (q.v.).

Phyllis, in Spenser's eclogue Colin Clout's Come Home Again, is lady Carey, wife of sir George Carey (afterwards lord Hunsdon, 1596). Lady Carey was Elizabeth, the second of the six daughters of sir John Spenser of Althorpe, ancestor of the noble houses of Spenser and Marlborough.

No less praiseworthy are the sisters three,
The honour of the noble family
Of which I meanest boast myself to be, . . .
Phyllis, Charyllis, and sweet Amaryllis:
Phyllis the fair is eldest of the three.
Spenser: Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1594).

Phyllis and Brunetta, rival beauties. Phyllis procured for a certain festival some marvellous fabric of gold brocade in order to eclipse her rival; but Brunetta dressed the slave who bore her train in a robe of the same material and cut in precisely the same fashion, while she herself wore simple black. Phyllis died of mortification.—The Spectator (1711, 1712, 1714).

Phynnodderee, a Manx spirit, similar to the Scotch brownie. Phynnodderee is an outlawed fairy who absented himself from Fairy-court on the great levée day of the harvest moon. Instead of paying his respects to king Oberon, he remained in the glen of Rushen, dancing with a pretty Manx maid whom he was courting.

Physic a Farce is (His). Sir John Hill began his career as an apothecary in St. Martin's Lane, London; became author, and amongst other things wrote farces. Garrick said of him—

For physic and farces, his equal there scarce is:
His farces are physic, his physic a farce is.

Physician (The Beloved), St. Luke the evangelist (Col. iv. 14).

Physician or Fool. Plutarch, in his treatise On the Preservation of Health, tells us that Tiberius used to say, "A man is his own physician or a fool at forty."

Physicians (The prince of), Avicenna the Arabian (980-1037).

Physigna'thos, king of the frogs, and son of Pelus ("mud"). Being wounded in the battle of the frogs and mice by Troxartas the mouse king, he flees ingloriously to a pool, "and, half in anguish of the flight, expires" (bk. iii. 112). The word means "puffed chaps."

Great Physignathos I from Pelus' race,
Begot in fair Hydromedê's embrace.
Parnell: Battle of the Frogs and Mice, i. 1 (about 1712)

Physiology (The Father of), Albert von Haller (1708-1777).

Pibrac (Seigneur de), poet and diplomatist, author of Cinquante Quatrains (1574). Gorgibus bids his daughter study Pibrac instead of trashy novels and poetry.

Lisez-moi, comme il faut, au lieu de ces sornettes,
Les Quatrains de Pibrac, et les doctes Tablettes
Du conseiller Matthieu; l'ouvrage est de valeur, . . .
La Guide des pécheurs est encore un bon livre.
Molière: Sganarelle, l. 1 (1660).

(Pierre Matthieu, poet and historian, wrote Quatrains de la Vanité du Monde, 1629.)

Pibroch. It is remarkable how common the error is of mistaking this word, which is the name of a kind of air, generally martial, for the instrument on which it is played, namely, the bag-pipe. Even lord Byron falls into it in his poem Oscar of Alva—

It is not war their ald demands,
The pibroch plays the song of peace.
Oscar of Alva, 24.

Picanninies (4 syl.), little children; the small fry of a village.—West Indian Negroes.

There were at the marriage the picanninies and the Jobililies, but not the Grand Panjandrum.—Yonge.

Picaresco School (The), romances of roguery; called in Spanish Gusto Picaresco. Gil Blas is one of this school of novels.

Pic'atrix, the pseudonym of a Spanish monk; author of a book on demonology.

When I was a student, . . . that same Rev. Picatrix . . . was wont to tell us that devils did naturally fear the bright flashes of swords as much as he feared the splendour of the sun.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, iii. 29 (1545).

Piccolino, an opera by Mons. Guiraud (1875); libretto by MM. Sardou and Nuittier. This opera was first introduced to an English audience in 1879. The tale is this: Marthe, an orphan girl adopted by a Swiss pastor, is in love with Frédéric Auvray, a young artist, who "loved and left his love." Marthe plods through the snow from Switzerland to Rome to find her young artist, but, for greater security, puts on boy's clothes, and assumes the name of Piccolino. She sees Frédéric, who knows her not; but, struck with her beauty, makes a drawing of her. Marthe discovers that the faithless Frédéric is paying his addresses to Elena (sister of the duke Strozzi). She tells the lady her love-tale; and Frédéric, deserted by Elena, forbids Piccolino (Marthe) to come into his presence again. The poor Swiss wanderer throws herself into the Tiber, but is rescued. Frédéric repents, and the curtain falls on a reconciliation and approaching marriage.

Pickel-Herringe (5 syl.), a popular name among the Dutch for a buffoon; a corruption of pickle-härin ("a hairy sprite"), answering to Ben Jonson's Puck-hairy.

Pickle (Peregrine), a savage, ungrateful spendthrift, fond of practical jokes. He delighted in tormenting others, but bore with ill temper the misfortunes which resulted from his own wilfulness. His ingratitude to his uncle, and his arrogance to Hatchway and Pipes, are simply hateful.—Smollett: The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle (1751).

Pickle the Spy, so scandalously mixed up with the history of "Bonnie prince Charles," was Alastair Ruadh McDonnell, heir to the chieftainship of Glengarry. Charles Edward (the young Pretender) trusted this Scotch Judas to the very last.—Andrew Lang: Pickle the Spy (1896).

Pickwick (Samuel), the chief character of The Pickwick Papers, a novel by C. Dickens. He is general chairman of the Pickwick Club. A most verdant, benevolent, elderly gentleman, who, as member of a club instituted "for the purpose of investigating the source of the Hampstead ponds," travels about with three members of the club, to whom he acts as guardian and adviser. The adventures they encounter form the subject of the Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club (1836).

(The original of Seymour's picture of "Pickwick" was a Mr. John Foster (not the biographer of Dickens, but a friend of Mr. Chapman's the publisher). He lived at Richmond, and was "a fat old beau," noted for his "drab tights and black gaiters.")

Pickwick Club (The Posthumous Papers of the), the title of the novel generally called the "Pickwick Papers," by Dickens (1836). Mr. Seymour was retained to illustrate the papers, and after his death H. K. Browne, who assumed the name of Phiz. The first five monthly parts were a decided failure, but on the introduction of Sam Weller the sale rose twentyfold, and the publishers sent Dickens £500 on the publication of the twelfth number, and at the close of the novel they sent him a further sum of £3000 over and above his stipulated agreement.

(Moncrieff dramatized the novel under the title of Sam Weller or The Pickwickians. In this version Mrs. Bardell is the wife of Alfred Jingle, and therefore her charge against Pickwick involved her in a charge of bigamy, while Messrs. Dodson and Fogg are sent to Newgate for conspiracy.)

Pickwickian Sense (In a), an insult whitewashed. Mr. Pickwick accused Mr. Blotton of acting in "a vile and calumnious manner;" whereupon Mr. Blotton retorted by calling Mr. Pickwick "a humbug." But it finally was made to appear that both had used the offensive words only in a parliamentary sense, and that each entertained for the other "the highest regard and esteem." So the difficulty was easily adjusted, and both were satisfied.

Lawyers and politicians daily abuse each other in a Pickwickian sense.—Bowditch.

Pic'rochole, king of Lernê, noted for his choleric temper, his thirst for empire, and his vast but ill-digested projects.—Rabelais: Gargantua, i. (1533).

(Supposed to be a satire on Charles V. of Spain.)

The rustics of Utopia one day asked the cake-bakers of Lernê to sell them some cakes. A quarrel ensued, and king Picrochole marched with all his army against Utopia, to extirpate the insolent inhabitants.—Bk. i. 33.

Picrochole's Counsellors. The duke of Smalltrash, the earl of Swashbuckler, and captain Durtaille, advised king Picrochole to leave a small garrison at home, and, dividing his army into two parts, to send one south and the other north. The former was to take Portugal, Spain, Italy, Germany (but was to spare the life of Barbarossa), to take the islands of the Mediterranean, the Morea, the Holy Land, and all Lesser Asia. The northern army was to take Belgium, Denmark, Prussia, Poland, Russia, Norway, Sweden, sail across the Sandy Sea, and meet the other half at Constantinople, when king Picrochole was to divide the nations amongst his great captains. Echephron said he had heard about a pitcher of milk which was to make its possessor a nabob, and give him for wife a sultan's daughter; only the poor fellow broke his pitcher, and had to go supperless to bed. (See BOBADIL, p. 133.)—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, i. 33 (1533).

A shoemaker bought a ha'p'orth of milk; with this he intended to make butter, the butter was to buy a cow, the cow was to have a calf, the calf was to be sold, and the man to become a nabob; only the poor dreamer cracked the jug, spilt the milk, and had to go supperless to bed.—Pantag'ruel, i. 33.

Picts, the Caledonians or inhabitants of Albin, i.e. Northern Scotland. The Scots came from Scotia, north of Ireland, and established themselves under Kenneth M'Alpin in 843.

(The etymology of "Picts" from the Latin picti ("painted men"), is about equal to Stevens's etymology of the word "brethren" from tabernacle, "because we breathe therein.")

Picture (The), a drama by Massinger (1629). The story of this play (like that of the Twelfth Night, by Shakespeare) is taken from the novelletti of Bandello of Piedmont, who died 1555.

Pi'cus, a soothsayer and augur; husband of Canens. In his prophetic art he made use of a woodpecker (picus), a prophetic bird sacred to Mars. Circe fell in love with him, and, as he did not respond to her advances, changed him into a woodpecker, whereby he still retained his prophetic power.

"There is Picus," said Maryx. "What a strange thing is tradition! Perhaps it was in this very forest that Circe, gathering her herbs, saw the bold friend of Mars on his fiery courser, and tried to bewitch him, and, failing, metamorphosed him so. What, I wonder, ever first wedded that story to the woodpecker?"—Ouida: Ariadné, i. 11.

Pied Horses. Motassem had 130,000 pied horses, which he employed to carry earth to the plain of Catoul; and having raised a mound of sufficient height to command a view of the whole neighbourhood, he built thereon the royal city of Samarah.—Khondemyr: Khelassat al Akhbar (1495).

The Hill of the Pied Horses, the site of the palace of Alkoremmi, built by Motassem, and enlarged by Vathek.

Pied Piper of Hameln (or Hamelin), in Westphalia, a piper named Bunting, from his dress. He undertook, for a certain sum of money, to free the town of Hamelin, in Brunswick, of the rats which infested it; but when he had drowned all the rats in the river Weser, the townsmen refused to pay the sum agreed upon. The piper, in revenge, collected together all the children of Hameln, and enticed them by his piping into a cavern in the side of the mountain Koppenberg, which instantly closed upon them, and 130 went down alive into the pit (June 26, 1284). The street through which Bunting conducted his victims was Bungen, and from that day to this no music is ever allowed to be played in this particular street.—Verstegan: Restitution of Decayed Intelligence (1634).

(Robert Browning has a poem entitled The Pied Piper, which he wrote for little Willie Macready, and did not mean to publish.)

N.B.—Erichius, in his Exodus Hamelensis, maintains the truth of this legend; but Martin Schoock, in his Fabula Hamelensis, contends that it is a mere myth.

"Don't forget to pay the piper" is still a household expression in common use.

¶ A similar tale is told of the fiddler of Brandenberg. The children were led to the Marienberg, which opened upon them and swallowed them up.

¶ When Lorch was infested with ants, a hermit led the multitudinous insects by his pipe into a lake, where they perished. As the inhabitants refused to pay the stipulated price, he led their pigs the same dance, and they, too, perished in the lake.

Next year, a charcoal-burner cleared the same place of crickets; and when the price agreed upon was withheld, he led the sheep of the inhabitants into the lake.

The third year came a plague of rats, which an old man of the mountain piped away and destroyed. Being refused his reward, he piped the children of Lorch into the Tannenberg.

¶ About 200 years ago, the people of Ispahan were tormented with rats, when a little dwarf named Giouf, not above two feet high, promised, on the payment of a certain sum of money, to free the city of all its vermin in an hour. The terms were agreed to, and Giouf, by tabor and pipe, attracted every rat and mouse to follow him to the river Zenderou, where they were all drowned. When the dwarf demanded payment, the people gave him several bad coins, which they refused to change. Next day, they saw with horror an old black woman, fifty feet high, standing in the market-place with a whip in her hand. She was the genie Mergian Banou, the mother of the dwarf. For four days she strangled daily fifteen of the principal women, and on the fifth day led forty others to a magic tower, into which she drove them, and they were never after seen by mortal eye.—Gueulette: Chinese Tales ("History of Prince Kader-Bilah," 1723).

∴ The syrens of classic story had, by their weird spirit-music, a similar irresistible influence.

(See Curious Myths of the Middle Ages.)

(Weird music is called Alpleich or Elfenseigen.)

Pieria, a mountainous slip of land in Thessaly. A portion of the Mountains is called Piĕrus or the Pierian Mountain, the seat of the Muses.

Ah! will they leave Pieria's happy shore,
To plough the tide where wintry tempests roar?
Falconer: The Shipwreck (1756).

Pierre [Peer], a blunt, bold, outspoken man, who heads a conspiracy to murder the Venetian senators, and induces Jaffier to join the gang. Jaffier (in order to save his wife's father, Priuli) reveals the plot, under promise of free pardon; but the senators break their pledge, and order the conspirators to torture and death. Jaffier, being free, because he had turned "king's evidence," stabs Pierre to prevent his being broken on the wheel, and then kills himself.—Otway: Venice Preserved (1682).

John Kemble [1757-1823] could not play "sir Pertinax" like Cooke, nor could Cooke play "Pierre" like Kemble.—C. R. Leslie: Autobiography.

Charles M. Young's "Pierre," if not so lofty, is more natural and soldierly than Kemble's.—New Monthly Magazine (1822).

Macready's "Pierre" was occasionally too familiar, and now and then too loud; but it had beauties of the highest order, of which I chiefly remember his passionate taunt of the gang of conspirators, and his silent reproach to "Jaffier" by holding up his manacled hands, and looking upon the poor traitor with stedfast sorrow [1793-1873].—Talfourd.

Pierre, a very inquisitive servant of M. Darlemont, who long suspects his master has played falsely with his ward Julio count of Harancour.—Holcroft: The Deaf and Dumb (1785).

Pierre Alphonse (Rabbi Moïse Sephardi), a Spanish Jew converted to Christianity in 1062.

All stories that recorded are
By Pierre Alfonse he knew by heart.
Longfellow: The Wayside Inn (preludes).

Pierre du Coignet or Coignères, an advocate-general in the reign of Philippe de Valois, who stoutly opposed the encroachments of the Church. The monks, in revenge, nicknamed those grotesque figures in stone (called "gargoyles"), pierres du coignet. At Notre Dame de Paris there were at one time gargoyles used for extinguishing torches, and the smoke added not a little to their ugliness.

You may associate them with Master Pierre du Coignet, . . . which perform the office of extinguishers.—Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel (1533-45).

Pierrot [Pé-er-ro], a character in French pantomime, representing a man in stature and a child in mind. He is generally the tallest and thinnest man in the company, and appears with his face and hair thickly covered with flour. He wears a white gown, with very long sleeves, and a row of big buttons down the front. The word means "Little Peter."

Piers and Palinode, two shepherds in Spenser's fifth eclogue, representing the protestant and the catholic priest.

Piers or Percy again appears in ecl. x. with Cuddy, a poetic shepherd. This noble eclogue has for its subject "poetry." Cuddy complains that poetry has no patronage or encouragement, although it comes by inspiration. He says no one would be so qualified as Colin to sing divine poetry, if his mind were not so depressed by disappointed love.—Spenser: The Shepheardes Calendar (1579).

Piers Plowman (The Vision of), a satirical poem divided into twenty parts. The vision is supposed to have been seen while the plowman was sleeping in the Malvern Hills. First published in 1550; but the author, William Langland, a secular priest, lived 1332-1400. The poem is not in rhymes, nor yet in heroic blank verse like Shakespeare's plays, but in alliterative verse containing from ten to twelve syllables, with a pause at the fifth or sixth foot. He preceded Chaucer, who wrote in rhymes.

(The Malvern Hills form a boundary between Worcestershire, Monmouthshire, and Herefordshire.)

N.B.—Anglo-Saxon alliterative poetry does not require every word of a line to begin with the same letter, but that three words in two short lines (or one long line) should do so. Two words in the former part and one in the latter, as—

*M*ercy hight that *M*aid ‖ a *M*eek thing withal . . .
Her Sister at ft Seemed ‖ came Soothly walking
When these *M*aidens *M*et ‖ *M*ercy and Truth.
From Piers Plowman.

But by no means was this method strictly observed.

Pie'tro (a syl.), the putative father of Pompilia. This paternity was a fraud, perpetrated, unknown to Pietro, by Violante his wife, "partly to please old Pietro," partly to oust the heirs of certain property which would otherwise fall to them.—R. Browning: The Ring and the Book, ii. 575 (1868-69).

Pietro of Abano, the greatest Italian philosopher and physician of the thirteenth century. He was an astrologer, and was persecuted as a wizard. Abano is a village near Padua.

Browning has a poem called Pietro of Abano (1880).

Pig. Phædrus tells a tale of a popular actor who imitated the squeak of a pig. A peasant said to the audience that he would himself next night challenge and beat the actor. When the night arrived, the audience unanimously gave judgment in favour of the actor, saying that his squeak was by far the better imitation; but the peasant presented to them a real pig, and said, "Behold, what excellent judges are ye!"

¶ This is similar to the judgment of the connoisseur who said, "Why, the fellow has actually attempted to paint a fly on that rosebud, but it is no more like a fly than I am like——;" but, as he approached his finger to the picture, the fly flew away.—Stevens: The Connoisseur (1754).

Pigal (Mons. de), the dancing-master who teaches Alice Bridgenorth.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Pigeon and Dove (The). Prince Constantio was changed into a pigeon and the princess Constantia into a dove, because they loved, but were always crossed in love. Constantio found that Constantia was sold by his mother for a slave, and in order to follow her he was converted into a pigeon. Constantia was seized by a giant, and in order to escape him was changed into a dove. Cupid then took them to Paphos, and they became "examples of a tender and sincere passion; and ever since have been the emblems of love and constancy."—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("The Pigeon and Dove," 1682).

Pigmy, a dwarf. (See PYGMY.)

Pigott Diamond (The), brought from India by lord Pigott. It weighs 82½ carats. In 1818 it came into the hands of Messrs. Rundell and Bridge.

Pigrogromi'tus, a name alluded to by sir Andrew Ague-cheek.

In sooth thou wast in very gracious fooling last night when thou spokest of Pigrogromitus, of the Vapian passing the equinoctial of Queubus. 'Twas very good i' faith.—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, act ii. sc. 3 (1614).

Pigwig'gen, a fairy knight, whose amours with queen Mab, and furious combat with Oberon, form the subject of Drayton's Nymphidia (1593).

Pike. The best pike in the world are obtained from the Wyth'am, in that division of Lincolnshire called Kesteven (in the west).

Yet for my dainty pike I [Wytham] am without compare.

Drayton: Polyolbion, xxv. (1622).

Pike (Gideon), valet to old major Bellenden.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Pila'tus (Mount), in Switzerland. The legend is that Pontius Pilate, being banished to Gaul by the emperor Tiberius, wandered to this mount, and flung himself into a black lake at the summit of the hill, being unable to endure the torture of conscience for having given up the Lord to crucifixion.

Of course there is no historical value in this tradition. Pilatus means "capped" [with snow], but the similarity of the two words gave rise to the tradition.

Pilcrow, a mark in printing, to attract attention, made thus ¶ or ☞

In husbandry matters, where pilcrow ye find,
That verse appertaineth to husbandry kind.

Tusser: Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry (1557).

Pilgrim Fathers. They were 102 puritans (English, Scotch, and Dutch), who went, in December, 1620, in a ship called the Mayflower, to North America, and colonized Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut. These states they called "New England." New Plymouth (near Boston) was the second colony planted by the English in the New World.

Men in the middle of life, austere and grave in deportment . . .
God had sifted three kingdoms to find the wheat for this planting.

Longfellow: Courtship of Miles Standish, iv. (1858).

Pilgrim—Palmer. Pilgrims had dwellings, palmers had none. Pilgrims went at their own charge, palmers professed willing poverty and lived on charity. Pilgrims might return to a secular life, palmers could not. Pilgrims might hold titles and follow trades, palmers were wholly "religious" men.

Pilgrim to Compostella. Some pilgrims on their way to Compostella stopped at a hospice in La Calzāda. The daughter of the innkeeper solicited a young Frenchman to spend the night with her, but he refused; so she put in his wallet a silver cup, and when he was on the road, she accused him to the alcaydê of theft. As the property was found in his possession, the alcaydê ordered him to be hung. His parents went on their way to Compostella, and returned after eight days, but what was their amazement to find their son alive on the gibbet and uninjured. They went instantly to tell the alcaydê; but the magistrate replied, "Woman, you are mad! I would just as soon believe these pullets, which I am about to eat, are alive, as that a man who has been gibbeted eight days is not dead." No sooner had he spoken than the two pullets actually rose up alive. The alcaydê was frightened out of his wits, and was about to rush out of doors, when the heads and feathers of the birds came scampering in to complete the resuscitation. The cock and hen were taken in grand procession to St. James's Church of Compostella, where they lived seven years, and the hen hatched two eggs, a cock and a hen, which lived just seven years and did the same. This has continued to this day, and pilgrims receive feathers from these birds as holy relics; but no matter how many feathers are given away, the plumage of the sacred fowls is never deficient.

Gallum caplunt et gallinam, et in ecclesiam transferunt magna solemnitate. Quæ ibi clausæ res admirabiles et Dei potentiam testificantes observantur, ubi septemnio vivunt; hunc enim terminum Deus illis instituit; et in fine septennii antequam moriantur, pullum relinquunt et pullam sui coloris et magnitudinis; et hoc fit in ea ecclesia quolibet septennio. Magnæ quoque admirationis est, quod omnes per hanc urbem transeuntes peregrini, qui sunt innumerabiles, galli hujus et gallinæ plumam capiunt, et nunquam illis plumæ deficiunt. Hac EGO TESTOR, propterea quod VIDI et interfui.—Lucius M. Siculus: Rerum Hispanicarum Scriptores, ii. 805.

 This legend is also seriously related by bishop Patrick, Parable of the Pilgrims, xxxv. 430–4. Udal ap Rhys repeats it in his Tour through Spain and Portugal, 35–8. It is inserted in the Acta Sanctorum, vi. 45. Pope Calixtus II. mentions it among the miracles of Santiago. Mgr. Guerin, the pope's chamberlain, inserts it in his Petits Bollandists, as undoubtedly true; and Lucius M. Siculus (see above) says, "Hac EGO TESTOR, propterea quod VIDI et interfui."—History of Spanish Authors, ii. 805.

Pilgrims and the Peas. Two pilgrims, for penance, had to walk to the Holy Land with peas in their shoes. One accomplished the journey without difficulty, but the other was well-nigh crippled. The latter asked the former why he was so nimble, and he replied, "I boiled my peas."—Peter Pindar [Dr. Wolcot] (1782).

Pilgrims of the Rhine (The), a novel by lord Lytton (1834).

Pilgrim's Progress (The), by John Bunyan (pt. i., 1678; pt. ii., 1684). This is supposed to be a dream, and to allegorize the life of a Christian from his conversion to his death. His doubts are giants, his sins a bundle or pack, his Bible a chart, his minister Evangelist, his conversion a flight from the City of Destruction, his struggle with besetting sins a fight with Apollyon, his death a toilsome passage over a deep stream, and so on.

The second part is Christiana and her family led by Greatheart through the same road, to join Christian, who had gone before.

Pilgrims' Songs; or, "Songs of the Goings-up," Psalms written from the recollection of the going up from Babylon to Jerusalem, when, full of joy, the caravans returned with Zerubbabel after the Captivity. They were afterwards collected into one volume, and were then intended for the use of the pilgrims who went up from all parts of the Holy Land to keep the yearly festivals in the second temple.

Pillar of the Doctors [La Colonne des Docteurs], William de Champeaux (*-1121).

Pillars of Hercules (The), Calpê and Abyla, two mountains, one in Europe and the other in Africa. Calpê is now called "The Rock of Gibraltar," and Abyla is called "The Apes' Hill" or "mount Hacho."

Pills to Purge Melancholy. Another title is "Laugh and be Fat," a collection of sonnets by D'Urfey (1719).

Pilot (The), an important character and the title of a nautical burletta by E. Fitzball, based on the novel so called by J. Fenimore Cooper of New York (1823). "The pilot" turns out to be the brother of colonel Howard of America. He happened to be in the same vessel which was taking out the colonel's wife and only son. The vessel was wrecked, but "the pilot" (whose name was John Howard) saved the infant boy, and sent him to England to be brought up, under the name of Barnstable. When young Barnstable was a lieutenant in the British navy, colonel Howard seized him as a spy, and commanded him to be hung to the yardarm of an American frigate called the Alacrity. At this crisis "the pilot" informed the colonel that Barnstable was his own son, and the father arrived just in time to save him from death.

Pilot that Weathered the Storm (The), William Pitt (1759–1806). The "storm" referred to was the European disturbance created by Napoleon Buonaparte. There was a silver medal cast in the Pitt Club, on the obverse side of which was the motto given above, and below it was the date of Pitt's birth. On the reverse is "Warrington Pitt Club, MDCCCXIV."

Pilpay, the Indian Æsop. His compilation was in Sanskrit, and entitled Pantschatantra (fourth century B.C.).

> It was rumoured he could say . . .
> All the "Fables" of Pilpay.
> Longfellow: The Wayside Inn (prelude).

Pilum'nus, the patron god of bakers and millers, because he was the first person who ever ground corn.

> Then there was Pilumnus, who was the first to make cheese, and became the god of bakers.—Ouida: Ariadné, i. 40.

Pimperlimpimp (Powder), a worthless nostrum, used by quacks and sorcerers. Swift uses the word in his Tale of a Tub (1704).

> This famous doctor [Sherlock] plays the Merry Andrew with the world, and, like the powder "Pimper le Pimp," turns up what trump the knave of clubs calls for.—A Dialogue between Dr. Sherlock . . . and Dr. Oates (1690).

Pinabello, son of Anselmo (king of Maganza). Marphi'sa overthrew him, and told him he could not wipe out the disgrace till he had unhorsed a thousand dames and a thousand knights. Pinabello was slain by Brad'amant. — Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Pinac, the lively spirited fellow-traveller of Mirabel "the wild goose." He is in love with the sprightly Lillia-Bianca, a daughter of Nantolet.—Fletcher: The Wild-goose Chase (1652).

Pinch, a schoolmaster and conjurer, who tries to exorcise Antiph'olus (act iv. sc. 4).—Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors (1593).

Pinch (Tom), clerk to Mr. Pecksniff "architect and land surveyor." Simple as a child, green as a salad, and honest as truth itself. Very fond of story-books, but far more so of the organ. It was the seventh heaven to him to pull out the stops for the organist's assistant at Salisbury Cathedral; but when allowed, after service, to finger the notes himself, he lived in a dream-land of unmitigated happiness. Being dismissed from Pecksniff's office, Tom was appointed librarian to the Temple library, and his new catalogue was a perfect model of penmanship.

Ruth Pinch, a true-hearted, pretty girl, who adores her brother Tom, and is the sunshine of his existence. She marries John Westlock. — Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Pinchbeck (Lady), with whom don Juan placed Leila to be brought up.

> Olden she was—but had been very young;
> Virtuous she was—and had been, I believe . . .
> She merely now was amiable and witty.
> Byron: Don Juan, xii. 43, 47 (1824).

Pinchwife (Mr.), the town husband of a raw country girl, wholly unpractised in the ways of the world, and whom he watches with ceaseless anxiety.

> Lady Drogheda . . . watched her town husband as assiduously as Mr. Pinchwife watched his country wife. —Macaulay.

Mrs. Pinchwife, the counterpart of Molière's "Agnes," in his comedy entitled L'école des Femmes. Mrs. Pinchwife is a young woman wholly unsophisticated in affairs of the heart.— Wycherly: The Country Wife (1675).

(Garrick altered Wycherly's comedy to The Country Girl.)

Pindar (Peter), the pseudonym of Dr. John Walcot (1738–1819).

Pindar, the Theban poet, whose lyrics in irregular verse have furnished the word "pindaric" (B.C. 518–442).

The British Pindar, Thomas Gray (1716–1771). On his monument in Westminster Abbey is inscribed these lines—

> No more the Grecian muse unrivalled reigns;
> To Britain let the nations homage pay:
> She felt a Homer's fire in Milton's strains,
> A Pindar's rapture in the lyre of Gray.

The French Pindar, (1) Jean Dorat (1507–1588); (2) Ponce Denis Lebrun (1729–1807).

The Italian Pindar, Gabriello Chiabrera (1552–1637).

Pindar of England (The). Cowley was preposterously called by the duke of Buckingham, "The Pindar, Horace, and Virgil of England." Posterity has not endorsed this absurd eulogium (1618–1667).

Pinder of Wakefield (The), George-a-Green, pinner of the town of Wakefield, that is, keeper of the public pound for the confinement of estrays.—The History of George-a-Green, Pinder of the Town of Wakefield (time, Elizabeth).

Pindo'rus and Aride'us, the two heralds of the Christian army in the siege of Jerusalem.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Pine-Bender (The), Sinis, the Corinthian robber, who used to fasten his victims to two pine trees bent towards the earth, and leave them to be torn to pieces by the rebound.

Pinkerton (Miss), a most majestic lady, tall as a grenadier, and most proper. Miss Pinkerton kept an academy for young ladies on Chiswick Mall. She was "the Semiramis of Hammersmith, the friend of Dr. Johnson, and the correspondent of Mrs. Chapone." This very distinguished lady "had a Roman nose, and wore a solemn turban." Amelia Sedley was educated at her academy, and Rebecca Sharp was a pupil teacher there. —Thackeray: Vanity Fair, i. (1848).

Pinnit (Orson), keeper of the bears.—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Pinto (Ferdinand Mendez), a Portuguese traveller, whose "voyages" were at one time wholly discredited, but have since been verified (1509–1583).

Ferdinand Mendez Pinto was but a type of thee, thou liar of the first magnitude.—Congreve: Love for Love (1695).

Pious (The), Ernst I. founder of the house of Gotha (1601–1674).

Robert, son of Hugues Capet (971, 996–1031).

Eric IX. of Sweden (*, 1155–1161).

Pip, the hero of Dickens's novel called Great Expectations. His family name was Pirrip, and his Christian name Philip. He was enriched by a convict named Abel Magwitch; and was brought up by Joe Gargery a blacksmith, whose wife was a woman of thunder and lightning, storm and tempest. Magwitch, having made his escape to Australia, became a sheep farmer, grew very rich, and deposited £500 a year with Mr. Jaggers, a lawyer, for the education of Pip and to make a gentleman of him. Magwitch returned to England, was captured, and died in jail. All his property being confiscated, Pip was reduced to poverty, and had to earn his living as a clerk. His friend Herbert Pocket used to call him "Handel," because Handel wrote the Harmonious Blacksmith. —Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

Pipchin (Mrs.), an exceedingly "well-connected lady," living at Brighton, where she kept an establishment for the training of children. Her "respectability" chiefly consisted in the circumstance of her husband having broken his heart in pumping water out of some Peruvian mines (that is, in having invested in these mines, and being let in). Mrs. Pipchin was an ill-favoured old woman, with mottled cheeks and grey eyes. She was given to buttered toast and sweetbreads, but kept her children on the plainest fare.—Dickens: Dombey and Son (1846).

Pipe (The Queen's), the dock kiln in the centre of the great east vault of the wine-cellars of the London docks. This is the place where useless and damaged goods that have not paid duty are burnt.

Pipe and Dance. As you pipe I must dance, I must accommodate myself to your wishes. To "pipe another dance" is to change one's bearing, to put out of favour. J. Skelton speaking of the clergy, says their pride no man could tolerate, for they "would rule king and kayser," and "bryng all to nought;" but, if kings and nobles, instead of wasting their time on hunting and hawking, would attend to politics, he says—

They would pype you another daunce.
Spenser: Colyn Clout (1460–1529).

Piper (Tom), one of the characters in a morris-dance.

So have I seen
Tom Piper stand upon our village green,
Backed with the May-pole.
W. Browne: Shepherd's Pipe (1614).

Piper (Paddy the), an Irish piper, supposed to have been eaten by a cow. Going along one night during the "troubles," he knocked his head against the body of a dead man dangling from a tree. The sight of the "iligant" boots was too great a temptation; and as they refused to come off without the legs, Paddy took them too, and sought shelter for the night in a cowshed. The moon rose, and Paddy, mistaking the moonlight for the dawn, started for the fair, having drawn on the boots and left the "legs" behind. At daybreak, some of the piper's friends went in search of him, and found, to their horror, that the cow, as they supposed, had devoured him (with the exception of his legs)—clothes, bags, and all. They were horror-struck, and of course the cow was condemned to be sold; but while driving her to the fair, they were attracted by the strains of a piper coming towards them. The cow startled, made a bolt, with a view, as it was supposed, of making a meal on another piper. "Help, help!" they shouted; when Paddy himself ran to their aid. The mystery was soon explained over a drop of the "cratur," and the cow was taken home again.—Lover: Legends and Stories of Ireland (1834).

Piper of Hamelin. (See PIED PIPER OF HAMELN, p. 843.)

Piperman, the factotum of Chalomel chemist and druggist. He was "so handy" that he was never at his post; and being "so handy," he took ten times the trouble of doing anything that another would need to bestow. For the self-same reason, he stumbled and blundered about, muddled and marred everything he touched, and being a Jack-of-all-trades was master of none.

> There has been an accident because I am so handy. I went to the dairy at a bound, came back at another, and fell down in the open street, where I spilt the milk. I tried to bale it up—no go. Then I ran back or ran home, I forget which, and left the money somewhere; and then, in fact, I have been four times to and fro, because I am so handy.—Ware: Piperman's Predicament.

Pipes (Tom), a retired boatswain's mate, living with commodore Trunnion to keep the servants in order. Tom Pipes is noted for his taciturnity.—Smollett: The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle (1751).

(The incident of Tom Pipes concealing in his shoe his master's letter to Emilia, was suggested by Ovid—

> Cum possit solea chartas celare ligatas,
> Et vincto blandas sub pede ferre notas.
> Ovid: Art of Love.)

Pippa Passes, a dramatic poem by R. Browning (1841). Pippa is a poor child, at work all the year round, except one day, in the silk-mills at Asolo, in Italy. Her one holiday is New Year's Day, and the drama hinges on her chance appearance "at critical moments in the spiritual life-history of the leading characters in the play." Just at the supreme moment, Pippa passes, singing some refrain, and her voice alters the destinies of the men and women to whom she is unknown. Unconsciously, her own destiny is altered in the end by her last song (see note at beginning, vol. i.). The leading feature of Browning's teaching lies in the refrain of Pippa's first song—

> "God's in His heaven—> All's right with the world!"
> Robert Browning: Pippa Passes (1841).

Pirate (The), a novel by sir W. Scott (1821). In this novel we are introduced to the wild sea scenery of the Shetlands; the primitive manners of the old udaller Magnus Troil, and his fair daughters Minna and Brenda: lovely pictures, drawn with nice discrimination, and most interesting.

(A udaller is one who holds his lands on allodial tenure.)

Pirner (John), a fisherman at Old St. Ronan's.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Pisa. The banner of Pisa is a cross on a crimson field. It is said to have been brought from heaven by Michael the archangel, and delivered to St. Efeso, the patron saint of Pisa.

Pisanio, servant of Posthu'mus. Being sent to murder Imogen the wife of Posthumus, he persuades her to escape to Milford Haven in boy's clothes, and sends a bloody napkin to Posthumus, to make him believe that she has been murdered. Ultimately, Imogen becomes reconciled to her husband. (See POSTHUMUS.)—Shakespeare: Cymbeline (1605).

Pisis'tratos of Athens, being asked by his wife to punish with death a young man who had dared to kiss their daughter, replied, "How shall we requite those who wish us evil, if we condemn to death those who love us?" This anecdote is referred to by Dantê, in his Purgatory, xv.—Valerius Maximus: Memorable Acts and Sayings, v.

Pisis'tratos and His Two Sons. The history of Pisistratos and his two sons is repeated in that of Cosmo de Medici of Florence and his two grandsons. It is difficult to find a more striking parallel, whether we regard the characters or the incidents of the two families.

 Pisistratos was a great favourite of the Athenian populace; so was Cosmo de Medici with the populace of Florence. Pisistratos was banished, but, being recalled by the people, was raised to sovereign power in the republic of Athens; so Cosmo was banished, but, being recalled by the people, was raised to supreme power in the republic of Florence. Pisistratos was just and merciful, a great patron of literature, and spent large sums of money in beautifying his city (Athens) with architecture; the same may be said of Cosmo de Medici. To Pisistratos we owe the poems of Homer in a connected form; and to Cosmo we owe the best literature of Europe, for he spent fortunes in the copying of valuable MSS. The two sons of Pisistratos were Hipparchos and Hippias; and the two grandsons of Cosmo were Guiliano and Lorenzo. Two of the most honoured citizens of Athens (Harmodios and Aristogiton) conspired against the sons of Pisistratos—Hipparchos was assassinated, but Hippias escaped; so Francesco Pazzi and the archbishop of Pisa conspired against the grandsons of Cosmo—Guiliano was assassinated, but Lorenzo escaped. In both cases it was the elder brother who fell, and the younger who escaped. Hippias quelled the tumult, and succeeded in placing himself at the head of Athens; so did Lorenzo in Florence.

Piso's Notion of Justice. Seneca tells us that Piso condemned a man to death for murder on circumstantial evidence; but on going to execution the man supposed to be dead exclaimed, "Hold! I am the man supposed to have been killed." The centurion sent back the prisoner to Piso, and explained the reason why. Whereupon Piso condemned all three to death, saying, "Fiat justitia! I condemn the prisoner to death, because sentence of death has been passed upon him; the centurion, for disobeying orders; and the man supposed to have been murdered, because he is the cause of death to the other two."

(The tale is told of others besides Piso.)

Pistol, in The Merry Wives of Windsor and the two parts of Henry IV., is the ancient or ensign of captain sir John Falstaff. Peto is his lieutenant, and Bardolph his corporal. Peto being removed (probably killed), we find in Henry V. that Pistol is lieutenant, Bardolph is ancient, and Nym is corporal. Pistol is also introduced as married to Mistress Nell Quickly, hostess of the tavern in Eastcheap. Both Pistol and his wife die before the play is over; so does sir John Falstaff; Bardolph and Nym are both hanged. Pistol is a model bully, wholly unprincipled, utterly despicable; but he treated his wife kindly, and she was certainly fond of him.—Shakespeare.

His [Pistol's] courage is boasting, his learning ignorance, his ability weakness, and his end beggary. —Dr. Lodge.

∴ His end was not "beggary;" as host of the tavern in Eastcheap, he seems much more respectable, and better off than before. Theophilus Cibber (1703–1758) was the best actor of this part.

Pistris, the sea-monster sent to devour Androm'eda. It had a dragon's head and a fish's tail.—Aratus: Commentaries.

Pithyrian [Pi-thirry-an], a pagan of Antioch. He had one daughter, named Mara'na, who was a Christian. A young dragon of most formidable character infested the city of Antioch, and demanded a virgin to be sent out daily for its meal. The Antioch'eans cast lots for the first victim, and the lot fell on Marana, who was led forth in grand procession as the victim of the dragon. Pithyrian, in distraction, rushed into a Christian church, and fell before an image which attracted his attention, at the base of which was the real arm of a saint. The sacristan handed the holy relic to Pithyrian, who kissed it, and then restored it to the sacristan; but the servitor did not observe that a thumb was missing. Off ran Pithyrian with the thumb, and joined his daughter. On came the dragon, with tail erect, wings extended, and mouth wide open, when Pithyrian threw into the gaping jaws the "sacred thumb." Down fell the tail, the wings drooped, the jaws were locked, and up rose the dragon into the air to the height of three miles, when it blew up into a myriad pieces. So the lady was rescued, Antioch delivered; and the relic, minus a thumb, testifies the fact of this wonderful miracle.—Southey: The Young Dragon (Spanish legend).

Pitt Bridge. Blackfriars Bridge, London, was so called by Robert Mylne, its architect; but the public would not accept the name.

Pitt Club (The), the club of the supporters of W. Pitt, the great statesman; all members of parliament or of the Upper House. There was also a Fox Club for those of the policy of Mr. Fox. The present Carlton Club is a conservative club, like the Pitt Club.

Pitt Diamond (The), the sixth largest cut diamond in the world. It weighed 410 carats uncut, and 136¾ carats cut. It once belonged to Mr. Pitt, grandfather of the famous earl of Chatham. The duke of Orleans, regent of France, bought it for £135,000, whence it is often called "The Regent." The French republic sold it to Treskon, a merchant of Berlin. Napoleon I. bought it to ornament his sword. It now belongs to the king of Prussia. (See DIAMONDS, p. 277.)

Pixie-Stools, toad-stools for the fairies to sit on, when they are tired of dancing in the fairy-ring.

Pizarro, a Spanish adventurer, who made war on Atali'ba inca of Peru. Elvi'ra, mistress of Pizarro, vainly endeavoured to soften his cruel heart. Before the battle, Alonzo the husband of Cora confided his wife and child to Rolla, the beloved friend of the inca. The Peruvians were on the point of being routed, when Rolla came to the rescue, and redeemed the day; but Alonzo was made a prisoner of war. Rolla, thinking Alonzo to be dead, proposed to Cora; but she declined his suit, and having heard that her husband had fallen into the hands of the Spaniards, she implored Rolla to set him free. Accordingly, he entered the prison where Alonzo was confined, and changed clothes with him, but Elvira liberated him on condition that he would kill Pizarro. Rolla found his enemy sleeping in his tent, spared his life, and made him his friend. The infant child of Cora being lost, Rolla recovered it, and was so severely wounded in this heroic act that he died. Pizarro was slain in combat by Alonzo; Elvira retired to a convent; and the play ends with a grand funeral march, in which the dead body of Rolla is borne to the tomb. —Sheridan: Pizarro (1814).

The sentiments of loyalty uttered by "Rolla" had so good an effect, that when the duke of Queensberry asked why the stocks had fallen, a stock-jobber replied, "Because they have left off playing Pizarro at Drury Lane."—Sheridan's Memoirs.

(Sheridan's drama of Pizarro is taken from that of Kotzebue, but there are several alterations: Thus Sheridan makes Pizarro killed by Alonzo, which is a departure from both Kotzebue and also historic truth. Pizarro lived to conquer Peru, and was assassinated in his palace at Lima by the son of his friend Almagro.)

Pizarro, "the ready tool of fell Velasquez' crimes."—Jephson: Braganza (1775).

Pizarro, the governor of the State prison in which Fernando Florestan was confined. Fernando's young wife, in boy's attire, and under the name of Fidelio, became the servant of Pizarro, who, resolving to murder Fernando, sent Fidelio and Rocco (the jailer) to dig his grave. Pizarro was just about to deal the fatal blow, when the minister of state arrived, and commanded the prisoner to be set free.—Beethoven: Fidelio (1791).

Place (Lord), noted for his corrupt briberies. His fellow-candidate is colonel Promise. Their opponents are Harry Foxchase and squire Tankard.—Fielding. Pasquin (1736).

Place'bo, one of the brothers of January the old baron of Lombardy. When January held a family conclave to know whether he should marry, Placebo told him "to please himself, and do as he liked."—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales ("The Merchant's Tale," 1388).

Placid (Mr.), a hen-pecked husband, who is roused at last to be somewhat more manly, but could never be better than "a boiled rabbit without oyster sauce." (See PLIANT, p. 854.)

Mrs. Placid, the lady paramount of the house, who looked quite aghast if her husband expressed a wish of his own, or attempted to do an independent act.—Inchbald: Every One has His Fault (1794).

Plac'idas, the exact fac-simile of his friend Amias. Having heard of his friend's captivity, he went to release him, and being detected in the garden, was mistaken by Corflambo's dwarf for Amias. The dwarf went and told Pæa'na (the daughter of Corflambo, "fair as ever yet saw living eye, but too loose of life and eke of love too light"). Placidas was seized and brought before the lady, who loved Amias, but her love was not requited. When Placidas stood before her, she thought he was Amias, and great was her delight to find her love returned. She married Placidas, reformed her ways, "and all men much admired the change, and spake her praise."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 8, 9 (1596).

Plagiary (Sir Fretful), a playwright, whose dramas were mere plagiarisms from "the refuse of obscure volumes." He pretended to be rather pleased with criticism, but was sorely irritated thereby.

(Richard Cumberland (1732–1811), noted for his vanity and irritability, was the model of this character.—Sheridan: The Critic, i. 1, 1779.)

Herrick, who had no occasion to steal, has taken this image from Suckling, and spoilt it in the theft. Like sir Fretful Plagiary, Herrick had not skill to steal with taste.—R. Chambers: English Literature, i. 134.

William Parsons [1736–1795] was the original "sir Fretful Plagiary," and from his delineation most of our modern actors have borrowed their idea.—Life of Sheridan.

Plague of London (1665). 68,586 persons died thereof. Defoe wrote a

Journal of the Plague of London (1722). As this was fifty-seven years after the plague, and Defoe was born in 1661, of course he can scarcely be considered an eye-witness, but his description is most vivid and lifelike.

Plaids et Gieux sous l'Ormel, a society formed by the troubadours of Picardy in the latter half of the twelfth century. It consisted of knights and ladies of the highest rank, exercised and approved in courtesy. The society assumed an absolute judicial power in matters of the most delicate nature; trying, with the most consummate ceremony, all causes in love brought before their tribunals.

¶ This was similar to the "Court of Love," established about the same time by the troubadours of Provence.—Universal Magazine (March, 1792).

Plain (The), the level floor of the National Convention of France, occupied by the Girondists or moderate republicans. The red republicans occupied the higher seats, called "the mountain."

Plain and Perspicuous Doctor (The), Walter Burleigh (1275-1357).

Plain Dealer (The), a comedy by William Wycherly (1677).

The countess of Drogheda . . . inquired for the Plain Dealer. "Madam," said Mr Fairbeard, . . . "there he is," pushing Mr Wycherly towards her.—Cibber: Lives of the Poets, iii. 252.

(Wycherly married the countess in 1680. She died soon afterwards, leaving him the whole of her fortune.)

Plain Speaker (The), Hazlitt's opinions on certain "books, men, and things" (1826).

Planet of Love. Venus is so called by Tennyson, in his Maud, I. xxii. 2 (1855).

Plantagenet (Lady Edith), a kinswoman of Richard I. She marries the prince royal of Scotland (called sir Kenneth knight of the Leopard or David earl of Huntingdon).—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

Plantain or PLANTA'GO, the favourite food of asses. It is very astringent, and excellent for cuts and open sores. Plantain leaves bruised, and rubbed on the part affected, will instantly relieve the pain and reduce the swelling occasioned by the bite or sting of insects. The Highlanders ascribe great virtues to the plantain, which they call slan-lus ("the healing plant").—Lightfoot.

The hermit gathers . . . plantane for a sore.
Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Plato. The mistress of this philosopher was Archianassa; of Aristotle, Hepyllis; and of Epicurus, Leontium. (See LOVERS, p. 633.)

The English Plato, the Rev. John Norris (1657-1711).

The German Plato, Friedrich Heinrich Jacobi (1743-1819).

The Jewish Plato, Philo Judæus (fl. A.D. 20-40).

The Puritan Plato, John Howe (1630-1706).

Plato and the Bees. It is said that when Plato was an infant, bees settled on his lips while he was asleep, indicating that he would become famous for his "honeyed words." The same story is told of Sophoclês, St. Chrysostom, and others.

And as when Plato did i' the cradle thrive,
Bees to his lips brought honey from the hive;
So to this boy [Dorrillon] they came—I know not whether
They brought or from his lips did honey gather.
Browne: Britannia's Pastorals, ii. (1613).

Plato and Homer. Plato greatly admired Homer, but excluded him from his ideal republic.

Plato, 'tis true, great Homer doth commend,
Yet from his common-weal did him exile.
Brooke: Inquisition upon Fame, etc. (1554-1628).

Plato despised Poets.

Plato, anticipating the Reviewers,
From his "republic" banished without pity
The poets.
Longfellow: The Poet's Tale.

Plato of the Eighteenth Century, Voltaire (1694-1778).

The sage Plato of the eighteenth century.—Carlyle: Frederick II. of Prussia, vol. ii. p. 597.

Plato's Republic, in Greek prose. It is not so much a political treatise, as an ideal of perfect men living in a perfect state. It may be called an ideal of social life. It has been well translated by Davies and Vaughan (1866).

Plato's Year, 25,000 Julian years.

Cut out more work than can be done
In Plato's year.
S. Butler: Hudibras, iii. 1 (1678).

Platonic Bodies, the five regular geometrical solids described by Plato, all of which are bounded by like, equal, and regular planes. The four-sided, the six-sided, the eight-sided, the twelve-sided, and the twenty-sided; or the tetrahedron, hexahedron or cube, octahedron, dodecahedron, and icosahedron.

Platonic Love, the innocent friendship of opposite sexes, wholly divested of all animal or amorous passion.

> The noblest kind of love is love platonical.
> Byron: Don Juan, ix. 76 (1824).

Platonic Puritan (The), John Howe, the puritan divine (1630–1706).

Plausible (Counsellor) and serjeant Eitherside, two pleaders in The Man of the World, by C. Macklin (1764).

Play called the Four P's (The), by John Heywood (1569). It is a contention as to which of the four can tell the greatest lie, and the Palmer (who asserted that he never saw a woman out of temper) wins the prize. The other three P's are the Pardoner, the Poticary, and the Pedlar.

Pleasant (Mrs.), in The Parson's Wedding, by Tom Killigrew (1664).

Pleasure (A New).

> 'Tis said that Xerxes offered a reward
> To those who could invent him a new pleasure.
> Byron: Don Juan, i. 108 (1819).

Pleasures of Hope, a poem in two parts, by Thomas Campbell (1799). It opens with a comparison between the beauty of scenery and the ideal enchantments of fancy in which hope is never absent, but sustains the seaman on his watch, the soldier on his march, and Byron in his perilous adventures. He goes on to descant on the hope of a mother, the hope of a prisoner, the hope of the wanderer, the grand hope of the patriot, the hope of regenerating uncivilized nations, extending liberty, and ameliorating the condition of the poor. Pt. ii. speaks of the hope of love, and the hope of a future state, concluding with the episode of Conrad and Ellenore. Conrad was a felon, transported to New South Wales, but, though "a martyr to his crimes, was true to his daughter.'

> But not, my child, with life's precarious fire,
> The immortal ties of Nature shall expire;
> These shall resist the triumph of decay,
> When time is o'er, and worlds have passed away.
> Cold in the dust this perished heart may lie,
> But that which warmed it once shall never die—
> That spark, unburied in its mortal frame,
> With living light, eternal, and the same,
> Shall beam on Joy's interminable years,
> Unveiled by darkness, unassuaged by tears.
> Pt. ii.

Pleasures of Imagination, a poem in three books, by Akenside (1744). All the pleasures of imagination arise from the perception of greatness, wonderfulness, or beauty. (1) The beauty of greatness—witness the pleasure of mountain scenery, of astronomy, of infinity. (2) The pleasure of what is wonderful—witness the delight of novelty, of the revelations of science, of tales of fancy. (3) The pleasure of beauty, which is always connected with truth—the beauty of colour, shape, and so on, in natural objects; the beauty of mind and the moral faculties. Bk. ii. contemplates accidental pleasures arising from contrivance and design, emotion and passion, such as sorrow, pity, terror, and indignation. Bk. iii. denounces morbid imagination as the parent of vice; and contrasts with it the delights of a well-trained imagination.

(The first book is by far the best. Akenside recast his poem in maturer life, but no one thinks he improved it by so doing. The first or original cast is the only one read, and parts of the first book are well known and much admired.)

Pleasures of Melancholy (The), a poem by Warton (1745).

Pleasures of Memory, a poem in two parts, by Samuel Rogers (1793). The first part is restricted to the pleasure of memory afforded by the five senses, as that arising from visiting celebrated places, and that afforded by pictures. Pt. ii. goes into the pleasures of the mind, as imagination, and memory of past griefs and dangers. The poem concludes with the supposition that in the life to come this faculty will be greatly enlarged. The episode is this: Florio, a young sportsman, accidentally met Julia in a grot, and followed her home, when her father, a rich squire, welcomed him as his guest, and talked with delight of his younger days when hawk and hound were his joy of joys. Florio took Julia for a sail on the lake, but the vessel was capsized, and, though Julia was saved from the water, she died on being brought to shore. It was Florio's delight to haunt the places which Julia frequented—

> Her charm around the enchantress Memory threw,
> A charm that soothes the mind and sweetens too.
> Pt. ii.

Pleiads (The), a cluster of seven stars in the constellation Taurus, and applied to a cluster of seven celebrated contemporaries. The stars were the seven daughters of Atlas: Mala, Electra, Taygĕtê (4 syl.), Asterŏpê, Merŏpê, Alcyŏnê, and Celĕno.

The Pleiad of Alexandria consisted of Callimachos, Apollonios Rhodios, Aristos, Homer the Younger, Lycophron, Nicander, and Theocritos. All of Alexandria, in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphos.

The Pleiad of Charlemagne consisted of Alcuin, called "Albinus;" Angilbert, called "Homer;" Adelard, called "Augustine;" Riculfe, called "Damætas;" Varnefrid; Eginhard; and Charlemagne himself, who was called "David."

The First French Pleiad (sixteenth century): Ronsard, Joachim du Bellay, Antoine de Baïf, Remi-Belleau, Jodelle, Ponthus de Thiard, and the seventh is either Dorat or Amadis de Jamyn. All under Henri III.

The Second French Pleiad (seventeenth century): Rapin, Commire, Larue, Santeuil, Ménage, Dupérier, and Petit.

We have also our English clusters. There were those born in the second half of the sixteenth century: Spenser (1553), Drayton (1563), Shakespeare and Marlowe (1564), Ben Jonson (1574), Fletcher (1576), Massinger (1585), Beaumont (Fletcher's colleague) and Ford (1586). Besides these, there were Tusser (1515), Raleigh (1552), sir Philip Sidney (1554), Phineas Fletcher (1584), Herbert (1593), and several others.

Another cluster came a century later: Prior (1664), Swift (1667), Addison and Congreve (1672), Rowe (1673), Farquhar (1678), Young (1684), Gay and Pope (1688), Macklin (1690), etc.

The following were born in the latter half of the eighteenth century: Sheridan (1751), Crabbe (1754), Burns (1759), Rogers (1763), Wordsworth (1770), Scott (1771), Coleridge (1772), Southey (1774), Campbell (1777), Moore (1779), Byron (1788), Shelley and Keble (1792), and Keats (1796).

Butler (1600), Milton (1608), and Dryden (1630) came between the first and second clusters. Thomson (1700), Gray (1717), Collins (1720), Akenside (1721), Goldsmith (1728), and Cowper (1731), between the second and the third.

Pleonec'tes (4 syl.), Covetousness personified in The Purple Island, by Phineas Fletcher (1633). "His gold his god" . . . he "much fears to keep, much more to lose his lusting." Fully described in canto viii. (Greek, pleonektês, "covetous.")

Pleydell (Mr. Paulus), an advocate in Edinburgh, shrewd and witty. He was at one time the sheriff at Ellangowan.

Mr. counsellor Pleydell was a lively, sharp-looking gentleman, with a professional shrewdness in his eye, and, generally speaking, a professional formality in his manner; but this he could slip off on a Saturday evening, when . . . he joined in the ancient pastime of High Jinks.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering, xxxix. (time, George II.).

Pliable, one of Christian's neighbours, who accompanied him as far as the "Slough of Despond," and then turned back.—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, i. (1678).

Pliant (Sir Paul), a hen-pecked husband, who dares not even touch a letter addressed to himself till my lady has read it first. His perpetual oath is "Gadsbud!" He is such a dolt that he would not believe his own eyes and ears, if they bore testimony against his wife's fidelity and continency. (See PLACID, p. 851.)

Samuel Foote [1721–1777] attempted the part of "sir Paul Pliant," but nothing could be worse. However, the people laughed heartily, and that he thought was a full approbation of his grotesque performance.—Davies.

Lady Pliant, second wife of sir Paul. "She's handsome, and knows it; is very silly, and thinks herself wise; has a choleric old husband" very fond of her, but whom she rules with spirit, and snubs "afore folk." My lady says, "If one has once sworn, it is most unchristian, inhuman, and obscene that one should break it." Her conduct with Mr. Careless is most reprehensible.—Congreve: The Double Dealer (1694).

Those who remember the "lady Pliant" of Margaret Woffington [1718–1760] will recollect with pleasure her whimsical discovery of passion, and her awkwardly assumed prudery.—Davies.

Pliny, a Roman, author of Historia Naturalis, A.D. 77. It embraces astronomy, meteorology, geography, mineralogy, zoology, botany, inventions, institutions, the fine arts. It is divided into 37 books.

(English versions by Dr. Holland in 1601; by Bostock in 1828; by Riley (in Bohn's series), 1855–57.)

The German Pliny, or "Modern Pliny," Konrad von Gesner of Zurich, who wrote Historia Animalium, etc. (1516–1565).

The Pliny of the East, Zakarija ibn Muhammed, surnamed "Kazwini," from Kazwin, the place of his birth. He is so called by De Sacy (1200–1283).

Plon-Plon, prince Napoleon Joseph Charles Bonaparte, son of Jerome Bonaparte by his second wife (the princess Frederica Catherine of Würtemberg).

Plon-Plon is a euphonic corruption of Craint-Plomb ("fear-bullet"), a nickname given to the prince in the Crimean war (1854-6).

Plornish, plasterer, Bleeding-heart Yard. He was a smooth-cheeked, fresh-coloured, sandy-whiskered man of 30. Long in the legs, yielding at the knees, foolish in the face, flannel-jacketed and lime-whitened. He generally chimed in conversation by echoing the words of the person speaking. Thus, if Mrs. Plornish said to a visitor, "Miss Dorrit dursn't let him know;" he would chime in, "Dursn't let him know." "Me and Plornish says, 'Ho! Miss Dorrit;'" Plornish repeated after his wife, "Ho! Miss Dorrit." "Can you employ Miss Dorrit?" Plornish repeated as an echo, "Employ Miss Dorrit?" (See PETER, p. 831.)

Mrs. Plornish, the plasterer's wife. A young woman, somewhat slatternly in herself and her belongings, and dragged by care and poverty already into wrinkles. She generally began her sentences with, "Well, not to deceive you." Thus: "Is Mr. Plornish at home?" "Well, sir, not to deceive you, he's gone to look for a job." "Well, not to deceive you, ma'am, I'll take it kindly of you."—Dickens: Little Dorrit (1857).

Plotting Parlour (The). At Whittington, near Scarsdale, in Derbyshire, is a farm-house where the earl of Devonshire (Cavendish), the earl of Danby (Osborne), and Baron Delamer (Booth) concerted the Revolution. The room in which they met is called "The Plotting Parlour."

> Where Scarsdale's cliffs the swelling pastures bound,
> . . . there let the farmer hail
> The sacred orchard which embowers his gate,
> And shew to strangers, passing down the vale,
> Where Cav'ndish, Booth, and Osborne sate
> When, bursting from their country's chain, . . .
> They planned for freedom this her noblest reign.
> Akenside: Ode, XVIII. v. 3 (1767).

Plotwell (Mrs.), in Mrs. Centlivre's drama The Beau's Duel (1703).

Plousina, called Hebê, endowed by the fairy Anguilletta with the gifts of wit, beauty, and wealth. Hebê still felt she lacked something, and the fairy told her it was love. Presently came to her father's court a young prince named Atimir. The two fell in love with each other, and the day of their marriage was fixed. In the interval Atimir fell in love with Hebê's elder sister Iberia; and Hebê, in her grief, was sent to the Peaceable Island, where she fell in love with the ruling prince, and married him. After a time, Atimir and Iberia, with Hebê and her husband, met at the palace of the ladies' father, when the love between Atimir and Hebê revived. A duel was fought between the young princes, in which Atimir was slain, and the prince of the Peaceable Islands was severely wounded. Hebê, coming up, threw herself on Atimir's sword, and the dead bodies of Atimir and Hebê were transformed into two trees called "charms."—Comtesse D'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales ("Anguilletta," 1682).

Plowman (Piers), the dreamer, who, falling asleep on the Malvern Hills, Worcestershire, saw in a vision pictures of the corruptions of society, and particularly of the avarice and wantonness of the clergy. This supposed vision is formed into a poetical satire of great vigour, fancy, and humour. It is divided into twenty parts, each part being called a passus or separate vision.—William [or Robert] Langland: The Vision of Piers Plowman (1362).

Plumdamas (Mr. Peter), grocer.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Plume (Captain), a gentleman and an officer. He is in love with Sylvia a wealthy heiress; and, when he marries her, gives up his commission.—Farquhar: The Recruiting Officer (1705).

Plume (Sir), in Pope's Rape of the Lock, is the photograph of Thomas Coke, vice-chamberlain in the reign of queen Anne (1712).

> Sir Plume of amber snuff-box justly vain,
> And the nice conduct of a clouded cane.
> Rape of the Lock.

Plummer (Caleb), a little old toy-maker, in the employ of Gruff and Tackleton, toy merchants. He was spare, grey-haired, and very poor. It was his pride "to go as close to Natur' in his toys as he could for the money." Caleb Plummer had a blind daughter, who assisted him in toy-making, and whom he brought up under the belief that he himself was young, handsome, and well off, and that the house they lived in was sumptuously furnished and quite magnificent. Every calamity he smoothed over, every unkind remark of their snarling employer he called a merry jest; so that the poor blind girl lived in a castle of the air, "a bright little world of her own." When merry or puzzled, Caleb used to sing something about "a sparkling bowl."

It would have gladdened the heart of that inimitable creation of Charles Dickens, "Caleb Plummer."—Lord W. Lennox: Celebrities, ii.

Bertha Plummer, the blind daughter of the toy-maker, who fancied her poor old father was a young fop, that the sack he threw across his shoulders was a handsome blue great-coat, and that their wooden house was a palace. She was in love with Tackleton, the toy merchant, whom she thought to be a handsome young prince; and when she heard that he was about to marry May Fielding, she drooped and was like to die. She was then disillusioned, heard the real facts, and said at first, "Why, oh, why did you deceive me thus? Why did you fill my heart so full, and then come like death, and tear away the objects of my love?" However her love for her father was not lessened, and she declared after a time that the knowledge of the truth was "sight restored." "It is my sight," she cried. "Hitherto I have been blind, but now my eyes are open. I never knew my father before, and might have died without ever having known him truly."

Edward Plummer, son of the toy-maker, and brother of the blind girl. He was engaged from boyhood to May Fielding, went to South America, and returned to marry her; but, hearing of her engagement to Tackleton the toy merchant, he assumed the disguise of a deaf old man, to ascertain whether she loved Tackleton or not. Being satisfied that her heart was still his own, he married her, and Tackleton made them a present of the wedding-cake which he had ordered for himself.—Dickens: The Cricket on the Hearth (1845).

Plurality of Worlds (The), an essay by Dr. Whewell (1853). Dr. Whewell maintains that our world is the only one inhabited by sentient beings like ourselves. Dr. Brewster, in his treatise More Worlds than One (1854), took the other side.

(The arguments on both sides are briefly stated in my Theology in Science.)

Plush (John), any gorgeous footman conspicuous for his plush breeches and rainbow colours.

Plutarch (The Modern), Vayer, born at Paris. His name in full was Francis Vayer de la Mothe (1586–1672).

Plutarch's Parallel Lives, in Greek prose (about A.D. 110–113), have been translated into English prose by North, 1579; Langhorn, 1771, etc. Shakespeare used North's translation.

Pluto, the god of hadês.

Brothers, be of good cheer, for this night we shall sup with Pluto.—Leonidas: To the Three Hundred at Thermopylæ.

Plutus, the god of wealth.—Classic Mythology.

Within a heart, dearer than Plutus mine.
Shakespeare Julius Cæsar, act iv. sc. 3 (1607).

Plymouth Cloak (A), a cane, a cudgel. So called, says Ray, "because we use a staff in cuerpo, but not when we wear a cloak."

Wellborn. How, dog? (Raising his cudgel.)
Tapwell. Advance your Plymouth cloak.
There dwells, and within call, if it please your worship,
A potent monarch, called the constable,
That doth command a citadel, called the stocks.
Massinger: A New Way to Pay Old Debts, i. 1 (1628).

Po (Tom), a ghost. (Welsh, bo, "a hobgoblin.")

He now would pass for spirit Po.
S. Butler: Hudibras, iii. 1 (1678).

Pocahontas, daughter of Powhatan, an Indian chief of Virginia, who rescued captain John Smith when her father was on the point of killing him. She subsequently married John Rolfe, and was baptized under the name of Rebecca (1595–1617).—Old and New London, ii. 481 (1875).

Pochet (Madame), the French "Mrs. Gamp."—Henri Monnier.

Pochi Dana'ri ["the pennyless"], So the Italians call Maximilian I. emperor of Germany (1459, 1493–1519).

Pocket (Mr. Matthew), a real scholar, educated at Harrow, and an honour-man at Cambridge, but, having married young, he had to take up the calling of "grinder" and literary fag for a living. Mr. Pocket, when annoyed, used to run his two hands into his hair, and seemed as if he intended to lift himself by it. His house was a hopeless muddle, the best meals and chief expense being in the kitchen. Pip was placed under his charge.

Mrs. Pocket [Belinda], daughter of a City knight, brought up to be an ornamental nonentity, helpless, shiftless, and useless. She was the mother of eight children, whom she allowed to "tumble up" as best they could, under the charge of her maid Flopson. Her husband, who was a poor gentleman, found life a very uphill work.

Herbert Pocket, son of Mr. Matthew

Pocket, and an insurer of ships. He was a frank, easy young man, lithe and brisk, but not muscular. There was nothing mean or secretive about him. He was wonderfully hopeful, but had not the stuff to push his way into wealth. He was tall, slim, and pale; had a languor which showed itself even in his briskness; was most amiable, cheerful, and communicative. He called Pip "Handel," because he had been a blacksmith, and Handel composed a piece of music entitled The Harmonious Blacksmith. Pip helped him to a partnership in an agency business; and when Pip lost his "expectations," Herbert gave him a clerkship.

Sarah Pocket, sister of Matthew Pocket, a little dry, brown, corrugated old woman, with a small face that might have been made of walnut-shell, and a large mouth like a cat's without the whiskers.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

Podgers (The), lickspittles of the great.—Hollingshead: The Birthplace of Podgers.

Podsnap (Mr.), "a too, too smiling large man with a fatal freshness on him." Mr. Podsnap has "two little light-coloured wiry wings, one on either side of his else bald head, looking as like his hair-brushes as his hair." On his forehead are generally "little red beads," and he wears "a large allowance of crumpled shirt-collar up behind."

Mrs. Podsnap, "a fine woman for professor Owen: quantity of bone, neck and nostrils like a rocking-horse, hard features, and majestic head-dress in which Podsnap has hung golden offerings."

Georgiana Podsnap, daughter of the above; called by her father "the young person." She is a harmless, inoffensive girl, "always trying to hide her elbows." Georgiana adores Mrs. Lammle, and when Mr. Lammle tries to marry the girl to Mr. Fledgeby, Mrs. Lammle induces Mr. Twemlow to speak to the father and warn him against the connection.

It may not be so in the gospel according to Podsnappery, . . . but it has been the truth since the foundations of the universe were laid.—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend (1864).

Poem in Marble (A), the Taj, a mausoleum of white marble, raised in Agra by shah Jehan, to his favourite shahrina Moomtaz-i-Mahul, who died in childbirth of her eighth child. It is also called "The Marble Queen of Sorrow."

Poet (The Quaker), Bernard Barton (1784–1849).

Poet Sire of Italy, Alighieri Dante (1265–1321).

Poet Squab. John Dryden was so called by the earl of Rochester, on account of his corpulence (1631–1701).

Poet of France (The), Pierre Ronsard (1524–1585).

Poet of Poets, Percy Bysshe Shelley (1792–1822).

Poet of the Poor, the Rev. George Crabbe (1754–1832).

Poets (Lives of the), by Dr. Johnson (1779–81).

Poets (The prince of). Edmund Spenser is so called on his monument in Westminster Abbey (1553–1598).

Prince of Spanish Poets, Garcilaso de la Vega; so called by Cervantes (1503–1536).

Anthony Caraccio of Italy (1630–1702).

Pietro Aretino, an Italian of Arezzo (1492–1557).

Poets' Corner, in the south transept of Westminster Abbey. No one knows who christened the corner thus. With poets are divines, philosophers, actors, novelists, architects, and critics. It would have been a glorious thing indeed if the corner had been set apart for England's poets. But alas! the deans of Westminster have made a market of the wall, and hence, as a memorial of British poets, it is almost a caricature. Where is the record of Byron, Ford, Hemans, Keats, Keble, Marlowe, Massinger, Pope, Shelley? Where of E. B. Browning, Burns, Chatterton, Collins, Congreve, Cowper, Crabbe, Gower, Herbert, Herrick, Hood, Marvel, T. Moore, Scott, Shenstone, Southey, and Waller?

The "corner" contains a bust, statue, tablet, or monument to Chaucer (1400), Dryden (1700), Milton (1674), Shakespeare (1616), and Spenser (1598); Addison, Beaumont, (none to Fletcher), S. Butler, Campbell, Cowley, Cumberland, Drayton, Gay, Gray, Goldsmith, Ben Jonson, Macaulay, Prior (a most preposterous affair), Rowe, Sheridan, Thomson, and Wordsworth. And also to such miserable poetasters as Davenant ("Oh! rare sir William Davenant!"), Mason, and Shadwell. Truly, our Valhalla is almost a satire on our taste and judgment.

N.B.—Dryden's monument was erected by Sheffield duke of Buckingham. Wordsworth's statue was erected by a public subscription.

Poetry (The Father of), Orpheus (2 syl.) of Thrace.

The Father of Dutch Poetry, Jakob Maerlant; also called "The Father of Flemish Poetry" (1235–1300).

The Father of English Poetry, Geoffrey Chaucer (1328–1400).

The Father of Epic Poetry, Homer.

He compares Richardson to Homer, and predicts for his memory the same honours which are rendered to the Father of Epic Poetry.—Sir W. Scott.

The Father of German Poetry, Martin Opitz of Silesia (1597–1639).

Poetry — Prose. Pope advised Wycherly "to convert his poetry into prose."

Po'gram (Elijah), one of the "master minds" of America, and a member of congress. He was possessed with the idea that there was a settled opposition in the British mind against the institutions of his "free enlightened country." —Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit (1844).

Poinder (George), a city officer.—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Poins, a companion of sir John Falstaff.—Shakespeare: 1 and 2 Henry IV. (1597, 1598).

The chronicles of that day contain accounts of many a mad prank which [lord Warwick, Addison's stepson] played . . . [like] the lawless freaks of the madcap prince and Poins.—Thackeray.

Poison. It is said that Mithridātēs VI., surnamed "the Great," had so fortified his constitution, that poisons had no baneful effect on him (B.C. 131, 120–63).

Poison-Detectors. Opal turns pale and Venetian glass shivers at the approach of poison. Peacocks ruffle their feathers at the sight of poison; and if poison is put into a liquid contained in a cup of rhinoceros's horn, the liquid will effervesce. No one could pass with poison the horn gate of Gundofōrus. Nourgehan had a bracelet, the stones of which seemed agitated when poison approached the wearer. Aladdin's ring was a perservative against every evil. The sign of the cross in the Middle Ages was looked upon as a poison-detector. (See WARNING-GIVERS.)

Poison of Khaïbar. By this is meant the poison put into a leg of mutton by Zaïnab, a Jewess, to kill Mahomet while he was in the citadel of Kha'ïbar. Mahomet partook of the mutton, and suffered from the poison all through life.

Poisoners (Secret).

1. Of Ancient Rome: Locusta, employed by Agrippi'na to poison her husband the emperor Claudius. Nero employed the same woman to poison Britannicus and others.

2. Of English History: the countess of Somerset, who poisoned sir Thomas Overbury in the Tower of London. She also poisoned others.

Villiers duke of Buckingham, it is said, poisoned king James I.

3. Of France: Lavoisin and Lavigoreux, French midwives and fortune-tellers.

Catharine de Medicis is said to have poisoned the mother of Henry IV. with a pair of wedding-gloves, and several others with poisoned fans.

The marquise de Brinvilliers, a young profligate Frenchwoman, was taught the art of secret poisoning by Sainte-Croix, who learnt it in Italy.—World of Wonders, vii. 203.

4. Of Germany: Anna Zwanziger, sentenced to death at Bamberg in 1811. Her career is related in lady Duff-Gordon's translation of Feuerbach's Criminal Trials.

5. Of Italy: Pope Alexander VI. and his children Cæsar and Lucrezia [Borgia] were noted poisoners; so were Hieronyma Spara and Tofa'na.

Polexan'dre, an heroic romance by Gomberville (1632).

Policy (Mrs.), housekeeper at Holyrood Palace. She appears in the introduction.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Pol'idore (3 syl.), father of Valère.—Molière: Le Dépit Amoureux (1654).

Polinesso, duke of Albany, who falsely accused Geneura of incontinency, and was slain in single combat by Ariodantês.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Polish Jew (The), also called THE BELLS, a melodrama by J. R. Ware, brought prominently into note by the acting of [sir] Henry Irving at the Lyceum. Matthias, a miller in a small German town, is visited on Christmas Eve by a Polish Jew, who comes through the snow in a sledge. After rest and refreshment, he leaves for Nantzig, "four leagues off." Matthias follows him, kills him with an axe, and burns the body in a lime-kiln. He then pays his debts, becomes a prosperous and respected man, and is made burgomaster. On the wedding night of his only child, Annette, he dies of apoplexy, of which he had ample warning by the constant sound of sledge-bells in his ears. In his dream he supposes himself put into a mesmeric sleep in open court, when he confesses everything and is condemned (1874).

Polixène, the name assumed by Madelon Gorgibus, a shopkeeper's daughter, as far more romantic and genteel than her baptismal name. Her cousin Cathos called herself Aminte (2 syl.).

"A-t-on jamais parlé," asks Madelon, "dans le beau style, de Cathos ni de Madelon? et ne m'avouerez-vous pas que ce seroit assez d'un de ces noms pour décrier le plus beau roman du monde."

"Il est vrai," says Cathos to Madelon's father, "et le nom de Polixène ... et celui d'Aminte ... ont une grace dont il faut que vous demeuriez d'accord."—Molière: Les Précieuses Ridicules, 5 (1659).

Polix'enes (4 syl.), king of Bohemia, schoolfellow and old companion of Leontês king of Sicily. While on a visit to the Sicilian king, Leontês grew jealous of him, and commanded Camillo to poison him; but Camillo only warned him of his danger, and fled with him to Bohemia. (For the rest of the tale, see PERDITA, p. 825.)—Shakespeare: The Winter's Tale (1604).

Poll Pineapple, the bumboat woman, once sailed in seaman's clothes with lieutenant Belaye' (2 syl.), in the Hot Cross-Bun. Jack tars generally greet each other with "Messmate, ho! what cheer?" but the greeting on the Hot Cross-Bun was always, "How do you do, my dear?" and never was any oath more naughty than "Dear me!" One day, lieutenant Belaye came on board and said to his crew, "Here, messmates, is my wife, for I have just come from church." Whereupon they all fainted; and it was found that the crew consisted of young women only, who had dressed like sailors to follow the fate of lieutenant Belaye.—Gilbert: The Bab Ballads ("The Bumboat Woman's Story").

Pollente (3 syl.), a Saracen, lord of the Perilous Bridge. When his groom Guizor demands "the passage-penny" of sir Artegal, the knight gives him a "stunning blow," saying, "Lo! knave, there's my hire;" and the groom falls down dead. Pollentê then comes rushing up at full speed, and both he and sir Artegal fall into the river, fighting most desperately. At length sir Artegal prevails, and the dead body of the Saracen is carried down "the blood-stained stream."—Spenser: Faërie Queene, v. 2 (1596).

(Upton conjectures that "Pollente" is intended for Charles IX. of France, and his groom "Guizor" (he says) means the duke of Guise, noted for the part he took in the St. Bartholomew Massacre.)

Polly, daughter of Peachum. A pretty girl, who really loved captain Macheath, married him, and remained faithful even when he disclaimed her. When the reprieve arrived, "the captain" confessed his marriage, and vowed to abide by Polly for the rest of his life.—Gay: The Beggar's Opera (1727).

N.B.—This character has led to the peerage three actresses: Miss Fenton (duchess of Bolton), Miss Bolton (lady Thurlow), and Miss Stephens (countess of Essex).

Mrs. C. Mathews says of Miss Fenton—

Both by singing and acting, the impression she made in "Polly" was most powerful. . . . Not a print-shop or fan-shop but exhibited her handsome figure in her "Polly's" costume, which possessed all the characteristic simplicity of the modern quakeress, without one meretricious ornament.

Polo'nius, a garrulous old chamberlain of Denmark, and father of Laer'tês and Ophelia; conceited, politic, and a courtier. Polonius conceals himself, to overhear what Hamlet says to his mother; and, making some unavoidable noise, startles the prince, who, thinking it is the king concealed, rushes blindly on the intruder, and kills him; but finds too late he has killed the chamberlain, and not Claudius as he hoped and expected. —Shakespeare: Hamlet (1596).

Polonius is a man bred in courts, exercised in business, stored with observations, confident of his knowledge, proud of his eloquence, and declining to dotage. —Dr. Johnson.

(Polonius was the great part of William Mynitt, 1710–1763.)

Soon after Munden retired from the stage, an admirer met him in Covent Garden. It was a wet day, and each carried an umbrella. The gentleman's was an expensive silk one, and Joe's an old gingham. "So you have left the stage, . . . and 'Polonius,' 'Jemmy Jumps,' 'Old Dornton,' and a dozen others have left the world with you? I wish you'd give me some trifle by way of memorial, Munden!" "Trifle, sir? I' faith, sir, I've got nothing. But hold, yes, egad, suppose we exchange umbrellas."—Theatrical Anecdotes.

Polwarth (Alick), one of Waverley's servants.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Poly-chron'icon, one of those tedious chronicles running back to "creation," to A.D. 1342. It is subdivided into seven books, by Ralph Higden, who died in 1363.

Polycle'tos (in Latin, Polycletus), a statuary of Sicyon, who drew up a canon of the proportions of the several parts of the human body: as, twice round the thumb is once round the wrist; twice round the wrist is once round the neck; twice round the neck is once round the waist; once round the fist is the length of the foot; the two arms extended is the height of the body; six times the length of the foot, or eighteen thumbs, is also the height of the body.

Again, the thumb, the longest toe, and the nose should all be of the same length. The index finger should measure the breadth of the hand and foot, and twice the breadth should give the length. The hand, the foot, and the face should all be the same length. The nose should be one-third of the face; and, of course, the thumbs should be one-third the length of the hand. Gerard de Lairesse has given the exact measurements of every part of the human figure, according to the famous statues of "Antinous," "Apollo Belvidere," "Hercules," and "Venus de Medici."

Polycrates (4 syl.), tyrant of Samos. He was so fortunate in everything, that Am'asis king of Egypt advised him to part with something he highly prized. Whereupon Polycrătes threw into the sea an engraved gem of extraordinary value. A few days afterwards, a fish was presented to the tyrant, in which this very gem was found. Amasis now renounced all friendship with him, as a man doomed by the gods; and not long after this, a satrap, having entrapped the too fortunate despot, put him to death by crucifixion. (See FISH AND THE RING, p. 370.)—Herodotus, iii. 40.

Polyd'amas, a Thessalian athlete of enormous strength. He is said to have killed an angry lion, to have held by the heels a raging bull and thrown it helpless at his feet, to have stopped a chariot in full career, etc. One day, he attempted to sustain a falling rock, but was killed and buried by the huge mass.

¶ Milo carried a bull, four years old, on his shoulders through the stadium at Olympia; he also arrested a chariot in full career. One day, tearing asunder a pine tree, the two parts, rebounding, caught his hands and held him fast; in which state he was devoured by wolves.

POLYDORE (3 syl.), the name by which Belarius called prince Guiderius, while he lived in a cave in the Welsh mountains. His brother, prince Arvirăgus, went by the name of Cadwal.—Shakespeare: Cymbeline (1605).

Pol'ydore (3 syl.), brother of general Memnon, beloved by the princess Calis sister of Astorax king of Paphos.—Beaumont and Fletcher: The Mad Lover (1618).

(Beaumont died 1616.)

Pol'ydore (Lord), son of lord Acasto, and Castalio's younger brother. He entertained a base passion for his father's ward Monimia "the orphan," and, making use of the signal ("three soft taps upon the chamber door") to be used by Castalio, to whom she was privately married, indulged his wanton love, Monimia supposing him to be her husband. When, next day, he discovered that Monimia was actually married to Castalio, he was horrified, and provoked a quarrel with his brother; but as soon as Castalio drew his sword, he ran upon it and was killed.—Otway: The Orphan (1680).

Pol'ydore (3 syl.), a comrade of Ernest of Otranto (page of prince Tancred).—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Polyglot (Ignatius), the master of seventeen languages, and tutor of Charles Eustace (aged 24). Very learned, very ignorant of human life; most strict as a disciplinarian, but tender-hearted as a girl. His pupil has married clandestinely, but Polyglot offers himself voluntarily to be the scapegoat of the young couple, and he brings them off triumphantly.—Poole: The Scapegoat.

Polyglot (A Walking), cardinal Mezzofanti, who knew fifty-eight different languages (1774–1849).

Polyglot Bible (The), by Walton, in six large folio volumes, in nine languages (1654–1657).

A gigantic work, both to compile and print. The Gospels are given in six languages. The books of the Old Testament are not all in the same number of versions, and no single book is in all the nine. Walton's Polyglot is not a translation of the several languages, but each language is printed in its own character, and eight are accompanied with a Latin translation, viz. the Hebrew [version], Samaritan, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Persian, and Greek; the ninth is the Latin version itself. Origen (220–250) published an Hexapla, but all his six versions were in the Greek character.

 There are other polyglots besides Walton's, as (1) the Complutensian, printed at Complutum (1502–1517); (2) the Antwerp (1569–1572); (3) the Parisian (1586–1545); all therefore published before Walton's great work (1654–1657).

(Polyglot is from two Greek words polu glotta, "many tongues.")

Polyolbion (the "greatly blessed"), by Michael Drayton, in thirty parts, called "songs." It is a topographical description of England. Song i. The landing of Brute. Song ii. Dorsetshire, and the adventures of sir Bevis of Southampton. Song iii. Somerset. Song iv. Contention of the rivers of England and Wales respecting Lundy—to which country did it belong? Song v. Sabrina, as arbiter, decides that it is "allied alike both to England and Wales;" Merlin, and Milford Haven. Song vi. The salmon and beavor of Twy; the tale of Sabrina; the druids and bards. Song vii. Hereford. Song viii. Conquest of Britain by the Romans and by the Saxons. Song ix. Wales. Song x. Merlin's prophecies; Winifred's well; defence of the "tale of Brute" (1612). Song xi. Cheshire; the religious Saxon kings. Song xii. Shropshire and Staffordshire; the Saxon warrior kings; and Guy of Warwick. Song xiii. Warwick; Guy of Warwick concluded. Song xiv. Gloucestershire. Song xv. The marriage of Isis and Thame. Song xvi. The Roman roads and Saxon kingdoms. Song xvii. Surrey and Sussex; the sovereigns of England from William to Elizabeth. Song xviii. Kent; England's great generals and sea-captains (1613). Song xix. Essex and Suffolk; English navigators. Song xx. Norfolk. Song xxi. Cambridge and Ely. Song xxii. Buckinghamshire, and England's intestine battles. Song xxiii. Northamptonshire. Song xxiv. Rutlandshire; and the British saints. Song xxv. Lincolnshire. Song xxvi. Nottinghamshire, Leicestershire, Derbyshire; with the story of Robin Hood. Song xxvii. Lancashire and the Isle of Man. Song xxviii. Yorkshire. Song xxix. Northumberland. Song xxx. Cumberland (1622).

Pol'ypheme (3 syl.), a gigantic Cyclops of Sicily, who fed on human flesh. When Ulysses, on his return from Troy, was driven to this island, he and twelve of his companions were seized by Polypheme, and confined in his cave, that he might devour two daily for his dinner. Ulysses made the giant drunk, and, when he lay down to sleep, bored out his one eye. Roused by the pain, the monster tried to catch his tormentors; but Ulysses and his surviving companions made their escape by clinging to the bellies of the sheep and rams when they were let out to pasture (Odyssey, ix.).

¶ There is a Basque legend told of the giant Tartaro, who caught a young man in his snares, and confined him in his cave for dessert. When, however, Tartaro fell asleep, the young man made the giant's spit red hot, bored out his one eye, and then made his escape by fixing the bell of the bell-ram round his neck, and a sheep-skin over his back. Tartaro seized the skin, and the man, leaving it behind, made off.

¶ A very similar adventure forms the tale of Sinbad's third voyage, in the Arabian Nights. He was shipwrecked on a strange island, and entered, with his companions, a sort of palace. At nightfall, a one-eyed giant entered, and ate one of them for supper, and another for breakfast next morning. This went on for a day or two, when Sinbad bored out the giant's one eye with a charred olive stake. The giant tried in vain to catch his tormentors, but they ran to their rafts; and Sinbad, with two others, contrived to escape.

N.B.—Homer was translated into Syriac by Theophilus Edessenes in the caliphate of Hárun-ur-Ráshid (A.D. 786–809).

Polypheme and Galatea. Polypheme loved Galatēa the sea-nymph; but Galatea had fixed her affections on Acis, a Sicilian shepherd. The giant, in his jealousy, hurled a huge rock at his rival, and crushed him to death.

(The tale of Polypheme is from Homer's Odyssey, ix. It is also given by Ovid in his Metamorphoses, xiv. Euripidēs introduces the monster in his Cyclops; and the tragedy of Acis and Galatea is the subject of Handel's famous opera so called.)

In Greek the monster is called Polupheimos, and in Latin Polyphēmus.

Polyphe'mus of Literature, Dr. Samuel Johnson (1709–1784).

Polypho'nus ["big-voiced"], the Kapāneus and most boastful of the frog heroes. He was slain by the mouse Artophāgus ("the bread-nibbler").

But great Artophagus avenged the slain, . . .
And Polyphōnus dies, a frog renowned
For boastful speech and turbulence of sound.
Parnell: Battle of the Frogs and Mice, iii. (about 1712).

Polyphrasticontinomimegalondulation.

Why not wind up the famous ministerial declaration with "Konx Ompax,' or that difficult expression, "polyphrasticontinomimegalondulation"?—The Star.

Polypo'dium ["many-foot"], alluding to its root furnished with numerous fibres. Polypodium used to be greatly celebrated for its effect on tape-worm, and for rheum.

The hermit
Here finds upon an oak rheum-purging polypode (3 syl.).
Drayton: Polyolbion, xiii. (1613).

Polyx'ena, a magnanimous and most noble woman, wife of Charles Emmanuel king of Sardinia (who succeeded to the crown in 1730).—R. Browning: King Victor and King Charles.

Pombod'ita, hocus-pocus-land. When any one tells an incredible story, we might say to him, "Perhaps you are a native of Pombodita, where elephants are driven through the eyes of needles."

Cum aliquis incredibilia narrat, respondent, "Forte ex Pombodita tu es, ubi traducunt elephantem per foramen acus."—Fole: Synopsis Criticorum.

It may be that thou art of Pumbeditha, where they can bring an elephant through the eye of a needle.—Lightfoot (A Jewish Proverb). (See Luke xviii. 18–25; Mark x. 22.)

Pomegranate Seed. When Perseph'onē was in hadēs, whither Pluto had carried her, the god, foreknowing that Jupiter would demand her release, gathered a pomegranate, and said to her, "Love, eat with me this parting day of the pomegranate seed;" and she ate. Demēter, in the mean time, implored Zeus (Jupiter) to demand Persephonē's release; and the king of Olympus promised she should be set at liberty, if she had not eaten anything during her detention in hadēs. As, however, she had eaten pomegranate seeds, her return was impossible.

Low laughs the dark king on his throne—
"I gave her of pomegranate seeds" . . .
And chant the maids of Enna still—
"O fateful flower beside the rill,
The daffodil, the daffodil." (See DAFFODIL.)
Jean Ingelow: Persephone.

Pompeii (The Last Days of), an historical novel by lord Lytton (1834).

Pompey, a clown; servant to Mrs. Overdone (a bawd).—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure (1603).

Pompey the Great was killed by Achillas and Septimius, the moment the Egyptian fishing-boat reached the coast. Plutarch tells us they threw his head into the sea. Others say his head was sent to Cæsar, who turned from it with horror, and shed a flood of tears. Shakespeare makes him killed by "savage islanders" (2 Henry VI. act iv. sc. 1, 1598).

Pompil'ia, a foundling, the putative daughter of Pietro (2 syl.). She married count Guido Franceschini, who treated her so brutally that she made her escape under the protection of a young priest named Caponsacchi. Pompilia subsequently gave birth to a son, but was slain by her husband. For Pompilia's character, see the magnificent speech of the pope (bk. x. 1000).

. . . first of the first,
Such I pronounce Pompilia, then as now
Perfect in whiteness.
R. Browning: The Ring and the Book, x., "The pope," 1000.

Pomposus. (See PROBUS.)

Ponce de Léon, the navigator who went in search of the Fontaine de Jouvence, "cur fit rajovenir la gent." He sailed in two ships on this "voyage of discoveries," in the sixteenth century.

Like Ponce de Léon, he wants to go off to the Antipodes in search of that Fontaine de Jouvence which was fabled to give a man back his youth.—Véra, 130.

Pond of the Prophet (The), a well of life, from which all the blessed will drink before they enter paradise. The water is whiter than milk, and more fragrant than musk.

Po'nent Wind (The), the west wind, or wind from the sunset. Lev'ant is the east wind, or wind from the sunrise.

Forth rush the Levant and the Ponent winds.
Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 704 (1665).

Pongo, a cross between "a land-tiger and a sea-shark." This terrible monster devastated Sicily, but was slain by the three sons of St. George.—R. Johnson: The Seven Champions, etc. (1617).

Ponoc'rates (4 syl.), the tutor of Gargantua.—Rabelais: Gargantua (1533).

Pons Asino'rum ["the asses' bridge"], the fifth proposition bk. i. of Euclid's Elements, too difficult for "asses" or stupid boys to get over.

A most improper term. It is the asses' trap, not their bridge. Their "stone of stumbling and rock of offence."

Pontius Pilate's Body-Guard, the 1st Foot Regiment. In Picardy the French officers wanted to make out that they were the seniors; and, to carry their point, vaunted that they were on duty on the night of the Crucifixion. The colonel of the 1st Foot replied, "If we had been on guard, we should not have slept at our posts" (see Matt. xxviii. 13).

Pontoys (Stephen), a veteran in sir Hugo de Lacy's troop.—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Pony (Mr. Garland's), Whisker (q.v.).

Poole (1 syl.), in Dorsetshire; once "a young and lusty sea-born lass," courted by great Albion who had by her three children, Brunksey, Fursey, and [St.] Hellen. Thetis was indignant that one of her virgin train should be guilty of such indiscretion; and, to protect his children from her fury, Albion placed them in the bosom of Poole, and then threw his arms around them.—Drayton: Polyolbion, ii. (1612).

Poor (Father of the), Bernard Gilpin (1517-1583).

Poor Gentleman (The), a comedy by George Colman the younger (1802). "The poor gentleman" is lieutenant Worthington, discharged from the army on half-pay, because his arm had been crushed by a shell in storming Gibraltar. On his half-pay he had to support himself, his daughter Emily, an old corporal, and a maiden sister-in-law. Having put his name to a bill for £500, his friend died without effecting an insurance, and the lieutenant was called upon for payment. Imprisonment would have followed if sir Robert Bramble had not most generously paid the money. With this piece of good fortune came another—the marriage of his daughter Emily to Frederick Bramble, nephew and heir of the rich baronet.

Poor Jack, a popular sea-song by Charles Dibdin (1790). The last two lines are—

There's a sweet little cherub that sits up aloft,
To keep watch o'er the life of poor Jack.

Poor John, a hake dried and salted.

'Tis well thou art not fish; if thou hadst [been] thou hadst been poor John.—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, act i. sc. 1 (1597).

Poor Relations, a humourous essay by C. Lamb (Essays of Elia, 1823).

Poor Richard, the pseudonym of Benjamin Franklin, under which he issued a series of almanacs, which he made the medium of teaching thrift, temperance, order, cleanliness, chastity, forgiveness, and so on. The maxims or precepts of these almanacs generally end with the words, "as poor Richard says" (begun in 1732).

Poor Robin, the pseudonym of Robert Herrick the poet, under which he issued a series of almanacs (begun in 1661).

Poor as Lazarus, that is, the beggar Lazarus, in the parable of Divês and Lazarus (Luke xvi. 19-31).

Pope (To drink like a). Benedict XII. was an enormous eater, and such a huge wine-drinker that he gave rise to the Bacchanalian expression, Bibămus papaliter.

Pope Changing His Name. Peter Hogsmouth, or, as he is sometimes called, Peter di Porca, was the first pope to change his name. He called himself Sergius II. (844-847). Some say he thought it arrogant to be called Peter II.

Pope-Fig-lands, protestant countries. The Gaillardets, being shown the pope's image, said, "A fig for the pope!" whereupon their whole island was put to the sword, and the name changed to Pope-fig-land, the people being called "Pope-figs."—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, iv. 45 (1545).

(The allusion is to the kingdom of Navarre, once protestant; but in 1512 it was subjected to Ferdinand the Catholic.)

Pope-Figs, protestants. The name was given to the Gaillardets, for saying, "A fig for the pope!"

They were made tributaries and slaves to the Papimans for saying, "A fig for the pope's image!" and never after did the poor wretches prosper, but every year the devil was at their doors, and they were plagued with hail, storms, famine, and all manner of woes in punishment of this sin of their forefathers.—Rabelais: Pantag'ruel, iv. 45 (1545).

Pope Joan, between Leo IV. and Benedict III., and called John [VIII.]. The subject of this scandalous story was an English girl, educated at Cologne, who left her home in man's disguise with her lover (the monk Folda), and went to Athens, where she studied law. She afterwards went to Rome and studied theology, in which she gained so high a reputation that, at the death of Leo IV., she was chosen his successor. Her sex was discovered by the birth of a child while she was going to the Lateran Basilica, between the Coliseum and the church of St. Clement. Pope Joan died, and was buried, without honours, after a pontificate of two years and five months (853-855).—Marianus Scotus (who died 1086).

The story is given most fully by Martinus Polonus, confessor to Gregory X., and the tale was generally believed till the Reformation. There is a German miracle-play on the subject, called The Canonisation of Pope Joan (1480). David Blondel, a Calvinist divine, has written a book to confute the tale.

The following note contains the chief points of interest:—

(1) Argument in proof of the allegation—

Anastasius the librarian is the first to mention such a pope, A.D. 886, or thirty years after the death of Joan.

Marianus Scotus, in his Chronicle, says she reigned two years five months and four days (853-855). Scotus died 1086.

Sigebert de Gemblours, in his Chronicle, repeats the same story (1112).

Otto of Freisingen and Gotfrid of Viterbo both mention her in their histories.

Martin Polonus gives a very full account of the matter. He says she went by the name of John Anglus, and was born at Metz, of English parents. While she was pope, she was prematurely delivered of a child in the street "between the Coliseum and St. Clement's Church."

William Ocham alludes to the story.

Thomas de Elmham repeats it (1422).

John Huss tells us her baptismal name was not Joan but Agnes.

Others insist that her name was Gilberta.

In the Annalês Augustani (1135) we are told her papal name was John VIII., and that she it was who consecrated Louis II. of France.

Arguments in favour of the allegation are given by Spanheim, Exercit. de Papa Fœmina, ii. 577; in Lenfant, Histoire de la Papesse Jeanne.

(2) Arguments against the allegation are given by Allatius or Allatus, Confutatio Fabulæ de Johanna Papissa; and in Lequien, Oriens Christianus, iii. 777.

(3) Arguments on both sides are given in Cunningham's translation of Geiseler: Lehrbuch, ii. 21, 22; and in La Bayle's Dictionnaire, iii. (article "Papisse").

∴ Gibbon says, "Two protestants, Blondel and Bayle, have annihilated the female pope; but the expression is certainly too strong, and even Mosheim is more than half inclined to believe there really was such a person."

Pope Joan, the game so called, once very popular in England, and often played as a children's game in the first quarter of the nineteenth century. In the privy purse's expenses of Henry VIII. it is called Pope Ju'ly's [Julius's] Game, and supposed to represent the courtship and marriage of Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn. The point called "stops" is the interference of the pope and his agents to prevent the marriage. The other points are called "intrigue," "matrimony," and "pope."

Pope of Philosophy, Aristotle (B.C. 384-322).

Pope of the Huguenots (The), Plessis Mornay (1549-1623).

Popes (Titles assumed by). "Universal Bishop," prior to Gregory the Great. Gregory the Great adopted the style of "Servus Servorum" (591).

Martin IV. was addressed as "the lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world," to which was added, "Grant us thy peace!" (1281).

Leo X. was styled, by the council of Lateran, "Divine Majesty," "Husband of the Church," "Prince of the Apostles," "The Key of all the Universe," "The Pastor, the Physician, and a God possessed of all power both in heaven and on earth" (1513).

Paul V. styled himself "Monarch of Christendom," "Supporter of the Papal Omnipotence," "Vice-God," "Lord God the Pope" (1605).

Others, after Paul, "Master of the World," "Pope the Universal Father," "Judge in the place of God," "Vicegerent of the Most High."—Brady: Clavis Calendaria, 247 (1839).

The pope assumes supreme dominion, not only over spiritual but also over temporal affairs, styling himself "Head of the Catholic or Universal Church, Sole Arbiter of its Rights, and Sovereign Father of all the Kings of the Earth." From these titles, he wears a triple crown—one as high priest, one as emperor, and the third as king. He also bears keys, to denote his privilege of opening the gates of heaven to all true believers.—Brady, 250, 251.

N.B.—For the first five centuries the bishops of Rome wore a bonnet, like other ecclesiastics. Pope Hormisdas placed on his bonnet the crown sent him by Clovis; Boniface VIII. added a second crown during his struggles with Philip the Fair; and John XXII. assumed the third crown.

Popish Plot, a supposed Roman Catholic conspiracy to massacre the protestants, burn London, and murder the king (Charles II.). This fiction was concocted by one Titus Oates, who made a "good thing" by his schemes; but being at last found out, was pilloried, whipped, and imprisoned (1678–79).

Poppy (Ned), a prosy old anecdote-teller, with a marvellous tendency to digression. (See AIRCASTLE, p. 17.)

Ned knew exactly what parties had for dinner, . . . in what ditch his bay horse had his sprain, . . . and how his man John—no, it was William—started a hare, . . . so that he never got to the end of his tale.—Steele.

Population (An Essay on the Principle of), by Malthus (1803). The object is to show that the increase of food cannot keep pace with the present increase of population, and therefore that every obstacle should be thrown in the way of matrimony, especially in the lower strata of society; but if they persist in marrying, leave them entirely alone without parish relief.

No doubt there is a limit to the production of food, but theoretically no limit to population; but we are as yet a long way off the fatal line. Canada alone might find room for all the inhabitants of the British Isles, and be the better for it.

Porch (The). The Stoics were so called, because their founder gave his lectures in the Athenian stoa or porch called "Pœ'cilê."

The successors of Socrates formed . . . the Academy, the Porch, the Garden.—Sailey: Ecce Homo.

(George Herbert has a poem called The Church Porch (six-line stanzas). It may be considered introductory to his poem entitled The Church, in sapphic verse and sundry other metres.)

Porcius, son of Cato of Utica (in Africa), and brother of Marcus. Both brothers were in love with Lucia; but the hot-headed, impulsive Marcus, being slain in battle, the sage and temperate Porcius was without a rival.—Addison: Cato (1713).

When Sheridan reproduced Cato, Wignell, who acted "Porcius," omitted the prologue, and began at once with the lines, "The dawn is overcast, the morning lowers . . ." "The prologue! the prologue!" shouted the audience; and Wignell went on in the same tone, as if continuing his speech—

Ladies and gentlemen, there has not been
A prologue spoken to this play for years——
And heavily in clouds brings on the day,
The great, the important day, big with the fate
Of Cato and of Rome.

History of the Stage.

Porcupine (Peter). William Cobbett, the politician, published The Rushlight under this pseudonym in 1800.

Pornei'us (3 syl.), Fornication personified; one of the four sons of Anag'nus (inchastity), his brothers being Mæ'chus (adultery), Acath'arus, and Aselgês (lasciviousness). He began the battle of Mansoul by encountering Parthen'ia (maidenly chastity), but "the martial maid" slew him with her spear. (Greek, porneia, "fornication.")

In maids his joy; now by a maid defied,
His life he lost and all his former pride.
With women would he live, now by a woman died.
P. Fletcher: The Purple Island, xi. (1633).

Porphyrius, in Dryden's drama of Tyrannic Love (1669).

Valeria, daughter of Maximin, having killed herself for the love of Porphyrius, was on one occasion being carried off by the bearers, when she started up and boxed one of the bearers on the ears, saying to him—

Hold! are you mad, you damned confounded dog!
I am to rise and speak the epilogue.
W. C. Russell: Representative Actors, 456.

Porphyro-Genitus ["born in the Porphyra"], the title given to the kings of the Eastern empire, from the apartments called Porphyra, set apart for the empresses during confinement.

There he found Irene, the empress, in travail, in a house anciently appointed for the empresses during child-birth. They call that house "Porphyra," whence the name of the Porphyro-geniti came into the world.—See Selden: Titles of Honour, v. 61 (1614).

Porrex, younger son of Gorbodug a legendary king of Britain. He drove his elder brother Ferrex from the kingdom, and, when Ferrex returned with a large army, defeated and slew him. Porrex was murdered while "slumbering on his careful bed," by his own mother, who "stabbed him to the heart with a knife." —Norton and Sackville: Gorboduc (1561-62).

Por'sena, a legendary king of Etruria, who made war on Rome to restore Tarquin to the throne.

Lord Macaulay has made this the subject of one of his Lays of Ancient Rome (1842).

Port'amour, Cupid's sheriff's officer, who summoned offending lovers to "Love's Judgment-Hall." — Spenser: Faërie Queene, vi. 7 (1596).

Porteous (Captain John), an officer of the city guard. He was hanged by the mob (1736).

Mrs. Porteous, wife of the captain.—Sir W. Scott: The Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Portia, the wife of Pontius Pilate.

Portia, wife of Marcus Brutus. Valerius Maximus says, "She, being determined to kill herself, took hot burning coals into her mouth, and kept her lips closed till she was suffocated by the smoke."

> With this she [Portia] fell distract,
> And, her attendants absent, swallowed fire.
> Shakespeare: Julius Cæsar, act iv. sc. 3 (1607).

Por'tia, a rich heiress, in love with Bassa'nio; but her choice of a husband was restricted by her father's will to the following condition: Her suitors were to select from three caskets, one of gold, one of silver, and one of lead, and he who selected the casket which contained Portia's picture was to claim her as his wife. Bassanio chose the lead, and being successful, became the espoused husband. It so happened that Bassanio had borrowed 3000 ducats, and Anthonio, a Venetian merchant, was his security. The money was borrowed of Shylock, a Jew, on these conditions: If the loan was repaid within three months, only the principal would be required; if not, the Jew should be at liberty to claim a pound of flesh from Anthonio's body. The loan was not repaid, and the Jew demanded the forfeiture. Portia, in the dress of a law doctor, conducted the defence, and saved Anthonio by reminding the Jew that a pound of flesh gave him no drop of blood, and that he must cut neither more nor less than an exact pound, otherwise his life would be forfeit. As it would be plainly impossible to fulfil these conditions, the Jew gave up his claim, and Anthonio was saved.—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice (q.v.) (1598).

Portland Place (London). So called from William Bentinck, second duke of Portland, who married Margaret, only child of Edward second earl of Oxford and Mortimer. From these came Margaret Street, Bentinck Street, Duke Street, Duchess Street, and Portland Place.

Portman Square (London). So called from William Henry Portman, owner of the estate in which the Square and Orchard Street stand.

Portsmouth (The duchess of), "La Belle Louise de Querouaille," one of the mistresses of Charles II.—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Portuguese Cid (The), Nunes Alvarez Pereira (1360-1431).

Portuguese Horace (The), Antonio Ferreira (1528-1569).

Portuguese Mars (The), Alfonso de Albuquerque (1453-1515).

Portuguese Nostradamus (The), Gonçalo Annes Bandarra, a poet-cobbler (died 1556). His writings were suppressed by the Inquisition.

Possunt, quia Posse Videntur. Fail not to will, and you will not fail.—Virgil: Æneid, v. 231.

Postage. Design for the penny postage envelope. It was Mulready who made this ridiculous design for the penny postage envelopes, but happily it had a very brief period of existence. In 1896 the lord mayor of London issued his invitation for the banquet given on the 9th November on cards of similar character, but, if possible, in still worse taste than the Mulready envelopes (q.v.).

Posthu'mus [LEONĀTUS] married Imogen, daughter of Cymbeline king of Britain, and was banished the kingdom for life. He went to Italy, and there, in the house of Philario, bet a diamond ring with Iachimo that nothing could seduce the fidelity of Imogen. (For the rest of the tale, see IACHIMO, p. 516.)—Shakespeare: Cymbeline (1605).

Potage (Jean), the French Jack Pudding; similar to the Italian "Macaroni," the Dutch "Pickel-herringe," and the German "Hanswurst." Clumsy, gormandizing clowns, fond of practical jokes, especially such as stealing eatables and drinkables.

Pother (Doctor), an apothecary, "city registrar, and walking story-book." He had a story à propos of every remark made and of every incident; but as he mixed two or three together, his stories were pointless and quite unintelligible. "I know a monstrous good story on that point. He! he! he!" "I'll tell you a famous good story about that, you must know. He! he! he! . . ." "I could have told a capital story, but there was no one to listen to it. He! he! he!" This is the style of his chattering . . . "speaking professionally—for anatomy, chemistry, pharmacy, phlebotomy, oxygen, hydrogen, caloric, carbonic, atmospheric, galvanic. Ha! ha! ha! Can tell you a prodigiously laughable story on the subject. Went last summer to a watering-place—lady of fashion—feel pulse—not lady, but lap-dog—talk Latin—prescribe galvanism—out jumped Pompey plump into a batter pudding, and lay like a tode in a hole. Ha! ha! ha!"—Dibdin: The Farmer's Wife (1780).

(Colman's "Ollapod" (1802) was evidently copied from Dibden's "doctor Pother." See AIRCASTLE, p. 17.)

Potiphar's Wife, Zoleikha or Zuleika; but some call her Raïl.—Sale: Al Korân, xii. note.

Pott (Mr.), the librarian at the Spa.

Mrs. Pott, the librarian's wife.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Potteries (Father of the), Josiah Wedgewood (1730–1795).

Pounce (Mr. Peter), in The Adventures of Joseph Andrews, by Fielding (1742).

Poundtext (Peter), an "indulged pastor" in the covenanters' army.—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (time, Charles II.).

Pourceaugnac [Poor-sone-yak], the hero of a comedy so called. He is a pompous country gentleman, who comes to Paris to marry Julie, daughter of Oronte (2 syl.); but Julie loves Eraste (2 syl.), and this young man plays off so many tricks, and devises so many mystifications upon M. de Pourceaugnac, that he is fain to give up his suit.—Molière: M. de Pourceaugnac (1669).

Pou Sto, the means of doing. Archimedês said, "Give me pou sto ('a place to stand on'), and I could move the world."

> Who learns the one pou sto whence after-hands
> May move the world.

Poussin, an eminent French landscape painter (1594–1665).

The British Poussin, Richard Cooper (*–1806).

Gaspar Poussin. So Gaspar Dughet, the French painter, is called (1613–1675).

Powell (Mary), the pseudonym of Mrs. Richard Rathbone.

Powheid (Lazarus), the old sexton in Douglas.—Sir W. Scott: Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Poyning's Law, a statute to establish the English jurisdiction in Ireland. The parliament that passed it was summoned in the reign of Henry VII. by sir Edward Poynings, governor of Ireland (1495).

Poyser (Mrs.), a capital character in the novel called Adam Bede, by George Eliot (Mrs. J. W. Cross, 1859). Her shrewd proverbial observations are inimitable.

P. P., "Clerk of the Parish," the feigned signature of Dr. Arbuthnot, subscribed to a volume of Memoirs in ridicule of Burnet's History of My Own Times.

In Ireland P.P. often stands for Parish Priest.

> Those who were placed around the dinner-table had those feelings of awe with which P. P., Clerk of the Parish, was oppressed, when he first uplifted the psalm in presence of . . . the wise Mr. justice Freeman, the good lady Jones, and the great sir Thomas Truby.—Sir W. Scott.

Pragmatic Sanction. The word pragmaticus means "relating to state affairs," and the word sanctio means "an ordinance" or "decree." The four most famous statutes so called are—

(1) The Pragmatic Sanction of St. Louis (1268), which forbade the court of Rome to levy taxes or collect subscriptions in France without the express permission of the king. It also gave permission in certain cases of French subjects appealing from the ecclesiastical to the civil courts of the realm.

(2) The Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges, passed by Charles VII. of France in 1438. By this ordinance, the power of the pope in France was limited and defined. The authority of the National Council was declared superior to that of the pope. The French clergy were forbidden to appeal to Rome on any point affecting the secular condition of the nation; and the Roman pontiff was wholly forbidden to appropriate to himself any vacant living, or to appoint to any bishopric or parish church in France.

(3) The Pragmatic Sanction of kaiser Karl VI. of Germany (in 1713), which settled the empire on his daughter, the archduchess Maria Theresa, wife of François de Loraine. Maria Theresa ascended the throne in 1740, and a European war was the result.

(4) The Pragmatic Sanction of Charles III. of Spain (1767). This was to suppress the Jesuits of Spain.

N.B.—What is meant emphatically by The Pragmatic Sanction is the third of these ordinances, viz. settling the line of succession in Germany on the house of Austria.

Praise indeed. "Approbation from sir Hubert Stanley is praise indeed."—Morton: Cure for the Heartache, act i. 2 (1811).

Pramnian Mixture (The), any intoxicating draught. The "mixture" was made from the Pramnian grape. Circê gave Ulysses "Pramnian wine" impregnated with drugs, in order to prevent his escape from the island.

> And for my drink prepared
> The Pramnian mixture in a golden cup,
> Impregnating (on my destruction bent)
> With noxious herbs the draught.
> Homer: Odyssey, x. (Cowper's trans.).

Prasildo, a Babylonish nobleman, who falls in love with Tisbi'na wife of his friend Iroldo. He is overheard by Tisbina threatening to kill himself, and, in order to divert him from his guilty passion, she promises to return his love on condition of his performing certain adventures which she thinks to be impossible. However, Prasildo performs them all, and then Tisbina and Iroldo, finding no excuse, take poison to avoid the alternative. Prasildo resolves to do the same, but is told by the apothecary that the "poison" he had supplied was a harmless drink. Prasildo tells his friend, Iroldo quits the country, and Tisbina marries Prasildo. Time passes on, and Prasildo hears that his friend's life is in danger, whereupon he starts forth to rescue him at the hazard of his own life.—Bojardo: Innamorato Orlando (1495).

Prasu'tagus or Præsu'tagus, husband of Bonduica or Boadicēa queen of the Icēni.—Richard of Circencester: History, xxx. (fourteenth century).

> Me, the wife of rich Prasutagus; me, the lover of liberty,—
> Me they seized, and me they tortured!
> Tennyson: Boadicea.

Prate'fast (Peter), who "in all his life spake no word in waste." His wife was Maude, and his eldest son Sym Sadle Gander, who married Betres (daughter of Davy Dronken Nole of Kent and his wife Al'yson).—Hawes: The Passe-tyme of Plesure, xxix. (1515).

Prattle (Mr.), medical practitioner, a voluble gossip, who retails all the news and scandal of the neighbourhood. He knows everybody, everybody's affairs, and everybody's intentions.—Colman, senior: The Deuce is in Him (1762).

Praxitelus, in Greville's book of Maxims, is meant for lord Chatham.

Prayer. Every Mohammedan must pray five times a day—at sunset, at nightfall, at daybreak, at noon, and at Asr or evensong (about three o'clock).

Praying-Wheels. The "Praying-wheel" used by Buddhists is either a small hand cylinder, or a larger one suspended to the ceiling or sides of a chapel, and pushed round by each person as he enters. Some have been observed in Thibet so arranged as to be revolved by the wind. The prayer-formula (printed in fine characters) is wound round the axis of the wheel from left to right, and when the wheel is set in motion, the writing passes in front of the person or persons pushing the wheel. It was used originally (like the Jewish Urim and Thummim) to divine answers to prayers, but afterwards for prayer itself. The hand praying-wheels are little cylinders of copper, with Om Main Palim om engraved round—containing rolls of the usual prayers. They are held in the hands and turned like a child's rattle.

P. R. B., the signature of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood.

Pre-Adamite Kings, Soliman Raad, Soliman Daki, and Soliman di Gian ben Gian. The last-named, having chained up the dives (1 syl.) in the dark caverns of Kâf, became so presumptuous as to dispute the Supreme Power. All these kings maintained great state [before the existence of that contemptible being denominated by us "the father of mankind"]; but none can be compared with the eminence of Soliman ben Daoud.

Pre-Adamite Throne (The). It was Vathek's ambition to gain the pre-Adamite throne. After long search, he was shown it at last in the abyss of Eblis; but, being there, return was impossible, and he remained a prisoner without hope for ever.

> They reached at length the hall [Argunk] of great extent, and covered with a lofty dome. . . . A funereal gloom prevailed over it. Here, upon two beds of incorruptible cedar, lay recumbent the fleshless forms of the pre-Adamite kings, who had once been monarchs of the whole earth. . . . At their feet were inscribed the events of their several reigns, their power, their pride, and their crimes. [This was the pre-Adamite throne, the ambition of the caliph Vathek.]—Beckford: Vathek (1784).

Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood (The). In 1850 or thereabouts a circle of young men, inspired by Ford Madox Brown, and led by Dante Gabriel Rossetti (artists), determined to band themselves together, and made the following resolution, to use the words of Ruskin: "That as far as in them lies, they will draw either what they see, or what they suppose might have been the actual facts of the scene they desire to represent, irrespective of any conventional rules of picture-making." They chose their name "because all artists did this before Raphael's time, and after Raphael's time did not this, but sought to paint fair pictures rather than represent stern facts" (Arrows of the Chace, p. 89). Amongst the Pre-Raphaelites were Woolner, Holman Hunt, Millais, Collins, John Lewis, etc. In 1850 a short-lived periodical called the Germ appeared under the editorship of William Michael Rossetti, brother of the artist, in which the virtues and failings of the Pre-Raphaelite school were displayed. In 1854 Holman Hunt exhibited his picture "The Light of the World," and Ruskin wrote a letter to the Times (May 5, 1854) respecting this, "the principal Pre-Raphaelite picture in the Royal Academy this year." He describes how he stood by the picture for one hour, watching the passers-by: "few stopped to look, and those who did almost invariably with some contemptuous expression, founded on what appeared to them the absurdity of representing the Saviour with a lantern in His hand" (Arrows of the Chace, p. 98). The whole description of the picture is worth a careful study, and is interesting to look back upon to-day, when we remember that the engraving or photograph of Holman Hunt's "Light of the World" is to be found treasured in many homes.

Burne-Jones, although not one of the Pre-Raphaelites, has been decidedly influenced by their teaching.

Preacher (The), Solomon, the son of David, author of The Preacher (i.e. Ecclesiastes).

> Thus said the Preacher, "Nought beneath the sun
> Is new;" yet still from change to change we run.
> Byron.

The Glorious Preacher, St. Chrys'ostom (347–407). The name means "Golden Mouth."

The Little Preacher, Samuel de Marets, protestant controversialist (1599–1663).

The Unfair Preacher. Dr. Isaac Barrow was so called by Charles II., because his sermons were so exhaustive that they left nothing more to be said on the subject, which was "unfair" to those who came after him.

Preachers (The king of), Louis Bourdaloue (1632–1704).

Précieuses Ridicules (Les), a comedy by Molière, in ridicule of the "précieuses," as they were styled, forming the coterie of the Hôtel de Rambouillet in the seventeenth century. The soirées held in this hotel were a great improvement on the licentious assemblies of the period; but many imitators made the thing ridiculous, because they lacked the same presiding talent and good taste (1659). (For the rest, see CATHOS, p. 188.)

Preciosa, a gipsy girl, the heroine of Longfellow's Spanish Student (1843). She is threatened with the vengeance of the Inquisition.

Precocious Genius.

(1) JOHANN PHILIP BARATIER, a German, at the age of five years, knew Greek, Latin, and French, besides his native German. At nine he knew Hebrew and Chaldaic, and could translate German into Latin. At thirteen he could translate Hebrew into French, or French into Hebrew (1721–1740).

The life of this boy was written by Formey. His name is enrolled in all biographical dictionaries.

(2) CHRISTIAN HENRY HEINECKEN, at one year old, knew the chief events of the Pentateuch!! at thirteen months he knew the history of the Old Testament!! at fourteen months he knew the history of the New Testament!!! at two and a half years he could answer any ordinary question of history or geography; and at three years old knew French and Latin as well as his native German (1721–1725).

The life of this boy was written by Schœneich, his teacher. His name is duly noticed in biographical dictionaries.

(3) JEAN LOUIS ELIZABETH DE MONTCHALM knew his letters when a child in arms; when thirty months old he knew both small letters and capitals; at three years of age he could read fluently Latin and French, either in print or manuscript; at four he could translate Latin; at five he could translate the most difficult Latin authors; at six he could read Greek and Hebrew, was good at arithmetic, history, geography, and metallurgy. In four weeks he learnt to write correctly and fluently. At the age of seven he had read all the chief poets, orators, historians, philosophers, grammarians, etc.; but the poor fellow died before he was eight. —Dictionnaire d'Education (1819).

(4) ENNIUS VISCONT read Greek and Latin, as well as Italian (his own language), before he was four years old. He lived to the age of 67, and died in 1818.

Pressæus ["eater of garlic"], the youngest of the frog chieftains.

Then pious ardour young Pressæus brings,
Betwixt the fortunes of contending kings;
Lank, harmless frog! with forces hardly grown,
He darts the reed in combats not his own,
Which, faintly tinkling on Troxartas' shield,
Hangs at the point, and drops upon the field.
Parnell: Battle of the Frogs and Mice, iii. (about 1712).

Prest, a nickname given by Swift to the duchess of Shrewsbury, who was a foreigner.

Prester John, a corruption of Belul Gian, meaning "precious stone." Gian (pronounced zjon) has been corrupted into John, and Belul translated into "precious;" in Latin Johannes preciosus ("precious John"), corrupted into "Pres byter Joannes." The kings of Ethiopia or Abyssinia, from a gemmed ring given to queen Saba, whose son by Solomon was king of Ethiopia, and was called Melech with the "precious stone," or Melech Gian Belul.

Æthiopes regem suum, quem nos vulgo "Preste Gianni" corrupte dicimus, quatuor appellant nominibus, quorum primum est "Belul Gian," hoc est lapis pretiosus. Ductum est autem hoc nomen ab annulo Salomonis, quem ille filio ex regina Saba, ut putant gemito, dono dedisse, quove omnes postea reges usos fuisse describitur. . . . Cum vero eum coronant, appellant "Neghuz." Postremo cum vertice capitis in coronæ modum abraso, ungitur a patriarcha, vocant "Masih," hoc est unctum. Hæc autem regiæ dignitatis nomina omnibus communia sunt.—Quoted by Selden, from a little annal of the Ethiopian kings (1552), in his Titles of Honour, v. 65 (1614).

∴ As this title was like the Egyptian Pharaoh, and belonged to whole lines of kings, it will explain the enormous diversity of time allotted by different writers to "Prester John."

Marco Polo says that Prester John was slain in battle by Jenghiz Khan; and Gregory Bar-Hebræus says, "God forsook him because he had taken to himself a wife of the Zinish nation, called Quarakhata."

Bishop Jordānus, in his description of the world, sets down Abyssinia as the kingdom of Prester John. Abyssinia used to be called "Middle India."

Otto of Freisingen is the first author to mention him. This Otto wrote a chronicle to the date 1156. He says that John was of the family of the Magi, and ruled over the country of these Wise Men. Otto tells us that Prester John had "a sceptre of emeralds."

Maimonidēs, about the same time (twelfth century), mentions him, but calls him "Preste-Cuan."

Before 1241 a letter was addressed by "Prester John" to Manuel Comnēnus emperor of Constantinople. It is preserved in the Chronicle of Albericus Trium Fontium, who gives for its date 1165.

Mandeville calls Prester John a lineal descendant of Ogier the Dane. He tells us that Ogier, with fifteen others, penetrated into the north of India, and divided the land amongst his followers. John was made sovereign of Teneduc, and was called "Prester" because he converted the natives to the Christian faith.

Another tradition says that Prester John had seventy kings for his vassals, and was seen by his subjects only three times in a year.

In Orlando Furioso, Prester John is called by his subjects "Senāpus king of Ethiopia." He was blind, and, though the richest monarch of the world, he pined with famine, because harpies flew off with his food, by way of punishment for wanting to add paradise to his empire. The plague, says the poet, was to cease "when a stranger appeared on a flying griffin." This stranger was Astolpho, who drove the harpies to Cocy'tus. Prester John, in return for this service, sent 100,000 Nubians to the aid of Charlemagne. Astolpho supplied this contingent with horses by throwing stones into the air, and made transport-ships to convey them to France by casting leaves into the sea. After the death of Agramant, the Nubians were sent home, and then the horses became stones again, and the ships became leaves (bks. xvii.-xix.).

Preston (Christopher), established the bear-garden at Hockley-in-the-Hole, in the time of Charles II. He was killed in 1709, by one of his own bears.

> Where I'd as good oppose > Myself to Preston and his mastiffs loose.
> Oldham: The Third Satire of Juvenal (1653-1684).

Pretender (The Young), prince Charles Edward Stuart, son of James Francis Edward Stuart (called "The Old Pretender"). James Francis was the son of James II., and Charles Edward was that king's grandson.—Sir W. Scott: Waverley (time, George II.).

Charles Edward was defeated at Cullōden in 1746, and escaped to the Continent.

> God bless the king—I mean the "Faith's Defender;"
> God bless—no harm in blessing—the Pretender.
> Who that Pretender is, and who is king,
> God bless us all! that's quite another thing.
> Ascribed by sir W. Scott to John Byrom (in Redgauntlet).

(The mistress of Charles Edward Stuart was Miss Walkingshaw.)

Prettyman (Prince), in love with Cloris. He is sometimes a fisherman and sometimes a prince.—Duke of Buckingham: The Rehearsal (1671).

("Prince Prettyman" is said to be a parody on "Leonidas" in Dryden's Marriage à-la Mode.)

Pri'amus (Sir), a knight of the Round Table. He possessed a phial, full of four waters that came from paradise. These waters instantly healed any wounds which were touched by them.

> "My father," says sir Priamus, "is lineally descended of Alexander and of Hector by right line. Duke Josué and Machabæus were of our lineage. I am right inheritor of Alexandria, and Affrike, of all the out isles."
> And Priamus took from his page a phial, full of four waters that came out of paradise; and with certain balm 'nointed he their wounds, and washed them with that water, and within an hour after, they were both as whole as ever they were.—Sir T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur, i. 97 (1470).

Price (Matilda), a miller's daughter; a pretty, coquettish young woman, who marries John Browdie, a hearty Yorkshire corn-factor.—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Pride. "Fly pride, says the peacock," proverbial for pride. — Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, act iv. sc. 3 (1593).

Pride (Sir), first a drayman, then a colonel in the parliamentary army.—S. Butler: Hudibras (1663-78).

Pride and Prejudice, a novel of domestic life by Jane Austin (1812).

Pride of Humility. Antisthĕnēs, the Cynic, affected a very ragged coat; but Socrătēs said to him, "Antisthĕnēs, I can see your vanity peering through the holes of your coat."

Pride's Purge, a violent invasion of parliamentary rights by colonel Pride, in 1649. At the head of two regiments of soldiers he surrounded the House of Commons, seized forty-one of the members, and shut out 160 others. None were allowed into the House but those most friendly to Cromwell. This fag-end went by the name of "the Rump."

Pridwin or PRIWEN, prince Arthur's shield.

> Arthur placed a golden helmet upon his head, on which was engraven the figure of a dragon; and on his shoulders his shield called Priwen, upon which the picture of the blessed Mary, mother of God, was painted; then girding on his Caliburn, which was an excellent sword, made in the isle of Avallon; he took in his right hand his lance Ron, which was hard, broad, and fit for slaughter.—Geoffrey: British History, ix. 4 (1142).

Priest of Nature, sir Isaac Newton (1647-1727).

> Lo! Newton, priest of nature, shines afar,
> Scans the wide world, and numbers every star.
> Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, i. (1799).

Prig, a knavish beggar.—Fletcher: The Beggars' Bush (1622).

Prig (Betsey), an old monthly nurse, "the frequent pardner" of Mrs. Gamp; equally ignorant, equally vulgar, equally selfish, and brutal to her patients.

"Betsey," said Mrs. Gamp, filling her own glass, and passing the teapot [of gin], "I will now propoge a toast: 'My frequent pardner Betsey Prig.'" "Which, altering the name to Sairah Gamp, I drink," said Mrs. Prig, "with love and tenderness."—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit, xlix. (1843).

Prim'er (Peter), a pedantic country schoolmaster, who believes himself to be the wisest of pedagogues.—Foote: The Mayor of Garratt (1763).

Primitive Fathers (The). The five apostolic fathers contemporary with the apostles (viz. Clement of Rome, Barnabas, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp), and the nine following, who all lived in the first three centuries: Justin, Theoph'ilus of Antioch, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Cyprian of Carthage, Origen, Gregory "Thaumatur'gus," Dionysius of Alexandria, and Tertullian.

(For the "Fathers" of the fourth and fifth centuries, see GREEK CHURCH, p. 447; LATIN CHURCH, p. 594.)

Primrose (The Rev. Dr. Charles), a clergyman, rich in heavenly wisdom, but poor indeed in all worldly knowledge. Amiable, charitable, devout, but not without his literary vanity, especially on the Whistonian theory about second marriages. One admires his virtuous indignation against the "washes," which he deliberately demolished with the poker. In his prosperity, his chief "adventures were by the fireside, and all his migrations were from the blue bed to the brown."

Mrs. [Deborah] Primrose, the doctor's wife, full of motherly vanity, and desirous to appear genteel. She could read without much spelling, prided herself on her housewifery, especially on her gooseberry wine, and was really proud of her excellent husband.

(She was painted as "Venus," and the vicar, in gown and bands, was presenting to her his book on "second marriages," but when complete the picture was found to be too large for the house.)

George Primrose, son of the vicar. He went to Amsterdam to teach the Dutch English, but never once called to mind that he himself must know something of Dutch before this could be done. He becomes captain Primrose, and marries Miss Wilmot, an heiress.

(Goldsmith himself went to teach the French English under the same circumstances.)

Moses Primrose, younger son of the vicar, noted for his greenness and pedantry. Being sent to sell a good horse at a fair, he bartered it for a gross of green spectacles with copper rims and shagreen cases, of no more value than Hodge's razors (ch. xii.).

Olivia Primrose, the eldest daughter of the doctor. Pretty, enthusiastic, a sort of Hebe in beauty. "She wished for many lovers," and eloped with squire Thornhill. Her father found her at a roadside inn, called the Harrow, where she was on the point of being turned out of the house. Subsequently, she was found to be legally married to the squire.

Sophia Primrose, the second daughter of Dr. Primrose. She was "soft, modest, and alluring." Not like her sister, desirous of winning all, but fixing her whole heart upon one. Being thrown from her horse into a deep stream, she was rescued by Mr. Burchell (alias sir William Thornhill), and being abducted, was again rescued by him. She married him at last.—Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield (1766).

(Sir William was the uncle of squire Thornhill, ch. xxiii.)

Primum Mo'bile (The), a sphere supposed at one time to revolve in twenty-four hours from east to west, carrying with it the planets and fixed stars.

> Here is the goal whence motion on his race
> Starts; motionless the centre, and the rest
> All moved around. Except the soul divine,
> Place in this heaven hath none . . .
> Measured itself by none, it doth divide
> Motion to all.
> Dante: Paradise, xxvii. (1321).

Prince of Alchemy, Rudolph II. kaiser of Germany; also called "The German Trismegistus" (1552, 1576–1612).

Prince of Angels, Michael.

> So spake the prince of angels. To whom thus
> The Adversary [i.e. Satan].
> Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 261 (1665).

Prince of Celestial Armies, Michael the archangel.

> Go, Michael, of celestial armies prince.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 44 (1665).

Prince of Darkness, Satan (Eph. vi. 12). (See DARKNESS, p. 261.)

> Whom thus the prince of darkness answered glad:
> "Fair daughter,
> High proof ye now have given to be the race
> Of Satan (I glory in the name)."
> Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 383 (1665).

Prince of Hell, Satan.

> And with them comes a third of regal port,
> But faded splendour wan; who by his gait
> And fierce demeanour seems the prince of Hell.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 868 (1665).

Prince of Life, a title given to Christ (Acts iii. 15).

Prince of Peace, a title given to the Messiah (Isa. ix. 6).

Prince of Peace, don Manuel Godoy of Badajoz. So called because he concluded the "peace of Basle" in 1795 between France and Spain (1767–1851).

Prince of the Air, Satan.

. . . Jesus Son of Mary, second Eve,
Saw Satan fall, like lightning, down from heaven,
Prince of the air.
Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 185 (1665).

Prince of the Devils, Satan (Matt. xii. 24).

Prince of the Kings of the Earth, a title given to Christ (Rev. i. 5).

Prince of the Power of the Air, Satan (Eph. ii. 2).

Prince of the Vegetable Kingdom. The palm tree is so called by Linnæus.

Prince of this World, Satan (John xiv. 30).

Prince's Peers, a term of contempt applied to peers of low birth. The phrase arose in the reign of Charles VII. of France, when his son Louis (afterwards Louis XI.) created a host of riff-raff peers, such as tradesmen, farmers, and mechanics, in order to degrade the aristocracy, and thus weaken its influence in the state.

Princes. It was prince Bismarck the German chancellor who said to a courtly attendant, "Let princes be princes, and mind your own business."

Princess (The), a poem by Tennyson (1847), especially noted for the songs introduced. One of the songs begins—

Home they brought her warrior dead.

Printed Books. The first book produced in England was printed in England in 1477, by William Caxton, in the Almonry at Westminster, and was entitled The Dictes and Sayings of the Philosophers.

∴ The Rev. T. Wilson says, "The press at Oxford existed ten years before there was any press in Europe, except those of Haarlem and Mentz." The person who set up the Oxford press was Corsellis, and his first printed book bore the date of 1468. The colophon of it runs thus: "Explicit exposicio Sancti Jeronimi in simbolo apostolorum ad papam laurēcium. Impressa Oxonii Et finita Anno Domini Mcccclxviij., xvij. die Decembris." The book is a small quarto of forty-two leaves, and was first noticed in 1664 by Richard Atkins, in his Origin and Growth of Printing. Dr. Conyers Middleton, in 1735, charged Atkins with forgery. In 1812 S. W. Singer defended the book. Dr. Cotton took the subject up in his Typographical Gazetteer (first and second series).

Prior (Matthew). The monument to this poet in Westminster Abbey was by Rysbrack; executed by order of Louis XIV.

Prioress's Tale (The), the seventeenth of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, similar to that of "Hugh of Lincoln" (q.v.). A little boy was constantly singing the Alma redemptoris, and the Jews, having captured him on his way to school, killed him and cast his dead body into a well. His mother, anxious at his absence, went in search of him, and coming to the well heard her son's voice singing the Alma redemptoris. She told the provost, who had the Jews executed. The child was drawn up, still repeating the same words, and being asked why he did so, replied, "he could never die till his tongue was cut out." The abbot cut out the tongue, the child instantly gave up the ghost, and the body was buried in a marble tomb.

Yet spake this child, when spreint was the holy water,
And sang O Alma redemptoris mater.

(Wordsworth has modernized this tale.)

Priory (Lord), an old-fashioned husband, who actually thinks that a wife should "love, honour, and obey" her husband; nay, more, that "forsaking all others, she should cleave to him so long as they both should live."

Lady Priory, an old-fashioned wife, but young and beautiful. She was, however, so very old-fashioned that she went to bed at ten and rose at six; dressed in a cap and gown of her own making; respected and loved her husband; discouraged flirtation; and when assailed by any improper advances, instead of showing temper or conceited airs, quietly and tranquilly seated herself to some modest household duty till the assailant felt the irresistible power of modesty and virtue. —Mrs. Inchbald: Wives as They Were and Maids as They Are (1797).

Priscian, a great grammarian of the fifth century. The Latin phrase, Diminuere Prisciani caput ("to break Priscian's head"), means to "violate the rules of grammar." (See PEGASUS, p. 819.)

Some; free from rhyme or reason, rule or check,
Break Priscian's head, and Pegasus's neck.
Pope: The Dunciad, iii. 161 (1728).

Quakers (that, like to lanterns, bear
Their light within them) will not swear; . . .
And hold no sin so deeply red
As that of breaking Priscian's head.
S. Butler: Hudibras, II. ii. 219, etc. (1664).

Priscilla, daughter of a noble lord. She fell in love with sir Aladine, a poor knight.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, vi. x (1596).

Priscilla, the beautiful puritan in love with John Alden. When Miles Standish, a bluff soldier in the middle of life, wished to marry her, he asked John Alden to go and plead his cause; but the puritan maiden replied archly, "Why don't you speak for yourself, John?" Soon after this, Standish being killed, as it was supposed by a poisoned arrow, John did speak for himself, and Priscilla listened to his seduction.—Longfellow: The Courtship of Miles Standish (1858).

Prison Life Endeared. The following are examples of prisoners who, from long habit, have grown attached to prison life:—

(1) COMTE DE LORGE was confined for thirty years in the Bastile, and when liberated (July 14, 1789) declared that freedom had no joys for him. After imploring in vain to be allowed to return to his dungeon, he lingered for six weeks and pined to death.

(2) Goldsmith says, when Chinvang the Chaste ascended the throne of China, he commanded the prisons to be thrown open. Among the prisoners was a venerable man of 85 years of age, who implored that he might be suffered to return to his cell. For sixty-three years he had lived in its gloom and solitude, which he preferred to the glare of the sun and the bustle of a city.—A Citizen of the World, lxxiii. (1759).

(3) Mr. Cogan once visited a prisoner of state in the King's Bench prison, who told him he had grown to like the subdued light and extreme solitude of his cell; he even liked the spots and patches on the wall, the hardness of his bed, the regularity, and the freedom from all the cares and worries of active life. He did not wish to be released, and felt sure he should never be so happy in any other place.

(4) A woman of Leyden, on the expiration of a long imprisonment, applied for permission to return to her cell, and added, if the request were refused as a favour, she would commit some offence which would give her a title to her old quarters.

(5) A prisoner condemned to death had his sentence commuted for seven years' close confinement on a bed of nails. After the expiration of five years, he declared, if ever he were released, he should adopt from choice what habit had rendered so agreeable to him.

Prison Literature.

(1) BACON (Roger), imprisoned in 1268, in France, by order of pope Nicholas IV., wrote during his confinement his treatise on The Means of Avoiding the Infirmities of Old Age.

(2) BUNYAN wrote his Grace Abounding (1666), and Pt. I. of his Pilgrim's Progress in Bedford Gaol (1660-1672).

(3) COBBETT carried on his Political Register in prison (1810-12).

(4) COMBE (William) wrote his Journal of Dr. Syntax during his twenty years' imprisonment in the King's Bench (1743-1828).

(5) COOPER (Thomas) wrote in Stafford Gaol his Purgatory of Suicides and Wise Saws and Modern Instances.

(6) DEFOE wrote in prison his Review (1704 and 1713).

(7) DODD (Dr.) wrote in prison his Prison Thoughts (1815).

(8) GRAY (Sir Thomas) wrote his fascinating Scalacronica when prisoner of war in Edinburgh Castle in 1355.

(9) LANGLEY (Gilbert) wrote in Maidstone Gaol his Life and Adventures (1740).

(10) LOVELACE (Richard) wrote some beautiful poems to "Divine Althea" (Lucy Sacheverel) while in prison for presenting to the Long Parliament a petition on behalf of Charles II.

(11) MONTGOMERY (James), in 1794-5, wrote his Prison Amusements while confined in York Castle for publishing a ballad on the "Demolition of the Bastile."

(12) NUGENIUS (Caius Libius) wrote an historical novel called The Oppressed Captive, in the Fleet (1787).

(13) O'BRIEN (William) wrote the main part of his novel, When we were Boys, while imprisoned for inciting to Irish rebellion. Published in 1890.

(14) PAIN (Thomas) wrote the first part of his Age of Reason while imprisoned in Paris by command of Robespierre, in 1794-5.

(15) PENN (William) wrote his No Cross no Crown while imprisoned in the Tower at the instigation of the bishop of London (1644-1718), for publishing his book The Sandy Foundation Shaken.

(16) RALEIGH (Sir Walter) wrote his History of the World (down to B.C. 170), and many other works, while imprisoned in the Tower by James I. on a most ridiculous charge (1592-1613).

(17) SMOLLETT, while in prison (1759), wrote The Adventures of Launcelot Greaves.

(18) TAYLOR (Robert) composed his Devil's Pulpit in Oakham Gaol.

(19) THOMAS (F.), while confined in a dungeon in Morocco, composed his Sufferings of Christ (fifteenth century).

(20) VOLTAIRE wrote two cantos of his Henriade in the Bastille, and revised his tragedy of Œdipe.

(21) WITHER (George) wrote his eclogues in prison. (See SHEPHEARDS HUNTING.)

(22) WOLLETT composed his Black Dwarf in prison.

(Many more names might be added, but space forbids.)

Prisoner of Chillon, François de Bonnivard, a Frenchman who resided at Geneva, and made himself obnoxious to Charles III. duc de Savoie, who incarcerated him for six years in a dungeon of the Château de Chillon, at the east end of the lake of Geneva. The prisoner was ultimately released by the Bernese, who were at war with Savoy.

 Byron has founded on this incident his poem entitled The Prisoner of Chillon, but has added two brothers, whom he supposes to be imprisoned with François, and who died of hunger, suffering, and confinement. In fact, the poet mixes up Dante's tale about count Ugolino with that of François de Bonnivard, and has produced a powerful and affecting story, but it is not historic.

Prisoner of State (The), Ernest de Fridberg. E. Stirling has a drama so called. (For the plot, see ERNEST DE FRIDBERG, p. 330.)

Pritchard (William), commander of H.M. sloop the Shark.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time George II.).

Priuli, a senator of Venice, of unbending pride. His daughter had been saved from the Adriatic by Jaffier, and gratitude led to love. As it was quite hopeless to expect Priuli to consent to the match, Belvidera eloped in the night, and married Jaffier. Priuli now discarded them both. Jaffier joined Pierre's conspiracy to murder the Venetian senators, but, in order to save his father-in-law, revealed to him the plot under the promise of a general free pardon. The promise was broken, and all the conspirators except Jaffier were condemned to death by torture. Jaffier stabbed Pierre, to save him from the wheel, and then killed himself. Belvidera went mad and died. Priuli lived on, a broken-down old man, sick of life, and begging to be left alone in some "place that's fit for mourning;" there all leave me—

> Sparing no tears when you this tale relate,
> But bid all cruel fathers dread my fate.
> Otway: Venice Preserved, v. the end (1682).

Privolvans, the antagonists of the Subvolvans.

> These silly, ranting Privolvans
> Have every summer their campaigns,
> And muster like the warlike sons
> Of Rawhead and of Bloody-bones.
> S. Butler: The Elephant in the Moon, v. 85 (1754).

Proa, a Malay skiff of great swiftness, much used by pirates in the Eastern Archipelago, and called the flying proa.

> The proa darted like a shooting star.
> Byron: The Island, iv. 3 (1819).

Probe (1 syl.), a priggish surgeon, who magnifies mole-hill ailments into mountain maladies, in order to enhance his skill and increase his charges. Thus, when lord Foppington received a small flesh-wound in the arm from a foil, Probe drew a long face, frightened his lordship greatly, and pretended the consequences might be serious; but when lord Foppington promised him £500 for a cure, he set his patient on his legs the next day.—Sheridan: A Trip to Scarborough (1777).

Probus and Pomposus, names which frequently occur in the earlier poems of lord Byron, are meant respectively for Dr. Drury and Dr. Butler, successive headmasters of Harrow School. Byron was a great admirer of the former, but had at first a great dislike to the latter, who was appointed while Byron was a pupil. The poet, however, became reconciled to Dr. Butler before his departure for Greece, in 1809.

Procession of the Black Breeches. This is the heading of a chapter in vol. ii. of Carlyle's French Revolution. The chapter contains a description of the mob procession, headed by Santerre carrying a pair of black breeches on a pole. The mob forced its way into the Tuileries on June 30, 1792, and presented the king with a bonnet rouge and a tricolor cockade.

Pro'cida (John of), a tragedy by S. Knowles (1840). John of Procida was an Italian gentleman of the thirteenth century, a skilful physician, high in favour with king Fernando II., Conrad, Manfred, and Conrad'ine. The French invaded the island, put the last two monarchs to the sword, usurped the sovereignty, and made Charles d'Anjou king. The cruelty, licentiousness, and extortion of the French being quite unbearable, provoked a general rising of the Sicilians, and in one night (the Sicilian Vespers, March 30, 1282) every Frenchman, Frenchwoman, and French child in the whole island were ruthlessly butchered. Procida lost his only son Fernando, who had just married Isoline (3 syl.) the daughter of the French governor of Messina. Isoline died broken-hearted, and her father, the governor, was amongst the slain. The crown was given to John of Procida.

Procris, the wife of Cephălos. Out of jealousy, she crept into a wood to act as a spy upon her husband, Cephalos, hearing something move, discharged an arrow in the direction of the rustling, thinking it to be caused by some wild beast, and shot Procris. Jupiter, in pity, turned her into a star.—Greek and Latin Mythology.

The unerring dart of Procris. Diana gave Procris a dart which never missed its aim, and after being discharged returned back to the shooter.

Procrus'tes (3 syl.), a highwayman of Attica, who used to place travellers on a bed; if they were too short he stretched them out till they fitted it, if too long he lopped off the redundant part.—Greek Mythology.

Critic, more cruel than Procrustes old,
Who to his iron bed by torture fits
Their nobler parts, the souls of suffering wits.
Mallet: Verbal Criticism (1734).

Proctor's Dogs or Bull-dogs, the two "runners" or officials who accompany a university proctor in his rounds, to give chase to recalcitrant gownsmen.

And he had breathed the proctor's dogs [was a member of Oxford or Cambridge University].
Tennyson: prologue of The Princess (1830).

Prodigal (The), Albert VI. duke of Austria (1418, 1439–1463).

Prodigy of France (The). Guillaume Budé was so called by Erasmus (1467–1540).

Prodigy of Learning (The). Samuel Hahnemann, the German, was so called by J. P. Richter (1755–1843).

Professor (The), a novel by Charlotte Brontë, who adopted the pseudonym of Currer Bell. The novel was published in 1856.

Profitless Toil. (See ROPE OF OCNUS.)

Profound (The), Richard Middleton, an English scholastic divine (*–1304).

Profound Doctor (The), Thomas Bradwardine, a schoolman. Also called "The Solid Doctor" (*–1349).

Ægidius de Columna, a Sicilian schoolman, was called "The Most Profound Doctor" (*–1316).

Progne (2 syl.), daughter of Pandion, and sister of Philomela. Progné was changed into a swallow, and Philomela into a nightingale.—Greek Mythology.

As Progné or as Philomela mourns . . .
So Bradamant laments her absent knight.
Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, xxiii. (1516).

Progress of Poesy (The), a pindaric ode by Gray (1757). It stops at Dryden.

Prome'thean Unguent (The), made from the extract of a herb on which some of the blood of Promētheus (3 syl.) had fallen. Medea gave Jason some of this unguent, which rendered his body proof against fire and warlike instruments.

Prome'theus (3 syl.) taught man the use of fire, and instructed him in architecture, astronomy, mathematics, writing, rearing cattle, navigation, medicine, the art of prophecy, working metal, and, indeed, every art known to man. The word means "forethought," and forethought is the father of invention. The tale is that he made man of clay, and, in order to endow his clay with life, stole fire from heaven and brought it to earth in a hollow tube. Zeus, in punishment, chained him to a rock, and sent an eagle to consume his liver daily; during the night it grew again, and thus his torment was ceaseless, till Herculēs shot the eagle, and unchained the captive.

Learn the while, in brief,
That all arts came to mortals from Prometheus.
Mrs. Browning: Prometheus Bound (1850).

Truth shall restore the light by Nature given,
And, like Prometheus, bring the fire from heaven.
Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, i. (1799).

(Percy B. Shelley has a classical drama entitled Prometheus Unbound, 1819.)

Promise (Colonel). (See PLACE, Lord, p. 851.)—Fielding: Pasquin (1736).

Promised Land (The), Canaan or Palestine. So called because God promised to give it to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.—Gen. xii. 7; xxvi. 3; xxviii. 13.

Prompt, the servant of Mr. and Miss Blandish.—Burgoyne: The Heiress (1871).

Pronouns. It was of Henry Mossop, tragedian (1729–1773), that Churchill wrote the two lines—

In monosyllables his thunders roll—
He, she, it, and we, ye, they, fright the soul;

because Mossop was fond of emphasizing his pronouns and little words.

Prophesy. (See EQUIVOKES, p. 327.)

Prophet (The), Mahomet (560–632).

The Mohammedans entertained an inconceivable veneration for their prophet. . . . Whenever he made his ablutions, they ran and caught the water he had used; and when he spat, licked up the spittle with superstitious eagerness.—Abulfeda: Vita Moham., 19 (thirteenth century).

Prophet Elm, an elm growing in Credenhill Court, belonging to the Eckley family. It is so called because one of the branches is said to snap off and thus announce an approaching death in the family.

Prophetess (The), Ayē'shah, the second and beloved wife of Mahomet. It does not mean that she prophesied, but, like Sultana, it is simply a title of honour. He was the Prophet, and she the Prophēta or Madam Prophet.

Prose (Father of English), Wycliffe (1324–1384).

The Father of Greek Prose, Herodotos (B.C. 484–408).

The Father of Italian Prose, Boccaccio (1313–1375).

Pros'erpine (3 syl.), called Proser'pina in Latin, and "Proser'pin" by Milton, was daughter of Ce'rês. She went to the fields of Enna to amuse herself by gathering asphodels, and, being tired, fell asleep. Dis, the god of hell, then carried her off, and made her queen of the infernal regions. Cerês wandered for nine days over the world disconsolate, looking for her daughter, when Hec'ate (2 syl.) told her she had heard the girl's cries, but knew not who had carried her off. Both now went to Olympus, when the sun-god told them the true state of the case.

N.B.—This is an allegory of seed-corn.

> Not that fair field
> Of Enna, where Proser'pin, gathering flowers,
> Herself a fairer flower, by gloomy Dis
> Was gathered—which cost Cerês all that pain
> To seek her thro' the world.
> Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 268 (1665).

Prosperity Ensured. (See RING-FAIRY.)

Prosperity Robinson, Frederick Robinson, afterwards viscount Goderich and earl of Ripon, chancellor of the exchequer in 1823. So called by Cobbett, from his boasting about the prosperity of the country just a little before the great commercial crisis of 1825.

Pros'pero, the banished duke of Milan, and father of Miranda. He was deposed by his brother Anthonio, who sent him to sea with Miranda in a "rotten carcass of a boat," which was borne to a desert island. Here Prospero practised magic. He liberated Ariel from the rift of a pine tree, where the witch Syc'orax had confined him for twelve years, and was served by that bright spirit with true gratitude. The only other inhabitant of the island was Calîban the witch's "welp." After a residence in the island of sixteen years, Prospero raised a tempest by magic, to cause the shipwreck of the usurping duke and of Ferdinand his brother's son. Ferdinand fell in love with his cousin Miranda, and eventually married her.—Shakespeare: The Tempest (1609).

> He [sir W. Scott] waves his wand more potent than that of Prospero, and the shadows of the olden time appear before us, and we absolutely believe in their reanimation.—Encyc. Brit. (article "Romance").

> Still they kept limping to and fro,
> Like Ariels round old Prospero,
> Saying, "Dear master, let us go."
> But still the old man answered, "No!"
> Thomas Moore: A Vision.

Pross (Miss), a red-haired, ungainly creature, who lived with Lucie Manette, and dearly loved her. Miss Pross, although very eccentric, was most faithful and unselfish.

> Her character (dissociated from stature) was shortness. . . . It was characteristic of this lady that whenever her original proposition was questioned, she exaggerated it.—Dickens: A Tale of Two Cities, ii. 6 (1859).

Protectionists, the name originally given to that section of the conservative party which opposed the repeal of the corn laws, and which separated from sir Robert Peel in 1846. Lord George Bentinck was the head of the party from 1846 till his death in 1848. The name has since undergone modification.

Proterius of Cappadōcia, father of Cyra. (See SINNER SAVED.)

Protesila'os, husband of Laodamia. Being slain at the siege of Troy, the dead body was sent home to his wife, who prayed that she might talk with him again, if only for three hours. Her prayer was granted, but when Protesilāos returned to death, Laodamia died also.—Greek Mythology.

(In Fénelon's Télémaque, "Protésilaos" is meant for Louvois, the French minister of state.)

Protestant Duke (The), James duke of Monmouth, a love-child of Charles II. So called because he renounced the Catholic faith, in which he had been brought up, and became a protestant (1619–1685).

Protestant Pope (The), Gian Vincenzo Ganganelli, pope Clement XIV. So called from his enlightened policy, and for his bull suppressing the Jesuits (1705, 1769–1774).

Proteus [Pro-tuce], a sea-god, who resided in the Carpathian Sea. He had the power of changing his form at will. Being a prophet also, Milton calls him "the Carpathian wizard."—Greek Mythology.

> By hoary Nereus' wrinkled look,
> And the Carpathian wizard's hook [or trident].
> Milton: Comus (1634).

¶ PERIKLYM'ENOS, son of Neleus (2 syl.), had the power of changing his form into a bird, beast, reptile, or insect. As a bee, he perched on the chariot of Heraklês (Herculês), and was killed.

¶ ARISTOGĪTON, from being dipped in the Achelōus (4 syl.), received the power of changing his form at will.—Fénelon: Télémaque, xx. (1700).

¶ The GENII, both good and bad, of Eastern mythology had the power of changing their form instantaneously. This is powerfully illustrated by the combat between the Queen of Beauty and the son of Eblis. The genius first appeared as an enormous lion, but the Queen of Beauty plucked out a hair, which became a scythe, with which she cut the lion in pieces. The head of the lion now became a scorpion, and the princess changed herself into a serpent; but the scorpion instantly made itself an eagle, and went in pursuit of the serpent. The serpent, however, being vigilant, assumed the form of a white cat; the eagle in an instant changed to a wolf, and the cat, being hard pressed, changed into a worm; the wolf changed to a cock, and ran to pick up the worm, which, however, became a fish before the cock could pick it up. Not to be outwitted, the cock transformed itself into a pike to devour the fish, but the fish changed into a fire, and the son of Eblis was burnt to ashes before he could make another change.—Arabian Nights ("The Second Calender").

Proteus or Protheus, one of the two gentlemen of Verona. He is in love with Julia. His servant is Launce, and his father Anthonio or Antonio. The other gentleman is called Valentine, and his lady-love is Silvia.—Shakespeare: The Two Gentlemen of Verona (1594)

(Shakespeare calls the word Pro'-tē-us. Malone, Dr. Johnson, etc., retain the h in both names, but the Globe edition omits it from them.)

Protevangelion ["first evangelist"], a Gospel falsely attributed to St. James the Less, first bishop of Jerusalem; it is noted for its minute details of the Virgin and Jesus Christ. Said to be the production of L. Carinus of the second century.

> First of all we shall rehearse . . .
> The nativity of our Lord,
> As written in the old record
> Of the Protevangelion.
> Longfellow: The Golden Legend (1851).

Protocol (Mr. Peter), the attorney in Edinburgh employed by Mrs. Margaret Bertram of Singleside.—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering (time, George II.).

Protosebastos (The) or SEBASTOCRATOR, the highest state officer in Greece.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Protospathaire (The), or general of Alexius Comnēnus emperor of Greece. His name is Nicanor.—Sir W. Scott: Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Proud (The). Tarquin II. of Rome was called Superbus (reigned B.C. 535–516, died 496).

Otho IV. kaiser of Germany was called "The Proud" (1175, 1209–1218).

Proud Duke (The), Charles Seymour duke of Somerset. His children were not allowed to sit in his presence; and he spoke to his servants by signs only (*–1748).

Proudfute (Oliver), the boasting bonnet-maker at Perth.

Magdalen or Maudie Proudfute, Oliver's widow.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Prout (Father), the pseudonym of Francis Mahoney, a humorous writer in Fraser's Magazine, etc. (1805–1866).

Proverbial Philosophy. Thoughts in a sort of verse, once very popular, by Martin Tupper, in three series (1838, 1842, 1867).

Proverbs (The Book of), one of the poetical books of the Old Testament, which may conveniently be subdivided into five parts—

1. The introduction (chs. i.–ix.).
2. The proverbs of Solomon (chs. x.–xxiv.). (See ch. x. 1).
3. Proverbs compiled in the reign of Hezekiah (chs. xxv.–xxix.). (See ch. xxv. 1).
4. The words of Agur (ch. xxx.).
5. The words to king Lemuel by his mother (ch. xxxi.).

Provis, the name assumed by Abel Magwitch, Pip's benefactor. He was a convict, who had made a fortune, and whose chief desire was to make Pip a gentleman. —Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

Provoked Husband (The), a comedy by Cibber and Vanbrugh. The "provoked husband" is lord Townly, justly annoyed at the conduct of his young wife, who wholly neglects her husband and her home duties for a life of gambling and dissipation. The husband, seeing no hope of amendment, resolves on a separate maintenance; but then the lady's eyes are opened—she promises amendment, and is forgiven.

(This comedy was Vanbrugh's Journey to London, left unfinished at his death. Cibber took it, completed it, and brought it out under the title of The Provoked Husband, 1728.)

Provoked Wife (The), lady Brute, the wife of sir John Brute, who, by his ill manners, brutality, and neglect, is "provoked" to intrigue with one Constant. The intrigue is not of a very serious nature, since it is always interrupted before it makes head. At the conclusion, sir John says—

> Surly I may be, stubborn I am not,
> For I have both forgiven and forgot.
> Sir J. Vanbrugh (1697).

Provost of Bruges (The), a tragedy based on "The Serf," in Leitch Ritchie's Romance of History. Published anonymously in 1836; the author is S. Knowles. (For the plot, see BERTULPHE, p. 115.)

Prowler (Hugh), any vagrant or highwayman.

> For fear of Hugh Prowler, get home with the rest.
> Tusser: Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, xxxiii. 25 (1557).

Prudence (Mistress), the lady attendant on Violet ward of lady Arundel. When Norman "the sea-captain" made love to Violet, Mistress Prudence remonstrated, "What will the countess say if I allow myself to see a stranger speaking to her ward?" Norman clapped a guinea on her left eye, and asked, "What see you now?" "Why, nothing with my left eye," she answered, "but the right has still a morbid sensibility." "Poor thing!" said Norman; "this golden ointment soon will cure it. What see you now, my Prudence?" "Not a soul," she said.—Lord Lytton: The Sea-Captain (1839).

Prudens, the wife of Melibēus in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales ("The Host's Tale," in prose, 1388).

Prudes for proctors; dowagers for deans.—Tennyson: prologue of The Princess (1830).

Prudhomme (Joseph), "pupil of Brard and Saint-Omer, calligraphist and sworn expert in the courts of law. Joseph Prudhomme is the synthesis of bourgeois imbecility; radiant, serene, and self-satisfied; letting fall from his fat lips "one weak, washy, everlasting flood" of peurile aphorisms and inane circumlocutions. He says, "The car of the state floats on a precipice." "This sword is the proudest day of my life."—Henri Monnier: Grandeur et Décadence de Joseph Prudhomme (1852).

> No creation of modern fiction ever embodied a phase of national character with such original power as that of "M. Joseph Prudhomme." . . . "Podsnap," his English parallel, is more self-contained, more ponderous and less polite. . . In 1857 Monnier turned his piece into a bulky volume, entitled Vie et Opinions de M. Joseph Prudhomme.

Prue (Miss), a schoolgirl still under the charge of a nurse, very precocious and very injudiciously brought up. Miss Prue is the daughter of Mr. Foresight a mad astrologer, and Mrs. Foresight a frail nonentity.—Congreve: Love for Love (1695).

> The love-scene between Jack Bannister (1760–1836), as "Tattle," and "Miss Prue," when this latter part was acted by Mrs. Jordan, was probably never surpassed in rich natural comedy.—F. Reynolds.

Prunes and Prisms, the words which give the lip the right plie of the highly aristocratic mouth, as Mrs. General tells Amy Dorrit.

> "'Papa gives a pretty form to the lips. 'Papa, 'potatoes, poultry,' 'prunes and prisms.' You will find it serviceable if you say to yourself on entering a room, 'Papa, potatoes, poultry, prunes, and prisms.'"—Dickens: Little Dorrit (1855).

¶ General Burgoyne, in The Heiress, makes lady Emily tell Miss Alscrip that the magic words are "nimini pimini;" and that if she will stand before her mirror and pronounce these words repeatedly, she cannot fail to give her lips that happy plie which is known as the "Paphian mimp."—The Heiress, iii. 2 (1781).

Pru'sio, king of Alvarecchia, slain by Zerbi'no.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Pry (Paul), one of those idle, meddling fellows, who, having no employment of their own, are perpetually interfering in the affairs of other people. —Poole: Paul Pry (1825).

Prydwen or PRIDWIN (q.v.), called in the Mabinogion the ship of king Arthur. It was also the name of his shield. Taliessin speaks of it as a ship, and Robert of Gloucester calls it a shield.

Hys seeld that het Prydwen.
Myd ys suerd he was ygurd, that so strong was and kene;
Calybourne yt was ycluped, nas nour no such ye wene.
In ys right hond ys lance he nom, that ycluped was Ron.
I. 174.

Pryane (Hester), in Hawthorne's novel entitled The Scarlet Letter (1850).

Psalmanazar (George). (See under FORGERS, etc., p. 385.)

Psalmist (The). King David is called "The Sweet Psalmist of Israel" (2 Sam. xxiii. 1).

Psalms. One hundred and fifty pieces of poetry composed by different persons and collected together in the Old Testament.

In the Septuagint the whole collection is styled Ψαλμοί (Psalms), songs sung to a musical accompaniment. In the New Testament the Psalter is called Βίβλος Ψαλμῶν, "the Book of Psalms" (Luke xx. 42; Acts i. 20).

The Psalms are divided into five books.

The first book consists, with two or three exceptions, of Psalms of David; the second, of a series of Psalms by the sons of Korah, and another series by David; the third, of two minor collections, one supposed to be by Asaph, and the other by the sons of Korah. In the fifth we have one group of "Pilgrim songs" (p. 846), and another group of "Hallelujah Psalms," each of them manifestly, in the first instance, distinct hymn-books or liturgies.—Perowne: The Psalms, vol. i. p. 74.

Perowne thinks that the Psalms now classed in the first book were nearly all written by David, and were probably collected by Solomon, who would naturally provide for the preservation of his father's poetry. The next collection was not completed till the time of Hezekiah. Probably we owe the preservation of many of the Psalms attributed to David, and grouped in the second book, to "the men of Hezekiah." In the time of Ezra and Nehemiah the Psalter was enriched by a large number of songs written during and after the Exile. The fourth and fifth books are due, in the main, to this period; but now and then we find an earlier psalm, probably some relic of the ancient psalmody of Israel, not hitherto classed in any collection, and, perhaps, preserved by oral repetition from father to son.

The most ancient songs, those of David and of David's time, are chiefly contained in Pss. i–xli. In xliii.—lxxxix. mainly those of the middle period of Hebrew poetry. In xc.—cl. by far the majority are of the later date, composed during or after the Babylonish captivity.—Perowne: Psalms, vol. i. p. 79.

The following psalms are supposed to refer to incidents in the life of David:—

Ps. lix. Saul watching to slay David (1 Sam. xix. 11).
cxlii. David hiding in the cave of Adullam (1 Sam. xx. 1, 2).
xxxiv. David's flight from Ahimelech (1 Sam. xxi. 1–10).
lvi. David at Gath feigning madness (1 Sam. xxi. 10–15).
lxii. David in the wilderness of Judah (1 Sam. xxii. 5).
liii. Doeg informing against David (1 Sam. xxii. 9, 10).
liv. The men of Ziph informing against David (1 Sam. xxiii. 19, 20).
lvii. David hiding in the cave from Saul (1 Sam. xxiv.).
cxlii. David's prayer at the time.
cv.,cvi. The psalms sung when the ark was brought back from the house of Obed-edom (1 Chron. xvi. 7–34).
lx. On the victory gained in the valley of Salt (2 Sam. viii. 13).
li. After Nathan's reproof (2 Sam. xii. 1–25).
iii. David after his flight from Jerusalem (2 Sam. xv. 14–37).
vii. David's trust in God in his deep affliction (2 Sam. xvi.).
lv. David's bitter grief at Absalom's conduct (2 Sam. xvi.).
xviii. David's psalm of thanksgiving when all his enemies had been subdued (2 Sam. xxii.).
xxx. After the plague was stayed.

N.B.—For two of these we have the Bible authority: 2 Sam. xxii. and 2 Chron. xvi. 7. Ps. xc. is ascribed to Moses. The Pss. cxx. to cxxxiv. are called "Songs of Degrees," and were sung by the Jews on their march home from Babylon; subsequently they were used by the priests as they went up to the temple for their daily service. Pss. cxlvi. to cl. were probably composed for the dedication of the restored temple. Ps. lx. refers to the victory of Joab over the Edomites (2 Sam. vii. 13). (See SABBATH-DAY PSALMS and HALLELUJAH PSALMS, PILGRIMS' SONGS.)

Psalter of Tarah or TARA, a volume in which the early kings of Ireland inserted all historic events and enactments. It began in the reign of Ollam Fodlah, of the family of Ir, B.C. 900, and was read to the assembled princes when they met in the convention which assembled in the great hall of that splendid palace. Also called Tara's Psaltery.

Their tribe, they said, their high degrees,
Was sung in Tara's Psaltery.
Campbell: O'Connor's Child.

Pschent (The). (See EGYPT, p. 326.)

Psycarpax (i.e. "granary-thief"), son of Troxartas king of the mice. The frog. king offered to carry the young Psycarpax over a lake; but a water-hydra made its appearance, and the frog king, to save himself, dived under water, whereby the mouse prince lost his life. This catastrophe brought about the fatal Battle of the Frogs and Mice. Translated from the Greek into English verse by Parnell (1679–1717).

Psyche [Si'-ke], a most beautiful maiden, with whom Cupid fell in love. The god told her she was never to seek to know who he was; but Psyché could not resist the curiosity of looking at him as he lay asleep. A drop of the hot oil from Psyché's lamp, falling on the love-god, woke him, and he instantly took to flight. Psyché now wandered from place to place, persecuted by Venus; but after enduring ineffable troubles, Cupid came at last to her rescue, married her, and bestowed on her immortality.

(This exquisite allegory is from the Golden Ass of Apulêios. Lafontaine has turned it into French verse. M. Laprade (born 1812) has rendered it into French most exquisitely. The English version, by Mrs. Tighe (1805), in six cantos, is simply unreadable.)

∴ The story of Cupid and Psyché is an allegory, meaning that romances of love, like castles in the air, are exquisite till we look at them as realities, when they instantly vanish, and leave only disappointment and vexation behind.

Ptah, the Creator, in Egyptian mythology. "Amen" is the Egyptian godhead.

Hath not Ptah, the Creator, fashioned the form to fit the imperial garb?—H. Rider Haggard: Cleopatra, ch. ii.

O Amen, god of gods, who hast been from the beginning . . . the self-begot, who shall be to all eternity, . . . listen unto me.—H. Rider Haggard: Cleopatra, ch. iii.

Pternog'lyphus ["bacon-scooper"], one of the mouse chieftains.—Parnell: Battle of the Frogs and Mice, iii. (about 1712).

Pternoph'agus ["bacon-eater"], one of the mouse chieftans.

But dire Pternophagus divides his way
Thro' breaking ranks, and leads the dreadful day.
No nibbling prince excelled in fierceness more,—
His parents fed him on the savage boar.
Parnell: Battle of the Frogs and Mice, iii. (about 1712).

Pternotractas ["bacon-gnawer"], father of "the meal-licker," Lycomilê (wife of Troxartas, "the bread-eater"). Psycarpas, the king of the mice, was son of Lycomilê, and grandson of Pternotractas.—Parnell: Battle of the Frogs and Mice, i. (about 1712).

Ptolemean System (The). King Alfonso, speaking of this system, said, if he had been consulted at the creation of the world, he would have spared the Maker of it many absurdities.

I settle all these things by intuition . . .
Like king Alfonso.
Byron: Vision of Judgment (1822).

Ptolemy's Great Book was called the Almagest (Arabic, al, "the," majisti, "greatest"), meaning the chief book of astronomy on the geometric system. It was written in the second century of our era, and was the standard work for fourteen centuries, when Ptolemy was superseded by Copernicus, who pointed out the difference between real motion and apparent motion; and that the earth is a mere planet.

Travelling in a railway carriage, the hedges and houses seem to be running the opposite way to ourselves, and the carriage seems to be motionless.

Public Good (The League of the), a league between the dukes of Burgundy, Brittany, and other French princes against Louis XI.

Public'ola, of the Despatch newspaper, was the assumed name of Mr. Williams, a vigorous political writer.

Publius, the surviving son of Horatius after the combat between the three Horatian brothers against the three Curiatii of Alba. He entertained the Roman notion that "a patriot's soul can feel no ties but duty, and know no voice of kindred" if it conflicts with his country's weal. His sister was engaged to Caius Curiatius, one of the three Alban champions; and when she reproved him for "murdering" her betrothed, he slew her, for he loved Rome more than he loved friend, sister, brother, or the sacred name of father.—Whitehead: The Roman Father (1741).

Pucel. La bel Pucel lived in the tower of "Musyke." Graunde Amoure, sent thither by Fame to be instructed by the seven ladies of science, fell in love with her, and ultimately married her. After his death, Remembraunce wrote his "epitaphy on his graue."—Hawes: The Passetyme of Plesure (1506, printed 1515).

Pucelle (La), a surname given to Joan of Arc the "Maid of Orleans" (1410–1431).

Puck, generally called Hobgoblin. Same as Robin Goodfellow. Shakespeare, in Midsummer Night's Dream, represents him as "a very Shetlander among the gossamer-winged, dainty-limbed fairies, strong enough to knock all their heads together; a rough, knurly-limbed, fawn-faced, shock-pated, mischievous little urchin."

He [Oberon] meeteth Puck, which most men call
Hobgoblin, and on him doth fall,
With words from frenzy spoken.
Hob! hob!" quoth Hob; "God save your grace . . ."
Drayton: Nymphidia (1593).

Pudding (Jack), a gormandizing clown. In French he is called Jean Potage; in Dutch, Pickel-Herringe; in Italian Macaroni; in German, John Sausage (Hanswurst).

Puddle-Dock Hill, St. Andrew's Hill, Blackfriars, leading down to Puddle Wharf, Ireland Yard.

PUFF, servant of captain Loveit, and husband of Tag of whom he stands in awe.—Garrick: Miss in Her Teens (1753).

Puff (Mr.), a man who had tried his hand on everything to get a living, and at last resorts to criticism. He says of himself, "I am a practitioner in panegyric, or to speak more plainly, a professor of the art of puffing."

"I open," says Puff, "with a clock striking, to beget an awful attention in the audience; it also marks the time, which is four o'clock in the morning, and saves a description of the rising sun, and a great deal about gilding the eastern hemisphere."—Sheridan: The Critic, i. 1 (1779).

"God forbid," says Mr. Puff, "that, in a free country, all the fine words in the language should be engrossed by the higher characters of the piece."—Sir W. Scott: The Drama.

Puff, publisher. He says—

"Panegyric and praise! and what will that do with the public? Why, who will give money to be told that Mr. Such-a-one is a wiser and better man than himself? No, no! 'tis quite and clean out of nature. A good sousing satire, now, well powdered with personal pepper, and seasoned with the spirit of party, that demolishes a conspicuous character, and sinks him below our own level,—there, there, we are pleased; there we chuckle and grin, and toss the half-crowns on the counter."—Foote: The Patron (1764).

Puff (Mr. Partenopex), a sayer of smart things, which he fathers on his valet Booby, his monkey, or his parrot.—Disraeli (lord Beaconsfield): Vivian Grey (1826–7).

Pug, a mischievous little goblin, called "Puck" by Shakespeare.—Ben Jonson: The Devil is an Ass (1616).

Puggie Orrock, a sheriff's officer at Fairport.—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (time, George III.).

Pugna Porco'rum (i.e. "battle of the pigs"), a poem extending to several hundred lines, in which every word begins with the letter p. (See P, p. 793.)

Pul'ci (L.), poet of Florence (1432–1487), author of the heroi-comic poem called Morgante Maggiore, a mixture of the bizarre, the serious, and the comic, in ridicule of the romances of chivalry. This Don Juan class of poetry has since been called Bernesque, from Francesco Berni of Tuscany, who greatly excelled in it.

Pulci was sire of the half-serious rhyme,
Who sang when chivalry was more quixotic,
And revelled in the fancies of the time,
True knights, chaste dames, huge giants, kings despotic.
Byron: Don Juan, iv. 6 (1820).

Pulia'no, leader of the Nasamo'ni. He was slain by Rinaldo.—Ariosto: Orlando Furioso (1516).

Pumblechook, uncle to Joe Gargery the blacksmith. He was a well-to-do corn-chandler, and drove his own chaise-cart. A hard-breathing, middle-aged, slow man was uncle Pumblechook, with fishy eyes and sandy hair inquisitively on end. He called Pip, in his facetious way, "six-pen'orth of ha'pence;" but when Pip came into his fortune, Mr. Pumblechook was the most servile of the servile, and ended almost every sentence with, "May I, Mr. Pip?" i.e. have the honour of shaking hands with you again.—Dickens: Great Expectations (1860).

Pumpernickel (His Transparency), a nickname by which the Times satirized the minor German princes.

Some ninety men and ten drummers constitute their whole embattled host on the parade-ground before their palace; and their whole revenue is supplied by a percentage on the tax levied on strangers at the Pumpernickel kursaal.—Times, July 18, 1860.

Pumpkin (Sir Gilbert), a country gentleman plagued with a ward (Miss Kitty Sprightly) and a set of servants all stage mad. He entertains captain Charles Stanley and captain Harry Stukely at Strawberry Hall; Stanley, under cover of acting, makes love to Kitty (an heiress), elopes with her, and marries her.

Miss Bridget Pumpkin, sister of sir Gilbert of Strawberry Hall. A Mrs. Malaprop. She says, "The Greeks, the Romans, and the Irish are barbarian nations who had plays;" but sir Gilbert says, "they were all Jacobites." She speaks of "taking a degree at our principal adversity;" asks "if the Muses are a family living at Oxford," if so, she tells captain Stukely, she will be delighted to "see them at Strawberry Hall, with any other of his friends." Miss Pumpkin hates "play-acting," but does not object to love-making.—Jackman: All the World's a Stage (1777).

Pun. He who would make a pun would pick a pocket, generally ascribed to Dr. Johnson (1709-1784); but by Moy Thomas to Dr. Donne (1573-1631).

W. H. Pym, in Wine and Walnuts, vol. ii. p. 277, says, "It is well known that John Dennis (1657-1734) execrated a pun. He said, 'He that would make a pun would not scruple to pick a pocket.' If Moy Thomas is right, Dr. Donne has the pre-eminence; but puns with lads and lasses, like riddles, sharpen their wits, and sometimes contain wit creditable to mature age."

Punch, derived from the Latin Mimi, through the Italian Pullicinella. It was originally intended as a characteristic representation. The tale is this: Punch, in a fit of jealousy, strangles his infant child, when Judy flies to her revenge. With a bludgeon she belabours her husband, till he becomes so exasperated that he snatches the bludgeon from her, knocks her brains out, and flings the dead body into the street. Here it attracts the notice of a police-officer, who enters the house, and Punch flies to save his life. He is, however, arrested by an officer of the Inquisition, and is shut up in prison, from which he escapes by a golden key. The rest of the allegory shows the triumph of Punch over slander in the shape of a dog, disease in the guise of a doctor, death, and the devil.

 Pantalone was a Venetian merchant; Dottore, a Bolognese physician; Spaviento, a Neapolitan braggadocio; Pullicinella, a wag of Apulia; Giangurgolo and Coviello, two clowns of Calabria; Gelsomino, a Roman beau; Beltrame, a Milanese simpleton; Brighella, a Ferrarese pimp; and Arlecchino, a blundering servant of Bergamo. Each was clad in an appropriate dress, had a characteristic mask, and spoke the dialect of the place he represented.

Besides these, there were Amorosos or Innamoratos, with their servettas or waiting-maids, as Smeraldina, Colombina, Spilletta, etc., who spoke Tuscan.—Walker: On the Revival of the Drama in Italy, 249.

Punch, the periodical, started in 1841. The first cover was designed by A. S. Henning; the present one by R. Doyle.

Pure (Simon), a Pennsylvanian quaker. Being about to visit London to attend the quarterly meeting of his sect, he brings with him a letter of introduction to Obadiah Prim, a rigid, stern quaker, and the guardian of Anne Lovely, an heiress worth £30,000. Colonel Feignwell, availing himself of this letter of introduction, passes himself off as Simon Pure, and gets established as the accepted suitor of the heiress. Presently the real Simon Pure makes his appearance, and is treated as an impostor and swindler. The colonel hastens on the marriage arrangements, and has no sooner completed them, than Master Simon reappears, with witnesses to prove his identity; but it is too late, and colonel Feignwell freely acknowledges the "bold stroke he has made for a wife."—Mrs. Centlivre: A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717).

Purefoy (Master), former tutor of Dr. Anthony Rochecliffe the plotting royalist.—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Purgatory, by Dante, in thirty-three cantos (1308). Having emerged from hell, Dante saw in the southern hemisphere four stars, "ne'er seen before, save by our first parents." The stars were symbolical of the four cardinal virtues (prudence, justice, fortitude, and temperance). Turning round, he observed old Cato, who said that a dame from heaven had sent him to prepare the Tuscan poet for passing through Purgatory. Accordingly, with a slender reed old Cato girded him, and from his face he washed "all sordid stain," restoring to it "that hue which the dun shades of hell had covered and concealed" (canto i.). Dante then followed his guide Virgil to a huge mountain in mid-ocean antipodal to Judæa, and began the ascent. A party of spirits were ferried over at the same time by an angel, amongst whom was Casella, a musician, one of Dante's friends. The mountain, he tells us, is divided into terraces, and terminates in Earthly Paradise, which is separated from it by two rivers—Lethê and Eu'noe (3 syl.). The first eight cantos are occupied by the ascent, and then they come to the gate of Purgatory. This gate is approached by three stairs (faith, penitence, and piety); the first stair is transparent white marble, as clear as crystal; the second is black and cracked; and the third is of blood-red porphyry (canto ix.). The porter marked on Dante's forehead seven P's (peccata, "sins"), and told him he would lose one at every stage, till he reached the river which divided Purgatory from Paradise. Virgil continued his guide till they came to Lethê, when he left him during sleep (canto xxx.). Dantê was then dragged through the river Lethê, drank of the waters of Eunöe, and met Beatrice, who conducted him till he arrived at the "sphere of unbodied light," when she resigned her office to St. Bernard.

Purgon, one of the doctors in Molière's comedy of Le Malade Imaginaire. When the patient's brother interfered, and sent the apothecary away with his clysters, Dr. Purgon got into a towering rage, and threatened to leave the house and never more to visit it. He then said to the patient, "Que vous tombiez dans la bradypepsie . . . de la bradypepsie dans la dyspepsie . . . de la dyspepsie dans l'apepsie . . . de l'apepsie dans la lienterie . . . de la lienterie dans la dyssenterie . . . de la dyssenterie dans l'hydropisie . . . et l'hydropisie dans la privation de la vie."

Votre M. Purgon, . . . c'est un homme tout médecin depuis la tête jusqu' aux pieds; un homme qui croit à ses règles plus qu' à toutes les démonstrations des mathématiques, et qui croirait du crime à les vouloir examiner; qui ne voit rien d'obscur dans la médecine, rien de douteux, rien de difficile; et qui, avec une impétuosité de prévention, une roideur de confiance, une brutalité de sens commun et de raison, donne au travers des purgations et des saignées, et ne balance aucune chose.—Molière: Le Malade Imaginaire, iii. 2 (1673).

Purita'ni (I), "the puritan," that is Elvi'ra, daughter of lord Walton also a puritan, affianced to Ar'turo (lord Arthur Talbot) a cavalier. On the day of espousals, Arturo aids Enrichetta (Henrietta, widow of Charles I.) to escape; and Elvira, supposing that he is eloping, loses her reason. On his return, Arturo explains the fact to Elvira, and they vow nothing on earth shall part them more. This vow is but just made, when Arturo is arrested for treason, and led off to execution. At this crisis, a herald announces the defeat of the Stuarts, and Cromwell pardons all political offenders; whereupon Arturo is released, and marries Elvira.—Bellini: I Puritani (an opera, 1834).

(The libretto of this opera is by C. Pepoli.)

Purley (Diversions of), a work on the analysis and etymology of English words, by John Horne, the son of a poulterer in London. In 1782 he assumed the name of Tooke, from Mr. Tooke of Purley, in Surrey, with whom he often stayed, and who left him £8000 (vol. i., 1785; vol. ii., 1805).

Purple Island (The), the human body. It is the name of a poem in twelve cantos, by Phineas Fletcher (1663). Canto i. Introduction. Cantos ii.–v. An anatomical description of the human body, considered as an island kingdom. Canto vi. The "intellectual man." Canto vii. The "natural man," with its affections and lusts. Canto viii. The world, the flesh, and the devil, as the enemies of man. Cantos ix., x. The friends of man who enable him to overcome these enemies. Cantos xi., xii. The battle of "Mansoul," the triumph, and the marriage of Eclecta. The whole is supposed to be sung to shepherds by Thirsil a shepherd.

Pusillus, Feeble-mindedness personified; "a weak, distrustful heart." Fully described in canto viii. of The Purple Island. (Latin, pusillus, "pusil-animous.")

Puss in Boots, from Charles Perrault's tale Le Chat Botté (1697). Perrault borrowed the tale from the Nights of Straparola an Italian. Straparola's Nights were translated into French in 1585, and Perrault's Contes de Fées were published in 1697. Ludwig Tieck, the German novelist, reproduced the same tale in his Volksmärchen (1795), called in German Der Gestiefelte Kater. The cat is marvellously accomplished, and by ready wit or ingenious tricks secures a fortune and royal wife for his master, a penniless young miller, who passes under the name of the marquis de Car'abas. In the Italian tale, puss is called "Constantine's cat."

Putrid Plain (The), the battle-field of Aix, in Provence, where Marius overthrew the Teutons, B.C. 102.

Pwyll's Bag (Prince), a bag that it was impossible to fill.

Come thou in by thyself, clad in ragged garments, and holding a bag in thy hand, and ask nothing but a bagful of food, and I will cause that if all the meat and liquor that are in these seven cantreves were put into it, it would be no fuller than before.—The Mabinogion ("Pwyll Prince of Dyved," twelfth century).

Pygma'lion, the statuary of Cyprus. He resolved never to marry, but became enamoured of his own ivory statue, which Venus endowed with life, and the statuary married.

(Morris has a poem on the subject in his Earthly Paradise ("August"), and Gilbert a comedy. In Gilbert's comedy, Pygmalion provokes the jealousy of his wife Cynisca by his love for the statue, and she calls down blindness on him. Afterwards they become reconciled, Pygmalion's sight is restored, and the Galatea becomes a statue again.)

Fall in loue with these,
As did Pygmalion with his carvèd tree.
Brooke: Treatie on Human Learning (1554-1608).

(Lord Brooke calls the statue "a carved tree." There is a vegetable ivory, no doubt one of the palm species, and there is the ebon tree, the wood of which is black as jet. The former could not be known to Pygmalion, but the latter might, as Virgil speaks of it in his Georgics, ii. 117, "India nigrum fert ebenum." Probably lord Brooke blundered from the resemblance between ebor ("ivory") and ebon, in Latin "ebenum.")

Pygmy, a dwarf. The pygmies were a nation of dwarfs, always at war with the cranes of Scythia. They were not above a foot high, and lived somewhere at the "end of the earth"—either in Thrace, Ethiopia, India, or the Upper Nile. The pygmy women were mothers at the age of three, and old women at eight. Their houses were built of egg-shells. They cut down a blade of wheat with an axe and hatchet, as we fell huge forest trees.

One day, they resolved to attack Hercules in his sleep, and went to work as in a siege. An army attacked each hand, and the archers attacked the feet. Hercules awoke, and with the paw of his lion-skin overwhelmed the whole host, and carried them captive to king Eurystheus.

¶ Swift has availed himself of this fable in Gulliver's Travels ("Lilliput," 1726).

Schweinfurth, it is said, met the Akkers (pygmies) in the Mombuttu country.

Dr. Ludwig Wolf and Wissman, who recently explored the Sankuru, also came upon a nation of pygmies, not exceeding 1·4 metre in height. These dwarfs are called "Batua," and their chief employment is the manufacture of palm oil. The main height of these little folk is 1·3 metre.

Stanley came upon pygmies in his African exploration. He saw the first specimen at an Arab settlement near the Amiri Falls—a woman thirty-three inches in height. The pygmies are said to be thickly scattered north of the Sturi, from the Ngaiya eastward. —Stanley: Darkest Africa, pp. 197, 198.

Pyke and Pluck (Messrs.), the tools and toadies of sir Mulberry Hawk. They laugh at all his jokes, snub all who attempt to rival their patron, and are ready to swear to anything sir Mulberry wishes to be confirmed. — Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Pylades and Orestes, inseparable friends. Pylades was a nephew of king Agamemnon, and Orestes was Agamemnon's son. The two cousins contracted a friendship which has become proverbial. Subsequently, Pylades married Orestes's sister Electra.

(Lagrange-Chancel has a French drama entitled Oreste et Pylade (1695). Voltaire also (Oreste, 1750). The two characters are introduced into a host of plays, Greek, Italian, French, and English. See ANDROMACHE, p. 43.)

Pyrac'mon, one of Vulcan's workmen in the smithy of mount Etna. (Greek, pûr akmôn, "fire anvil.")

Far passing Bronteus or Pyracmon great,
The which in Lipari do day and night
Frame thunderbolts for Jove.
Spenser: Faërie Queene, iv. 5 (1596).

Pyramid. According to Diodo'rus Sic'ulus (Hist., i.) and Pliny (Nat. Hist., xxxvi. 12), there were 360,000 men employed for nearly twenty years upon one of the pyramids.

The largest pyramid was built by Cheops or Suphis, the next largest by Cephrênês or Sen-Suphis, and the third by Menchêrês last king of the fourth Egyptian dynasty, said to have lived before the birth of Abraham.

(Respecting the third pyramid, there is a tradition that it was built by Rhodôpis or Rhodopê, the Greek courtezan. Rhodopis means the "rosy-cheeked.")

The Rhodopé that built the pyramid.
Tennyson: The Princess, ii. (1850).

Pyramid of Mexico. This pyramid is said to have been built in the reign of Montezuma emperor of Mexico (1466–1520). Its base is double the size of Cheops's pyramid, that is, 1423 feet each side, but its height does not exceed 164 feet. It stands west of Puebla, faces the four cardinal points, was used as a mausoleum, and is usually called "The Pyramid of Cholula."

Pyr'amos (in Latin, Pyrămus), the lover of Thisbê. Supposing Thisbê had been torn to pieces by a lion, Pyramos stabs himself "under a mulberry tree" in his unutterable grief. Thisbê finds the dead body, and kills herself on the same spot. Ever since then the juice of mulberries has been blood-stained.—Greek Mythology.

(Shakespeare has introduced a burlesque on this pretty love story in his Midsummer Night's Dream; but Ovid has told the tale beautifully.)

Pyre'ni, the Pyrenees.

Who [Henry V.] by his conquering sword should all the land surprise,
Which 'twixt the Penmenmaur and the Pyrene lies.
Drayton: Polyolbion, iv. (1612).

(Penmenmaur, a hill in Caernarvonshire.)

Pyrgo Polini'ces, an extravagant blusterer. (The word means "tower and town taker.")—Plautus: Miles Gloriosus.

If the modern reader knows nothing of Pyrgo Polinîcês and Thraso, Pistol and Parollês; if he is shut out from Nephelo-Coccygia, he may take refuge in Lilliput.—Macaulay.

 "Thraso," a bully in Terence (The Eunuch); "Pistol," in the Merry Wives of Windsor and 2 Henry IV.; "Parollês," in All's Well that Ends Well; "Nephelo-Coccygia" or cloud cuckoo-town, in Aristophanês (The Birds); and "Lilliput," in Swift (Gulliver's Travels).

Py'rocles (3 syl.) and his brother Cy'moclês (3 syl.), sons of Acra'tês (incontinence). The two brothers are about to strip sir Guyon, when prince Arthur comes up and slays both of them.—Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii. 8 (1590).

Pyrocles and Musidorus, heroes whose exploits are told by sir Philip Sidney in his Arcadia (1581).

Pyr'rho, the founder of the sceptics or Pyrrhonian school of philosophy. He was a native of Elis, in Peloponne'sus, and died at the age of 90 (B.C. 285).

It is a pleasant voyage, perhaps, to float,
Like Pyrrho, on a sea of speculation.
Byron: Don Juan, ix. 18 (1824).

("Pyrrhonism" means absolute and unlimited infidelity.)

Pythag'oras, the Greek philosopher, who is said to have invented the lyre from hearing the sounds produced by a blacksmith hammering iron on his anvil. (See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, p. 1022.)

As great Pythagoras of yore,
Standing beside the blacksmith's door,
And hearing the hammers, as he smote
The anvils with a different note . . .
. . . formed the seven-chorded lyre.
Longfellow: To a Child.

(Handel wrote an "air with variations" which he called The Harmonious Blacksmith, said to have been suggested by the sounds proceeding from a smithy, where he heard the village blacksmiths swinging their heavy sledges "with measured beat and slow.")

Pyth'ias, a Syracusian soldier, noted for his friendship for Damon. When Damon was condemned to death by Dionysius the new-made king of Syracuse, Pythias obtained for him a respite of six hours, to go and bid farewell to his wife and child. The condition of this respite was that Pythias should be bound, and even executed, if Damon did not return at the hour appointed. Damon returned in due time, and Dionysius was so struck with this proof of friendship, that he not only pardoned Damon, but even begged to be ranked among his friends. The day of execution was the day that Pythias was to have been married to Calanthê.—Damon and Pythias, a drama by R. Edwards (1571), and another by John Banim in 1825.

Python, a huge serpent engendered from the mud of the deluge, and slain by Apollo. In other words, pytho is the miasma or mist from the evaporation of the overflow, dried up by the sun. (Greek, puthesthai, "to rot;" because the serpent was left to rot in the sun.)

Q.

Q (Old), the earl of March, afterwards duke of Queensberry, at the close of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth centuries.

Quacks (Noted).

(1) BOOKER (John), astrologer, etc. (1601–1667).

(2) BOSSY (Dr.), a German by birth. He was well known in the beginning of the nineteenth century in Covent Garden, and in other parts of London.

(3) BRODUM (eighteenth century). His "nervous cordial" consisted of gentian root infused in gin. Subsequently a little bark was added.

(4) CAGLIOSTRO, the prince of quacks. His proper name was Joseph Balsamo, and his father was Pietro Balsamo of Palermo. He married Lorenza, the daughter of a girdle-maker of Rome, called himself "the count Alessandro di Cagliostro," and his wife "the countess Seraphina di Cagliostro." He professed to heal every disease, to abolish wrinkles, to predict future events, and was a great mesmerist. He styled himself "Grand Cophta, Prophet, and Thaumaturge." His "Egyptian pills" sold largely at 30*s.* a box (1743–1795). One of the famous novels of A. Dumas is Joseph Balsamo (1845).

He had a flat, snub face; dew-lapped, flat-nosed, greasy, and sensual. A forehead impudent, and two eyes which turned up most seraphically languishing. It was a model face for a quack.—Carlyle: Life of Cagliostro.

(5) CASE (Dr. John), of Lime Regis, Dorsetshire. His name was Latinized into Caseus, and hence he was sometimes called Dr. Cheese. He was born in the reign of Charles II., and died in that of Anne. Dr. Case was the author of the Angelic Guide, a kind of Zadkiel's Almanac, and over his door was placed this couplet—

Within this place
Lives Dr. Case.

Legions of quacks shall join us in this place,
From great Kirleus down to Dr. Case.
Garth: Dispensary, iii. (1699).

(6) FRANKS (Dr. Timothy), who lived in Old Bailey, was the rival of Dr. Rock. Franks was a very tall man, while his rival was short and stout (1692–1763).

Dr. Franks, F.O.G.H., calls his rival "Dumplin' Dick." . . . Sure the world is wide enough for two great personages. Men of science should leave controversy to the little world, . . . and then we might see Rock and Franks walking together hand-in-hand, smiling onward to immortality.—Goldsmith: A Citizen of the World, lxviii. (1759).

(7) GRAHAM (Dr.), of the Temple of Health, first in the Adelphi, then in Pall Mall. He sold his "elixir of life" for £1000 a bottle, was noted for his mud baths, and for his "celestial bed," which assured a beautiful progeny. He died poor in 1784.

(8) GRANT (Dr.), first a tinker, then a baptist preacher in Southwark, then oculist to queen Anne.

Her majesty sure was in a surprise,
Or else was very short-sighted,
When a tinker was sworn to look after her eyes,
And the mountebank tailor was knighted.
Grub Street Journal.

(The "mountebank tailor" was Dr. Read; see below.)

(9) HANCOCK (Dr.), whose panacea was cold water and stewed prunes.

¶ Dr. Sangrado prescribed hot water and stewed apples.—Lesage: Gil Blas, ii. 2 (1715).

¶ Dr. Rezio of Barataria would allow Sancho Panza to eat only "a few wafers, and a thin slice or two of quince."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, II. iii. 10 (1615).

(10) HANNES (Dr.), knighted by queen Anne. He was born in Oxfordshire.

The queen, like heaven, shines equally on all,
Her favours now without distinction fall,
Great Read, and slender Hannes, both knighted, show
That none their honours shall to merit owe.
A Political Squib of the Period.

(11) KATERFELTO (Dr.), the influenza doctor. He was a tall man, dressed in a black gown and square cap; and was originally a common soldier in the Prussian service. In 1782 he exhibited in London his solar microscope, and created immense excitement by showing the infusoria of muddy water, etc. Dr. Katerfelto used to say that he was the greatest philosopher since the time of sir Isaac Newton.

And Katerfelto with his hair on end,
At his own wonders, wondering for his bread.
Cowper: The Task ("The Winter Evening," 1782).

(12) LILLY (William), astrologer, born at Diseworth, in Leicestershire (1602–1681).

(13) LONG (St. John), born at Newcastle, began life as an artist; but afterwards set up as a curer of consumption, rheumatism, and gout. His profession brought him wealth, and he lived in Harley Street, Cavendish Square. St. John Long died of rapid consumption (1798–1834).

(14) MAPP (Mrs.), bone-setter. She was born at Epsom, and at one time was very rich; but she died in great poverty at her lodgings in Seven Dials, 1737.

(Hogarth has introduced her in his heraldic picture, "The Undertakers' Arms." She is the middle of the three figures at the top, and is holding a bone in her hand.)

(15) MOORE (Mr. John), of the Pestle and Mortar, Abchurch Lane, immortalized by his "worm-powder," and called the "Worm-Doctor" (died 1733).

Vain is thy art, thy powder vain,
Since worms shall eat e'en thee.
Pope: To Mr. John Moore (1733).

(16) MORISON (Dr.), famous for his pills (consisting of aloes and cream of tartar, equal parts). Professor Holloway, Dr. Morison, Rowland maker of hair oil and tooth-powder, and Pear maker of "Pear's soap," were the greatest advertisers of the nineteenth century.

(17) NOSTRADAMUS (Michael), a physician and astrologer, born December 14, 1503, at St. Remy, in Provence. He took his doctor's degree at Montpelier, after which he practised at various places, particularly Aix and Lyons, where he was successful in the cure of a pestilential disease. He pretended to the gift of prophecy, and one of his prognostications bore so remarkable an allusion to the death of Henry II., that Nostradamus received many presents, and was appointed physician to the court. He died July 2, 1566. His Centuries of Prophecies have been published in English.

(18) PARTRIDGE, cobbler, astrologer, almanac-maker, and quack (died 1708).

> Weep, all you customers who use
> His pills, his almanacs, or shoes.
> Swift: Elegy, etc.

(19) READ (Sir William), a tailor, who set up for oculist, and was knighted by queen Anne. This quack was employed both by queen Anne and George I. Sir William could not read. He professed to cure wens, wry-necks, and hare-lips (died 1715).

> . . . none their honours shall to merit owe—
> That popish doctrine is exploded quite,
> Or Ralph had been no duke, and Read no knight;
> That none may virtue or their learning plead,
> This hath no grace, and that can hardly read.
> A Political Squib of the Period.

(The "Ralph" referred to is Ralph Montagu, son of Edward Montagu, created viscount in 1682, and duke of Montagu in 1705. He died 1709.)

(20) ROCK (Dr. Richard) professed to cure every disease, at any stage thereof. According to his bills, "Be your disorder never so far gone, I can cure you." He was short in stature and fat, always wore a white three-tailed wig, nicely combed and frizzed upon each cheek, carried a cane, and waddled in his gait (eighteenth century).

> Dr. Rock, F.U.N., never wore a hat. He is usually drawn at the top of his own bills sitting in an armchair, holding a little bottle between his finger and thumb, and surrounded with rotten teeth, nippers, pills, and gallipots.—Goldsmith: A Citizen of the World, lxviii. (1759).

(21) SMITH (Dr.), who went about the country in the eighteenth century in his coach with four outriders. He dressed in black velvet, and cured any disease for sixpence. "His amusements on the stage were well worth the sixpence which he charged for his box of pills."

> As I was sitting at the George inn, I saw a coach with six bay horses, a calash and four, a chaise and four, enter the inn, in yellow livery turned up with red; and four gentlemen on horseback, in blue, trimmed with silver. As yellow is the colour given by the dukes in England, I went out to see what duke it was, but there was no coronet on the coach, only a plain coat-of-arms, with the motto ARGENTO LABORAT FABER [Smith works for money]. Upon inquiry, I found this grand equipage belonged to a mountebank named Smith.—A Tour through England (1723).

(22) SOLOMON (Dr.), eighteenth century. His "anti-impetigines" was simply a solution of bichloride of mercury coloured.

(23) TAYLOR (Dr. Chevalier John). He called himself "Opthalminator, Pontificial, Imperial, and Royal." It is said that five of his horses were blind from experiments tried by him on their eyes (died 1767).

(Hogarth has introduced Dr. Taylor in his "Undertakers' Arms." He is one of the three figures at the top, to the left hand of the spectator.)

(24) THORNHILL (Dr. Benjamin), "the seventh son of a seventh son," and the "servant of his majesty king George II." His advertisement as such appeared in the Evening Post, August 6, 1717.

(25) UNBORN DOCTOR (The), of Moorfields. Not being born a doctor, he called himself "The Un-born Doctor."

(26) WALKER (Dr.), one of the three great quacks of the eighteenth century, the others being Dr. Rock and Dr. Timothy Franks. Dr. Walker had an abhorrence of quacks, and was for ever cautioning the public not to trust them, but come at once to him, adding, "there is not such another medicine in the world as mine."

> Not for himself but for his country he prepares his gallipot, and seals up his precious drops for any country or any town, so great is his zeal and philanthropy.—Goldsmith: A Citizen of the World, lxviii. (1759).

(27) WARD (Dr.), a footman, famous for his "friars' balsam." He was called in to prescribe to George II., and died 1761. Dr. Ward had a claret stain on his left cheek, and in Hogarth's famous picture, "The Undertakers' Arms," the cheek is marked gules. He occupies the right-hand side of the spectator, and forms one of the triumvirate; the others being Dr. Taylor and Mrs. Mapp.

¶ Dr. Kirlëus and Dr. Tom Saffold are also known names.

Quackleben (Dr. Quentin), "the man of medicine," one of the committee at the Spa.—Sir W. Scott: St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.).

Quadroon. Zambo is the issue of an Indian and a Negro; Mulatto, of a Whiteman and a Negress; Terzeron, of a Whiteman and a Mulatto woman; Quadroon, of a Terzeron and a White.

Quaint (Timothy), servant of governor Heartall. Timothy is "an odd fish, that loves to swim in troubled waters." He says, "I never laugh at the governor's good humours, nor frown at his infirmities. I always keep a sober, steady phiz, fixed as the gentleman's on horseback at Charing Cross; and, in his worst of humours, when all is fire and faggots with him, if I turn round and coolly say, 'Lord, sir, has anything ruffled you?' he'll burst out into an immoderate fit of laughter, and exclaim, 'Curse that inflexible face of thine! Though you never suffer a smile to mantle on it, it is a figure of fun to the rest of the world.'"—Cherry: The Soldier's Daughter (1804).

Quaker Poet (The), Bernard Barton (1784–1849); and J. G. Whittier, an American (1808–1892).

Quale (Mr.), a philanthropist, noted for his bald, shining forehead. Mrs. Jellyby hopes her daughter Caddy will become Quale's wife.—Dickens: Bleak House (1852).

Quarll (Philip), a sort of Robinson Crusoe, who had a chimpanzee for his "man Friday." The story consists of the adventures and sufferings of an English hermit named Philip Quarll (1727).

Quasimodo, the Hunchback of Notre Dame. Quasimodo, the ringer of Notre Dame, hunchbacked, bowlegged, and one-eyed. He was found, when a baby, by Claude Frollo, the archdeacon of Joas, on Quasimodo Sunday. Frollo adopted the miserable, misshapen child, and baptized it by the name of Quasimodo. One day Esmeralda, the beautiful gipsy dancing-girl, crossed the hunchback's path, and he loved her as she spoke kindly to him. He saved her when she was about to be executed for witchcraft, and hid her in Notre Dame, where she lived till Claude Frollo, who entertained a base passion for her, enticed her away. She did not return his love; he left her to the mercy of the people, and she was hanged for a witch. Quasimodo threw Frollo over the battlements of Notre Dame, and disappeared. Two years after, the skeleton of his body was found in the cave of Montfaucon, clasping the skeleton of Esmeralda, and it was inferred that he crept into the cave where the body was thrown, and lay down by her to die. The tale takes place about the year 1482.—Victor Hugo: Notre Dame de Paris (1831).

Quatre Fils Aymon (Les), the four sons of the duke of Dordona (Dordogne). Their names are Rinaldo, Guicciardo, Alardo, and Ricciardetto (i.e. Renaud, Guiscard, Alard, and Richard), and their adventures form the subject of an old French romance by Huon de Villeneuve (twelfth century).

Quaver, a singing-master, who says, "If it were not for singing-masters, men and women might as well have been born dumb." He courts Lucy by promising to give her singing lessons.—Fielding's The Virgin Unmasked (about 1740).

Queen (The Starred Ethiop), Cassiopea, wife of Cepheus (2 syl.) king of Ethiopia. (See CASSIOPEA, p. 184.)—Milton: Il Penseroso, 19 (1638).

The White Queen, Mary queen of Scots, La Reine Blanche; so called by the French, because she dressed in white as mourning for her husband.

Queen Dick, Richard Cromwell (1626, 1658–1660, died 1712).

It happened in the reign of queen Dick, i.e. never, on the Greek kalends. This does not refer to Richard Cromwell, but to queen "Outis." There never was a queen Dick, except by way of joke.

Queen Mary, an historic drama by lord Tennyson (1875). It introduces her love for Philip of Spain, her marriage, and her hopeless yearning for a son who might inherit the crown of Great Britain and of Spain.

(Victor Hugo wrote a tragedy called Mary Tudor, in 1833; Aubrey de Vere, in 1847; and Miss Dickenson, in 1876.)

Queen Sarah, Sarah Jennings duchess of Marlborough (1660–1744).

Queen Anne only reigned, while queen Sarah governed.—Temple Bar, 208.

Queen Square Hermit (The), Jeremy Bentham, 1, Queen Square, London (1748–1832).

Queen Victoria's Name is Alexandrina Victoria Guelph. Prince Albert's name was Francis Augustus Charles Emanuel Busici. The family name of prince Albert was Wetter; if, therefore, the queen took her husband's family name, she would be Mrs. Wetter.

Queen of Hearts, Elizabeth Stuart daughter of James I., the unfortunate queen of Bohemia (1596–1662).

Queen of Heaven, Astartê ("the moon"). Horace calls the moon "the two-horned queen of the stars."

N.B.—Some speak of the Virgin Mary as "the queen of heaven."

Queen of Queens. Cleopatra was so called by Mark Antony (B.C. 69–30).

Queen of Song, Angelica Catala'ni; also called "The Italian Nightingale" (1782–1849).

¶ The Swedish Nightingale was Jenny Lind (Mrs. Goldschmidt) (1821–1886).

Queen of Sorrow (The Marble), the mausoleum built by shah Jehan to his favourite wife Moomtaz-i-Mahul.

Queen of Tears, Mary of Mo'dena, second wife of James II. of England (1658–1718).

Her eyes became eternal fountains of sorrow for that crown her own ill policy contributed to lose.—Noble: Memoirs, etc. (1784).

Queen of the Antilles [An-teel], Cuba.

Queen of the East, Zenobia queen of Palmy'ra (*, 266–273).

Queen of the Eastern Archipelago, the island of Java.

Queen of the Mississippi Valley, St. Louis of Missouri.

Queen of the North, Edinburgh.

Queen of the Sciences, theology.

Queen of the Sea, ancient Tyre.

Queen of the South, Maqueda or Balkis queen of Sheba or Saba.

The queen of the south . . . came from the uttermost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon.—Matt. xii. 42; see also 1 Kings x. 1.

(According to tradition, the queen of the south had a son by Solomon named Melech, who reigned in Ethiopia or Abyssinia, and added to his name the words Belul Gian ("precious stone"), alluding to a ring given to him by Solomon. Belul Gian translated into Latin became pretiosus Joannes, which got corrupted into Prester John (presbyter Johannes), and has given rise to the fables of this "mythical king of Ethiopia.")

Queen of the Swords. Minna Troil was so called, because the gentlemen, formed into two lines, held their swords so as to form an arch or roof under which Minna led the ladies of the party.—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate (time, William III.).

(In 1877 W. Q. Orchardson, R.A., exhibited a picture in illustration of this incident.)

Queens (Four daughters). Raymond Berenger count of Provence had four daughters, all of whom married kings: Margaret married Louis IX. of France; Eleanor married Henry III. of England; Sancha married Henry's brother Richard king of the Romans; and Beatrice married Charles I. of Naples and Sicily.

Four daughters were there born
To Raymond Ber'enger, and every one
Became a queen.
Dante: Paradise, vi. (1321)

Queerummania, the realm of Chrononhotonthologos. — Carey: Chrononhotonthologos (1734).

Quentin (Black), groom of sir John Ramorny.—Sir W. Scott: Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).
